That is, we who live under the light, and enjoy the liberty of the gospel, with open face beholding as in a clear glass the glory of the Lord Jesus, as Moses did the glory of God in the mount, are by degrees changed into the same image with him, from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord working in us, and transforming us into his own likeness. Learn hence, 1. That the word and ordinances of God are the glass wherein we have now a sight of the glory of God. 2. That the sight of God in his ordinances is transforming, as well as the sight of him in heaven; the glory into which we are changed, is our conformity to that likeness which shineth in the word. Vision, or the sight of God here in its ordinances, assimilates as well as in heaven; perfect vision produceth perfect assimilation; but the soul's present assimilation, or imperfect conformity to God here, is gradually carried on by daily communion with him. All sorts of communion among men have an assimilating power and efficacy: He that converses with vain company, grows more vain, and he that delights in holy and spiritual company, grows more serious than he was before: But nothing so transforms the spirit of a man, as communion with God in his ordinances doth; none so like him, as those that converse most frequently with him. 3. That if the sight of God in the glass of an ordinance be so assimilating, how transforming will be the sight of God in heaven, when we shall there behold and see him face to face? If the vision of Christ here be so influential upon believers, what an illustrious and infallible efficacy will the immediate, clear, and perfect sight of his glory have in heaven? 1 John iii. 2. We shall be perfectly like him, when once we shall see him as he is.

In this chapter the apostle vindicates his office and dignity from the prejudices which either his sufferings which attended him in the dispensation thereof, or the suggestions of false apostles, and deceitful workers might have raised up against him.

THHEREFORE seeing we have this ministry, as we have received mercy, we faint not; 2. But have renounced the hidden things of dishonesty, not walking in craftiness, nor handling the word of God deceitfully, but by manifestation of the truth commending ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God.

That is, seeing we have such a glorious ministry, far more excellent than that of Moses, mentioned in the conclusion of the foregoing chapter, as we have received mercy or special favours from God in committing it to us, so we faint not under the difficulties and pressures to which it doth expose us. Having received mercy we faint not; but have renounced the hidden things of dishonesty, all fornication and uncleanness, all ambition and covetousness, which the false apostles allowed themselves in: Not walking in guile or craftiness; nor handling the word of God deceitfully, as they do; but by manifestation of the truth, commending ourselves to every man's conscience, as persons acting in the sight of God. Learn hence, 1. That the ministry of the gospel is a very glorious ministry, far excelling the Mosaic dispensation. 2. That it is a special favour from God to be judged faithful, and put into this ministry. 3. That no troubles or trials, no difficulties, dangers or distresses, should cause any of the faithful servants of God to faint, who have have received mercy or favour from God to be put into the ministry: Seeing we have this ministry, as we have, received mercy, we faint not. Observe, next, How the apostle, having vindicated and extolled his ministry, does in the second verse declare and assert his fidelity in the discharge of his ministry: Not handling the sword of God deceitfully, but commending ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God. Hence learn, That the apostles delivered the gospel, in all things necessary to be known, believed, and practised, with great plainness and sufficient perspicuity; otherwise, they could not be said to manifest the truth to every man's conscience.

3 But if our gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost:

As if he had said, We preach the gospel plainly: But if men do not understand and believe it, will not embrace and obey it, it is not an argument of the gospel's obscurity, but of our hearers incredulity: The gospel is not hid from men for want of clearness, but only by means of their own voluntary and wilful blindness: If our gospel be hid. Here note, 1. St. Paul's claim and interest in the gospel which he preached, he calls it his gospel; not as if he was the author of it, but because of his instrumentality in the promulgation and establishing of it, it was a divine treasure committed to his care and trust; it was not his gospel, by way of original revelation, but by way of ministerial dispensation. 2. The Corinthians non-proficiency under the gospel, specified, or at least supposed. If our gospel be hid; that is, if the word, which we preach with the greatest plainness, in the greatest simplicity and sincerity, if it be hidden from the minds and understandings of men, so as to miss of its convincing power, and converting efficacy, the fault is not in the gospel, but in them that sit under it. 3. The heavy doom and judgment which the apostle passes upon all such persons as sit under the external dispensation of the gospel, and yet are no ways enlightened nor improved by it, but remain blind and ignorant, obstinate, and unreformed. It is a sad symptom and foreboding sign of a lost people. Learn hence, 1. That there are many, very many, who sit under the external dispensation of the gospel, unto whom the gospel is an hidden gospel. 2. That the gospel's being hid from a people, who have long enjoyed the light and benefit of it, is a sad symptom, yea, a certain sign of a lost people. Such blindness, under the clearest light, is like the covering of the face, or tying the handkerchief over the eyes, in order to the turning off the obstinate sinner into an eternal hell.

4 In whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of them which believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ, who is the image of God should shine unto them.

Observe here, 1. The title given to Satan, he is styled the God of this world; not properly, but because the honour and homage of a god is challenged by him, and by a multitude of sinners given to him. He is called by our Saviour the prince of this world, and by the apostle the ruler of the darkness of this world; because he ruleth over a great part of the world, and they are his subjects, or, rather his slaves. 2. The way and course which Satan takes to secure his subjects' obedience to himself; he blinds their eyes, that they may never know a better prince, see a better way, or understand a better state, than he hath drawn them into. Satan blinds the understanding of men by the efficacy of divers lusts, which are bred and nourished in their hearts. Now the streamings of sensual lust from a corrupt heart, do blind the understanding, and beset the judgment, that the sinner can neither see nor know the excellency of spiritual objects. O bloody and barbarous prince, that puts out the eyes of all his subjects, darkens the mind and understanding, takes away the thinking, considering, and reasoning power of the soul, that they neither see nor consider spiritual things, nor have any distinct and effectual apprehensions of them! 3. The character of the persons whom Satan the God of this world, hath blinded; Such as believe not; that is, both such as want the means of faith, and such as enjoy the means, but want the grace of faith: The former is the case of the Pagan, the latter of the Christian world. Lord! how many live, under the light of the gospel, that never had heart to receive it, or will to obey it! How great a part of the Christianized world do reject Christ! though called by his name, yet will not own his authority, or submit to his government. The nobles of the world think themselves dishonoured by submitting their necks to Christ's yoke; the sensualists of the world will not lay down a lust for him, that laid down his life for them; the worldlings of the earth prefer their dirt and dunghill before the pearl of great price. O how few amongst them that profess Christianity, do love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity! 4. The great end and design of the devil's agency, in blinding the minds of men with ignorance and error, with passion and prejudice: lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ should shine into their hearts, to the ruin of him and his kingdom. As the sun casts its beam upon blind men, but they receive not the light of it, so, though the light of Christ's glorious gospel shines before the eyes of them whom the god of this world has blinded with the hopes and desires, with the possessions and enjoyments of this world, yet they receive it not. 5. The glorious title here given to Christ, The image of God; that is, (1.) His substantial and essential image, being God of God, very God of very God. Christ, considered with respect to his divine nature, is the express image of his Father's person. (2.) Christ is his image as Mediator, and with reference to the gospel, in which he has given us glorious demonstrations of the power and wisdom, of the grace and holiness, of the mercy and goodness of God towards; all which, as in a glass, are represented to us, and presented before us. In both these respects Christ is called, The image of God.

5 For we preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord; and ourselves your servants for Jesus' sake.

In these words, our apostle further manifests his fidelity and integrity in preaching the gospel, by shewing that he sought to advance Christ, and not himself, in preaching of it. Here note, 1. The duty practised by St. Paul: We preach. How mean and ignoble soever this office of preaching is esteemed by some men, who value not their own or other men's souls, and therefore no wonder that they undervalue the means of making them happy; yet will the faithful ministers of Christ magnify this part of their office, not by pomp and state, nor by scorn and superciliousness, as thinking it beneath them to preach, but by an humble and painful attendance upon the ministry, which they have received of the Lord; and will dispense the word with evidence and perspicuity, with faithfulness and sincerity, with power and authority, with courage and boldness, and with exemplariness of conversation; not preaching angelical sermons, and leading diabolical lives. 2. The subject-matter of the apostle's preaching; not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord. But when may persons be said to preach themselves? Ans. When they make themselves the authors of their own ministry, running before they are sent, and are self-created preachers; when they make themselves the matter of their preaching, venting their own passions, and prejudices, and private opinions, instead of the doctrine of Christ; and when they make themselves the end of their preaching, aiming rather at pleasing others, and profiting themselves, than at the glory of God, and the good men's souls. But what is it to preach Christ? We preach not ourselves, but Jesus Christ our Lord. Ans. When he is the author of our ministry, and we receive our mission from him; when we make him the object of our preaching; when the subject-matter and substance of it is Jesus Christ, either explicitly or reductively; and when we make him the end of our preaching, desiring to promote the honour and interest of Christ by our ministry, that his people may be gathered, his body edified, his saints perfected, his enemies subdued, his gospel propagated, and he finally admired in all them that believe. 3. In what capacity the apostle looked upon himself in the church of Christ; not as a lord, but as a servant: Ourselves your servants. There is an honour belonging to Christ's ministers, but verily that honour consists in service which we owe to the church of Christ: Servants we are to the souls of men, but not to the humours of men; at the same time that we are servants to them, we are to rule over them, and they are to obey, and submit unto us as those who watch for their souls. Therefore it is added, Servants for Jesus's sake: that is, servants in order to the promoting of his honour, and his church's interest.

6 For God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.

Observe here, The faithful and humble acknowledgment which the apostle makes, how himself and his fellow-apostles came to preach Jesus Christ so convincingly to others; namely, That Almighty God, who at first by his omnipotent word produced light out of darkness, by no less efficacy and power brought him, a lost sinner, out of the darkness of Pharisaism and sin, and shined into his and their hearts with a glorious light, to the intent that he and they should communicate and impart this divine light of the knowledge of God, which shineth in the face of Christ unto others. Learn hence, That ministers must know Christ themselves, before they can make him known to others; Christ must be revealed in them, before he can be revealed by them; he must shine into their hearts by his holy Spirit, and give them an experimental acquaintance, in their own souls, with what they deliver and make known to others. Every truth ought to be the transcript of our own experience, and be preached first to our hearts, and then to our hearers. Who can savingly enlighten others, that is in the darkness of ignorance, or sin, himself?

7 ¶ But we have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us.

In the foregoing verses we find the apostle magnifying his office, extolling his ministry, and vindicating his fidelity in the discharge of his duty. In this verse, observe, 1. He compares the gospel he preached to a treasure: We have this treasure; a treasure for the enriching and edifying of the church. The gospel is a treasure for its worth and dignity, for its abundance and variety, for its closeness and secrecy. This treasure Christ keeps under lock and key, only intrusting those with it whom he calls to it, and furnishes for it. They are no better than thieves and sacrilegious robbers, who without a mediæ call or warrant from Christ, do assume this trust, and break open this treasure. 2. The repository in which this treasure is laid up, in earthen vessels: So the apostles and ministers of the gospel are called. Where note, The word of description, they are vessels; and the word of diminution, they are earthen vessels. (1.) The preachers of the gospel are represented by a word of description, they are vessels: Thus vessels are not natural, but artificial instruments. No man is born a Christian, much less a minister, but made such. Vessels are not of equal capacity; some are less, others greater: Thus the ministers of the gospel have gifts and graces of different degrees and excellencies. Again, vessels are not for reception only, but for effusion also: as they receive and retain, so they let out what is put into them: The ministers of Christ are not only to receive and lay up, but to lay out this heavenly treasure, which is not impaired by imparting. Finally, vessels are not the originals of what they have, but all they contain is poured into them, and received by them. A mine has treasure in its own bowels, but it is put into the chest. Thus the preachers of the gospel are not the authors, but the receivers only, of those truths which they publish: 1 Cor. xi. 23. I have received of the Lord what I also delivered unto you. Note farther, The word of diminution, they are earthen vessels. The preachers of the gospel are divine in regard of the sublimity of their doctrine, but human and earthen in regard of the frailty of their condition. Their being called earthen vessels, may denote the meanness of their condition, which for the most part is little and low in the world: As the poor receive the gospel, so are they very often poor and low that publish the gospel, necessitous and indigent, earthen vessels. Again, it may denote the frailty of their persons, and the contemptibleness of them. Earthen vessels are little set by, stand in open places, used by every hand, and at every turn; while plate, gold and silver vessels are are laid and locked up with great carefulness. Thus it is often with the preachers of the gospel, they are objects base and vile, contemptible and despised in the eyes of the world, vessels wherein there is no pleasure; yea, with some, not only our persons are despicable, but our very office and function is contemptible. In a word, as our mean condition and base estimation, so our bodily constitution proclaims us earthen: Our bodies are earthen, because formed of the dust of the earth, because subject to flaws and cracks, and to be broken in pieces; we that preach eternal life to others, are dying men ourselves; and whilst the word of life is in our mouths, many times death is in our faces. Lastly, The reason assigned why this treasure of the gospel is committed to earthen vessels, men; not to heavenly vessels, angels; namely, That the excellency of the power might be of God, and not of us: From the weakness of man, the instrument, there redounds great honour to God, the agent. This precious treasure of the gospel is lodged in such weak and worthless vessels, that as the power is from God, namely, the awakening, convincing, quickening, heart-changing power of the word is from him: So the glory, the entire glory and complete praise, may be attributed and ascribed to him.

8 We are troubled on every side, yet not distressed; we are perplexed, yet not in despair; 9 Persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed; 10 Always bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our body, 11 For we which live are always delivered unto death for Jesus's sake, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our mortal flesh. 12 So then death worketh in us, but life in you. 13 We having the same spirit of faith, according as it is written, I believed, and therefore have I spoken; we also believe, and therefore speak:

The false apostles and some weak Christians having taken offence at the manifold and great sufferings which St. Paul, with his fellow apostles, had met with in the course of their ministry: In these verses, St. Paul shews the church at Corinth, that there was no reason at all why any should be offended at his sufferings, or any cause why the false apostles should object, that if he had preached the gospel sincerely, Almighty God would never have suffered him to be persecuted and afflicted so severely; namely, because all his afflictions were so graciously moderated, and himself so powerfully upheld by God, that he sunk not under the weight and burden of them. We are troubled, says he, on every side, but not overwhelmed with our troubles; we are often perplexed, but not so as to despair of God's help and succour; we are persecuted by men, but not forsaken of God; cast down indeed, but not killed by the fall. So that there is in our sufferings a resemblance and representation of the death and sufferings of Christ Jesus. We bare in our bodies a memorative conformity to our dying Lord, that it may appear how mightily we are supported by the quickening power of the Spirit of Christ, under all our afflictions. As if the apostle had said, "Behold and admire in us the almighty power of Christ exerted towards us, in upholding these earthen vessels (our frail bodies) notwithstanding the many thousand knocks they have met with in carrying about that heavenly treasure, the holy gospel, with which God has intrusted us." Observe next, He rejoices in the cause of his sufferings: We are delivered unto death for Jesus's sake: for our owning, preaching, and practising the doctrine of Jesus. Blessed be God, we suffer not as evil doers, but for well doing; we suffer for the sake of the best person, and in the best cause, that ever the world was acquainted with. He adds, We are delivered unto death, that the life of Jesus might be made manifest in our mortal flesh; that is, the infinitely wise God suffers us to be thus afflicted, that in and by the sufferings which our mortal flesh does sustain and undergo, he might make it evidently manifest that Christ is risen from the dead; and, as a living Head, conveys the necessary influences of strength, support and comfort, to all his members, so more particularly to us his ministers; by which we are enabled, without fainting, to suffer the hardest things with patience, courage, and constancy. Lastly, He declares to them the great advantages which they reaped by his afflictions: Death worketh in us, but life in you; that is, the preaching of the gospel exposes us to death, but unto you it brings eternal life. Our death is your life, our sufferings are your advantage, we having the same faithful spirit which was in the saints under the Old Testament, and particularly in holy David, Psal. cxvi. 10. who says, I believed and therefore spake: I was sore afflicted. Now as he believed and trusted in God for deliverance out of his many and great troubles, so, in like manner do we believe and trust. From the whole, note, 1. That a perplexed, and persecuted, and afflicted, and distressed condition, was the lot and portion of the members, but especially of the ministers of Christ, in the first and purest ages of the church. Christ espoused his church to himself upon the bed of the cross, his head begirt with a pillow of thorns, his body drenched in a bath of his own blood: And if the head was crowned with thorns, it is unsuitable that the feet should tread on roses. 2. Though all Christ's followers have drank of the same cup with himself, yet the dregs of the cup have usually been put into the hands of the ministers of the word; we that live are always delivered unto death: Most of the apostles were, by the rage of tyrants, put to cruel deaths, and offered up a bloody sacrifice. The calling of ministers is honourable, but their outward condition is deplorable; their embassy is glorious, but their usage is often grievous: God sends them forth with renown, the world entertains them with reproach. 3. God doth not bring his people into a suffering condition, and there leave them; when they suffer for him, they are not forsaken by him: The voice of despair is not heard in the dark night of their calamity: But God has either the castle of providence, or the ark of promise; the all-sufficiency of his power, or the abundance of his grace: These, every of these, and all these, are for his people's retirement in the greatest storms and tempests.

14 Knowing that he which raised up the Lord
4 X Jesus,

Jesus, shall raise up us also by Jesus, and shall present us with you. 15 For all things are for your sakes, that the abundant grace might through the thanksgiving of many redound to the glory of God.

A double reason is here assigned, why the apostle bare his sufferings with such invincible courage and Christian patience. The first is drawn from the advantage which would redound to the church by his sufferings: All things are for your sakes; that is all the straits we are put to, turn to your advantage: If we die, it is to confirm you by our sufferings; if we be delivered, it is for God's glory and your good, that the abundant grace might by the thanksgiving of many redound to the glory of God. Whatever we meet with tends to the confirming of your faith, and the increasing of your thankfulness. A second reason is drawn from the joyful issue of his sufferings: He and his fellow-apostles steadfastly believed, that Almighty God, who raised up Christ from the dead, would in like manner raise them from the grave of their sufferings, yea, from the grave of death; and both soul and body shall be presented with them, to be eternally glorified together. Learn hence, That how different soever the lot and portion of God's children and servants be in this life, some more, others less afflicted; yet having all, at the same time, faith in God for a joyful deliverance out of their afflictions, they shall all meet in the morning of the resurrection, and be by Christ presented unto God as persons redeemed by him, and shall eternally be glorified with him.

16 For which cause we faint not; but though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day.

The original word for fainting, signifies to shrink back, as cowards in war, or to sink down as a porter under the pressure of some heavy burden: For this cause we faint not. For what cause? Namely this, that though their bodies were weakened by affliction, and they were daily decaying as to the strength and vigour of the outward man; yet as to their inward man, the strength and vigour of their minds and spirits, were day by day renewed. O happy apostle! the cold blasts of persecution beating upon thy outward man, did, by a spiritual antiperistasis, increase the heat of grace within; thy soul is made fat with blows upon thy body, and battens with pricking and beating; every stone thrown at thee knocked thee nearer to Christ, the chief corner-stone: Under all the storms and billows of affliction, thou, like Noah's ark, wert lift up nearer to heaven; and after every encounter, thy salvation is nearer than before. Well therefore mightest thou declare and say, For this cause we faint not.

Still our apostle proceeds in assigning reasons why all the afflictions which himself and others met with, were not only tolerable, but joyous; namely, because, (1.) His afflictions were light. (2.) Because they were short. They were light; but how? Not considered in themselves; so they were hard and heavy; thrice was he beaten with rods, five times he received forty stripes save one; but light, compared with the glory expected. Again, they were short; but for a moment, compared with eternity. Mark the gradation: For affliction there is glory; for light affliction, a weight of glory; and for light affliction, which is but for a moment, an eternal weight of glory. Observe farther, the apostle doth not barely say, that glory will be the consequent of affliction, but that affliction will be the cause of glory; it worketh for us. But how? Not as a meritorious cause: For alas! how can our afflictions deserve this happiness? What proportion can there be betwixt light and momentary afflictions, and an eternal weight of glory? But they work for us, as they are sanctified by God to us. His infinite mercy and goodness, his covenant-truth and faithfulness, make his saints afflictions a whipping-post to their corruptions; they purge out iniquity, and take away our sin, if we belong to God as his covenant-children. But for wicked and obdurate sinners, alas! it is much otherwise: Instead of being refined from their dross, and purged from their filth, by being in the furnace of affliction, it boils their scum and impurity more into them; and, like flints in the fire, they fly in the very face of God their refiner.

The last reason is assigned here, why the apostle was kept from fainting in and under the pressure of the most things; not at things seen, but unseen; not at things-temporal, but eternal. Observe here, 1. What it was that the apostle, when on earth, made his main scope, his chief aim, grand design, and grand end. This is signified to us in the original word σκοπεω, which signifies to look as the archer doth at the mark he shoots at. There were some things which he, his fellow apostles, and all serious Christians with them, looked at. This is specified, first, negatively, We look not at things seen; at the things of this life, at the sensible objects, be they bitter or sweet, be they comforts or crosses: Temporal things are temporary things; and we mind them not as the men of the world do, who make them their chief and principal aim, and scope: No, we leave the men of the world to the world; We look not at things which are seen. But, secondly, This is specified affirmatively. We look at the things which are not seen; the things of another life, things which are objects of faith, and not visible to fleshly eyes; we look at these, we make these our aim and scope. And the reason is subjoined why they made these things the matter of their choice, the objects of their desire and endeavour. This is intimated in the word (for); For the things which are seen are temporal; that is, all the visible things of this life, whether comforts or crosses, whether prosperous or adverse, be it health or sickness, liberty or restraint, poverty or riches, honour or disgrace, life or death, they are all ωφειματα for a while, only for a short season, as the word signifies; therefore we do not much eye them, we trouble not our heads, heads much about them; they are things of an higher nature we look at, such as neither eye hath seen, nor ear heard; and these are the durable things; for the things which are not seen are eternal. Learn hence, 1. That temporal things, or things that are seen, do take up the heads and hearts, the minds and thoughts of the men of the world, and are the sum of their desires, and the substance of their endeavours: We look not at the things which are seen, but there are those that do; we make them not our aim and scope, but others look at them, wholly at them, can see nothing beyond them, and desire nothing besides them. 2. That things unseen, the things of eternity, and the visible encouragements of another world, are the mark and scope which every real Christian is aiming at, and contending for: We look at the things which are not seen, and make them our aim and scope. 3. That the things not seen, or the things of another life and world, are eternal things; that is, such things as admit of no changes and alterations, of no gradations or successions, of no decay or consumption, of no future hopes and expectations, of no mixture or moderation, of no recovery or revocation, of no period or conclusion. O eternity! eternity! that vast, that boundless ocean of eternity! how does it swallow up our thoughts with wonder and amazement! God help us daily to consider of it, duly to prepare for it, and not to prefer the trifles of time before it, but make the wisest provision for the longest duration. 4. That which puts the weight upon things not seen, and renders them the proper objects of a Christian's aim and choice, is this, because they are eternal: That which chiefly casts the scale, and maketh things not seen to preponderate, is because they are eternal things. It is eternity which transcendeth all expression, all conception, much more all our comprehension, that puts an infinite weight upon unseen things: The things which are not seen are eternal. This meditation, well digested, would work in us an holy indifferency towards all temporal things; it would moderate our esteem of them, our desires after them, our delight in them, and our grief for the want and loss of them; and sweeten all those troubles and trials, all those sufferings and afflictions, which we meet with in our passage through time into eternity. Lord, take off, and turn away our eyes, from things which are seen, and help us to look at the things which are not seen.

CHAP. V.

Our apostle in this chapter gives a reason why he did so courageously labour in the work of the ministry, notwithstanding the great dangers which he met with: And tells us, it was the well-grounded hopes of a future immortality which did support and bear up his spirit under all the pressures of human life.

FOR we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

Note here, 1. Our apostle compares the body of a believer to an house, to an earthly house, and to an house of tabernacle; to an house, because of its comely fabric and composure, as also in regard of the inhabitant that dwells in it, the never-dying soul; to an earthly house, in regard of the matter of which it was composed, and in regard of the means by which it is sustained; and to an house of tabernacle, because such buildings consist of slight and mean materials, they are soon set up, and as soon taken down. 2. The necessity of this earthly tabernacle of the body's dissolution by death, it must down and be dissolved. 3. The believers future happiness, after the body's present dissolution asserted and declared: They have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. Learn hence, 1. That it is the pleasure and will of God, that his people should for a short time remain in this earthly tabernacle of the body. 2. That this earthly tabernacle of the believer's body, sooner or later, must by death be dissolved. 3. That after the dissolution of this earthly tabernacle of the body, all the faithful have an eternal habitation, a building of God, not made with hands, in the highest heavens. 4. That it is both the duty and interest of every sincere and serious Christian, to labour for the certain knowledge and full assurance of this happy privilege, and be able to say, We know, &c.

2 For in this we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven:

For in this, that is, in this ruinous earthly tabernacle. Note here, 1. The strength and vehemency of the saints affection, we groan; the word signifies such a groaning as of a man that has a load or burden lying upon him, which makes him fetch his wind from his very bowels: As there are groans which proceed from sorrow, so there are groans which arise from desire and hope. Thus here, We groan earnestly desiring. 2. What is the subject which the apostle's groaning desires were carried out after; namely, to be clothed with a celestial body, instead of that clogging body of earthly corruption which here they carried about with them, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon, &c. Learn thence, That such as do believe and wait for a blessed immortality, do groan for it, and earnestly desire it, because of the miseries and pressures by sin and sorrow in this present life, because they have already a taste of the happiness and glory of the life to come, and because the holy Spirit doth excite and stir up these groaning desires in the hearts of believers: Rom. viii. 23. We also, that have the first-fruits of the Spirit, do groan within ourselves.

3 If so that being clothed we shall not be found naked.

That is, If so be at our passage hence, we shall have the happiness to be of the number of those who are found clothed with glory, or clothed with holiness and good work, to fit us for our clothing in glory, that we may not be found naked, in our natural turpitude of sin and spiritual nakedness, which will render us abominable in the sight of God. Learn hence, that none can groan or long for heaven but such as are clothed with a gospel righteousness, that of justification, sanctification, and new obedience: None shall be clothed upon with glory hereafter, but such as are clothed with grace and holiness here.

4 For we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened : not for that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life.

Note here, That this groaning desire, again mentioned by the apostle in this verse, with respect to the burden of the body, to get rid of it, is not either an unnatural desire, or a discontented desire, or a desire of death as death, or a desire to be unhoused, and without clothing for the soul ; but he would be better clothed with a celestial body, that his mortal part might be swallowed up by immortal glory. As if the apostle had said, "As weary as I am of life, by means of sin and sorrow, by reason of corruption and affliction, yet I would not barely, for the sake of that, desire a dissolution, but for the hope's sake of eternal and immortal life." Learn hence, 1. That whilst the saints live in this earthly, mortal body, they are burdened with a heavy load of sin and affliction. 2. That believers thus burdened, do, in an holy manner, groan and long for a better state. 3. That in that better state, mortality shall be swallowed up of life. 4. That in that life, we shall be clothed again with our own bodies, glorious and heavenly.

5 Now he that hath wrought us for the self-same thing is God, who also hath given unto us the earnest of the Spirit.

That is, He that hath wrought and appointed us, he that hath prepared and fitted us for this glorious change, and hath set our souls a-longing for this immortal state, is God; who hath also given us by his Spirit those holy affections, fervent desires and faithful endeavours, which are the earnest of heaven before we enjoy it. Learn hence, 1. That Almighty God doth fit and frame his people for that happy state of blis and glory, which he has designed them for, and appointed them unto. He that hath wrought us for the self-same thing, is God. 2. That to the intent his saints may look and long for that glorious and immortal state with the greater vehemency and desire, he has already given them an earnest and foretaste of it, by his holy Spirit in their hearts.

6 Therefore we are are always confident, knowing that whilst we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord,

We are confident, that is, by the holy Spirit comfortably assured of a better state. They who have the earnest of the Spirit, may be confident of their future glorious state: or we are confident ; that is, we are of good courage, fearing neither death nor danger in the way of our duty, Knowing that whilst we are at home here in the body, that is, whilst sojourning in the body as pilgrims and strangers, we are absent from the Lord: That is, we are detained from the blessed sight and enjoyment of God, and kept out of the possession of that happiness which makes heaven. Here the apostle plainly intimates, that whilst we remain in the body, we are detained from our happiness, and that soon as we leave the body, we shall be admitted to our happiness. Learn, 1. That a Christian is not in his own proper home whilst he sojourneth in the body, and lives in his earthly tabernacle here below. His birth and parentage is from heaven, his treasure and inheritance in heaven, his kindred and relations, and best friends are there, and there shall he longest abide. 2. That the true reason why the saints count themselves here not at home, is because they are absent from the Lord whilst present in the body.

7 For we walk by faith, not by sight :

That is, our condition here in the world is such, that we cannot see God face to face, but by faith only ; whilst we are in the body, we do not see and enjoy, but believe and expect. Faith is the thing in expectation, sight is the thing in fruition : Faith is a cloudy discovery of things at a distance, sight is a clear view and apprehension of things that are present. Learn, 1. That faith is for earth, and sight is for heaven. 2. That till we have sight, it is a great advantage that we have faith. 3. That if we now have faith, we may be well assured, that ere long we shall have sight.

8 We are confident I say, and willing rather to be absent from that body, and to be present with the Lord.

The original words for we are confident and willing, denote first courage and undaunted boldness, with respect to death, and complacency and satisfaction in it. We are willing : The translation is too flat, volens dicitur, we are well pleased. It is a grateful and desirable thing to us to leave the body, yet not in an absolute, but comparative consideration. We are willing rather ; that is, rather than not see and enjoy the Lord, rather than be always here finning and groaning, We had rather be absent from the body, and present with the Lord. Learn, 1. That our happiness in the world to come, lies in our being present with the Lord. 2. That we are present with the Lord, as soon as the soul quitteth and takes its leave and farewell of the body. 3. That a state of separation from the body, is much more preferable to the saints, than that of dwelling in the body. 4. That this desire, preference, and choice, arises from that confident assurance which they have of a better state, and of their interest in it.

9 ¶ Wherefore we labour, that whether present or absent we may be accepted of him.

The word signifies, to labour ambitiously, as an ambitious courtier, labours for his prince's favour. We labour, whether present in the body, or absent from the body, whether living or dying, that our persons and our services may be accepted with him, whenever we appear before him. Learn, 1. That to be accepted with the Lord, is a very high honour : To have our persons accepted and our performances acceptable, are high favours ; the former is the ground of the latter, and Christ is the foundation of both, Ephes. i. 6. Learn, 2. That it is a gracious person's great ambition and desire, his aim and scope, his design and endeavour, that living and dying he may find acceptance with God, and his actions be such, as God may well like and approve of it.

10 For we must all appear before the judgement-seat of Christ, that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad.

These words are fully descriptive of a future judgment. In which observe, 1. The necessity of a future judgment, We must, willing or unwilling. 2. The universality of this judgment; We must all. 3. The person by whom, and before whom, we must be judged, Christ. 4. The manner of this judgment, All must appear, and be made manifest, both persons and actions. 5. The matter about which we shall be judged, The things done in the body. 6. The end of all this inquisition, to be punished or rewarded, according to our actions. Learn 1. That there will certainly come a day, when every person that ever lived in this world, shall certainly be judged by Jesus Christ: We must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ. 2. That every man's judgment and sentence at the great day, shall proceed and be pronounced according to what he has done in the flesh, be it good or bad; That every one may receive the things done in his body, &c.

11 Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord, we persuade men; but we are made manifest unto God; and I trust also are made manifest in your consciences.

That is, knowing the terror and dread of that terrible and dreadful day, in which Christ will judge the whole race of mankind; and being persuaded of the truth and certainty of it ourselves, we endeavour to persuade all men, by all means, to fly from the wrath to come, by repentance and faith, that they may be found of God in peace in that solemn hour. Learn hence, That the knowledge and consideration of the present terrible judgments of God, and the future terrors of that great day, should move the ministers of God to persuade, and their people to be persuaded, to a careful and serious preparation for it. Such ministers as know and consider the terrors of the Lord, will both persuade others, and be persuaded themselves, to look after reconciliation and acceptance with God; that when Christ comes terribly, they may appear comfortably: Knowing the terrors of the Lord we persuade men. It follows, but we are made manifest unto God, and I trust also are made manifest in your consciences. As if he had said, We hope God hath discovered our sincerity unto you in some measure, as he is an observer of it, and witness to it himself. Learn hence, That then a minister has the full assurance of his sincerity, when he has the approbation of God, and his own conscience, and also a testimony in the consciences of his people. This is gained by the purity of our doctrine, by the piety of our lives, and by the prudence of our conduct: When these are evident and manifest to the consciences of our people, how convincing is it to them, and comfortable unto us!

12 For we commend not ourselves again unto you, but give you occasion to glory on your behalf, that, that you may have somewhat to answer them which glory in appearance, and not in heart.

As if our apostle had said, "We commend not ourselves to you upon our own account, as if there were any need of it, with respect to us; but only to give you an occasion to vindicate us, and to glory to others on our behalf, when need requires, that you may have wherewith to answer the calumnies of the false apostles, who gloried much in outward appearance of piety and zeal, but not in purity of heart, and upright intentions." Learn hence; that though the ministers of Christ have no itching desire to exalt themselves in a way of self-condemnation, yet they are sometimes constrained to it in a way of self-vindication, and this is not only lawful, but a duty; because scandals cast upon a good man reach farther than himself; they reflect upon others as well as himself, yea, they reflect upon God himself, therefore to be wiped off and rolled away.

13 For whether we be besides ourselves, it is to God: or whether we be sober, it is for your cause.

The holy apostle was sometimes so zealously transported, and carried forth in his high actions for Jesus Christ, that the false apostles represented him as a frantic person, crazed, mad, and what not: "Be it so, says the holy man, it is unto God, in his cause, and to propagate his glory, and not my own: For if I be sober in my words and actions, it is for your benefit, not my own." Learn hence, That wicked and carnal men account and represent the holy servants of God as a sort of madman. Workings of grace are sometimes so far above reason, that they seem to be without reason: There are several acts of holiness, which the profane world esteem as madness; as eminent self-denial, great seriousness in religion, their burning zeal, their holy singularity, their fervours of devotion, their patience and meekness under sufferings and reproaches. All these acts of holiness represent the saints as madmen to carnal men.

14 For the love of Christ constraineth us.—

That is, the infinite love of Christ, in dying for us, constraineth us to live unto him, and do the utmost services for him. Some understand it passively, for the love that Christ beareth us; others take it actively, for that love which we bear to him. Now, this love is said to constrain. Some think it a metaphor from a woman in travail, that strives to be delivered of her burden; others, that it signifies to have one bound, and so much under power, that he cannot move without leave. The expression denotes the absolute empire which the love of Christ had over him, ruling all the inclinations of his heart, and the actions of his life. It signifies the sweet violence and force of love, by which the soul is overpowered, and cannot say nay; it does wholly possess us, rule and command us, keep us in its power, and obliging force and efficacy, upon the soul, that it inclines it to a willing performance of all duties, that it inclines it with the greatest difficulties and dangers. Love is the spring of action, it is a forcible and compelling, it is an invincible, unconquerable affection: And it has such an influence from the consideration of what Christ is in himself, and of what he has done for us, and designed for us.

—Because

— Because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead: 15 And that he died for all, that they which live, should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them, and rose again.

If one died for all, then were all dead. Some understand it of a death in sin; all were in a state of sin and death, when Christ died for them. Others understand it mystically, when Christ died for all, all were then dead; that is, dead in Christ unto sin; intimating, that when Christ died, all believers were dead in him to sin and the world. As Christ died for sin, so ought all to die unto sin. Farther, Christ dying once for all, proveth the verity of his satisfaction, and the sufficiency of his satisfaction. What virtue was there in that death which merited life for all! What love was there in our God to appoint one for all! That one so worthy in himself, that one so dear to God, should die, should die so willingly, should die so painfully, should die so shamefully, should die under a curse, to absolve from guilt, and discharge from condemnation! Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us! Observe next The great end and design of Christ in his death and resurrection for us; namely, (1.) Negatively declared, that we should not live unto ourselves, to our own ease, profit, or honour; gratifying our own wills, inclinations, and corrupt desires, serving our own interest and ends; but positively, to live unto him, according to his word and will, in obedience to his commands, and with an eye at his glory, who died for our sins, and rose again for our justification. Had Christ only died for us, the favour had been inexpressible and unrequitable, and required us to live to his name and glory; but when he not only died for us, but rose again, and lives for ever in heaven, to pour down fresh benefits upon us, and to do good offices daily and hourly for us, how endearing are our obligations to love him, and to live unto him! Learn hence, 1. That by virtue of Christ's death and resurrection, Christians are both obliged to, and have obtained the grace of newness of life, and holiness of conversation. 2. That it is the duty, and will be the endeavour, of all those that are quickened by the Spirit of Christ unto newness of life, to refer all their actions not to themselves, but unto him: None can do both, live to Christ and self together. His we are already; by creation, by redemption, by sanctification, by voluntary resignation, we live by him. Our spiritual life is from him, we expect hereafter to live with him; let us therefore now live unto him, even unto him that died for us, and rose again.

16 Wherefore henceforth know we no man after the flesh: yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now henceforth know we him no more.

These words, probably, were spoken by the apostle, to rebuke the carnal boastings of some Jews, who gloried in their having seen Christ in the flesh before he died. The apostle directs them to a more spiritual knowledge of him, and since his resurrection, as more suitable to his glorified state: "What though you have eaten and drunken in Christ's presence when on earth, all that corporeal familiarity is ceased; it is his spiritual gracious presence which now you are to depend upon, and value yourselves by." For henceforth know we no man after the flesh; we value no man for his outward advantages, for his wisdom, riches, or learning. Yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, seeing and conversing with him, when here on earth, yet must we know him so, and enjoy him as such, no more. Our carnal affections and relations to him must ever cease, now he is exalted into a spiritual and glorious condition. Learn 1. That a bare knowing of Christ after the flesh, ought to cease among Christians. There is a knowledge of Christ after the flesh, since his ascension into heaven; namely, by a naked profession of his name, without a conformity to his laws, and by acts of sensitive affection: Some by reading the history of our Saviour's passion, others by seeing in the sacramental elements, a tragical representation of his crucifixion, do find their human passions stir and move; but, if it rests here, without drawing forth our love to his person, and quickening our obedience to his commands; all this is but knowing Christ after the flesh to no spiritual or saving purposes. 2. That a bare knowledge of Christ after the flesh will do us no good, be of no comfort or advantage to us, as to our eternal salvation: It is not a fond affection to his person and memory, but obedience to his laws, that Christ values. It is observable, that an outward ceremonious respect to our Saviour's person was very little regarded by him, when here upon earth; a serious attention to his doctrine was infinitely preferred by him before all that. Our love to Christ is better shewn by religious services, than by passionate affections. We find, St. John xx. when Mary fell at Christ's feet, after he was risen, and embraced him, when she held him by the feet and worshipped him, when in an humble and affectionate devotion she lies prostrate before him, Christ forbids it, Touch me not. He rejects all these external testimonies of her love, which proceeded only from human affection; but he directs her to a more acceptable service, namely, to run and carry tidings of his resurrection to his disconsolate disciples; Go to my disciples, and say, &c. From whence I infer, that it is much more acceptable to Christ to be about his service, and doing good in our place and station, than performing any offices of human love and respect unto his person. Seeing then, that this ceremonious respect pleased Christ, neither when on earth, nor now he is in heaven, henceforth know we no man after the flesh, &c.

17 Therefore, if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things are passed away: behold, all things are become new.

As if the apostle had said, If any one amongst you pretend to be a Christian indeed, engrafted into Christ by baptism and regeneration, and is a member of his body, he is by regeneration made a new man, all the faculties of his soul are renewed, his principles, affections, and practices are all new: Old things are passed, or passing away daily, the old carnal inclinations of mind are wearing off, the old will is changed, the old life is reformed; and, in a word, whatever was old and carnal, is now become new and spiritual. Behold, all things become new; new affections, new inclinations, new dispositions, a new course, and a new conversation. Nothing is new physically; he is the same person; he has the same faculties: But all things are new qualitatively, he is renewed in the spirit of his mind. Learn hence, 1. That all such as call themselves the disciples of Christ, and own themselves to be his followers, are and ought to be new creatures. This implies a real and inward, a thorough and prevailing change, both in heart and life; not a civil change, barely from profaneness to sobriety; not a sudden change, only under some great affliction or awakening providence; not a change from one sect or party of professors to another: But the change of the new creature consists in a new mind, a new will, a new judgment, new affections, in a new conversation, not in a new form or profession; the change of the new creature introduces the life of God, and produces the nearest likeness to God. 2. That this new creation, wrought in a man by the word and Spirit of God, is an indubitable evidence of his interest in Christ, and title to salvation; for where the new creature is, there all the saving graces of the Spirit are, as a pledge and an earnest of glory and happiness.

18 And all things are of God,—

That is, all those things forementioned belonging to this new spiritual creation, are of God, as the author and efficient cause of them. Learn, That God is the original author of the new creature, and of all things belonging thereunto. This appears partly from the nature of the work, it is a new creation; and partly from the objects of the work, the persons wrought upon. They are averse from God, in enmity to him, and rebellion against him, dead in sin, under the dominion of Satan. Well therefore might the apostle say, All these things are of God.

—Who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, and hath given to us the ministry of reconciliation: 19 To wit, that God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them; and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation.

In these words the apostle gives us a short, but full account of the grand doctrine of a sinner's reconciliation unto God by the death of Christ, which is the principal subject and substantial part of the gospel. Where observe, 1. The privilege itself, reconciliation; this is two-fold: Fundamental, in the death of Christ, he is our peace; God laid the foundation of our peace and reconciliation with himself in the death of his Son: Actual, in the application of it, on our part, by faith. The death of Christ rendered God reconcilable: Faith renders him actually reconciled. 2. The author of this reconciliation, God the Father; he was the person wronged by sin, declaring his anger against the sinner: Hence we are said to have access to the Father through Christ, and by the Spirit. The Son brings us to the Father, and the Spirit directs us to the Son: Christ takes away God's enmity against us, and the Spirit takes away our enmity against God. 3. The medium or mean by which we become reconciled to God, Jesus Christ. Christ was the meritorious cause of this privilege: Christ is the center of that agreement between the justice of God, and the mercy of God. 4. The parties at variance, and made one by reconciliation, God and the world, God and mankind. Almighty God, in consideration of Christ's death, did so far reconcile and forgive the offending world, as to offer them pardon of sin, and salvation by a redeemer, upon a condition of their believing acceptance: But none are actually reconciled but believers, who actually accept the terms and conditions of peace and reconciliation by faith which is a necessary receptive qualification. Learn hence, That there is an happy peace and reconciliation made in and by Jesus Christ, between an offended God, and an offending world. Reconciliation is a repairing of decayed friendship, or making up of a breach between two that were formerly friends, but now at variance. The reconciliation is mutual, because the enmity is such; yet the scriptures speaks more of our being reconciled to God, than of God's being reconciled to us, because we are in the fault, and not God; we the cause of the breach, we offended God, not God us; and because we have the benefit of this reconciliation, and not God, it is no profit to him that we are at peace with him; and because all the difficulty of being reconciled lies on our part, and not God's.

20 Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us: we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God.

Observe here, 1. The ministers' office and employment declared: they are ambassadors for Christ, ambassadors from God to man; and, as ambassadors, they have their mission, their commission, from a great Prince, about great concerns; they must be faithful to their instructions, they are inviolable by the laws of nations, and their embassy must be received, upon pain of displeasure. Where let us remark, the wonderful goodness and wisdom of God, in appointing men, of the same level with us, and not angels superior to us, to dispense the mystery of reconciliation to us. As God deals more familiarly with us in this way (for we cannot bear the voice of God, or the sight of angels) so there is more certainty in this way, because ministers must deceive their own souls, if they deceive us: And herein God magnifies his own power, and lets us know, that the efficacy of the gospel is from him the author, and not from man the dispenser. 2. The ministers duty discovered; in God's name, and Christ's stead, to intreat, beseech, and persuade sinners to become reconciled unto God. Here note, 1. That God and man were once friends. 2. That God and man are now enemies. 3. That man, and not God, first made the breach of friendship, and occasioned that unhappy controversy, which is now depending between God and man. 4. That though man was the first in the breach, yet God is first in the offer of reconciliation. 5. That therefore it is the highest duty and chiefest interest of man to accept of terms of peace and reconciliation with God. 6. That in order to all this, the great duty incumbent upon the ministers of the gospel, is this, with all earnestness to press upon people the doctrine of reconciliation, and to use all arguments with them, to persuade them to become reconciled unto God.

21 For he hath made him to be sin for us, who knew knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him.

Observe here, 1. The spotless innocency of our Lord Jesus Christ, as Mediator, declared: He knew no sin; that is, practically and experimentally; he knew it not so as to commit it in the least degree; he was a pure, innocent, and sinless person: But theoretically and speculatively he did know sin: He well understood its nature, its effects, and fruits: None knew the bitter fruits of sin so well as our blessed Saviour. 2. God's ordination of Christ, with reference unto sin: He hath made him to be sin; not made him a sinner, but a sin-offering, a sacrifice for sin. Made; that is, ordained a sacrifice to expiate sin, and to bear the punishment due to sinners. 3. The end of this ordination with respect to us, That we might be made the righteousness of God in him. Here note, the righteousness of the Mediator is called the righteousness of God; because (1.) It was the righteousness of that person who was God. (2.) Because the only wise God found out and appointed it. And, (3.) Because it is accepted by God; and the penitent believer, for the sake of it, looked upon as righteous and justified. Learn hence, 1. That sin must have a sacrifice. He hath made him to be sin: that is, a sin-offering, or a sacrifice to expiate sin. Under the law the sacrifice was called sin, because the sin of the person was laid upon the sacrifice; there was a sort of a translation of the sin from the sinner to the sacrifice. 2. That Jesus Christ was made a sacrifice for sin: Our guilt was imputed to him, and our punishment was born by him, which made Luther call Christ the greatest sinner in the world; not that he had any sin in his nature, or in his life, but because the Lord laid on him the iniquity of us all. 3. That Jesus Christ's being made sin for us, is the meritorious cause and means of our being made the righteousness of God in him. Surely God may be as just in pardoning us, who have no righteousness of our own, as in condemning his own Son, who had no sin of his own. Have we broken his royal and righteous law? yet Christ has kept it, and fulfilled all righteousness. Have we sinned against mercy? yet Christ has suffered without mercy: And all this by the ordination and appointment of God the Father, who made his own and only Son to be sin for us, who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him.

CHAP. VI.

Our apostle in the last words of the foregoing chapter having positively asserted the great doctrine of reconciliation through Christ; in this chapter, he draws inferences from that doctrine, by way of application.

WE then as workers together with him, beseech you also that ye receive not the Grace of God in vain.

Observe, 1. The nature of the ministerial function: The ministry is a work, an arduous and laborious work neither angels nor men are of themselves sufficient for it, without proportionable assistance from God. Ministers are workers. 2. They are workers together, they join together with one voice, with one cry, beseeching sinners to be reconciled unto God. All the ministers of Christ are fellow-labourers, workers together in God's harvest-field; that which is the work of one, is the work of all; they should all join in it, and rejoice together in the success of it: not only labour with, but bless God for the services and successes of each other. Lord! how sad is it to see the ministers of God divided in their work and way, when one rejoiceth in that which to another is cause of mourning! 3. Ministers are workers together with God, as well as with one another; they are subordinate instruments working by him, but not co-ordinate causes producing with him the work of conversion in the souls of men; not as if they could communicate any power or strength to the working of grace, by the preaching of the word, 1 Cor. iii 5. Who is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom ye believed? 4. The exhortation, or cautionary direction given. We beseech you, receive not the grace of God in vain; where, by the grace of God, is meant the doctrine of the gospel; because it is graciously and freely bestowed upon a people, and because the matter and message which it brings is grace. The law discovers God's will, the gospel discovers his good will: And by receiving this grace in vain, is meant, the receiving the gospel unfruitfully, unprofitably, and ineffectually; when we do not receive it with a due estimation, with fervency of affection, with a fiducial application; when it doth not purify the heart, reform the life, and save the soul. It is not the receiving of the gospel into our houses, into our heads, into our mouths; but into our hearts, that will bring us to heaven.

2 (For he saith, I have heard thee in a time accepted, and in the day of salvation have I succoured thee: behold now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation.)

These words are taken from the prophet Isa. xlix. 8. They are the promise which God the Father made to Christ, as Mediator, That in the great work of saving his church, the father could accept and succour him, as the head of the church: I have heard thee in an accepted time, in the day of salvation. Here note, There is a two fold day of salvation; the one was Christ's day, for the purchase of salvation; the other is our day, for the application. (1.) Christ had a season assigned him for the impetration or purchase of salvation: And he set in, and complied with that season, and it became an acceptable time with respect to him. (2.) We have also our season allotted us by God, for the application of Christ and his benefits to our souls. Behold, now is our accepted time, now is our day of salvation; let us prize it highly, and improve it stedfastly. It is a day, and that is but a short space of time; it is a day, and therefore continually spending: it is a day, therefore when once gone, is irrecoverably gone. Our working day is a wasting day; it is a day, and that will be followed with a night, in which none can work, but only lament their folly in not working.

3 Giving no offence in any thing, that the ministry be not blamed:

Observe

Observe here, 1. The nature and quality of the work which the ambassadors of Christ are called to, and do labour in, a ministry. 2. What was the desire and aim, the care and endeavour, of the apostle then, ought to be the study of every minister now; namely, to avoid offence, and that universally, both as to persons and things, giving no offence in any thing. 3. What was the ground and reason of this care and endeavour to give no offence, namely, that the ministry be not blamed. Learn, That it is the standing duty of all the ministers of Christ, so to perform their ministerial office, that they give no just offence in any thing to any person, that so the ministry committed to them may not be blamed. We must give no offence by our words and speeches in common conversation; no offence by unsound doctrine, by personal reflections; no offence by gross, careless; and negligent omissions, or by rude and irreverent indecencies, or by any affected singularities in our administrations; but especially, give no offence by a bad life and scandalous conversation.

4 But in all things approving ourselves as the ministers of God, in much patience, in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses, 5 In stripes, in imprisonments, in tumults, in labours, in watchings, in fastings, Observe here, 1. The great care which the holy apostle took to approve himself unto God, in the exercise of his ministry: In all things approving ourselves as the ministers of God. 2. What an approved minister must do and endure, in order to the obtaining the ends of his ministry: If he be called to it, he must bear up against all discouragements, and encounter all oppositions; let the way be what it will, fair or foul, a green carpet way, or dirty poachy way, he must stick at nothing, but go through thick and thin, patiently enduring afflictions of all sorts, and cheerfully undergoing sufferings of all kinds, and exercising all manner of self-denial, for the gospel's sake. Behold here, how the ministers of Christ, that will approve themselves unto God, must run all hazards, and venture through all extremities: They must work in heat and cold, in fire and frost, in all sorts of providences from God, in all sorts of aspects from men, fearing neither the face nor frowns of any: For though every gospel minister attains not to St. Paul's zeal, and holy fortitude and courage, yet he has a truth of zeal, and such a firmness of resolution, as will, according to his measure, carry him through a world of evils and incumbrances, in the doing of that good which duty and conscience doth oblige him to, and call for.

6 By pureness, by knowledge, by long-suffering, by kindness, by the Holy Ghost, by love unfeigned, 7 By the word of truth, by the power of God, by the armour of righteousness on the right hand and on the left, 8 By honour and dishonour, by evil report and good report,—

The apostle, in the foregoing verses, had declared how many difficulties and dangers must be encountered by him that will attain the ends of his ministry, and approve himself unto God in integrity and uprightness; here he shews by how many ways and means the work of the ministry is promoted, and how the ministers of the gospel must be qualified for it; namely, by pureness of conversation, by knowledge of divine mysteries, and study of the holy scriptures, by long-suffering under all provocations, by kindness towards all men, by the gifts and assistances of the Holy Ghost, by the word of truth clearly preached, and by the power of God confirming it; by the armour of righteousness, which completely covers and protects us on the right hand and on the left, both in prosperity and adversity; by passing through honour and dishonour; by going through evil report and good report. Here note, That the ministers of God do approve themselves, and trial is made of them, as well by the things on the right hand as on the left. A minister of Christ is tried as well by honour as disgrace, as well by praise as by disparagement. The good report which we meet with in the word, is certainly as great, yea, a more dangerous temptation, than the ill reports we pass under: It is a great trial to a minister to be dispraised and despised, to have dirt thrown undeservedly in his face; but verily, it is as great a trial to be praised, commended and applauded, to be lifted up in the thoughts and upon the tongues of men. Solomon has an excellent proverb to this purpose, Prov. xxvii 21. As the fining-pot for silver, and the furnace for gold, so is a man to his praise; that is, a man is tried by his praise, as really as silver is tried in the fining-pot, or gold in the furnace: Whenever a minister is praised, he is tried; his humility is tried, his self-denial is tried; when he is praised by men, he is tried whether he can give the entire praise to God: When people cry up such and such a preacher, they put him into the fining pot; and he that is but dross, consumes. Let ministers remember there are trials on the right hand, as well as on the left; that passing through honour, and going through good reports, are great trials, as well as passing through dishonour and evil reports. God prepare us for both.

—As deceivers, and yet true; 9 As unknown, and yet well known; as dying, and behold, we live; as chastened, and not killed; 10 As sorrowful, yet always rejoicing; as poor, yet making many rich; as having nothing, and yet possessing all things.

As if the apostle had said, Verily our life is made up of seeming, but not real contradictions. The wise men of the world look upon us as deceivers, but we are the true dispensers of the word of life unto them; we are looked upon by the world as unknown, obscure persons; but we are well known to God and good men by our doctrine and miracles; we are as dying persons daily, by our passing through so many perils, and by being exposed to continual persecutions, and yet you see we are still alive; and we are sometimes chastened by God, as well as persecuted by men, but we are not killed, nor given over unto death. Outwardly we are sorrowful, but inwardly always rejoicing in God, and in the testimony of a good conscience; in worldly goods and outward circumstances we are very poor, yet making many spiritually rich in grace and good works. We have nothing we can call our own; yet in Christ all things are ours. Hence observe, What has been the lot and portion of the faithful ambassadors and ministers of Christ from the first beginning of Christianity; the dirt of a thousand scandals hath been thrown upon their faces, which in the day of Christ's appearance will be as crowns upon their heads. 2. That all outward evils are to be received by the ministers and members of Christ, in the same manner, and with the same mind, that good things are received with: Honour and dishonour, good report and evil report, must be entertained with the same evenness and constancy of mind, because God is the same in all variety of estates. Though men change their opinions of us, yet God changes not his judgment concerning us: He loves his ministers and members when poor, as well as when rich; when the world smites us, as well as when it smiles upon us: Therefore, if God be the same to us at all times, it is our wisdom and duty to keep the temper of our minds, and to be always the same to him and to ourselves. Whatever we meet with from the world, we have no reason to be dissatisfied if our integrity be safe. 3. How rich the apostle was without earthly riches, and how abounding in wealth, when he had nothing of worldly treasure to rejoice in: Having nothing, yet he possessed all things. But how? and in what sense? Ans. He and they possessed all things: 1. In Christ, by whom they had a title to all things. 2. They had all things in the covenant, favour, and grace of God: He hath all things who hath him that hath all things. 3. They had all things virtually, in that contentment of mind which they did enjoy: They possessed all things in possessing themselves, and wanted nothing which they could deny themselves. The contented man is only rich; he is not rich that has much, but he that has enough; the man is poor that covets more. 4. They possessed all things eventually; they had the good of all things, when they had not the actual possession of all things; their poverty was a blessing, and their very wants, in the event, worked for good. 5. They possessed all things, in future expectation; they looked and longed for heaven and everlasting happiness, which would swallow up their desires with fruition; for he that overcometh, shall inherit all things, Rev. xxi. 7. Thus is this apostolical paradox unriddled, As having nothing, and yet possessing all things. True faith apprehends and enjoys all things in God, which it wanteth in the creature.

11 O ye Corinthians, our mouth is open unto you, our heart is enlarged. 12 Ye are not straitened in us, but ye are straitened in your own bowels. 13 Now for a recompense in the same (I speak as unto my children) be ye also enlarged.

These words are very pathetic, and expressive of St. Paul's most affectionate and ardent love towards the Corinthians, whom he had been an happy instrument to convert unto Christianity. He tells them, his mouth was opened to them, not to receive, but to bestow; his mouth was open to fill them with the treasure of gospel-knowledge, not to be filled by them; and his heart, as well as his mouth, was upon unto them, and at their service: If therefore they were straitened in affection towards him, who was thus enlarged in heart and mouth, by tongue and pen towards them, it must be through mistakes and misapprehensions on their part; therefore, in a way of recompense, he challenges, it as just and fit, that the same reciprocal love be bestowed upon him their spiritual father, as he had manifested towards them his beloved children. Learn hence, That there is no stronger love, nor more endeared affection, between any relations upon earth, than between such ministers of Christ and their beloved people, whom they have been happily instrumental to convert to God.

14 ¶ Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers: for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? and what communion hath light with darkness? 15 And what concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel?

The holy apostle closes this chapter with an exhortation to avoid all intimacy with idolators, either in civil affairs, in marriages, or in religious worship, lest they be brought into communion with their idolatry; there being no more agreement between a believer and an idolator, than betwixt light and darkness, betwixt Christ and Satan. And, as we must not join with idolators in spiritual communion, or religious worship, so should we have no communion with them in marriages; that, having proved a dangerous snare to the souls of many, our divines have justly pronounced sinful: Nay, it is both wise and safe to have as little civil communion with idolators as we can; and when we are necessitated to have civil communion with them we must utterly avoid all sinful communion with them, that is, all communion with them in their sins. Learn, That to associate with idolators, or to join in affinity with them, but especially to communicate with them in their idolatrous worship, is a God-provoking and a wrath-procurring sin.

16 And what agreement hath the temple of God with idols? for ye are the temple of the living God: as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people.

This form of questions evidently implies the absolute inconsistency between believers and idolators, and the danger from communion with them: And the apostle's calling believers, the temple of the living God, represents both their dignity and duty; their dignity, in having the Spirit of God to dwell with them, and walk in them; their duty to be purified and adorned in this habitation. Note, 1. Believers are a spiritual temple in which the Holy Ghost dwells: This dwelling implies propriety, familiarity, authority, residency, and fixedness of abode. 2. That the indwelling presence of the holy Spirit in good men, as in a temple, being the highest honour and most perfect felicity of the reasonable nature, should oblige them to universal holiness, and to avoid all communion with idolators.

17 Wherefore, come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you; 18 And will be a father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty.

As if the apostle had said, "Go not then to the idols' temples; join not with idolators in communion, to avoid persecution, but come out from amongst them as an holy people separated to the Lord, and defile not yourselves with any unclean thing; and while you are pure: and cleave to God, he will own you for his sons and daughters." Note here, 1. A pressing exhortation to make a full separation from unclean persons and things, particularly from all idolators, and idolatrous worship; Come out from among them: The words are taken out of Isa. iii. 11. where the prophet exhorts the remnant of Israel to come fully out of unclean Babylon. Learn hence, That God expects and requires his saints should make a separation from all uncleanness, but especially from the uncleanness of idolatry. God expects a separation from us, from all unclean courses, from all unclean company, from the presence and appearance of all uncleanness, from communion with idolatrous churches, and from communicating with what is sinful in the truest churches of Christ upon earth. Note, 2. A quickening encouragement to back this exhortation; I will receive you, and be a Father to you. Here is a twofold promise, (1.) Of reception, I will receive you. (2.) Of adoption, I will be a Father to you. God will receive them both into his house and heart. Learn hence, That Almighty God will, as a Father, undoubtedly receive all those into his family and favour who renounce communion with all impurity. As he is Almighty, he is abundantly able, and as he is a Father, he is graciously willing, to recompense all the services and sufferings of his children, for the honour and interest of his name and truth. It is sufficiently known how this text hath been misapplied by separatists, to very bad purposes; (1.) To justify their schismatical separation from the best and purest of the reformed churches, under pretence of finding greater purity amongst themselves; whereas nothing will justify a separation from a church, but that which makes a separation between God and that church. If the church's way or worship (in their opinion) be faulty, they presently denounce it false, and they must not join in false worship; whereas no man offers any worship to Almighty God that is not false worship, if all that is faulty be false worship: If Christ doth not disown his church for that faultiness, we ought not to desert her for it. (2.) Others would seek occasion from these words to justify their practice, in refusing to come to the Lord's table, where some vicious persons are apprehended to be, lest they should pollute the ordinance, and these touch the unclean thing; whereas the presence of a bad man at the sacrament pollutes the ordinance only to himself; for unto the pure all things are pure; and who will neglect a certain duty, to escape an uncertain danger? True, we must not own such worship as we know God rejecteth; but as God pardoneth the faulty imperfections of others men's worship, and of our own also, thus must we bear with our own and one another's failings, that are tolerable, so far as we cannot cure them. We unto us, had Almighty God no more charity for us than we have for one another? A defective worship is not a false worship; sinful defects in the administration of ordinances, do not hinder the saving effects of ordinances; a wife and good man is certainly as great an enemy to separation, as he is to superstition: Doctrines crying up purity, to the ruin of unity, reject; for the gospel calls for unity, as well as for purity.

C H A P. VII.

HAVING therefore these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God.

These words are argumentative, and infer the indispensable duty of Christians to preserve themselves untainted from the idolatrous impure world, by the consideration of the promises specified in the preceding chapter, I will dwell in you, and walk in you; and I will be your God, and ye shall be my people: A promise which contains the highest honour, and most perfect felicity, of the reasonable nature. Now from hence he infers, That Christians having such promises, such helps and assistances, should cleanse themselves from all sinful pollution, and endeavour after perfection in purity and holiness: Having therefore, &c. Note, here, 1. The title wherewith the apostle addresses himself unto them, Dearly beloved; this expresses both the truth and also the strength of his affections towards them: By this appellation he recommends his counsel to their acceptance: For, as light opens the mind by clear conviction, so love opens the heart by persuasive insinuation. 2. The matter of the address, and that is, to cleanse ourselves from all pollution both of spirit and flesh, and the changing of us into the unspotted image of God's holiness. The pollution of human nature is intimate and radical, diffused through all the faculties of the soul, and members of the body; we are therefore to pray for, and endeavour after renewing grace, and to be always advancing in holiness on earth, till we arrive at perfection in heaven. 3. The motive exciting thereunto, namely, the exceeding great and precious promises assured to us from the mouth of God, Having the promises, let us cleanse ourselves. 4. The means to help us therein, The fear of God. This grace has an eminent causality and influence in a Christian's sanctification: it is a powerful restraint upon sin both in thought and act, by considering that God's pure and flaming eyes see sin wherever it is, in order to judgment. An holy fear of God, and a humble fear of ourselves, will both restrain us from sin, and engage us to obedience. From the whole, learn, That the promises of the gospel lay the most powerful obligations upon Christians to endeavour after, and strive for the attainment of pure and perfect holiness. As the pollution is universal, so must the cleansing be; and though thankful we must be for the least measure of sanctifying grace receive, yet not satisfied with the greatest, short of our perfection: perfecting holiness, in the fear of God

2 Receive us: We have wronged no man, we have corrupted no man, we have defrauded no man. 3 I speak not this to condemn you: for I have said before, that ye are in our hearts to die and live with you. 4 Great is my boldness of speech towards you, great is my glorying of you; I am filled with comfort, I am exceeding joyful in all tribulation..

Note here, 1. The duty which St. Paul exhorts the Corinthians to, namely, to receive him, their apostle, into their kind affections, into the bosom of their love, Receive us; that is, into your best affections. The ministers of Christ are very desirous of a largeshare and interest in their people's love; well knowing, that if they be prejudiced against their persons, they will reap no benefit by their doctrine. 2. The solemn protestation which the holy apostle makes of his integrity and uprightness towards the Corinthians, We have wronged no man, corrupted no man, defrauded no man; that is, we have wronged none in their reputation by slander, we have corrupted no man's judgment by error and false doctrine, we have defrauded no men of any part of their estates, either by force or fraud. Learn hence, That the holy servants of God, especially the faithful ministers of Christ, may justify themselves, and make solemn protestations of their own integrity and uprightness, especially when they fall under jealousy and suspicion by the enemies of religion. As it was the continual practice of the false apostles to discredit St. Paul's ministry, and reflect upon his person; so it was his constant care to counter-work them, by a professed vindication of himself, and all his actions. 3. The fervour of the apostle's affection towards his Corinthian converts, You are in our hearts to live and die with you; that is, you lie and are lodged so near our heart, that we could live with you, and die for you, to promote your spiritual and eternal welfare. Behold how large a room the people of God have in the affections of his ministers, how near do they lie to their hearts; and so passionately desirous are they of their people's salvation, that they could even lay down their lives, and die, to promote their temporal and eternal advantage. 4. How the apostle gloried in, and was comforted by the Corinthians in the midst of all his afflictions, by the report he had of their repentance, obedience and liberality: Great is my glorying in you, &c. As if he had said, "Verily, the report I have made of your repentance and reformation upon the receiving of my former epistle, has filled me with such a weight of joy, as over-balances all the afflictions and tribulations which I meet with for the gospel." Learn hence, That the repentance and reformation of any of our people, by the blessing of God upon our ministerial endeavours, is matter of great rejoicing and glorying to us the ministers of God, who desire above all things, the conversion, edification, and salvation of the souls of our people: Great is my glorying in you, &c.

5. For when we were come into Macedonia, our flesh had no rest, but we were troubled on every side: without were fightings, within were fears. 6. Nevertheless God, that comforteth those that are cast down, comforted us by the coming of Titus; 7. And not by his coming only, but by the consolation wherewith he was comforted in you, when he told us your earnest desire, your mourning, your fervent mind toward me: so that I rejoiced the more, opposition both from Jews and Gentiles; and from within, by fears lest the false apostles should have prevented any of his young converts from the simplicity which is in Christ; or fearing, lest the Corinthians, being tender and weak in the faith, the violence of persecution, and the strength of temptation, should cause them to apostatize from their religion, and backslide from their holy profession. 2. A most endearing title given to Almighty God: He comforteth all those that are cast down. This is his dear title: He esteems himself more honoured with the aimable and endearing title of a Comforter and a Father, than with the glorious title of a Creator and a Sovereign. He is more pleased in doing us good, than we can be pleased in receiving of it; and can as soon forget himself, as forget as his children. 3. The instrumental means which God made use of, for the apostle's consolation, support, and relief; namely, the coming of Titus. First, God comforted us by the coming of Titus. Mark, He doth not intitle Titus, but God, by Titus, for the comfort he received. Whoever is the instrumental cause, God is the principal efficient cause of our consolation and comfort. It shews an holy flame of heart, when we stay not in creatures, but are carried to God as the author of our comforts and crosses. Secondly, the glad tidings and good news which Titus brought, as touching the Corinthians earnest desire to have all things amiss rectified, their sorrow expressed for the sin reprov'd, their fervent affection towards the apostle, their grief for offending him, their zeal to vindicate him; all these were matter of comfort and exceeding consolation to the apostle; under all his disquietness in Macedonia. Learn hence, That when troubles, both from without and within, do oppress the minds, and even sink the spirits of the ministers of God; if they can but see the success of their labours in the lives of their people, that they are humbled for sin, and turned from it; this is matter of unspeakable consolation at present, and will be their crown of rejoicing in the day of Christ: When Titus told us of your earnest desire, &c.

8 For though I made you sorry with a letter, I do not repent, though I did repent. For I perceive that the same epistle made you sorry, though it were but for a season. 9. Now I rejoice, not that ye were made sorry, but that ye sorrowed to repentance: for ye were made sorry after a Godly manner, that ye might receive damage by us in nothing.

As if the apostle had said, Although in my former epistle I wrote somewhat sharply to you, by reason of the many abuses that were crept in amongst you: I do not now repent of that severity, because it produced a thorough and effectual reformation: Though at first I did repent of it, being unwilling to put you to grief; for I was troubled myself, because I was necessitated to trouble you. However, now I rejoice, not in your grief, as such, but because your sorrow was a godly sorrow, and wrought repentance, which is so necessary to forgiveness; so that my plain dealing with you has evidently been no damage, but an advantage to you. Learn hence, That the faithful ministers of Christ must by no means omit the duty of sharp reproof, nor neglect to bring the censures of the church upon notorious offenders, how ungrateful soever the work is either to themselves or others. 2. That there is good ground to hope, that when the censures of the church are duly executed, they will have their desired effects, by bringing the offenders to repentance; and by repentance to remission and salvation: I rejoice, that ye sorrowed to repentance.

10 For sorrow worketh repentance to salvation not to be repented of:—

Note here, That sorrow for sin, will be of no advantage or avail upon us, if it be not godly sorrow, or a sorrow according to God, as it runs in the original. Now it may be called a sorrow according to God, when it is a sorrow wrought in us by the Spirit of God, in obedience to the command of God, and with an eye at the glory of God; when it has sin, and not wrath, for its object; sin, as a wrong to God, as a contempt of his sovereignty, and a contrariety to his holiness. Again, It is then a godly sorrow, when it puts us upon an high prizing of Jesus Christ who became a sacrifice for sin; and prompts us to a cordial and unfeigned forsaking of all sin, to such a turning from it, as is resolved against all returning to it.

—But the sorrow of this world worketh death.

The sorrow of the world may be taken two ways, (1.) For the sorrow of worldly men, whose sorrow for sin is only a vexing of their hearts, not a breaking or humbling of their hearts; which being separate from true faith, and without any purpose to leave sin, worketh death, by wearing out the natural life lingeringly, and sometimes destroying the natural life violently, as in the case of Judas. (2.) By the sorrow of the world, may be understood a sorrow for worldly things, a sorrow for worldly losses and disappointments. This is sinful, when it is excessive; and as it is prejudicial to the soul, so doth it hurt the body, and hasteneth death. Worldly sorrow is a killing sorrow.

11 For behold this self-same thing; that ye sorrowed after a godly sort, what carefulness it wrought in you, yea, what clearing of yourselves, yea, what indignation, yea, what fear, yea, what vehement desire, yea, what zeal, yea, what revenge. In all things ye have approved yourselves to be clear in this matter.

The apostle in the foregoing verse, had declared, that godly sorrow, or a sorrow wrought by the spirit of God, worketh true repentance, and produceth a thorough reformation, not to be repented of: Now in this verse he proves, that the Corinthians' sorrow for the incestuous person's sin, was of this nature, namely, a godly sorrow, because it produced such excellent effects and fruits as godly sorrow is wont to do. Seven of which he here reckons up. 1. Care, or an holy carefulness to amend what is amiss for time to come, by thumping and avoiding all occasions and temptations that lead to sin. He that truly repenteth, is careful not to sin again, 2. Clearing of themselves, that they did not approve the fact of the incestuous person, but did inflict the church's censures upon him, and so put away evil from amongst them. 3. Indignation against sin; this is found where godly sorrow is found; the heart rises, swells and boils against sin; we are then angry and sin not when we are angry at sin, and with ourselves for sinning. 4. Fear; a true penitent fears to offend; and that he may not offend, doth nourish in himself an holy fear of God and an humble fear of himself: There is found with him a fear of reverence, from an awful apprehension of the holiness and majesty of God, and also a fear of diligence and vigilance, watching and warring against sin, that it may not set upon us and surprise us for the time to come. 5. Vehement desire, after a thorough reformation, and to rectify whatever is amiss; a desire to be rid of all sin, and in the mean time conflicting with it, and groaning under it. 6. Zeal; this is an affection in a true penitent, compounded of love and anger. Be zealous and repent, is Christ's own call, Rev. iii. 19. This will make a penitent persist in the exercise and expression of his godly sorrow for sin, and persevere in his course of mortification, in defiance of all opposition made against him. 7. Revenge; this is the result of zeal, when our zeal boils into revenge, and puts us upon self castigations; not so much upon our bodies with whips and scourges, but by the abatement of lust which stirreth in us, buffeting the flesh, and bringing it into subjection. And this revenge leads the penitent also to make satisfaction for wrongs done, either by open confession, or secret restitution: In all things you have approved yourselves to be clear of this matter. As if the apostle had said, "By these forementioned acts of your's, the body of you hath shewn that you did not approve of the incestuous person's sin, but evidenced by your sorrow for it, that you are clear of it. Learn hence, 1. That there is no way to get clear of the guilt of other men's sins, but by duly mourning for them: Now are you clear of this matter. 2. That true repentance for sin, clears us from the guilt of it, both in the sight of God and man; and if so, it is both uncharitable and unchristian to stigmatize or reproach any person for the sin, which we either know or believe he has truly repented of.

12 Wherefore, though I wrote unto you, I did it not for his cause that had done the wrong, nor for his cause that suffered wrong, but that our care for you in the sight of God might appear unto you.

Here the apostle tells them, that he did not write so passionately and severely to them, only or chiefly for the incestuous person's sake who had done the wrong, that he might be punished, nor for his sake that he suffered the wrong, namely the injured father, out of a particular kindness to have him righted; but that his general care, solicitude, and concern for them, the whole church of Corinth, to remove sin and scandal from them, might appear unto them.

13 Therefore we were comforted in your comfort: yea, and exceedingly the more joyed we for the joy of Titus, because his spirit was refreshed by you all.

That is, in all the forementioned effects and fruits, signs and evidences of a true repentance, which were found in you, and are matter of great comfort to you, we are also comforted with you; and we also had a superadded joy for the joy that Titus conceived, upon his understanding of your affairs; also your ready compliance with the duties and directions given you in my former epistle, did wonderfully refresh and rejoice his spirit; and in all these your consolations and comforts am I comforted. Hence learn, That such is the intimate and endeared union between the ministers and members of Jesus Christ, that they are comforted with another's comforts, and afflicted with each other's sorrows and sufferings.

14 For if I have boasted any thing to him of you I am not ashamed: but as we spake all things to you in truth, even so our boasting which I made before Titus is found in a truth. 15 And his inward affection is more abundant toward you, whilst he remembereth the obedience of you all, how with fear and trembling you received him. 16 I rejoice therefore that I have confidence in you in all things.

Note here, How the apostle had formerly taken occasion to speak boastingly, and not without assurance, concerning the church of Corinth. "Now, says the apostle, whatever I said of you, is as infallibly and certainly true, as what I have heretofore either written or spoken to you." Happy is it when a minister's commendation of his people unto others, are not contradicted or gainsayed by the people themselves, but confirmed greatly. Here, what St. Paul had boasted of the Corinthians, Titus found a truth. Note next, With what inward affection Titus did embrace and receive the Corinthians, remembering with what great deference and regard they had received him; he is greatly affected toward you, upon his finding you so obedient to me. Nothing doth more enlure people to the ministers of Christ than to find them obedient to their spiritual guides in things pertaining to godliness and religion: The affection of Titus is more abundant towards you, whilst he remembereth the obedience of you all. Lastly, What confidence the apostle had, that the church of Corinth would hearken to, and comply with his future admonitions, exhortations, and reproofs: I have confidence in you in all things. It is a blessed thing when the ministers of the gospel and their beloved people have a mutual confidence in each other, and when that confidence on either side is not broken, but preserved and increased between them all their days; when they can say of each other, as doth the apostle here, I rejoice that I have confidence in you in all things.

C H A P. VIII.

The design of our apostle in this and the following chapter, is, to excite and stir up the Corinthians to a liberal contribution of their charity towards the poor saints in Jerusalem and Judea; and this he does by several arguments.

MOREOVER, brethren; we do you to wit of the grace of God bestowed on the churches of Macedonia; 2 How that in a great trial of affliction, the abundance of their joy, and their deep poverty, abounded unto the riches of their liberality.

The first argument which our apostle makes use of to excite the charity of the Corinthians, is drawn from the example of the Macedonians, into whose hearts God had poured that excellent grace of charity; insomuch that the churches of Phillippi, Thessalonica, Berea, and other churches in the region of Macedonia, though under great trials and afflictions themselves, yet such was their joy in, and their affection to the Christian profession that notwithstanding their deep poverty, they abounded in their liberality towards the necessities of the poor saints in Jerusalem and Judea. Note here, 1. The root from which all acceptable charity to the members of Christ must arise and spring, namely, from the grace of God; from an inward principle of love to God, in obedience to his command, and with a pure and fixed eye at his glory. Liberality to the poor distressed members of Christ, as such, must flow from that habit of divine love, by which men are taught of God to love one another; for though from a natural sympathy and compassion men may relieve the afflicted, as men, yet without a gracious inclination they cannot do good to them, as members of the household of faith. Charity then is here called the grace of God, because it proceeds from a gracious disposition wrought in the heart by God, as the root and spring, the motive and attractive of it. Note here, 2. The condition which the churches of Macedonia were in themselves; when they thus liberally and cheerfully administered to the necessities of others, they were first under great affliction, and then in great poverty themselves; and yet the riches of their liberality are said here to abound. From hence learn, That poverty excuses not from charity: If we have nothing actually to give, God accepts the inclination of the mind, and a willing desire. If we have but little to give, God will accept of our mite, and reward us for that little, if given for his sake. It is not the quantity of the gift, but the good affection of the giver, that God's eye is upon. If we give but a cup of cold water to a disciple, and as a disciple, God accepts it and rewards it, provided we have better to give them if our charity be not in some degree proportionable to what we have, it will not be acceptable, but we shall miss of its reward.

3 For to their power, I bear record, yea, and beyond their power, they were willing of themselves; 4 Praying us with much intreaty that we would receive the gift, and take upon us the fellowship of the ministering to the saints.

Three things are here recorded as the glory of the Macedonians' charity, (1.) It was profusely liberal, beyond their ability: To their power, yea, and beyond their power, they were ready. Though, generally speaking, we are to consult our own ability and present circumstances in all our charitable distributions; yet there may be, and sometimes are, such emergent occasions, as may make it a necessary duty to administer to others necessities far beyond our own ability. (2.) Their charity was purely voluntary; They were willing of themselves; that is, unsolicited by the apostle unasked by any other, only prompted to it by the grace of God: They made a collection amongst themselves freely and cheerfully. (3.) Their charity was accompanied with importunity to the apostle to receive and distribute it. He was so far from intreating them to give, that they intreated him to receive their collection, and to take care for its conveyance to them, and distribution among them: Praying us with much intreaty, that we would receive this, &c.

4 And this they did, not as we hoped, but first gave their own-selves to the Lord, and unto us by the will of God.

As if the apostle had said; "Verily these Macedonians, in the liberal distribution of their alms to the poor Christians, have exceeded our hopes and expectation." Wherein? First, They gave their own-selves to the Lord, and then unto us by the will of God. They gave themselves, their own-selves, first to the Lord. To give a man's self to the Lord, is more than to give all his estate to him, though, strictly speaking, it is rather a debt than a gift; for we owe ourselves to the Lord. And, oh, how infinitely shall we gain by this giving! he gains all who gives his all to God: God will return it with advantage to him. Next, the Macedonians, says the apostle, gave themselves unto the will of God; that is, they resigned themselves unto us by the will of God; that is, they resigned themselves up, to us, to be employed by us in such services as we thought meet. It seems they were ready to assist the poor saints, as well with their persons as with their purses. From the Macedonians giving themselves first to the Lord and then to the church's service, in all charitable distributions, we learn, That he that doth not first dedicate himself, will never dedicate his estate to God; but he that by a deliberate and voluntary dedication gives himself to God, will keep back nothing that he requires from him; yea, he will look upon all that he has and is, as the Lord's: Not an inch of his time, not a penny in his purse, but it is to be employed by, and improved for God. He looks upon God as the owner and proprietor of all, and himself as the steward and dispenser only: Oh! let us, in imitation of these noble, though poor Macedonians, first give ourselves to the Lord, and then we shall never withhold any thing that is our's from him.

6 Inasmuch that we desired Titus, that as he had begun, so he would also finish in you the same grace also. 7 Therefore as ye abound in every thing, in faith, and utterance, and knowledge, and in all diligence, and in your love to us; see that ye abound in this grace also. 8 I speak not by commandment, but by occasion of the forwardness of others, and to prove the sincerity of your love.

Here our apostle proceeds to make use of several other arguments to persuade the Corinthians to the exercise of the duty and grace of charity; as namely, (2.) Because he had desired Titus to go to them; and as he had in his last visit begun to stir them up to this duty, and to exercise this grace, so he would farther promote and bring it to perfection. And, (2.) Because they abounded in other graces and gifts; as namely, in faith, in utterance, and knowledge, &c. therefore they ought to abound in this grace also, otherwise they would not be complete in the whole will of God, (3.) Because hereby they would testify the sincerity of their love to the saints. It is not good words, but charitable deeds, that evidence the truth of our love to our fellow-members in Christ; not saying, Be ye warmed, or be ye clothed; but distributing to their necessities according to our abilities, Yet, note, The apostle doth not command their purses, and require so much of them for charity; he mentions no particular sum, much less doth he command them to give away all their estates, and live upon a common stock, and leave nothing to themselves which they could call their own; for if a man has nothing of his own, there is no room for liberality. There must be prudence then in the exercise of our charity, prudence in finding out proper objects for our charity, prudence in timing of our charity, prudence in the measure of our charity, and prudence in the end which we propound to ourselves in the exercise of our charity.

9 For ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that, though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that yet through his poverty might be rich

Here we have the grand motive used by the apostle to excite their charity, namely, the example of Christ, who impoverished himself to enrich us, and emptied himself to fill us; therefore should we be ready to administer unto others: Ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, &c. Observe hence, 1. A description of Christ in his divine nature, as God: He was originally, essentially, and eternally rich; that is, in his Godhead. All the riches that Christ now has in his state of exaltation, he had from all eternity; before his humiliation, with respect to his divine nature, he was rich. 2. A description of Christ in his human nature, he became poor; that is, in the day of his incarnation, when he assumed our flesh, and was made manifest in our nature, he impoverished himself; though he was rich, yet he became poor. 3. The persons for whose sake did he thus impoverish himself: For our sakes he became poor, that we through his poverty might be rich. 4. The moving, impelling, or impulsive cause of this condescension in Christ, and that was the graciousness of his nature: Ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ. 5. The use and improvement which the apostle makes of this gracious dignation and condescension in Jesus Christ, and that was by way of argument, to excite the believing Corinthians to exercise their charity towards the poor saints which were at Jerusalem. Learn from hence, That the extensive charity and wonderful compassion of Christ towards us sinners, hath both the force of an argument to excite us to, and also the nature of a rule to direct us in, the exercise of our charity towards all fellow-brethren and members of Christ: Ye know the grace, &c.

10 And herein I give my advice. For this is expedient for you, who have begun before, not only to do, but also to be forward a year ago. 11 Now therefore perform the doing of it; that as there was a readiness to will, so there may be a performance also out of that which ye have. 12 For if there be first a willing mind it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not.

Here the apostle proceeds to a fresh argument for the quickening and exciting the Corinthians charity, drawn from their own reputation. He had heard, that a year ago upon writing his former epistle, they had made several collections, at several times, as their gains came in; his advice therefore is, that they perfect and complete the good work which they had undertaken; and that as their was a readiness and willingness of mind then, so there might be a performance of good resolutions now: For whatsoever is given to God, is accepted according to what a man has, and it is not expected he should give according to what he has not. Learn, That God interprets and accepts the charity of men, according to the largeness of their hearts, and not according to the straitness of their fortunes. It is not so much the quantity of the gift, as the good-will and cheerful mind of the giver, that God looks at: If there be first a willing mind, it is accepted. Learn farther, That to do any good with a willing mind, be it little or much, is very acceptable to God; if there be little of the purse, and much of the heart in it, provided that little be what we can well spare, the Lord hath a great respect unto it. Learn lastly, That as we must give, so God will accept what is given, according to what a man has, and not according to what he has not. What is due to another, either by debt or duty, in making provision for those of our own family cannot be charitably given, as being not our own.

13 For I mean not that other men be eased and you burdened; 14 But by an equality, that now at this time your abundance may be a supply for their want, that their abundance also may be a supply for your want, that there may be equality. 15 As it is written, He that had gathered much, had nothing over; and he that had gathered little, had no lack.

Note here, The humble modesty and holy prudence of the apostle, in what he demanded of the Corinthians by way of charity for the poor saints in Judea. He tells them freely, he did not design to lay a load upon them to ease others, or to make others rich by making themselves poor; but that there might be an equality in supplying the wants of one another, that now you abound, you may supply them; and when they abound, they may supply you; yet mark, We must not, by the equality mentioned here, understand it so, as if the wisdom of the divine providence had ordained levelling, or making all men equal in their portion of the good things of this life: But so far Christianity seems to require this equality, that we should not suffer others to lack the necessary comforts of this life, whilst we abound with them, and can spare them, and suffer them to sink in their sorrows, whilst we swim in fulness. Learn hence, There is a debt of mercy and pity, of charity and compassion, of relief and succour, due to human nature, and payable from one man to another; and such as deny to pay it the distressed in the time of their abundance, may justly expect it will be denied themselves in a time of want. To confirm this, the apostle draws an allusion from the gatherers of manna in the wilderness; some gathered more, and others less; but they that had more, were to give them that had less: In like manner would Almighty God have it, that they which have great riches, should impart of their abundance, to them that are in want; otherwise, Almighty God will shrink their heap into some equality with them whom they refused to relieve. With what measure we meet, in acts of charity, as well as in acts of justice, it shall be measured to us again.

16 ¶ But thanks be to God, which put the same earnest care into the heart of Titus for you. 17 For indeed he accepted the exhortation; but being more forward, of his own accord he went unto you. 18 And we have sent with him the brother, whose praise is in the gospel, throughout all the churches: (19 And not that only, but who was also chosen of the churches to travel with us with this grace, which is administered by us to the glory of the same Lord, and declaration of your ready mind.)

As if the apostle had said, I thank God that Titus was as forward to move you to this good work as myself; for he did not barely yield to it at my request, but of his own accord was ready to come to you about it. And with him we sent Luke, a beloved brother, whose service for the gospel has made him honoured in all the churches, and who was chosen by the church to go with us in this deconary service, namely, the ministrations of your charity to the glory of God, and evincing the readiness of your mind to so good a work. Here note, 1. The holy apostle's constant custom and practice to refer all good in us to God as the author and producer of it: Thanks be to God that put this into the heart of Titus. 2. That a minister of the gospel who declines being chargeable to his people himself, may yet put on confidence, and be bold and importunate in urging them to charity for the service and supply of others. 3. That St. Paul's importunity for collecting this charity at Corinth, shews how much the case was altered, since at Jerusalem, Acts iv. they sold all and laid it at the apostle's feet: And that was not intended for a constant and universal practice, so we see how quickly the love of Christians grew more cold. To procure this charity, St. Paul writes, Titus is sent, exhortation is given arguments urged and all due means used to accomplish this collection for the poor distressed Christians. 4. That amongst Christians, renowned for gifts and parts, costly duties come hardly off, else what needed this ado? And yet it is not the cheap duties of religion, (such are prayer, hearing the word, and receiving sacraments) but the costly duties of charity, that must evidence the truth of our faith and love, which are certainly dead, if barren and destitute of these fruits.

28 Avoiding this, that no man should blame us in this abundance which is administered by us: 21 Providing for honest things not only in the sight of the Lord, but also in the sight of men. 22 And we have sent with them our brother, whom we have oftentimes proved diligent in many things, but now much much more diligent, upon the great confidence which I have in you.

Note here, The holy wisdom of this great apostle, in joining some other persons with himself, as Titus and Luke, &c. in the distribution of this charity; lest evil-minded men should suspect him of dishonesty, he takes care to cut off all occasion of suspicion, that he either kept any part of this large contribution to himself, or distributed it unfaithfully unto others: Avoiding this, that no man should blame us. Note 2. The reason also assigned by the apostle for this his prudential management; namely, because as a minister and a Christian, he was obliged to provide and take care that all things he done blamelessly in the sight of men, as well as faithfully in the sight of God. The apostle, by this his example, recommends to all ministers, and private Christians, a prudential foresight of such scandalous imputations, as they may be exposed to by the world, let their sincerity in their actions be what it will; and let us see how we ought to provide against them: Any one of these upright persons alone, either St. Paul alone, Titus alone, or St. Luke alone, were sufficient to be intrusted alone with the distribution of this charity; but the apostle did not know what a censorious world might say; and therefore, to cut off all occasion, and to prevent all suspicion, he wisely appoints several persons to be witnesses of this action. If there be not, in some cases, over much caution, all is too little and not enough.

23 Whether any do inquire of Titus, he is my partner and fellow helper concerning you: or our brethren be enquired of, they are the messengers of the churches, and the glory of Christ. 24 Wherefore shew ye to them, and before the churches, the proof of your love, and of your boasting on your behalf.

Note here, What pains the apostle takes to answer all cavils and objections that might hinder the free collection and regular distribution of this charity. Some might pretend, possibly, to say then, (as many amongst us do now) "We know not in whose hands this charity-money may fall; we know not whether ever they shall be the better for it, for whom it was intended. Therefore, says St. Paul, if any make that objection, that they do not know Titus, and inquire after him, or his trustiness, tell him he is my coadjutor, my partner and fellow-helper in converting you to Christianity; and if the other two be inquired after, they are our brethren, the messengers of the churches, and the glory of Christ; that is, the instruments of his glory: Therefore, let these messengers see, and the churches which did depute them, the proof of your love to me, and to the saints, and that I did not boast of your liberality in vain." Note here, The high honour which St. Paul put upon the ministers of the gospel in calling them the glory of Christ, that is, the glory of the gospel of Christ, the glory of the Christian profession, the instruments of Christ's glory, by whom his honour and glory is greatly promoted; persons, who by their exemplary gloriousness, did bring much honour and glory to Christ. This title, I conceive, shews both our dignity and duty; our dignity, in that Christ accounts us his glory when we are found faithful to him; as the faithfulness of an ambassador redounds to the glory and honour of the prince that sends him: And it points our duty to promote the glory of Christ, to pray and endeavour that he would use us as instruments for the advancement of his glory; that as we glorify him on earth, he may glory in us, and be glorified by us, before his Father in heaven, and we be presented faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy. Amen.

CHAP. IX.

FOR as touching the ministering to the saints, it is superfluous for me to write to you. 2 For I know the forwardness of your mind, for which I boast of you to them of Macedonia, that Achaia was ready a year ago: and your zeal hath provoked very many.

Note here, The holy art and skill of this wise and great apostle, in promoting forward, and putting on these Corinthians to this work of pious charity; he intimates their present forwardness, to provoke them to farther forwardness; he tells them, it was superfluous for him to use farther arguments with them; for their forwardness was known unto him, and boasted of by him to the Macedonians, that the Christians in Achaia, (of which Corinth was the chief city) had made a proposal to supply the poor saints of Judea a year ago; and that their zeal therein had provoked very many to the like forwardness. It is very happy when the ministers of Christ find their people forward and ready to every good work, to costly works of charity especially; yet it will be their wisdom, by commending their people for what they have done, to encourage them to do farther; not only for increasing their own reward, but for provoking them to do the like: I know the forwardness of your mind, &c.

3 Yet have I sent the brethren, lest our boasting of you should be made vain in his behalf; that as I said, ye may be ready: 4 Lest haply if they of Macedonia come with me, and find you unprepared, we (that we say not ye) should be ashamed in this same confident boasting. 5 Therefore I thought it necessary to exhort the brethren that they would go before unto you, and make up beforehand your bounty, whereof ye had notice before, that the same might be ready, as a matter of bounty, and not as of covetousness.

As confident and fully persuaded as the apostle was of the readiness and willingness of mind that was found in the Corinthians towards this charitable contribution, yet he judgeth it both expedient and necessary to send the brethren before to them, to get all things ready, the collection finished, and over; that so, when he himself, and the Macedonians should come to Corinth, he might not be put to the blush for them, having made great boasts of their charity, but finding no deeds; and also he desires their collection may be ready, with respect to themselves, that so their beneficence may appear to be their own free bounty, and not

collection difficultly extorted from them, as from covetous men, who give grudgingly and unwillingly. Note here, 1. That it is very lawful for the ministers of Christ to use an holy craft, and innocent guile, to draw men to a speedy compliance with their duty; sometimes by engaging their reputation in it, and sometimes alluring them by just praises to the doing of it. Thus our apostle did here. 2. That the readiness which St. Paul here presses them to, is not the readiness of the mind, but readiness of the action: He was well satisfied that they were ready in their preparation of the mind long ago, but he presses them to finish the collection, of which he had so much boasted to the Macedonians. 3. How the blessed apostle did consult the Corinthians honour and reputation equally with his own, and was as desirous to prevent reflection upon them, as upon himself; he would not have them ashamed, no more than himself at his coming among them. 4. That a liberal free-giving to the saints in distress, is called here χρηματις, grace and blessing; we translate it bounty; It is called grace, because an heart to give liberally is wrought in us by the grace of God; the world shuts up our hearts until God opens them; and if the heart be open, the hands will not be shut: And works of charity are a blessing of God with our substance, and the way and means to produce his blessing upon our substance. Giving to distressed saints in proportion to what God has given us, is by Almighty God, accounted a blessing of him, and a blessing of our fellow brethren; and whoever thus blesses God shall be blessed by him. 5. That the Corinthians being a very rich and wealthy people, the apostle stirs them up to an abundant charity. Where God gives much he expects much: But how many, alas, grudge God a little of his own! And how difficultly is that little drawn from them like drops of blood! Whereas, to give alms purely to satisfy the importunity of others, or out of shame, misses of its reward before God, 6 ¶ But this I say. He which soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly; and he which soweth bountifully, shall reap also bountifully. 7 Every man according as he purposeth in his heart, so let him give; not grudgingly, or of necessity; for God loveth a cheerful giver,

Here the apostle comes to direct the Corinthians, how and after what manner they should give their alms, so as to secure a blessing; namely, deliberately. (1.) As he purposeth in his heart, so let him give; as he is determined and resolved within himself. When a Christian gives, he must take care that it be his own act as much as he can. Some men give what they did never intend, and bestow what they did never chuse or design to bestow: Importunity extorts charity from some; they give to get rid of the noise, and purchase their quiet with their alms; whereas, the liberal man devises liberal things, the good man lays by in store what he intends to bestow in alms. (2.) Freely and bountifully; For he that soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully; that is, he that giveth liberally to the poor shall be liberally rewarded by God; no wise man will pinch his ground of the seed. The proportion, or how much every one should give, cannot be determined, because that must be measured according to the ability of him that giveth, and according to the necessity of him that receiveth. (3.) Cheerfully, not grudgingly, or of necessity: for the Lord loveth a cheerful giver. In all thy gifts shew a cheerful countenance, says the wife man; let us give with the same cheerfulness, that we should receive, and be as willing to give, as the needy are to receive; nay, it is our duty to seek out objects; for some of Christ's members have as great modesty as they have necessity, and cannot speak for themselves: And let none think that his liberality will prejudice their estates; no, it is men's lusts that undo them, and not their charity.

8 And God is able to make all grace abound towards you, that ye always having all sufficiency in all things may abound unto every good work; 9 As it is written, He hath dispersed abroad, he hath given to the poor: his righteousness remaineth forever.

Here the apostle tacitly answers the common objection against liberal alms-giving; men are afraid they shall want themselves, what they give away to others: No, says the apostle, God is able to make all grace and mercy shewn by you, to abound the more towards you; that you having a sufficiency in the comforts of this life, may abound in every good work of charity towards others. As if he had said, "Be not afraid to give, nor sparing in giving; for hereby you make God your debtor, and you will find him an all-sufficient paymaster; he will repay you both in spirituals and temporals. Thou shalt receive silver for thy brass, and gold for thy silver, grace for thy gold, a treasure in heaven for thy drops on earth: Nay, your gold and silver will multiply here, as seed sown, when scattered with a wise and prudent hand." The apostle here engages God's all sufficiency for it; God will shew his all-sufficiency, in giving you an all-sufficiency in all things: Only we must remember, that we must allow time; for Almighty God loves to be trusted upon his word; and those that will not give him credit, let them try if they can improve their estates better, or put them into safer hands.

10 ¶ Now he that ministereth seed to the sower, both minister bread for your food, and multiply your seed sown, and increase the fruits of your righteousness, 11 Being enriched in every thing to all bountifulness, which causeth through us thanksgiving to God.

Some look at these words as a prayer, others as a promise, that as Almighty God blesseth the increase of the earth so largely, that it sufficeth for the nourishment of men, and for seed to sow again; in like manner would he supply all their wants, and grant them ability to supply the wants of others, and plentifully reward them for all the fruits of their righteousness and mercy; and they being thus enriched by the goodness of God, and exercising all bountifulness towards their brethren, much thanksgiving and praise upon that occasion is given unto God. In these last words is couched an argument farther to press the Corinthians to this liberality; namely, that it would cause both the ministers of Christ, and also the poor saints to offer up incessant praises and thanksgivings to God for the same.

12 For the administration of this service not only supplieth the want of the saints, but is abundant also by many thanksgivings unto God: 13 Whiles by the experiment of this ministrati^on, they glorify God for your professed subjection unto the gospel of Christ, and for your liberal distribution unto them, and unto all men; 14 And by their prayer for you, which long after you for the exceeding grace of God in you.

Still our apostle proceeds, by way of motive, farther, 10 excite and stir up the Corinthians to this charitable contribution, from sundry considerations; namely, 1. That it would be a very seasonable supply to the church's wants, who were at this time in great want of it: Now, the seasonableness of any mercy, adds greatly to the worth and value, to the pleasure and sweetness of it: 2. That it would occasion repeated praises and incessant thanksgiving to God, for many persons, and upon many occasions. 3. This distribution of yours, says the apostle, will be a convincing experiment, evidence and demonstration of your professed subjection to the gospel, and that your faith is not barren and ineffectual. No better evidence of our real subjection to the gospel of Christ, than a cheerful compliance, not with the cheap, but with the costly duties of Christianity. Lastly, For your alms you will engage a stock of prayers going for you: This will procure, yea, provoke them to pray night and day for you, nay, not only engage prayer for you, but it will also draw forth their love and fervent affection towards you, make them very desirous of your acquaintance, having received such an experiment of the grace of God that is in you.

15 Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift.

Here the apostle concludes his discourse upon this great argument, with a doxology, praising and blessing God for putting it into their hearts, in so liberal a manner, to relieve the necessities of the saints, by which so much glory did redound to God, and so much honour to the Christian religion. This he calls, not barely an admirable but an unspeakable gift; because a gift by which God was so much glorified, the gospel adorned, the poor saints so much comforted, and they themselves so plentifully rewarded: Thanks be unto God for his unspeakable gift: But if the Corinthians charity was an unspeakable gift, what was the gift of Christ? the gift of God to a lost world, to whom this title of unspeakable doth best agree; who is the author and finisher of all grace, and particularly of this noble grace of charity in the hearts of his people; for he sends his holy Spirit, and pours into their hearts his most excellent grace of charity, the very bond of peace, and of all virtues, without which, whosoever liveth, is counted dead before him. Eternal thanks then be to Christ for this admirable gift of charity, and thanks be to God for the unspeakable gift of Christ. Amen.

C H A P. X.

Our apostle having pleaded with the Corinthians on the behalf of the poor Christians in Judea, comes, in this chapter, to plead for himself, and to vindicate his authority from the contempt cast upon it by the false apostles.

NOW I Paul myself beseech you by the meekness and gentleness of Christ, who in presence am base among you, but being absent am bold toward you. 2 But I beseech you that I may not be bold when I am present, with that confidence wherewith I think to be bold against some which think of us, as if we walked according to the flesh.

Observe here, 1. The charge brought in unjustly against St. Paul by the false apostles, namely, that when he was present with the Corinthians, he was low and humble enough to some degree of baseness; but when absent, that then he writes like a Lord to them, and exercises an authority with pride and imperiousness over them. The greatest apostles, no more than the meanest minister of Jesus Christ, cannot expect protection from slander and false accusation. 2. The pious and prudent course which the apostle takes for his own necessary and just vindication; he beseeches them, by all that meekness and gentleness, which according to the command and example of Christ, he desired to express towards them, firmly to believe that he desired nothing more, than not to be forced to use his power with that boldness towards them, which he feared he must use against the false apostles, who accused him of too much servility and meanness in his behaviour amongst them, and reproached his ministry as carnal and self-seeking.

3. For though we walk in the flesh, we do not war after the flesh.

That is, "Although I yet dwell in the body, and consequently am not free from human infirmities and weaknesses; yet neither my ministry nor my life are from fleshly principles, by fleshly means, or fleshly ends." The best and holiest of men in this life walk in the flesh; they are clothed with a mortal body, but they do not war after the flesh, they do not fight under the banner of corrupt nature. Here note, The Christian life described; it is a warfare; we war; It is a life of vigorous opposition. The Christian has many enemies to contend with, and to contend against, both outward and inward enemies; in a passive sense, he is a man of strife and contention, his hand is against many, and many hands against him; he doth not manage a war for the flesh, but against the flesh: And in the next verse he tells us with what weapons he managed this war.

4. For the weapons of our warfare are not carnal but mighty through God to the pulling down of strong holds: 5. Casting down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ:

Observe here, 1. That as the life of every Christian is a continual warfare, so the ministers of the gospel are more eminently men of war; they fight against principalities and powers; powers; and the devil draws up his full strength to pull down the office of the ministry, which is erected for the pulling down the strong holds of him and his kingdom.

2. The weapons which these spiritual warriors, the ministers of the gospel do make use of in their conflict and combat with sin and Satan; The weapons of our warfare are not carnal but spiritual. They are not carnal or fleshly weapons that we use, neither fraud or flattery, nor force; but spiritual armour, with which we batter the fortresses of sin and Satan; namely, the sword of the Spirit, the word of God, the plain and persuasive preaching of the gospel, the holy Spirit, miracles of all sorts, eminent wisdom and patience, exemplary zeal and courage in executing and inflicting the censures of the church upon the disobedient.

3. These weapons are called mighty; but mighty through God; that is, as quickened by the power and presence of God's Spirit. Then is our ministry mighty, when made mighty through God. The Spirits of darkness cannot be conquered but by spiritual weapons. It is as possible to make an impression with your finger upon a wall of brass, as for the best sermon in the world to make an effectual impression upon a sinner's will, without the co-operation and concurring assistance of the holy Spirit: The weapons of our warfare are spiritual and mighty through God. It is the Spirit that gives them their success and efficacy: There is a real spiritual power and energetical presence of Christ in his own institutions and appointments. When the sword of his Spirit is taken into the hand of the Spirit, it works wonders.

4. The great and good execution which these spiritual weapons do effect and accomplish, when thus accompanied with the power of God; they are mighty under the pulling down of strong-holds. By which some do understand a particular beloved lust; a special sin, by which Satan keeps and holds possession of the sinner's heart. Others understand it more generally of every thing that opposeth, resisteth, and hindereth the success of the gospel; and particularly, the stubborn will of the sinner, which is so strong an hold, that no power short of an Almighty power can influence it to surrender: Casting down imaginations or reasonings, and proud conceits, and particularly unbelief, in which sinners fortify themselves against the convictions of the word, disdain to submit themselves to the abasing, humble and self-denying way of the gospel. But behold the glorious conquest which the gospel of Christ obtains over sinners thus fortified against it; it casts down imaginations, and pulls down every strong-hold. Thus the ministry of the gospel spoils Satan of his armour, in which he trusted, by shewing the sinner, that all this can be no defence to his soul against the wrath of God.

5. The improvement of the victory: The gospel doth not only lead away these enemies spoiled, but brings them into captivity and obedience to itself. O happy and blessed conquest! Sinners do not only lay down their arms, and fight no more against Christ, but they repair to his camp, and fight for him with those reasonings of theirs which before were employed against him. O blessed victory! where the conqueror and conquered both triumph together.

6 And having in a readiness to revenge all disobedience, when your obedience is fulfilled,

That is, having in a readiness that which will revenge all disobedience upon refractory and stubborn offenders, (namely, the power of excommunication) and both authority and ability to inflict such corporal punishment as he judged fit, by delivering them unto Satan; which power he resolved to make use of, when the greater part of them were, by their obedience to his admonitions, reduced to good order again. Where, note, That the apostle defers the excommunicating and censuring the offenders amongst them, they being very many, till he had, by exhortation and argument, brought over as many as possibly he could unto obedience. There is no place for severe remedies, when the diseases have taken and infected the whole church: The offenders in the church, when very many, cannot be easily punished; for when great multitudes are concerned they are like to draw great multitudes after them. The apostle's practice in this case here, is a good pattern for our imitation, not to be too forward, rash, and hasty in denouncing the censures of the church, but to proceed prudently and gradually: first using all fair means and gentle methods, and waiting with all patience for the reducing them to their duty who will be reduced, and then revenging the glory and honour of God only upon such as will by no means be reclaimed or reduced.

7 Do we look on things after the outward appearance? if any man trust to himself that he is Christ's, let him of himself think this again, that as he is Christ's, even so are we Christ's.

Because the false apostles had taught the Corinthians to despise St. Paul, upon the account of his mean appearance; he here expostulates with them, and desires to know whether they would judge of men by outward appearance, or by inward worth? As if he had said, "Are ye so weak as to judge of me by my outward person, by my bodily presence, by the meanness of my garb, by the smallness of my stature by my outward aspect and countenance? but if you will judge of me, and the pretended apostles, by ministerial gifts and authority received from Christ, surely I have as much to shew of these, as they can pretend to shew; for in nothing was I behind the very chiefest apostles." There is no judging of men, much less of ministers, by outward appearances: Much real worth sometimes lodges within, when nothing but what is despicable and contemptible appears without.

8 For though I should boast somewhat more of our authority, which the Lord hath given us for edification, and not for your destruction, I should not be ashamed.

As if the apostle had said, I have not only an equal power and authority with those which despise me, (the false teachers) but I have an authority and power which they cannot, dare not, will not pretend unto; namely, the power to inflict corporal punishments upon obstinate and contumacious offenders, and delivering them up to Satan; which power, if at any time I make use of, it is for edification, not for destruction. This rod is not to be used rashly, but discreetly, by me. Observe we, and learn from hence hence, an excellent rule, Never to handle the censures of the church (those edge-tools) but with care and caution, with an intention to reform, not to ruin; to save, not destroy: The church's power is for edification, not for destruction.

9 That I may not seem as if I would terrify you by letters. 10 For his letters (say they) are weighty and powerful, but his bodily presence is weak, and his speech contemptible. 11 Let such an one think this, that such as we are in word by letters when we are absent, such will we be also in deed when we are present.

Our apostle here goes on, vindicating himself from the aspersions and reflections which the false teachers cast upon him. They told the Corinthians, that St. Paul's letters were indeed severe and authoritative, terrifying and affrighting: but his personal presence was weak, and his speech contemptible. Tradition tells us, that Paul (according to his name) was a man of a very little stature, and his voice answerably small; whence probably, the false apostles took occasion to raise this report of his presence and speech. St. Chrysostom saith, that St. Paul's stature was low, his body crooked, his head bald; and when it is added, that his speech was contemptible, it cannot be understood as it were so for want of eloquence, but it is thought, that refers rather to some infirmity, or natural impediment, which the apostle might have in his speech. The gift of knowledge and learning, and the gift of utterance and elocution, as they are distinct in their nature, so they are separable in their subject, and do not always go together; a person of the profoundest knowledge is not always happy in elocution and utterance. However, in these false teachers we see the constant method and practice of impostors and seducers; namely, to asperse and lessen all that stand in their light: This is an old way of insinuating into the people. The false apostles feared they should never reign at Corinth, but by bringing St. Paul into disesteem with the Corinthians; therefore they say, his letters are weighty, but his bodily presence weak. But the apostle, ver. 11. gives them to understand, that they should find him the same both absent and present; and that his deeds then should appear as awful as his words now; that when he came again, he would not spare, but punish all disobedience. Note here, That the thing which St. Paul would have his accusers fear, was, that by the miraculous gift of the Holy Ghost given to him, to inflict corporeal punishments upon disobedient persons, they should speed as Elymas did, Acts xiii. 8. who was smitten with blindness, &c.

12 ¶ For we dare not make ourselves of the number, or compare ourselves with some that commend themselves: but they measuring themselves by themselves, and comparing themselves amongst themselves, are not wise. 13 But we will not boast of things without our measure, but according to the measure of the rule which God hath distributed to us, a measure to reach even unto you. 14 For we stretch not ourselves beyond our measure, as though we reached not unto you: for we are come as far as to you also in preaching the gospel of Christ.

Observe here, 1. St. Paul's just charge, which he brings in against the false apostles, for their pride and vanity, in commending themselves, and comparing themselves with such as were like themselves; They measuring themselves, by themselves, and comparing themselves amongst themselves, are not wise. The reason why many think themselves wiser than they are, is, because they compare themselves with those that are below themselves, and not above them in understanding and knowledge. It is an excellent mean to keep us from pride, to consider how many are above us in knowledge; and there are thousands so much excelling us in understanding, that our knowledge is but ignorance our strength but weakness, our faith but unbelief, our fruitfulness but barrenness, compared with theirs. 2. As the pride and vanity of the false apostles, so the great modesty and humility of St. Paul, the true apostle of Christ Jesus; but we will not boast of things without our measure, but according to the measure which God hath distributed to us. Where, note, The apostle makes his apostleship or preaching of the gospel, to be, as it were, his spiritual exercise, or running a race, to which he here alludes; declaring that he kept his province, his stage, his compass of ground which God had marked out to him; beyond or out of which line, whoever pretends to run, doth over-extend himself, and boast without his measure. 3. That the apostle's line or measure reached as far as Corinth, where Christ never had been preached; thither he came, and there he first planted the Christian faith amongst them; and he takes occasion from thence, to advance himself above the false apostles. (1.) That he could shew a commission to preach to the Corinthians: a measure by which God had distributed the Corinthians to him, as his proper province, which none of them could pretend unto. (2.) That whereas they went out of their line, leaping from one church to another, he went on orderly in the conversion of churches to the faith, from Judea, through all the interjacent provinces, till he came to Corinth. 3. That whereas they came to those churches where the gospel had been already preached, and so could only boast of things made ready to their hands, he preached the gospel where Christ was not named before.

15 Not boasting of things without our measure, that is, of other men's labours; but having hope, when your faith is increased, that we shall be enlarged by you according to our rule abundantly, 16 To preach the gospel in the regions beyond you, and not to boast in another man's line of things made ready to our hand.

Here the apostle tells the Corinthians, that he would not boast of other men's labours, nor pretend any title to those Christians at Corinth, nor any where else, whom others had converted, as the false apostles did: Notwithstanding he declares his hope, that when the apostle should have an eminent success amongst them, and thereby their faith be increased, that the increase of their faith would increase his joy and comfort, his present advantage and future reward; because it was the fruit and increase of the seed which he had himself sown amongst them. The apostle also doth farther declare his hopes, that he should preach the gospel beyond Corinth, in the regions of Achaia, where it had not been preached before; he being unwilling to enter upon other men's labours. Here note, that though ordinary ministers are fixed in particular places, and confined to particular churches, yet the apostles had a commission to go into all places, and preach the gospel over the whole world, and were tied to no certain place or people. Note farther, That the apostle seems to prefer an instrumentality in the work of conversion, before being instrumental in the work of edification. The false apostles could only pretend to build upon other men's foundations, and carry on a work by others made ready to their hands: But the apostle preferred preaching the gospel where Christ had never been heard of, as being unwilling to build upon another's foundation, or to boast of another man's line. It is a special favour now vouchsafed by God to us his ministers, if he puts the honour upon us, to make us instruments in his hands, either for conversion, or edification, either for bringing home, or building upon a people. Happy we, if when our predecessors have laboured before us, we enter into their labours, and see the seed, which they sowed with a laborious hand, flourishing in the lives of our people, to the joy of our hearts. Ere long, both he that sowed, and he that reapeth, shall rejoice together.

17 But he that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord.

These words are a seasonable exhortation to all the ministers of the gospel. (1.) To take heed that they glory not in themselves, or in any services or performances of their own. As it is the highest act of grace to make our boast of God all the day long, so it is the highest act of corruption, to make a boast of any thing we either have or do, though but for a moment. Alas; what have we, that we have not received? Or what do we, wherein we have not been divinely assisted? And if so, why should we glory? Verily, when man is most bent and set upon these gloryings, God delights to check him therein, and spit upon his glorying; and so jealous is God of his glory, that he seldom suffers a proud minister that assumes and arrogates to himself, to be either serviceable or successful in his work. (2.) These words are an exhortation to all the ministers of the gospel, as not to glory in themselves, so to glory in the Lord; that is 1. To glory in the work of the Lord, that we promote his kingdom, his honour and interest in the world. 2. To glory in the help of the Lord; the Lord is a Master in covenant with us, and that a covenant of grace, in which every command hath a promise annexed to it, a promise both of assistance and acceptance. 2. To glory in the reward of the Lord, expected by us, and secured to us, by purchase and promise the private Christian's labours, shall not be in vain in the Lord, much less his faithful ministers, who have borne the burden and heat of the day; let them then glory in the Lord, and not in themselves, seeing all the good that is in them, and their actions, comes from him, and their recompence of reward is secured by him.

18 For not he that commendeth himself is approved, but whom the Lord commendeth.

Three things are here observable, 1. The proneness which is in human nature to admire, applaud and commend itself. Man is a proud piece of flesh, and a little apprehended excellency in himself presently puffs him up, and he looks big with conceit: It is rare to see a rich man in gifts, and poor in spirit: poverty of spirit is better than all the riches of gifts; yea, it is the truest riches of grace. 2. Though a man is prone to commend and admire himself, yet self-examination is no just praise, but rather disparagement, a shameful indication both of pride and folly. He that commendeth himself, is not approved of God or wise men; the same word in Hebrew, signifies to praise ourselves, and to be foolish, because there is no greater evidence of folly, than self-commendation; yet sometimes, a wise man is forced to boast of his own performances, rather in a way of self-vindication, than by way of self-commendation. 3. That it is God's approbation, and not our own commendation, which is a matter of true praise and real honour. When God and conscience bear witness to our sincerity, we need neither our own nor others commendation; the open testimony of God, and the silent applause of our own conscience, is above all commendations whatsoever.

CHAP. XI.

Our apostle in this and the following chapter, enters upon a just and necessary commendation of himself; he gives us a large catalogue of his sufferings and services not to grace himself, but to glorify God thereby.

WOULD to God you could bear with me a little in my folly, and indeed bear with me, 2 For I am jealous over you with godly jealousy: for I have espoused you to one husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ.

Observe here, 1. That which the apostle calls his folly is his speaking so much in his own commendation and praise, because ordinarily self-commendation has a very great shew of folly in it, though not always. As if he had said, "I would you could bear with me a little, in that, which looks like a foolish boasting in me, namely, my glorying in my performances, in my services and sufferings, amongst you; and indeed, you must bear with me herein." Where note, That although the apostle lay under a necessity to commend himself for the vindication of his office, which made him free from folly in this matter; yet because, generally speaking, self-commendation usually proceeds from folly and vanity, and such as did not know the necessity which lay upon St. Paul thus to speak, would be apt to impute folly to him for thus speaking, he therefore calls it folly himself first, and tells the Corinthians, they did.

did and must bear with it. 2. The reason assigned, which constrained the apostle thus to do it, was his holy jealousy for them. He had, by preaching of the gospel, brought them to know and believe in Christ, and so, by converting them to the Christian faith, had espoused them to Christ: He earnestly therefore desired that he might present them a pure and chaste virgin; that is, a spotless church unto Christ. As the Jews say, that Moses espoused Israel to God in mount Sinai, when he made them enter into covenant with him there; so says the apostle here, by converting you to the Christian faith, I have espoused you to one husband, even Christ.

3 But I fear lest by any means, as the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtilty, so your hands should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ.

Our apostle having in the foregoing verses, with a rhetorical insinuation, begged their pardon and their patience, whilst by just and necessary commendation of himself, he vindicated his person and office from contempt; and having shewn, that what he did and said, was the fruit and effect of a pious jealousy, or holy love mixed with fear; accordingly, he tells them very plainly in this verse, that he was really afraid of them, lest as Eve was seduced by the subtilty of the devil, so their minds should be corrupted by false apostles, and seduced from the pure doctrine of the gospel: For as the noblest and most generous wine is adulterated by mingling it with water, so is the doctrine of the gospel corrupted, by mixing with either philosophical speculations, or Jewish traditions, or any sort of human inventions. Well therefore might the apostle say, I fear lest your minds should be corrupted, &c.

4 For if he that cometh preacheth another Jesus whom we have not preached, or if ye receive another spirit which ye have not received, or another gospel which ye have not accepted, ye might well bear with him.

As if the apostle had said, "It is one Christ, one Spirit, one gospel, and not many which we have preached, and you have received; now, if your new teachers, the false apostles, have another Christ to set forth, more excellent gifts of the Spirit to boast of, another gospel to preach unto you, which I never preached amongst you, let them be heard and received:" But this being impossible, they might well bear with him in his modest boasting and glorying in what he had done and suffered amongst them, by whose ministry they were at first converted to Christianity.

5 For I suppose I was not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles. 6 But though I be rude in speech, yet not in knowledge; but we have been thoroughly made manifest among you in all things.

Observe here, 1. The great modesty of the apostle in this expression; I suppose I was not a whit behind the chiefest apostles. He might have said he was equal with them, and in some sense superior to them, even the most eminent of them, Peter, James, and John. Indeed the apostleship, as an office, was of equal honour in all the apostles; but even amongst them, some had more excellent gifts, and greater enlargements, and did more signal services than others. Thus one of those stars differed from another in brightness and glory. But, observe, 2. Before whom it is that St. Paul thus compares himself with the chiefest apostles; it was not before the true, but the false apostles, that he makes this modest boast. He did not contend with any of the apostles of Christ for the upper-hand, nor say, I am not behind any of you, or I am better than any of you; but he only gives check to those false apostles who undervalued him, and poured contempt upon him. He who said at another time, I am not worthy to be called an apostle, says here, I am not behind the chiefest apostle. From whence we learn, That the ministers of Christ may stand upon terms of credit with those that vilify their persons, disparage their function, and discredit that honourable work which God hath called them unto. Though all ambitious contending with others is odious, yet no man ought to betray either the truth of God or his own integrity, lest he should be counted contentious. He purchases the opinion of an humble and peaceable minister too dear, who either pays the faith of God for it, or his own credit; something of reputation being absolutely necessary in a minister, to render his labours successful. 3. The objection which the false apostles, those proud boasters of their eloquence, made against St. Paul, namely, that he was rude in speech. That the apostle had some imperfection in his speech or utterance, is the opinion of many. Others affirm, that he was an eloquent preacher, from Acts xix. 12. where he is compared to Mercurius for it; but he did not think fit, in his ministry, to use the Grecian flouting way in ostentation thereof, that so the power of the gospel might not seem to be placed in human wisdom. "However, says the apostle, though I be rude in speech, yet not in knowledge; if my language has nothing extraordinary in it, yet sure nothing can be objected against my skill in the mysteries of salvation. But I need not tell you of this, who have had the proof of it in my ministry amongst yourselves." Note we here, The manner and method of St. Paul's preaching; it was grave and serious, pious and ardent, plain and profitable. No doubt he could have the orator in the pulpit, as well as the most: But he chose rather to speak close and home to the consciences of men, in a plain and familiar style, delivering all his evangelical and apostolical precepts so plainly, that the weakest capacities might understand and receive them. Plain truths, without any art or varnish, may be conveyed with more warmth and vigour to the conscience, than all the charms of human eloquence from the most fluent and popular tongue.

7 Have I committed an offence in abasing myself that ye might be exalted, because I have preached to you the gospel of God freely? 8 I robbed other churches, taking wages of them to do you service. 9 And when I was present with you, and wanted, I was chargeable to no man: for that which was lacking to me, the brethren which came from Macedonia supplied; and in all things I have kept myself from being burdensome unto you, and so will I keep myself. As the truth of Christ is in me, no man shall stop me of this boasting in the regions of Achaia. 11 Wherefore? because I love you not? God knoweth. 12 But what I do, that I will do, that I may cut off occasion from them which desire occasion; that wherein they glory, they may be found even as we. 13 For such are false apostles, deceitful workers, transforming themselves into the apostles of Christ. 14 And no marvel: for Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light. 15 Therefore it is no great thing if his ministers also be transformed as the ministers of righteousness: whose end shall be according to their works.

Observe here, That St. Paul, in his former epistle to the Corinthians, abundantly proved the lawfulness of his taking maintenance from those to whom he preached the gospel: Yet here he tells the Corinthians, he preached freely to them, without putting them to any charge, though at the same time, he had substance from the brethren in Macedonia. From whence learn, That one church ought to contribute towards the furtherance of the gospel in and amongst other churches. Here the brethren in Macedonia supplied the apostle with maintenance, whilst he preached to the church of Corinth. Observe 2. The reason why St. Paul did preach the gospel without receiving any thing for the same at Corinth; namely, to cut off occasion from the false apostles, who sought occasion to traduce and slander him, as a poor indigent fellow that preached for bread, and gloried that he preached freely. Where note, That it is very probable, that these false apostles were some rich men, who took no pay of the churches for what they did, but preached, or rather deceived freely, and would have reproached the apostle as a mercenary preacher, had he taken any thing. From the whole, learn 1. That it is agreeable to the mind of Christ, that the ministers and dispensers of his gospel should be maintained. A maintenance for the ministry, is certainly of divine right. 2. That the apostles themselves did not all work, at least, nor at all times, for their livelihood, but generally speaking, did always receive maintenance from the churches: ver. 8. I robbed other churches, taking wages of them. We do not find the eleven apostles, after the Holy Ghost came upon them, wrought afterwards with their hands for their livelihood, but gave themselves continually to prayer, and to the ministry of the word, Acts vi. 4. 3. That though St. Paul did labour with his own hands at Corinth, and refused maintenance, for the reason forementioned, yet his example doth not enjoin us to work for our subsistence, with the labour of our hands, nor forbid us to take maintenance, when the churches we serve are able to maintain us: St. Paul tells us, when he wrought with his hands, he had then a power to leave working, 1 Cor. ix. 6. He had a right to a maintenance from the church at Corinth, though, upon prudential consideration, he did forbear it, and no law of Christ restrained him from it. 4. That there had been persons, all along, from the first planting and preaching of the gospel, who have sought occasion, and taken all occasions, though very unjustly, to charge the ministers of Christ with covetousness, worldly-mindedness, and with preaching for filthy lucre sake. It was St. Paul's own case here; and therefore, says he, will I glory in this, that at Corinth, and all Achaia, I have preached freely, to cut off occasion from them that desire occasion, to charge me with covetousness and worldly-mindedness, which he would by no means give them an handle for. And thus it continues to this day: Let a minister be never so laborious in his office, or inoffensive in his life, if he expects but a moderate part of what is his just due, there are those who will cheat him of one half of his right, and then charge him with covetousness for demanding the other. Observe, lastly, The description and character here given by St. Paul of the apostles, They transform themselves into the apostles of Christ; that is, they pretend themselves to be Christ's apostles, and act as if they were such indeed; they take up the doctrine of Christ in some things which the holy apostles taught, but it was, that they might weaken the estimation of the true apostles in the hearts of the Corinthians, and set up themselves there. These false apostles were Judaizing Christians, who mingled Judaism with Christianity, and endeavoured to bring the Corinthians under the bondage of the ceremonial law. Behold here the first heresy with which the wisdom of God was pleased to exercise the church, even in the apostle's days, that no church, and no age of the church might pass without some temptation and trial; they transform themselves into the apostles of Christ, even as Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light. Then is Satan an angel of light, when he suggests good for evil ends, and under specious pretences of bringing glory to God, doth tempt, persuades to transgress the will of God. Thus the false apostles would preach error with as great zeal and industry, as the apostles of Christ did preach truth, and use their utmost arguments, persuasions, and motives, for embracing of error, which the holy apostles did for the entertainment of truth, seeming to do the same things that the true ministers of Christ did. It is very possible for men to be really Satan's instruments, animated and taught by him to do his work, against the interest of Christ and his truth, and yet, at the same time, pretend to excel and go beyond Christ's faithful ministers in preaching truth and holiness. So that the highest pretences to truth, orthodoxy, free grace, purity, and unity, are no sufficient evidences of a true ministry. Satan and his ministers, who love to transform themselves sometimes into angels of light, may pretend to all these, and are, notwithstanding, the sworn enemies of Christ and his kingdom.

16 I say again, Let no man think me a fool; if otherwise, yet as a fool receive me, that I may boast myself a little. 17 That which I speak, I speak it not after the Lord, but as it were foolishly, and this confidence of boasting.

Here our apostle returns again to his own just and necessary vindication of himself; he acknowledges it unbecoming and and unseemly in itself to boast much; and that boasting is the usual mark of a fool; but it is no folly when the interest of God and souls require it: It was only seemingly, and not really, his folly; though it had the appearance of folly in ostentation; yet with respect to the scope, the aim, and end, and design of it, it was needful and necessary. But yet he tells them, that what he had before spoken, and was now farther about to speak, he spake not after the Lord; that is, as if the Lord commanded any such boasting and glorying in ourselves, or of ourselves. He did not pretend to have any special command from God, to enlarge so copiously in his own commendation; for the Spirit of God no where advises us to commend ourselves, or to glory either in the sufferings we have undergone, or the services we have done: Yet what the apostle here said and did, though not after the Lord, yet was it not contrary to the Lord, or to the direction of his word, which no where commands us to conceal what grace God has wrought in us, or the good done by us, upon a fitting occasion, and with a sincere design, that he, and not ourselves, may have the praise and glory of it.

18 Seeing that many glory after the flesh, I will glory also. 19 For ye suffer fools gladly, seeing ye yourselves are wise. 20 For ye suffer if a man bring you into bondage, if a man devour you, if a man take of you, if a man exalt himself, if a man finite you on the face. 21 I speak as concerning reproach, as though we had been weak: howbeit, whereinsoever any is bold, (I speak foolishly) I am bold also.

Here our apostle, with some kind of salt and smartness, reflects upon the Corinthians, (whom ironically he calls wise men,) for suffering themselves to be imposed upon by their false teachers, to be tyrannized over, to be spunged upon and exhausted, to be brought again into bondage to Jewish ceremonies, to be smitten on the face; that is to be upbraided to their faces, because they had subjected themselves to so mean and weak a person as Paul, a tent-maker. However he assures them, that in any thing according to the flesh, wherein the false apostles could glory, he could glory also. Here note, That by glorying after the flesh, is meant glorying in any external privileges and outward advantages, particularly in glorying that they were the seed of Abraham, according to the flesh, for the Jews had a very high opinion of themselves, as being the seed of Abraham, and the only people of God, by visible profession, at that time in the world; having contemptible thoughts of all others, whom they called the profane; and the people of the earth, likening them to dogs. Now the apostle tells the Corinthians plainly, That although there is nothing after the flesh which deserves greatly to be gloried in, yet seeing that the false apostles did pride themselves in these things, he could boast of the same carnal privileges with them, and glory after the flesh as well as themselves; and accordingly, thus he speaks in the following verses:

22 Are they Hebrews? [speaking the Jewish language] so am I: are they Israelites? [descended from beloved Jacob] so am I: are they the seed of Abraham? [and not profelytes] so am I: 23 Are they ministers of Christ? (I speak as a fool) I am more; in labours more abundant [than any of them], in stripes above measure, in prisons more frequent, in deaths oft.

That is, I have suffered more for Christ, by stripes, by imprisonments, by daily dying, than any of them have done. Here note, That these false teachers, the Judaizing doctors, were most certainly of the Jewish race; and that they were not only converted to, but did preach up the faith of Christ; but withal, the necessity of circumcision, and the observation of the Jewish rites. These teachers went from Judea, and gave great disturbance to all Christian churches; as Corinth, Galatia, and Philippi: And we often find St. Paul complaining of them, by the name of those of the circumcision; because they required of such as did embrace Christianity, to submit to circumcision and the Jewish law.

24 Of the Jews five times received I forty stripes save one.

The law in Dent. xxv. 3. allowed forty stripes to be given to them that were worthy to be beaten, but forbade them to exceed that number: But it being their custom to beat them with a whip that had three cords, they must either stop at thirty-nine, or exceed and go forty-two. Here observe, That the apostle contending with these false teachers, proves the truth of his ministry and apostleship; not, as elsewhere, from the miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost, which did accompany his preaching, but from his sufferings, as being the things which these false apostles could not pretend unto, and so could not glory that they were like unto him in them.

15 Thrice was I beaten with rods, once was I stoned, thrice I suffered shipwreck; a night and a day I have been in the deep, 26 In journeyings often, in perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by mine own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils amongst false brethren; 27 In weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness.

Behold what a catalogue the apostle here gives of his sufferings and services: He was scourged by the Jews with whips, beaten by the Gentiles with rods, stoned by the rabble, thrice suffered shipwreck, a night and a day tossed to and fro upon the sea, and in great danger of perishing; in journeyings often, from one country to another, to preach, plant, and propagate the gospel; in perils at sea and land, by pirates and robbers; in perils by his countrymen the Jews; in perils in the cities, Damascus, Ephesus, and Jerusalem; in perils in wildernesses and deserts, in perils amongst false brethren, men of the Christian profession; in weariness and painfulness, by travelling from place to place; in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, that is, in necessitated hunger often, and in voluntary fastings frequent for spiritual purposes; in cold and nakedness, that is, very poor and thin in clothing. Lord! what tongue can utter, or what heart can conceive, the pains which the apostle took, or the hazards which he run, in preaching the gospel to a lost world? And yet the good man heartily thanks our Lord Jesus Christ for all that, who had counted him faithful, and put him into the ministry. Verily none of the ministers of Christ have any reason or cause to repent of the choice of their office, whatever services they undertake, or whatever sufferings or reproaches it either hath or may expose them to. Alas! what is all that we feel, to what this apostle underwent? And what is all that he underwent for Christ, compared with that transcendent reward which is in the hand of Christ, both for him and us.

28 Besides those things that are without, that which cometh upon me daily, the care of all the churches.

The apostle's burden of outward troubles was discovered before: His burden of outward care is declared now. Besides, those things which were afflicting to him from without, the care and business of all the new-planted churches was daily upon his heart and hand; besides all his bodily labours by journeying and travelling incessantly from place to place, his solicitous care and thoughtfulness of mind, for the prosperity and happiness of all the churches of Christ, both near and afar off, was great and pressing; the holy man felt as much by sympathy as he did by sense. Many were the personal troubles which he had felt, but more were the churches troubles of which he had feeling; concerning which, he thus expresses himself in the next verse:

29 Who is weak, and I am not weak? who is offended, and I burn not?

That is, "What particular church, or what particular Christian in any of the churches of Christ, is weak in faith, or wavering in their profession? Where is the person that is assaulted with inward temptations, or outward troubles, and I do not sympathize with him, yea, burn with his holy zeal and fervent desire for his settlement and establishing?" Sympathy among all the members, but especially in and among the ministers of Christ, is a great Christian duty: They ought to have a tender compassion to the whole flock, and also a quick sense both of the sins and of the sufferings of every particular and individual member and part thereof. As Christ, our Head, is afflicted in all his church's afflictions; so ought we, as his ministers and members, to be afflicted in all the afflictions of our fellow-brethren. He that has no crosses of his own, must take up and bear his brother's; yea, he that has many of his own, must yet bear a part of all his brethren's crosses. Good men have ever been, and are men of tender and compassionate dispositions, ready to mourn over, and lament for, both the sins and sufferings of others, from the overflowings of a Christ like spirit in them. True goodness evermore promotes compassion.

30 If I must needs glory, I will glory of the things which concern mine infirmities.

By infirmities here, we are to understand sufferings, reproaches and disgraces, afflictions and persecutions, for the sake of the gospel. Where note, That the apostle chose rather to glory in what Christ had enabled him to suffer, than in what he enabled him to do for him; he had wrought divers miracles, could speak divers tongues, had done very great and eminent services for Christ; but not a word of these, because these indeed were evidences of the power of God in him, and of the favour of God towards him, but no demonstrations of any inherent grace or goodness in him; whereas his patient bearing of such sharp, long, and continued sufferings for the sake of the gospel, where undeniable proofs of extraordinary measures of faith and patience, of holy self-denial and eminent love to God, and consequently were a truer and greater cause of boasting, than extraordinary gifts, and miraculous operations.

31 The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which is blessed for evermore, knoweth that I lie not.

Note, here, How the apostle, in a most awful and solemn manner, appeals to the all-knowing and heart-searching God, that the foregoing account of his sufferings for Christ and his gospel, was the exact truth, and no lie. He calls God to bear witness to the certainty of all that he had said of his sufferings and services: And calling him the Father of our Lord Jesus, who is blessed for evermore, affords an undeniable argument to prove the Godhead of Christ; this doxology, blessed for evermore, being a term of honor usually annexed by the Jews at the naming of God.

32 In Damascus the governor under Aretas the king kept the city of the Damascenes with a garrison, desirous to apprehend me: 33 And through a window in a basket was I let down by the wall, and escaped his hands.

The apostle concludes this chapter, continuing a relation of his sufferings, with a remarkable deliverance which God gave him from danger and death, at the city of Damascus, soon after his conversion, of which mention is made, Acts ix. 24, 25. The Jews, whom he confuted and confounded with his arguments at Damascus, sought to kill him; to effect which, they had, by some means or other, brought over Aretas, who was king under the Roman emperor at Damascus, and he engages with the Jews in persecuting the holy and innocent apostle: He shuts up the gates of the city, keeps his soldiers in arms, and uses all possible means to prevent the apostle's escape. But what faith the Psalmist! Psal. cxxvii. 1. Except the Lord keep the city the watchmen waketh but in vain; either to keep out those whom he will have in, or to keep in those whom he will have out. All the walls shall be an open gate to those whom divine providence will have to escape; as here St. Paul, being let down over the wall by a rope in a basket: Neither was it an evidence of cowardice that the apostle now fled, nor in the least degree sinful; our Lord having given us a particular licence in the case, saying, When they persecute you in one city, fly to another. Besides, the persecution now raised was directly levelled against the apostle in particular : It was therefore piously done in the disciplines, and prudently done in himself, to attend the means of his own preservation. As the husbandman doth not commit all his corn to the oven but saves some for seed ; so doth God in persecution. All are not martyrs ; and none shall be so presently ; they must first finish their course of obedience, before they finish their course with joy. Happy soul, that can say with this great and good man, I have fought the good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith, I am ready to be offered up ; henceforth is laid up for me a crown of glory, which fadeth not away. Amen.

CHAP. XII.

Our apostle here pursues the argument used in the foregoing chapter, namely, a just and necessary vindication of himself, from the aspersions of the false apostles.

IT is not expedient for me doubtless to glory, I will come to visions and revelations of the Lord.

That is, " I acknowledge it neither decent nor advantageous, with respect to myself, to go on in farther boasting and glorying ; but since it may be necessary with respect to you, I will declare what visions and revelations I have received from the Lord ; in which I shall give such an evidence of the favours of Christ to me, and such a testimony of my mission from heaven, as none of these false apostles or deceitful workers can pretend unto." Learn hence, That although glorying or boasting, in itself is so inexpedient a thing, favours of pride, and is an evidence of folly, when it is not necessary and just, and therefore all Christians should be backward to it : Yet that which is so inexpedient in itself, may, upon a just and fitting occasion, be not only lawful, but laudable, both a necessary and commendable duty. 2. The present subject matter of St. Paul's glorying ; it was heavenly raptures and visions which he gloried in. Learn thence, That divine revelations, acquainting the soul with heaven, are matters most worthy of humble and modest glorying. Oh ! if God would vouchsafe to favour us with the sight of what St. Paul saw, what little things would crowns and scepters, empires and kingdoms, seem to us ? How would it make us long, groan, and cry, to be with Christ ! But though none of us must expect such raptures and ecstasies as the apostle had, blessed be God for that clear revelation of this heavenly glory which the apostle gives, and for that assurance which faith gives, that Christ as our forerunner is entered into, and keeps his possession of it, in the name and stead of all believers ? As has prepared it for us, and is daily preparing us for that, and in his own appointed time will put us into the actual possession of it ; not for a few hours, (which was all the apostle enjoyed) but for eternal ages,

2 I knew a man in Christ above fourteen years ago (whether in the body I cannot tell : or whether out of the body I cannot tell ; God knoweth) such an one caught up to the third heaven. 3 And I knew such a man (whether in the body, or out of the body, I cannot tell : God knoweth) 4 How that he was caught up into paradise, and heard unspeakable words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter.

Note 1. That the person here spoken of was doubtless himself, otherwise it had been no cause or ground of glorying to him at all ; yet he speaks in the name of a third person. Thence note, That they who know most of God, are most modest when they come to speak of themselves. 2. The description of the person, a man in Christ ; that is, a man acted by the Spirit of Christ, above himself ; and also a description of the place he was caught up into, paradise, the seat of the blessed. Learn thence, That there is a third heaven, or heavenly paradise, where are the concerns and hopes of holy souls : And holy souls are not so closely tied to the body, but they may, whenever God pleases, be wrapt up into paradise, or the third heaven. The apostle not being able to tell whether he was in the body, or out of the body, sheweth that somehow the soul was there, though he could not declare nor discover the manner how. Note, 3. What St. Paul heard when thus wrapt up into paradise, namely, unspeakable words, such as cannot be uttered ; or, if uttered, cannot be understood. Learn thence, That the things of the heavenly paradise are to mortal men unspeakable ; there is no human language that hath words fit to reveal that part of heavenly things which God hath shut up as a secret from us. Observe, lastly, St. Paul's great humility, both in concealing formerly this extraordinary favour, and now not without some difficulty and disguise mentioning it, though for defence of the gospel, in a manner, constrained thereunto ; contenting himself with such a fame as his deportment and outward actions, in serving the interest of Christ, could produce, and no way avoid.

5 Of such an one will I glory : yet of myself I will not glory, but in mine infirmities. 6 For though I would desire to glory, I shall not be a fool, for I will say the truth : but now I forbear, lest any man should think of me above that which he seeth me to be or, that he heareth of me.

Here the apostle declares, That although this foretaste of the heavenly glory was worthy to be gloried in, and though he might boast of himself as thus exalted, yet he being purely passive in it, and advanced freely by God to it, he chose rather to ascribe unto God the entire glory of that, and content himself with glorying in such infirmities, and debasing sufferings, as he could strictly call his own, being undergone by him with an invincible courage and constancy of mind. However, he assures them, that if he had a mind to glory of this rapture and revelation, he might do it without folly or vanity, it being most certainly true ; but he chose rather to forbear, lest he should thereby give occasion to any to over-value him, and to think more highly of him, than his common behaviour, his ordinary words and actions, gave them reason to do. A wise and good man is not ambitious of more applause or commendation than what his personal worth deservedly challenges ; he desires no man to think or speak of him above that which he appeareth to be, which is always as he really is, being that in reality, which he is in appearance.

7 And lest I should be exalted above measure through the abundance of the revelations, there was given me a thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan to buffet me, lest I should be exalted above measure.

Note here, The great and special sin which St. Paul was in danger of, by the abundance of revelations, namely, the sin of spiritual pride. Learn hence, That heavenly revelations may be matter and occasion of unmeet and sinful exaltation: The holiest Christians, after their most heavenly acquaintance, are not out of danger of spiritual pride, or being too much exalted. Pride is such a sin as the holiest saint is not secured from; no, not when he hath been hearing utterable words, and seeing the heavenly paradise itself; no, not if he came down from the third heaven, newly from converse with angels, yet bringing an imperfect nature with him, is he not out of danger of this sin, much less is he so when he cometh off his knees from prayer, &c. 2. The way and means which the wisdom of God made use of for preventing St. Paul's falling into this dangerous sin of spiritual pride, and that was, the giving him a thorn in the flesh; a bodily pain, say some; a bitter persecution say others; something that was very afflictive to the flesh, say all. Learn hence, That spiritual pride is so dangerous a sin, that it is a mercy to be freed from it, even by bodily pain: God seeth our danger when we see not our own and will hurt the body, to save the soul of his dearest children. Oh, how much better is it that the body should smart, than that the soul should be over-much exalted! It is an happy thorn in the flesh, which lets the pestilent and corrupt blood of spiritual pride out of the soul. Lord! why do we contend and quarrel with thee for every sickness, bodily pain, or afflictive cross? Can sin be prevented or killed at too dear a rate? 3. This thorn in the flesh is called the messenger of Satan, from whence St. Chrysostom concluded that it was some evil angel that was permitted and empowered by God to scourge and buffet him. The sufferings of the best and holiest persons in the flesh, may be the buffetings of a messenger of Satan, and yet he from God. Satan certainly intendeth our hurt, but God over-rules him as an instrument to do us good: It is no proof that a man is not a child of God, because Satan has a permission to torment his flesh. The messenger of Satan was sent to buffet me, Says St. Paul, lest I should be exalted.

8 For this thing I besought the Lord thrice that it might depart from me.

Note here, 1. The person prayed to, the Lord; that is, the Lord Jesus, as appears by the two next verses, that the power of Christ may rest upon me. Here is an instance of prayer directed to Christ, therefore here is an instance of Christ's divinity; prayer made to Christ at all times, in all places, and for all things, is an evidence of his omniscience, omnipotence, and omnipresence, and consequently of his being truly and essentially God. 2. The subject matter of this prayer, and that was, for the removal of the afflic-tion: I prayed that it might depart from me; together with the reiterated frequency of it, I besought the Lord thrice. Learn hence, That peace with God doth not make the flesh insensible; a good man may groan under bodily pain, and lawfully pray for the removal of it; yea, be oft in prayer for it; earnest and frequent prayer is not unsuitable to sharp affliction: For this I besought the Lord thrice. Where mark, St. Paul's conformity to his Saviour, who in his agony prayed thrice that the cup might pass, but both of them with profound submission. Note also, That the apostle's gifts of healing was not to be used at their own pleasure, (then St. Paul might have healed himself) and for the conformation of the faith, when it pleased the holy Spirit.

9 ¶ And he said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee:—

Note In this answer that is given to St. Paul's prayer, that the mercy prayed for, is not in kind given in unto him, but promised grace and strength, which is better than the mercy he prayed for. Learn hence, That the frequent and earnest prayers of the most holy and eminent saints, for deliverance from outward troubles, may not be granted in the kind or thing desired. We are not lords, but beggars, and must leave it to God to determine the matter, the manner, the measure, the time of our afflictions. Note farther, That as in the prayer, so in the answer, St. Paul was conformed to Christ; the one was heard, but not by the passing of the cup; the other was heard but not by removing the thorn in the flesh; but both were heard by assurance and supply of divine strength, and sufficient grace to help in time of need: He said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee. Learn hence, That the grace of Christ is sufficient for his people in all their afflictions; sufficient for their preservation to keep them from falling away from God and godliness, by the temptation which always attends affliction; sufficient for their sustentation, to uphold and support them in and under their heaviest pressures and afflictions; and sufficient to render their afflictions truly advantageous and serviceable to them, to make them more holy, humble, heavenly, conformed unto Christ, &c.

—For my strength is made perfect in weakness.—

This is not to be understood as if our weakness added any thing to God's power, or could make his power perfect: But our weakness renders God's power more illustrious, he delights in and under our weakness, to manifest most of his helping power; as the stars never shine so gloriously as in the sharpest frosty night, so the power of God never appears so signally and conspicuously, as in and under our weakness. Learn hence, That when God, upon our prayer, doth not deliver us from bodily sufferings, he will be sure to come in with sufficient grace, and manifest his strength in our pain and weakness. We never thought how much or how long we could bear and hold out, until God made manifest his own strength in our weakness. More of the power of grace is seen in the sufferings of believers, than ever was seen in their prosperity: Beg then, O Christian! more importunately for divine strength, than for the departing of the thorn: Grace is better than ease or health, the one is proper to saints, the other is common to wicked men and brutes.

—Most gladly therefore will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me.

Here our apostle tells the Corinthians, that most gladly he chose rather to glory in his afflictions and tribulations, than in his visions and revelations, because by them he had greater experience of the power and presence of Christ with him, and supporting of him under all his pressures. Learn hence, 1. That the people of God are supported under, and carried through all their sufferings and afflictions, by the power of Christ: A divine power above their own strength like everlasting arms, is underneath them in the hour of trial. 2. That to glory in afflictions and tribulations, is an high pitch of holiness and grace, but attainable. To glory in tribulation, is, (1.) To rejoice in it, (2.) To express that joy outwardly upon a fit occasion. (3.) To express it with a great degree of exultation and boasting. Many of the martyrs were so far from changing countenance at the stake, that they sung and triumphed in the midst of the flames. But can any comfort be derived from this for sinful infirmities? Ans. From the power of Christ, in this text, there may. Thus the powerful mediation and intercession of Christ is magnified, in procuring the acceptance of our persons and services, notwithstanding the sinful infirmities cleaving to them: Also the power of his grace, will at death be magnified, in purging and purifying his people from all their dross and dregs. There is nothing uneasy to a child of God, but there is something in Christ to alleviate it; the wrath of God uneasy, the law, as condemning, is uneasy and displeasing; but Christ has delivered from the curse of the law, satisfied the justice of God, sanctified the cross, sweetened death. Oh, how adorable is the power, how desirable the grace of Christ!

10 Therefore I take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses for Christ's sake: for when I am weak, then am I strong.

Note here, 1. The high and heroic pitch which St. Paul's spirit was raised to, he took pleasure in reproaches and persecutions. Pleasure is a degree beyond joy; though these sufferings were painful to the flesh yet were they pleasing to the spirit: A Christian may not love that which he bears yet may he love to bear; to bear is the patience of necessity; to love to bear, is the patience of virtue; to delight to bear reproach or persecution for Christ, is expressive of the highest affection, towards Christ, and lowest subjection to him. If nature suffers not a saint to take pleasure in reproaches, as such, yet grace enables him to take pleasure in what he is reproached for. 2. The cause assigned why the apostle took such pleasure in his sufferings and abasements, because they gave him such experience of the power of Christ: Inasmuch that when he was most weak in himself, he was then most strong in him: When I am weak, then am I strong; which words are a divine paradox or riddle: The apostle affirms one contrary of another:

Weakness is contrary to strength; how then can a weak man be strong, when he is weak? The meaning is, that when a Christian is most sensible of his own weakness, and most diffident and distrustful of his own strength, then the power of Christ rests upon him, and he experiences divine strength coming in unto him. Christ fills none but the hungry, nor doth he strengthen any but the weak; only by going out of our strength, do we get strength; when in an humble sense of our weaknesses we rest upon Christ, the power of Christ rests upon us.

11 ¶ I am become a fool in glorying; ye have compelled me. For I ought to have been commended of you: for in nothing am I behind the very chiefest apostles, though I be nothing. 12 Truly the signs of an apostle were wrought among you in all patience, in signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds. 13 For what is it wherein ye were inferior to other churches, except it be that I myself was not burdensome to you? forgive me this wrong.

Here again does our apostle excuse his boasting, and tells the Corinthians that they had compelled him to it, and ought to have saved him the labour of it, by defending him themselves: For he had done and suffered as much as any of the most eminent apostles, though he looked upon all as nothing; and consequently, his services and sufferings, his miracles, signs and wonders, were sufficient arguments, and undeniable demonstrations that he was indeed an apostle of Jesus Christ. He farther adds, That the church at Corinth had as great and excellent gifts of the Spirit bestowed upon them by his ministry, as any church whatsoever; all the difference was, that whatever was done for them, was done freely: He spared their purses, and put them to no charge, Now, says he, if that be a wrong, I hope you can easily forgive it. Corinth was a very rich and wealthy city, but they loved a cheap gospel: the apostle spared their purses not because they were unable, but unwilling to draw them: Here observe, That the people ought to give testimony to their ministers integrity, and do all that in them lies to support and maintain the honour of his ministry; I ought; says the apostle, to be commended of you. Note farther, That when the people omit and neglect this necessary part of their duty towards the ministers, it is lawful, and not discommendable, for the ministers of Christ themselves, in a most humble manner, to declare both what they have been, and what they have done: In nothing am I behind the very chiefest apostles, though I be nothing. As if the apostle had said, "Verily, I am as much an apostle as they who think themselves more than apostles, though you and they, through envy, count me nothing, and though I in humility count myself nothing." Thus the ministers of Christ may stand upon terms of credit with any, who lay their persons low, that they may disparage their work, and lay their persons low, to which God hath called them: Though the ministers and members of Christ ought in lowliness to submit to one another, yet must they not submit to the pride or lust of any, how high soever in their own, or others account.

14 Behold, the third time I am ready to come to you ; and I will not be burdensome to you ; for I seek not your's but you. For the children ought not to lay up for the parents, but the parents for the children. 15 And I will very gladly spend and be spent for you ; though the more abundantly I love you, the less I be loved.

The apostle here acquaints the Corinthians, that he prepared himself a third time to come unto them, being providentially hindered twice before, yet with a firm resolution not to be any ways burdensome to them ; for he coveted not their possessions, but was desirous of their salvation : And as a parent lays up for his children, and takes not from them ; so he desired as their spiritual father, to enrich them with spiritual good things, and not to take from them any temporal riches. Nay he adds, that he was willing to spend and be spent ; that is, to spend his time, his strength, his pains, his life ; although he met with very undue returns from some of them, who loved him so little, because he loved them so much ; shewing more kindness to the false apostles, than to him their spiritual father. Behold here an inimitable pattern of ministerial diligence and faithfulness, love and affectionateness ; the apostle was willing to spend and be spent ; not only in his purse and pains, but time and strength, life and health. Oh, how tender are some of their carcase, how fearful of their skin, how sparing of their pains, for fear of shortening their days, and hastening their end ! Whereas the lamp of our lives can never burn out better than enlightening others to heaven : Is it not better that our flesh consume with industry and usefulness, than wear out with rust and idleness ? As it is the duty, so it is the disposition of the faithful ministers of Christ, to spend and be spent for souls.

16 But be it so, I did not burden you ; nevertheless being crafty, I caught you with guile. 17 Did I make a gain of you by any of them whom I sent unto you ? 18 I desired Titus, and with him I sent a brother. Did Titus make a gain of you ? walked we not in the same spirit ? walked we not in the same steps ?

Here the apostle answers an objection, which, without any just cause, was made against him by some : It was suggested, "That though he was not burdensome to the Corinthians himself, nor took any thing of them for preaching the gospel, yet that he cunningly and craftily sent others to them, and set them at work to take money for him." Now, to wipe off this aspersion, the apostle appeals to themselves, whether any person he ever sent to them, received any thing of them for his use ? Neither Titus nor Luke made a gain of them, but with the same generosity and freedom preached the gospel, and communicated the riches of grace to their souls. When the ministers of the gospel at any time call in the assistance of others to help them in their work, their care is to employ such, as near as they can judge, who are of the same spirit, and walk in the same steps with themselves. St. Paul, Titus, and Luke, all agree together in carrying on a generous design for the preaching the gospel to the Corinthians freely, are of the same mind and practice in every thing.

19 Again, think ye that we excuse ourselves unto you ? we speak before God in Christ : but we do all things, dearly beloved, for your edifying. 20 For I fear, lest when I come I shall not find you such as I would, and that I shall be found unto you such as ye would not: lest there be debates, envyings, wraths, strifes, back-bitings, whisperings, swellings, tumults: 21 And lest when I come again, my God will humble me among you, and that I shall bewail many which have sinned already, and have not repented of the uncleanness and fornication and lasciviousness which they have committed.

As if the apostle had said, "Think not that for any sinister or by ends of my own, I excuse myself so often to you, for deferring so long my promised and intended journey among you, for all I do is with an eye to your advantage. It is your benefit and reformation I aim at ; for verily, I fear, whenever I come, I shall find these sins unrepented of, and unhumiliated for, by many of you, which will be matter of humiliation, sorrow, and lamentation to me ; and that I must be necessitated, contrary to my inclinations and desires, to inflict censures and corporal punishments upon many among you, for the schisms, debates and strifes of some ; for the uncleanness, fornication, and lasciviousness of others." Note here, 1. What great disorders and scandalous crimes were found in the church of Corinth, and yet she retained the denomination and character of a true church ; the apostle fears, and not without cause, that he should find debates, envyings, wraths and strifes among them, the usual and necessary consequences of schisms and factions in the church. 2. That notwithstanding all these corruptions and scandalous abuses, St Paul neither separates himself, nor persuades any to separate from them. Nothing will justify a separation from a church, but that which makes a separation between God and that church, namely, heresy in doctrine, or idolatry in worship.

CHAP. XIII.

Our apostle being come to the conclusion of this second epistle, lets the Corinthians know, that he had a third time resolved to come unto them, and to be sharp against such of them with his ecclesiastical censures, as he found unreformed ; sparing neither great nor small, one or other, if involved in the same guilt.

THIS is the third time I am coming to you. In the mouth of two or three witnesses shall every word be established. 2 I told you before, and forgettel you as if I were present the second time, and being absent now I write to them which heretofore have sinned, and to all other, that if I come again I will not spare : 3 Since ye seek a proof of Christ speaking in me, which to you-ward is not weak, but is mighty 'mighty in you. 4 For though he was crucified through weakness, yet he liveth by the power of God. For we also are weak in him, but we shall live with him by the power of God toward you.

The apostle having, throughout both his epistles, blamed the Corinthians for several gross enormities found amongst them, and hearing there were some that had not repented of them, he gives them plainly to understand, that he had a full purpose to come unto them with his rod of ecclesiastical discipline and church-censures, and would not spare a man of them, but execute that power on the impenitent which Christ had given him, by excluding such unreclaimable offenders from church communion. Note here, With what wisdom and caution the holy apostle proceeds in the executing and insisting the severe censures of the church; He uses admonition a first, second and third time, before he proceeds to the awful sentence of excommunication: I told you before, I foretel you now, and being absent I write to you, that when I come I will not spare. He tells them farther, that they had tempted him hereunto, in that they had required a proof from him whether Christ had owned him as an apostle or not, and would ratify his censures by judgements following them. He shews, that Christ had owned him, and manifested his power in his ministry among them, by converting many of them to the Christian faith, by bestowing the gifts of his Spirit upon them, and by many signs and miracles which he enabled him to do in the midst of them. When God calls his servants to the work of the ministry, he leaves not either himself or them without witness; he bears testimony to their sincerity, by giving them, in some degree, the seal of their ministry, in the conversion and edification of those they are sent unto: Since you seek a proof of Christ speaking in me, to you-ward he is not weak, but is mighty in and amongst you. Next, the holy apostle draws a parallel, and makes a comparison between his blessed Lord and Master and himself. As Christ, in his state of humiliation, appeared to be a weak and frail man, by being crucified; but was evidenced to be the great and mighty God, by his rising from the dead; so the apostle, considered in himself, and in respect of his afflictions, appears a weak and contemptible man; but yet they had found, and should farther find, a resemblance of the power and strength of Christ in his life and ministry; and particularly, they should find him armed with authority from Christ, to execute censures upon the contumacious and impenitent. Though the ministers of Christ, like their Master, when here on earth, are in a state of weakness, poverty and contempt yet they are clothed with divine power in the execution of their office, and their ministry is a living, powerful, and efficacious ministry, in the vigorous effects of it upon the hearts of their people.

5 ¶ Examine yourselves whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves. Know ye not your own selves, how that Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be reprobates?

Here the apostle advises the Corinthians, instead of inquiring after the proof of Christ in him, to examine whether they were in Christ themselves; intimating to us, that such are usually most backward to examine the state of their own souls, who are forward to enquire into the spiritual state and condition of others. "You seek a proof of Christ in me says the apostle; Oh, rather prove and examine yourselves." Where note, 1. A duty expressed; Examine yourselves; prove yourselves. The word is a metaphor taken from goldsmiths, who with great exactness try their gold; the truth of it by the touchstone, the weight of it by the scale, and the purity of it by the fire. And the repetition of the command, Examine yourselves; prove yourselves; implies the great backwardness that is in the men's natures to perform this duty, the great necessity of the duty, and the great diligence and frequency to be used in performing of the duty. Learn hence, That self-examination is an excellent, a necessary and important duty, belonging to every one in the church, and requires great diligence and faithfulness in the performing of it. It is necessary, in regard of our comforts, and also in regard of our graces; for there are counterfeit graces, as well as real; and common graces, as well as saving; and it is a duty that requires diligence and frequency, because the work is difficult because the heart is backward, because we are apt to be deceived, and willing to be deceived; because many have miscarried without it, and many perished by a negligent performance of it; Therefore examine yourselves; prove yourselves. Note, 2. The subject-matter of our examination, whether ye be in the faith; that is, whether ye be converted to the Christian faith, whether the faith of Christ be in you, whether the principle of faith be in your hearts, whether the power of faith be in your consciences, whether the practice of faith be in your lives, whether your faith be the parent and principle of obedience, working love, and working by love, 3. The enforcement and motive to this duty, Except ye be reprobates; that is, counterfeit, adulterate unsound, and unsincere Christians, unaccepted of God, and not owned by him. As reprobate silver has no worth or fitness in it for trading, so such Christians as, upon examination, are not found to have the grace of faith in them, more precious than gold, and unapproved of God, and rejected by him: 4. When the apostle expostulates with them, and says, Know ye not your own selves? it implies both the folly and unreasonableness of the neglect of the duty, and also the possibility and easiness of knowing whether Christ be in us, or not, upon a due and diligent inquiry, whether we have experienced the quickening and transforming power of Christ in our hearts and lives. Finally, So great is the benefit, and so sweet the comfort, which flows to us by examination and self acquaintance, that it will abundantly recompence our care and diligence in the frequent and faithful discharge of it.

6 But I trust that ye shall know that we are not reprobates.

As if the apostle had said, "Whatever you, upon examination, shall be found to be, I trust you shall know, and be convinced, that we have not dishonoured Christ, nor shall be disowned of him: But whenever I come to you, you shall find that I am not destitute of the grace and power of Christ; whether for advancing your faith, improving proving your holiness, or correcting your miscarriages." The ministers of Christ, who are faithful to him, in contending with the errors and vices of men, in reproving sin, in censuring sin, shall be owned and approved of God, when the reprobate world shall be condemned by him.

7 Now I pray to God that ye do no evil; not that we should appear approved, but that ye should do that which is honest, though we be as reprobates

The apostle, drawing towards the conclusion of his epistle, shuts it up with prayer, earnestly imploring almighty God, that the Corinthians might be found doing no evil which might expose them to his censure, and force him to exercise his apostolical power in punishing such offenders and offences as he should find among them. And he prayed thus for them, because he had rather have them good, than by punishing their evil manners, have an occasion to testify himself an approved and faithful apostle: For he did not so much regard his own reputation, as their salvation.

The apostle having prayed that the Corinthians might be found doing no evil, in the former verse, and assuring them thereupon, that they would then be secured from his censures and chastisements, he assigns a reason here for that assurance given them; because, says he, We can do nothing against the truth, but for the truth; having our power given us only for edification, and not for destruction. Considering the words, without respect to the coherence, observe, 1. A negative proposition, We can do nothing against the truth. O blessed impotency! 2. An affirmation, or positive assertion, but for the truth. O blessed ability! He was as strong as a giant for the truth, but as weak as an infant against it. Learn, That sincere Christians in general and the ministers of Christ in particular, cannot, dare not, will not do any thing against the truth, but for the truth: They cannot, that is, they may not, they are restrained by an outward command from God, who is truth itself: They cannot, that is, they will not, there is a restraint of an inward principle; neither the conviction of their understandings, the clearness of their judgments, nor the holiness of their hearts, will suffer them to oppose the truth. Again, they cannot attempt it; or if they did, they can never effect it; they cannot do it safely, they cannot do it successfully. We can do nothing against the truth in a way of discouragement; nor nothing against it in a way of disparagement: But all our endeavours are for the truth; we embrace it in our judgments, we hide it in our hearts, and practise it in our lives. Whatever talent God entrusts any of his ministers with whether of parts, power, or estate, it is an opportunity put into their hands of doing service for the truth, and, as such, to be accepted and improved.

6 For we are glad when we are weak, and ye are strong: and this also we wish, even your perfection.

The apostle may be understood two ways: 1. We are glad when we are weak; that is, when I have no occasion to manifest my apostolical power, in censuring any of you as offenders: But ye are strong; strong in faith, and fruitful in good works. Or, 2. We are glad when we are weak, that is, when we are weakened by never so many sufferings and infirmities, provided you are made strong thereby: For this is what we principally wish and endeavour, even your utmost perfection in knowledge, faith, and holiness. Nothing is more desired by the zealous and faithful ministers of Jesus Christ, than to see their people strong in faith, fruitful in good works, persevering in well-doing, yea, perfect in holiness and obedience.

10 Therefore I write these things being absent, lest being present I should use sharpness, according to the power which the Lord hath given me to edification, and not to destruction.

As if the apostle had said, "Verily I write thus to you, being absent purposely to reclaim you, lest being present, I should be forced to use some sharpness towards you, according to the power which the Lord hath given me, tending to your edification always, and not at any time to your destruction." Observe here, With what tenderness the apostle treats these offenders; he tells them, the sharpness and severity in his letters (if they accounted it such) was upon a kind design, to prevent sharpness and severity in his dealings with them, when he came amongst them; yet withal, he assures them, that if matters should come to an extremity, that he must be forced to exercise his apostolical power, in cutting the contumacious off from the church's communion; he would exercise it with a tender regard to their good, not their hurt; for their edification and not willingly to their destruction. Learn we, from the apostle's practice, to execute the censures of the church with great tenderness and affection, with great pity and compassion, with extraordinary dread and caution; not with rashness and indiscretion, or upon every light and trivial occasion, but like a tender-hearted father, with a rod in our hand, and tears in our eyes.

11 Finally, brethren, farewell. Be perfect, be of good comfort, be of one mind, live in peace; and the God of love and peace be with you.

Here our apostle shuts up his epistle with a pathetic option and affectionate wish of all perfection, consolation, concord and communion, to his beloved Corinthians. Where note, 1. What a fervent and unfeigned love there is in all the faithful ministers of Christ to the people committed to their charge, and how desirous they are, when they are taking their leave of them, to leave God with them; The God of love and peace be with you. Now God's being with a people, implies and imports these things; namely, the heart of God with them, the help of God with them, and the presence of God with them, and that they shall shortly be with God. 2. What are the particular graces and blessings which the apostle wishes his beloved Corinthians? He doth not wish them earthly honours, worldly riches, sensual pleasures; but perfection of grace, spiritual consolation, mutual love, sweet communion munion with God, unanimity and concord amongst themselves: Sanctifying gifts and saving graces are the best legacies that can be left by the ministers of God unto their people. Be perfect, be knit together; let the schisms and breaches which have been amongst you, be healed. Be of good comfort, rejoice in and under all your sufferings for Christ, and the profession of his holy religion. Be of one mind, of the same judgment, if possible, in all things; or if otherwise, let no difference in judgment cause disunion in affection; if in some lesser things your heads be different, yet let your hearts be one. Live in peace; for the Lord's sake, live no longer in division and strife, in contention and wrath; let me hear no more of those debates, envyings, backbitings, whisperings, and swellings, which I have reprov'd you for; but especially live in peace with your teachers and spiritual guides; cause not them to complain to God of you, nor to groan to God against you, for your factious preferring one minister before another; one crying, I am of Paul, and another, I am of Apollos. Thus doing, the God of peace and love shall be with you: That is, he who is the author and enjoiner of love and peace will be with you, and dwell among you with his gracious and favourable presence.

12 Greet one another with an holy kiss. 13 All the saints salute you.

He exhorts them, according to the custom of those eastern countries, to salute one another with a kiss, as a token of mutual and sincere love: And since it was become a practice in sacred meetings and church assemblies, particularly before their receiving the holy communion, to kiss each other, he advises them to use it innocently, chastely; let it not be a wanton, but an holy kiss. However, afterwards, the piety and purity of the church degenerating and declining, it was laid aside. That which is innocent in itself, and pious in its first intendment, may in time fall under such abuse, as to cause it wholly to be laid aside.

14 The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all. Amen.

Here are the highest blessings and benefits wished to, and prayed for, in behalf of the Corinthians, which they could possibly be made partakers of; namely, all that love which doth, or can flow from the Father; all that grace which was purchased by the Son, and all that fellowship and communion with, and communication from the holy Spirit, which might render them meet for the service of Christ on earth, and for the full fruition and final enjoyment of him in heaven. Observe here, A full text for the holy Trinity; the names of the three persons Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, are here distinctly mentioned as in the commission for, and in the form of baptism, Matt. xxvii. 19. Here the apostle calls the Father God, the Son Lord, and the Spirit the Holy Ghost; and as he attributes love to the Father, grace to the Son, so fellowship to the Holy Ghost; so that we have no reason to doubt of the personality of either, or any of them. But when we consider how many at this day, with impudence and impunity, deny the divinity of the second, and the personality of the third person in the blessed Trinity, we have reason to pray, as our church has taught us, for our own establishment, in the collect for Trinity-Sunday;

Almighty and everlasting God, who hast given unto us thy servants grace, by the confession of a true faith, to acknowledge the glory of the eternal Trinity, and in the power of the divine Majesty, to worship the Unity; we beseech thee, that thou wouldst keep us stedfast in this faith, and evermore defend us from all adversaries, who livest and reignest one God, world without end. Amen.

G A L A T I A N S.

That this epistle was written by St. Paul, whose name it bears, I think was never questioned; though it be not writ, as most of his other epistles are, to the Christians of one particular city, but of the whole country, to wit, Galatia.

The Galatians very readily embraced the gospel, upon the preaching of St. Paul, and were at first exceedingly affectionate to his person, and zealous in the profession of what he taught. But, alas! soon after St. Paul had left them, some false apostles from Judea crept in amongst them, perverting some, and staggering others; teaching the necessity, for such as had embraced the Christian religion, to submit to circumcision, and the observation of the Mosaical institution.

To countenance this insinuation of theirs, they alledged, that St. Peter, James, and John, had sent them thither, and that they were of their minds in this matter; and particularly, that St. Peter was against the rejecting of circumcision, and did himself practise the ceremonial law, and observe the rites of it in common conversation, separating himself from the Gentiles. Thus these Judaizers opposed the doctrine and practice of St. Peter to that of St. Paul; and to carry on their design with greater success, they magnified the other apostles, and vilified St. Paul, not allowing him the name or right of an apostle, having not seen Christ in the flesh, as the rest had done, affirming that he never was called by Christ, nor ever owned for an apostle by the other apostles.

Hereupon St. Paul, in his absence from the Galatians, writes this epistle to them; in which, 1. He vindicates himself and his doctrine, proving, that he was called to be an apostle by Christ himself, and that he had received his doctrine by immediate revelation from him; and that it was conformable to, and the very same with what was preached by the other apostles. Next, he strenuously proves, that circumcision, and all the ceremonial rites, were certainly abolished by the death of Christ. And, lastly, He draws practical inferences from this doctrine, and instructs them in the duties of an holy life, exhorting them to live religiously in every relation; and so concludes his epistle with a solemn protestation of his sincere affection to them; assuring them, that as an evidence thereof, he had written the whole epistle with his own hand, wishing them abundant consolation in Christ, both in life and death.

C H A P. I.

PAUL an apostle (not of men, neither by man, but of Jesus Christ, and God the Father, who raised him from the dead)

The penman of this epistle is here described by his name, Paul; by his office, an apostle; and by his commission to that office, which was not human, but altogether divine, even from God the Father by Jesus Christ. Observe here, 1. The great modesty of this great apostle, in the setting forth his authority as an apostle, you will find in the front of his epistles, when he names any others in the salutation with himself (as Silvanus and Timotheus) he mentions not himself as an apostle, when named with them, lest he should be thought to magnify himself above them. But here, because his apostolical office was called in question, he is necessitated to vindicate his authority, and accordingly declares himself an apostle, not by men, nor by man; that is, men were neither the authors nor chusers of him to his office: He was not called, as Matthias was, Acts i. by the suffrage of the rest of the apostles: He was not an apostle of men's election or by men's instruction; but appointed by Jesus Christ, and God the Father, who raised him from the dead. Learn hence, That no sins before, nor yet after, conversion, can hinder the rich mercy and and free grace of God, from using men in the highest employments in the church, if he pleases to make use of them. Paul, after he had been a blasphemer, was made an apostle; and Peter, after his conversion, denied Christ with oaths and curses; yet is a chief apostle, and an inspired penman of holy scripture. Note 2. The high dignity conferred upon St. Paul, with reference to his apostolical office, he did not take it upon himself, but was chosen to it; he was not chosen to it for any merit in himself, but it was a grace freely bestowed upon him: And this not by the ministry and mediation of man, but by the immediate designation and election of Jesus Christ. Thus far he stands upon equal terms with the rest of the apostles; they did not call themselves, nor were they called by Christ, for any worthiness in themselves, above others: But behold the peculiar prerogative of St. Paul above the rest of the apostles, in this particular; they were called by Christ, in the days of his humiliation, when he was here upon earth in the flesh; but he was called by Christ after his resurrection yea, in his highest state of exaltation, when sitting at his Father's right hand in heaven. And as his call was thus very extraordinary, so his gifts were answerable to his call: The gospel which he preached, he received by inward and immediate revelation, which made him so much excel all the other apostles; insomuch, that although, in his own opinion, he was the least of saints, when here upon earth; yet, in the opinion of others, he was the holiest man when upon earth, and the highest now in heaven, next the man Jesus Christ.

That is, "All the brethren which are here with me, and own the doctrine which I preach, send greeting unto the churches of Galatia." Here note, 1. How St. Paul's doctrine is justified from the charge of singularity, which the Judaizing false teachers objected against it. What he wrote and taught, he tells the Galatians, was owned by all the brethren. This shews he had the consent of the church with him, in that holy doctrine which was delivered by him. 2. The generality of the persons to whom this epistle is directed; not to a single person, nor to a particular church, but to all the churches in the province of Galatia. There were several christian congregations, called churches, in that country, and of all of them being leavened, or in danger of being soured with Judaism, that is, of superadding the ceremonial law of Moses to the gospel of Christ; the apostle, and the brethren with him, direct this epistle, not to any single church in that province, but to them all in general, being equally concerned: All the brethren with me, unto the churches of Galatia. 3. How the apostle doth not say here, as elsewhere, To the saints of God which are in Galatia; or, To them that are sanctified by God the Father; but barely says, To the churches of Galatia; thereby declaring his holy indignation against the Galatians, as unworthy of those gracious appellations, because they had sadly corrupted the doctrine of the gospel begun in the spirit, and ended in the flesh; first owning Christ and the liberty of the gospel, and afterwards pleading for the bondage of the ceremonial law. Yet, note, lastly, As corrupt as these churches of Galatia were, our apostle owns and acknowledges them to be true churches; they retained the essentials of Christianity, and were not guilty either of idolatry, or a total apostasy; therefore though stained with divers corruptions both in doctrine and manners, which he sharply rebukes and reproves them for, yet he doth not deny them the name of churches: All the brethren which are with me, unto the churches of Galatia.

3 Grace be to you and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ.

These words are both a Christian salutation, and an apostolical benediction: As they are a salutation, they express a wish and desire of the best blessings towards and on the behalf of them they saluted. From whence we may learn, That religion doth not abolish and destroy, but spiritualize and improve civility, humanity, and common courtesy. The Heathens wished health to their saluted friends; the Jews, peace; but the Christians, grace and peace. Again, the words may be understood as an apostolical and ministerial blessing: The apostles were the patriarchs of the church of the New Testament: And as a spiritual father, St. Paul here blesses his children, wishes them first grace; then peace: Peace must be sought after grace; and not expected before it. Peace without grace, is no peace. There can be no peace with the Creator, no sanctified peace with the creatures, except through Jesus Christ we are first made partakers of the gracious love and favour of Almighty God. Accordingly, says the apostle here, Grace be to you and peace from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ. Where note, That grace and peace may be said to be from the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ, these two ways: (1.) Efficiently, as the authors and causes of both: God the Father is the author of all grace, as he did decree it; and Christ, as he did purchase it. (2.) Objectively; that is, this grace and love in God the Father, and this peace and satisfaction that is in Jesus Christ, the more they are by faith apprehended by us, the more are they increased in us, and upon us. Learn from the whole, That the holiest and best of Christians here on earth, stand in manifest need of fuller supplies and farther additions both of grace and peace to be daily communicated to them, and enjoyed by them.

4 Who gave himself for our sins, that he might deliver us from this present evil world, according to the will of God and our Father;

That is, "Our Lord Jesus Christ gave himself unto death, for the remission of our sins, that he might deliver us from this evil world; and namely, to separate or bring us off from the evil customs and practices of the wicked men in the world, and engage us to live a life of strict holiness, according to the will and command of God our Father." Here note, 1. The priestly office of Christ declared and asserted: He gave himself for our sins; that is, an expiatory sacrifice for our sins. So deadly was the guilt of sin, so exact the justice of God, and so unalterable his faithfulness, in executing the judgment which was denounced against sinners, that there was no hope for guilty sinners pardon, without satisfaction given to the injured justice of God, for sin; and nothing less would satisfy than the blood of Jesus Christ, who is essentially, truly and really God. 2. A farther end and design which Christ had in giving himself for us, namely, to deliver us from the rage of our lusts, as well as from the wrath of God, to sanctify our natures for us, and to mortify our corruptions in us, to redeem us from our vain conversation, and deliver us from this present evil world; not totally to remove us out of the world, but morally to oblige us to abandon the wicked courses, the sinful practices of the evil men of the world. Blessed be God, that Jesus Christ did not only purchase pardon and remission, but holiness and sanctification also for his ransomed and redeemed ones, and is as willing to free us from the dominion, as from the danger of our sins: He gave himself for us, that he might deliver us from this present evil world. 3. As the final cause of Christ's death, deliverance from God's wrath and sin's rage, so the efficient cause of his death, the will of his Father: He gave himself for us, according to the will of God; that is, according to the purpose and appointment of God. Christ, as Mediator, was the Father's servant; and whatever he did in the work of mediation for us, was by the appointment and with the special approbation of God the Father. Eternal thanks be given, that the Son's purchase was the Father's pleasure. 4. The comfortable relation in which God now stands unto us, since Christ gave himself for us, namely, that of a Father: according to the will of God and our Father; that is, who is now our Father. Learn hence, That satisfaction being given by Christ to provoked justice for our sins, God, who was before a consuming fire, and a punishing judge, is become our gracious and reconciled Father; our Father by adoption, who before was our Father only by creation: according to the will of God and our Father.

5 To whom be glory forever and ever. Amen.

That is, "To God the Father, and Christ Jesus our Redeemer, be given the highest degrees of honour and glory, throughout the present and eternal ages." Note here, 1. The work and duty incumbent upon Christ's redeemed ones, and that is, to ascribe all honour and homage, all glory and praise to God the Father, as the contriver, and to Christ the Son, as the accomplisher of the work of redemption; To whom, both whom, be glory. 2. The duration and continuance of this duty; not for a day, or year, but for eternal ages. This duty of ascribing honour and homage, glory and praise to the Father and Mediator, for the glorious work of man's redemption, is such, that it can never be sufficiently discharged, but requires a succession of ages to perform it in; yea, eternity itself is too short for the performance of it: To whom be glory forever and ever. The glory of the Redeemer, and of him that sent him to redeem, will be the long-lasting, and never-ending song of redeemed ones, through millions of ages, yea, to all eternity; a work begun on earth, never finished in heaven.

6 I marvel that ye are so soon removed from him that called you into the grace of Christ unto another gospel: 7 Which is not another; but there be some that trouble you, and would pervert the gospel of Christ.

Note here, 1. The heavy charge which St. Paul brings in against the false apostles or Judaizing teachers, they perverted the gospel which St. Paul preached, and taught a new gospel of their own; yet not absolutely so, but by compounding and mingling the gospel with the ceremonial law, and by making circumcision and other things necessary to salvation, which our apostle never made so, this the apostle calls another gospel. Whence learn, 1. That it is no new or strange thing to hear of new gospels, of true gospel perverters, and of false gospel teachers. We find such in the primitive and purest churches, planted even by the apostles themselves; no wonder they are found in our days, who are fallen into the very dregs of time and error together. 2. That the addition of any thing to the Christian religion, as necessary to be believed and practised in order to salvation, is a perverting of the gospel of Christ, and preaching another gospel. These Galatians did not renounce Christianity, and go over to another religion, but they received circumcision, and the observation of the law of Moses; as an essential part of the Christian religion, and as a condition of eternal salvation: Whereas the death of Christ having put an end to the Jewish dispensation, there was neither then, nor now, any obligation upon Christians to observe the law of Moses, and consequently, the addition of any thing to the Christian doctrine, as necessary to be believed and practised in order to salvation, is preaching another gospel, and a manifest perverting of the gospel of Christ. 3. That there is no authority in the Christian church, in any, or in all the guides of it, to impose upon Christians any thing, as of necessity to salvation, which the gospel has not made necessary. The apostles themselves had no authority to add any thing to the gospel, much less can any that come after them pretend to it: Christ commanded them, Matt. xxviii. to teach all nations, to observe all things whatsoever he commanded them: and had the apostles themselves added any point of faith and practice, not given them in charge by Christ himself, they had fallen under that curse themselves, which here they denounced against false teachers. Note 2. The artifice which these false teachers, used to draw the Galatians into these new errors, and that was hastily and suddenly to avow and own them before the world; I marvel that ye are so soon removed. Seducers are for clapping up an halcyon match between the mind and error, and press the seduced to quick resolutions; an halcyon dispatch being their great advantage, before they consult their spiritual guides, or weigh matters in the balance of impartial judgments. What, says the apostle, are ye so soon removed? Yes, might the false teachers have said, if not so soon, it might never; if not so soon removed, they might never be at all: For errors are like fish, they must be eaten fresh and new, or they will quickly stink, and be thrown away. 3. The true cause from which the Galatians' fall into error did proceed: They trusted themselves with themselves; they trusted the clearness of their own unassisted eyes, and to the strength of their own reason and judgment, without consulting their spiritual guide: Had not these Galatians a Paul to consult with,

with, before they gave their consent to false teachers? Or if he was at a distance from them, about the work of the Lord in remote places, could they not have written to him, or advised with others besides him? Wo to him that is alone, when assaulted by seducers!

8 But though we or an angel from heaven preach any other gospel unto you, than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed. 9 As we said before, so say I now again, If any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed.

Note here 1. How our apostle supposes an impossibility, only for the confirmation of what he had before affirmed. He doth not suppose it possible for any angel in heaven, or apostle upon earth, to contradict the doctrine of the gospel which he had delivered, to preach any thing contrary to it, or besides it, or different from it; making that necessary to be believed and practised, which Christ and his apostles never made necessary. Learn hence, That the written word of God, without unwritten traditions, contains in it all things necessary to salvation; and whatever doctrines are propounded to the church, not only contrary to, but differing from it, or besides the written word, are cursed doctrines. Note, 2. The terrible anathema which the apostle denounces against those, whoever they should be, be it an apostle upon earth, or an angel from heaven, that should thus pervert the gospel of Christ, by making any thing necessary to be believed or practised in order to salvation, which Christ has not made necessary. Let him be accursed. Let the church of Rome in general, and the council of Trent in particular, dread the efficacy of this curse, who have added so many new articles to the Christian faith, and enforced them as necessary to be believed by all Christians; insomuch that they pronounce, "that no salvation can be obtained without the belief of them," and denounce their anathemas against us who cannot believe them: But as their curse, causeless, shall not come, so we believe that they, propounding terms of salvation no where delivered by Christ and his apostles, do bring themselves under the apostle's anathema here in this text: For if the new articles of the church of Rome be necessary to salvation, then what Christ and his apostles delivered was not sufficient to salvation before; and thus the pride of man exalts itself above the wisdom of God. 3. How the apostle expresses his assurance in this matter; and to shew that he did not speak rashly, and in an hear, but upon due consideration, he repeats again, ver. 9. As we said before, so say I now again, &c. Note here, How positive and peremptory the apostle is in this matter: And doubtless this one anathema of his, is more dreadful than all the bruta fulmina, the freakish anathemas of an enthusiastic church, which, in a manifest affront to the authority of St. Paul, has presumed to add so many new articles to the Christian religion, for which there is not the least ground or warrant, either from the holy scriptures, or any of the ancient creeds. Lastly, How the apostle puts himself into the number, if I, or any man, or any angel preach otherwise, let him be accursed. As if the apostle had said, "Not only the false apostles are to be rejected, but I myself deserve to be anathematized, and accounted an execrable person, should I preach any other doctrine to you, than what you have received from Christ by me; nay, should any angel from heaven attempt it, he ought to be detested for it." Learn, That no angel in heaven, no person or church upon earth, have power to make new articles of faith, or to impose any thing upon our belief or practice, that is either against or besides the written word, or any ways inconsistent with it, or contrary unto it.

10 For do I now persuade men, or God? or do I seek to please men? for if I yet pleased men, I should not be the servant of Christ.

Our apostle in these words discovers the great sincerity he used in preaching the pure and unmixed doctrine of the gospel to the Galatians; for he did not persuade, that men, but God, should be heard and obeyed, that so their faith might be founded upon divine, and not human authority; nor did he in his ministry aim at pleasing men, but Christ: For should he now please men, being an apostle, as he did in times past, being a Pharisee, he should not be the servant of Christ. The ministers of Christ must not be men-pleasers; they must not please men either by flattery or falsehood, nor accommodate their doctrines to the humour and dispositions of men; pleasing of God is our great work and business, let us mind that: Man pleasing is endless and needless, any farther than for their good, and the gospel's gain. Accordingly, the apostle tells us elsewhere, that he was made all things to all men that he might gain some; not to make a present gain of them, but that they might be eternal gainers by him; it was not to exalt himself, but that Christ might be exalted in the hearts and lives of his hearers, that he sought in and by his ministry to please all men; and thus, in imitation of him, let us seek to please all men for their good to edification.

11 ¶ But I certify you, brethren, that the gospel which was preached of me is not after man. 12 For I neither received it of man, neither was I taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ.

The apostle here, as he did before, ver. 1, 2, asserts the divinity of the doctrine of the gospel which he had preached to them: and assures them likewise of his own lawful call to be an apostle, which was questioned by his adversaries, who affirmed, that he had received his doctrine only from others at the second hand. To satisfy them in the divinity of his doctrine, he tells them, it was not after man; that is, it was not human, but divine; nothing belonging to man, but all from God in it: And as for his authority to preach it, he assures them, he had a revelation and commission from Jesus Christ so to do; he learned not his doctrine from any human teacher, nor undertook to preach it by any human authority, but from Christ's immediate revelation. Learn hence, It is a singular satisfaction to the ministers of Christ, and that which gives them boldness before their false accusers, when they can give good proof of their regular call to the work of the ministry, and of the divinity of the doctrine dispensed by them. Thus did St.

seen Peter, or any other of the apostles, and consequently could not receive the knowledge of the gospel from him or them, as his adversaries the false apostles would insinuate and suggest. True, after his three years preaching in, and his return from Arabia, he went up to Jerusalem, and saw Peter and James, and conversed with them for fifteen days: But the shortness of his stay with them is an evidence that he went not up to Jerusalem to learn the gospel from them, much less to pay homage to St. Peter as the Prince of the apostles; for St. Paul often affirms, in his epistles, That he was not inferior to St. Peter, nor came behind the chiefest of the apostles; but it was only a familiar and friendly visit, given by one minister of Christ to another, in token of mutual consent and agreement in the same truth preached by both; and by no means to receive ordination from Peter, or divine instructions (for he had an higher teacher than him, even Christ himself) or to acknowledge any subjection to him, by owning his supremacy over all the apostles; as the church of Rome would bear us in hand he did, in defiance of what St. Paul himself declares to the contrary. But we cannot help it, if men who have their credulity at their own disposal, and can believe what they list, will yield their assent to what is contrary to divine relation, and the reason of things. Very evident is it to any impartial observer, that St. Paul's visit at Jerusalem was a visit of civil courtesy, yet for the spiritual consolation and mutual edification both of himself and the apostles, whom he thus visited. From hence learn, 1. That the ministers of Christ should be so far from being at variance with, or at any distance in affection from each other, that they ought to maintain correspondency and familiarity with one another, and to give friendly visits to each other, in token of their harmony and mutual agreement in the same divine truths delivered by them. Thus did our apostle here; he took a journey to Jerusalem to see Peter and James our Lord's kinsman. 2. From the shortness of his visit and stay at Jerusalem, though it was in the most delightful and desirable, yea most profitable company, yet it was but for fifteen days; he hastens away to his charge again. Thence note, That though the ministers of Christ may and ought to visit each other, as an evidence of reciprocal affection, and in order to mutual direction, edification and consolation; yet ought their meetings to be neither so frequent, nor of so long continuance, that thereby their several flocks shall suffer prejudice: After a short time spent in visiting, we must return to our business, and mind, above all things, our ministerial charge: I went to see Peter; &c.

20 Now the things which I write unto you, behold, before God, I lie not.

Observe here, That St. Paul, having to do with the false apostles and the seduced Galatians, who, he had just cause to suspect, would not (as they ought) give much credit to his word; he asserts the truth of what he affirmed, upon oath, appealing to the all-knowing and heart-searching God, as witness and judge of the truth of what he said: Behold, before God I lie not. Where, note, 1. That it is no new thing for the faithfullest and ablest ministers and servants of Christ to be looked upon as liars, unworthy to be trusted, and to have the truth of what they deliver, though in God's name, questioned and suspected. Our apostle's purging of himself here from lying, doth import, that some did suspect him for a liar. And if an inspired apostle be, what private minister may not be, suspected? 2. The mean which St. Paul makes use of, for purging himself from the imputation of falshood; it was, by taking an oath in a solemn manner. Learn thence, That though rash swearing, false swearing, and upon every little occasion to take or multiply oaths, be a very great sin; yet to swear, and bear witnesses to the truth, and to take an oath upon due consideration, and for weighty reasons, and to swear by the name of God, is certainly a lawful, and sometimes a very necessary and important duty.

21 Afterwards I came into the regions of Syria and Cilicia; 22 And was unknown by face unto the churches of Judea which were in Christ; 23 But they had heard only, That he which persecuted us in times past, now preacheth the faith which once he destroyed. 24 And they glorified God in me.

The fourth evidence is here produced by St. Paul, to prove, that both his ministry and his message, his office and his doctrine, were divine; and that he was so far from learning the Christian religion from the Christian churches in Judea, that he was not by face so much as known to them, or they to him: They had heard, indeed, that one Paul a persecutor was become a preacher, but they had never seen him; and accordingly they magnified the grace of God in his conversion, admiring the wonderful change wrought in him. Observe here, 1. The laborious diligence and indefatigable industry of St. Paul, in planting and propagating the Christian faith throughout the world; he travels, as soon as converted, into Arabia, then into the regions of Syria and Cilicia, thinking he could never do enough for Christ, who had suffered and done so much for him. Oh, how full of life and zeal are young converts! What activity and industry for Christ and souls is found with them! They despise all dangers, they surmount all difficulties, are above all discouragements, in expressing their love to Christ, and venturing their lives for him: But, alas! as they grow older, their affections are cooler: so that they have many times just cause to say, Oh, that it were with me, as in the months of old, in the day when God converted me, when the secret of God was with me, and when by his light I walked through all difficulties to subserve his interest, and to promote his glory. 2. The great and mighty power of the heart-changing grace of God, which turns the haters and professed enemies of religion into friends, and bitter and bloody persecutors into bold and painful preachers of the gospel: He who persecuted in times past, now preacheth the faith which once he destroyed. He that leads captivity captive, can soon make the stoutest enemies of religion to become its strongest friends. 3. Paul, before his conversion, is said to destroy the faith, because he intended it, and endeavoured it, though he could not actually effect it, and accomplish it. Sin and evil, intended by a determinate resolution, are as good as acted, in God's account. Bloody persecutors design no less than a total extirpation of the truth, to destroy the faith, which, though it be out of their reach to effect, yet having deliberately resolved

Paul here : The gospel, says he, which I preach to you, and the mission I had so to preach it, was not after man, nor from man, nor by man, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ : Where, note, From Christ's being so often opposed to man in these verses, and in the first verse, that he is not mere man, but God as well as man : Why else doth the apostle oppose Christ to man so often as he doth here ? Not of man, neither by man, nor after man, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ, who is God.

13 For ye have heard of my conversation in time past in the Jews religion, how that beyond measure I persecuted church of God, and wasted it ; 14 And profited the in the Jews religion above many my equals in mine own nation, being more exceedingly zealous of the traditions of my fathers.

Here the apostle offers several arguments to satisfy the Galatians, that both his commission to preach the gospel, and also the gospel which he preached to them, were not from man, but our Lord Jesus Christ. And the first argument to prove it, as a convictive evidence of it, was his bitter enmity against the Christian religion, and his mighty zeal for the Jewish religion, in which he was educated and brought up : All which he mentions as a thing publicly known, leaving them to infer from thence, that so great and sudden a change could not be the effect of human persuasion, but divine revelation : In time past I persecuted the church of God, and wasted it. Where, note, That although our apostle did not shun to make an open confession of his wicked life, before his conversion, that he might thereby make evident, -that his conversion was immediately from God, yet he makes an open confession only of his open sins, such as they had heard of in time past, without discovering his secret sins, which had been kept from the knowledge of the world, the divulging thereof would but have multiplied scandals and stumbling-blocks unto others. To confess our secret sins to God, is safe ; to confess our open sins to the world, is sufficient. Observe farther, The commendable proficiency which St. Paul made in the Jewish religion, wherein he was instructed and educated, I profited in the Jews religion above many my equals. He was also a zealous maintainer of the Jewish customs, and underwritten traditions, being more exceedingly zealous of the traditions of my fathers. From St. Paul's example we may infer, That it is a special duty incumbent upon all persons to make religion the matter of their choice ; and having espoused it, to be the more serious and zealous in it ; to labour to advance and grow both in the knowledge and in the practice of it ; and that to a degree of eminency, excelling and out-stripping others.

15 But when it pleased God, who separated me from my mother's womb, and called me by his grace, 16 To reveal his Son in me, that I might preach him among the heathen ; immediately I conferred not with flesh and blood ; 17 Neither went I up to Jerusalem to them which were apostles before me ; but I went into Arabia, and returned again unto Damascus.

Here we have a second evidence which St. Paul brings to prove himself an apostle extraordinary, called by God himself unto the ministerial service ; and that the doctrine he delivered, was not immediately from the mouths of the apostles, but by immediate revelation from Jesus Christ. Thus he speaks : "When says he, it pleased God, who decreed and determined to separate and set me apart for the work of an apostle, even from my very infancy, and afterwards of his mere grace and good will called me to preach the gospel to the Gentile world, having first revealed his Son in me, and to me, and then by me, immediately I set about the work, and complied with my duty, not consulting any person living, neither my own carnal reason, nor any man's advice ; neither went I up presently to Jerusalem to confer with, to receive authority or instruction from them, which were apostles before me ; but I went immediately from Damascus, the place of my conversion, into Arabia, and preached the gospel three years among those wild and barbarous heathens, and then returned again unto Damascus : From whence it evidently appears, that I neither had instruction nor commission from any of the apostles that were before me, having never seen any of them as yet, but both my mission and my message were immediately received from Jesus Christ. Here note, 1. The qualification necessary in a minister that reveals Jesus Christ unto his people, namely, that Christ must be revealed to him, and in him. We must learn Christ ourselves, before we pretend to preach him to others : When it pleased God to reveal his Son in me, I preached him among the Heathen. As there is no knowledge like the knowledge of experience ; so there is no preaching like experimental preaching. Happy those that can say, Not only that which we have heard and read, but that which we have tasted, and felt, and experienced from the holy Spirit's operation in and upon our own hearts, that declare we unto you. 2. What haste the apostle made to obey the call and command of God, after he had received it : Immediately I conferred not with flesh and blood. He consulted neither himself nor others, neither his own heart, nor the wisest heads, he consulted not his own safety nor carnal interest, but instantly did what he was commanded to do. The great commendation of duties, is the ready discharge of duties. When once the mind of God is declared, and conscience thoroughly satisfied, we cannot be too quick and expeditious in the execution of divine commands. Lord ! how readily should all men, but especially thy ministers, answer and obey thy call, and execute thy will and pleasure ! Immediately I conferred not, says St. Paul ; I made haste and delayed not, says holy David. In a good work it is good to make haste : In God's work we cannot readily make more haste than good speed.

18 Then after three years I went up to Jerusalem to see Peter, and abode with him fifteen days. 19 But other of the apostles saw I none, save James the Lord's brother.

Here is a third evidence to prove that St. Paul received his ministry and message by divine revelation from Jesus Christ, and not from man, or by man. He acknowledges, that not till three years after the conversion, when he had preached the gospel in the deserts of Arabia, had he ever seen resolved it, it is as actually accomplished in the account of God; He now preacheth the faith that once he destroyed. Lastly, To whom the glory and praise of converting grace is due, namely, to God, and to God alone; They glorified God in me; that is, they owned and admired the grace of God bestowed upon me, which wrought such a glorious and blessed change in me. The converting grace of God, wrought either in ourselves, or others, is matter of admiration, and calls for thanksgivings and acknowledgments unto God; They glorified God in me.

CHAP. II.

Our apostle here prosecutes the argument begun in the former chapter, namely, To evidence and prove, that both his ministry and his message, his office and his doctrine, were divine, neither of them received from man, but immediately from Jesus Christ,

THEN fourteen years after I went up again to Jerusalem with Barnabas, and took Titus with me also. 2. And I went up by revelation, and communicated unto them that gospel which I preach among the Gentiles, but privately to them which were of reputation, lest by any means I should run, or had run in vain.

Observe here 1. How the gracious care and good providence of God did watch over St. Paul from place to place, and from time to time, when and wheresoever he went forth to preach, to plant, and propagate the gospel. After fourteen years he went up to Jerusalem, that is, fourteen years after his conversion; soon after which he went about preaching the gospel to the Gentile world. Blessed be God, who is oftentimes pleased, in mercy to his church, to preserve the lives of his laborious ministers, and their liberties also, for the free exercise of their ministry, notwithstanding the joint endeavours of men and devils to the contrary. This good man, this great apostle, whose blood was thirsted after, having obtained help of God, continued fourteen years together, preaching the gospel of Jesus Christ. 2. The end, design, and intent of St. Paul, in his present going up to Jerusalem, and appearing before St. Peter there: It was not to acknowledge St. Peter's supremacy over him, or to appeal to him as the infallible judge in matters of religion; but it was, in a friendly and brotherly manner, to acquaint St. Peter and the rest of the apostles, with the doctrine preached by him; that their concurring approbation being given to it, the mouth of his adversaries, the false apostles, might be stopped, who accused him for preaching contrary to what the rest of the apostles both believed and practised. 3. The ground upon which St. Paul undertook this journey to Jerusalem at this time; He went up by revelation, he advised with God about the matter, and received direction from God to undertake the journey. Blessed be God, that although we cannot expect immediate direction and information from God now, as the saints of old had before the cannon of the Scripture was completed, yet we have the written word of God to be a light to our feet, and a lamp unto our paths, to direct and guide us in all our enterprizes; and we ought to regulate all our actions according to it, and to judge of the lawfulness and expediency of our undertakings by it. 4. With what prudence and holy caution the blessed apostle proceeded in this matter; he imparted his sentiments, and communicated his doctrine to the rest of the apostles privately, for fear of exasperating the zealous Judaizing Christians: And to the most eminent of the apostles, such as were of the greatest reputation; lest if there should be any opposition made to his doctrine, he should hereafter run, or had run in vain. Nothing more obstructs the success and efficacy of the gospel, than differences of judgment, and strife and debate about those differences, amongst the most eminent preachers of it. Hence it was, that St. Paul endeavoured so much to get the joint consent of the most eminent apostles to the doctrine delivered by him, lest by the calumnies of his adversaries, his preaching should have been rendered unsuccessful, and he should hereafter run and labour in vain.

3 But neither Titus, who was with me, being a Greek, was compelled to be circumcised: 4 And that because of false brethren unawares brought in, who came in privily to spy out our liberty which we have in Christ Jesus, that they might bring us into bondage: 5 To whom we gave place by subjection no not for an hour; that the truth of the gospel might continue with you.

Observe here, 1. The instance and evidence which St. Paul brings of the apostles at Jerusalem, agreeing with him, both in their doctrine and in their practice; and that was Titus, who being a Gentile, born a Greek, and now a preacher of the gospel, and never circumcised, the apostles at Jerusalem would no more compel him to be circumcised than St. Paul had done, but received him into fellowship with them, though he was an uncircumcised Greek. This was a plain evidence, that they did not judge circumcision, at that time, to be a part of God's commanded worship; for then they would have compelled Titus to it; that is, constrained him, by the force of ecclesiastical censures, to become circumcised, had they thought circumcision necessary to the Gentiles. 2. The reason assigned, why the apostle would not circumcise Titus, though he had before circumcised Timothy, namely, because some false brethren crept in, would have taken advantage from it, to bring persons into bondage to the law of ceremonies, and plead conformity to circumcision as an obliged duty. Learn hence. That although the ceremonial law was certainly abolished by the death of Christ; yet, Almighty God, partly with respect to it as his own ordinance, and partly in condescension to the weakness of the Jews, was pleased to tolerate the observation of some part of it, and particularly circumcision, as an indifferent action, though not as a part of religion, for some time; the ceremonial rites being dead, they were to be decently, not over hastily buried. Observe, 3. The apostle's undaunted courage, and heroic resolution in this matter; he would, notwithstanding the false apostles' importunity, never yield subjection, jection, or submission to, or compliance with, their commands, in the least measure, by consenting to circumcise Titus; that so the truth and liberty of the gospel might continue sincere and unshaken, Learn hence, That an outward act of compliance must not be consented to, which, in some cases, might be complied with, when, by making it necessary, we turn Christian liberty into servitude and bondage, when things in their own nature indifferent are urged and enforced as necessary; in that case the practice of a thing indifferent, is to be abstained from. Thus here, when false brethren urged the circumcision of Titus, as an evidence of St. Paul's receding from the doctrine of Christian liberty, he would not obey them, nor consent unto them: To whom we gave place, no not for an hour; that is, we refused to use circumcision, though but that once, because we would not give the adversaries the least advantage against us, or against the truth delivered and defended by us.

6 But of those who seemed to be somewhat (whatsoever they were, it maketh no matter to me: God accepteth no man's person) for they who seemed to be somewhat, in conference added nothing to me.

As if the apostle had said, "When I came up to Jerusalem, thus I behaved myself towards the false brethren, as I have here declared; but now, for those who seemed to be somewhat, that is, Peter, James, and John, who were of chief reputation among the apostles, and more than ordinary ministers of Jesus Christ, being the foundations of the Christian church, laid by Christ himself, although they had some external advantages above me, as being apostles before me, and having conversed with Christ, and seen him here on earth, which I never did; yet this maketh no matter to me; for God values no man for these outward favours and benefits: Neither in that conference about circumcision, did they add any thing to me, either by their authority or instruction; they added nothing, they corrected nothing, but approved all things, both what I did and said: From whence it evidently appears, that my authority was equal with theirs, and my doctrine the same with theirs also."

7 But contrariwise, when they saw that the gospel of the uncircumcision, was committed unto me, as the gospel of the circumcision was unto Peter: 8 (For he that wrought effectually in Peter to the apostleship of the circumcision, the same was mighty in me towards the Gentiles.) 9 And when James, Cephas, and John, who seemed to be pillars, perceived the grace that was given unto me, they gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of fellowship; that we should go unto the heathen, and they unto the circumcision, 10 Only they would that we should remember the poor; the same which I also was forward to do.

Note here, 1. That the ordinance both of Peter and Paul, for the office and work of apostles, was alike divine.

The former, St. Peter, was to be the minister of the circumcision: that is, to exercise his ministry among the Jews, and St. Paul, by virtue of the same divine ordinance, was to exercise his office among the Gentiles, called the uncircumcision; yet this must not be so understood, as if Paul might not preach to the Jews, nor St. Peter to the Gentiles, which they did both upon occasion, but because their more special and particular province was thus, St. Peter to preach to the Jews, and St. Paul to the Gentiles. Learn hence, That the office of preaching the gospel is a special trust, committed by God himself to such as he qualifies for it; and as none must enterprize it, but such as he calls unto it, so must all that undertake, be accountable to him for it; The gospel of the uncircumcision was committed unto me, and the gospel of the circumcision was committed unto Peter:—Note 2. How this great apostle ascribes the success and efficacy of his own ministry among the Gentiles, and of St. Peter's among the Jews, alike to God; He that wrought effectually in Peter, was also mighty in me: It is neither the person nor pains of the minister, nor any natural energy or efficacy in the word preached upon which the success of the gospel depends, but upon the effectual working of the holy Spirit; He that wrought effectually in Peter, was also mighty in me. The word of God works not as a natural agent, but as a moral instrument in the hand of the Spirit. The weapons of our ministerial warfare are then mighty, when made mighty through God, for the pulling down the strong-holds of sin and Satan. 3. The duty of the ministers of Christ implicitly declared, namely, to be pillars; not seeming to be so, but really so: As pillars, they are to uphold the truth, by their doctrine and diligence; as pillars, to be constant in defending the truth against all the blasts and storms of error and false doctrine; as pillars to adorn the truth, by an innocent life and instructive example, whereby they ought not only to shine before others, but also to outshine others. When James, Cephas, and John seemed to be pillars: These three apostles under Christ, were great supporters of the church of Christ, by their diligence and faithfulness; yet observe, St. James is here named before St. Peter; which shews the weakness of the Papist's argument for Peter's primacy, because sometimes first named: But it is evident he is not always so; St. James is here mentioned before him, because, say some, bishop of Jerusalem, and the Lord's brother, or near kinsman; but certain it is, that St. Paul paid not here any deference to Peter, upon the account of his primacy or supremacy, which is now so much contended for, but was not then thought of, because it was the apostles great drift and design to shew that he was in every respect equal with Peter, and the rest of the apostles, and in no respect inferior to any of them; and consequently, that neither in his mission nor his message, neither in his office nor his doctrine, neither in his external authority, nor his internal gifts and graces, did he come behind the chiefest apostles, as the false apostles had misrepresented him. Note farther, St. Peter's integrity with James's and John's, in this matter, they being all very well satisfied, by convincing evidence, that almighty God had certainly called Paul to be an apostle no less than themselves; they own and acknowledge him for such, no doubt, to the grief, as well as to the shame of the false apostles, who had vilified his person, lessened his authority, and disparaged his doctrine; When James, Cephas, and John perceived the grace that was given unto me; that is, the grace of apostleship, they, in the name of all the apostles, and the whole church, gave unto me, and Barnabas my fellow-labourer, the right hand of fellowship; that is, they owned us to be pillars as much as themselves; and it was agreed and concluded upon that we should continue to preach chiefly to the Gentiles, and they to the Jews: So far were the apostles at Jerusalem from condemning St. Paul's doctrine, or undervaluing his calling, which was the thing that the false apostles were so desirous of, and hoped for. Note lastly, That as an evidence of the happy agreement of Peter, James, and John, with Paul and Barnabas, and of their owning them as apostles and ministers of Jesus Christ, they recommended to St. Paul's charitable consideration, the poverty of the Jewish converts to Christianity, desiring him to make collections in the Gentile churches for the Christian Jews. Here observe, 1. That the Jews were generally poorer than the Gentiles; it is frequently the lot of those who are rich in grace, to be poor in goods, and to be reduced to such straits, as to be forced to live upon some charitable supplies from others. 2. That although those who are our own poor, and live within our bounds, near us, and about us, are chiefly to be relieved by us; yet in cases of extreme necessity, such poor as live remote from us, whose faces were never seen by us, ought to be sharers in our charity. 3. That the care of God's poor, and the supplying of the outward necessities of his saints, is an employment not unworthy the highest apostle, much less unbecoming the ordinary ministers of Christ; They would that we should remember the poor. 4. That the faithful ministers of Christ ought, upon just and fit occasions, to excite and stir up their people to duties of charity, as well as piety; to costly and expensive, duties, as well as those that are easy and less burdensome; these being no less profitable to the church, and much more evidential of a real work of grace upon the heart.

11 But when Peter was come to Antioch, I withstood him to the face, because he was to be blamed.

Observe here, St. Peter's offence, and St. Paul's rebuke. St. Peter's offence, 1. was this, He declined from the doctrine taught by himself, concerning the abrogation of circumcision and the ceremonial law; he had formerly conversed freely with the Christian Gentiles without scruple, making no objection against them, because they were not circumcised: But at Antioch he withdrew from the Gentiles, refusing to eat with them, because they were not circumcised; as if, for want of circumcision, they had been unclean, and altogether unfit to be conversed with. This was his fault; whereby it appears, that St. Peter himself was not infallible, whatever his pretended successors, the Bishops of Rome, are supposed to be. Learn hence, How certainly and suddenly the holiest and best of men will run into sin and error, if a special assistance from the holy Spirit doth not uphold them, and preserve them. Observe, 2. As St. Peter's offence, so St. Paul's rebuke; he withstood him to the face; that is, rebuked him publicly, because he was blame-worthy, and not secretly behind his back; such as sin openly, must be rebuked and reprov'd openly. Here note, How little St. Paul dreamed of St. Peter's supremacy; if so, he had been more modest than thus to reprove him to his face. Learn hence, That as no bands of friendship must keep the ministers of God from reprov'ing sin and vice; so, when they find the fault to be notorious, they must reprove it wherever they find it, waiting much boldness and resolution. St. Paul here, in reprov'ing St. Peter, withstood him: It is in the original a military word, signifying to stand against, either by force of arms, as among soldiers; or by dint of argument, as among disputants: It is a word of defiance, and signifies an opposition hand to hand, face to face, foot to foot, not yielding an hair's breadth to the adversary. Yet withal, as St. Paul's courage, so his candour appeared, in reprov'ing St. Peter, to his face, and not reproaching him, as some, behind his back. And behold this great and chief apostle St. Peter, submits to his reprover, neither justifying his action, nor reflecting upon St. Paul; he replieth not again.

12 For before that certain came from James, he did eat with the Gentiles; but when they were come, he withdrew, and separated himself, fearing them which were of the circumcision. 13 And the other Jews dissembled likewise with him; insomuch that Barnabas also was carried away with their dissimulation. 14 ¶ But when I saw that they walked not uprightly according to the truth of the gospel, I said unto Peter before them all, If thou, being a Jew, livest after the manner of the Gentiles, and not as do the Jews, why compellest thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews?

A farther account is given us in these verses, of St. Peter's offence at Antioch, in giving occasion of scandal to the Gentiles, by refusing to converse and eat with them, although he had before, in a vision, received a divine command so to do. St. Paul calls it fear, ver. 12. dissimulation, ver. 13. and not walking uprightly, ver. 14. He refused to converse with the believing Gentiles, being uncircumcised, for fear of offending the believing Jews, who were so tenacious of circumcision, and the ceremonial law. Learn hence, What weakness and inconstancy is found with the best of men; especially when fear gets a prevailing power over them. St. Peter was the minister of the circumcision, in great honour and esteem with the believing Jews, but fearing the loss of his reputation among them, he falls into sin against God. Observe, 2. The fatal influence of that his sin; it drew others into a partnership with him therein; Barnabas himself was led away with the dissimulation, and the other Jews dissembled with him. Learn hence, That such as are eminent in the church, had need be exactly careful how they walk; for if they fall, they fall not alone, many do fall with them. Observe, 3. With what openness and freedom, with what courage and resolution, St. Paul checks and reprov'es Peter, for his cowardness and timorousness.

timorousness, in refusing to converse with the believing Gentiles, for fear of gaining the displeasure of the circumcised Jews: I said unto Peter before them all, If thou, being a Jew, livest, in thy ordinary conversation, after the manner of the Gentiles, why compellest thou the Gentiles, by thy example, to live as do the Jews. Where note, What a constraining power there is in the example of eminent persons. He is said to compel in scripture, not only who doth violently force, but who, being of authority, doth provoke by his example. The errors of those that do rule, become rulers of error. Men sin through a kind of authority, through the sins of those who are in authority.

15 We who are Jews by nature, and not sinners of the Gentiles. 16 Knowing that a man is not justified by the works of the law, but by the faith of Jesus Christ, even we have believed in Jesus Christ, that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law: for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified.

St. Paul having fully vindicated his own authority as an apostle, from the imputations of the false apostles, he comes next to vindicate his doctrine, namely, the evangelical doctrine of justification by faith in Christ, which he had formerly preached to the Galatians, and which, in his absence, the false apostles had endeavoured to subvert and overthrow, urging the strict observation of the ceremonial law, as necessary to justification and salvation. Our apostle, therefore, to strike at the root of this dangerous error, excludes all works of our own from having any influence upon our justification. Now this he proveth, (1.) Because they that were Jews by birth, and so federally the holy people of God, found it necessary to renounce the works of the law in point of justification, and to seek righteousness only through faith in Christ, as well as the profane idolatrous sinners, or the Gentiles, who were strangers to the covenant of God: For by the works of the law shall no flesh neither Jew nor Gentile, be justified; that is, acquitted from the guilt of sin, and discharged from obnoxiousness to the wrath of God. Now, no obedience of ours can obtain this, because of the great imperfection which cleaves to it, and because God will have all boasting excluded; Eph. ii. 8. By grace ye are saved, through faith; not of works lest any man should boast; but that he that glorieth, should glory in the Lord. Note here, That the doctrine of justification by faith, and not by works, was early, very early opposed by Satan and false teachers. It being articulus fidei et eadem ecclesie, a fundamental article of our Christian faith, our comfort stands or falls with it; no wonder then it is strenuously opposed.

17 But if, while we seek to be justified by Christ, we ourselves also are found sinners, is therefore Christ the minister of sin? God forbid. 18 For if I build again the things which I destroyed, I make myself a transgressor.

These words are generally looked upon as an objection, which the adversaries of the doctrine of justification by faith, have been always ready to make against it, namely,

“That if persons be not justified by their obedience to the law, then they may live as they list in the breach and violation of the law, and freely indulge themselves in sin, and consequently make Christ the minister of sin, as if he had relaxed the duty.” The apostle rejects this inference and deduction with the greatest abhorrence and detestation, saying, God forbid. Hence note, That it is no new prejudice, though a very unjust one, against the doctrine of justification by faith alone, and not by works, that it opens a door to licentiousness, and makes Christ the minister of sin. Note farther, A second objection here suggested. Some might pretend that he built up by his practice, what he had destroyed: No, says the apostle, I have, together with the doctrine of free justification preached to you, pressed upon you, the duty of mortification, as of indispensable necessity to be practised by you; should therefore my preaching or my practice be otherwise then it has been, I should build again what I have destroyed, and destroy what I have already builded; and thus by encouraging sin, and discouraging holiness and obedience, I should be a transgressor against the law of righteousness. Learn hence, That the doctrine of justification by faith alone, cannot be rightly preached, except the duty of mortification of sin be urged and enforced with it; for the same faith that depends upon Christ for pardon of sin, doth look upon him for power and strength to vanquish and subdue sin: If we do not the latter, Christ will never do the former.

19 For I through the law am dead to the law, that I might live unto God.

Here the apostle shews, that believers are so far from being justified by the law, that they are dead to the law, so as to put no confidence in their obedience to it for justification; particularly, (1.) They are dead to the law; that is, they are delivered from the rigorous exactions of the law. Perfect, personal and perpetual obedience, is the duty which the law exacts at the believer's hand, and he has performed it, though not in himself, yet in the person of Christ his Surety, who yielded absolute and complete obedience to the law, as it could require or demand. (2.) The law is dead to believers, and they to that, in regard to the condemnatory curse and sentence of the law; Christ hath redeemed them from the curse of the law; being made a curse for them, Gal. iii. 13. True, the believers violation of the royal and righteous law of God, in the smallest measure and degree, doth, in its own nature, deserve the curse and condemnatory sentence; but Christ has discharged him from obnoxiousness to the curse, by being made a curse. (3.) The law is dead to believers, as to its authority, to justify and save them. This is that the law cannot do; being made weak through the flesh; though properly speaking, the law is not weak to us, but we are weak to that; the law has not lost its authority to command, but we our ability to obey; it is as impossible for a fallen sinner to keep the law of God perfectly, as it is for a lame cripple to run a race swiftly. Yet, (4.) Believers are not dead, but alive to the law, as a rule of life and holy living: the law binds the believer (in Christ's hand) as strictly to endeavour obedience to it, as it did bind Adam in innocency: But here is the believers privilege, that God the Father, upon the score of the covenant of grace, which the blood of Christ has ratified and confirmed doth graciously except the faithful endeavours of his children, instead of perfect performances; which obedience the law-covenant did rigorously exact and require. Thus may every believer say with the apostle, I through the law, am dead unto the law, that I might live unto God, namely, a life of righteousness and true holiness.

20 ¶ I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me: and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me.

Several things are here observable, viz. St. Paul's spiritual death declared, and his spiritual life described, together with the author and instrument of it. Observe, 1. St. Paul's spiritual death, I am crucified with Christ; that is, with Christ I am dead to the law (in the manner mentioned in the foregoing verse) dead to sin, and dead to the world. Learn hence, That all true believers are crucified with Christ Jesus; or that all justified persons have fellowship with Christ in his death: They have fellowship with him, (1.) In the merit and value of his death; they are ransomed by it, as a price paid down to the justice of God for them. (2.) In the virtue and efficacy of his death; which doth not only merit pardon for us but mortifies sin in us; Our old man is crucified; that is, the power of sin is subdued in us. (3.) A justified person hath fellowship with Christ, in the likeness and similitude of his death, and that is a crucifixion: As Christ died a painful, shameful, lingering, and accursed death for him, so doth sin die painfully, shamefully and gradually in him: They that are Christ's, have crucified the flesh with its affections and lusts. Gal. v. 24. Observe 2 St. Paul's spiritual life described, I live, yet not I, but Christ in me. Learn hence, That a crucified Christian is a living Christian: I am crucified, nevertheless I live; a life of justification and sanctification at present, in hope of, and as an earnest for, a life of glorification to come. Yet, observe, 3. How the apostle corrects, or rather explains himself, after what kind, and in what manner he lives; he denies himself to be the author and root of his own life; and declares Christ to be both. I live, yet not I, but Christ in me. Christ is both the author and efficient cause, of the exemplary cause, the end or final cause of the Christian's life; a living Christian lives not himself, but Christ lives in him. 4. As the author of the Christian's spiritual life, Christ; so the instrument of it, and that is faith: The life which I live in the flesh, that is, the spiritual life which I live as a Christian here in the world, I live by faith in the Son of God; my life of justification, is by faith in his blood; my life of sanctification and consolation, is through faith, in and by influences derived from his holy Spirit. 5. How the apostle appropriates to himself in particular, what Christ had done for all believers in general: He loved me, and gave himself for me. Where note, Though a firm persuasion, and full assurance of Christ's special love to ourselves, and his dying for us in particular, is not of the essence and being of justifying and saving faith, yet it is attainable without an extraordinary revelation; and, as such, every sincere Christian ought to aim at it, to labour and endeavour after it.

21 I do not frustrate the grace of God: for if righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain.

The apostle concludes the chapter with a double argument, to prove the Christian's justification by faith, without the works of the law. (1.) Were it otherwise we should frustrate and make void the grace of God: For if justification be by works, it can no more be by grace; according to the apostle, Rom. xi. 6. (2.) Christ's death had been in vain, without any necessary cause or reason at all, if the justification of a sinner could have been obtained by his own works. Where note, That as well works done after faith and conversion, as those done before it, are excluded from being the meritorious cause of our justification, either in whole or in part; because the joining of works with faith, in the matter of our justification, is a total excluding of God's free grace, and a loud proclaiming, that Christ died in vain.

CHAP. III.

In this and the following chapters of this epistle, our apostle expostulates with the Galatians, who were seduced by the false apostles to relinquish the liberty they were called to by the gospel, and to put their necks under the Judaical yoke again.

○ Foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you, that ye should not obey the truth, before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth, crucified among you?

Note here, 1. The object of the apostle's sharp reprehension, the churches of Galatia. 2. The ground of their reprehension, their defection from the truth into a very great error, namely, their holding of circumcision, and the observation of the ceremonial law, as necessary to salvation; which was a making of the cross of Christ of no effect, and a virtual denial of his being come in the flesh. From hence we learn, That the best and purest of particular churches may err, and have erred fundamentally and dangerously: For what consists such a church of, but persons all fallible? Head and members, being all sinful, are as unable to secure themselves from error, as from vice. Indeed the church of Rome talks big, and boasts of a false gift, that of infallibility; but could never yet agree where it is lodged, whether in the Pope, or in a general council; however, they are sure they have it. Well, if so, the more wicked and wretchedly inexcusable are they, in not improving their talent of infallibility for the best service of the Christian church, namely, by writing one infallible comment upon the whole bible. What a serviceable performance would it have been in them, to pin the Pope in his chair, and hold down his hands to write, as Aaron and Hur held up Moses's hands to pray, till all the Amalekite errors and heresies, so much complained of, were routed and ruined! Wo unto them that let such an excellent gift lie idle idle amongst them, and unemployed by them. 3. The high and heinous aggravation of this fault in the Galatians, before whose eyes Jesus Christ had been evidently set forth, crucified among them; that is, Christ, and their freedom by him from the bondage of the ceremonial law, had been preached to them; and his death and sufferings, with the great end and design of them, as plainly laid before them, as if Christ himself had been crucified in the midst of them. Lastly, The brand of infamy which our apostle sets upon the Judaizing doctors, heretical and false teachers; he calls them spiritual forcerers, and their doctrines spiritual witchcraft: O foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you? Because, (1.) As forcerers, by deluding the senses, make persons apprehend they see what they see not; so heretics, by casting a mist of seeming reason before the understanding, do delude it, and make the deluded person believe that to be truth, which indeed is not. (2.) As forcerers, in what they do, are assisted beyond the reach of their own ability and skill, by the help of Satan; so heretical spirits are often by Satan's concurrence with them, more than ordinarily assisted by him, in drawing multitudes after them: O foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you? The original word seems borrowed from the practice of witches and forcerers, who being assisted by the devil, used to cast mists before the eyes of the people, to dazzle and delude them.

2 This only would I learn of you, Received ye the Spirit by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?

Our apostle having prepared the Galatians attention, by a very smart and sharp reprehension in the foregoing verse, returns to the subject of justification by faith, without the works of the law, which he had entered upon in the former chapter, and prosecutes at large in this; and he uses five arguments to prove that we are justified by faith, and not by works: The first is contained in the verse before us, Received ye the Spirit by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith? As if the apostle had said, "I appeal to your own experience; you have received the spirit yourselves, some of you for sanctification, others for miraculous operations; now I would know by what means you received it? Was it by hearing the law of Moses preached? You cannot say it; for you were heathens, and without the written law; it must then be by hearing of the gospel, the doctrine of faith, which I preached to you." Here we have a truth expressed, and a truth implied. The truth expressed is this, That the hearing of the gospel faithfully preached, is the instrumental mean by which persons receive the Holy Spirit in the sanctifying gifts and graces of it, to enable them to live an holy and spiritual life: Received ye not the Spirit by the hearing of faith? Yes, he did. The truth implied is this, That a people should take great heed, that they never undervalue, much less despise and vilify that ministry, or that doctrine, which God at first blessed for their conversion. How many are there in England at this day, who disown that church, despite that ministry which God blessed to their conversion, if ever they were converted? Sad it is, yet very certain, that like vipers they gnaw out the bowels of her who suckled them at her breast.

3 Are ye so foolish? having begun in the Spirit, are ye now made perfect by the flesh?

Observe here, The apostle calls the doctrine of the gospel, Spirit; because by hearing the gospel preached, they had received both the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit. The law, with all its rites and ceremonies, he calls flesh; because they were now weak, and being but temporary institutions, were abolished by the coming of Christ and the gospel. Note next, How the apostle endeavours to convince the Galatians of the folly and absurdity of hoping to perfect that in the flesh, which they had begun in the Spirit: Are ye so foolish? As if he had said, "That having at your entrance into Christianity begun an holy life, by and according to the Holy Spirit conferred upon you, that now you should think to be made more perfect by the flesh, by the external commandments and observances of the law; how unreasonable is it to suppose that your justification should be begun by a more noble, and perfected by a less noble cause?"

4 Have ye suffered so many things in vain? if it be yet in vain.

As if the apostle had said, "To what purpose have you suffered so many persecutions from the Jews, for the cause of Christianity? All which sufferings will be in vain, if, after all, you bring yourselves under the bondage of the Jewish yoke; for these might have been escaped, had you owned the necessity of circumcision, and other legal observances: But I hope you will recollect yourselves, and persevere in your first profession, without which all your former labours, your past and present sufferings, will avail you nothing." Intimating that all good actions we have done, and the hard things which we have suffered, will be altogether in vain to us, if we do not persevere in well-doing, and patient suffering unto the end: Have ye suffered so many things in vain? if it be yet in vain. Note here, 1. That it has been from the beginning the lot and portion of such as profess Christianity, to suffer many things in the defence of it. 2. That it is very possible for some of those who have made an early and long profession of Christianity, yea, and suffered hard things for it, after all, to make a foul defection and apostasy from it. 3. That all such sufferings have been, are, and will be in vain, and turn to no joyful account, if the persons suffering do afterward apostatize from, and turn their backs upon the truths of God, formerly embraced and maintained by them.

5 He therefore that ministereth to you the Spirit, and worketh miracles among you, doeth he it by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?

Note here, 1. That God did accompany the first preaching and planting of the gospel with the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit, with a power to work miracles, to heal diseases, and to speak with tongues, which were so many attestations and confirmations that the doctrine of the gospel was from God; for here St. Paul appeals to the Galatians, as men that had the Spirit and miracles amongst them, He that ministereth to you the Spirit, and worketh miracles; implying, that Almighty God had given to them his Holy Spirit.

Spirit, both in the sanctifying graces, and miraculous gifts of it. 2. That the Spirit thus communicated in the first and early days of Christianity, was not given to the Galatians, or any other Gentiles, by the preaching of the law, but by the ministry and dispensation of the gospel, which is here called the hearing of faith: He that ministereth to you the Spirit, doth he it by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith? Learn hence, That although the gifts and graces of God's holy Spirit are conveyed to the hearers of the gospel by the ministry of the word, yet God is the author, the minister and dispenser of them, and the gospel only the instrument and mean of their conveyance: He ministereth to you the Spirit.

6 ¶ Even as Abraham believed God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness. 7 Know ye therefore that they which are of faith, the same are the children of Abraham.

Here our apostle proceeds to a second argument, to prove that persons are justified by faith, and not by works; and that is drawn from the example of Abraham: And the argument lies thus, "As Abraham, the father of the faithful, was justified; so must all believers, the children of faithful Abraham, be justified also. But though Abraham did abound in many virtues and good works, yet he was not justified by these, but by faith only; therefore by faith must all his children be justified also. Abraham believed God; that is, assented to, and relied upon the promise of God made unto him, That in him, that is, in the Messiah, who was to descend from him, should all the nations of the earth be blessed; and this faith of his was accounted, imputed and reckoned to him for righteousness; that is, was accepted of God for his justification." From whence the apostle doth infer, or draw this conclusion, that such as seek justification by faith, as Abraham did, are the children of Abraham, as the Gentiles were; that is, the children of his faith; a far greater privilege than what the Jews gloried in, namely, that they were the children of his flesh. Learn hence, That as the pious Jews under the Old Testament, so are Christians now under the New Testament, justified alike. Were they justified freely? So are we. Are we justified fully? So are they. Was a righteousness necessary for them to be clothed with, in order to their acceptance with God? The same is necessary for us also. Was faith imputed by God to them for righteousness? So shall it be to us also.

8 And the scriptures foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed. 9 ¶ So then they which be of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham.

Observe here, That because the former consequence from Abraham's justification to ours, might be questioned whether it holds in the Gentiles, who were not of Abraham's posterity; therefore the apostle declares, that the greatest promise made to him, was, That in him, that is, in the Messiah Christ Jesus, who was to come of him, all nations, Gentiles as well as Jews, should be blessed: God having determined, that all believers indistinctly, of what nation or kindred soever, should be all justified one and the same way, namely, by faith in Christ, without the works of the law. So that all that are of faith, or true believers, whether Gentiles or Jews, do partake of all those benefits and blessings which believing Abraham did partake of, amongst which justification by faith is the chief. Learn hence, 1. That the gospel is no new doctrine, but the same for substance, though not for clearness, with that which was preached to Abraham and to the church under the Old Testament: The scripture preached before the gospel unto Abraham. 2. That the blessing of justification by faith, and other spiritual favours promised to the nations in Abraham, was such as Abraham himself was a sharer in, and partaker of; they were blessed with faithful Abraham.

10 For as many as are of the works of the law, are under the curse. For it is written, Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them.

Here is a third argument produced in this chapter, to prove that we are justified by faith, and not by works; because they who seek to be justified by the works of the law, are under the curse; and if so, cannot be justified. The argument runs thus, "Our observance of the law, when at the best, is but imperfect: Now every performance lays us under the curse, therefore no performance of ours can justify us. They that cannot fulfil the law, can never be justified by the law: But no fallen man can perfectly fulfil the law, therefore none can be justified by the law." This is the force of the argument, which the apostle proves by a quotation out of Deut. xxvii. 26. Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things, &c. Where note, 1. The duty which the law enacts, namely, perfect, personal, and perpetual obedience. 2. The penalty which the law inflicts, and that is, the curse: Cursed is every one, &c. Learn hence, That sin and the curse are inseparable; wherever sin is, the curse will be, be it upon a person by imputation, or by actual commission; wherever sin lies, it lays us under the curse; for sin is an infinite evil, objectively considered; it is a contempt of infinite authority, a contrariety to infinite holiness, a provocation of infinite justice, and an abuse of infinite mercy; and consequently, the desert of sin is death and the curse.

11 But that no man is justified by the law in the sight of God, it is evident: for, The just shall live by faith. 12 And the law is not of faith: but, The man that doeth them shall live in them.

A fourth argument is here produced to prove, that not sinner can be justified before God, by the works of the law, although before men he may. The argument is this, taken from Hab. ii. 4. The just shall live by faith; that is, live his spiritual life by faith, his life of justification and sanctification also; the life of his righteousness before God, of his holiness before men, and his life of glory with God in heaven, are all by faith. He adds, ver. 12. The law is not of faith; that is, the law says nothing of faith in a Mediator, or promises life to any person, save only to him who by a sinless obedience performs exactly what it prescribes: but the voice of the law is, Do, or die. Learn hence, That the law and faith, that is, the law and the gospel, are not contrary to each other, but are mutually subservient one to another in many things; as thus, when the law makes known sin, the gospel holds forth the remedy for sin; the law discovers our need of Christ, the gospel makes an offer and gracious tender of Jesus Christ; the law makes known to us our entire duty, the gospel furnishes us with strength and ability to perform that duty. 2. That though the law and faith, that is, the gospel, which is the doctrine of faith, be not contrary to each other, yet in point of justification they are mutually inconsistent with one another: So that if justification be by the works of the law, it cannot be had by faith; if it be had by faith, it cannot be attained by the works of the law. There can be no mixture of law and gospel, of faith and works, in this matter.

13 Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us: for it is written, Curfed is every one that hangeth on a tree.

This is the apostle's fifth and last argument, to prove that we are justified by faith; and that notwithstanding the threats of the law, a believer is freed from the curse and malediction of the law, by Christ's bearing the curse for him. Christ hath redeemed us, &c. Where note, 1. The believer's happy discharge from the most dismal and dreadful thing imaginable; namely, the condemnatory sentence and curse of the law, whereby a sinner is bound over to death, even to death of soul and body. 2. The person that doth, and only can deliver the sinner from this condemnatory curse and sentence, and that is Jesus Christ. He discharges the believer from his obnoxiousness to wrath, dissolves his obligation to punishment, looses all bands and chains of guilt; so that the curse of the law has nothing, and shall have nothing to do with him for ever. 3. The way and manner in and by which Jesus Christ effected all this for us; namely, by his being made a curse for us; not that Christ was made the very curse itself, or changed into a curse, but he took the curse upon himself; our sin became his, by voluntary susception of the punishment; and Christ underwent that death, the death of the cross, which by the law was accused, to free us from the curse of the law; as Christ was made sin for us, so was he made a curse for us. Now as he was made sin, not by contracting the guilt of sin, but by suffering the punishment of sin; so he was made a curse, by undergoing that death which the law styles accused.

14 That the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ; that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith.

Observe here, One special fruit of Christ's sufferings, and being made a curse for us; namely, that the curse being abolished, the blessing of Abraham, that is, the blessing of justification, reconciliation, and adoption, promised to Abraham upon his believing, might come upon all the believing Gentiles, through Christ, the promised seed; and that the Gentiles might receive the promises made by Christ, of the holy Spirit, both in its miraculous gifts and sanctifying graces, through their submission to the faith of Christ, or the doctrine of the gospel. Learn hence, 1. That Christ, by submitting to the curse of the law did not only appease the wrath of God towards us, and deliver us from the curse of the law deserved for us, but purchased all spiritual blessings for us, such as grace here, and glory hereafter. Christ was made a curse, that the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles. O wonderful grace, infinite love, and astonishing goodness of God, in that great work of our redemption, in bringing about one contrary by another! He giveth life by death, and the blessing by the curse; Christ was made a curse, that the blessing might come, &c. 2. That there was a promise of divers blessings made to Abraham; namely, that God would give him a son, a son by Sarah, a son in his old age, and by that son a numerous issue; that that issue should become a mighty nation, and possess all the land of Canaan, wherein he then sojourned; and that he would settle his covenant, that is, his church, in that family and nation; and that in one person descending from his posterity, all nations should be blessed; and that this blessing, introduced by that one person, should abolish the curse brought upon all nations by the first person's sin: That the blessing of Abraham might come upon the Gentiles through Jesus Christ.

15 Brethren, I speak after the manner of men; Though it be but a man's covenant, yet if it be confirmed, no man disannulleth or addeth thereto. 16 Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but, as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ. 17 And this I say, that the covenant which was confirmed before of God in Christ, the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul, that it should make the promise of none effect. 18 For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise: but God gave it to Abraham by promise.

Note here, 1. An argument drawn from contracts among men, to prove the fixedness and stability of the covenant made by God: if one man makes a covenant with another, signs it, seals it, and delivers it before witnesses, it becomes irrevocable and irresistible; much more then must the covenant of grace and mercy made with us by God, be perpetual and immutable, since it is a covenant established by oath; and when God swears, he cannot repent. 2. The apostle proves, That as the covenant of God can never fail, in regard of the wisdom and invariableness of him that made it; so it can never expire for want of parties that have interest in it, and advantage by it, for want of a seed to whom it is made; for as long as Christ hath a church and members upon earth, so long shall the promise be of force; not only to Abraham, but to his seed, were the promises made: not to seeds, as of many; but as of one, and to thy seed, which is Christ; where, by one, we understand one mystically, and in the aggregate; not only personally and individually: And by Christ, the whole church, consisting of head and members, believing Gentiles, as well as Jews. 3. That the apostle having confirmed the truth of his doctrine by arguments in the foregoing part of the chapter, comes now, in the latter part of it, to answer objections which some might be ready to make against his doctrine. The first we have, ver. 17. This I say, that the covenant, &c. The objection lies thus: Some might say, "When two laws are made, whereof the one was expressly contradictory to the other, the latter doth, in common presumption, abrogate and disannul the former: But here we find, that four hundred and thirty years after the promise made to Abraham, there was a law published extremely contrary to that promise, a law without mercy or compulsion, a law both impossible and inexorable, a law which can neither be obeyed nor endured, a law which denounces a terrible and severe curse to the transgressors and breakers of it; therefore, it should seem as if some cause had happened, to make God repent and revoke his former covenant-promise made to Abraham." To obviate this objection, our apostle shews, first, What the purpose of the covenant-promise to Abraham was; namely, to give life and salvation by grace and promise. Secondly, What the purpose of the latter covenant by Moses was not; namely, to give the same life by working, since, in those respects, there would be a contradiction and inconsistency in the covenants, and so by consequence, instability and faithfulness in him that made the one. That, therefore, which the apostle here drives at, is this, That the coming of the law hath not voided the promise, and that the law is not of force towards the seed to whom the promise is made, in any such sense as carries contradiction to, or implies abrogation of, the promise before made; from whence it follows, if it be not to stand in contradiction to, it must stand in subordination to the gospel, and so stand to evangelical purposes. Learn hence, 1. That although God might have dealt with mankind as an absolute Lord and Sovereign, yet he doth not govern them barely by law, but by a covenant, which has promises and threatenings annexed. 2. That after the covenant of works, made with man before the fall, was broken by Adam, God was pleased to enter into a covenant of grace with fallen man, to deliver him out of an estate of sin and misery, and to bring him into a state of salvation by a redeemer. 3. That though the former and latter covenant did differ in some considerable circumstances, yet they are one and the same in substance, and do fully agree in all the essential parts of both. 4. That God's intent in giving the law, and urging exact obedience to it, under the penalty of the curse, was not to take us off from seeking righteousness and life only by the promise, but to encourage us to seek it; for, says the apostle here, The law could not disannul the covenant made with Abraham, &c.

19 Wherefore then serveth the law? It was added because of transgressions, till the seed should come to whom the promise was made, and it was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator. 20 Now a mediator is not a mediator of one: but God is one.

Here an objection is moved: Some might be ready to say, "If the law, that is, works done in obedience to the law, do not justify, then the law given by Moses upon mount Sinai, is in vain, and to no purpose; for why was the law given, enjoining so many duties, promising life to the obedient, and threatening wrath and a curse to the disobedient; if the inheritance come not by the law?" The apostle answers, That one great end for which the law was given, was to discover sin, and a sinner's undone condition by reason of sin, and to lead him to seek out for a remedy. The law was added because of transgressions; that is, to make transgression appear, to discover the pollutions of men's hearts and natures, and to make them sensible of the condemnation they are under. The law was added because of transgressions, till the seed should come; that is, Christ and his church. Where note, That the legal dispensations were not to continue always in the church, but only till the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ; at whose death the partition-wall was broken down, and the Gentiles called into the fellowship of the church, as well as the Jews. Note farther, The glorious and amazing manner, in which the law was given upon mount Sinai, in thunder and lightning, by the ministry of angels, in such a terrible manner, that there was no access for sinful men to God, but by Moses, a mediator, standing betwixt God and them; who in that action was a type of our Lord Jesus Christ, the only Mediator between God and us. As Moses was a typical, national, and representative Mediator, standing between the Lord and that people of the Jews, so Christ was a substantial and universal Mediator between God and mankind. Where note, That the law was published in mercy and pacification, not in fury and revenge; for had the Lord intended death in the publishing of the law, he would not have proclaimed it in the hand of a Mediator, but of an executioner. He adds, That a Mediator is not a Mediator of one, that is, of one party, but of disagreeable parties. God and man were once friends: They were one, and needed no Mediator: But God and man, by sin, fell at variance, and now need a Mediator. The very notion of a Mediator doth suppose, that men, by sin, are at odds with God, and that God, by grace, is willing to be one with man. However though a Mediator is not a Mediator of one, yet God is one; that is, though there be two covenants, and two mediators, yet God is one and the same in both covenants; he carries on one and the same purpose and intention, both in the law, and in the gospel; namely, a benevolence and good-will towards, and an hearty desire and reconciliation with mankind.

21 Is the law then against the promises of God? God forbid: For if there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law. 22 But the scripture hath concluded all under sin; that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe.

Another objection is here made by the apostle: The Jews might possibly say, "That the law given by Moses, was against the promise of God made to Abraham." The apostle answers, No; that the law is not contrary, but subservient to, the promise: For the law was not given on mount Sinai, to afford life and justification by obedience to it (seeing it could not by a fallen creature be ever perfectly kept) but to convince of sin, and to condemn for sin; and that men, despairing of salvation in and of themselves, might betake themselves to Christ for it: For God in the scripture, hath concluded, that is, declared all men to be under sin, and under the curse due to sin; that renouncing all confidence in themselves, they should, by faith, have recourse to the only Mediator for righteousness and life, for justification and salvation. Learn hence, That God, in the publication of the law by Moses on mount Sinai, had none but merciful and evangelical intentions. 2. That the publication of the law by Moses, was not against the promise of God made to Abraham, but they had both the same merciful design and gracious intention. To explain the matter by a similitude or illustration, thus: "Suppose a prince should proclaim a pardon to all traitors, if they would come in and plead it, and after this, should send forth an officer to attack and arraign them, to threaten and condemn them: Is the prince contrary to himself? Hath he repented of his mercy? No, sure! but he is unwilling to lose the glory of his mercy, and most desirous to have the honour of it acknowledged; and therefore he brings these criminals into extremities, that when their guilt is made evident, they may acknowledge the justice of the law that would condemn them, and the great mercy of the prince in offering a pardon to them." The case is alike between God and us; first to Abraham, and in him to us: God made a promise of mercy and blessedness, even to all that would plead an interest in it, for remission of sins, and acceptance with God: But the world grew secure; and though sin was in them, and death reigned over them, they regarded not their miserable condition; being without a law to evidence sin and death unto their consciences, they saw no necessity of pleading the promise of pardon. Hence upon God publishes by Moses, a severe and terrible law, a law which filled the air with thunder, and the mount with fire, insomuch, that Moses, the Mediator, did exceedingly fear and quake; in all this, God did but pursue his first purpose of mercy, and take a course to make his gospel accounted worthy of all acceptation, that men being by this law rouzed from their security, and made sensible of the curse and malediction they lie under, might run from Sinai unto Sion, from Moses to Christ, and by faith plead that pardon and remission which in Christ was promised; when God told Abraham, that in his seed should all the families of the earth be blessed.

23 But before faith came, we were kept under the law, shut up unto the faith which should afterwards be revealed. 24 Wherefore the law was our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ, that we might be justified by faith. 25 But after that faith is come, we are no longer under a schoolmaster.

Before faith came, that is, before Christ came, and the doctrine of faith was preached, we were in bondage under the law; the ceremonial law was a very great bondage; their frequent going up to Jerusalem at their festival, was burdensome; their ceremonies were many, inconvenient and chargeable; their laws for uncleanness and purifications, rendered them unconvertible, at all times, with other people, and sometimes unconvertible one with another;

yet was the law very useful to the Jews that so they might be prepared by it to receive the doctrine of Christ, and salvation by faith in him. Hence it is that he calleth the law their schoolmaster to bring them unto Christ; the schoolmaster exercises authority over minors only, not over grown persons; he teaches only rudiments and first principles for beginners, not such things as require mature judgment and perfect age. Such was the law in comparison of the gospel, and Moses with respect to Christ. Moses and the law is a rigid and severe schoolmaster, who, by whips and threats, requires a hard lesson of their scholars, whether able to learn it or not: But Christ and the gospel is a mild and gentle teacher, who, by sweet promises and good rewards, invite their scholars to their duty, and guide and help them to do what of themselves they cannot do; by which means, they love both their master and their lesson, and rejoice when it is nearest to them, to direct them in their studies. As the law is our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ, so Christ is our great prophet that leads us to God. Note, farther, That though the law was a good schoolmaster to the Jews in their infancy and minority; yet it has no authority over Christians now grown up to maturity. The gospel-church, that is, both believing Jews and Gentiles, being like a son come to age, believing in Christ already come, are no longer to be treated as children under the discipline of the law as a schoolmaster; for they are now under the evangelical, not Mosaiical dispensation of the covenant of grace. After that faith is come; that is, Christ, the object of faith manifested, and the gospel, the doctrine of faith, revealed, we are no longer under a schoolmaster.

24 For ye are the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus.

Observe here, 1. A glorious gospel privilege discovered, namely, adoption; Ye are the children of God. The church of God, under the New Testament, is in a special state of sonship and adoption, to whom the privileges and immunities of sons and heirs grown up to maturity do belong. 2. The universality of this privilege, Ye are all children of God; that is, all, both Jews and Gentiles, all, both weak and strong believers; substantial relations do not recipere majus et minus; he that is a father in reality, cannot be more a father to one child than to another; the young one in the cradle may call the parent father, as well as he that is grown to man's estate: Ye are all the children of God. 3. The instrumental cause of this blessed privilege, Faith in Christ Jesus; Christ invests every believer, weak as well as strong, in the glorious privileges of adoption; faith in Christ to come, did initle believers under the Old Testament, to the dignity of sons and daughters; and faith in Christ now already come, doth add some peculiar dignity of sonship to believers under the New Testament: They with us, and we with them, are all the children of God, through faith in Christ Jesus; Christ of a Son became a servant, that we of slaves might become sons.

27 For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ.

What the apostle had asserted in the foregoing verse, he 5 D. proves proves in this; namely, that all believers are the children of God, through faith in Christ Jesus, because they are baptized into Christ and have put on Christ; that is, they are admitted into the Christian church by baptism, they profess Christ's holy religion; and if they live as they profess, they put on Christ; that is, they are made partakers of his Spirit, and do copy forth the excellencies of his life. To put on Christ, is not as to put on a suit of clothes fitted to the body, but as metal cast into a mould, receiving the figure from it. Happy they, who are not only sacramentally, but really and spiritually baptized into Christ; incorporated into him, and made one body with him by faith; who do not only bear his name, but wear his image.

28 There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus.

As if the apostle had said, "Now since the coming of Christ, there is no difference or discrimination between one nation and another, no regard to any national privilege, either of Jew or Gentile, no distinction of conditions, either bond or free; or of sexes, either male or female; but circumcised or uncircumcised, we are all one as good as another, in respect of outward privileges, or external advantages; but being sincere believers, we are all equally accepted of God in Christ." Learn hence, That no external privilege or prerogative whatever, without faith in Christ, is any whit available to salvation; none are debarred from Christ, nor more nor better accepted with him for any of these things: Both the circumcised and uncircumcised are his, if believing in Christ.

29 And if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise.

That is, "If ye be Christ's servants and subjects, then are ye the true seed of faithful Abraham, and heirs of the blessing, according to the promise made to him and his seed." This our apostle asserts in opposition to the false apostles, who maintained, that there could be none truly reputed Abraham's seed, except they were circumcised, and subjected themselves to the law of Moses, "Yes, says the apostle, if ye be Christ's and by baptism ingrafted into him, you are the true children of Abraham, though ye be not circumcised; yea, you are heirs apparent of the heavenly inheritance given unto Abraham by promise." Learn hence, That all sincere and serious Christians are Abraham's spiritual seed, children of his faith, though not of his flesh; and being the children of his faith, are heirs together with him of the same promises.

C H A P. IV.

NOW I say that the heir, as long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a servant, though he be Lord of all; 2 But is under tutors, and governors, until the time appointed of the father. 3 Even so we, when we were children, were in bondage under the elements of the world;

The apostle, in these words, compares the church of God, under the Old Testament, to an infant or child in its minority and nonage; partly, with respect to their weakness in understanding, and want of the means of knowledge, comparatively to what we enjoy; and partly, with respect to the discipline they were under from their rigid schoolmaster, the ceremonial law. "Now, says the apostle, as a child, though he be heir to, and owner of all his father's inheritance in hope, yet so long as he is a minor, and under age, he differeth nothing from a servant in point of subjection, but is under the management of tutors and directors:" In like manner the church, when in its infant state, under the Old Testament, was kept in bondage and subjection under the rigid administration, and rigorous exactness of the law, and tied to almost a numberless number of ceremonial observances, by which it pleased Almighty God to instruct the former ages of his church. Learn hence, That the Jewish church, in its infant state, was obliged to learn and practise the elements of a religion chiefly consisting in visible and bodily performances of the ceremonial law, which were but rudiments, in respect to that heavenly doctrine concerning spiritual life which the gospel now reveals, and clearly makes known unto us.

4 But when the fulness of the time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, 5 ¶ To redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons.

That is, "When the fulness of time was come, which God the Father had appointed for the finishing of the legal dispensation, and for the abolishing the ceremonial rites, God sent forth from himself the Son of himself, his only begotten Son, made, that is, born of a woman, made under and obedient to the law, subjecting himself both to its precepts and its curse, to redeem them who were under the law, and discharge them from the curse of the malediction of it; that we believers, we the members of the Christian church, might receive the adoption of sons, without any observance of circumcision, or other ceremonial rites." Observe here, 1. That Christ was God's Son, his own Son, the Son of himself, as the original calls him, Rom. viii. 3. his Son, not barely on account of his miraculous conception, or in regard of his sanctification and mission, or in regard of his resurrection and exaltation, or in regard of that endeared affection which the Father bare unto him, but in regard of his essence and nature, as begotten by him; his Son, by eternal and ineffable generation; being for nature co-essential, for dignity co-equal, and for duration co-eternal with the Father. 2. That Christ, God's own son, was sent forth by God the Father: God sent forth his Son. This sending of the Son doth (1.) pre-suppose his pre-existence before his incarnation; for if he had not had a being, he could not have been sent: It supposes also his personality, and that he was a person; not an operation or manifestation only, for that could not be sent; and that he was a person really distinct from the Father; for how else could one send the other? (2.) God's sending of Christ doth imply his ordaining, constituting, and appointing Christ from all eternity to come into the world; also, his fitting and qualifying of him for his incarnation, and his authorizing and commissioning of Christ to take our nature upon him, and in that nature to do and suffer for us, as our pattern, and as our surety.

Observe,

Observe, 3. That Christ, God's own Son, sent forth by God the Father, was made of a woman, did really assume and take upon him our flesh; and was made manifest in our nature: It was not an indigested, unshapen mass, or lump of flesh, that Christ assumed, but that flesh was organized and formed into a perfect body, having the same parts, members, lineaments and proportions which ours have; St. Paul calls it, Colof. i. 22. the body of his flesh; a body, to shew the organizing of it; and a body of flesh, to shew the reality of it. 4. That the season in which Christ was sent forth, was not in the beginning of time, nor at the end of time, but in the fulness of time. He came not in the beginning of time, to excite his people's affections and longing desires for his coming, and to teach them to prize him the more when come. He staid not till the end of time, lest the faith of his church and people should have failed; the patriarchs believed in Christ to come, the apostles believed in Christ then present among them, and we believe in Christ as come, and gone again to heaven. Thus, in all differences of time past, present, and to come, faith had, has, and will have its suitable work, and proper employment. 5. That the great end of God in sending Christ unto us, and the gracious design of Christ in his undertaking for us, was our redemption from the bondage and curse of the law, and our adoption into the number of God's children.

6 And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father.

As if the apostle had said, "That you are now, under the gospel, become and made the sons of God, appeareth by this, that God hath sent the Spirit of his natural Son into your hearts, to authorize and enable you to call upon him, not only as your God, but as your Father: The gospel assuring you, that you are no longer in that servile condition you were in whilst under the law; but God will deal with you now upon gospel terms, and justify you by faith, without the deeds of the law: Now God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts." Observe here, 1. The title given to the holy Spirit; it is called the Spirit of God's Son; that is, the Spirit of Christ, because it is the same Spirit which abode upon him that resteth upon us, and because the Spirit purchased and procured for us by the blood of the Son. Those rivers of living water, by which the effusion of the Spirit is expressed, do flow out of Christ's pierced side; Christ purchased the Spirit for us, before he sent him from heaven to us. 2. The act respecting his person, God hath sent forth. This imports not any change of place, as if he were more distant from the Father when he was thus sent; than he was before; but it denotes his commission for some special work in and upon the creature. 3. The objects which have the benefits of this act; God hath sent the Spirit of his Son into your hearts; that is, into the hearts of believers; signifying that the work here intended is an inward work, and a saving work, Ezek. xxxvi. 27. I will put my Spirit in them; not into the brain, to dwell there by common unsanctified gifts, but into the heart, where all the habits of grace are planted, and from whence all the issues of life proceed. 4. The office which the holy Spirit performs in the believer's heart: First, it cries; Secondly, it cries, Abba, Father: The Spirit cries, by enabling us through his gracious influences and assistances to cry or pray unto God; and it cries, Father, Father: The repetition made, and the word redoubled, denotes the strength and vehemency of the desire, and speaks a passionate and extraordinary concernment of soul, for obtaining the mercy desired, and the blessings prayed for. Learn hence, 1. That there are three sacred persons in the blessed Godhead, the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit; all are held forth to us in this single verse, yea, in this single clause of the verse, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son. 2. That the Spirit is not a quality or operation, but a person that has a real being and substance; else the phrase of being sent could not be properly applied to him. 3. That the Holy Spirit proceeds both from the Father and the Son; for he is the Spirit of the Son, and is sent by the Father: There is an order among the divine persons, though no priority of being. 4. That the spirit of adoption is a spirit of supplication; and this spirit of supplication is the great privilege and advantage of believers under the gospel; for it teaches us what to pray for, and the manner how we are to pray; it joineth with our prayers his own effectual intercessions; it gives us a right and privilege to come unto God as unto a Father, and gives us also confidence and assurance, as sons, to be accepted with him. 5. That the great privilege of adoption is both discovered and improved by the help of the Spirit of Christ: Our privilege of sonship under the gospel excels by far theirs under the law: 1. In point of manifestation and clearness; 2. As fulness and amplitude of enjoyment.

7 Wherefore thou art no more a servant, but a son: and if a son, then an heir of God through Christ.

Note here, 1. That the spirit of the first covenant was a servile spirit, a spirit of fear and bondage, and they that were under that covenant, were rather servants than sons; not but that true believers, in and under the Old Testament, were the sons and daughters of the most high God, and we find them challenging their privilege. Isa. lxxiii. 16. Doubtless thou art our Father: But yet it was in so defective a degree, that they seemed more like to servants than to sons, and were trained up in suitable discipline: Hence, says the apostle here, thou art no more a servant; implying, they were once so. 2: That the Spirit of the new covenant is a free and ingenious spirit, and the gospel state a more filial state than the legal state was: Thou art now no more a servant, but a son: and if sons, then are you heirs of God, and have a right to the inheritance of heaven when you die, and to the blessed privileges, and royal immunities contained in that great charter and covenant of grace whilst you live: If a Son, then an heir of God, through Christ.

8 Howbeit, then when ye knew not God, ye did service unto them which by nature are no gods. 9. But now after that ye have known God, or rather are known of God, how turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements, whercunto ye desire again to be in bondage?

Our apostle having proved sufficiently the believing Christians.

Christians freedom from the yoke of the ceremonial law ; next endeavours to convince the Galatians how absurd and unreasonable it was for them voluntarily to put themselves under the obligation and obedience of it, and to look upon it as necessary to their justification and salvation : Now in the verses before us he tells them, that when they were Gentiles they were the worst of slaves, serving them that were no gods at all ; whereas the Jews served the true God, though in a servile manner : These Galatians being Heathens before conversion, served false gods, and so were in a bondage much worse than that of the Jews. The apostle therefore justly blames them, that they being naturally Gentiles, and never under the ceremonial law, should now desire and choose to enter into that bondage ; which was apparently to go backward in religion, or to return to those principles which they had already overcast. Thence learn, That it is possible for a professing people to advance very far in the way of Christianity, and yet make a foul retreat afterwards in a course of defection and apostacy : After ye have known God, that is acknowledged the living and true God, and been acknowledged by him, how turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements ? Here note, How contemptuously, or at least disesteemingly, our apostle speaks of the legal rites of the ceremonial law : He calls them elements or rudiments, because they were God's first instructions given to his church for his worship, to which he intended afterwards a more perfect way of worship : Next he calls them weak elements, because the law made nothing perfect, and the observance of it was impotent and unavailable to a sinners justification before God : And lastly, he calls them beggarly elements, in comparison of that more rational and spiritual way of worship under the gospel. Whence we may learn, That holy zeal will teach a saint to speak with a sort of contempt of any thing that encroaches upon the honour due to Christ, or any of his offices. True, the Levitical ceremonies were appointed by God himself, as a part of divine worship leading to Christ, and as such to be religiously observed ; but when the false apostles did urge the observation of them under the gospel, as a part of necessary commanded worship, and as a part of the Galatians righteousness before God, St. Paul is bold then to give them the name of weak and beggarly elements.

10 Ye observe days and months, and times, and years. 11 I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labour in vain.

St. Paul here gives instances to the Galatians, wherein it did appear, that they brought themselves under an unnecessary bondage to the rites of the ceremonial law ; he tells them plainly, that they kept the ceremonial sabbaths, feasts and fasts, as if that law was obligatory, and still binding : Ye observe days, that is, the Jewish sabbath days, and new moons ; and months, as the feast of the first month, and of the seventh month ; and times, that is, the times of their solemn festivals for going up to Jerusalem, as the Passover, Pentecost, and feast of tabernacles ; and years as the sabbatical years, and years of jubilee. This, says the apostle, makes me afraid of you, that I have preached the gospel, and the doctrines of free justification by faith, in vain to you ; because you leave the doctrine I taught you, and put your confidence in observing those legal ceremonial rites." Learn hence, 1. That the work of the ministry is a laborious work ; I have bestowed upon you labour, says St. Paul. A minister's life is not a life of ease, but of much toil and pains, a labouring unto faintness and weariness, as the word here used doth import and signify. 2. That the most laborious ministers and lively preachers may sometimes see so little fruit of their labours and endeavours, that they may have just cause to fear that few are savingly converted by their ministry : St. Paul here was afraid, lest he had laboured in vain among the Galatians. 3. That in order to the success of our ministry, we must not content ourselves with a reproof of sin in general, but must descend to particulars, and give instances of those several and distinct sins which our people are guilty of, and ought to fall under our reproof for. Thus the apostle here gives particular instances of the sins formerly reprov'd, in their observing days, and months, and times, and years. Generals, we say, do not affect ; but particular reproofs are more piercing, and more convincing : When we say to the sinner, as Nathan to David, Thou art the man ; this, if any thing, will stick close to the conscience.

12 Brethren, I beseech you, be as I am ; for I am as ye are : ye have not injured me at all.

Observe here, The holy wisdom of our apostle, in tempering his former reproofs with great mildness and gentleness ; I beseech you, brethren. He well knew that these Galatians were alienated in their affections from him ; and fearing lest from his present severity and sharpness towards them, they should apprehend that he was alienated from them also, he thus lovingly bespeaks them, "I pray you be affected towards me as I stand affected towards you : Count me not your enemy, because I tell you the truth ; for I am the same to you that ever I was ; my love is not alienated from you, for any wrong or injury done to me by you : For, alas ! it is yourselves, and not me, that you injure, by bringing yourselves into this bondage to the ceremonial law, to the loss of your Christian liberty : Be as I am ; for I am as ye are ; ye have not injured me at all." Learn from St. Paul's example, That though the ministers of Christ may, and sometimes must, use severity and sharpness in rebukes and reproofs which they give for sin, yet must they temper severity with gentleness ; and insinuations of kindness and affection must be mingled with rebukes ; as looking not so much at what their sin deserveth, as what is most convenient for bringing them to repentance : Brethren, I beseech you, be as I am. 2. That when the ministers of God, from a true zeal for the glory of God, do rebuke sin, and reprove sinners, the people are apt to apprehend that our zeal flows from a private spirit of revenge, as if we had some particular displeasure against their persons, for some personal injury done unto ourselves, all which groundless suspicions it is our duty to labour to wipe off : So doth our apostle here : Ye have not injured me at all, says he.

13 Ye know how through infirmity of the flesh I preached the gospel unto you at the first. 14 And my my temptation which was in my flesh ye despised not, nor rejected; but received me as angel of God, even as Christ Jesus. 15 Where is then the blessedness ye spake of? for I bear you record that if it had been possible, ye would have plucked out your own eyes, and have given them to me.

Note here, 1. A singular instance which St. Paul gives of his sincere affection towards these Galatians, he preached the gospel to them at first, and this both with difficulty and danger, through the infirmity of the flesh; that is, through much bodily weakness and imperfection. The ancients say St. Paul was a little man, and had some deformity or crookedness of body, and imperfection in his utterance, which rendered both his person and his speech contemptible. These bodily infirmities he calls a temptation; intimating, that the afflictions of the body are great temptations to the soul. And besides these bodily infirmities, he encountered also with persecutions in preaching the gospel to them; which were evidences and convincing demonstrations of his fervent love and affectionate regard towards them: Ye know how through infirmity of the flesh, &c. Note, 2. The reciprocal returns of love and affection which the Galatians made to St. Paul, at his first coming among them to preach the gospel; they received him as an angel of God, or as a messenger from God sent unto them, yea, as Jesus Christ, as if Christ himself had been there in person, and preached to them: Nay, so warm were their affections then to St Paul at his first coming among them, that they did not only pull open their purses, but, had it been possible for them, or profitable to him, they could even have plucked out their very eyes for him. But observe, It was at his first coming among them, and preaching to them. Whence we may note, That the first years of a minister's preaching to, and amongst a people, are usually most successful: Then our people's affections are warmest, and perhaps our own too: Our people then hear us without prejudice against us, with great desire and delight; afterwards their affections cool, either through their own inconstancy, or our inadvertency, or by the malice of Satan, or by the mischievous designs and misrepresentations of some of his instruments. Note farther, That the love and reverence which people owe to their ministers, should not be verbal and in profession only, but real and in sincerity; they ought to part with what is dear to them, to promote the work of God in their houses. There was a time when these Galatians could have given all they had to the apostle, money out of their purse, bread from their table, yea, blood out of their veins, and the very eyes out of their head: I bear you record, that you would even have plucked out your own eyes, and have given them to me. Learn, lastly, That it is an high commendation to a people, when neither poverty nor deformity, nor any deficiency, which may render a minister of the world, can possibly diminish any thing of that respect which they know to be due and payable unto him. Notwithstanding the Galatians knew the infirmity and temptation of the apostle, yet they received him (at first) as an angel of God.

16 Am I therefore become your enemy, because I tell you the truth.

As if the apostle had said. "How comes your affections, which were so warm at first, to be so cold now? Whence is it that I, who was formerly so precious in your esteem, am now looked upon as an enemy, and only because I declare the truth of God unto you? Can any reason be given on my part, for this sudden change of affection on your part? I trow not, unless you count my candour and ingenuity in telling the truth a crime: Am I become your enemy because I tell you the truth?" Learn hence That notwithstanding the faithful ministers of Christ, in reproving sin, and vindicating the truths of God, are sometimes counted and treated as enemies, yet will they persist, and finally persevere in their duty, whatever the event may be; though the world account them their enemy, yet they will tell them the truth.

17 They zealously affect you, but not well: yea, they would exclude you, that ye might affect them.

They, that is, the false apostles, pretend great love to you, and zealous affection for you; but not well, not upon honest and just grounds. There is often an ill cause, which is to be condemned and avoided; zeal is a mixed affection of love and anger working into a fervency of mind, in defending what we believe to be true and good, and in opposing what we judge to be false and bad: they zealously affect you, but not well. Nothing is more common, and consequently more dangerous, than for heretical teachers to pretend great zeal for the glory of God, and great love and affection to the people of God, whilst they are about to persuade them to embrace their pernicious errors and damnable heresies. He adds, Yea, they would exclude you, that you might affect them: Exclude you, that is, from the liberty and privileges of the gospel say some; from depending upon me, or any faithful pastor, say others; they would ingratiate themselves that they may engross you, and you may affect them only. The old practice has ever been amongst seducers, first to alienate the peoples minds from their own teachers and next get themselves looked upon as alone, and only worthy to have room in the people's hearts and affections; They would exclude you from us, and us from you, only that you might affect them.

18 But it is good to be zealously affected always in a good thing, and not only when I am present with you.

Note here, That although there is a zeal in a bad cause, which is to be condemned and avoided, yet there is a zeal in a just and righteous cause, which is so laudable and worthy to be practised: when it is a zeal guided by religion, governed by prudence, attended with perseverance; when in a good thing we are affected, zealously affected, and zealously affected always. This the apostle desires that the Galatians should be, and that as well when he was absent from them, as when he was present with them.

19 My little children of whom I travail in birth again until Christ be formed in you.

Note

Note here, 1. The endearing title which the apostle gives to the apostatizing Galatians; he calls them children, little children, his little children, my little children. Observe, He calls them children, because converted to Christianity by the preaching of the gospel; and being thus regenerate and born again, they were to be as children, innocent and inoffensive. He calls them little children, to denote the tenderness of their growth in Christianity, the smallness of their proficiency in religion; they were not come to that consistency in grace, to that maturity in goodness, to that perfection in knowledge, which he did desire. Farther, he calls them his little children, to denote that spiritual relation which was between them, he having been the undoubted instrument of their conversion, and so was their spiritual Father; and also to denote that endearedness of affection which he bare unto them, and that tender care and concern which he had for them. Note, 2. The holy vehemency of the apostle's desire, how earnestly he longed after them in the bowels of Jesus Christ. He compares himself to a mother in travail, until he saw Christ formed in their hearts and lives. I travail in birth, till Christ be formed in you. Learn hence, 1. That there is no stronger love nor more endeared affection between any relations upon earth, than between such ministers of Christ and their beloved people, as they have been happily instrumental to convert and bring home to Christ, 2. That there is nothing in this world which the faithful ministers of Christ do so passionately desire and affectionately long after, as to see Jesus Christ formed and fashioned in the hearts and lives of their beloved people: My little children, of whom I travail.

20 I desire to present with you now, and to change my voice: for I stand in doubt of you.

Our apostle, as a farther testimony of his endeared affection towards the Galatians, declares here his earnest desire to have been with them, and see them face to face, that sobeing more fully acquainted with their case, he might know how to suit his discourses to them, and might have more cause of rejoicing with, than complaining of them. Learn hence, 1. That though a minister may sometimes necessarily withdraw himself from his flock, yet he ought always to have a fervent desire to be present with them, without neglecting any opportunity, when occasion offereth of returning to them: I desire to be present with you. 2. That it is a minister's duty to get, as much as may be, the exact knowledge of his people's inclinations and dispositions, of their state and condition, that he may know how to make a fit application to all of them, admonishing and reproving some, threatening and correcting others. Thus the apostle here wished to be present with them, that he might change his voice; that is, know the better how to speak most suitably and seasonably to their condition.

21 Tell me, ye that desire to be under the law, do ye not hear the law? 22 ¶ For it is written, that Abraham had two sons; the one by a bond-maid, the other by a free-woman. 23 But he who was of the bond-woman, was born after the flesh; but he of the free-woman was by promise.

Our apostle here proceeds to the end of the chapter, in shewing the Galatians that it was the design of God, at the coming of Christ, to abulish the legal dispensation, and free men from the servitude and bondage of that law. And first, he argues with them from the nature of the law they were so willing, yea, so desirous to be under, ver. 21. Ye that desire to be under the law, do ye not bear the law? That is, "Ye that desire to be justified by your legal performances, by observing circumcision, &c. do you not hear and take notice how the very law itself doth sentence, curse, and condemn you? And do you not find in the Old Testament, the story of Sarah and Hagar, of Ishmael and Isaac? Are you ignorant that Abraham had two sons, Ishmael by Hagar, the bond-woman, and Isaac by Sarah the free-woman? Ishmael the bond-woman's son was born after the flesh; that is, by the ordinary strength of nature in generation; Hagar being young, and Abraham being strong. But Isaac was the son of the promise; God gave him, by virtue of his promise made to Abraham when his body was dead, unfit for generation, and Sarah past conception also." Now from this history of Abraham's family, considered in itself (without the mystery prefigured by it) we learn, 1. That the best of men are imperfect men; the holy patriarchs lived in the sin of polygamy, or taking more wives than one, contrary to the first institution of marriage, either not knowing, or not considering it was a sin. Abraham had two wives. 2. That the truth and veracity of God, engages him to fulfil and make good all his promises, though all ordinary means and secondary causes fail, and become impotent and unable to bring about the thing promised. Thus here, a promise being made to Abraham, that Sarah should have a child, she conceiveth and beareth Isaac; not according to the course of nature, but through virtue of the promise: he of the free-woman was by promise.

24 Which things are an allegory. For these are the two covenants; the one from the mount Sinai, which gendereth to bondage, which is Agar. 25 For this Agar is mount Sinai in Arabia, and answereth to Jerusalem which now is, and is in bondage with her children. 26 But Jerusalem which is above is free, which is the mother of us all.

Here the apostle makes an allegorical and spiritual application of the foregoing history of Sarah and Hagar, of Isaac and Ishmael; and the mystery he tells us is this, "The two mothers, Sarah and Hagar, are types of the two covenants, the one of works, the other of grace; the two sons, Isaac and Ishmael, are a type of two sorts of men living in the church, the one proceeding from the first, the other from the second covenant; the one regenerate the other unregenerate men. All regenerate men are under the covenant of grace, and free men; for every man's freedom depends upon the covenant under which he stands. Ishmael is the son of the bond-woman, and points at the Jerusalem which then was, and the people of the Jews, as they then stood affected, seeking justification and expecting eternal salvation by the works of the law; but now behold in Isaac, a son of the free woman, an emblem of the gospel church.

church, which dares not depend upon the righteousness of the law for justification, but relies upon the meritorious righteousness of the Mediator; and this points out Jerusalem above, which is free, and the mother of us all. Learn hence, That all unregenerate men, who continue in a state of nature, are under the first covenant, or covenant of works. Ishmael is a type of all unregenerate men. Mankind is bound to God by a double bond: First, by a bond of creation; Secondly, by a bond of stimulation: The one is natural, and the other is a voluntary obligation; by the former we are bound to God, by the latter he is bound to us. The covenant was made with man in his state of innocence, was fœdus amicitie, a covenant of friendship; the covenant made with us since the fall, is fœdus misericordie, a covenant of reconciliation; the former made with the first Adam, and the latter with Christ the second Adam. The first covenant was made not barely with the person, but with the nature of Adam, with the whole race of mankind; for God dealt with Adam, not as a single person, but as caput gentis, as the root and representative of mankind; and consequently, this covenant was not abolished by the fall, but stands still in force: not to give life, because it is become weak through our flesh; we are become weak to that, not that weak to us; but it commands duty as it did before, namely, perfect, personal, and perpetual obedience; and in case of failure, denounces the curse. Lord! awaken every natural and unregenerate man, who bearing only Adam's image, is also under Adam's covenant; he is a bond-man now, as was Ishmael of old, in bondage to sin, in bondage to Satan, in bondage to the law, in bondage to his own fears, in bondage to the world. O, rest not; till by grace you are delivered from this bondage, by being translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son, and heartily submitted to the terms and conditions of the second covenant, which propoundeth repentance, and promiseth pardon and acceptance upon repentance!

27 For it is written, Rejoice, thou barren, that bearest not; break forth and cry, thou that travailest not: for the desolate hath many more children than she which hath an husband.

Our apostle here proceeds, and still goes on in his former allegory; the church of the Gentiles he compares to Sarah, who was a long time barren, but at last brought forth a child of the promise, a seed in which all the families of the earth were blessed. The church of the Jews is represented under the notion of a woman that had an husband and many children; but the barren Gentiles are, by a spirit of prophecy, called upon to rejoice, and shout for joy, because there should be more children brought forth to God amongst them, than were amongst the Jews. Here, and hence observe, That it is not the church's lot to be always alike fruitful in bringing forth children unto God; she hath her barren times, in which the labours of the ministers are attended with little success, and few are converted and brought home to God: In the first beginnings of the Christian Church, though Christ himself was the preacher, she was one that beareth not, and travaileth not. Learn, 2. That upon the enlargement of Christ's kingdom, and the weakening of Satan's interest in the world, when souls are gathered in, and brought home to Christ, by the power of converting grace, all the churches of Christ ought to rejoice and break forth into singing, as being matter of exceeding joy and great exultation: Rejoice, thou barren, &c.

28 Now we, brethren, as Isaac was, are the children of promise. 29 But as then he that was born after the flesh persecuted him that was born after the spirit, even so it is now.

In the former of these two verses, the apostle applies the foregoing allegory, or typical history of Sarah and Hagar, thus; "As, says he Isaac, by virtue of the promise, being born of the free-woman, was heir to all his father's estate; in like manner, they who seek salvation not by the law, but by faith in Christ, are the free children of God, and heirs of the promise of life eternal; We brethren, as Isaac was, are the children of promise." In the latter of these two verses, which gives us an account of the persecuting enmity that was in the heart and tongue of Ishmael against Isaac, we have several things observable: As, 1. The root and rise of Ishmael's persecuting malice discovered, and from whence it proceeded, and that was an inward antipathy to the work of grace in Isaac. Those great differences in divine heraldry, of being born after the flesh, and after the Spirit, evidently discover where the quarrel lay, and whence it arose; it was the spiritualness of Isaac that exasperated Ishmael's rage; Isaac was born after the Spirit, and doubtless he shewed some fruits of the Spirit, which Ishmael could not relish, and therefore did deride and mock him. 2. What was the kind of persecution which Isaac underwent. It was the persecution of the tongue, in derisions and cruel mockings; Moses tells us, in the book of Genesis, the manner how, and the weapon with which: Ishmael did not lift up his hand against Isaac, as Cain did against Abel, but his tongue only; yet St. Paul calls it here persecution. Mocking and scoffing either at the word, ways, or people of God, is a sin of unspeakable profaneness, a blaspheming of Christ, and a persecution of his members. He that was born after the flesh, persecuted him that was born after the Spirit. 3. That the persecution of the tongue, at least, is that which the children and church of God have met with in all former, and must expect to meet with in future ages; as it was then, says the apostle, even so it is now; afflictions are the donatives of the gospel, and persecution is the church's patrimony; To us it is given on the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on him, but to suffer, Phil. i. 29. Lastly, From Ishmael's being brother to Isaac, and yet his bitter persecutor, that the sorest trials and sharpest persecutions, which the saints endure, are very often from their nearest relations who are tied to them by the strongest obligations, either of kindred or acquaintance. Bitterest things are sometimes endured from the hands of those from whom better things might justly have been expected: Christ foretold all this, The brother shall betray the brother to death, and the father the son. Cain is dead, but the spirit of Cain yet lives; they that scoff, would bite, and make their teeth meet, had they power to use their check-bone: He that is born after the the flesh will persecute those of his own flesh and family that are born after the Spirit; as it was then, we may go on to say, even so it is now.

30 Nevertheless, what saith the scripture? Cast out the bond-woman and her son: for the son of the bond-woman shall not be heir with the son of the free-woman.

The apostle goes on in explaining and applying this typical history of Ishmael and Isaac, and tells us, that the casting out of Ishmael the son of Hagar the bond-woman, did typify the exclusion of the law, from a partnership with the gospel in the justification of a sinner before God: As Ishmael was cast out of Abraham's family, and none but Isaac must inherit; so that they depend upon the law for justification, shall be cast out of the church of God, and never attain the heavenly inheritance: But they who depend upon the promise of God, and expect to be justified by faith, without legal performances, they only shall be heirs of grace and mercy. The doctrine of justification by the works of the law, when it is not only doctrinally maintained, but practically pursued and walked in, doth exclude persons from having any part or share in the kingdom of heaven. So much was typified and prefigured by the son of the bond-woman's being cast out, and not allowed to be heir with the son of the free-woman.

31 So then, brethren, we are not children of the bond-woman but of the free.

Here the apostle draws a conclusion from the foregoing discourse, thus, "As Sarah cast out Hagar and Ishmael, so must the children of the new Jerusalem cast out the law and all the legal rites, henceforth to be observed no more either alone without Christ, or in conjunction with Christ. And as the church of the Gentiles was not typified in Hagar, but in Sarah, so we Christian Gentiles are not obliged to Judaical observances, but freed entirely by Christ from them, and justified by gospel grace without them." The conclusion and sum of all this is, to bring off the Galatians from seeking justification by the works of the law, and to apprehend themselves no longer in bondage to circumcision and the Mosaic rites, but to stand fast in the liberty where-with Christ had made them free, which introduces that excellent discourse to this purpose, contained in the next chapter.

CHAP. V.

STAND fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage:

As if he had said, "Since Christ, by his death, has purchased our freedom from the yoke and bondage of the ceremonial law, let us resolutely stand fast in this our Christian liberty, without subjecting ourselves again to circumcision and the observation of the Mosaic rites." Here note, 1. The servile condition of the Jewish church, they were under bondage, under a yoke of bondage, This servitude of theirs consisted in the vast number of their religious rites and observances, as to days and weeks, months and years; in the multitude of their sacrifices of all sorts, which they were obliged every day to offer; in their frequent purifications and washings; in the strict distinction they were obliged to make betwixt clean and unclean meats; in the numerous rites and ceremonies they were required to observe at their marriages and burials, at bed and board, at home and abroad, nay, even in ploughing, sowing, and reaping: So numerous were these observances, that they took up half their time, and as burdensome as they were numerous. Well might the apostle here call it a yoke of bondage, and elsewhere, viz. Acts xv. 10. A yoke which neither they nor their fathers were able to bear. 2. The happy liberty and freedom from this intolerable yoke, purchased by Christ, for the Christian church, Christ has made us free: He, by his obedience and death, has purchased this happy freedom for us, a freedom from ceremonial bondage, from sinful servitude and slavery; not from civil subjection, not from the yoke of new obedience, but from the obliging force of the ceremonial law, and the curse and irritating power of the moral law. 3. The Christians duty with reference to this privilege, namely, to stand fast in the liberty which Christ has purchased for them, without obliging themselves to observe any part of the ceremonial law, which was now a servility perfectly unprofitable, and nothing else; stand fast in it; that is, maintain and defend it both in judgment and practice.

2 Behold, I Paul say unto you, that if ye be circumcised Christ shall profit you nothing.

That is, "Behold, I Paul, your apostle, do positively declare, and expressly tell you the Galatians, and all other Christians converted by me to Christianity, that if ye be circumcised, that is, join circumcision with the gospel as a thing necessary to justification and salvation, Christ's undertaking will profit ye nothing, for, embracing circumcision after Christ's coming, is virtually to deny and disown that he is come, and in effect to renounce and disclaim him; because at his coming the promise was fulfilled, and circumcision of its own nature ceased." Learn hence, That for persons religiously to observe any of the rites of the ceremonial law, in obedience to any divine precept, or to join any thing with Christ, and faith in him, for the justification of a sinner before God, is a plain denial of Christ and a disdaining of his ability and sufficiency to justify and save us.

3 ¶ For I testify again to every man that is circumcised, that he is a debtor to do the whole law.

He that urges the necessity of circumcision, is a debtor to the law, in a double respect, namely, in regard of duty, and in regard of penalty: First, He is a debtor in regard of duty; because he that thinks himself bound to keep one part of the ceremonial law, circumcision, doth thereby oblige himself to keep the whole ceremonial law, yea, and the whole moral law too, without deficiency, and that under the penalty of condemnation. Again, secondly, As he is a debtor in point of duty, so he must needs be a debtor in regard of penalty, because he is not able to keep any part part of it perfectly. Hence we may infer, (1.) how endearing our obligations are to Christ, who as our Surety paid both these debts for us, namely, our debt of duty, and our debt of penalty to the law of God; by fulfilling all righteousness, he paid our debt of duty, and by suffering the punishment due to transgressors, he paid our debt of penalty. We may also (2.) infer, that as he that is circumcised, is bound to keep the whole law; so, he that is baptized, is obliged to obey all the commands of the gospel, to make conscience of the duties of both tables, as an argument of his sincerity, and as ornament to his profession.

4 Christ is become of no effect unto you, who-soever of you are justified by the law; ye are fallen from grace.

Here another argument is used, to shew that believers are dead to the ceremonial law, and are by no means to expect justification by it: Who-soever of you, says the apostle, is justified by the law, that is, whoever seeks and endeavours to be so justified (for; in reality, none can in that manner be justified) Christ is become of no effect unto such persons; that is, they renounce Christ, and disdain benefit by his death: And they are fallen from grace; that is, fallen from Christianity, and the covenant of grace; they have forfeited the grace of the gospel, by cleaving to the ceremonial law; they are fallen from the doctrine of grace delivered in the gospel, and Christ is become of no effect unto them. Learn from hence, That such persons as do believe that faith in Christ alone is not sufficient to justification and acceptance with God, without the observation of the abrogated law, do in effect own their relation to Christ, and disclaim all benefit by his death.

5 For we through the Spirit wait for the hope of righteousness by faith.

That is, "We Christians, we believers, through the Spirit which we have received, and not by legal observances, do hope both for such a righteousness as will denominate and constitute us righteous in the sight of God, and also for the crown of righteousness in heaven, which now we wait and hope for here on earth." Note 1. That a believer does not value himself by what he has in his hand, but by what he has in hope; his riches are not so much in present possession, as in future expectation: We wait for the hope; that is, for heaven, the good hoped for. 2. That none have either right to heaven, or can warrantably expect the enjoyment of heaven, who are destitute of righteousness; heaven is here called the hope of righteousness, that is, the rational hope and expectation of righteous persons only. 3. That it is a righteousness made ours by faith, even the righteousness of the Mediator, which gives us the best title to, and the firmest ground to hope and wait for, the kingdom of heaven and eternal life. 4. That it is the special work of the holy Spirit to produce in us the graces of the Spirit, both faith and hope; faith to enable us to apprehend, and hope to enable us to wait for the crown of righteousness, even eternal glory.

6 For in Jesus Christ neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, but faith which worketh by love.

In Christ Jesus, that is, in the œconomy of Christ Jesus, under the gospel dispensations, in our state of Christianity, since Christ's manifestation in the flesh, neither circumcision nor uncircumcision availeth any thing with God, as to our acceptance with him, or reward from him: But the qualification now necessary to salvation under the gospel, is faith working by love; that is, such an effectual belief of future happiness purchased for us, and promised to us by Christ, as causes us to love and serve him, to trust in, and depend upon him for the same. Learn, 1. That although circumcision, and the rest of the Levitical ceremonies were once enjoined by God, and practised by the Jews as an acceptable service, and the neglect or contempt of them was a mortal sin; yet since Christ's coming in the flesh, who was the substance of all those shadows, the command whereby they were enjoined did cease, and neither circumcision nor uncircumcision availeth any thing to salvation. 2. That although the ceremonial law be abolished, yet a believer under the gospel has work to do, a work of faith, and labour of love; for though faith alone justifieth us before God, yet it is not alone in the heart when it doth justify, but is always accompanied with the grace of love to God and our neighbour: For in Christ Jesus, no faith availeth any thing, but that which worketh by love.

7 Ye did run well, who did hinder you that we should not obey the truth?

Ye did run well; that is, in the race of Christianity; you set out well at first, and received the gospel in the plainness and simplicity of it, without any mixture of Jewish ceremonies: What hindered you? Who stopt you? Who drove you back from your belief of, and obedience of the truth of the gospel, which you then received from me? Here note, 1. With what holy wisdom our apostle mixed commendations with his reproofs: At the same time that he reproves them for their present backsliding, he commends them for their former forwardness: Ye did run well. 2. That ordinarily a Christian's first ways are his best ways, his first fruits are his fairest fruits: Jehoshaphat walked in the first ways of David his father, 2. Chron. xvii. 3. Commonly young converts are carried out with a greater measure of affection and zeal, and make a swifter progress in religion, than others do, at first, or they themselves do afterwards, when they are of older standing. These Galatians did run, yea, did run very well, at first, in the race of Christianity. 3. That when a person's or a people's progress in Christianity is not answerable to their hopeful beginning, it is matter of regret and grief to all beholders, as well as matter of reproach and shame to the persons themselves: Ye did run well, who did hinder you? Intimating, that this their defection and apostacy was no less matter of astonishment to St. Paul, than it was of rebuke and reproach to them.

8 This persuasion cometh not of him that calleth you. 9 A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump.

A. if the apostle had said, "This Judaizing opinion and practice of yours, this persuasion of the necessity of yours your being circumcised, and obeying the law of Moses, this new doctrine so contrary to the spirit of the gospel, and the design of Christianity, was never taught you either by God or myself, or any other faithful minister of Jesus Christ, who first converted you to the faith; but it is a mere delusion of Satan, and his emissaries the false apostles: And do not think this a small matter; let not circumcision seem a little thing to you; and let not these Judaizing teachers be disregarded by you as inconsiderable, because they are few in number, for they are like to leaven; and ye know very well that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump; intimating, that a few false teachers, and a little of error and false doctrine, crept into the congregation and church of Christ, may do unspeakable mischief, by speedily infecting the whole church, as a little leaven (to which error is compared) leaveneth the whole lump.

10 I have confidence in you through the Lord that you will be none otherwise minded: but he that troubleth you shall bear his judgment whosoever he be.

Observe here, 1. The apostle's holy confidence grounded upon charity, that through the Lord, that is, through the Lord's assisting his endeavours, and through the Lord's blessing upon their serious consideration of what he had written to them, they would be reclaimed from their errors and brought to be of the same mind with himself. Where note, How the holy and zealous apostle was divided betwixt hope and fear concerning these men; he feared the worst of these Galatians, and yet hopes the best; I have confidence in you through the Lord. It is a fault in the ministers of the gospel, when they despair of men too soon, when they cease or slacken their endeavours for their people's good, looking upon them as resolutely bent upon, and judicially given up unto all evil. Though our apostle here had a confidence not of faith, or full persuasion, yet he had a confidence of charity, which caused him to hope that they would belike minded with himself: I have confidence in you through the Lord, that you will be no otherwise minded.

2. With what a holy caution, as well as Christian prudence and charity, our apostle applies himself unto them; declaring, that though he hoped they might be reclaimed from their error, yet least they should conclude their error not to be very dangerous, he shews them his just indignation against us, by denouncing deserved punishments against those that seduced them into it: He that troubleth you, shall bear his own judgment, his condemnation due to him in hell, without repentance, which is supposed in all threatenings. For the condition of conditional threatenings, though it is not always expressed, yet it is to be understood. 3. The universality of the threatening; He shall bear his own judgment, whosoever he be; let him be who he will, or what he will; who he will for abilities and parts, what he will for power or reputation; whoever he is, or whatsoever he be, he shall bear his judgment. Such is the exact justice of God, and such his impartiality in the exercise of it, that he will suffer no impenitent transgressor to escape his indignation, whoever he is, without respect of persons: He that troubleth you, &c.

11 And I, brethren, if I yet preach in circumcision, why do I yet suffer persecution? then is the offence of the cross ceased.

Our apostle, in these words, signifies to us, that some of the Judaizing teachers had suggested to the Galatians; as if he himself had preached elsewhere the doctrine of circumcision, and also practised the duty of circumcision (by circumcising Timothy) which here he opposes. "True, he did circumcise Timothy, but it was only to avoid offending the weak Jews, not out of any opinion which he had touching the necessity of circumcision: Therefore, to discover to them the fallhood of that suggestion, he declares, that if he would have preached circumcision, he might have escaped persecution; the Jews were his persecutors, looking upon him as an apostate from their holy religion, for preaching up the abolishment of the Mosaic law. Where observe, That the Jews, who looked upon themselves to be the people, yea, the peculiar and only people of God, and accounted all others contemptible and profane, were yet far greater persecutors of Christ and his apostles, than the blind and barbarous heathen; and all this out of zeal for God and his law: Why do I yet suffer persecution? implying, that the Jews did persecute him; and that his not preaching circumcision was the cause why they did so. He adds, Then is the offence of the cross ceased. By the cross, may be understood, either, (1.) The doctrine of the cross, the doctrine of the gospel; and then the sense is, the Jews would not have taken such offence at my preaching the doctrine of the gospel as they do, were it not because by it, circumcision, and the whole frame of the old legal administration are laid aside: Or else, (2.) By the cross, may be understood the afflictions and sufferings which he underwent for the sake of Christ and his holy religion; and the sense then is this: Verily, all my sufferings had long since been at an end, would I but have yielded the Jews this point, that Christians are obliged to circumcision, and to yield obedience to the law of Moses; would I grant them this, my sufferings would soon be at an end; but my daily persecutions are evident demonstrations that I do not preach up circumcision; for had I so done, the offence of the cross had long since ceased. Learn hence, That the faithful ministers of Jesus Christ will not, dare not, conceal any part of the necessary truth, when the eminent hazard of the people's salvation calls for the preaching of it, though the imbittered enemies of religion should raise against them the fiercest persecutions for the same: If I yet preach circumcision, &c.

12 I would they were even cut off which trouble you.

The apostle's meaning is, "That it were very fit, were it seasonable, that those which had thus seduced them, should be excommunicated and cut off from the church's communion." Where note, 1. How implicitly and interpretively St. Paul compares these seducers to rotten members, which are and ought to be cut off, lest the gangrene overspread the whole body; I would they were cut off; implying, that like rotten members they deserved it; and the church's safety called for it, would her then circumstances admit of it. 2. That in the very expression here used used by St. Paul, of cutting off, there seems to be an allusion to the practice of circumcision, which is a cutting off the fore-skin of the flesh, and throwing it away. Now, says the apostle, I wish that these Judaizing teachers, that urge you to be circumcised, that is, to cut off and cast away the fore-skin of your flesh, I wish that they might be cut off as superfluous flesh, and cast out of the fellowship and communion of the church. Yet, 3. The apostle doth rather declare what such seducers deserve, than actually inflict the censure itself; he satisfieth himself with an affectionate wish, lest the number of the seduced being great, and perhaps the seducers not a few, they should be hardened rather than reformed, and the ordinance itself exposed: I would they were even cut off, &c.

13 ¶ For brethren, ye have been called unto liberty: only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another.

Our apostle having finished the former part of the chapter, which contains an exhortation to stand fast in that liberty which Christ had purchased for them: he now enters upon the second part of it, namely, to caution them against abusing of their Christian liberty, and by no means to apprehend or suppose as if they were thereby freed from all obligation to serve God or man, in the duties particularly required of them. "Brethren, says he, ye are called unto liberty; that is to the enjoyment of evangelical liberty, which consists in a freedom from the obligation of the ceremonial law, and the curse of the moral law: Use it then so as not to abuse it; use it neither to sin nor scandal; not to sin, to allow yourselves the least liberty in indulging any carnal lust, or sinful affection, nor yet to scandalize the weak, who at present scruple the forsaking of circumcision, and the rest of the ceremonial rites: Use not your liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but in love serve one another." Learn hence, 1. That our liberty and freedom, purchased for us by Christ, doth not dissolve any tie or obligation which we lie under, either to God or man; the yoke of duty is very consistent with our Christian liberty. 2. That one of the great occasions of the sins we commit in the course of our lives, is the too free use of our Christian liberty: The using our liberty to the utmost pitch and extent of that which we call lawful, is the occasion of our running into that which is certainly sinful. Religion most certainly allows us all reasonable liberty in the gratification of our natural appetites and passions; but all excesses and immoderate liberties are forbidden by religion. And accordingly, one good rule for securing ourselves from falling into sin, in the using our Christian liberty, in this, namely, That in matters of duty, we should rather do too much, than too little: But in matters of indifferency, we should rather take too little of our liberty than too much. For instance, prayer and almsgiving are indispensable duties; but how oft we should pray, and how much we should give, is not positively declared; in this case, to pray very fervently, and to give alms very liberally and largely; is our wisdom and duty; no damage will come by doing too much, but both damage and danger will accrue by doing too little. 3. That it is not sufficient, in order to the right use of our Christian liberty, that we do not from these take occasion to sin ourselves; but we ought to take care, lest by any indiscreet use of our own liberty, we give offence, and minister occasion of sin and stumbling unto others. This truth is implied in the second injunction, By love serve one another.

14 For all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.

Here our apostle enforces the foregoing exhortation to love and serve one another, with a forcible argument or motive, namely, because love is the fulfilling of the law; that is, (1.) It is the fulfilling of that part of the law which relates to our neighbour; all the moral law respecting our neighbour is fulfilled in that one word, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. Or, (2.) Love may be said to be the fulfilling of the law in general; for true and regular love to our neighbour supposeth our love to God, springeth from it, and is an evidence of it; yea, the love of our neighbour is the perfecting and completing of our love to God, 1 John iv. 12. If we love one another, God dwelleth in us, and his love is perfected in us. Learn, That as love is a very comprehensive duty, comprising the inward affection as well as the outward action, so the word neighbour is of a very extensive consideration, and includes all persons, friend and foe, rich and poor, near and afar off; all that partake of humanity must be sharers in our charity: Our inward affection and good-will must extend to all, though the outward expressions of it can reach but a very few. Thus the law is fulfilled in one word, when we love our neighbour as ourselves; not as we do (often) love ourselves, but as we should love ourselves, namely, with a wise and well guided love.

15 But if ye bite and devour one another, take heed that ye be not consumed one of another.

The apostle, to enforce the foregoing exhortation to mutual love, urges here the dangerous effects which their animosities and strifes, with their controversies and contentions would most certainly produce: By biting one another, says he, you will destroy and consume one another; where it deserves a serious remark, that St. Paul compares the enmities and animosities which were amongst them, upon the score of their differences in religion, to the bitings, rendings, and devourings of wild beasts, If ye bite and devour one another; and gives them timely notice of the fatal mischiefs and consequences that will follow thereupon; namely, a total devastation and inevitable consumption of the whole church. Take heed that ye be not consumed one of another. It is a true saying, Odia religionum sunt acerbissima: there is no such hatred amongst men as upon the score of religion: As the zeal of the Jews would not suffer an uncircumcised person to live amongst them, so probably these zealous Judaizers in Galatia, would not suffer those who had cast off legal observances, to live quietly and peaceably by them; which might give occasion to these words of the apostle, If ye bite and devour one another, take heed ye be not consumed one of another. Learn hence, 1. That there ever have been, are, and will be differences about matters of religion, in the best and purest churches here on earth. 2. That these differences may and ought to be managed with with great temper and charity. 3. That then contentions are highly uncharitable, and very sinful, when men bite and devour one another. 4. That such uncharitable contentions do prepare and make ready a people for utter destruction.

16 This I say then, Walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lust of the flesh.

“To prevent the forementioned evils, as if the apostle had said, I advise and exhort you to walk in the Spirit, that is, according to the guidance and direction, according to the influence and motion, of the holy Spirit speaking to you in his word, and then you never will fulfil the lusts of the flesh; that is, you will never accomplish and bring in to complete act (especially with deliberation and consent) the inordinate motions of corrupt nature.” Learn hence, That the more Christians set themselves to obey the new nature, and follow the motions of the Spirit of grace, the more will the power of indwelling sin and inbred corruption be mortified and kept under. This expression, Ye shall not fulfil the lust of the flesh, may be thought to import and imply these two things; (1.) That an inward principle of grace in the heart, will give a check to sin in its first motions, and cause it oft-times to miscarry in the womb, like an untimely birth, before it comes to its full maturity; it shall never gain the full consent of a gracious person's will, as it doth of an unregenerate person. (2.) But if, notwithstanding all the opposition grace makes to hinder the production of sin, if yet it doth break forth into act, such acts of sin are not committed without reluctance and regret, and are followed with shame and sorrow, yea, those very surprizals and captivities of sin at one time, are made cautious and warnings to prevent it at another time: And thus they that walk in the Spirit, do not fulfil the lust of the flesh.

17 For the flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh: and these are contrary the one to the other; so that ye cannot do the things that ye would.

These words are brought in as a special reason, why Christians should walk in the Spirit, that is, after the motions and guidance of God's holy Spirit: because, otherwise the flesh will quickly prevail over them; for the flesh is continually lusting against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh; that is, the evil inclinations of corrupt nature are continually struggling with, and striving against the good motions which the holy Spirit of God stirreth up in us: And in like manner, the Spirit, or renewed nature, opposeth the motions of corrupt nature: For these two principles are contrary the one to the other; so that we who are led by the Spirit, cannot act (with deliberation and consent) according to the flesh; nor can they that are led by the flesh, do the things which delight the Spirit. Learn hence, 1. That there is a diversity of principles in a Christian, flesh and Spirit; there is a good principle, called Spirit, because the Spirit of God is the author of it: and a bad principle in us, which is called flesh, by which we are inclined to that which is evil. This is called flesh, to denote its intimacy with us; it is as dear to us as our flesh, to denote its dearness to us; it is as dear to us as our own flesh, as dear as a right hand or right eye; and, to denote its continuance with us, as long as we carry flesh about us, so long will this principle of corrupt nature remain in us, and continue with us. 2. That the motions and inclinations in our nature to sin, do ever conflict and combat with, oppose and war against, the motions of God's holy Spirit, exciting and inclining us to do good: Though contrarieties cannot be together in the same subject in an intense, yet they may be together in a remiss degree. 3. The consequence and issue of this combat, we cannot do the things that we would, or any thing as we would; we cannot perform any holy duty perfectly in this life. As soon may an imperfect father beget a perfect child, as we in our state of imperfection perform any duty free from sin. O what need, what great need then, have the best of saints, of the meditation and intercession of our Lord Jesus-Christ, when they present any performed duty unto God! And what need also to watch our own hearts, when we are upon our knees, to fortify them against the incursions and disturbances of the flesh; seeing, after all our care and vigilance in duty, we can none of us do the things that we would, nor any thing as we would!

18 But if ye be led by the Spirit, ye are not under the law.

That is, if ye be under the guidance and government of the holy Spirit of God, and that renewing principle of grace which he has produced in you, you are no longer under the law, that is, not under the moral law as a covenant of life for our justification, though under it as an eternal rule of living; not under the vindictive, though under the directive power of the law.” So that the force of the apostle's argument seems to lie thus: “You are by the Spirit, by the spiritual dispensation of the gospel, free from the curse and terror of the moral law; how unreasonable then is it to suppose, that you should be still subject to the ceremonial law? No; if you be led by the Spirit, neither the moral law shall condemn you, nor the ceremonial law oblige and bind you.

19 ¶ Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these, adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, 20 Idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, 21 Envyings, murders, drunkenness, revelings, and such like: of the which I tell you before, as I have also told you in time past, that they which do such things, shall not inherit the kingdom of God.

Our apostle having in the foregoing verses, exhorted the Galatians to walk in the Spirit to be led and guided by the Spirit, and by no means to obey or fulfil the lusts of the flesh; he comes in these and the following verses to discover how they might with certainty and assurance, know whether they were spiritual or carnal, whether the Spirit or the flesh had a prevalency in them, or dominion over them: Accordingly, he describes particularly the flesh and the Spirit, by their various and different effects, and gives us a catalogue of the one and the other; he reckons up no fewer than seventeen works of the flesh, all which, yea, any of which, continued in, and unrepented of, are damnable; after this, he enumerates nine special and gracious fruits of the Spirit, which qualify us for, and intitle us to the kingdom of heaven: The works of the flesh are manifest, &c. Here note, 1. That sin is called a work; thereby intimating to us the labour and toil, the drudgery and pains, which sinners meet with in a sinful course: The ways of sin are very toilsome, although in their issue very unfruitful; sin is no pleasurable service, but a laborious servitude. 2. The apostle calls sin by the name of works in the plural number, the works of the flesh; intimating, that sin never goes single, but has a dangerous train and retinue: He that yields himself a servant to one sin, shall soon find himself a slave to many. 3. That sin is called a work of the flesh, because most sins are committed by the flesh; the body is the soul's instrument, as well in the work of sin, as in the service of Christ; and the flesh is the object, about which these works are conversant, as well as the organ and instrument by which they are committed. 4. These works of the flesh are here said to be manifest: But how so? First, They are most of them manifestly condemned by the light of nature; the natural conscience in men startles at them at first, till by custom and frequent practice they become habitual and natural to them. Secondly, They are all of them manifest by the light of scripture; the word of God, which is in all our hands, condemns all these works of the flesh to the pit of hell. 5. The particular enumeration of the works of the flesh, here made by the apostle; adultery, or the defiling our neighbour's bed; fornication, or the unlawful mixture of single persons one with another; uncleanness, under which is comprehended all sorts of filthiness, and filthy lusts, whether natural or unnatural; lasciviousness, by which is meant all wanton behaviour, either in speech or action, tending to excite filthy desires, either in themselves or others; idolatry, whereby God is represented to corporeal eyes by pictures and images, and so brought down to human senses: properly, therefore, is idolatry, as such, called here a work of the flesh: Again, witchcraft, a devilish art, whereby some men and women, having made a compact with the devil, either expressly or implicitly, are enabled, with God's permission, and by the assistance of Satan, to produce effects beyond the ordinary course and order of nature, and these for the most part rather mischievous to others, than beneficial to themselves; hatred, or a secret enmity in our hearts against our neighbour, either for real or apprehended injuries; variance, or outward contention by words or actions, arising from the forementioned enmity in the heart; emulations, or an inward grief and displeasure at some good in others, or done by others, which eclipses and overthadows us; wrath, or violent anger, and immoderate passion, depriving a man for the time of his reason, and transforming him into a beast; strife, or a litigious spirit, a continual proneness to quarrelling and contending; seditions, or rending of societies into factions, and dividing communities into parties; which dividing work, when it fall out in the state, is called sedition, when in the church, by the name of schism: heresies, or dangerous errors in the fundamental points of religion, not arising purely from mistakes of judgment, but from the espousing of false doctrines out of disgust or pride, or from worldly principles, to avoid persecution or trouble in the flesh; these may well be accounted carnal lusts, and called works of the flesh, although they be mental errors, and their first seat in the understanding and judgment: envyings, a pestilent lust, which makes another's good our grief; our eyes smart at the sight of what another enjoys, though we have never the less, because another has more: murders, that is, the executing of private revenge, by shedding of blood, and taking away our neighbour's life unjustly: drunkenness, revellings, the one is intemperance in drinking, the other an excess in eating; all sinful abuse of the creatures of God, which he has given, not barely for necessity, but delight, is censured here as a work of the flesh. 6. The solemn warning which the apostle gives the Galatians to watch against all these sins, and not indulge or allow themselves in the wilful commission of any one of them: I tell you, says he, that such shall not inherit the kingdom of God, but be eternally banished from him. Now, from the whole, learn, 1. That the ministers of the gospel must not satisfy themselves barely to reprove and condemn sin in general, but must descend to particulars: though investives against sin, at large, are of good use to expose the deformity of sin, yet, in order to the awakening of particular sinners, we must take into our consideration their particular sins, and endeavour to convince them of them, and turn them from them: so doth our apostle here, in the foregoing catalogue of vices. 2. That the ministers of Christ must acquaint their people, not only with the danger of allowing themselves in the grosser acts of sin, as adultery, fornication, drunkenness, and revellings, and such like, but also with the danger of indulging themselves in secret sins, heart sins, sins which the eye of the world can never accuse them of, but God will condemn them for; such are hatred, emulation, envy, &c. not only the outward act of sin, but the inward desire, is dangerous and damning. It is easy for a man to murder his neighbour, in the account of God, by a secret wish, and a passionate desire; he that hateth his brother is a murderer, and he that looks upon a woman unduly, is an adulterer in the sight of God. 3. That the ministers of Christ can never often enough warn sinners of the danger of sin, and continuance in it; we must do it over and over again; every sabbath, and every sermon, must ring a peal in the sinner's ears, of the fatal danger of a resolute impiety: Thus here, I tell you now, as I told you in time past, that they which do such things, shall not inherit, &c.

22 But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, 23 Meekness, temperance: against such there is no law:

Note here, 1. That the apostle, who called sin the work of the flesh, doth here call grace the fruit of the Spirit. Sin is a work of our own; it proceeds wholly from ourselves, our own depraved minds and wills; without the least co-operation of the holy Spirit; he can neither be the author nor abettor of any thing that is evil. All sinful works are works of the flesh and therefore our own works; but all graces accompanying salvation are the fruits of God's Spirit; both because he is the author of them, and also, because because they are so acceptable and pleasing to him, even as fruit is unto our taste, and likewise, so profitable and advantageous to ourselves. Where the flesh ruleth, there the work exceeds the fruit; and accordingly, without any mentioning of the fruit, they are called works of the flesh, but where the spirit of God ruleth, there the fruit exceeds the work; and therefore, without ever mentioning the work, it is called the fruit of the Spirit. 2. That the works of the flesh is spoken of as one, many works, but one fruit. There is such a connexion and concatenation of graces, that although they are distinct in their natures, yet are they inseparable in their subject, pull one link of a chain, and you pull all; so he that has any one spiritual grace in reality, or at least in eminency, cannot be utterly destitute of any other; for where the Holy Spirit is, there cannot be a total defect of any holy grace. 3. That the works of the flesh are said to be manifest, ver. 19. but no such thing is here affirmed of the fruit of the Spirit. Alas! God knows, the works of the flesh are but every where too manifest; adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, drunkenness, do so abound in all places, that you can scarce look beside them: But the fruits of the Spirit are not so; love, peace, gentleness, meekness, these are very thin in the world; hips and haws grow in every hedge, when choicer fruits are but in some few gardens. 4. How Paul enumerates here nine special fruits of the Spirit; not as if there were no more, but because these here mentioned stand in a direct opposition to the former vices recited in the foregoing verses. The first sweet fruit of the Spirit, taken notice of here by our apostle, is love, an holy affection in the soul, whereby a person is carried forth to love God, primarily and chiefly for himself, and his neighbour for God's sake: Joy, delight in doing our duty, and rejoicing in expectation of the regard for well-doing: Peace, inward peace with God and conscience, and outward peace with one another: Long-suffering, an inclination of mind disposing us to bear injuries patiently, and to forgive them readily: Gentleness, or affability and courtesy in conversation, a sweetness of temper, which renders us greatly useful, as well as exceedingly delightful to mankind: Goodness, a disposition inclining us to communicate what we have and are to others, and to do all the possible good we can in our respective places and stations: Faith, or fidelity towards men, in our promises, and in all our actions, speaking exact truth: Meekness, this is a threefold, a natural meekness, which is the product of the temperament of the humours in body, a rare felicity; there is also a moral meekness, which is the product of education and counsel, this is an amiable virtue; and there is a spiritual meekness, that orders the persons according to the divine rule, the holy law of God; this is a noble and divine grace, which attracts the estimation of God, and the admiration of men: Temperance, a sober use of meat, drink, and every thing wherein our senses are gratified or delighted. 5. A special privilege belonging to all those who are possessed of the forementioned fruits of the Spirit, and that is, exemption from the law: Against such there is no law; that is, no law to compel, no law to accuse or condemn; for the law enjoins them, and encourages the practice and performance of them.

Learn hence, 1. That the best, yea, the only way to have the fruits of the Spirit thrive in our hearts, is first to mortify the works of the flesh; weeds and thistles must be rooted up before grain can grow or thrive. As the corruption of one form is the production of another, so the mortification of sin makes way for the plantation of the fruits of the Spirit. 2. That moral virtues are the fruits of the Spirit, and commence Christian graces when they are acted by faith in Christ, influenced by love unto him, and aiming at the highest of ends, the glory of God, and our own salvation. 3. That if we compare the fruits of the Spirit with the works of the flesh, there will appear so much beauty in the one, and such real deformity in the other, so much satisfaction in the one, and such disquiet and vexation in the other, that besides the difference between them in their original and event, the former considerations are abundantly sufficient to engage our love to the fruits of the Spirit, and to excite our hatred to the works of the flesh.

They that are Christ's, that is, they that are truly his followers, and sincere disciples, they have crucified, that is subdued, and in some degree mortified and put to death their fleshly corruptions, their carnal lusts, and sinful affections and passions. They did, by baptism, engage themselves to die unto sin; and the regenerate have done it in some measure; they have crucified the flesh: Yet we must not understand this of a total, plenary, and final crucifixion, but inchoative only; and they are said to have done it, because they are daily doing of it, in proposito, voto, et conatu, in resolution, in desire, and endeavour. And by affections, we are not to understand natural, but inordinate affections; and by crucifixion, is not to be understood a total extinction of sin; but a deposing of it from its regency and dominion in the soul of the sinner; yet as death surely, though slowly, follows crucifixion, so likewise doth sin live in a believer a dying life, and dies a lingering, but a certain death: They that are Christ's, have crucified the flesh, with the affections and lusts. Learn hence, 1. That there are a peculiar people which are Christ's, that have specified interest in him, union and communion with him; they that are Christ's, not by an external profession only, but by an internal implantation into him by faith. 2. That all such as thus have an interest in Christ, are daily crucifying the flesh with its affections and lusts. The death of sin, is here compared to our Saviour's crucifixion; (1.) To shew the conformity there is betwixt the death of sin, and the death of Christ. Did Christ die a painful, shameful, lingering, and accursed death? So dies sin in the soul of a believer. There is a gradual weakening of the power of sin in him; sin is dying, as he, but it is a long time a dying. (2.) To denote the principal meat and instrument of our mortification, namely, the death of Christ; by virtue whereof, believers do crucify their corrupt affections; the great arguments to mortification being drawn from the sufferings of Christ for sin. 3. That the work of mortification (called here, tropically, a crucifixion) strikes not only at all sin, but at the root of all sin; it spares none, neither the flesh, nor any of its affections and lusts do escape; root and branches, head and members, the old man is crucified, and the body of sin destroyed, and the law of mortification laid to the root of every sin and sinful affection. In this manner, do they that are Christ's, crucify the flesh, with its affections and lusts.

25 If we live in the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit.

If we live in the Spirit; that is, if the Spirit lives in us, if the holy Spirit of grace be the principle of our life, let us walk in the Spirit; that is, let us live and act under the conduct and guidance, under the direction and influence of the holy Spirit; let us do the works of the Spirit, let us bring forth the fruits of the Spirit, and let us live a spiritual life; let our dealings be about spiritual and heavenly things, and our chiefest delight be in such things; and by these spiritual delights and exercises we shall every day become more and more spiritual, and in the account of God be esteemed and reckoned amongst the number of those that walk in the Spirit. Let us then evidence the life of grace in ourselves, by exercising that grace in a life of communion with God: This seems to be the importance of this remarkable place, If we live in the Spirit, &c. Here note, 1. That there must be a principle of spiritual life, before there can be any spiritual motion and exercise; we must first live in the Spirit, and the Spirit live in us, before we can possibly walk in the Spirit; the child must live before it can walk. 2. That where there is a principle of grace and spiritual life in the heart, there will be the actings and exercise of grace in the life; If we live in the Spirit, we shall walk in the Spirit. Ezek. xxxvii. 27. I will put my Spirit within them, and cause them to walk in my statutes. An holy heart will be attended with an holy life, and a good conscience accompanied with a good conversation; spiritual life will produce spiritual motion.

26 Let us not be desirous of vain glory, provoking one another, envying one another.

Our apostle closes this excellent chapter with an exhortation to the Galatians to avoid all pride and ambition, all vain-glorious boastings and ostentation, not provoking one another by their contentions, not envying either the gift or graces of God bestowed on others. Learn hence, 1. That there is and may be, in all men, a desire of applause and just commendation: All men pretend to a share in reputation, and do not love to see it monopolized and ingrossed by any person. 2. That a vain-glorious desire of applause and reputation is sinful, when we seek for what we do not deserve, or for more than we deserve, or seek more to be applauded by men, than to be approved by God. 3. That ambition is usually attended with envy and contention; no sin goes single, but has a train of followers: Let us not be desirous of vain-glory, &c.

CHAP. VI.

Our apostle in this concluding chapter exhorts the Galatians to the practice of several important duties, in order to an holy life, which was so necessary to evidence the truth of their conversion to Christianity.

BRETHREN, if a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual restore such an one in the spirit of meekness: considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted.

The first exhortation here given, is, how they should carry themselves one towards another, upon supposition of their scandalous falling either into error, or into sin, namely, not with rigour and severity, but with mildness and lenity: If any be overtaken in a fault, &c. Here note, 1. A evil supposed, namely, that the wisest, the holiest, and the best of men, may be overtaken in a fault, and surpris'd by a temptation; If any man be overtaken; implying that any man may be so: that sin, or that misery, which befalls some men, may befall others, any others, yea, all others; for all are partakers of the same frail nature, subject to the working of the same corruption, and liable to the danger of the same temptation. 2. The duty directed to, with relation to these persons, who trip and fall either into sin, or into error, restore him, set him right, put him in joint again; a metaphor taken from bone-setters, who place dislocated bones, and set broken bones, with great tenderness: Those three things, which we say are necessary in a bone-fetter, are absolutely needful in a reprovor; namely, an eagle's eye, to discern where the fault lies; a lion's heart, to deal faithfully and freely with the faults; and a lady's hand, to use them gently and tenderly. 3. The persons particularly named, who are and ought to manage this duty of brotherly reproof, ye that are spiritual; you that are the governors of the church, say some; you that are endowed with spiritual gifts, say others; the prophets among you, who perform all spiritual offices for you, let them rebuke offenders. Others, by spiritual, understand such as had received larger measures of the gift and graces of the Spirit than others; let such as are strong bear with the infirmities of the weak. 4. The manner how this duty of fraternal correction, or brotherly reproof is, and ought to be managed, namely, with patience and meekness, not with severity and roughness: Ye that are spiritual restore him in the spirit of meekness; if the reproofs you give others be imbittered with your own passions, they will spit them out of their mouths; yea, spit them back upon your very faces. 5. The argument to excite to all this; namely, the consideration of our own personal frailty, and great liability to fall into temptation ourselves, considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted; Who knows what a feather the strongest saint and stoutest Christian may prove in the wind of temptation? Therefore let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall, and exercise great candour and Christian tenderness towards them that are fallen before him. Hoide mihi, cras tibi. From the whole, learn, 1. That fraternal correction, or brotherly reproof, is a great duty which Christians mutually owe to one another, when they either run into error, or fall into sin: If any of you be overtaken, restore him. 2. That although it be the duty of private Christians to admonish and reprove one another, as being members one of another, yet those that are spiritual, Christ's ministers; the guides of his church, the stewards of his household, ought in special to look upon it as their obliged duty to reprove and rebuke with all long-suffering and gentleness. 3. That rigour and severity, expressed towards the failings and escapes of others, will rather exasperate than reclaim them; we must deal as gently with a fallen brother, as with a broken bone; if we do not temper our reproofs with meekness, they will certainly prove successless. 4. That the holiest saint and most spiritual man, here on earth, is within the reach of temptation, and may possibly fall himself; therefore ought to treat a fallen brother with great tenderness and regard.

Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ.

This is a general precept, and requires us to sympathize with our brethren in all their sorrows and sufferings, and to bear a part with them under the load and burden of oppressive wants and necessities; particularly, bearing with the weaknesses and infirmities of our brethren, seems here to be recommended to our care and practice in this apostolical injunction. Bear ye one another's burdens. The encouragement to which duty follows, so shall we fulfil the law of Christ; that is, the law of love the moral law, which enjoins us to love our neighbour as ourselves. But why is this called the law, of Christ, when it was long before Christ; yea, before Moses, and as old as Adam himself, being part of the law of nature, which was written in Adam's heart before there was any written bible? I answer, the law of love is very properly called the law of Christ; because he revived it, rescued it, recommended and enforced it, frequently urged it upon his followers, and exemplified it in his own life and conversation, therefore called a new commandment, and his commandment: This is my commandment, &c. A new commandment I give you, that ye love one another. St. John xiii. 34. (See the note there) Learn hence, 1. That to have our ear, our heart, and our hand open to our brethren in distress, is a necessary Christian duty: Our ear open to their mournful complaints, our heart open to sympathize with, and mourn over them, our hand open to the relief of their necessities and wants. This is a burden which the law of Christ has laid upon us, Bear ye one another's burdens. 2. To hear a part of our brethren's burdens with a compassionate heart, and helping hand, is a fulfilling of the law of Christ; because much love which is the fulfilling of the law, goes out, and is acted in the bearing of it; so fulfil the law of Christ.

3 For if a man think himself to be something when he is nothing, he deceiveth himself. 4 But let every man prove his own work, and then shall he have rejoicing in himself alone, and not in another 5 For every man shall bear his own burden.

The apostle is still directing the Galatians, and enforcing them to express great lenity and tenderness towards such of their brethren as had fallen into sin and error, and particularly cautions them, 1. To beware of the sin of pride and self conceit, and to abound in the grace of humility and modesty: intimating to us, that pride, and an high opinion of ourselves, are the certain causes of censoriousness and rash judging of others, and the true reason why we despise and glory over an offending brother, instead of pitying him, sympathizing with him, and endeavouring to restore him; He that thinks himself to be something here, is the man that hath proud thoughts of himself, who thinks himself more righteous and holy, more steady and stedfast, than his fallen brother; and conceits he has more power to preserve himself than others; such an one thinks himself to be some great thing; when alas! every man is nothing; and the best of men have nothing but what the grace of God confers upon them, 2 Cor. xii. 11. 2. How the apostle strikes at the root of the forementioned sin of pride and self conceit; namely, the comparing of themselves with those who are worse than themselves, which is very apt to stir up pride and arrogancy; to cure which he directs them to compare themselves with those who are better than themselves, and to try and prove their own works by the rule of the word of God, and not by the example and practice of others; and so shall they find matter of rejoicing in themselves, in the testimony of God, and the silent applause of their own consciences, without borrowing matter of rejoicing from the failings and infirmities of other persons. 3. The argument or motive used by the apostle to enforce upon every man the duty of trying his own work, rather than prying into the infirmities of others; because when he cometh to judgment, every man must bear his own burden, or give an account of himself and his own actions to God; who will then absolve or condemn men, not as they have done better or worse than others, but as they shall be then found in themselves, absolutely considered. It is a great error for any man to measure himself by the measure of other men either by their perfections, or by their imperfections. To conclude our estate safe, because we are not so bad as others, or unsafe, because we have not attained to the perfections of others, is alike dangerous; God will not proceed by this rule, no more should we; every man that appears before him, shall bear his own burden, and answer for his own sin. Here note, 1. That how light soever men make of sin in the commission of it, it will be found heavy and burdensome when they come before God to account for it; He shall bear his own burden. 2. That the righteous God, in the great judgment, will call no man to account for the sins of others, unless he has some ways been accessory to them; but every one shall bear his own burden, both of guilt and punishment.

6 ¶ Let him that is taught in the word, communicate unto him that teach, in all good things.

In this and the following verses our apostle enters upon a new exhortation, and that is, to stir up the Galatians to liberality and beneficence, upon every fitting occasion, to be ready to distribute, willing to communicate, and to do good unto all men. And because it is highly probable, that by reason of the prevalence of error amongst them, and the number of false teachers found with them, that the Galatians' love to the word, and to the ministers and dispenser of it, was grown cold; he first begins to stir up their liberality towards their teachers, saying, Let him that is taught in the word of the gospel, communicate unto him that teacheth in all such good things as he stands in need of. Learn hence, 1. That the wisdom of God hath seen it fit to teach men by the ministry of man, not by his own immediate voice;

voice; this we cannot bear; nor by the glorious angels, these would rather terrify than teach us; but by men like ourselves doth the great God instruct us: He has appointed some to teach, and obliged others to be taught; but the pride of man is grown to that pitch in our days, that almost every one thinks himself sufficient to teach, and few have humility enough to be taught. 2. That it is the special duty of ministers not only to teach, but to teach the word: Let him that is taught in the word, that is, the written word, as dictated by the Holy Ghost, communicate unto him that teacheth, in all good things. Our business is not to go into the pulpit, and read a lecture to our people out of Aristotle's ethics, or Seneca's morals, much less to load them with the burden of unwritten traditions, but to make known a crucified Saviour to them, and the way to eternal salvation by him. 3. That seeing the ministers of Christ are to give themselves wholly to the work of teaching, &c. without being entangled with the affairs of this life; the people whom they teach, and amongst whom they spend their time and strength, are obliged by common equity, as well as by the command of God, to allow them a comfortable subsistence; and, if able, an honourable maintenance. Let him that is taught, communicate to him that teacheth in all good things. 4. The church's maintenance, is only due to such ministers as are apt to teach, that labour in the word themselves: None have a right to the church's salary, which do not perform the church's service. Let such laymen as by their impropriations take away the vicar's bread, and such clergymen as eat the sweat of their curate's brow, consider how they will answer it at the bar of God.

7 Be not deceived. God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. 8 For he that soweth to his flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption: but he that soweth to the Spirit, shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting.

Here the apostle offers several arguments to consideration, for exciting them to the forementioned duty of liberality and Christian beneficence in general, and to the ministers of the word in particular; and the first of them is taken from God's omniscience, who takes notice of all the petty and pitiful pretences, pleas, and excuses, which men make, why cannot they be so kind as they would be to the ministers and members of Jesus Christ. Alas! their own wants are many (but it is their lusts that make them so); their burdens are great upon them, and they must provide and take care of themselves. But, says the apostle, though you may, with these lying pretences, cheat yourselves, and mock your ministers and poor neighbours, yet God is not, will not, cannot be mocked. There is no juggling with God, no deceiving of his eye; man never deceives himself so much, as when he thinks to deceive God in the least: Man may be mocked and deceived by man, but God can never be mocked by man. Observe, 1. St. Paul compares charity and Christian bounty, to seed sown, and assures us, that the crop we reap shall be answerable, both in quality and kind, and also in measure and degree, to the seed we now sow; Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. Learn, That every man's harvest hereafter, shall be according to his seed-time here. The actions of this life, are as seed sown for the life to come; if the husbandman sow tares, he must not expect to reap wheat: For whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. Observe, 2. How the apostle doth amplify in particular, what he had asserted in general; namely, that such as the seed is, such will the harvest be: He that soweth to the flesh, that is, plainly, he that spends his substance upon his lusts, seeking no more than the gratification of his sensual desires, shall reap corruption; that is, a perishing satisfaction only at present, and eternal perdition afterwards: But he that soweth to the Spirit, he that improves his estate for God, for the support of his gospel, for the sustenance of his members, shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting. The Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead, will also raise us up at the great day, and reward our present parting with the things of this world, which we cannot keep, with eternal life, which we shall never lose.

9 ¶ And let us not be weary in well doing: for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not. 10 As we have therefore opportunity let us do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith.

The holy apostle, in these words, exhorts the Galatians, and in them all Christians, to the practice of one of the most important parts and duties of the Christian religion, namely, that of doing good one to another: And he doth not barely excite us to the duty, but he exhorts us also to an unwearied diligence in the doing of it, according to our ability and opportunity. In the exhortation before us, observe, 1. The grand comprehensive duty we are exhorted to, well-doing, and an unwearied diligence therein. This comprehends all those ways and means whereby we may be beneficial and useful one to another, both to soul and body, in spiritual and temporal good things, and promote both the present comfort and future happiness of each other. 2. The extent and latitude of the duty, with respect to its object, which is all mankind: Let us do good unto all. The Galatians were in danger of Judaizing in their practice, as well as in their doctrines; that is, of loving none but themselves, and their own countrymen: For the Jews were grown so sour and churlish in their temper, that they would not do the least office of kindness to any that was not of their own nation: Therefore, St. Paul here exhorts them to extend their charity universally to all and every one that is of the same nature with themselves. 3. The special and particular objects of our charity, the household of faith: Do good to all, but especially to them. By the household of faith, as appears by the context, ver. 6. are primarily meant the ministers of God, the teachers of his word; these are God's domestic servants. Wherever there has been a people, there has been a religion professed, such as it was; wherever there has been a religion professed there have been persons consecrated and set apart to attend the service of that religion, and a maintenance provided for those attendants: It was so by God's appointment under the law, and by Christ's under the gospel, 1 Cor. ix. 14. But farther, by the household of faith, we are to understand the whole collective body of believing Christians, all the members of Christ's mystical body; such are very dear to God, and ought to be so to us. 4. The subject of this duty, or whom it doth eminently concern, all Christians: As we have opportunity, let us do good; that is, every one of us; for verily there is no condition in the world so mean and despicable, but it yields persons an opportunity one way or other of doing good, if not by their purse, yet at least by their prayers, and by their example. 5. The frequency of the duty, As we have opportunity; that is, as often as the occasions of doing good are presented to us, and as long as ability for doing good is found with us. Some men defer doing good till they come to die, till they come to make their will, that unwilling will in which they give God a small pittance of his own, because they can keep it no longer; they will repent when they are dying, and be charitable after they are dead. Good God! how unwilling are men to part with either their money or their sins, as long as they can keep them! But verily a death-bed charity may be as unavailing as death-bed repentance. The rule is, As we have opportunity; that is, as often as an opportunity is offered: Let us decline no opportunity by getting out of the way, with some, when a work of charity presents itself unto us. 6. The measure of this duty, as we have ability, let us do good unto all; that is, proportionably to what God has given us, let us be willing to give to others: God could easily level the world, and give every man alike, but he is pleased to give some more than others, on purpose to try their graces, the charity and bounty of the rich, the faith and patience of the poor. And verily an estate above what sufficeth our occasions and necessities, is no farther a blessing to us, than as it puts an opportunity into our hands of doing more good than others. 7. An unwearied perseverance in doing good required at our hands, Let us not be weary in well doing; though we have done much good, there is room for more; new objects will appear, new occasions will arise, new opportunities will present themselves unto us. Let us never think we can do enough, much less too much good; the best of beings are most unwearied in well doing. God, Christ, the holy angels, are never weary of this blessed work; let us never be weary in imitating them in that which is their highest and their chiefest excellency and perfection. 8. The argument and encouragement to the cheerful discharge of this duty, in due season we shall reap, if we faint not; that is, sooner or later, either in this world or in the next, or in both, we shall certainly reap the reward of well doing. We shall reap, but what? Ans. We shall reap the blessing of God upon all we have, are, and do; we shall reap the benefit and blessing of their prayers, to whom we extend our charity; we shall reap the highest pleasure and satisfaction in our own minds of doing good, with which no sensual pleasure can be compared. The reflections upon any good we have done, is a perpetual spring of peace and pleasure to us; the thoughts of it lie even and easy in our minds, and the remembrance of it refreshes the soul with a strange kind of delight and joy. But, Lord! what tongue can utter, or what heart conceive, that vast and unspeakable reward, which an unwearied diligence in well doing will meet with in the other world? It will plead for us at the day of judgment, and procure at the hands of a merciful God, for the rich merits of our Lord Jesus Christ, a glorious recompence at the resurrection of the just: And proportionable to the degrees of our charity, will be the dispensations of this reward. From the whole learn, 1. That great are the obligations which all Christians do lie under of doing good one to another, according to their abilities and opportunities. 2. That great is the reward of well doing, which Christians may eye as a motive to an unwearied diligence, and unfainting perseverance in well doing.

It is very probable, that St. Paul ordinarily did only dictate, and that some other person wrote his epistles, as that to the Romans, wrote by Tertius, Rom. xvi. 22. Sometimes he only wrote the salutation, and subscribed the epistle with his own hand, as 1 Cor. xvi. 22. but here he tells the Galatians, that he wrote this epistle to them all with his own hand, having never wrote so large an epistle wholly with his own hand to any church, as he did to them. This he did for two reasons, (1.) To testify the fervency of his own affections towards them, and to insinuate how much he loved them. (2.) To evidence the sincerity of his endeavours for their present and future happiness: To accomplish these ends, he judged no pains too great. From whence learn, 1. That the faithful ministers of Christ will stick at no pains, but encounter with all difficulties, to advance the good of souls in general, and to reduce an erroneous and wandering people in particular to the obedience of the gospel. Thus, this great apostle, though he had upon him the care of the churches, and consequently a multiplicity of business, many vocations, and a multitude of distractions; yet, in order to the reclaiming of these Galatians, who were deeply tinctured with error, as well as dangerously tainted with sin, he redeems time for, and undergoes the fatigue and trouble of writing this whole epistle to them with his own hand; Ye see how large a letter I have written unto you with mine own hand. 2. That it neither favours of pride nor vain glory in the ministers of the gospel, if upon occasion, though sparingly, they make known to the world the great pains they have taken for promoting the good of their people, that so they may be excited the more to bring forth fruit answerable to the cost and culture which the ministers of Christ have expended upon them: St. Paul here sticks not to tell the Galatians, and the whole world, the pains he had been at in writing this large epistle with his own hand to them; yet it was not to commend himself, but to excite and encourage them.

12 As many as desire to make a fair shew in the flesh, they constrain you to be circumcised: only lest they should suffer persecution for the cross of Christ. 13 For neither they themselves who are circumcised keep the law; but desire to have you circumcised, that they may glory in your flesh.

Here our apostle returns to the description which he had before given of the false apostles, who, though they urged the necessity of circumcision, yet it was not with any fincerity of intention: It was, first, to make a fair shew in the flesh; that is, to make a fair outward shew of religion, an high pretence to holiness, by observing circumcision, and the other abrogated rites of the ceremonial law: And secondly, This pretended zeal of theirs proceeded from pusillanimity and fear, lest they should suffer persecution from the Jews, for preaching the doctrine of the gospel, called here, the cross of Christ, because it treats of a crucified Christ. Now the fury of these persecutors was abated towards those that preached up circumcision, but enraged abundantly against those who preached circumcision down. Note farther, How well the apostle makes good his charge against these false apostles, the Judaizing doctors, that they urged the necessity of circumcision insincerely, and for base ends; namely, because they made no conscience to keep the law themselves but could dispense with circumcision well enough, if they were amongst their friends, but pleaded for it when in fear of their persecuting enemies: Thus they became all things to all men, but it was to save themselves. And, lastly, He assures them, that they urged circumcision upon them, that they might glory in their flesh; that is, might pride themselves, that you were become their converts, by being circumcised at their persuasion, and be able to boast of the multitudes of their proselytes, who received circumcision at their instigation, and carried it as a mark of their instruction. Learn hence, 1. That deligning hypocrites do constantly pretend high to religion, but they evermore seek themselves, under pretence of acting for God and his glory; they that constrain you to be circumcised, make a fair shew in the flesh. 2. That though it is our duty to eschew persecution when we can fairly avoid it, yet we must not part with the least iota of truth, or espouse the smallest error, to avoid the sharpest persecution: they constrain you to be circumcised, lest they should suffer persecution. 3. That men who talk loud of religion, and pretend high to it, who preach it to, and press it upon others, but do not conscientiously practise it themselves, it is an evident demonstration that they are men of corrupt minds, of profligate consciences, that do not believe themselves; for he only believes what he says, that lives as he doth believe: Neither they themselves who are circumcised, says the apostle, keep the law. 4. That there is nothing which false teachers and erroneous seducers do so much glory of, magnify themselves by, and pride themselves in, as in the number of their proselytes and converts, which they look upon as so many trophies of their victory, and speaking proofs of their unparalleled abilities.

14 But God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world.

Having shewn what it was that the false apostles gloried in, he next shews what it was that he himself gloried in; namely, in the cross of Christ; that is, in his preaching Christ crucified, and the necessity of faith in him, who died as a sacrifice upon the cross. The cross of Christ is taken three ways in scripture, materially, metaphorically, and metonymically; the material cross of Christ, is that which he died upon at Jerusalem: This the church of Rome glories in greatly, but not the apostle. The metaphorical cross of Christ, is afflictions, Luke, chap. ix. ver. 28. Let him take up the cross, that is, submit to any afflictions: God oft-times sanctifies this cross, for the crucifying the hearts of his people to the world: But the cross of Christ is taken metonymically for the gospel, the doctrine of the gospel, or of him that died upon the cross. Now, Christianity, or the doctrine of the gospel, crucifies us to the world: First, by discovering to us the great vanity and emptiness of the world, and all the perishing satisfactions of it: Secondly, By propounding such arguments to crucify the world, as were never heard of from all the philosophers and wise men that ever lived in the world; namely, arguments taken from the glory of God, from the death of Christ, from the dignity of the soul, &c. Learn hence That such a Christian as doth experimentally fix his heart and affections daily more and more crucified to the world, by the cross of Christ, has unspeakable cause and reason sufficient for spiritual glorying and rejoicing. Quest. Wherein consists not our crucifixion to the world? Ans. It consists not in a vile esteem of the world, as useless or hurtful, or in casting off all care and concern for the things of the world, as sinful and unnecessary; nor is every degree of desire after, love unto, or delight in the things of this world, inconsistent with our being crucified to it; nor doth it consist in, or oblige us to the withdrawing of ourselves from all society and conversation with the men of the world: But, positively, crucifixion to the world, consists in a crucified judgment and opinion of the world; in crucifying our love and our affections to the world; in crucifying our hopes and expectations from the world; in crucifying our care and concern for the world; in crucifying our delight in, and our endeavours after the world. Quest. How doth a Christian's being crucified to the world, afford him cause for unspeakable rejoicings? Ans. Thus: We may, and ought to glory in the blessed effect and fruit of Christ's death, in re-instamping the image of God upon the soul, in the certain tokens of the love of God: We may glory in the death of Christ's enemy, and our soul's enemy: We may glory in that wherein God is glorified, and in that which is the earnest of our own glorification. Now, crucifixion to the world, by the cross of Christ, is this, all this, and therefore warrantably to be boasted of, and gloried in. God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross, &c.

15 For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature.

Here the apostle subjoins a reason why he gloried only in the cross of Christ, and not in those carnal ordinances and fleshly privileges of circumcision, &c. which the false apostles so much gloried in; namely, because circumcision nor uncircumcision, neither the presence of that ordinance, nor the want of it, availeth any thing, as to our acceptance with Christ, and interest in him; but the new creature is all in all; a circumcised heart, not a circumcised fore-skin, a renewed nature, a divine temper of mind rendering us like to Christ: This will enable us to love him, and qualify us for living in him now in Christ Jesus; that is, now under the Christian dispensation, under the oeconomy of the gospel, neither the presence nor absence of this outward badge of circumcision will avail any thing to our justification before God; but that which was signified by circumcision, is the thing that pleaseth God; namely, the renovation of our nature, and becoming new creatures, both in heart and life. Learn hence, That according to the terms of the gospel-covenant, or Christian religion, nothing will avail to our acceptance with God, but the real renovation of our hearts and lives: Nether circumcision availeth, &c.

15 And as many as walk according to this rule, peace be on them and mercy, and upon the Israel of God.

Note here; 1. The nature of Christianity described; it is a walk: Now, a walk is a motion, a free and voluntary motion, an uniform and even motion, it is a progressive motion, and a constant motion. 2. The condition of this walk, and that is regularity, it is a walk by rule; a Christian is not a lawless person, to range and ramble, and run up and down as fancy leads him, but he walks by rule, by the rule of scripture, by the rule of charity. 3. The determination of that rule which a Christian is to walk by, it must be according to this rule. What rule? The foregoing verse declares it is regeneration, and the law of the new creature: as many as walk according to that rule, when the new creature, in the principles and workings of it, is made the ground, the pattern and direction of our obedience, and we frame and square all the actions of our lives according thereunto. 4. The blessed privileges belonging to them that thus walk: Peace be on them, and mercy; that is, there shall be peace and mercy to them; these shall be their portion, nay, they shall be upon them; that is, in a large and plentiful manner vouchsafed to them. Lastly, The honourable mention which the apostle makes of them that thus walk by scripture-rule, according to the law of the new creature, written in the heart; he calls them the true Israel of God, the spiritual seed of Abraham, the children of his faith, which was a thousand times greater privilege than to be the children of his flesh: These are the persons interested in his blessings. Learn hence, That true and inward peace, great and lasting peace, peace with God, and peace with conscience, is the assured portion, and shall be the possession of all and only those who walk according to the law of God, the rule of the creature: As many as walk according to this rule.

17 From henceforth, let no man trouble me: for I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus.

The apostle having thus fully declared the mind of God in the matter controverted betwixt himself and the false apostles, touching the necessity of circumcision; he now makes use of his apostolic authority, and charges his adversaries to give him no farther trouble or disturbance, either by gainfaying his doctrine, or detracting from his authority; because he bare in his body the marks of his sufferings for Christ Jesus, namely, the stripes and wounds which he patiently received for the sake of Christ, and his holy religion, 2 Cor. xi. 23. Learn hence, That whatever hard measure we meet with for the sake of Christ, what wounds and marks we receive for professing faith in him, and persevering in obedience to him, he will own them for his own, and give us leave to look upon them as his own, yea, to call them his own, as our apostle did here: I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus.

18 Brethren, the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit. Amen.

Here our apostle closes his epistle with his accustomed valediction, most affectionately praying that the grace and favour of Christ, in the sweet effects of it, and in the sensible apprehension of it, might remain in their souls, to enlighten, sanctify, comfort, and quicken them more and more, that from thence they might derive and draw abiding consolation, both in life and death. Amen.

E P H E S I A N S.

St. Paul having planted a famous church at Ephesus, which was the metropolis or chief city in Asia, where he had preached the gospel for three years with eminent success, and being now a prisoner at Rome, he justly feared lest they should faint in their Christian course: and accordingly to prevent it, he writes this epistle to the churches of Christ in and about Ephesus, to establish them in the faith he had preached to them, which he was now a prisoner for, and stood ready to seal with his own blood.

And here the good providence of God towards St. Paul and them is very remarkable, that though he was now a prisoner at Rome, yet not so close as to be denied pen and paper: God gave him favour in the sight of the keeper, and having work for him to do in prison, provides a keeper for his turn.

St. Paul is no sooner Nero's prisoner, but he falls a preaching and writing too. Happy was it for Onesimus that St. Paul was sent to goal, where he was begotten in his bonds by the preaching of the gospel; and as happy was it for the Ephesians too, unto whom he wrote this excellent epistle, that they might be the more comforted and confirmed. The devil had better have let Paul alone, than thus imprisoned him: For no sooner was he committed, but he falls both a preaching and writing; at which the gates of Satan's kingdom fly open, and sinners come forth, to his sorrow and shame. There are no such ways to be even with the devil and his instruments, for all their spite and malice against us as by doing all the good we possibly can wherever we come.

This excellent epistle divinely sets forth the great and astonishing mysteries of our redemption and reconciliation by Jesus Christ; the freeness and riches of God's grace; the admirable benefits and privileges of the gospel; the marvellous dispensation of God to the Gentiles, in revealing Christ unto them.

The principal parts of this epistle are two, doctrinal, and practical. The former is contained in the three first chapters, in which he treats of the sublime privileges of our election, vocation, justification and adoption; the latter in the three last chapters, in which he exhorts them to constancy in the faith, to preparation for, and patience under suffering, and to live religiously in every relation, by making conscience of relative duties one towards another, as husbands and wives, parents and children, masters and servants, in which the life and beauty of religion lies; and so closes and shuts up the epistle, wishing them all peace and prosperity, and a mutual increase of love and charity, and advising them to manifest the sincerity of their love to Christ, by the purity and incorruptness of their lives and conversations.

C H A P. I.

PAUL an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God to the Saints which are at Ephesus, and to the faithful in Christ Jesus:

Note here 1. The penman of this epistle described by his name, Paul; by his office an apostle; by his commission to that office, the will of God; that is, by the command and appointment of God. It is a matter of great consolation to the ministers of Christ, as well as great satisfaction to their people, that their calling is from God, and not from themselves; that they speak not in their own names, but by commission received from Christ, whose ambassadors they are. 2. The superscription of this epistle, the persons to whom it was directed and sent, To the saints at Ephesus: So they were all at Ephesus by visible profession, and many of them, no doubt, by real sanctification. All the members of the visible church are obliged to be saints, and the true and real Christian is a true and real saint: He adds, And to the faithful in Christ Jesus, throughout all Asia. This pointed out their duty to them, to be not only holy in profession, but faithful in conversation; these two words saints and faithful, conjoined, denote both their dignity and their duty; their dignity, in standing near to God, as his children; their duty, in being faithful to him as his servants. Lastly, He styles them saints and faithful in Christ Jesus; intimating, that all our grace and holiness must be holiness in Christ Jesus; that is, acted and exercised by strength fetched from Christ Jesus, and that all our holiness must be accepted in Christ Jesus.

2 Grace be to you, and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

These words may be considered two ways: (1.) As a religious salutation, taken from the manner of the Jews, who expressed their desires for one another's well-doing, by wishing peace, that is, all kind of happiness and prosperity to each other: Christianity doth neither forbid or abolish, but doth spiritualize and improve civility, humanity, and common courtesy. (2.) The words may be considered as an apostolical benediction, in imitation of the priest's blessing, Numb. vi. The apostles were the patriarchs or spiritual fathers of the church of the New Testament, as the sons of Jacob were of the Old; accordingly they bless their church, wishing grace from God the Father, or grace from God as a Father; thereby denoting, that God bestows not his grace as a Creator but as a Father in Christ, in a discriminating way and peculiar manner: And peace from our Lord Jesus Christ: he being the purchaser of our peace, he upon whom the chastisement of our peace was laid, and he that made peace for us by the blood of his cross; and thereupon God of his free grace accepts us, justifies us, and is at peace with us. Learn, That such as have received most grace from God, stand in farther need of supplies of grace from him; they are thankful for peace, but they cannot content themselves with peace without grace; they desire both to have the heart and love of God set upon them, as well as pacified towards them; they desire to be pardoned, but above all, seek to be beloved of the Father.

3 Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ.

Observe here, 1. The work which the heart of the apostle was set upon, and that is, the work of blessing God; we bless God one way, he blesses us another; he blesses us imperatoriously, by commanding his blessings upon us; we bless him optatively, when with thankful hearts we praise him, when we wish well to him, and speak well of him. Lord, what an infinite favour and privilege is this vouchsafed to us, not only to pray to God and receive blessings from him, but to admit us to bless him, and to account himself honoured by us, when we acknowledge him the fountain of all blessings, and blessedness to us his creatures! 2. The title under which our apostle blesseth him, namely, as the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. He doth not say now under the gospel, as of old under the law,

Blessed be the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob; or, Blessed be the Lord God of Israel; but, Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. Where note, 1. He is a God to Christ, in relation to his being man: Christ being fore-ordained before the foundation of the world, to the work and office of a mediator, 1 Pet. i. 20. and the Father making a covenant or federal transaction with him from all eternity as Mediator. 2. He is a Father to Christ, and that both as God and man: a Father to him as God, by eternal and ineffable generation, the one being Deus dignens, the other Deus genitus; thus he was the only begotten Son of the Father; and a Father to him as man, by virtue of the personal union of the two natures in Christ, Luke i. 32. Therefore that holy thing shall be called the Son of God. Observe 3. The reason why under these relations he so affectionately blessed God, namely, for bestowing blessings, spiritual blessings, all spiritual blessings; and this is in or concerning heavenly things, which tend to fit us for heaven and eternal glory: And, lastly, All these things are conferred upon us in Christ; he, by his merit had purchased them: he, as our Head and Advocate, in our name, has received them, by virtue of our union with whom we have a right unto them, and shall ere long in heaven be fully and finally possessed of them. Behold here the transcendent bounty and liberality of our heavenly father: He has more than one blessing for his children, he has all spiritual and heavenly blessings for them, grace on earth, and glory in heaven; grace, to enable them to glorify him upon earth, and glory, as the reward of grace with himself in heaven. Rejoice, O Christian, in thy lot and portion; God himself hath but all things, and so hast thou: Has he all spiritual blessings in heaven in full possession? Thou hast them also in right and title at present, and ere long shall enjoy them in full fruition.

4 ¶ According as he hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy and without blame before him in love:

Our apostle having, in the former verse, offered up a very solemn thanksgiving to God, for blessing the Ephesians with all spiritual blessings in heavenly things in Christ, he comes in this verse to discover and declare the fountain from whence all these spiritual blessings did proceed and flow, namely, from God's gracious purpose in our election before all time: He hath chosen us in him before the foundation of the world, that we should be holy, &c. Where observe, The favour vouchsafed, election; and the fruit and product of that favour, holiness of life and conversation. Note, 1. The favour and privilege vouchsafed by God, He hath chosen us: This denotes the freeness of the favour; he chose when he might have refused; His book of life is a book of love, the cause of our love is the object, the reason of God's love is in himself. 2. The subject of this favour, He hath chosen us, us Gentiles: The Jews much gloried in their being a chosen generation, a peculiar people: we Gentiles are a chosen generation also: they were beloved for their father's sake, Abraham's; we for Christ's sake. 3. The antiquity of this favour, before the foundation of the world, that is, from all eternity. The apostle to take the Jews off from boasting, as they did, that the world was made for their sake, and that the Messiah from the beginning of the world did enter into a covenant with God to redeem them especially, declares, that the despised Gentiles were elected and chosen by God to be an holy people to himself; and all this, in the purpose of God, before the foundations of the world were laid. 4. God is said to have chosen us in Christ, as our head. Consider Christ as God, so we are chosen by him: I know whom I have chosen, says Christ: Consider him as a Mediator, so we are chosen in him, not chosen for him; because, not Christ's undertaking for us, but the Father's good pleasure towards us, was the spring and fontal cause of our election. The truth is, God was so far from chusing the Gentiles out of faith foreseen, that he did not chuse them for the sake and obedience of Christ foreseen: God did not love us from eternity, because Christ was to die for us in time, but because he loved us with an everlasting love; therefore, in the fullness of time, Christ was sent to die for us: So that the death of Christ was the fruit and effect, but not the cause of our election: No other reason, says Bishop Fell upon the place, can be assigned of this privilege, but the good pleasure of God; and if Christ's sufferings were not the cause of our election, much less our own deservings, as he adds there; almighty God not chusing us because worthy, but to make us worthy by chusing us. 5. The effect and fruit, the benefit and end of this free and ancient favour, that we should be holy, and without blame before him in love. (1.) Holiness is here declared not to be the cause, but the effect of our election: God chose the Gentiles from eternity to be his people, not because they were holy, they were far enough from that, being afar off from God, but designing that they thus graciously chosen should be holy; initially, progressively, and perseveringly holy in this life, and perfectly holy in the next: Yet arriving at such a perfection here in holiness, as to demonstrate us blameless in the account of God, by virtue of our faith in Christ, and love to one another. From the whole, learn, 1. That God's bestowing all spiritual blessings upon us in time, is the effect and fruit of his electing love from all eternity; He hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings, according as he hath chosen us in Christ before the foundation of the world. 2. That God hath chosen none to happiness and glory hereafter, but only such as are holy in conversation here, holy in the habitual frame and disposition of their hearts, and in the general course and tenour of their lives and actions. 3. That such as are holy before God, will endeavour to walk unblameable in the sight of man, in the exercise of love, and in the practice of all the duties of the second table, which are at once evidences of our sincerity, and an ornament to our profession.

5 Having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ to himself, according to the good pleasure of his will, 6 ¶ To the praise of the glory of his grace, wherein he hath made us accepted in the Beloved:

That is, "Having predestinated us Gentiles, who in the esteem of the Jews were accounted dogs, to be thus adopted sons and daughters, in and by Jesus Christ, in whom he hath made us accepted, to the abundant praise and glory of his free grace and mercy." Observe here, 1. That none are the children of God by nature; none are born sons, but made sons; not of their own, but God's making; and in order to this glorious privilege, we were predestinated unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ. 2. The attribute mentioned here by the apostle, which moved God to predestinate us to the adoption of children; it was the glory of his grace; he mentions not the glory of his holiness, the glory of his justice, or the glory of his power; because the glory of his power is manifested in making of the world, the glory of his holiness in making of his law, the glory of his justice in turning the transgressors of that law into hell; but his grace he shews no where so much as in the predestination of his children, and in what he hath predestinated them unto; he sheweth indeed all his attributes herein, but grace over and above all the rest. 3. The effect and fruit of this privilege, namely, of our being predestinated to the adoption of children, and that is, our being made accepted in Christ the Beloved; the word is properly rendered, he hath made us dear, precious and delightful to himself: or, in one word, he hath ingratiated us. Here note, That as Jesus Christ is in an eminent manner beloved of God, and accepted with him, so, in like manner, all God's adopted children do, and shall find favour with God, and acceptance through Christ.

7 In whom we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace;

Our apostle having, in the foregoing verses, enumerated the great and glorious privileges which the children of God were made partakers of before all time, comes next to discover what they are admitted to the participation of in time: And here in this verse he mentions two of them, namely, redemption, and remission of sin; in whom we have redemption through his blood, &c. Here note, the privilege itself, redemption; the Redeemer, Jesus Christ in whom; the price of this redemption paid down, his blood; one fruit of this redemption instanced in for all the rest, the forgiveness of sin; and, lastly, the spring or source of all this, the riches of his grace. Learn, 1. The deplorable state into which the whole race of mankind was brought by sin, namely, an estate of slavery and bondage, and spiritual captivity unto sin; redemption supposes this: Slaves and captives need a Redeemer, none else; we are all by nature under slavery to sin, to Satan, and the curse of the law, and the wrath of God. 2. That there was no delivery to be had from this slavery, but by a price paid down to the justice of God; redemption is a delivery by ransom and price. 3. That no other price did, or could redeem us from our miserable captivity, but the blood of Christ; we have redemption through his blood. 4. That all believers, and only they, have remission of their sins, through the redemption purchased for them by the blood of Christ. 5. That God's free grace, and Christ's full satisfaction, do stand well together in the work of redemption and remission of sin: True, God had a satisfaction from the hand of our Surety, Christ Jesus; but was it not free free grace and rich mercy in God, to accept of a Surety and a Substitution, when the rigour of the law required none, and would admit of none, but demanded that the soul which sinned should die? Was it not free mercy, not only to accept a Surety, but to provide a Surety for us, as God did, and this Surety his own Son? And to deliver up this Son to a painful, shameful, and accursed death, that we might have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace?

8 Wherein he hath abounded toward us in all wisdom and prudence, 9 Having made known unto us the mystery of his will, according to his good pleasure, which he hath proposed in himself :

That is, in which dispensation of his, namely, our redemption from sin and wrath by the blood of his Son, God the Father hath discovered abundant wisdom, wonderful wisdom, riches of divine wisdom, to the children of men. Taking the words in this sense, the observation is, That God's sending his Son into the world to suffer in our stead, and to satisfy for our sin, was not only an act of special grace and peculiar favour, but also an evidence and demonstration of wonderful wisdom in God; he hath abounded toward us in all wisdom; O that wonderful wisdom appeared in the contrivance of the work of redemption, and in the accomplishment of it! What wisdom, in appointing such a Mediator as was fit to reconcile God to man, and man to God! What wisdom, in laying the platform and design of the gospel in such a way and manner, as at once to advance the honour and secure the glory of God, and to promote the holiness and comfort of man! Observe, next, The description which St. Paul gives us of the gospel, and the preaching of it, it is the mystery of God's will revealed and made known to a lost world. Learn, That the gospel's method for recovering and saving lost sinners by a Redeemer, was a mystery, a hidden mystery; it was hid where all the world could never have found it, where angels and men could never discover it; it was hid in God, in his breast and bosom, in his heart and thoughts; it was hid from angels; nay, the churches knew it before the angels; yea, the angels learnt it from the churches, Eph. iii. 10. Unto principalities and powers is known by the church the manifest wisdom of God; and as it was hid from angels, so from the wise men of the world, 1 Cor. ii. 8. We preach the wisdom of God in a mystery, even the hidden wisdom, which none of the princes of this world knew; nay, the gospel was hid from all the saints of the Old Testament, comparatively, not absolutely; with respect to that clear revelation which we have of the gospel now, it may be said to be hidden from them then. O, what obligations then do we lie under, who live under the dispensation of the gospel, to acknowledge what an infinite favour it is from God Clearly to know the mystery of his will, concerning the redemption and salvation of poor lost sinners by a Mediator! God has now revealed it, and he desires all may know and receive the revelation of it, namely, the hidden mystery of his will. Observe, lastly, What was the impelling and moving cause of God's making known the mysteries of his will to a lost world; it was his own good pleasure, which he had proposed in himself; God's making known the mystery of his will by the gospel, and his enlightening the understanding of men savingly to apprehend it, proceeds entirely from the purpose and pleasure of his own good will.

10 That in the dispensation of the fulness of times he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth, even in him.

These words discover to us the end and design of God, in making known the mystery of his will, that is, in revealing the gospel; it was to gather in one universal church both angels and men, Jews and Gentiles, under Christ their Head, and by virtue of that union to become one with the Father, as he and Christ are one. Here note, 1. That Christ is the head both of angels and men; an Head of confirmation to the angels, of redemption to fallen man; both angels and saints in heaven and on earth make up one family, of which Christ is the Head: the angels are a part of the worshippers of Christ as well as we, they are a part of his family and household; the angels fill our churches as well as men, and are present in our congregations and assemblies, 1 Cor. xi. 10. 2. That all mankind by nature, and as considered in themselves, are under a fearful dispensation or scattering: Sin hath rent and separated them from God, from man, and from the blessed angels; Gathering together presupposes a foregoing scattering. 3. That the purpose and design of God, in discovering the truths of the gospel unto men, was this; that he might gather them together into union with Jesus Christ; that by virtue of that union they might be one with the Father, as He and Christ are one; That in the fulness of time he might gather together in one body in Christ all things capable of eternal happiness, both in heaven and earth; even in him, who is the Head of that body, whereof angels as well as men are members.

11 ¶ In whom also we have obtained an inheritance, being predestinated according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will: 12 That we should be to the praise of his glory, who first trusted in Christ.

Our apostle having hitherto spoken of the glorious privileges of the gospel in general, he comes now to make application of this his doctrine, first to the Jews, and next to the Gentiles in particular. As to the Jews, who were first called by Christ and his apostles, and who were the first that trusted or hoped in Christ for salvation, before there was any considerable number of converts among the Gentiles, he declares, that these Jewish believers, whereof himself was one, had, in and through Christ, obtained a right to be God's portion and peculiar people; and that they should not, by embracing the gospel, lose that ancient privilege which their forefathers so mightily boasted of, and gloried in; namely, to be a chosen generation, and a peculiar people; but together with their being God's portion, they should have right to an inheritance: In whom we have obtained an inheritance; namely, an inheritance in the Heavenly Canaan, the inheritance of the saints in light; and

and to this inheritance, says he, you have been appointed, God having fore-ordained that this inheritance should be the portion of all believers, and the consequent of faith in Christ, by virtue of which we become the sons of God, and all this to the praise of his own glory; that is, to the intent that his glorious attributes of wisdom, goodness, and mercy, might be acknowledged, and highly praised. Learn hence, 1. That to be called to faith, and brought to believe in Christ, before others, is a favour and special prerogative, which some persons have above all others: We who first believed in Christ. It is an high honour above all others to be in Christ before others. Rom. xvi. 7. We were in Christ before me. 2. That as all believers are God's portion, and the lot of his inheritance, so they do obtain from him right and title to a lot and share in an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in the heavens for them; We have obtained an inheritance. 3. That Jesus Christ the Mediator is that person, in, by, and through whom believers are instituted to this inheritance; In whom we have obtained an inheritance. Christ hath purchased this inheritance for them; he has promised it to them; he has already taken, and still keeps possession of it for them; and he will put them into the full and final possession of it at the great day. 4. That the great end and design of God, in all the distinguishing favours and benefits which by Jesus Christ we obtain from him, is this, That we should be to the praise of his glory. The words may be understood, (1.) Passively; the praise of his glory was to be manifested in them. (2.) Actively; that the high praises of God were to be set forth by them.

13 In whom ye also trusted after that ye heard the word of truth, the gospel of your salvation: in whom also after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that holy Spirit of promise, 14 Which is the earnest of our inheritance, until the redemption of the purchased possession, until the praise of his glory.

Here the apostle recounts the favours and privileges which the Gentiles, as well as the Jews, upon their believing Christ were admitted to the participation of: He assures them, that in and through Christ they had obtained a right to this heavenly inheritance also, as well as the Jews, having been brought to trust and believe in him, by hearing the word of truth, the doctrine of the gospel, preached to them: And next, that they were sealed for the children of God, by the sanctifying Spirit promised to the sons of God, which produced a real renovating change in their hearts and lives, and so was a pledge and earnest of, as well as made them meet and fit for the heavenly inheritance; the full enjoyment of which is not to be expected till the last day, when, and not before, all believers shall obtain complete redemption, and their bodies being raised, shall be reunited to their souls, and both rendered perfectly and everlastingly happy. The end of God, in all this dispensation of grace and mercy to the Gentiles, being the same with that before-mentioned to the Jews; namely, the praise of his own glorious grace. Here observe 1. That both the Gentiles and Jews are saved by the same faith and trust in Christ; In whom ye also trusted; as they have the same common inheritance, so have they the same common assiance and faith in Christ. 2. That the faith of the Gentiles came by hearing of the word: In whom ye also trusted, after ye heard the word, &c. that is, presently after they heard, they believed and obeyed: Col. i. 6. Ye obeyed from the first day that we preached the gospel. What a shame and reproach is this to those amongst us, who have heard the gospel preached all their days, yet never did believe or obey the gospel? 3. A double encomium which the apostle gives the gospel by which these Gentile Ephesians were converted: he calls it, (1.) The word of truth; that is, a word of the most eminent and excellent truth. There is no truth that ever God swore to, but the truth of the gospel. The law is truth as well as the gospel, but the law was made without an oath; had it been made with an oath, it had never been recalled; the gospel is sealed with an oath, and therefore shall never be reversed. (2.) He calls it the gospel of salvation, and the gospel of their (the Ephesians) salvation. It is called a gospel of salvation, because the matter of it is salvation, because the offer of it is salvation; and it declares the only way and means by which lost sinners may obtain salvation; and the gospel of their salvation, because God had, by his Holy Spirit, made the preaching of this gospel effectual for their conversion and salvation. Observe, 4. The privilege which the Ephesian Gentiles obtained, after they had by faith consented to this gospel of salvation, and that was their sealing: After ye believed, ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise. Where, note. That the privilege of sealing always follows the duty of believing, never goes before it. Sealing, doth imply that precious and excellent esteem which they have with God: Nothing but what is precious is sealed by us: Who seals up dung and pebbles in a bag? Believers are God's jewels, his treasure, therefore sealed. Sealing also is for safety and security, for discrimination, and for confirmation. The Holy Spirit, by sanctifying of us, doth discriminate and distinguish us from the rest of the world, doth secure and preserve us from the fatal danger of a ruinous apostacy and doth also confirm our hopes of the glorious inheritance. 5. That the Holy Spirit is given to believers in the nature of an earnest; sanctifying grace, wrought in the heart here, is a sure earnest of glory hereafter, which is the earnest of our inheritance. An earnest binds the bargain, and is a part of the bargain; if it be but a shilling given as an earnest, it secures a contract for a thousand pounds. Believers are to consider and look upon grace, not barely as grace, but as an earnest of glory. O, be thankful to God for his sanctifying Spirit, not only as subduing thy corruptions, but as a pledge and earnest of a glorious inheritance. It is a great comfort to find grace in the soul, as sanctifying, as quickening and renewing, but a greater matter of rejoicing to find it also there as witnessing, as sealing and confirming, as a part of our inheritance in glory, and as a pledge and earnest of the whole. 6. That the Holy Spirit of God is God. To sanctify, to seal, to confirm our hearts, are divine operations; he that doth these must be a divine person. True; how the Spirit of God is God, and how he proceedeth from the Father and the Son, cannot be comprehended by our reason and shallow understandings. No wonder that the doctrine of the Trinity is inexplicable.

seeing the nature of God is incomprehensible ; our faith, then, must assent to what our reason cannot comprehend, otherwise we can never be Christians. Lastly, Heaven is here called a possession, and a purchased possession ; that is, by the blood of Christ. A king's ransom we account a vast sum ; O, what will our ransom by the blood of the Son of God come to ! Grace is purchased, and glory is purchased, both by the blood of Christ. Lord ! what will that glory come to ! in eternity we shall admire it, but never fully comprehend it.

15 Wherefore I also, after I heard of your faith in the Lord Jesus, and love unto all the saints, 16 Cease not to give thanks for you, making mention of you in my prayers ;

Observe here, 1. The special duties which St. Paul performed on the behalf of these Ephesians, he gave thanks for them, he prayed for them, and both without ceasing ; I cease not to give thanks for you, making mention of you in my prayers. Where note, How enlarged St. Paul's heart was in thankfulness to God for the salvation of others, as well as unwearied in his endeavours in order to their salvation. This will be one great exercise of our grace in heaven ; namely, thankfulness to God for the salvation of others, as well as our own ; and verily, it ought to be a mighty argument to move the heart of any one to work out his own salvation, when he sees another, be it his minister, his parent, his master, or his neighbour, so solicitous for it, and taking such care of it. Note farther, That the duties of prayer and praise, of supplication and thanksgiving, ought to accompany one another : We are never to pray for fresh mercies, either for ourselves or others, without giving thanks to God for former mercies. Besides, there is no such effectual way of begging, as thanksgiving ; he that is spiritually thankful for what he has received, engages God to confer upon him the mercies which he wanteth. Add to this, That holy thankfulness is an evidence of true grace in us : Need and want will make us beggars, but grace only thanksgiving. Observe, 2. The occasion of St. Paul's prayers and praises on the Ephesians' behalf ; namely, his having heard, (1.) Of their faith in Christ : (2.) Of their love to all saints. Where, note, How he joins faith and love together, as the two most eminent graces, and as the two great evangelical commandments, faith in Christ, and love to saints. But how comes he not to make mention of their love to God ? Ans. Because love to God is supposed and necessarily included in our love to saints, as saints ; for he that loves them that are begotten, much more loves him that begetteth ; he that loves the child for the father's sake, loves the father much more for his own sake. Note farther, It is love to saints, as saints, and to all saints without exception, that is, the evidence of true faith ; poor saints as well as rich, weak saints as well as gifted. There are forward and fretful saints, passionate and peevish Christians, who have many infirmities, great infirmities cleaving to them, though disallowed by them ; yet these professing Christians are loved and to be loved by us, even as a brother loveth all his brothers, for his father's sake that begat them all, though one be little, another lame, a third crooked, a fourth sickly. Lord, how far are the professors of this day from the practice of this duty ! How doth a little difference in judgment, occasion a great deal of judging, and rash censuring one another ! Christ hath received us, why should we reject one another : One heaven will hold us all hereafter, why should not one communion hold us here ? Verily, if children quarrel and fall out with one another at a full table, there is an enemy, at their backs that will quickly take away the voider : If our hearts be not turned suddenly to one another, Almighty God will certainly come and smite the earth with a curse.

17 That the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may give unto you the Spirit of wisdom and revelation, in the knowledge of him :

These words give us a short, but a very comprehensive account of that affectionate prayer which St. Paul put up to God on the behalf of these Ephesians, newly converted to Christianity ; in which, note, 1. The person whom he prays unto, God, under a very endearing title, for the strengthening of his faith ; he styles him, not as the Old Testament saints, the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob ; but in the language of the New Testament, The God of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the Father of glory. The God of our Lord Jesus Christ, as he is man and Mediator, commissioned of him, and sent by him : And the Father of glory, as being in himself infinitely glorious ; to whom all glory is and ought to be ascribed, and from whom alone it is communicated. Learn hence, That as all our prayers and request are and ought to be directed unto God only, so in order to our having access to God with assurance in prayer, it is our duty to apply to him as a Father, as a Father in Christ, as a Father in Christ to us, and under this notion and apprehension to strengthen our faith for the obtaining of what we ask in prayer : May the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory give unto you ; &c. Note 2. The great and comprehensive blessing prayed for, namely, divine illumination and spiritual knowledge ; that is, a farther increase of that wisdom and saving knowledge of divine mysteries, whereof the spirit of God is the author. Learn hence, That as spiritual wisdom, or the saving knowledge of divine mysteries, is necessary to a Christian ; so those who have a good measure of this grace already received, ought not to sit down satisfied with it, but aspire after farther measures and degrees of it : Spiritual knowledge is as necessary for increasing grace, as it is for working grace in the soul. Note, 3. The title here given to the holy Spirit of God, he is styled the Spirit of wisdom and revelation : He being the author of all that knowledge in the mysteries of religion which we attain unto, and it being his proper work and office to reveal unto us the will of God for our salvation. Learn hence, 1. That believers themselves, who are divinely enlightened by the Holy Spirit of God, have yet need of farther measures and fuller degrees of spiritual wisdom. 2. That the way to obtain this fuller measure of divine wisdom and spiritual illumination, is to be earnest with God in prayer for his Holy Spirit. So the apostle here.

18 The eyes of your understanding being enlightened lightened; that ye may know what is the hope of his calling, and what the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints.

Our apostle proceeds in this verse, and to the end of the chapter, in a very affectionate and fervent prayer, on the behalf of the Ephesians; namely, that the blessed Spirit of God, the author of all divine illumination, would farther open the eyes of their understanding, formerly shut up in heathenish blindness and darkness, that so they might know, (1.) What is the hope of his calling; that is, what high and glorious hopes he had called them unto; for hope here, is taken for the object of hope, or the great and good things hoped for; and it is said to be the hope of their calling; because, at their conversion from heathenism to christianity, they were entitled to, and called to the expectation of these great and good things, which were the object of hope. Where note, The Ephesians deplorable state before conversion, they were without hope; and the happy exchange of their condition by embracing christianity, they were begotten to a lively hope of glorious things, which before they were wholly ignorant of, and strangers to. As a sinner's misery lies not in what he feels, but what he fears; so a Christian's happiness consists not in what he has in hand, but in what he has in hope: May you know what is the hope of his calling. The second blessing which he prays for on their behalf, is, that he may know what is the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints; that is, say some, what an exceeding glorious thing it is to be a Christian; or, what an exceeding glory redounds to God, by his people, which are his inheritance, say others: But most understand the words as a description of heaven, which is here called an inheritance, a rich inheritance, a glorious inheritance, in or among the saints; that is, the saints in heaven, who hold that in possession, which the saints on earth have in hope and expectation. Learn hence, That heaven is the saints inheritance. An inheritance is an estate that belongs to children, to all such, and none but such. It is an undeserved possession, and it is a sure and certain possession. Here note, That Almighty God is said in scripture, to make heaven as sure to his saints, by all sorts of ways, as a man can make an inheritance sure to his child. It is theirs by promise, it is theirs by purchase, it is theirs by gift, it is theirs by bequest; it is given by will to them, St. Luke xxii. 29. I appoint by will unto you a kingdom. Can any thing be surer, or more ways made secure to any person than this inheritance of heaven is to the holy servants of God? But farther, the apostle calls it the riches of the glory of his inheritance; that is, a very rich and exceeding glorious inheritance; such abundant riches and transcendent glory are found in it, as overwhelm the mind of man, that here enters upon the close contemplation of it. Heaven will appear to be a glorious inheritance, if we consider the glory of the place, the glory of the company, the glory of the employment, and the glory that will be then and there put upon our souls and bodies. Lord, make us meet for this glorious inheritance of thy saints in light!

19 And what is the exceeding greatness of his power to us-ward who believe, according to the working of his mighty power; 20 Which he wrought in Christ when he raised him from the dead,—

The next particular which the apostle prays for, on behalf of the converted Ephesians, is this, that they might know, or sensibly apprehend, the greatness of that divine power, which God had exerted, first, in their conversion; next, in carrying on that work step by step, in spite of all opposition; then in giving them the extraordinary gifts of his Spirit, as miracles, tongues, and prophecy; also, the sanctifying graces of the Spirit, as knowledge, faith, hope, love, joy, and patience, to enable them to go on in suffering for Christ to the uttermost; and, lastly, That they might know the exceeding greatness of that power which God will farther exert towards them as believers, in raising up their dead bodies to enter upon that glorious inheritance which God by promise insured to them; which power, he assures them, would bear some likeness to, and correspond with, that omnipotent power which God put forth, in raising Christ from the dead, and advancing him to the heavenly glory, where he is Lord of all. Observe here, What an heap of words our apostle makes use of, to set forth the power of God in the soul's conversion from the power of sin, and in the body's resurrection from the power of the grave; he calls it, "Power, the power of God, the greatness of his power, and the exceeding greatness of his mighty power, and the power which raised up Christ from the dead." Lord! what a glorious power was that which opened our Redeemer's grave, when he lay in the heart of the earth, with a mighty stone rolled upon his sepulchre! may the same Almighty power break asunder all those bars of unbelief, which keep our souls under the power and dominion of sin now, and at the great day, break in pieces the bars of death and the grave, that it may be altogether impossible for us any longer to be holden by them: For towards thy saints, and in order to their salvation, thou dost engage the uttermost of thine attributes, the uttermost of thy love, and the exceeding greatness of thy power.

—And set him at his own right hand in the heavenly places, 21 Far above all principality and power, and might and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come; 22 And hath put all things under his feet,—

Our apostle, in these words, discovers to us Christ's exaltation, or that glory and dignity, which, after his resurrection and ascension, the Father put upon him as God-man, or Mediator, far surpassing the glory of all created beings. Now, this is represented to us by the notion, and under the metaphor, of Christ's sitting at God's right hand: This imports, (1.) Fullness of rest and pleasure, that he quietly, securely, and everlastingly possesses all that happiness and satisfaction in heaven, which God himself is possessed of, and delighted with, far above all the pleasures and delightful satisfactions, which all the glorified saints and glorious angels do, or can possibly enjoy. (2.) It implies a fullness, of honour and glory, of dignity and respect. When Solomon set Bathsheba at his right-hand, it was in token of honour and respect to her. Heb. ii. 9. we see Jesus to be crowned with glory and honour, sitting down at the right-hand of the Majesty on high. (3.) Christ's sitting at God's right-hand, imports, his having all rule, dominion and power put into his hand, to govern all things, both in heaven, and on earth. (4.) It imports and implies ability to execute that power; all those royal glorious endowments, which God filled the human nature of Christ with, to make him fit to be the supreme Head of his church, and the great and wise Governor of the world; all this doth God's setting Christ at his own right hand import and imply. In the next verse (the 21st.) the apostle expresses more plainly, what he had said in the former verse figuratively; God hath exalted Christ (says he) far above all principalities and powers, might and dominion, and every name that is named; and hath put all things under his feet. Where note, (1.) The eminency; (2.) The universality of our Lord's exaltation. Its eminency appears in the height of his exaltation; he is not only above, but far above, all principalities and powers, and might and dominion; and in the lowness of the subjection of all things to him, having put all things under his feet. And the universality of Christ's exaltation appears, by instancing, in principalities and powers, might and dominion: under which he comprehends all things that are excellent in heaven and earth, angels and men, &c. all creatures whatsoever being placed in a degree of inferiority beneath him, and in the lowest state of subjection under him. Whence we learn, 1. That the human nature of Christ, and his glorified body, by virtue of that unspeakable union between the two natures of Christ, his Godhead and manhood, is so highly dignified and exalted in heaven, that all the glory of heaven and earth, of kings and emperors, of sun, moon, and stars, of the souls of just men made perfect, yea, and of the spotless glorious angels themselves, is nothing to it, nor may be compared with it. Christ sits now in heaven, in our glorified humanity united to his glorious Deity; that body which hung on an ignominious cross in blood and gore, now shines brighter than ten thousand suns in the kingdom of his father. All this honour and homage, glory and praise, dominion and power, is due to our Lord the Redeemer, as the reward of his sufferings: God hath set him at his own right-hand, far above, all principalities and powers. 2. That although the mediatorial kingdom of Christ shall cease at the last day, (and be delivered up by Christ unto his Father) as to the way wherein he now administers it, by ruling in the midst of his enemies, whom he shall then have finally subdued and destroyed; yet his natural kingdom, as God, shall never cease, but continue in the world to come without end. Those words here, not only in this world, but in the world to come, do shew the duration of Christ's kingly government, and that he is king for ever and ever, that his kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and his dominion endureth through eternal ages.

—And gave him to be the head over all things to the church, 23 Which is his body, the fulness of him that filleth all in all.

St. Paul having spoken of Christ's sovereignty in general, over all created beings, both in heaven and earth, in the foregoing verses, doth, in the words before us, declare, that as he is an Head of dominion and authority to the whole creation in general, so he is an Head of influence to his church in particular. Note, Christ was given by the Father to be the church's Head: Now, this metaphor of an head implies several things, As, (1.) Eminency above the church, as the head is above the members. (2.) Authority over the church; the head governs all the members. (3.) Oneness of nature betwixt him and his church: To see an head of one nature, and members of another is monstrous. (4.) It implies a strict intimate and close union betwixt him and his church, as betwixt head and members; which union, as to the members of the visible church, is a political union; but as to the invisible members (real believers) the union betwixt Christ and them is mystical, spiritual, supernatural, and indissoluble. Lastly, This metaphor of an head, given here to Christ, implies a communication of influences from himself unto all his members; an influence of common gifts to the visible members of his body, and an influence of spiritual life and motion to the invisible members, true believers. Indeed, Christ is the head of angels as well as saints, but in different respects; to angels, he is an Head of dominion and government, an Head of authority and superiority: But to his church, he is an Head of dominion and direction also; not only an Head of authority, but an Head of vital influence too: The angels are Christ's honourable subjects, but saints are the mystical members of his body; the former are as the nobles in his kingdom, that attend upon his person, but the latter are the endeared spouse that lies in his bosom. O glorious dignity of the meanest believer above the highest angel! For as the nobles in a prince's court think it a preferment and honour to wait upon his queen, so the glorious angels account it no dishonour to them, to serve and administer to the saints, to which honourable office they are appointed, Heb. i. 14. namely, to be ministering, or serviceable spirits, for the good of them that are the heirs of salvation. As the chiefest servants disdain not to serve the heir, so the angels delight to serve the saints. 2. As the character here given of Christ, the head of his church; so the honourable title put upon the church, she is his body; The head over all the church, which is his body; not his natural, but his mystical body. This implies, (1.) The church's union with Christ, and her relation to him. (2.) The church's receiving influences from him, life, motion, and strength; all which the members of the body receive by virtue of union with their Head. (3.) It implies the duty of subjection and obedience due from the church to Christ, as from the members to the head. (4.) It implies the union and order among the members themselves; that as all the members of the natural body sympathize with, and are subservient to each other, so should all the members of the church, Christ's mystical body, employ their gifts, and improve their functions and offices for the general good of the whole, and the mutual benefit and advantage of each other, as becomes the body of Christ, and members in particular. But especially, the church is said here to be the body of Christ, and He her Head; (1.) With respect to a communication of influences; Christ our head is our fountain of life; our Head is our heart also, out of it are the issues of life; from him we live, by him we move, and our spiritual being is derived from him, strengthened and sustained by him; the whole church receives spiritual life, motion, and strength from Christ, as the body doth from the animating and enlivening soul. (2.) Christ is called here, the head of the church, his body, with respect to a complication of interest, as well as a communication of influences. As the head and the body, as the husband and the wife, so Christ and his church are mutually concerned for each other; they stand and fall, live and die together; whatsoever he has, is theirs; they have nothing but through him, they have all things in him, and by him; his God is their God, his Father is their Father; his blood, his bowels, his merit, his spirit, his life, his death is theirs; and as all that he has is his church's, so all that he did is for his church, called here, his body. He obeyed as his church's Head; he died as her Head; he rose, ascended, and reigneth as her Head, and hath in his church's name, taken possession of heaven, as a purchased inheritance for her. How fitly then may Christ be called the Head of the church, and the church be called the body of Christ? 3. How Christ came to be the Head of his church. God the Father gave him this authority, ver. 22. And gave him to be the Head over all things to the church; that dignity and superiority, that dominion and power which Christ has over his church, is given to him by God the Father; none else was fit for it but himself; and although it was due unto himself, yet it must be given him. Now, if Christ did not exercise any authority over the church till it was given him, what bold presumption is it, and will it be, in any person upon earth to assume any power over, or to exercise any office in the church, when never called to it, nor authorized by Christ to undertake it? We may demand of such confident undertakers, as the Pharisees demanded of the holy and humble Jesus, By what authority dost thou do these things? and who gave thee this authority? 4. The high honour which is put upon the church by being Christ's body, by this she becomes Christ's fulness, The church which is his body, the fulness of him. Yet note, The church is not the fulness of Christ personal, but of Christ mystical; not of his natural, but mystical body; every saint, and every degree of grace in a saint, is part of Christ's fulness. The work of the ministry then, is the best and noblest work in the world, because it is an adding to the fulness of Christ. God had but one Son in the world, and he made him a minister: And if increasing the number of converts, and adding to persons' growth in grace, be an addition to Christ's fulness, then how glorious a sight will the great day afford, when Christ shall have all his fulness; when there shall not be one saint wanting, nor one degree of grace in any saint wanting; when head and members shall be both full, full of grace, full of joy, full of glory; when Christ shall be fully glorified in his saints, and they everlastingly filled with the fulness of him that filleth all in all. 5. The glorious title here given to our Lord Jesus Christ, as Head of his church: He filleth all in all; he filleth all persons, both angels and men: he filleth all places, heaven with glory, earth with grace, hell with horror; he filleth all ordinances, prayer with prevalency, preaching with efficacy, &c. he filleth all relations, fathers with paternal affections, mothers with maternal bowels;

he fills all conditions, riches with thankfulness, poverty with contentment.

C H A P. II.

AND you hath he quickened who were dead in trespasses and sins.

Note here, 1. The deplorable condition which the Ephesians were in by nature, and all persons with them, before their conversion from sin to God. It is a state of spiritual death; the natural and unregenerate man is a dead man, spiritually dead in sin: Our apostle doth not say they were in a dying, but in a dead condition; not half dead, but altogether dead. But how so? Not dead as to natural actions, they can eat and drink; not as to rational actions, they can reason and discourse: not as to civil actions, they can buy and sell, bargain and trade: Nor is the natural man dead to moral actions; he can pray, read and hear the word, meditate upon it, and discourse of it; if he pleases, he can hearken to the voice of God's judgments, consider and call his own ways to remembrance; but as to spiritual acts, to be spiritually performed, here he is dead, till quickened by a vital act of the Holy Spirit, whose office is to enlighten blind eyes, and whose delight it is to quicken and enliven dead souls. But what doth this state of spiritual life imply? Ans. It doth suppose and imply a state of separation from God, insensible of that dismal state, an impotency and inability to recover ourselves out of that condition, and our loathsomeness and offensiveness to Almighty God, whilst we continue in it. In short, every unregenerate man is a dead man, in a double sense: He is, (1.) Legally dead, being under the condemnatory sentence of the law: we call a man under a legal sentence of death, a dead man. (2.) Spiritually dead, as being destitute of a principle of spiritual life, a quickening principle to enable the soul to perform spiritual operations. Thus before regeneration are we dead, in opposition to justification; and dead in opposition to sanctification also; and the fatal instrument, by which our souls die, is here discovered, dead in or by trespass and sins. This is the sword that kills souls, and cuts them off from God: you hath he quickened, being dead in trespass and sins. Note, 2. The choice and singular privilege and favour vouchsafed to the Ephesians, in and under the power of spiritual death: They were quickened, that is, made spiritually alive, by the quickening or life-giving power of the Spirit of God. A regenerate man is a living man; he lives a life of justification, which consists in pardon of sin: A condemned man's pardon is his life; and he lives a life of sanctification, having received from the holy Spirit a vital principle of grace in all the powers and faculties of the soul: justification reconciles God to us, sanctification reconciles us to God; justification takes away the legal enmity, sanctification the natural enmity between God and us. Here observe, That the person who is spiritually quickened, is universally quickened; there is not a faculty in the soul but is spiritually dead, and therefore not a faculty in the soul but is spiritually quickened: As there is an universal pollution in every faculty, so must there be an universal renovation; for no duty can be performed without it, no spiritual privilege can be enjoyed without it, and we can never be saved hereafter, if not spiritually quickened here : But if quickened aright, we live a divine life, the life (in some measure) which God himself lives ; and this must needs be an excellent life and a pleasant life here on earth, and shall be an everlasting life with Christ in heaven ! Whosoever loveth, and believeth in me, shall never die. Note 3. The person quickening described, you hath he quickened ; that is, God the Father, who, chap. i. 17. is said to have given them the spirit of wisdom and revelation, in the knowledge of himself : Man, in his natural state considered, is unable of himself to quicken himself ; he doth not so much as desire the quickening grace of God, till God gives the grace of desire. Alas ! the understanding is naturally so blind, the heart so hard, and the will so stout and stubborn, that none but a divine power can enlighten the one, and efficaciously incline the other : It is a change of stone into flesh ; of a dead sinner into a living saint. A change from nature to grace requires as much, or more of divine power, than a change from grace to glory. To see a creature naturally filthy, now to delight in purity ; to see a sinner, that by nature drinks in iniquity like water, now thirsting after righteousness ; to see a man that loathed the holy law, and holy ways of God, now longing to walk in them, and come to an exact conformity to God in them : These acts are above nature, contrary to nature, and consequently the God of Grace is the author of them : you hath he quickened.

2 Wherein in time past ye walked according to the course of this world, according to the prince of the power of the air, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience :

Our apostle having in the former verse described the Ephesians by their natural state and inward condition, as dead in trespass and sins, doth in this verse set forth their misery in respect of their outward conversation ; they walked in, and made a constant trade of sin : Wherein in time past ye walked according to the course of this world, &c. Note, 1. Their constant and continued course of life, set forth by walking, a metaphor frequently used in scripture, to set forth the tenour of a person's conversation ; wherein that is, in which sins in time past ye walked. 2. The path in which they walked, in sins and trespasses ; this denotes the abundance of sin that was in them, and committed by them with facility and ease, with satisfaction and delight : Walking is a motion, a voluntary motion, a progressive motion, a pleasant and delightful motion ; it is natural to men whilst unregenerate, to walk in sin with some sort of delight and pleasure ; but alas ! it is the pleasure of the beast, and not of the man, a sensual, and not a rational satisfaction. 3. The guides which they are said here to follow, the world and Satan. (1.) The world ; that is, the corrupt course and sinful customs of the men of the world according to the time and place in which they live ; for though the world alters in the course and fashion of it, from time to time, yet it is, and ever will be the world still ; and the unregenerate part of mankind will always walk according to the course of this world. The second guide which the Ephesians followed, was Satan, styled here a prince ; in regard of that mighty power which he has in and over the men of the world ; and the prince of the power of the air, because he exercises his power (by God's permission, in the lower regions of the air : All the elements and meteors stoop to his direction ; when God gives him leave, he can command the fire, the water, the winds, the thunders ; all these powers that are in the air he can command, therefore he is called their prince ; yet here is matter of comfort to us, Satan is the prince of the air only : If so, when the air shall cease, his kingdom shall cease ; when the world is ended, his dominion and power is ended. Again, there is farther comfort in this, Satan is prince of the air, but Christ is prince of heaven and earth, and the air too ; both our prayers whilst we live, and our souls when we die, pass through the air, but Satan can neither intercept the one, nor stop the other, in their passage thither ; Christ, when he ascended into heaven, went through the air, this kingdom of devils, and spoiled their principalities and powers ; he entered heaven in the sight of them all, and led them all captives in triumph at his chariot, so that they shall never hurt the souls of his people, nor ever keep them from heaven. Again, the devil is here described by the influence he has upon the minds of sinners, he works in the children of disobedience. Satan's way of working in and upon obstinate and impenitent sinners, is very powerful and efficacious. Hence it is here said, (1.) That they are led by Satan, they walk according to the prince of the power of the air ; that is, according to his guidance, according to his mind and will. He has them at his beck : He says to one sinner, Go, and he goeth ; and to another, Come, and he cometh. (2.) They are excited and assisted by Satan, he works in them, and suggests evil thoughts to them : He filled the heart of Ananias and Sapphira to lie unto the Holy Ghost ; he put a lie first into their hearts, and then into their mouths. Now from hence we may infer, that the Holy Spirit of God doth also inwardly work in pious persons, enabling them to will and to do, according to his own good pleasure : For it is unreasonable to conceive, that the evil spirit should have more power over the children of disobedience, in whom he dwells, than the good Spirit has in those pious persons, in whose hearts he is said to dwell : Surely the Spirit of God doth more to the saving of souls, than the devil can do to the damning of them.

3 Among whom also we all had our conversation in times past in the lusts of our flesh, fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind ; and were by nature the children of wrath, even as others.

Our apostle, in these words, is supposed to set forth the condition of the Jews by nature, as he had done before of the Gentiles ; and that he declares, that even they had their conversation amongst the number of disobedient persons, and were no less obstinately rebellious against God, than the disobedient Gentiles, following the motions of their corrupt lusts and vile affections : Nay, he affirms roundly, concerning himself and all the Jews, without exception, and as their way and course, whilst unregenerate, they did whatsoever their corrupt minds willed, liked, and inclined to ; and as to their state, were by nature the children of wrath, as much as others: yea, even as much as the despised Gentiles were. Here note, 1. The case of all men, Jews and Gentiles, alike described, children of wrath: that is, our estate and course is such by nature as deserves destruction, as tends to, and will end in destruction, without the renewing grace of God. 2. The rise of this case, expressed by nature, which implies, (1.) The term from which this cominences, namely, from the first receiving of our beings and natures from our immediate parents, and together with the depravation of our natures, we received an obnoxiousness to the wrath and curse of God. (2.) It implies the ground for which this wrath doth impend and hang over us, namely, for that depravity of nature, which since the fall is found with us. Learn hence, 1. That original corruption is universal to all mankind, both Jew and Gentile. 2. That this original corruption leads to, and will lodge under eternal wrath, every person in whom regeneration and transplantation into Christ are not found.

4 But God, who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us, 5 ¶ Even when we were dead in sins hath quickened us together with Christ, (by grace ye are saved;)

St. Paul having set forth that miserable state, which both Jews and Gentiles were in by nature, namely, dead in sins, and children of wrath: he doth next set forth their deliverance from that woeful estate, by the rich mercy and free grace of God: God, who is rich in mercy, &c. Here note, 1. The author of our deliverance, God, and the moving or impulsive cause of it, rich mercy and great love. Where observe, That God hath done more for us, infinitely more than he did for the angels: He shewed love to them, but mercy to us; they are vessels of honour, but we are vessels of mercy; the object of mercy, is a creature in distress and misery. Note, farther, That all the attributes in God are subjected to his love; this is the great prevailing attribute which sways all the rest; which way love goes, all attributes go; mercy, power, justice, and wisdom, they all work in subordination to love, they are all at love's beck, and love sets them all on work for the good and benefit of the object loved. Note 3. That the love which God bears to the children of men, is a great love; and the mercy which was set on work by it, is rich mercy; his love so great, that it can never be expressed; his mercy so rich, that it can never be conceived; rich mercy, is abundant mercy, inconceivable mercy, inexhaustable mercy, sure mercy. 4. The blessed effects and fruits of this great love and rich mercy in God towards the Ephesians, in quickening them when dead, in saving them when lost, in doing all things for them when they had undone themselves; God who is rich in mercy—even when we were dead in sins, hath quickened us together with Christ. Learn hence, That poor lost sinners do stand in need of all the riches of mercy that are in God, in order to their regeneration and salvation; if ever we be saved, it is the riches of mercy that must save us. Note, 5. How the apostle ascribes the whole work of their salvation to God's free grace, in opposition to any merit or worth in the persons to be saved; by grace ye are saved. Learn hence, That the dependency our salvation has in the whole, and in all the parts of it, upon the free grace of God, is the great thing which St. Paul delighted to discover and make known to us here.

6 And hath raised us up together, and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus:

The apostle here instances in two branches more of that salvation, which he had in the foregoing verse affirmed to be of grace, namely, that of our resurrection and glorification, both which are yet to come, and yet they are spoken of as already past; when the Father raised and glorified Christ, all believers were raised and glorified in him; for in his resurrection and glorification, he did not sustain the quality of a public person, representing his whole church, as their head and husband; and accordingly, believers are and may be said to be raised already, and glorified already, not in their own persons, but in Christ their Head; the apostle says, God has raised us up, and has made us sit together; not he shall raise us, and will make us sit; to denote the dependency which our resurrection and glorification has upon Christ's, as the effects depend upon the cause, and also the undoubted certainty that they shall come to pass; Christ's resurrection and glorification being a pledge of ours. Learn hence, 1. That Christ rose from the dead, and ascended up into heaven, not as a private person, but as the common head and parent, root and representative of his church and people; so that what he has done, they may be said to have done; they rose in him, and are set down in heaven in him; and blessed be God for the well-grounded hopes, that as we sit now together in Christ, so ere long we shall for ever sit together with Christ. 2. That Jesus Christ is the cause of our resurrection and glorification; he is the efficient cause, the meritorious cause, and exemplary cause of our resurrection and glorification. 3. From the phrase here used of sitting, and of sitting together in Christ; that believers shall certainly partake of the same kingly state and dignity, of the same honour and glory, of the same delight and pleasure, of the same rest and tranquility, of the same safety and security with Christ in heaven.

7 That in the ages to come he might shew the exceeding riches of his grace, in his kindness towards us through Christ Jesus.

These words are expressive of the final cause or special end of that salvation which God propounded in his gracious workings upon the hearts of these Ephesians, namely, that in all present and succeeding ages, to the end of the world, he might give a convincing proof and example of the exceeding riches of his grace, for the encouragement of the greatest sinners to hope for mercy in and through our Lord Jesus Christ. Learn hence, That the instances and examples of God's mercy, grace, and goodness, love and kindness towards lost sinners, in one age, are and ought to be an encouragement to future generations to hope in the same mercy, to draw nigh to the same fountain of rich grace, for pardon of sin, and salvation by Christ. O! when we consider that others are as unworthy as ourselves (these Ephesians, for instance) have been admitted to the participation of such divine favours, Lord, what encouragement is it to us, and to others, to venture our salvation upon upon the same grace! Verily, the primitive Christians were intended by God as patterns of grace to succeeding Christians; nay, God did not only design them as patterns, but as pledges, that he would go on as he had begun, in after-ages to magnify the riches of his grace, in the conversion of the vilest and worst of sinners.

8 For by grace are ye saved, through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God: 9 Not of works, least any man should boast.

In these words our apostle informs the Ephesians, and in them all succeeding Christians, that their complete salvation, from the first to the last, from the lowest to the highest step, depends upon God's free favour and grace in Christ, and not upon any merit or desert in ourselves; works having no meritorious or casual influence upon our salvation (for they are not causes, but effects of that grace by which we are saved) to the intent that all boasting may be excluded, and that all the faints glorying may be in God, and not in themselves. Note here 1. That believers are saved already, in some sense; not only because they have salvation begun in their new birth here, but they have already a right and title to, yea, a pledge and an earnest of complete salvation: Believers are saved here. 2. That the believer's salvation is through faith in Jesus Christ. 3. That by faith and through which they are said to be saved, is not of themselves, it is the gift of God; faith is the gift of God as well as Jesus Christ, and the one as necessary as the other; for as the only way to heaven is by Christ, so the only way to Christ is by faith; as sin has put a vanity into the creature, so unbelief puts a vanity in Christ, that he should profit us nothing: Wrestle we then with God in prayer for a believing heart.

10 ¶ For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them.

Our apostle having, in the foregoing verses, asserted the whole of our salvation to be of grace, and not of works, left by magnifying of grace he should seem wholly to set aside good works, and the necessity of a holy life; he declares in this verse, that Christians are ordained to them, created and prepared for them, and consequently they are effects flowing from grace, though not causes producing grace: We are his workmanship: (1.) In our natural capacity, as men: (2.) In our civil capacity, as such or such men, high or low, rich or poor: (3.) In our spiritual capacity, as saints; this is intended here: Believers are God's workmanship, as such, by supernatural renovation and spiritual regeneration; they are not only once made, as other persons, but they are new made, as saints; not by receiving new faculties, but new qualities; for grace is not a substantial, but a qualitative change. Lord, as we are all thy workmanship by natural creation, let us be so by gracious renovation likewise! Created in Christ Jesus unto good works. Observe here 1. The manner of this workmanship, created; this denotes two things: (1.) That in their new making, they were intended to good works; this was God's mind and meaning, in fore-ordaining that they should walk in them: (2.) That in their new making they were fitted and prepared for good works, therefore did they receive a new nature from God, new principles new affections, new dispositions and inclinations, on purpose to fit them for an holy life, fruitful in good works. Here note, That as good works are antecedently necessary to salvation, so renewing grace is absolutely necessary to good works; therefore, before there can be any good work, there must be a good workman, and that good workman must be God's workmanship, created a new through the power of God. Observe, 2. The meritorious cause of this spiritual workmanship, and that is Christ Jesus: We are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus; that is, through the intervening mediation of Christ Jesus. The life which we live in this new creation state, namely, a life of holiness, it is purchased by his death, produced by his Spirit; all spiritual life comes from God, through Christ as a Mediator; he is a quickening Head and life-giving Spirit; 1 John. iv. 9. God sent his Son, that we might live by him; Christ is first our Ransom; and then the fountain of life unto our souls, created in Christ Jesus. 3. The final cause of this divine workmanship, and that is, to good works: All those that are new creatures are created unto good works; so that a holy life is the necessary fruit of their new creation: New creatures are not to live idly, much less to live wickedly, but to make conscience of every duty, to bring forth fruit of piety towards God, of righteousness towards our neighbour, of love and universal charity towards all mankind; which God hath before ordained that we shall walk in them; that is, God hath before prepared these works for us, and also prepared us for them; he has prepared these works for us, first by his decree and purpose; he has ordained the end, salvation, hath appointed good works as the means thereto, by his precept and command: Mic. vi. 8. He hath shewed thee, O man, what is good, &c. And as God hath prepared these works for us, so hath he prepared us for them by his holy Spirit, making our hearts fit for our work, by enlightening our minds, and inclining our wills. Learn hence, That new creatures are both ordained and obliged to, and also fitted and prepared for good works; God will have his children distinguished from others by the good they do, as well as the devil's children are characterized by the mischief which they do. Observe, lastly, The constancy of the Christian's duty declared; with reference to good works; he is to walk in them. Now walking denotes and implies both a way and action. Walking, (1.) It implies a way; and intimates plainly to us, that good works are the way and means to obtain salvation: We can never come at heaven as the end, but by walking in the path of good works as the way and means. (2.) An action; walking denotes spontaneity in the principle, progress and perseverance in the motion; he that walks, goes forward, gets ground, gives not over till he comes to his journey's end. A good man is as diligent and zealous, as constant and persevering in good works, as if he were to be saved for them and by them; and at the same time relies by faith on the merits of the Mediator for his acceptance with God, renouncing all confidence in his own good works; he knows they cannot justify themselves, much less can they justify him, who has

has a better righteousness than that of his best obedience, to denominate him righteous in the sight of God. Thus are we God's workmanship, created in Christ Jesus, &c.

11 Wherefore remember that ye, being in times passed Gentiles in the flesh, who are called Uncircumcision by that which is called the Circumcision in the flesh made by hands; 12 That at that time ye were without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world:

Our apostle doth two things in these two verses: Observe

1. He calls upon the Ephesians to remember their former miserable condition before conversion, when they were in their heathen and unregenerate state, when they were Gentiles, and reproached by the Jews for being uncircumcised, and looked upon by the Jews as dogs; he calls upon them here, to remember their obligations to God, for bringing them out of this miserable state and deplorable condition: Remember that in times past ye were Gentiles in the flesh.

Learn hence, That believers, remembering and calling to mind the sin they were guilty of, and the misery they were exposed to, in their natural and unregenerate state, may many ways be of singular use and advantage to them, and be spiritually improved by them; namely, thus, (1.) To excite us to magnify the greatness of God's love, and to admire the freeness and riches of his grace: This we shall certainly do, when we remember that where sin abounded, grace did much more abound. (2.) To inflame our love that much was forgiven her. (3.) To increase our godly sorrow for sin; then shall they be confounded when they remember that I am pacified towards them for all their abominations, Ezek. xvi. 63. (4.) To quicken us up to greater zeal and industry for God: It was the remembrance of what Paul was before conversion, that fired him with holy zeal, and carried him forth with such vigour and industry after his conversion, that he laboured more abundantly than all the apostles. (5.) The remembrance how bad we were ourselves before conversion, will be a special mean to keep up our hearts, in hopes of, in prayers for, and endeavours after the conversion of others, though very bad at present: What they are, that thou once wert; and what thou art, that they may also be. Observe, 2.

That as St. Paul does put the Ephesians in mind of their former miserable condition, in their heathenish and unregenerate state; so he does particularize the same, and branch it forth into its distinct parts and members. When they were unconverted Gentiles, (1.) They were without Christ; that is, without the knowledge of Christ, without any relation to him, or interest in him, without any union and communion with him, without any communications of life and light, of grace and holiness, of joy and comfort, of pardon and protection, received from him: They did not discern any excellency, nor taste any sweetness in Christ; and consequently had no love to him, no longings after him, no delight or satisfaction in him. Ah, miserable condition of a Christless soul! if thou art without Christ, thou art without the spirit and grace of Christ to enlighten thee, to quicken thee, to sanctify and save thee. (2.) They were aliens from the commonwealth of Israel; that is, they were no members of Christ's church, either visible or invisible; they did not so much as profess themselves to be a people that stood in any relation to God; they were unchurched Gentiles; for in the Jewry only was God known, and his name great in Israel, Psal. lxxvi. 1. Verily, whatever the world thinks of it, it is a very great favour from God, to be born within the pale of the visible church, and to have communion with her; for thereby we partake of many excellent privileges, namely, the word and sacraments, the communion of saints, together with the offers of Christ, and salvation by him. (3.) They were strangers for which reason it is here by the apostle called covenants, to the covenant of promise; that is, to the covenant of grace, first made with Adam after the fall, then with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, afterwards with Israel upon mount Sinai; in the plural number, though it was always one and the same covenant in substance; and its being called the covenants of promise, seems to point at the promise made to Adam, Gen. iii. 15. that first grand original promise, of which promise all the following promises were but branches, or more full explanations. Now the Ephesians are here said to be strangers to the covenants of promise; because, as Gentiles, this covenant was never revealed to them, nor any offer of it made by the ministry of the word, and consequently they could have no actual interest in the blessings and privileges of it. This intimates to us that for men to live and die without an offer of the covenant of grace made unto them, is a woeful, sad and dangerous condition, because their salvation is rendered in an ordinary way impossible, so far as the terms upon which salvation may be had, are concealed from them. (4.) They were without hope; that is, they were without the grace of hope, and without the means of hope; they were without hopes of redemption, without hopes of pardon and reconciliation, and consequently without any well-grounded hope of eternal life and salvation: Such as are Christless, must be hopeless; such as are without faith, must needs be without hope; and such as are without the promise, must necessarily be without faith; for the promise is the ground of faith, and faith is the ground of hope. Learn, That for a person to be without a well-grounded hope of future happiness, is a very deplorable state and condition; but all such as are without the pale of the Christian church, without the bond of the covenant of grace, without the offer of a Saviour in the gospel, they must be without hope, even in this life, and so are of all men most miserable. (5.) They were without God in the world; that is, without the knowledge of the true God, without worshipping of him as God, without any assiance or trust in him, without performing any obedience to him: Not that the Ephesians, and other heathens, lived without all sense of a deity, for they worshipped false gods abundantly; but they lived without any sense or sensible apprehension of the majesty and holiness of the true God: Now this is to live without God in the world; and verily, such a life is worse than death. The apostle calls all the Gentiles, not only the barbarous and savage, but the best polished and civilized nations, atheists, because they wanted the right knowledge of God by and through a Mediator; there is no knowing God acceptably, except we know him in Christ, and approach unto him by Christ. In this affecting manner doth our apostle set before the Ephesians their dark and dismal state whilst Gentiles, and before brought into the Christian church, by preaching the gospel of Christ unto them; "they were without Christ, aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world." God grant that every unregenerate sinner may think of it, till his heart and soul are affected with it!

15 But now in Christ Jesus, ye, who sometimes were afar off, are made nigh by the blood of Christ.

The apostle having set before the Ephesians the black and dark part of their lives, before their conversion to Christianity, in the foregoing verse; comes here in this to acquaint them with the blessed change which was made in their state, and by whom. Now, says he, in or by Christ Jesus, ye, who were sometimes afar off, namely, From Christ, his church, his covenant, from saving hope, and from God himself, are made as nigh as the Jews, and have as much right to expect the aforesaid benefits as they, the blood of Christ having purchased them for you, and sealed them for you: Ye, that were before afar off, are now made nigh by the blood of Christ. Where note, That persons who are most remote, and at the farthest distance from God, are sometimes unexpectedly brought home unto him; Ye, who were afar off, are now made nigh. Note, 2. That it is owing to the blood of Christ, to his death and sufferings, that any soul is brought into a state of nearness unto God, and finds acceptance with him: Ye are made nigh by the blood of Christ.

14 For he is our peace, who hath made both one, and hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us, 15 (Having abolished in his flesh, the enmity, even the law of commandments, contained in ordinances, for to make in himself of twain one new man, so making peace;

He is our peace; that is, (1.) He is the Mediator of our peace, the great peace-maker betwixt God and man. (2.) He is our peace; that is, the purchaser of our peace. (3.) He is our peace; that is, the establisher of our peace. All which is to be understood, not only of peace betwixt God and man, but also betwixt man and man: who hath made both one; that is, both Jews and Gentiles one church. Here note, That there was a very great and deep-rooted enmity betwixt Jews and Gentiles, until Christ purchased the peace and reconciliation. The Jews derided, scorned, and hated the Gentiles, as unclean, compared them to dogs and swine; The Gentiles, they reproached the Jews for circumcising their flesh, esteemed them, of all nations, the worst; and would hold their nose at the Jews when they met them, and cry, O facientes Judei! O ye stinking Jews! and turn away their eyes from them. Learn, from hence then, That the uniting of both Jew and Gentile into one church, was one blessed effect and sweet fruit of the purchase of Christ's blood; Christ's offering of himself was intended as a sacrifice for enmities between man and man as well as for enmities between God and man; He is our peace, who hath made both one. Observe next, What Christ hath done in order to his making peace between Jew and Gentile; (1.) He has abolished the ceremonial law, called here a partition-wall between the Jews and the Gentiles; in allusion, no doubt, to that wall in Solomon's temple, which separated the court of the Jews from that of the Gentiles, that they could never come at, or look at one another. So that this partition-wall being said to be broken down, intimates to us, that Jew and Gentile, who before had two manner of religions, the one in and under a covenant with God, the other afar off, and without God, yet now by Christ are both adopted into the same church, partakers of the same covenants, incorporated into the same faith, intitled to the same glory. (2) Christ has abolished the enmity and perpetual strife which was occasioned between Jew and Gentile, upon the account of the observation of the ceremonial law, and the ordinances thereunto belonging; He hath abolished the enmity; that is, the ceremonial law, which made the enmity between them. The ceremonial law was the cause and continuer of that enmity which was betwixt Jew and Gentile: This is called, the law of commandments contained in ordinances; because Almighty God did actually separate the Jews from all the world, by giving them ordinances and commandments, judicial and ceremonial laws, containing many visible and external observances, which forbade them to communicate with the Gentile world. Now Christ being come in the flesh, all those observances ceased, and those legal ordinances vanished away: All nations become blessed in Christ, and Jews and Gentiles become one church, both alike the people of God, both admitted equally into covenant, and both alike blessed. Here note, That the moral law, summarily comprised and comprehended in the ten commandments, was no part of the partition-wall between Jew and Gentile; nor the death of Christ abrogate this law, or is it at all abolished; but it was the law of ceremonies only, which the sufferings and death of Christ put an end unto; for when he died, they all vanished; as the shadow disappears when the substance is come.

16 And that they might reconcile both unto God one body.) 17 And came and preached peace to you which were afar off, and to them that were nigh. 18 For through him we both have access by one Spirit unto the Father.

Observe, 1. Our apostle had declared in the foregoing verses, that one end of Christ's death was, to make peace between Jew and Gentile; here he assures us, a second end was, to make peace between God and man, that he might reconcile both Jew and Gentile, thus united, to an offended God. This he did by the sacrifice of himself upon the cross, whereby he did destroy that enmity which was betwixt God and man, by undergoing the punishment of sin, the cause of that enmity. Learn hence, That in order to our reconciliation with God and being at peace, with him, a price was paid by Christ upon the cross, to satisfy divine justice and atone divine displeasure. Observe next, That Christ having purchased peace, he came and preached peace to both Jews and Gentiles; to the Gentiles, said here to be afar off, and to the Jews, that were nigh: but how did Christ preach to the Gentiles? Where do we read that he ever did so? Answer, Though he did not in his own person preach peace to the Gentiles, yet he gave commission to the apostles to preach to them, Matt. xxviii. and they and their successors, pursuant to such commission, did preach peace unto them, even to them that were afar off, and them that were nigh. Learn hence, That when the ministers of Christ do come in his name, and by a commission received from him, to preach peace, and offer terms of reconciliation unto lost sinners, it is all one as if Christ himself did come and preach; he expects the same readiness from them in receiving the message, as if it were delivered to them from his own mouth: and will treat the despisers of his ministers, and the contemners of their message, as if the affront were offered immediately to his own person. Observe, 3. The apostle's argument to prove that the Gentiles, as well as the Jews, were effectually called, by the preaching of the gospel, to partake of peace and reconciliation with God; because they had both equal access and liberty to approach unto God in all holy duties, as unto a Father, by the manuduction of the Spirit; through him, that is, through Jesus Christ, we, both Jews and Gentiles, have access, that is, liberty of approach, by one and the same Spirit unto the Father. Learn hence, That through Jesus Christ, all believers, of what denomination soever, have access to God by the Spirit of grace. Question, What doth this access to the Father denote? Answer. It supposes a preceding distance between God and us, both a natural and a moral distance, as creatures, and as sinners: It denotes a propinquity and nearness unto God, in opposition to this distance, and that our approach to God is free and voluntary, friendly, and complacential, peculiar and privilegious, fruitful and advantageous. Question 2. In what respects have believers access to God as to a Father? Answer, In this life they have access to the Father's heart and love, to the Father's ear and audience, to the Father's care and protection; to his providing care, to his guiding and counselling care, to his comforting and supporting care, but especially to his sanctifying care. Quest. 3 Through whom have we this access to God? Answer. Through Jesus Christ, through his mediation and manuduction, we have access to God's heart, to God's ear, to his fatherly care on earth, and to his gracious presence in heaven. Quest. 4. What influence gives the Holy Spirit unto this access unto the Father? Answer. It is by his influence that they are at first brought home to the Father; he prepares them for this access unto the Father; he stirs up holy affections, and enkindles holy desires in them after God, and helps them to make improvement, an holy, fruitful, and advantageous improvement, of all their accesses unto God.

19 Now therefore ye are no more strangers and foreigners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God; 20 And are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone; 21 In whom all the building fitly framed together groweth unto an holy temple in the Lord: 22 In whom ye also are builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit.

Our apostle began this chapter, with setting before the Ephesians the horror and dread of their heathenish state before converted to Christianity; here he closes the chapter with an account of that glorious and blessed state which the christian religion, embraced by them, had translated them into; Now ye are no more strangers, but fellow-citizens, &c. Where observe, 1. Their present happy condition is set forth both negatively and positively; negatively, by shewing what they were not, neither strangers nor foreigners, but freemen and fellow-citizens, &c. Where it must be remembered, that all the nations of the world, except the Jews, were called strangers to the God of Israel, but the Jews were called propinqui, his neighbours, or near-ones; but, says the apostle, there is now no such difference, for the believing Gentiles are equally admitted with the believing Jews to the privileges of the New Jerusalem, and are fellow citizens with one another; they are no longer aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, but freemen. Observe, 2. The apostle sets forth their happy condition positively, under a three-fold similitude; namely, that of a city, that of a household or family, and that of an edifice or building. Note, 1. Our apostle compares the Christian church (of which the Ephesians now were members) to a city; and shews, that themselves, as believing Gentiles, had a right to all the privileges and immunities of that city, as well as the Jews, who accounted themselves the only free members of it: Ye are fellow-citizens with the saints; that is, the patriarchs and prophets, and all other members of the church of the Jews, ye are free denizens, burgeses, and enfranchised citizens with the rest of that holy society; ye are all members of the holy catholic church. Note, 2. Our apostle compares the Christian Church to an household or family, Ye are fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God. Now, this metaphor intimates a greater degree of nearness to, and communion with the church, than what the former metaphor did imply, their being a straiter tie of familiarity and friendship between the members of a family, than between the members of a city. Whence we learn, That the church of Christ under the gospel, in God's great household or family, in a peculiar manner admitted to an intimate communion with him, in a special way provided and cared for by him; and every sincere Christian becomes a member of this blessed family, and enjoys all the privileges there: Ye are fellow-citizens with the saints &c. Note 3. St. Paul proceeds yet farther, and compares the church of Christ to an edifice or stately building, Ye are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, &c. And our apostle calling the church an holy temple, seems to allude to Solomon's temple, which was a type of the Christian church, as the tabernacle was of the Jewish church; the tabernacle was ambulatory and changeable, made of decaying and corruptible materials, and so fitly typified the Jewish dispensation, which was temporary and transient: the temple was made of durable and rich materials, and thereby a proper type of the Christian church, which is called a kingdom that cannot be shaken. But, observe, further, How our apostle doth describe this stately edifice, this spiritual building, the Christian church, these several ways: (1.) By its foundation which it stands upon, namely, the apostles and prophets: that is, upon the doctrine of the prophets and apostles, not upon their persons; Christ himself being the personal foundation and chief corner stone. Learn, That though Christ himself be the builder of, and the chief corner-stone in the church, yet he employs his ministers now, as he did the prophets and apostles of old, to lay the foundation, and carry on the superstructure, and no one apostle had a privilege in this above another; and therefore for the Pope, as St. Peter's successor, to style himself the "Foundation of the Catholic church," is an impudent presumption; for no more is here said of Peter, than is said of all the apostles and prophets. (2.) The church as a spiritual building or temple, is here described by the unity and compactness of its parts, in whom all the building fitly framed together: that is, all the members of the church, are by faith firmly joined to Christ as the foundation, and to one another by love, and their unity is both their strength and their beauty. (3.) This building is described by its growth and perpetual increase, it groweth unto an holy temple. The church groweth two ways, by an addition of new and particular converts, and by an addition of new graces in every particular convert: Where remark, How this spiritual edifice, the church of Christ, differs from all other buildings; both the whole of it, and all the individual parts of it, are endued with life, a life flowing from Christ the foundation, a life far from a state of perfection, in whom all the building groweth, all a Christian's life and spiritual growth flow from his union and communion with Christ; in him all the building groweth. (4.) This building, namely, the Christian church, consisting both of Jews and Gentiles, is here described by the end and design of Christ in erecting this growing edifice; namely, to be an holy temple unto God, wherein now, (as in the material temple of old) he may manifest his gracious presence, and be perpetually worshipped, glorified, and served: The whole church or collective body of believers jointly, and each believer severally and apart, are a spiritual and holy temple unto the Lord, in and by whom all spiritual sacrifices of prayer and praise are offered up, and all the duties of new and sincere obedience acceptably performed.

CHAP. III.

FOR this cause, I Paul the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles;

For this cause, that was, for preaching the gospel to the Gentiles in general; and in particular, for asserting, that the privileges of justification and salvation by Christ, belonged equally to the Gentiles as well as the Jews, though they were not circumcised; for this cause I was persecuted and imprisoned by the Jews. Where note, The apostle styles himself Christ's prisoner, I Paul the prisoner of Jesus Christ: He was at once Christ's prisoner, the Jews prisoner, the Romans prisoner, the Gentiles prisoner: Christ's prisoner, as suffering for his gospel; the Jews prisoner, as suffering by their accusation; the Romans prisoner, as suffering by their sentence; the Gentiles prisoner, as suffering for his labours in order to their salvation. Lord, what a title of honour is here put upon the apostle! I Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ: his imprisonment for Christ was verily a greater honour, and matter of higher glorying, than his rapture into the third heavens.

2 If ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God which is given me to you-ward: 3 How that by revelation he made known unto me the mystery, (as I wrote afore in few words;

Observe here, 1. The title given to the gospel; it is styled the grace of God: partly, because the glad tidings which the gospel brings, are the effect and product of God's grace and favour, and partly because the gospel is the instrument and means of working grace in the souls of persons. 2. The title given to St. Paul's apostleship, he styles it the dispensation of the grace of God: because God had commissioned him to declare and dispense the gospel of grace to them; Christ's ministers are the dispensers of his mind to the children of men. 3. The title here given to the calling of the Gentiles; he styles it a mystery. The calling of the Gentiles to salvation by faith in Christ, without the works of the law, was a mystery hid from ages. 4. The way and manner how St. Paul came by the knowledge of this mystery; it was by divine revelation from heaven: ver. 3. How that by revelation he made known unto me the mystery. The mystery of man's redemption in general, and of the calling of the Gentiles in particular, to the participation of that grace, was made known by divine revelation to the apostles, by God himself. The truth is, the redemption of a lost world, by the incarnation, death, and passion of the Son of God, is so stupendous and surprising, so wonderful and amazing, that the very thoughts of it had been the highest blasphemy, if God himself had not revealed it.

4 Whereby when ye read ye may understand my knowledge in the mystery of Christ) 5 Which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men, as it is now revealed unto his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit: 6 That the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, and of the same body, and partakers of his promise in Christ by the gospel:

Our apostle here proceeds in setting forth this great mystery of man's redemption in general, and the calling of the Gentiles in particular; he styles it a mystery. (1.) Now, a mystery is a purpose and decree of God, unknown to, and unsearchable by, man, unless first by revelation discovered and made known by God himself; such a mystery was the whole gospel in general, and this article concerning the calling of the Gentiles in particular. (2.) St. Paul style styles it a mystery, in other ages of the church not made known, that is, not so plainly and clearly, unto the sons of men, Jews or Gentiles; for the calling of the Gentiles was foretold and prophesied of under the Old Testament, not darkly and obscurely; the time when, the manner how, and the means by which, were not understood till now the holy Spirit of God revealed it to the apostles and evangelical prophets under the New Testament. (3.) The apostle amplifies and sets forth the glorious excellency of that mystery which here he had made mention of; namely, that the Gentiles should have access into the church, with an entrance by the door of circumcision, be joint-heirs of the heavenly inheritance with all believers, and together with the Jews, taken into the bond of the covenant; and finally, that they were brought into this happy estate by the preaching of the gospel, and by believing and obeying of it. Learn hence, That the calling of the neglected and despised Gentiles to the knowledge of Christ, and the participation of gospel privileges with the Jews, was a great mystery, a wisdom to be admired, and a glorious mercy, with all thankfulness to be acknowledged: That the Gentiles, &c.

7 Whereof I was made a minister according to the gift of the grace of God, given unto me by the effectual working of his power. 8 Unto me, who am less than the least of all saints, is this grace given; that I should preach among the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ; 9 And to make all men see what is the fellowship of the mystery which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God, who created all things by Jesus Christ.

As if the apostle had said, "Of this gospel it pleased God to make me a successful minister or dispenser, furnishing me with ordinary and extraordinary gifts and graces from his holy Spirit, for that weighty work and service; unto me, even unto me, I say, was this special favour granted, though unworthy, (being less than the least of all saints, because once a great persecutor) yet unto me was the apostolic office committed, to preach unto the Gentiles the incomparable and incomprehensible riches of God's mercy towards them in Christ, in receiving them fully, freely, and finally, into covenant with himself; and to make known unto all men what is the communion or fellowship of this mystery; namely, that the Gentiles with the Jews should have one faith, one Lord, one hope, one heavenly inheritance; which was a mystery hid in the secret intention and decree of God, until discovered by divine revelation," Observe here, 1. How careful the apostle was to assert his authority and apostolical commission, I was made a minister; and how he refers his calling immediately to the grace of God, unto me was this grace given. It was the grace of God converted him, it was the grace of God revealed the gospel to him, and that called him to reveal it unto others. 2. How the apostle attributes the success of his ministry to the power of God, and not to his own endeavours, by the effectual working of his own power. The grace of God in him, and the power of God accompanying him, was effectual to the conversion of very many sinners, and to the producing of great signs and miracles which were wrought by him. 3. The noble subject of St. Paul's sermons, what it was he preached amongst the Gentiles; namely, the unsearchable riches of Christ: Riches imply abundance, and abundance of such things as are of worth and value; in Christ are riches, all riches, eminently and transcendantly found; riches of grace, and riches of glory; and these are called unsearchable; not as if it were unlawful to search after them, but because after our utmost search after them, we can never fully discover them. Learn hence, That there are such mazes, such mysteries of love and goodness of our Lord Jesus Christ, as, though it be duty to be continually searching after them, yet we can never, by our utmost searching, fully discover them and find them out. 4. The humble and low opinion which this great apostle had of himself; he styles himself, not barely the least, but less than the least of all saints: he was, in his own esteem, as little as he could be, less than the least: a double diminutive; a comparative made of a superlative: Thus he debases himself, upon consideration of his former enmity against Christ and his church; lower he could not lie than he lays himself; the greatest and chiefest of sinners: the least, yea, less than the least of all saints: growth in grace, and increase in humility, accompany one another.

10 To the intent that now unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places might be known by the church the manifold wisdom of God:

Note here, 1. The title given to the holy angels, they are styled principalities and powers, because God makes use of their powerful ministry in governing the kingdoms and principalities of this world; and they are said to be in heavenly places: not as if they were never upon earth below, but because the ordinary place of their residence is heaven above. 2. That the angels are not omniscient and all knowing. The wisdom of God in the work of redemption was a secret unknown to the glorious angels; they did not know it until God made it known unto them. 3. That God did not make the mystery of the gospel, or the glorious work of redemption, known unto the angels immediately, but occasionally; by the revelation of it first to the church, and by the church to them: As if the apostle had said, "Had it not been for the light given to, and spread abroad in the church, the angels had been in the dark about the mysteries of the gospel to this day." By the church is made known unto the angels the manifold wisdom of God." Quest. But how could the church communicate this knowledge to angels? Ans. Either the angels did gather up their knowledge of these mysteries, by the ministry of the apostles preaching them to the world in a way of information, or else they saw, as in a glass, the manifold wisdom of God, and the dispensations of his mercy, grace and goodness towards his church, in a way of contemplation. 4. The title here given to the work of redemption; it is styled, The manifold wisdom of God. O, how full of variety was the wisdom of God in man's recovery! It is of many folds and plaits, manifold in kind, manifold in degree, manifold in its administration; there are manifold secrets in this wisdom, some less perfectly seen, some more perfectly understood, and some that will never perhaps be thoroughly understood: Doubtless, there are some some secrets in the wisdom of God, which it belongs only to God to understand and know. Blessed be God, that so much of the manifold wisdom of God, in the glorious work of redemption, is made known unto us, as will eternally ravish and delight us.

11 According to the eternal purpose which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord: 12 In whom we have boldness and access with confidence by the faith in him. 13 Wherefore I desire that ye faint not at my tribulations for you, which is your glory.

Our apostle here shews, (1.) That whatever the wisdom of God has done in the work of redemption, was from all eternity purposed to be done, and that our Lord Jesus Christ was the person by whom God would in time execute his eternal purpose: According to the eternal purpose which he purposed in Christ Jesus. Next, he shews the great and gracious privileges which all believers are admitted to the participation of, by and through our Lord Jesus Christ; namely, boldness, access and confidence: in whom we have boldness and access with confidence through the faith of him. Access, that is, a liberty of approaching to God as a Father: Boldness, that is, a freedom of speech in delivering our heart, our whole mind and heart, to him, in the duty of prayer and thanksgiving: Confidence, that is, a well grounded persuasion, that both our persons and performances shall find acceptance with God. All which privileges are enjoyed by the exercise of faith in Christ: We have boldness, access, and confidence through the faith of him. Lastly, he exhorts them not to faint under, or be discouraged at his present sufferings, much less to backslide from Christianity upon that account, seeing that his tribulations were both profitable, and also glorious and honourable: I desire that ye faint not at my tribulations for you, which is your glory. Observe here, 1. That new converts to Christianity are subject to faintings and drooping discouragements at the news of sufferings. 2. That persecution for the gospel of Christ, is a trial, not only to these who are under it, but to those who hear of it. St. Paul here was more afraid of the Ephesians fainting under his sufferings, than he was of his own fainting, and therefore he doth carefully guard against it: I desire you not to faint at my tribulations. 3. That the persecutions and afflictions, the hardships and severities, which the ministers of Christ do for the most part endure and undergo, are for the sake of their people; they might shun off and shun the cross as well as other men, did not love to the souls of their people engage them to suffer the sharpest persecution for their sake: I desire ye faint not at my tribulations for you: that is, for preaching the gospel to you. 4. From those words, My tribulations, which is your glory: So honourable it is to suffer, that not only the ministers of Christ themselves, who suffer, are thereby honoured, but the people of their charge also are greatly honoured thereby; in testifying God's high esteem of such a people, in sending his ministers not only to teach and instruct them, but to suffer for them, yea, even to die for them. Which consideration ought not only to prevent our people's fainting at our sufferings, but should make them glory in them, and take encouragement from them: My tribulations, saith St. Paul, is your glory.

14 For this cause I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, 15 Of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named, 16 That he would grant you, according to the riches of his glory, to be strengthened with might by his Spirit in the inner man.

Our apostle having exhorted the Ephesians, in the foregoing verse not to faint at his tribulations for the gospel, here he puts up a most affectionate prayer to God for them on the same account: For this cause, and in order to this end, I bow my knees, &c. Now, in this affectionate and most excellent prayer of the apostle, we have several particulars worthy of our notice and remark. As, 1. The humble gesture which the apostle used in his prayers, I bow my knees, thereby expressing the reverent frame of his heart in prayer. Learn hence, That the gestures which we use in prayer should be such as may best express our reverence of God, and denote our profound humility before him. 2. The person prayed to, God, under an appellation of a Father, and, in particular, as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ: I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. Blessed be God, that believers and Christ have one and the same Father; he by nature, we by grace; he by eternal generation, we by gracious adoption. By virtue of this relation, we may expect to be heard in prayer as Christ was, and to be helped in our distresses, as Christ was, and in God's good time to be possessed of the inheritance of children, as Christ is. 3. The title given to the church, it is styled God's family, his household; all the saints on earth, whether Jews or Gentiles, and all the glorified angels and saints in heaven, do make but one family. There is but one catholic or universal church, comprehending all its members both in heaven and earth; and all within the church are of one kindred and line, descending of one common Father; and this family is named, that is, united under Christ, he being the head of all. 4. The mercy prayed for, ver 16 That he would grant you, according to the riches of his glory, to be strengthened, &c. Where note, 2. The mercy itself, spiritual strength, strength in the inner man, to enable them to bear afflictions, to endure persecutions, to resist temptations, to grapple with all their spiritual enemies in the progress of their Christian course. Note, 2. The fountain from whence all spiritual strength flows, and that is, from the holy Spirit, strengthened with might by his Spirit. It is the holy Spirit of God that constantly renews the believers strength, by upholding and actuating their graces, which otherwise would fade and wither, would languish and die. So many and so mighty are our spiritual enemies that we have to wrestle with, and strive against, that except we be under-propt and strengthened by the Almighty power of the holy Spirit in the inner man, we cannot keep our ground, and much less get ground of our enemy, but shall become an easy prey to every temptation. 3. The moving, impelling, or impulsive cause from whence the foregoing mercy is expected to proceed and flow, namely, from from the rich and glorious mercy of God: God grant you, according to the riches of his glory, to be strengthened. In all our approaches to God for any blessings, especially for spiritual blessings, it is our duty to direct the eye of our faith to that inexhaustible fountain of rich mercy, and almighty power in God, whereby he is both able and willing to bestow upon us whatever is agreeable to his holy will. God grant you, according to the riches of his glory, &c.

17 That Christ may dwell in your hearts by faith; that ye being rooted and grounded in love, 18 May be able to comprehend with all saints, what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height; 19 And to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge, that ye might be filled with all the fulness of God.

Our apostle here proceeds with affectionate ardour to pray for further spiritual blessings on the behalf of his beloved Ephesians: (1.) He prays that Christ may dwell in their hearts by his most holy faith. The phrase of dwelling in us, imports a very close and intimate union between Christ and believers; he dwells in them subjectively and effectually, by his gracious influences, by his powerful assistances, by his quickening impressions. The holy Spirit is the bond of union on Christ's part, and faith on our part. (2.) He prays that they may be rooted and grounded in love; that is, that they might be so deeply possessed with the sense of God's love, that they might find their hearts inflamed with love to God, and one towards another; and that love might be the very habit of souls, and rooted nature in them. (3.) He prays that the Ephesians may comprehend what is the breadth, length, depth, and height of the love of God, and the mysteries of the gospel; intimating to us, that we are not to content ourselves with a superficial view of God's free love in Christ, but to make an accurate inspection into all the dimensions of it; to view it in its breadth, as extending to all ages, Jewish and Christian; in its length, as reaching from eternity to eternity; in its depth, as it stoops down to succour and relieve the vilest and the greatest, if penitent sinners; in its height, whereby it reaches up to heaven, and intitles us to the joy and felicity of the saints above. Verily, the love of God in Christ to a lost world, is so vast and boundless, so rich and matchless, exceeding not only our comprehension, but conceptions also, that not only the natural man cannot understand it, but the renewed man is unable to fathom it, but must be daily endeavouring to take dimensions of it; for the love of Christ surpassingly transcends the knowledge of the most illuminated believer; it surpasses natural knowledge, apostolical knowledge, yea, angelical knowledge; that ye may be able to comprehend with all saints, what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height. (4.) He prays that they may know the superlative love of Christ, which surpasseth all human understanding and knowledge, implying, that the love of Christ to a lost world is a transcendent love; that the knowledge of it may be attained in some measure; that it is our duty to seek after it, and search into it; but after all, we can never fully comprehend it: What created understanding can know what is unknowable, or comprehend what is incomprehensible? Learn, There are such dimensions and degrees in the love of Christ to sinners, which, at least in this present and imperfect state, do surpass all comprehension and conception; also, that love whereby he took our nature upon him, that love whereby he took our sins upon him, is so stupendous and amazing, that the holy angels awfully admire it, but even their enlarged capacities cannot fully comprehend it. (5.) He prays that they might be filled with all the fulness of God; that is, with such measures of grace, knowledge, faith, holiness and love, which God hath appointed believers unto, and they are capable of in this life. Note here, 1. That there is a fulness in God, which we can neither be filled with, nor may we strive to be filled with; God is essentially full originally full, independently full, inexhaustibly full of all holiness and grace; now this fulness of his is undiminishable, and consequently incommunicable. 2. That there is a fulness of God which we may, and therefore ought to pray and endeavour to be filled with, namely, to be filled with the knowledge of God, to be filled with the grace and Spirit of God, to be filled with the wisdom of God, that we may know God more, serve him better, glorify him on earth, and be glorified with him in heaven: In a word, we may pray for, and strive to be filled with such a measure of the fulness of God and his grace, as God shall see fit to give, and as our capacities are or may be prepared to receive; God is not straitened towards us, let us not be straitened in ourselves: Open thy mouth wide, says God, and I will fill it. Blessed be God for a present fulness of sufficiency, and for the hopes of a future fulness to satiety.

20 Now unto him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us, 21 Unto him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus throughout all ages, world without end. Amen.

Observe here, 1. How our apostle closes his prayer with thanksgiving and praise; intimating to us, that praise should evermore conclude that work which prayer began, and that spiritual blessings principally deserve our praises. 2. The title which St. Paul's faith fixed upon, in his approaches to God in prayer and praise, and that is, his omnipotence or almighty power. In all our addresses to God it is our duty to have such apprehensions, and use such expressions concerning him, as may most strengthen our faith. He is able, says the apostle, to do exceeding abundantly above all that we can ask or think. Note here, The comprehensive fulness of this expression, he is able do for us to do abundantly for us, to do exceeding abundantly for us, above what we ask, yea, to do exceeding abundantly for us, above what we can think, as well as ask. O! how narrow, short, and poor are our prayers, compared with the power of God! It is much that the tongue can ask; it is more that the mind can think: But the Lord is able to do for us, not only above what we can ask, but abundantly above what we can think. Lord, what an everlasting spring of comfort is this! what encouragement doth it administer to thy people! what encouragement to prayer! what encouragement in prayer! They pray to him who is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that they can ask or think.

Observe,

Observe, 3. That it is not God's absolute power that St. Paul bottoms his faith in prayer upon (for God can do many things that he never will do) but it is his operative promised and formerly experienced power, according to the power that worketh in us; that is, according to that infinite and almighty power which God had exerted and put forth in their first conversion; this power was, and is a main prop for confidence in prayer. Learn hence, That the experience we have had of God's gracious power in working in us, by converting and quickening grace, may and ought to confirm our faith, that he will do exceeding abundantly for us, above what we can expect, yea, above what we can ask or think, when we are upon our knees in prayer before him. Observe 4. The concluding doxology; To him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus, throughout all ages, world without end. Amen. Where note, 1. The divine praise given to Almighty God, namely that of glory; To him be glory. Glory is the fountain of all excellency in the creatures; they all shine with beams borrowed from God's excellencies, as stars join with the light they receive from the body of the sun: Almighty God is that infinitely glorious being, in whom all the excellencies and perfections of the creatures are eminently and transcendently found. 2. The persons giving this glory unto God, the church; To him be glory in the church. True, it is the duty of all reasonable creatures to set forth God's glory; but only the church (holy and gracious person's alone) can perform it in an active and acceptable manner. 3. The person through whom this duty becomes acceptable unto God, through Christ Jesus; To him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus. The duty of praise and thanksgiving is what we owe to God for received favours, and indeed is all we have to pay him; but neither this, nor any other duty, can find acceptance with God, but by and through the mediation of our Lord Jesus Christ. 4. The duration and continuance of this duty of thanksgiving, throughout all ages, world without end: As God shall never want glory from his church, so there shall always be a church to the end of the world, to give glory unto God, against which the gates of hell shall never prevail. Lastly, In this divine doxology, after what manner, and with what affection this praise is given, intimated in the word Amen: World without end, Amen. This Amen (1.) Is a note of assent, and as such used by the Jews and Christians in all ages, at the end of their prayers, to testify that they assented and agreed to what was put up to God in their name, and on their behalf. Again, (2.) It importeth earnest desire. Hence Jeremiah (chap. xxviii. 6.) said Amen to the prayer of Hananiah, concerning the return of the captives to their land, to shew how earnestly he desired that it might be so. (3.) It imports steadfast faith, that the thing we pray for shall be granted; and accordingly, in testimony of our desire, and assurance to be heard, we say, Amen, so be it; so let it be; so let it be, O Lord, for ever.

CHAP. IV.

I THEREFORE, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you that ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called,

As if he had said, "Seeing the rites of God's grace, in Christ have so abounded towards you, who were once Ephesian idolaters, but now converted Gentiles, I Paul who am a prisoner for preaching the gospel, and for declaring this grace to you, do most affectionately exhort you, that ye live answerably to your profession, and according to the great obligation of your high and holy vocation from heathenism to Christianity." Here note, 1. The person exhorting and beseeching, I Paul the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you; I that am in bonds for Christ, I that am imprisoned for preaching the gospel to you, and for proselyting you by it into Christianity. Nothing can more oblige a people to hearken to the exhortations of the ministers of Christ, than this consideration, that the truths which they deliver to them, they stand ready, both to suffer for, and to seal with their precious blood: I the prisoner of the Lord beseech you. 2. The comprehensive duty exhorted to, That ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called; worthy, that is, befitting and becoming your holy profession, answerable to the dignity and obligation of your Christian name: or, as he exhorteth the Philippians, chap. i. 20. Walk as becometh the members of Jesus Christ: But when may we be said so to do? Ans. When we walk according to the precepts and commands of the gospel; answerable to the privileges and prerogatives of the gospel; answerable to that grand pattern of holiness which the gospel sets before us, the example of Jesus Christ; answerable to the helps and supplies of grace which the gospel affords: Finally, to walk worthy of our vocation, is to walk answerable to those high and glorious hopes which the gospel raises the Christian up to the expectation of.

2 With all lowliness and meekness, with long-suffering, forbearing one another in love; 3 Endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.

Having exhorted them to the practice of their general duty; namely, to walk worthy of their holy vocation, in the former verse; in these two verses he presses upon them more special and particular duties, the chief of which is the duty of Christian unity and concord, endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit. The word signifies, a diligent, industrious, and united endeavour to preserve and keep, to support and maintain, the unity of the Spirit; that is, an union of heart and Spirit, an unity of faith and doctrine, an unity of judgment and affection, amongst all the professors of Christianity. Observe, 1. The means by which this duty may be performed, and the unity of the Spirit maintained; namely, in the bond of peace; a peaceable disposition and temper, a peaceable deportment and behaviour, is the bond or ligament which binds Christians together; whereas discord and division cuts that bond asunder. 2. The special graces which the apostle recommends unto us, as excellent helps for preserving unity and peace; namely, humility, meekness, and mutual forbearance. (1.) Humility; ver. 2. With all lowliness; that is, with all submissiveness of mind, and humble apprehensions of ourselves. What Tertullus said of Festus flatteringly, we may say of humility truly, By thee, O humility, we enjoy great quietness: The humble man is the peaceable man; only by pride cometh cometh contention. (2.) Meekness, which consists in a backwardness to provoke others, or to be provoked by others; as lowliness stood in opposition to pride, so meekness here stands in opposition to peevishness; with all lowliness and meekness. (3.) Long-suffering and mutual forbearance; when Christians are so far from resenting every wrong, and revenging every injury that is offered to them, that they can bear with one another's weaknesses, cover each other's infirmities, pity one another's failings, and pardon each other's provocations: And this duty of mutual forbearance ought to proceed from a principle of love to each other.

4 There is one body, and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling; 5 One Lord, one faith, one baptism, 6 One God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all.

The apostle having exhorted the Ephesians to a strict unity and concord amongst themselves, next proceeds to enforce his exhortation with several arguments; and there are no fewer than seven summed up in the three verses now before us. (1.) Says the apostle, there is one body, that is, one universal church, whereof ye are all members. (2.) There is one Spirit, by which ye are all animated and enlivened, and therefore keep the unity of the Spirit. (3.) There is one hope of eternal life, by which ye are all excited: Our inheritance in heaven is the same; God doth not give one a double portion, or a party-coloured coat, above another; but it is called an inheritance in light, because all alike are partakers of it, and sharers in it; the saints have all one hope, therefore should have all but one heart. (4.) One Lord Jesus Christ, the Head of his church, the Saviour of the body, one whom we all profess to serve and obey: Be ye therefore one, for your Lord is one. (5.) There is one faith; that is, either one grace of faith whereby we believe, or one doctrine of faith which is believed; ye all believe in one and the same Saviour, and are all justified by him, after one and the same manner; therefore be ye also one; one in affection, as well as one in belief. (6.) There is one baptism, one door by which we all enter into the church; both Jew and Gentile, bond and free, rich and poor, they are all one in Christ Jesus, and by one Spirit baptized into one body. (7.) One God and the Father of all things: And of all persons in Christ, whom we all expect one and the same salvation from: And this God is transcendently above all, and over all; his eye penetrates and pierces through you all, and he is in and among you all, as in his holy temple; therefore such as endeavour to divide you, do as much as in them lies to divide God himself that dwells in you. This then is the sum of the apostle's argument: "Seeing ye are all members of one body, partakers of one Spirit; expectants of one hope, having one Lord and common Saviour, one faith and belief, one and the same baptism in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and one and the same God and Father in Christ; seeing you are one in all these particulars, be one among yourselves, and endeavour to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." From the whole, learn, That so many are the obligations, so strong the bonds and ties, which lie upon all the members of the church to be at unity among themselves, of one judgment, and of one heart; that such as violate these bonds, and culpably divide and separate themselves from communion with their brethren, Christ looks upon them no longer as members of his body, but as having rent and torn themselves from it.

7 But unto every one of us is given grace according to the measure of the gift of Christ. 8 Wherefore he saith, When he ascended up on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men. 9 (Now that he ascended, what is it but that he also descended first into the lower parts of the earth? 10 He that descended is the same also that ascended up far above all heavens, that he might fill all things.) 11 And he gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers; 12 For the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ: 13 Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ.

Our apostle here, in these verses supplies us with another weighty argument to persuade us to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace; namely, that it was one great and chief end which Christ aimed at, in instituting the ministry of the word, in appointing the several officers in his church, of apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, and teachers, and also in the several gifts which he bestowed upon those officers: he assures us, it was Christ's great design, in and by all these, to bring his people, not only to faith and knowledge, but to unity in the faith, and in the knowledge of the Son of God. And here, (1.) Our apostle shews, that the diversity of those gifts and graces bestowed by Christ upon the several members of the church, do all tend to preserve and to promote unity, they all coming from one and the same author, and being all given for one and the same end. Unto every one of us is given grace, according to the measure of the gift of Christ. Learn hence, 1. That there is grace given by Christ to all his members, bearing some proportion and similitude to that grace which was conferred upon Christ himself. 2. That the design of Christ, in dispensing his grace in different measures and degrees, is the general good of his church, and particularly for preserving and promoting unity and love amongst his members; for seeing every one has his several graces from God, and no one has all, if one hath that grace which another wants, and if one want the help of one another, and therefore ought to love one another: This is the apostle's argument. Next he proceeds to prove that Christ has dispensed this diversity of gifts amongst his members; affirming, that in the day of his ascension into the highest heavens, he led captivity captive, captives, and gave gifts unto men. In which expression there is a manifest allusion to the Roman conquerors, who in the day of their triumphs scattered their magnificence and bounty, their largesses and donatives among their soldiers and their subjects. Thus Christ, after he had triumphed over his own and his church's enemies upon the cross, rode in the triumphant chariot of his ascension into heaven, where he received gifts as the purchase of his blood, and shed forth those gifts of his Spirit in various kinds, upon his members in general, but upon his ministers in particular; which gifts, in the first ages of Christianity, were extraordinary, as the gift of tongues and miracles, but now ordinary, and to continue to the end of the world. Now, from the apostle's scope and design in this argument, we learn, That though diversity of gifts in the church, and divers measure of grace in and among the members thereof, are too often a sad occasion of division and strife, through the prevalency of envy and pride, and other dividing lusts, yet this great variety and diversity of gifts and graces rightly considered, would be found to be one of the strongest ties and bonds of union, seeing we all stand in mutual need of the gifts and graces of each other. It is very evident, that our apostle's scope here, is, to urge and enforce unity, from the diversity of gifts and graces which are amongst the members of the church; God forbid then, that they should occasion envy and animosities, strife and contention, rents and divisions. Our apostle's next argument for unity, is in the 11th and 12th verses, where he proves, that as the unity and edification of the church, was the design of Christ in dispensing divers gifts and graces amongst the members of his church, so was it likewise his aim and end in instituting such variety of offices and officers in his church; for this end it was that he gave to his church by qualification and mission, first, apostles, sent forth first by his own mouth, to be witnesses of his doctrine and miracles, and then to preach the gospel throughout all the world, having received the holy Spirit in an extraordinary manner at the feast of Pentecost, to fit them for that service, Acts ii. 1, 2. Next, prophets, who explained the mysteries of faith foretold things to come, and expounded the writings of the old prophets. Then, evangelists, who were sent out by the apostles, some to plant, others to water the churches which they had planted, without being fixed to any particular place. Lastly, pastors, and teachers, called also bishops and elders, who were set over the churches as guides and instructors. Learn hence, 1. That it is Christ's special prerogative, as Head of the church, to institute and appoint such offices and officers in his church, as to his own wisdom seems meet for the edification and government of it. 2. That the great end and design of Christ, in instituting such variety of offices and officers in his church, was, his church's unity, that by all ministerial helps and endeavours, his members might be compacted and knit together, and made one entire body, by the increase of sanctity, concord, and unity. He gave some apostles, some pastors and teachers, for the perfecting of the saints, (not for converting of sinners only) and for the edifying of the body of Christ. Observe, lastly, The apostle declares how long the work of the ministry, appointed by Christ for his church's edification and advantage, was to continue: namely, to the end of the world, to the day of judgment, till all come, by means of the same faith in Christ, and knowledge of him, unto a perfect man, and unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ; that is, till the church, which is Christ's mystical body, shall be complete and perfect, and attain its full stature from infancy to full manhood. Learn hence, 1. That the church of Christ here on earth, is labouring for, and endeavouring after perfection in grace and knowledge, to come unto a perfect man, and attain to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ. 2. That the ministry of the word, is an ordinance of Christ's own appointment, to continue to the end of the world, in order to that purpose and design. 3. That none of the most eminent saints on earth (the most knowing and pious ministers of the gospel not excepted) are above ordinances, above the ministry of the word, above receiving benefit and advantage by the plain and practical preaching of it; even St. Paul here puts himself in, and reckons himself among the number of those who stood in need of the ministry of God's word, to bring him to a perfect man, and to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ; he says not, till ye, but till we all come unto a perfect man. Such people then, as think themselves above ordinances, are above God himself; none need ordinances so much, as those that want them least. And such hearers as turn their backs upon the preaching of the word, because they know more than the minister can teach them, and can better instruct the preacher, than be instructed by him, they betray their own ignorance both of the intent and end of the ministry of the word, and also of the state of their own hearts; for if their understanding want no light, do their affections need no warmth? Have you no grace to be perfected, no corruptions to be weakened, no good resolutions to be strengthened? If your knowledge be imperfect, as sure it is, do not your affections want a fresh excitement? Admit the despised preacher cannot be your instructor, yet sure he may be your remembrancer, and excite you to that duty which you know already perhaps better than you practise it.

14 That we henceforth be no more children, tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine; by the flight of men, and cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive;

St. Paul, in these words, declares one special end for which the ministry of the word was instituted and appointed; namely, to preserve from error and seduction, to prevent instability of mind, and unsettledness of judgment, and to confirm persons in fundamental truths: that we henceforth be no more children tossed to and fro, &c. Note here, 1. The name which St. Paul gives to unstable persons, and unsettled professors, he calls them children; Not in regard of age, but in respect of knowledge and understanding: children, is a word that denotes imperfection and weakness, instability and ungroundedness in knowledge. 2. How the unsteadiness of these professors is expressed by a double metaphor; the former is drawn from a wave of the sea, they are tossed to and fro; the latter is drawn from a light cloud hovering in the air, carried about from place to place; neither neither wave nor cloud have any consistency, but are both moving, if the least wind be stirring. 3. The cause of this instability, every wind of doctrine, professors that have no solid principles, every wind of doctrine has power over them to drive them to and fro, every teacher can cast them into what mould he pleases, and blow them like glasses, into this or that shape, at the pleasure of his breath. But why wind of doctrine? Because there is no solidity in it, but being wind in the preacher, it breeds but wind in the hearer, because of its variety and novelty, and because of its prevalency over untaught men. How suddenly, sometimes, is a family, a town, yea, a whole country, leavened with a particular error? 4. The character of those impostors and seducers that do thus unsettle and unhinge men, they use flight; a metaphor taken from gamesters, who with art and slight of hand, can cog the dice, and win the game. Seducers cheat with false doctrines, as gamesters do with false dice: Cunning craftiness; the word signifies the subtilty and deep policy of the old serpent; implying, that seducers are old and cunning gamester, skilful to deceive: They lie in wait to deceive; the word signifies an ambushment, or stratagem of war, implying, that all seducers flight and craftiness is to this very end and purpose, that they may intrap and catch men within the ambush of their impostures. From the whole, learn, That seducers and false-teachers are crafts-masters of slight and subtilty, and stratagems of deceit; they have artifices, ways and methods to take men unawares, and to make merchandise of the people; they wrest and wrack the scriptures to make them speak what they please, not what the Holy Ghost intended: If all this art fails, their last device is, to recommend their doctrines upon some private pretended revelation, and uncom non impulse of the holy Spirit; by all which methods they lie in wait to deceive.

15 But speaking the truth in love, may grow up into him in all things, which is the head, even Christ: 16 From whom the whole body fitly joined together, and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to the effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body, unto the edifying of itself in love.

Our apostle had set forth the excellent end of the ministry, in the foregoing verse, for furthering our stability and steadfastness in grace; here he declares the admirable fitness of it for helping forward our proficiency and growth in grace, Speaking the truth in love; that is, cleaving to the truth of Christ's doctrine, and living in love with one another, you may grow up in Christ by making progress in all Christian grace, being united to him as members to the head. Here note, How the apostle draws a comparison between the natural and mystical members, and the increase of both; as there must be a fellowship betwixt the natural head and members, so must there be an union betwixt Christ, the spiritual Head, and believers, his mystical members: and as there is further required, a mutual communion and fellowship of the members of the body within, and amongst themselves, in order to growth and increase; so must there be concord, love, and unity amongst believers, if they expect to see grace growing in themselves, or in one another. Are the members of the natural body severally distinct one from another, some principal, others ministerial, but all concurring to the service of the whole? So, in order to spiritual growth, must all the members of Christ's mystical body keep their rank and order, and act in their own sphere with spiritual wisdom and humility; the eye not doing the work of the hand, nor the hand the work of the foot, but every one in the calling wherein he is called, must there abide with God. Again, is there a supply of nourishment from one member to another, according to the measure of every part in the natural body? So is there a supply from head to members in the mystical body, and from one mystical member to another; one is apt to teach, willing to exhort, a fifth to advise and counsel; and all these, and every one of these, contributing all they can to the welfare and growth of the whole. Happy is it both for the natural and mystical body, when the members of both are subservient to each other, and contribute all they can to the mutual growth and improvement of one another, and especially for the benefit and advantage of the whole.

17 This I say therefore and testify in the Lord, that ye henceforth walk not as other Gentiles walk, in the vanity of their mind, 18 Having the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them, because of the blindness of their heart: 19 Who being past feeling have given themselves over unto lasciviousness to work all uncleanness with greediness.

Our apostle having finished his grand exhortation to love and unity amongst all Christians, and enforced it with the most weighty arguments and motives, in the former part of the chapter, comes now, in the latter part of it to press the Ephesians to the practice of particular duties. The first of which is this, to take special care, that being now converted Christians, they walk no more like ignorant and unconverted heathens: Walk not as other Gentiles walk. Next, he gives particular instances how, and after what manner the Gentiles, in the black night of paganism, did walk; namely, (1.) In the vanity of their minds, following their own imagination, and not any revealed from God, in the matters of his worship. (2.) Having their understandings darkened, their minds void of saving knowledge. (3.) They were alienated from the life of God, that is, from a godly life; they were strangers to the life which God commanded, which God approved, and which God himself lived. Here note, That holiness is called the life of God, because it is the life which God requires of us, it is the life which he works in us, it is the life whereby God liveth in us, the life whereby we live unto God; it is an ever-living life, not obnoxious to death, as the Ephesians were; so every carnal man, before conversion, is alienated from this life of God; he has no liking of it, no inclination to it, but prefers a life of sin before it. Lord, how many that are surrounded with the celestial beams of the gospel, are as impure and impenitent now, as these Gentiles were then in the black night of paganism! (4.) They were past feeling; their sottish stupidity had numbed them, the flames of their lusts had seared their consciences to a desparate degree of hardness and insensibility; they were at once insensible of their sin, and of their danger by reason of sin. A dead conscience, and a desparately dissolute life, are inseparable companions. (5.) They gave themselves over unto lasciviousness, to work all uncleanness with greediness. Here see, how insensibility of sin begets insatiableness in sinning; they work uncleanness with insatiable greediness; who have once abandoned themselves to sin, especially to the sin of uncleanness. Lord, this was the deplorable case of the heathen world, before the light of the gospel did arise and shine upon them; but, alas! It is the case of multitudes that sit under the brightest beams of gospel light, they shut their eyes, and will not see; they extinguish all sense of immortality and a future state, and so abandon themselves to a life of brutish sensuality, working all uncleanness with greediness; but let them know assuredly, that though they live like beasts, yet they shall not die like them, nor shall their latter end be like theirs, the soul being under a divine ordination to an everlasting existence in a future state, in which it shall be eternally happy or intolerably miserable, according as we manage our deportment in this present world.

20 But ye have not so learned Christ; 21 If so be that ye have heard him, and have been taught by him, as the truth is in Jesus: 22 That ye put off concerning the former conversation the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts; 23 And be renewed in the spirit of your mind; 24 And that ye put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness.

In these verses, 1. Our apostle acquaints the converted Ephesians, that the saving knowledge of Christ, which they had received, instructed them better than to practise such licentiousness and wickedness as the unconverted Gentiles wallowed in. But ye have not so learned Christ, that is, the gospel of Christ. Nothing curbs sin, nothing cures sin, in a licentious sinner, like the doctrine of Christ revealed in the gospel; no moral precepts from the school of the heathens, which some so much magnify and applaud, can compare with this, which lays open the root of this accursed disease, and leads us to the remedy which the wisdom of God has appointed for its cure, even the blood of his own Son; then blessed be God for revealed religion. 2. The apostle acquaints them what the truth as it is in Jesus, that is, the doctrine of the gospel, doth direct them to, enjoin and require of them, namely, to put off the old man, that is, their former heathen conversation, and manner of life, say some; but this they had put off already, at their first conversion to Christianity: By the old man, then, understand the old corrupt nature, so called, because it is as old as Adam, and derived from Adam, and which daily more and more corrupts and depraves us by its deceitful lusts, if we be not resisted and subdued. But this is not sufficient, that we put off the old man, unless we put on the new, and be renewed in the spirit of our minds after God; that is, after the image of God, which consisteth in. righteousness and true holiness. Note here, 1. That regenerating grace is called the new man, because the person has a new principle infused into him (says the pious Bishop Fell, upon the place) which enables him to lead a new life. Regenerate men, then, are new men, they have a renewed and enlightened understanding, they have a sanctified and renewed will, renewed affections and desires: old things are passing away, and all things becoming new. 2. That God himself is the pattern and exemplar, after which, and according to which, the new man is formed in the soul, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness: What is godliness, but Godlikeness? What is holiness, but the conformity of our natures to the holy nature of God, and the conformity of our lives to the will of God? Acts xiii. 22. I have found David a man after my own heart, who shall perform all my will. 3. That holiness is not only the reforming of the outward man, but it is the renewing of the mind; and not only of the mind, but of the Spirit of the mind; by which understand, the highest and most refined faculties of the mind, that part which is most free from the dregs of sin, and which comes up nearest to God, as the spirit of the mind and understanding doth; verily, not our minds only, but even the spirit of our minds, need renewing, because corruption is got into the highest powers and superior faculties of the soul, and because we must serve God with all our mind; and if so, with the spirit of our mind; and blessed be God, that regenerating and renewing grace is an universal principle, as sin was. Did sin invade the whole soul, all the powers and faculties of it, and deprive us of the divine image? It is the work of grace to restore our depraved natures to their primitive integrity. The renewed person is sanctified in part, though not totaliter; a new nature is found with him, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness.

25 Wherefore putting away lying, speak every man truth with his neighbour: For we are members one of another.

Our apostle closes this chapter with an exhortation to several duties belonging to the second table, namely, to abstain from lying, from anger, from stealing, from corrupt communication, from all bitterness of spirit, from malice and revenge, and to exercise brotherly kindness and mutual forgiveness. From whence note, That Christians must make conscience of the duties of the second table, as well as of the first, and perform their duty towards their neighbour, as well as towards God, for the law is one copulative, God spake all these words: The authority of the lawgiver is despised, in the violence of the least command: When therefore second-table duties are performed by us, from arguments and motives drawn from the first table, that is, when in obedience to God's command, and with an eye at his glory, we perform our duty to our neighbour, this is both an argument of our sincerity, and also an ornament to our profession: Wherefore put away lying, &c. Lying was a vice very common among the heathens: It is likely the Ephesians, in their heathen state, had been very guilty of it, for they thought it lawful, when it was beneficial, to lie; and affirmed, that a lie was better than an hurtful truth, truth. Our apostle therefore exhorts them, now converted to Christianity, to speak exact truth one to another; and adds a forcible reason for it, because they were members one of another; that is, of human society, which by lying is destroyed; falsehood dissolves the bond of human society. Learn hence, That there is no sin more unseemly in a Christian, more inconsistent with grace, more abominable to God, more like unto the devil, more injurious and prejudicial to human society, than the sin of lying; fidelity towards each other, and mutual confidence in each other, being that which makes human society both safe and easy.

26 Be ye angry, and sin not: let not the sun go down upon your wrath: 27 Neither give place to the devil.

Some understand these words only as a cautionary direction, and sense them us: If ye be angry at any time, take heed that ye sin not, by exceeding due bounds; and if at any time it doth so, suppress it speedily, before the sun go down: This was a practice even amongst the heathens; before the sun went down, they would shake hands and embrace one another; to the shame of Christians, who give place to the devil, according to the known proverb, Contubernalem habet diabolum, qui lectum petit iratus; he that goes angry to bed, has the devil for his chamber-fellow, yea, for his bed-fellow; nay he lies not only in his bed, but in his bosom. Others understand the words as a precept and command. Be angry, but take heed of sinful anger: Now, the way to be angry and not sin, is to be angry at nothing but at sin; it is our duty to be angry, when we see others depart from their duty. Meek Moses, who was cool enough in his own cause, was not in God's; he has no zeal for God, that is not moved, when he sees or hears God dishonoured. Learn hence, 1. That anger being an affection implanted by God in the human nature, is not in itself evil or sinful, but in some cases, a necessary duty. 2. That there is an easy and ready passage from what is lawful, to what is sinful. Be angry, and sin not; implying, that it is a very easy matter to sin in our anger, and no easy matter to be angry and not to sin. 4. That it is very difficult, if not impossible, to avoid sin in our anger, if we let anger hang upon our spirits, and continue with us; anger may pass through the heart of a wise man, but rests in the bosom of fools: Anger against sin must continue, but continuance in anger will be sinful. To prevent the sin of immoderate anger, these rules will be useful. (1.) Desire not to hear what others say of thee, lest you want patience to bear what you hear; many tear themselves with anger, when they hear themselves torn with slander; we had better be in the dark concerning our own wrongs, than by knowing of them, wrong ourselves by passion or desire of revenge. (2.) What you do hear said of you, interpret always in the most favourable sense; call it an infirmity, and distinguish between the action and intention, between what is spoken, and the intent of the speaker. (3.) In and under all provocations, cast your eye upward: Look up to God, and cast your eye inward; and see what you have deserved, though not at your neighbour's hand, yet at God's hand. Shimei gave David provocation to boil up his anger to the height of fury, 2 Sam. xvi. 5. but by cying God: how calm and meek was his spirit? Thus, Be angry and sin not.

28 Let him that stole, steal no more: but rather let him labour, working with his hands the thing which is good, that he may have to give to him that needeth.

Observe here 1. The sin dissuaded from, theft, and stealing. This the heathen nations counted no crime; they made no conscience, either openly or fraudently, to take away their neighbours goods. Therefore, says the apostle, let those of you, who in the time of your paganism and unregeneracy, were given to stealing, now being converted to Christianity, do so no more. 2. The remedy prescribed for the prevention of this sin, and that is, diligence and labour in some honest calling; let him labour, working with his hands: Idleness occasions poverty, brings men to want, increases their necessities, and then they betake themselves to indirect and unlawful means to supply them. 3. One special reason why persons should labour in the way of their calling that they might have to give to him that needeth; not only that they may have wherewith to relieve their own wants, but the wants of others. Where note, That God expects charity from the hand of those who get their living with their hands: Day-labourers, and such as have nothing to live upon but their work, must yet give their mite, their alms for the help of the indigent. Observe, 4. The restriction and qualification of this labour of the hands, he must work that which is good, that he may give to him that needeth: To relieve others with the gain of oppression, or with the hire of an harlot, is unacceptable; the matter of our alms must be goods righteously gotten, otherwise it is robbery, not righteousness.

29 Let no corrupt communication proceed out of your mouth, but that which is good to the use of edifying, that it may minister grace unto the hearers.

Here the apostle directs us how to manage our tongues, both negatively and positively telling us, what we should not speak, and what we should: Let no corrupt, rotten, filthy discourse come out of your mouth; such as have rotten lungs, have a stinking breath; filthy discourse argues a polluted heart; such noisome discourse is unsavoury to an holy ear, and greatly offensive, contagious, and infecting to common and ordinary hearers. Next, he tells them what they should speak, that which is profitable and edifying, and that which may minister increase of grace to the hearers: Our speech should be so gracious and savoury, as to discover grace wrought in our hearts, and be a means of working it in the hearts of others; elsewhere, St. Paul advises, that our speech be savoury, seasoned with salt, Col. iv. 6. Truth, holiness, and prudence, is the salt of our words: Christians must not suffer their tongue to run at random in their ordinary discourse; it is not sufficient that they do not speak to evil purpose, but they must speak to edifying purpose: that which has a tendency to make the hearers some way or other, either wiser or better: This the apostle calls, that which is good to the use of edifying.

30 And grieve not the holy Spirit of God, whereby ye are sealed unto the day of redemption.

Note here 1. The title given to the Spirit of God, he is styled the holy Spirit, being essentially and infinitely holy in himself, and the author of all grace and holiness in us. 2. The affection of grief, which is here attributed to the Spirit, not properly, but improperly; when we do that which would most certainly afflict and grieve him, were he a subject capable of grief, and when, upon provocations given on our parts, he carrieth himself towards us after the manner of a person grieved; namely, when we provoke him to suspend his influence, to withdraw his comforts, leaving us without any present sense or feeling of his assurances; he is also then grieved when he is opposed, interrupted, controuled, and disturbed in his operations of grace and comfort upon our souls. 3. The argument used to enforce the exhortation, and not to grieve the holy Spirit of God, because by it we are sealed to the day of redemption. But what doth God's sealing his people by his holy Spirit, intimate and imply? Ans. (1.) It intimates, that God has distinguished them from others. (2.) That he has appropriated them to himself. (3.) That he has put a value upon them, and a very high esteem. And (4.) It imports the irrevocable purpose of God for their salvation. Seals are for these uses, ends, and purposes; Seals are for distinction, for approbation, for conformation, and argue a high valuation and precious esteem of the person or thing which the seal is put upon: Grieve not the Spirit, whereby ye are sealed to the day of redemption, that is, to the day of judgment.

31 Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamour, and evil-speaking be put away from you, with all malice. 32 And be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you.

Our apostle had exhorted, in the former verse, not to grieve the holy Spirit of God: In the next verse, he acquaints us with the particular sins that would afflict and grieve him; namely, bitterness, that is, a secret grudge, and a smothered displeasure against our brother: wrath, or an impetuous fierceness of spirit, upon some real or apprehended injury; anger, an eager desire of revenge; clamour, loud threatenings, or reviling language; evil speaking, either of others, or to others; malice, a rooted enmity, the rage of the devil, and renders a man as like the devil, as any sin on this side hell: All these sins do exceedingly grieve the holy Spirit, they make him both loathe and leave his lodgings. In the last verse, as a proper remedy against all the foregoing sins, he exhorts them to mutual kindness: Be ye kind one towards another: This is, of a sweet and loving disposition, affable and courteous to each other; neither carrying it loftily or morosely, but affably and humbly; tender-hearted, having a compassionate sense of the miseries and infirmities of one another; forgiving one another whatever has been matter of provocation in each other, according to the example of God, who for Christ's sake has forgiven us. Learn hence 1. That Christians are obliged, by the laws of their holy religion, to forbear and forgive one another. 2. That they are obliged to forgive one another, as God, for Christ's sake, hath forgiven them. As God forgives us universally, freely, heartily, and sincerely, and when he has power in his hand to revenge, so should we in like manner forgive one another, even as God, for Christ's sake, hath forgiven us.

CHAP. V.

BE ye therefore followers of God, as dear children;

Our apostle having, in the conclusion of the foregoing chapter, exhorted the Ephesians to mutual offices of love and kindness towards each other, in the beginning of this chapter, he makes use of several very cogent arguments to excite and quicken them thereunto: The first of which is drawn from the example of God, as he had been kind to us, and for Christ's sake forgiven us; let us therefore be followers of him, not as our God only, but as our Father: Be ye followers of God, as dear children. Where note, 1. The duty exhorted to, Be ye followers of God; that is, in all the excellencies of his communicable attributes, and particularly in the exercise of universal goodness and kindness, mercy and forgiveness. 2. The argument exciting to this duty, as dear children: you are children, and who should children imitate but their Father? And you are dear children, will you not imitate such a Father? Learn from both, That such as lay claim to a relation to God, without imitation of him, are not children, but bastards: They may be of his family, but not of his household; of his family, by instruction, but not by descent: There is no implantation into Christ, without an imitation, both of the Creator and Redeemer, Heb. iii. 6. Christ as a son over his own house: Whose house are we, if we hold fast, &c.

2 And walk in love, as Christ also hath loved us, and hath given himself for us an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet-smelling savour.

Here we have a second argument urged, to walk in love, one with, and one towards another, drawn from the example of Christ; he also, as well as God the Father, has loved us; and the instance given of his love, is the highest that ever was or can be given: He gave himself for us, an offering and not a sacrifice to God for a sweet smelling savour. Observe here, 1. The great duty of the law, [walk in love]. This implies the exercise of this grace, not barely to have it in the principle and habit, but to exercise and exert it in the act: And it implies the universal exercise of grace; whatever we do both to God and man, must be done in love, 1 Cor. xvi. 14. Let all your deeds be done with charity. 2. As the great duty of the law, to walk in love, so the great pattern of the gospel, as Christ also hath loved us. The particle [as] hath first the force of an argument, and is as much as because Christ hath loved us; and it has also the force of a rule to direct us in the manner how we should love one another, with an [as] of identity, but not equality; not with the same degree, but with the same kind of love wherewith Christ hath loved us. But why hath, rather than doth love us? Why in the preter; rather than in the present tense? Ans. To denote both the priority of Christ's love, that he loved us before we loved him ; yea, before we loved ourselves ; nay, before we had any thing in the world, we had a being in his love, even from all eternity. And also to denote the indubitable certainty of his love ; he hath loved you ; you need not doubt it, nor question it ; he has given actual and undeniable proofs of it ; follow him from heaven to earth, and from earth to heaven again, and you will find every step he took to have been in love : Walk then in love, as Christ also hath loved us. Learn hence 1. That our Lord Jesus Christ hath given an ample and full demonstration of his great and wonderful love unto his church and people. 2. That this love of Christ towards us, should not only be an argument and motive to excite and quicken us to walk in love one towards another, but also an exact rule and copy to direct and guide us in our walking. There was some innumerable properties in Christ's love which we cannot imitate : As his love was an eternal love, an infinite love, a free love, without motive, and in despite of obstacles, a redeeming love ; such cannot our love be one to another : But as Christ's love was an operative love, a beneficent love, a preventing love, a soul love, a constant love, thus we are to imitate it, and walk in love one towards another. Observe, 3. The high instance and expression which Christ has given of his love unto us. He gave himself for us a sacrifice unto God, &c. He gave ; now gifts and expressions of love ; he gave himself, that is more than if he had given all the angels in heaven, and all the treasures on earth for us, more than the whole world, yea, than ten thousand worlds ; he gave himself an offering and a sacrifice, a voluntary sacrifice, a meritorious, efficacious, expiatory, and propitiatory sacrifice : And this for us, to be stuck and bleed to death in our stead : And he gave himself a sacrifice to God, as an injured and offended God ; to God, as a revenger of sin ; to God, as the guardian and giver of the law ; to God as the asserter of his truth in his threatenings ; he appeared before God as sitting upon a seat of justice, that he might open to us a throne of grace. Lastly, For a sweet-smelling savour, that is, he gave himself with an intention to be accepted, and God received him with a choice acceptation ; our sin had sent up a very ill savour to heaven, which disturbed the rest of God : Christ expels this ill scent, by the perfume of his precious blood. Learn hence, 1. That the sacrifice and sufferings of our Lord Jesus Christ were very free and voluntary : He offered himself, and his offering was a free-will offering. 2. That this voluntary sacrifice and free-will offering of Christ, was acceptable to God, and efficacious for men ; it was acceptable to God, because a complete satisfaction for sin's wrong ; and efficacious for us, because a discharge from the obligation of sin's guilt.

3 But fornication, and all uncleannesses, or covetousness, let it not be once named amongst you, as becometh saints ;

The apostle, in this and the following verses, exhorts the Ephesians to shun several sins, which were frequently practised among the Gentiles before their conversion to Christianity, as, first, fornication, and all sorts and degrees of uncleannesses : This was looked upon as an indifferent action, and no sin at all, by the Pagan world. Next, he advises them to beware of covetousness, that is, all irregular and inordinate desires, and lusting after things forbidden in the general, and particularly all insatiable love of riches, which in trading cities (such was Ephesus) doth usually very much abound, which sins he earnestly desires may not be named amongst them, that is, not named with approbation, not named without reprehension ; not named, that is, not committed by any of them, yea, not so much as named by them without detestation. And the argument offered to dissuade them from these sins, is drawn ab indecero, as not becoming saints, that is, converted Christians, who profess separation from the world, and solemn dedication to God and Christ, and therefore ought to be holy in heart, chaste in mind, heavenly in desire, undefiled in body : A life of purity, and chastity well becoming saints ; they must be pure in heart, pure in tongue, pure in hand, pure in intention, pure in expression, pure in conversation, otherwise they answer not their name, nor walk according to their renewed nature.

4 Neither filthiness, nor foolish talking, nor jesting, which are not convenient, but rather giving of thanks.

Here our apostle advises Christians to guard against the sins of the tongue, to avoid all filthy discourse, and all foolish discourse, all scurrilous and obscene jesting, all excess in drollery, which is nothing but the foam of a frothy wit : Moderate mirth, by innocent and inoffensive jesting, is not here forbidden, but when we jest by tart reflections, upon the way, gesture, natural imperfections of others, especially when we furnish out a jest in scripture attire, and in a jocular humour make light and irreverent applications of scripture phrases. Lord ! what an impious liberty do some men take, to bring forth scripture, as the Philistines brought forth Sampson, only to make them sport. These men, ere long, will find Almighty God in earnest, though they were in jest when they played the buffoon with the most serious things in the world. Observe, farther, our apostle's argument to dissuade from such talk, is this, they are not convenient ; not convenient in themselves ; not convenient for the speaker, not convenient for the hearers ; for they poison instead of profiting the company, and pollute both the minds and manners of the hearers. O, what a great and common instrument of sin is in the mouth or tongue of man ! The tongue of a good man is as his glory, the tongue of a sinner is his shame ; there is no member of the body that doth so much service for the devil as the tongue, especially in common conversation ; then it is that men let their tongues run-riot, then they utter oaths and blasphemies against God, censorious, opprobrious, slanderous words against their neighbours ; to prevent all which, the apostle exhorts, in the last words of the verse, that when we meet together, we should rather recount the favours received from God, and bless him for them : But rather giving of thanks. As there is at all times, and in all places, cause of thanksgiving administered to us by God, so it is our duty to take all occasions and fit opportunities to excite both ourselves and others to the practice of it, who are naturally very averse and backward to it. From the whole, note, That so quick and easy is the passage from from what is lawful and allowed, to what is sinful and forbidden, that is a task of no small difficulty to keep within the bounds of lawful and allotted mirth, especially by recreating our spirits by pleasant and delightful discourse, so that we exceed not either in matter, manner, or measure. Well might St. James say (chap. iii. 2.) If any man offend not in word, he is a perfect man, intimating, that there are many, very many, that do thus offend; and such as do not, are Christians of no common attainments, but great proficient in grace: Persons of extraordinary measures both of piety and prudence.

5 For this ye know, that no whoremonger, nor unclean person, nor covetous man, who is an idolater, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God. 6 Let no man deceive you with vain words: for because of these things cometh the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience. 7 Be not ye therefore partakers with them.

Our apostle, considering how exceeding common the forementioned sins were among the Gentiles, and how ready persons were to esteem highly of them, advises the Ephesians here, not to entertain in their minds light thoughts of them, or to believe any libertines which should represent them as small and inconsiderable matters; for how can a little sin be committed against a great God? or that sin be accounted light, which brings down the heavy wrath of God upon the person, and shuts him out of the kingdom of God? *Note here, 1. The description of heaven, it is a kingdom, for its eminency and glory, for its fulness and sufficiency, for its safety and security, for its duration and perpetuity, so called: And it is the kingdom of Christ, and of God, that is, either the kingdom of Christ who is God, or the kingdom of Christ by purchase, and the kingdom of God by free donation. But mark, the kingdom of Christ and of God, of Christ first, because there is no coming into the kingdom of God but by Christ: Christ is first named, because we enter by him into the kingdom, and in his right. 2. The sins enumerated, which will assuredly shut persons out of this kingdom, and they are not external and corporeal sins only, as whoredom and uncleanness, but internal and spiritual, covetousness, which is idolatry: As a man may be guilty of adultery, and yet never touch a woman, and of murder, yet never strike his neighbour, so he may be guilty of idolatry, and yet never bow his knee to an idol: Secret idolatry, soul idolatry, will shut out of heaven, as well as open idolatry. Any thing that has our highest esteem and regard, our extreme love and delight, and is the special object of our hope, our assurance and trust, of our fear and care, this we make our God: And thus the covetous man is an idolater, for he gives these acts of soul-worship to the creature, to something in the world which is not God. Every natural man is an idolater; either the world, or some worldly lust, is his God; and no idolater can have, while such, any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God. 3. The reasonable advice which St. Paul gives the Ephesians, and us in them, not to be partakers of other men's sins: *Be not ye therefore partakers with them, lest ye be also par- takers with them in their plagues and punishments. Quest. But when may we be said to be partakers of other men's sins? Ans. When we consent to them, connive at them, rejoice in them, give counsel or command for them, by not hindering of them, by not publishing and punishing of them if in our power, by not mourning over them, but especially by joining with them in the sinful practice of them; all these ways are we partakers of other men's sins.

8 For ye were sometimes darkness, but now are ye light in the Lord: Walk as children of light;

Here the Ephesians are put in mind of the darkness and blindness of their heathen state, before the light of the gospel came among them; they were not only dark, very much in the dark, but darkness itself: He next acquaints them with their happy condition, by entertaining of the gospel of Christ, they thereby become light in the Lord, they were savingly enlightened by the word and Spirit of God; and accordingly he urges them to walk answerably to their Christian profession, walk as children of light. *Note here 1. That the state which every soul is in by nature, and before conversion, is a state of spiritual darkness; like men in the dark, they go they know not whither, they do they know not what they stumble and fall they know not how nor when. 2. That all those whom God calls effectually out of the darkness and ignorance of their natural and unregenerate state, he doth enlighten them by his word and holy Spirit. 3. That such as are so called and enlightened, ought to walk suitably to their privilege, and answerably to their high and honourable profession. Walk as children of light; that is, holy, humbly, cheerfully, thankfully before God, exemplarily, and unblameably before the world.*

9 (For the fruit of the Spirit is in all goodness and righteousness and truth.) 10 Proving what is acceptable unto the Lord.

These words contain a reason why the Ephesians, who were once darkness, but then enlightened by the holy Spirit, should walk as children of the light, namely, because the fruits of that light, or of the holy Spirit, the author of that light which they had received, is in all goodness; righteousness, and truth, that is, consisted in these things these are the fruits of the enlightening and enlivening Spirit of God; so that the force of the argument lies thus: Such a walking as is here directed to, namely, in the love and practice of universal righteousness and goodness, is the genuine fruit and natural result of the holy Spirit, and accordingly, as such, they were obliged to it; none can walk as children of the light, but such as are renewed and quickened by the holy Spirit of God, and made children of light, and such as will be found in the practice of those duties wherein that walk consisteth; proving what is acceptable unto the Lord: That is, first, To study the word, and find what is pleasing unto God. Secondly, To embrace with our hearts what we find to be so. And, thirdly, To practise in our lives what we embrace with our hearts. The scripture acquaints us with some persons and some performances which are very acceptable unto God; such persons as live most by faith, as are very upright in their walking walking, very sincere in all they do, such are greatly, acceptable unto God; so the performances are also acceptable, namely, when we do justice and judgment, this is more acceptable to the Lord than sacrifice; both communicative and distributive justice betwixt man and man, more pleasing to God than the highest acts of worship performed to him without this, Prov. xxi. 3. To serve Christ with a pure intention, with good will, or a willing mind, and to suffer patiently for well-doing, this is highly pleasing and acceptable unto God, 1. Pet. ii. 20.

11 And having no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them.

Observe here, 1. The odious character wherewith sin in general is branded; it is styled darkness, a work of darkness, works of darkness, and an unfruitful work.—Sin is styled darkness, because it originally springs from darkness, it naturally delights in darkness, it ultimately leads to eternal darkness.—Sin is called a work of darkness, to imply the drudgery and toil, the labour and pains, that the sinner is at in the service of sin; the work of sin is a mere drudgery; it is not a pleasureable service, but a laborious servitude.—And the apostle calling sin by the name of works, doth intimate to us, that one sin never goes single and alone, but has a dangerous train and retinue.—Finally, sin is an unfruitful work; not materially and subjectively unfruitful, for the corrupt nature of man is a rank soil in which sin thrives apace; but terminatively and ultimately, it is unfruitful in the conclusion, in the event and issue, Rom. vi. 21. What fruit, &c. 2. A dehortation, or negative precept, Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness; it is both the duty and interest of every Christian to have nothing to do with any sinful work; the preceptive will of God requires this, sin being contrary to the holiness of his nature and will; and the dignity and purity of the gospel calls for this, which is a law of holiness, and a rule of holy living. 3. A positive injunction, but rather reprove them. How are we to reprove the unfruitful workers and works of darkness? Two ways, (1.) By our lips; with plainness, but yet with prudence; with faithfulness, but yet with meekness; in reproof never use sharp words, if soft words will serve the turn. (2.) With our lives; thus Nehemiah, by his princely demeanour; did reprove the coverousness of former governors, Neh. v. 15. So did I, because of the fear of the Lord; a holy life is a visible and daily reproof given both to sin and sinners.

12 For it is a shame even to speak of those things which are done of them in secret. 13 But all things that are reproved, are made manifest by the light: for whatsoever doth make manifest is light:

Here our apostle assigns particular reasons why the Ephesians should have no fellowship with the unfruitful workers and works of darkness, but reprove them; namely, (1.) The abominable filthiness of those sins which the wicked Pagans committed, especially in their Heathen mysteries, prescribed by the devil as parts of his worship; such things done in secret, as it was even a shame to speak of. (2.) Because admonitions and reproof make the work of darkness manifest to the sinners conscience, set sin forth in its black and ugly colours. A discovery of sin in its vile ness, odiousness, and ugliness, is necessary to a sinners conviction of it, and conversion from it; and God doth not only bless the ministry of the word from the pulpit, but sometimes by a word of reproof from the mouth of a private Christian, and the light of his holy example, for this great end. A reproof piously and prudently given to open sinners, by private Christians, shall not miss of its end, it will certainly have its effect, either in the sinner's conversion and salvation, or in his obduration and condemnation; as all things reproveable are made manifest by light, so a prudent reproof and pious conversation put sin to shame, if not to silence.

14 Wherefore he saith, Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light.

The last argument which our apostle offers to consideration, for enforcing the duty of reproofing the unfruitful workers and works of darkness, is drawn from the example of God himself, whose great design it is, by his holy word, to awaken men out of the sleep of sin and death, that Christ may give them light. Here note, The dangerous and deplorable, though not hopeless and desperate state of an unconverted and impenitent sinner, namely, spiritual sleep and death; every man by nature is in a dead sleep till the renovating change; he apprehends things as a man asleep; all his thoughts of God and Christ, of heaven and hell, of sin and holiness, are slight and hovering notions, not real and thorough apprehensions; the most substantial realities are with them but phantasms and imaginations:—Imaginary dangers startle them, like men in a dream; but real dangers, though never so near, do not affect them: As in natural sleep, all the senses of the body, so in spiritual sleep, are all the senses of the soul bound up; and accordingly, this sleep is not casual, but connatural to our present sinful state; a soul drenched in sensuality sleeps as it were by choice, and not by chance. But how, O sinner! canst thou sleep under such a load of sin and guilt, with so many wounds in thy conscience, with so many ulcers in thy soul? Can a diseased man sleep? Can a condemned man sleep? Can a man in debt sleep? All this the sinner is; and yet, though God thunders above, and hell gapes from beneath, and the sinner hangs over it by the fretted thread of this life, yet he is in a profound sleep: but this damnation slumbers not, if he doth not speedily awake, and arise from the dead, that Christ may give him light.

15 See then that ye walk circumspectly, not as fools: but as wise.

These words may be considered two ways; either, first As a direction to those, who, according to the foregoing exhortation, do reprove sinners for their unfruitful works of darkness, namely, to walk very circumspectly themselves; see then how circumspectly you walk, so the words may be rendered; and it intimates to us, that those only are fit to reprove sin in others, who walk very circumspectly and unblameably themselves; such only have authority to reprove, and such only can hope for success in reproving, ver. 11. Rather reprove them; see then that ye walk circumspectly. Secondly, The words may be considered as a new precept, added by St. Paul to the former given in this chapter, for directing the Ephesians to an holy life; he assures them, that if they will walk holily, they must walk circumspectly, and that circumspect walking is wise walking. Observe here, 1. The necessity of circumspect walking. see that ye walk circumspectly. Learn hence, That it is impossible for a Christian to maintain a holy course, of obedience to the commands of God, without great care and caution, heedfulness and circumspection; none can walk holily, that do not walk circumspectly and watchfully; such is that weakness and inconstancy of our nature, so many and so subtle are our spiritual enemies, and so intimate with us, so strict and exact is the law of God we are to walk by, and so holy and jealous is that God we are to walk before, that it is impossible to walk before him acceptably, if we do not walk circumspectly. 2. As the necessity, so the excellency of circumspect walking; it is not foolish, unadvised, and unaccountable walking, but it is truly wise walking; such walking as the wisdom of God recommends to us, and such walking as bespeaks us truly and really wise; such as walk loosely, walk foolishly; careless walking is foolish walking, but circumspect walking is wise walking: For it is to be wise for ourselves, and wise as to our best and true interest; it is to be wise for time, and wise to eternity; wise both for this and for the coming world.

16 Redeeming the time, because the days are evil.

Observe here, 1. A most important and necessary duty exhorted to, namely, to redeem the time, This cannot be done in a natural sense: Time once past, is irrecoverably lost, we can no more recal it: But in a moral sense, time may be said to be redeemed, when our diligence to improve it is redoubled, when we do much work in a little time; to redeem time, supposes and implies a right knowledge of the use and end of time, and high valuation of the worth and excellence of time, and resolution to rescue it out of the hands of those that would devour it: Idleness, excess of sleep, inordinate adorning of the body, immoderate recreations, vain company, an excess of worldly business, all these are robbers of our time, and time must be rescued out of their hands. Quest. Who are the persons more especially concerned to redeem time? Ans. All those that are young: Such as have idly wasted a great part of their time: All that are ignorant and graceless; all that are weak and aged, and have but a few sands in their glass; all those that are recovered from sickness; and all such as, through poverty, restraint, or service, are scant of their time, should wisely redeem it, and industriously improve it, for God and their souls; because upon this moment depends eternity, and according to our present choice, will be our eternal lot. Observe, 2. The apostle's argument here, to excite all persons wisely to redeem their time, namely, because the days are evil; that is, full of sin, by the scandalous lives of professors; full of error, by the subtlety of heretical seducers; full of affliction and misery, by reason of sharp and hot persecutions; when days are most evil, most sinful or calamitous, then it is a Christians duty to improve his time well and wisely, for God and his soul.

17 Wherefore be not unwise, but understanding what the will of the Lord is.

As if he had said, Seeing that the times are so perilous, and your opportunities of doing good so uncertain, be wise, and understand what are the proper duties of your place and station, and know how to manage yourselves in every relation, with reference to the duties, dangers, snares, and temptations which may be before you, and this according to the will of God revealed in his word. Learn hence, That it is a special part of divine wisdom, to understand and know what is the mind and will of God concerning us, in every condition of life which his providence brings us into; to the intent that we may fill up every relation, with the proper duties of it, to the glory of God, and our own and others satisfaction.

18 And be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess; but be filled with the Spirit;

Observe here, 1. Our apostle's seasonable dehortation, Be not drunk with wine; drunkenness, as well as uncleanness, and drunkenness with uncleanness, for they commonly go together, were sins which the Ephesians and unconverted Pagans, were generally guilty of; St. Paul therefore cautions these new converts against this old sin, which transports men to insolent and outrageous practices, as the next words intimate, for therein is excess; the original word may be rendered lewdness and lust, to denote, that when persons are inflamed with wine, they are liable to all manner of excessive wickedness, and particularly to the sin of uncleanness. 2. The duty exhorted to, in order to the prevention of this sin, and that is, to labour and endeavour, instead of being filled with wine, to be full of the holy Spirit of God, to be filled with the sanctifying graces of the holy Spirit: Blessed be God, he allows us to seek after the greatest and fullest measures of the holy Spirit; and injurious we are to ourselves, if we content ourselves, with small measures and degrees of it. The sense of the words seems to be thus: Let no Christian allow himself in any sinful excesses; let him never fill himself with wine or strong drink, or with meat and drink to the full, for that fulness will breed all manner of sensual lusts in him, But let his desires and endeavours be carried out after the grace and Spirit of God, let him be filled therewith; for that fulness will keep the soul holy, the body chaste, and render the Christian fit for the service of God on earth, and meet for the fruition and enjoyment of God in heaven. Take your fill of the Spirit, you can never be over-filled

19 Speaking to yourselves in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs, singing and making melody in your heart to the Lord;

The apostle, in the foregoing verse, cautions the Ephesians against that drunkenness and uncleanness which did commonly attend them at the solemnities of their Heathen gods; their Bacchanalia, or feasts dedicated to Bacchus the god of wine, were usually concluded with excessive drunkenness ness and uncleanness. In these drunken feasts, they had their drunken hymns, which they sang to their drunken deity, in praise of him whom they called the god of wine: Now in opposition to these drunken and impure songs, the apostle exhorts the Christian Ephesians to sing the psalms of David, or the hymns composed by spiritual men, such as Zachariah and Simeon, or by the efflatus of the holy Spirit, which in those times did immediately inspire persons both to pray and sing in their assemblies, 1 Cor. xiv. 15. singing these with the mouth, and also making melody in your heart to the Lord. Note here, The hearts and spirits of good men are full of spiritual mirth and joy; they are as merry in the Lord, as sinners in their lust; that it is lawful and laudable for them to express their mirth, and give vent to their spiritual joy, by singing; that psalms and hymns, and spiritual songs do best become their mouths, when they perform those spiritual exercises; that, in singing these, there must be an inward harmony, and musical melody in the soul and heart, as well as in the tongue; besides, a melodious tuning of the voice, the exercise of the understanding, and the orderly motions of the affections, must accompany them that will make melody in the heart to the Lord in their singing. Singing of psalms then both in public assemblies, and in private families, and sounding forth the high praises of God for mercies received, is a special duty to be jointly performed by all persons capable of it.

20 Giving thanks always for all things unto God, and the Father, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ;

The next duty St. Paul exhorts to, is that of spiritual thanksgiving. Where note, 1. The time when it ought to be performed, always, that is, at least every day, and upon every solemn occasion, keeping the heart continually in a praising, as well as praying frame. 2. The matter for which we are to give thanks, for all things; that is, first, For all providences, whether prosperous or adverse; for sickness as well as health, God intending our good by both. Secondly, For all mercies, for sparing mercy, preventing mercy, recovering mercy, for common benefits, for peculiar and distinguishing favours, for mercies received, for mercies expected, for what we have in hand, and what we have in hope. 3. The person to whom our thanksgivings are to be offered, to God and the Father, to God our Creator, to God as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and our Father in him. 4. The person through whom our thanksgivings are acceptable unto God, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ; as all spiritual addresses, both of praise and thanksgiving, must be offered up to God, so their acceptance with God is only to be expected by or through our Lord Jesus Christ.

21 Submitting yourselves one to another in the fear of God. 22 Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands, as unto the Lord. 23 For the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the Church: and he is the Saviour of the body. 24 Therefore as the Church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in every thing.

Our apostle having exhorted the Ephesians to such general duties as belong to all Christians, comes now to exhort them to the practice of relative duties, as they are members of societies, and particularly as they live in a family society one with another, as husbands and wives, parents and children, masters and servants: much of the life and power of religion appearing in the conscientious practice and performance of relative duties. But, first, he gives them a general direction, to submit themselves one to another in the fear of God; that is, by yielding and mutually condescending to each other, stooping to the meanest offices of love and kindness one towards another, and this in the fear of God; that is, either in obedience to the command of God, which enjoins this submission, for then we perform our duty towards one another acceptably, and as we ought, when we eye the command of God; or else in the fear of God; that is, making the fear of God the rule and measure of our submission one to another: for we are by no means bound to submit ourselves, in order to the pleasing of our neighbor, any farther than is consistent with that subjection and obedience which we owe to God. Learn hence, That where that noble and divine principle of the fear of God prevaileth in the heart, it will make a man conscientiously careful of his duty towards man; the fear of God in him will have both the force of a motive to quicken him up unto, and also of a rule to guide and direct him in that submission, which in obedience to God, is due and payable to his neighbours. Having laid down this general rule, now he comes to press us to the practice of particular duties: Wives, submit yourselves to your own husbands, &c. Note here, He begins with the wife's duty first, before the husband's, probably because her duty of entire subjection is the most difficult duty, and that being conscientiously discharged, is a compelling motive to the husband to set about his duty in like manner. 2. The particular and special duty which the wife is exhorted to, and that is submission: Wives, submit yourselves. This supposes the wife's due esteem of, and her affectionate love unto her husband, as the root of this submission. 3. The universality and extensive nature of the command, it is to all wives, to pay this tribute of subjection to their own husbands; no honour, superiority, or antecedent dignity in the wife, no personal infirmity, no moral infirmity, nay, no error in religion, can give a discharge from this obligation; there is no wife, whatever her birth and breeding, whatever her parts or privileges may be, that is exempted from this tie of subjection to her husband, for the law of nature, the ordinance of God, and her own voluntary covenant and promise in marriage, do oblige and bind her to it. Yet, note, 4. The qualification and manner of this submission: it must be as unto the Lord; that is, in obedience to the command of the Lord, who has given the husband power over the wife, and required, and will reward her obedience to him: or else, as unto the Lord, it pointed out a similitude, and likeness, and resemblance, in the wife's subjection to the husband, with that which they owe to Christ the Lord, that is, it must not be feigned, but sincere, it must not be constrained, but willing, from a complacency taken in the doing of this duty. And, lastly, As unto the Lord, that is, in all lawful things: the wife is by no means to obey the husband in any commands which which are contrary to that submissive obedience which she owes to Christ, her supreme Lord. Now with this limitation, the wife, in subjecting herself to her husband, is subject unto the Lord. 5. The reason given by the Holy Ghost for enforcing this duty of submissive obedience upon wives, ver. 23. For the husband is the head of the wife, even as Christ is the head of the church, &c. that is, the wife ought to submit herself to her husband, because, (1.) He is her head: and, (2.) Therein doth resemble Christ's headship over his church. Observe here, That this metaphor of an head, applied to the husband, denotes both the dignity and duty of the husband: it implies his eminency, by reason of his sex; it implies his authority to govern and direct, as the head has power to guide and govern the whole body, and it points out his duty, as well as his dignity: as the head is the seat of wisdom and knowledge, so husbands should be endowed with greater measures of knowledge and prudence, to enable them to guide and govern in the place God has set them. And further the apostle would have wives consider and observe that God will have some resemblance of Christ's authority over the church, held forth in the husband's authority over the wife. Is Christ an Head of dominion and direction also to his church? So should the husband be to his wife. Doth Christ exercise his dominion and power over the church, not rigidly and tyrannically, but with meekness and gentleness? So should the husband rule. In a word, Is Christ the Saviour of the body meritoriously? So should the husband be ministeriously, to defend the wife from injuries, to supply her necessities, and to improve his whole power and authority over her for her good. 6. The manner of this subjection specified and declared: as the church is subject, so let the wife be subject. Is the church subject to Christ willingly, cheerfully, dutifully, delightfully? So let the wife be subject. Doth the church subject itself to Christ universally? So let the wife be subject in all things: Not absolutely in all things, but in all things lawful, godly, and honest: nothing is excepted out of the wife's subjection to her husband, but that which is contrary to her duty to Him who commanded this subjection; when there appears little discretion in the husband's command, then there will appear a great sense of duty in the wife's obedience.

25 Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church, and gave himself for it; 26 That he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the word, 27 That he might present it to himself a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish.

The apostle having propounded the wife's duty first, recommends the husband's duty next: her's was the duty of submission, his of love and intire affection. This the apostle mentions, because the husband, for want of love, is too ready to abuse that sovereignty and superiority which God has given him over his wife, by proving rigorous and bitter unto her: therefore, says he, Husbands, love your wives, that is, with a special, peculiar, conjugal love, such as no other must share in. This duty of love is very comprehensive, and it includes a very affectionate regard to her, a tender care over her, co-habitation with her, contentment and satisfaction in her alone, a patient bearing with her weaknesses, a prudential hiding of her infirmities, a providing a supply of her wants suitable to her rank, a readiness to instruct and direct her, a willingness to pray for her, and with her: Where true conjugal love is found, these duties included will be performed. Observe next, As the apostle propounded the church for a pattern of subjection to the wife, so he propounds Christ as a pattern of love to husbands: Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the Church. Did he love his church with an active and operative love, with a real and sincere love, with an intire and undivided love, with a lasting and constant love, notwithstanding all his church's weaknesses and failings? Such ought the husbands love to be; that is, every husband to his own wife: No meanness of birth, no want of education, no homeliness of person, no forwardness of disposition, in the wife, will discharge the husband from the obligation of this duty towards her; Christ's example hath both the force of an argument to excite us to it, and is also an exact rule to guide and direct us in it: Husbands love your wives, as Christ also loved the church. Observe farther, The instances and evidences which Christ has given of his love unto his church: He gave himself for her, that he might sanctify and cleanse, and present her to himself a glorious church, without spot or blemish. Here note, 1. The church's polluted and impure condition, supposed before Christ gave himself for her; the church in herself was, as the world is, polluted, otherwise she had stood in no need of Christ's washing and cleansing. 2. The care of Christ to purify and cleanse his church from this pollution; he gave himself for her, that he might sanctify and cleanse her; he loved her, and washed her from her sins in his own blood. 3. The instrumental means of the church's sanctification, it was with the washing of water by the word; the word and sacraments are the instrumental means, in the hand of Christ, by which he applies the virtue and efficacy of his death, for the sanctifying and cleansing of his church and children, 4. The holy and glorious condition which the church shall be found in at the great marriage-day, without spot or wrinkle, that he might, at the last day, present her to himself a spotless spouse, a glorious church, having no spot of sin, or wrinkle of deformity, or any such imperfect thing, but be perfectly beautiful, holy, and without blemish; intimating, that the church hath her spots and wrinkles now in her militant state; but when Christ shall at last present the church triumphant to himself, then shall she be like himself, without spot. Bless'd be God, believers have now a righteousness in Christ, without spot or wrinkle; then shall they have an holiness in themselves, without spot or wrinkle; nothing of imperfection cleaving to them, or inhering in them. The blood of Christ has already perfectly justified, and thoroughly cleansed believers from sin's guilt; ere long the Spirit of Christ will perfectly cleanse them from all sin's filth. Oh, what a pure and spotless, what a perfect and beautiful creature will the church come out of Christ's hands, and be presented to the Father, at the great day, in the shining beauty of perfect holiness! God strengthen our faith in the belief of it, and prepare us for the full fruition and final enjoyment of it.

28 So ought men to love their wives, as their own bodies. He that loveth his wife, loveth himself. 29 For no man ever yet hated his own flesh; but nourisheth and cherisheth it, even as the Lord the church; 30 For we are members of his body, of his flesh, and of his bones.

Our apostle here propounds a farther argument to enforce this duty of love from husband to wife, taken from that near conjunction between them, shewing that they are one flesh, and one body, not in a natural, but in a relative sense; and accordingly a man should so love his wife, even as himself: Doth a man love himself superlatively, cordially, tenderly, industriously, perseveringly? So ought he to love his wife. Will a man be out of love with himself, much less hate himself, though he be deformed, or by some accident maimed? In like manner ought not any natural defect, or accidental mischance, to cause a remission, much less a cessation of the man's love unto his own wife; as it is an unnatural thing for a man to hate his own flesh personal, so his own flesh relational. Again: A man is so far from hating his own flesh, that he nourisheth and cherisheth it with the utmost care and tenderness; in like manner ought he to kind to, and tender over his civil-self, the wife of his bosom; in imitation likewise of Christ's example, who nourishes and cherishes his church, as being flesh of his own flesh, and bone of his own bone: that is, as near to one another by his mystical and spiritual union, as Adam and Eve were by matrimonial union. O stupendous privilege, for believers and Christ to be as one flesh! Husband and wife are not so near, soul and body are not so near, as Christ and believers are to each other.

31 For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall be joined unto his wife, and they two shall be one flesh. 32 This is a great mystery: but I speak concerning Christ and the church. 33 Nevertheless, let every one of you in particular so love his wife, even as himself; and the wife see that she reverence her husband.

Here the apostle uses a farther argument to excite the husband's love to his espoused wife, taken from the law of marriage, which maketh them two one flesh in a civil sense therefore the man should leave father and mother, and cleave to his wife: Not that their obligations cease to their parents, or as if they were to cast off natural affection to them; but he shews, that there is a nearer union betwixt husband and wife, than betwixt parents and child, and that the bonds of matrimonial love are stronger than those of nature. Their being said to be one flesh, implies a most strict union, and most intimate communion, whereby they have one interest, common goods, common friends, yea, and all things common, as if they were but one person; but the apostle further intimates to us, at the 31st verse, that this matrimonial union betwixt man and wife was designed by God, to shadow forth and represent that mystical union which is betwixt Christ and his church. Doth the conjugal union give the wife an interest in the estate and honour of the husband, be she never so meanly descended in herself? In like manner from the saints union with Christ, does there immediately result a sweet and blessed communion or fellowship with Christ in graces and spiritual privileges; all that Christ is, and has, is theirs by communication to them, or improvement for them; well might the apostle therefore say, This is a great mystery, &c. In the 33d verse, the apostle shuts up his discourse upon this argument, with a repeated exhortation to the husband to love his wife, and to the wife to reverence her husband; Let every one of you in particular, so love his wife, even as himself: So love, that is, with an extensive love, reaching the whole person, soul and body; with an intensive love, above all persons and relatives whatsoever; with an hearty love, without dissimulation; with an holy love, without pollution; with a constant love, without alteration; and with great love beyond comparison.—And let the wife see that she reverence her husband. The great duty which the wife owes to her husband is reverence. This is made up of three ingredients; namely, estimation, love, and fear; the wife that reverences her husband, esteems him, and dares not think meanly of him; her esteem of him provokes her love unto him; and her love of him is accompanied with an ingenuous fear to offend and grieve him; and the wife expresses this reverence in her gestures, by a respectful demeanour towards him, in her speeches to him when with her, and of him when absent from her, always mentioning him with respect and honour; in her actions, by complying with his desires, by following his directions, by hearkening to his reproofs, and by her cheerful and respectful behaviour towards him at all times, and in all places, as well at home as abroad before the world. And that the wife may thus reverence her husband, let her be earnest with God in prayer, for wisdom and understanding, for prudence and patience, for humility and meekness; a proud spirit would not agree with an angel, but the humble will agree with any person.

CHAP. VI.

CHILDREN, obey your parents in the Lord: For this is right. 2 Honour thy father and mother, (which is the first commandment with promise) 3 That it may be well with thee, and thou mayest live long on the earth.

Our apostle, in the foregoing chapter, began to treat of relative duties, and concluded that chapter with the duties of husbands and wives; he begins this with the duty of children and parents to each other: And here we have observable, that he begins with the duty of the inferior first, of the child to the parents, as he did before with the duty of the wife, chap. v. 22. He first puts them in mind of their duty who are to obey; that being the most difficult duty, and the persons concerned in it usually more defective, and the work less easy and pleasing to our nature. 2. The important duty which children are directed to, the duty of obedience and honour; Children, obey; honour your father and mother; this duty of honour and obedience implies inward reverence, and a lawfulness of their persons, and honouring of them in heart, speech and behaviour; it implies also outward observance, a pious regard to their instructions, executing all their commands which are not sinful, depending on their counsels, and following their good examples, owning with thankfulness their parents care and concern for them, and recovering the failings and infirmities found in them. 3. The object of this duty, both parents; not the father alone, or the mother only, but the father and mother jointly; Children, obey your parents; honour thy father and thy mother; as obedience belongeth to all children, of what age or sex, or condition soever, so are children obliged to obey both parents, the mother as well as the father, yea, she is named first Lev. xix. 3. her sex being weaker, she is the more subject to contempt; and because the mother, in old age, is liable to be despised. God has particularly guarded about her, by his positive and express command, to free her from contempt, Prov. xxiii. 22. saying, Hearken to thy father who begat thee, and despise not thy mother when she is old. 4. The noble principle from whence this obedience in children to parents ought to flow, namely, from the fear of God; obey them in the Lord, that is in obedience to his command, and in all things agreeable to his will, fearing his displeasure in case of disobedience; let not your obedience be barely natural and prudential, but Christian and religious. 5. The arguments used by our apostle to excite to the practice of this duty. The first argument is drawn from the equity of it, this is right, that is, the law of God and nature requires it. The great motive which ought to excite us to the practice of any duty, is not so much the advantageousness, as the righteousness and equity of the duty, as being commanded by God, and well-pleasing in his sight; Children, obey your parents in the Lord, for this is right. A second argument is, because this is the first commandment of the second table, which has a particular promise annexed to it: This is the first commandment with promise, that is, with an explicit and express promise; for every commandment hath both a promise and a threatening implied in it, and annexed to it; but this is the first commandment with a promise expressed, and that is a promise of long life, that thy days may be long; and this promise is always fulfilled, either in kind or in equivalency, either by enjoying a long life on earth, or a better life in heaven. Learn hence, That although our first and chief motive to obedience, be the equity and righteousness of what God requires, yet we may, as a secondary encouragement, have respect to the promised reward, and particularly to the temporal advantage of our obedience. Long life is here promised to children, as an encouragement to obedience, which is in itself a very valuable mercy and blessing; and having eyed the command of God in the first place, they may and ought to have respect to the recompence of reward in the next place.

4 And ye, fathers, provoke not your children to wrath: But bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord.

Here the duty of both parents to their children is laid down. Where note, 1. The apostle's dehortation, or negative precept Provoke not your children to wrath, that is, be not too severe towards them, abuse not your parental power, over them, provoke them not, nor embitter their spirits against you, by denying them what is convenient for them, by inveighing with bitter words against them, by unjust, unseasonable, or immoderate correction of them. To provoke or stir up any to sin, especially young ones, and particularly our children, renders us guilty before the Lord, of all that sin which they have committed through our provocation; Fathers, provoke not your children to wrath. Note, 2. St. Paul's positive injunction given unto parents; Bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord: Where, (1.) He directs to their education; Bring them up. (2.) To join nurture and admonition with their education; Bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord: That is, give them good instruction, withhold not early correction, set before them good example, begin with them betimes, and suffer not the devil, the world, and the flesh, to bespeak them for their service, before you engage them for God's; and remember, that there is a tie of nature, a tie of interest, and a tie of religion, which parents are under thus to do.

5 Servants, be obedient to them that are your masters according to the flesh, with fear and trembling, in singleness of your heart, as unto Christ; 5 Not with eye-service, as men pleasers, but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart; 7 With good-will doing service, as to the Lord, and not to men: 8 Knowing that whatsoever good thing any man doth, the same shall he receive of the Lord, whether he be bond or free.

Observe here, 1. The general duty incumbent upon servants, that of obedience to their masters, according to the flesh, that is, in temporal things only; obey your earthly masters in things pertaining to the world, leaving the soul and conscience to God only, who alone is the sovereign Lord of it. Christian liberty is not inconsistent with civil subjection; such as are God's freemen may be servants to men, though not the servants of men; and, as servants, obedience is their duty in all lawful things. 2. The qualifications and properties of this obedience, which is due and payable from servants to masters. (1.) It must be with fear and trembling, that is, with fear of displeasing them; yet they must not act barely from fear, but out of love both to God and their master. (2.) It must be in singleness of heart, in great simplicity and sincerity of spirit, without guile, hypocrisy and dissimulation. (3.) They must eye their great Master in heaven in all the services they perform to their masters here on earth, not with eye-service. But how should servants have an eye to their great Master in heaven? Ans. They should have an eye to the presence of their great Master, to the glory of their great Master, to the command of their great Master, and to the assistance and acceptance of their Master in heaven. Learn hence, That our eyeing of God in all the services we perform, and making him the judge and spectator of all all our actions, will be a singular help to make us sincere and single-hearted in all we do, and in all we design. Again, (4.) Their service must be performed with good-will, that is, with cheerfulness and delight, not grudgingly, unpleasantly, or from fear of punishment only; eyeing the Lord Christ in all that service they do for men. Learn hence, That the meanest and basest services and employments, in the place and station which God sets us in, being done with right qualifications, with faithfulness and cheerfulness, from right motives, and for right ends, is service done to Christ, and, as such, shall be accepted and rewarded by him, with good-will, doing service, as to the Lord, and not to man, Observe, lastly, The reward which the Holy Ghost propounds, as an encouragement to poor servants, in their obedience to their masters; and that is, the assurance of a reward from God, whatever disappointment they may meet with from men: knowing that whatever a man doth out of obedience to the Lord, a reward of the same shall he receive, whether he be a poor bond servant, or a free man and master. Note here, How the basest drudgery of servants, when performed in obedience to God, and with an eye at his glory, is called here a good work, and shall not fail of a good reward: Whatever good thing any man doth; when a poor servant scours a ditch, or does the meanest drudgery, God will reward him for it; for he looketh not at the beauty, splendour, and greatness of the work, but at the integrity and honesty of the workman; the mean and outwardly base works of poor servants, when honest and sincere, shall find acceptance with God, and be rewarded by him; as well as the more splendid, honourable, and expensive works of their rich masters.

9 And ye, masters, do the same things unto them, forbearing threatening: knowing that your master also is in heaven; neither is there respect of persons with him.

Here the master's duty, to his servant is directed to, both generally, and more particularly; in general, he directs masters to do the same things to their servants; not the same things for kind, but for manner of doing them; that is, in obedience to the same command of God, with an eye to the same glory of God, with the same singleness of heart, with the same love and good-will. Here note, That the greatest master, yea, the greatest prince and potentate upon earth, lie under obligations, in point of duty to their servants and inferiors; and it ought to be as much their care to discharge their duty sincerely, cheerfully, with good-will, and eyeing their great master in heaven, as it concerns the poorest servant to obey them in and after the same manner; Ye masters, do the same things unto them. Next follow the particular directions given to masters, namely, To forbear threatenings; that is, let them not exercise their authority over them imperiously and with rigour, but mildly, and with gentleness: Rule them not tyrannically, but govern with moderation and temper. Lord! how ordinary is it for men in place and power a little above others, to insult over, and trample upon others, forgetting that there is one above them, whom they must be accountable unto themselves! Forbearing threatenings, knowing that your master also is in heaven, with whom there is no respect of persons. Here we have almighty God described two ways: (1.) From his magnificence and stately palace, in which his illustrious glory shineth; your Master is in heaven; not as if he were only there, and no where else, but eminently there, though every where else. (2.) God is here described by his justice and impartiality in judging; There is no respect of persons with him, that is, when the rich master and poor servant come to stand upon a level before him, he will not respect either of them for their outward circumstances, but, as a just judge, reward them both according to their works. Thus our apostle concludes his exhortation to the practice and performance of relative duties, between husband and wife, parent and child, master and servant. He now closes his epistle with a special exhortation to all Christians, to look upon themselves as spiritual soldiers, listed under Christ's exalted banner, engaged in a continual warfare with the world, and the prince of the world; and accordingly, he bespeaks them in martial phrase to the end of the chapter.

10 Finally, my brethren, be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might. 11 Put on the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil.

Our apostle, calling us here forth to the Christian warfare, gives forth first the word of encouragement to battle, Be strong in the Lord, and in his mighty power. A Christian, above all men, needs resolution, and a daring courage; if he be possessed with fear, he is unfit to go into the field; if dispirited with strong impressions of danger, how unready for the encounter; Cowards win neither earth nor heaven. But where lies the Christian's strength? Verily, in the Lord, and not in himself; the strength of the whole host of saints lies in the Lord, of hosts, and accordingly, it ought to be the Christian's great care, in all difficulties and dangers, to strengthen his faith, on the Almighty power of God. Observe, 1. A direction given how a saint may come to be strong in the Lord, namely, by putting on the whole armour of God; that is, by being clothed with the following graces, which are hereafter mentioned in this chapter; as, the shield of faith, the breastplate of righteousness, the sword of the Spirit, &c. Now these are called armour of God, because they are of his appointment and institution, and of his make and constitution; and this armour must be put on, that is, our grace kept in continual exercise; it is one thing to have armour in the house, and another to have it buckled on in the field; it is not sufficient to have grace in the habit and principle, but it is grace in act and exercise that must conquer spiritual enemies. 3. A reason assigned why the Christian is to be thus completely armed, that he may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil; intimating, that the devil is one chief enemy we have to combat with in the Christian warfare, and that this enemy is a wily, subtle enemy, discovering his dangerous policy first by tempting and alluring into sin, and then by vexing and tormenting for sin: But Satan, with all his wits and wiles, shall never finally vanquish (though he may, in a particular battle, overcome) a soul clad with spiritual armour; nay, he that hath hath this armour of God on, shall certainly vanquish and overcome him : Put on the whole armour of God, &c.

12 For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places.

The apostle mentioned our enemy in the former verse ; here he describes the combat in this verse We wrestle : A Christian's life is a perpetual warfare, a continual wrestling ; but with what and with whom ? Ans. Negatively, not with flesh and blood ; that is, not only or chiefly with flesh and blood, with human enemies, but we must grapple and contend with evangelical powers, with devils, who are principalities and powers, &c. Note here, How the devil and his angels are described ; (1.) By their princelike authority and government which they exercise in the world, called therefore principalities and powers, to denote that Satan is a great and mighty prince ; a prince that has the heart and knee of all his subjects. (2.) By the seat of his empire, he rules in this world, not in the other ; the highest the devil can go, is the air ; heaven fears him not : And he is a ruler of the darkness of this world, that is, in such sinners as labour under the darkness of sin and ignorance. (3.) Satan and his angels are here described by their spiritual nature, called spiritual wickednesses, that is, wicked spirits, intimating to us, that the devils are spirits ; that they are spirits extremely wicked ; and that these wicked spirits do chiefly annoy Christians with, and provoke them to spiritual wickedness. (4.) They are described by their residence or place of abode, in high places ; that is, in the air, of which he is called the prince. From the whole, note, How plainly Christ our Captain deals with all his soldiers, and the difference between Christ's dealing with his followers, and Satan with his ; Satan durst not let sinners know who that God is whom they fight against, but Christ is not afraid to shew his saints their enemy in all his power and strength ; well he might, because the weaknesses of God are stronger than the powers of hell.

13 Wherefore, take unto you the whole armour of God, that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day, and having done all to stand. 14 Stand therefore, having your loins girt about with truth, and having on the breast-plate of righteousness ; 15 And your feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace ; 16 Above all, taking the shield of faith, wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked. 17 And take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God : 18 Praying always with all prayer and supplication in the Spirit, and watching thereunto with all perseverance, and supplication for all saints ;

Observe here, 1. How our apostle having described the enemy in the foregoing verse, and set him forth in his formidable strength and power, comes forth at the head of his Ephesian camp, gives them a fresh alarm, and bids them arm, arm ! Take unto you the whole armour of God, that you may be able to stand in the evil day ; intimating, that an evil day is before us ; that it shall be of mighty advantage to us to be able to stand in the evil day ; and without the help of divine armour, we cannot stand in that day. The sanctifying graces of God's Spirit, are this armour ; he that has not these, let his common gifts be never so gay and glorious, he will never hold out to fight the last battle, but fall into the enemy's hand, and be taken captive by him at his will. 2. How our apostle comes to describe the armour of God, piece by piece, which the Christian is to put on before he takes the field against the enemy : Here is the soldier's girdle, his breast-plate, his shoe, his shield, his helmet, and his sword, all described ; his offensive and defensive weapons, wherewith soldiers of old used to arm their bodies from head to foot ; now the apostle assigneth to particular graces, an use and excellency answerable to these pieces of armour, and shews, that there is some resemblance between every grace and that piece of the bodily armour to which it is here compared ; but observable it is, that although there be pieces of armour for all other parts of the body, here is none assigned for the back, nor back-parts, because there must be no running away, no hope of escaping by flight in this spiritual warfare ; if we turn our back upon our enemy, we lie open to his darts, and are in danger of destruction ; if we fight on, we have our second in the field, and are sure of victory, provided we enter the field in order, and stand to our arms, maintain our watch, keep our ground, and appear armed cap-a-pee, from head to foot, with the several pieces of armour here recommended : The first of which is the girdle of truth, ver. 14. Having your loins girt about with truth, that is, sincerity of heart. Doth a girdle or belt adorn the soldier ? So doth sincerity adorn the Christian. Doth the girdle strengthen the soldier's loins ? So doth sincerity strengthen the soul, and every grace in the soul ; it is sincere faith that is strong faith ; it is sincere love that is mighty love. Secondly, The breast-plate of righteousness ; by which isto he understood the love and practice of universal holiness. But why is this compared to a breast-plate ? Ans. Because, as the breast-plate defends the most principle parts of the body, where the heart and other vitals are closely couched together ; thus holiness preserves the soul and conscience, the principal parts of a Christian, from the wounds and harms of sin, which is the weapon that Satan uses, to give conscience its deadly stab with. The third piece of Christian armour, is the spiritual shoe, fitted to the soldier's foot, and worn by him so long as he keeps the field against sin and Satan ; the soldier's way is sometimes full of sharp stones, and sometimes by the enemy strewed with sharp iron spikes struck into the ground ; the soldier will soon be wounded, or soundered, if not well shod ; therefore, the direction here is, Let your feet be shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace ; that is, maintaining an holy readiness of spirit, and a resolute frame of heart, to undergo any suffering, and endure any hardship in your Christian warfare ; which frame of spirit being wrought in us by the doctrine of the gospel, is therefore called the preparation of the gospel of peace. The fourth piece of armour recommended above all, to be put on, is the shield of faith; this is that grace by which we believe the truth of God's word in general, and depend upon Christ in particular, as crucified for pardon and life, and this upon the warrant of the promise. But why is faith compared to a shield? Ans. Because, as the shield defends the whole body, so faith defends the whole man; the understanding from error, the conscience from fearedness, the will from rebellion against the will and command of God: And, as the shield defends the whole armour, as well as the soldier's whole body; it defends the breast plate, as well as the breast; so faith is our armour upon armour, a grace that preserves all other graces whatsoever. The fifth piece of armour is mentioned, ver. 17. The helmet of salvation; by which the grace of hope is understood, which has for its object salvation, called therefore the hope of salvation; salvation is the ultimate and comprehensive object of the Christian's expectation; and it is compared to an helmet; because, as the helmet defends the head, so doth the hope of salvation defend the soul; it keeps the head above water, and makes the Christian bold and brave: Hope is a grace of singular use and excellent service to a Christian, in the whole course of his Christian warfare; it puts him upon noble services, it keeps him patient under the greatest sufferings, and it will enable the soul to wait long for the performance of divine promises. The sixth piece of spiritual armour is the sword, ver. 17. The former were defensive, but this is both an offensive and defensive weapon, such is the word of God: But why compared to a sword? Ans. In regard both of its necessity and excellency; the sword was ever esteemed a most necessary and useful part of the soldier's furniture; of such usefulness, necessity, and excellency, is the word of God, by which the Christian doth defend himself, and offend his enemies: But why is it called the sword of the Spirit? Ans. Because the Spirit was the author of it; the Spirit of God is the interpreter of it; and it is the Spirit that gives the word its efficacy and power in the soul; the word of God, contained in the scriptures, is the sword by which the Spirit of God enables his saints to overcome and vanquish all their enemies. The seventh and last piece of spiritual armour is mentioned, ver. 18. and that is, prayer; praying always, with all prayer, &c. Here note, The time for prayer, praying always; the sorts and kind of prayer, praying always with all prayer; the inward principle of prayer, from which it must flow, in the Spirit; the guard to set about the duty of prayer, watching thereunto; the constancy to be exercised in the duty, with all perseverance; the comprehensiveness of the duty, for all saints. Learn, That prayer is a necessary duty for all Christians, and to be used, with all other pieces of spiritual armour, by the Christian soldier.

19 And for me, that utterance may be given unto me, that I may open my mouth boldly, to make known the mystery of the gospel: 20 For which I am an ambassador in bonds: That therein I may speak boldly, as I ought to speak.

Our apostle having directed the Ephesians to the duty of prayer in general, desires them here to pray for himself in particular. Where observe, 1. His exhortation and direction to pray for himself, and all the ministers of the gospel; and for me. Learn hence, That the ministers of Christ are and ought, in a special manner, to be remembered in the saints prayers. Observe, 2. The mercy which he desires them to pray for, that utterance may be given; namely, a readiness to deliver to others what God has handed into us. Ministers depend upon God for utterance, and it is their people's duty to be earnest with God to give it to them. 3. The end why he desires this utterance, that he may open his mouth boldly, to make known the mystery of the gospel. Where note, 1. The sublime nature of the gospel, it is a mystery. 2. The work of the gospel-minister; and that is, to make known that gospel-mystery. 3. The manner how he is to perform this work, that I may open my mouth boldly; namely, in asserting truth, and in reproving sin, with a wise and prudent, with a meek and humble, with an active and zealous boldness. Observe, 4. A double argument to back and enforce his request, to pray for him; (1.) From his office, for which I am an ambassador: The ministers of the gospel are God's ambassadors; and shall not their people pray for the success of their embassies? (2.) From his afflicted state, he was an ambassador in bonds; his zeal for God, and his truth, confined him to a prison; he preached himself into a goal; well therefore might they pray for him, who had now lost his liberty, and soon after, was to lose his life for them; no prayers can be too much to strengthen the hands, and encourage the hearts of such as suffer tribulation and persecution for the sake of Christ.

21 But that ye also may know my affairs, and how I do; Tychicus, a beloved brother and faithful minister in the Lord, shall make known to you all things: 22 Whom I have sent unto you for the same purpose, that ye might know our affairs, and that he might comfort your hearts.

Observe here, 1. The tender love and affectionate regard which St. Paul bore to these Ephesians, in the midst of his sufferings, and during his imprisonment; he not only wrote, but sent to them; no doubt, the apostle had but few, very few fast friends with him at Rome, whom he could repose an entire confidence in, and receive great consolation from; however, he will deny himself, to serve them: A faithful minister of Jesus Christ, is so tenderly affectionate towards his flock, that he prefers their spiritual edification before his own private and particular advantage; though St. Paul was now a prisoner, and under a daily expectation of death, and had few to attend him, yet he sends one of his most beloved friends away to them, choosing rather himself to want an attender, than that they should want a comforter; nothing better becomes a minister of Christ than a public spirit. 2. The character of the person whom St. Paul sent unto them; he is described, (1.) By his name, Tychicus. (2.) By his state, he was a brother, that is, a Christian, a beloved brother, a brother in Christ. (3.) By his office, he was a minister, yea, a faithful minister in the Lord, that is, in the work of the Lord;

Lord; between whom and St. Paul there was a sweet harmony, an happy union of hearts, a joint care and endeavour in carrying on the interest of Christ amongst the churches: Behold! how good and pleasant a thing it is, when ministers of Christ are dear to each other; when, instead of divisions, emulations, and strife amongst them, they can give testimonials of each other, as well deserving; without endeavouring to conceal and obscure the gifts and graces of God, which are eminent in any of their fellow-labourers, on purpose only to set off themselves, that their own performances may be the more taken notice of. St. Paul was far from this Spirit, as appears by the character which upon a fit occasion, he gave of Tychicus. 3. The design and end which St. Paul had in sending Tychicus unto them, and that was two-fold: (1.) That he might acquaint them with St. Paul's condition and state; that ye might know my affairs, how I do, and what I do, I have sent Tychicus to declare unto you all things. What! all things without exception? Yes, both doings and suffering; the apostle was ashamed of neither. Learn thence, That the life and conversation of ministers, both public and private, must, and ought to be such, that they need not be ashamed to have it known, or concerned that the church should know what they do, how they manage, to the intent that their people may be edified by their conversation, as well as instructed by their preaching; Tychicus shall declare unto you all things. The second end St. Paul had in sending Tychicus from himself to the Ephesians, was, that he might comfort their hearts. But how could Tychicus do this? These ways: (1.) By making known to them the true cause of his sufferings. St. Paul's enemies had laid heavy things to his charge, these might perhaps fly as far as Ephesus; now, though the apostle regarded little what the wicked world said of him, yet he desired to be set right in the thoughts of the churches, and accordingly sends Tychicus to acquaint them with the cause of his imprisonment. (2.) To keep them from discouragement, and being inordinately cast down at the report of his sufferings: No doubt, St. Paul's chain entered into their souls, and his sufferings were their sorrows; he therefore sends Tychicus to prevent their immoderate sorrow and mourning upon his account. (3.) To comfort their hearts with the report of that holy joy and cheerfulness of spirit which was found with him in and under all his sufferings. Oh! it is an excellent sight to behold the saints at liberty mourning over their afflicted brethren; and they that are sufferers become comforters of them that are at liberty. Lord! never doth thy holy religion appear more glorious, than when thy ministers commend it by their sufferings for it; and no way can they commend it higher, than by an holy, humble cheerfulness of spirit in their sufferings for it; thy ministers preach with far greater advantage from a prison, than they can from a pulpit. (4.) Might not St. Paul send Tychicus now to the church at Ephesus, to engage the churches to pray with earnestness for himself, as well as to comfort them? Oh! none so covetous of prayers as the ministers of Christ, and no ministers like suffering ministers. St. Paul sets all the churches at work to pray for him in prison; and great reason for it: A prison has its temptation as well as a palace; when men play the persecutors, the devil forgets not to be a tempter; sometimes he will attempt to soften them with impressions of fear; at another time he hopes to overcome them, and weaken their courage, by their friends tears and intreaties; sometimes the devil hopes to imbitter a suffering saint's spirit against his persecutors, and to sour him with the leaven of malice and wrath. Oh! it is no easy matter to receive evil, and yet wish none to him from whose hands we have received it; to reserve love for him who shews wrath and hatred to us, is a glorious, but a difficult work. But if all this fails, yet the devil hopes to blow him up with pride, and a high conceit of himself, who dares suffer, when others shrink, and is ready to lay down his head, when others pull in their heads, and seek to save themselves in a whole skin. Pride is a salamander, that can live in the very flames of martyrdom; if any saint need the humility of many saints, it is he that is called to suffer for Christ. St. Paul was very sensible of this; he well knew that a suffering condition is full of temptation; that a Christian's strength to carry him through it is not in his own keeping; God must help, or the stoutest champion will quail: He also knows that prayer is the best means to fetch in that help, and accordingly St. Paul here sends Tychicus to engage the auxiliary forces of the saints prayers on earth, and the peñe cali from heaven, that he might glorify God in a suffering hour.

23 Peace be to the brethren, and love with faith from God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

Our apostle being now come to the close and conclusion of this excellent epistle, he shuts it with very fervent and affectionate wishes and prayers for them. (1.) He wishes the brethren, the converted Christians, in and about Ephesus, peace, peace with God, peace with conscience, peace especially one with another, and all manner of outward prosperity, comprehended in the word peace. (2.) Mutual love among themselves. (2.) The grace of faith, the fountain of the former; all which he wishes from God the Father, not excluding, but including, the Son and Holy Ghost, and from Jesus Christ the Mediator, through virtue of whose merit and intercession all saving benefits are conveyed unto believers; St. Paul's example is instructive to the ministers of Christ in all succeeding ages. Would we have our ministerial endeavours attended with manifest success? We must be much in prayer, in serious and fervent prayer to God, to work those graces in our people, faith, love, and holiness, which we have been by our ministry recommending to their care and practice; that minister who is most prayerful, is usually most successful.

24 Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity. Amen,

Still our apostle goes on praying; he began and closes his epistle with prayer; and the blessings prayed for, are grace and peace; peace in the former verse comprehending all temporal felicity; and grace in this, comprehending the special favour and loving-kindness of God; this he prays may be the portion of all those that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity, or incorruption, as the word signifies; that that is, not for time only, but for eternity; not in show and appearance only, but in reality. Sincere love to our Lord Jesus Christ is a sure character and undoubted mark of such a person as has found grace in God's sight, and is very high in the divine favour. Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ; and he doth say with a seraphim's, but with a sincere love. Quest. But when, and how, may a person know that he loves Christ in great sincerity? Ans. If Christ be enthroned in thy heart as a chief commander; if he be esteemed by thee as thy chiefest excellency, and thy choicest treasure; if he be thy chiefest refuge, unto which thou fliest in all dangers and distresses; thou mayest conclude, thy supreme love is placed upon him, that thou lovest him in sincerity: And the more thou lovest him, the more lovely wilt thou be unto him, and the more will thy heart be let out in desires after him, and in fervent longings for the full fruition and final enjoyment of him; for those whom we love, we long to be with.

*Come then, Lord! down to me,
Or take me up to thee.*

P H I L I P P I A N S.

St. Paul being warned by the Holy Ghost to go into Macedonia and preach the gospel, as we find, Acts xvi. he plants first a church at Philippi, a principal city in Macedonia, so called from Philip king of Macedon, who beautified and enlarged it.

But St. Paul's charge being to preach the gospel to all the Gentiles, he travels from place to place till he came at Rome, where he was in bonds, and consequently in necessity and straits; which the Philippians understanding, they sent Epaphroditus, their bishop or chief minister, to him, with a liberal contribution to supply his wants: By whom St. Paul sends this affectionate letter to them, partly to testify his thankfulness for the relief received from them, but principally to confirm them in the faith, to prevent their being offended at his sufferings for the gospel, to encourage them to walk worthy of the gospel, to warn them against seducers and Judaizing teachers, and to quicken them to divers Christian duties: And so concludes his epistle with particular salutations, and an apostolical benediction.

C H A P. I.

The design of our apostle in this first chapter, is, to encourage the Philippians to constancy in the faith, to perseverance in holiness; and not to be discouraged at his sufferings for the gospel, seeing Christianity had already gained very much by the sufferings he underwent.

PAUL and Timotheus the servants of Jesus Christ to all the saints in Christ Jesus which are at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons:

Note here, 1. The penman of this epistle, St. Paul, joining Timotheus with him in the salutation, because his companion and fellow-labourer, and one that had assisted in the instructing of the Philippians, and was a person much valued and esteemed by them. 2. The great modesty of St. Paul, in the character he gives of himself; he doth not style himself here an apostle, but the servant of Jesus Christ; in his other epistles which he wrote alone, he styles himself an apostle, Rom. i. 1. Gal. i. 1. &c. He doth not say here, Paul an apostle, and Timotheus a servant of Jesus Christ, magnifying himself above Timothy, but sets himself upon a level with him, saying, Paul and Timotheus the servants of Jesus Christ. Learn hence, 1. That true humility teaches Christians to speak sparingly of themselves, and of their own authority and credit, except upon a just and necessary occasion, and when weighty reasons do urge and oblige them to it. 2. That the ministers and dispensers of the gospel are, in a special manner, the servants of Jesus Christ, wholly devoted to his service, and discharging themselves faithfully in the performance of it. Note 3. The superscription of this epistle, or the persons to whom it was directed, To all the saints in Christ Jesus, in general, which were at Philippi, and to the bishops and deacons: To all the saints at Philippi; so he calls them, because they were all holy by visible profession, and many of them, no doubt, by real sanctification, being inherently, as well as externally holy; and the denomination is here taken from the better, though not the greater part, for whose sake the whole community are here called saints: But why saints in Christ Jesus? Because, as it is necessary to make a man internally holy, that he be in Christ Jesus by real implantation; so to denominate a man externally and federally holy, requires a visible profession, and an external union with Christ, John xv. 2. In particular, this epistle is directed to the bishops and deacons; they were both the church's overseers; the bishops to oversee and inspect the lives and manners of persons; the deacons to oversee the necessities of persons, and to serve the church in taking care of the poor. Note here, The great and special care which our holy Lord has taken of his church, in appointing stated officers to undertake the oversight of his whole family, to rule and govern, to direct and instruct it; yea, not only has he appointed officers for the oversight of the souls of his people, but others to inspect their bodily necessities, that those who are indigent might be supplied by their care, and the charity of the church.

2 Grace be unto you and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

Grace from God the Father, or grace from God as a Father; intimating that God bestows not his grace as a Creator, but as a Father, as a Father in Christ: And peace from our Lord Jesus Christ; he being the purchaser of our peace, he, upon whom was laid the chastisement of our peace, and in whom, and for whose sake, God becomes reconciled to us, and at peace with us. Learn hence, 1. That such as have received most grace from God, do yet stand in need of further measures, and fresh supplies of it: Grace to pardon sin, and grace to subdue sin. 2. That peace, as well as grace, may and ought to be the subject of a Christian's prayer and care, to obtain peace with God, peace with conscience, peace with one another, and if it be possible, peace with all men.

3 I thank my God upon every remembrance of you. 4 Always in every prayer of mine for you all making request with joy, 5 For your fellowship in the gospel from the first day until now;

Note here, 1. The proper character of a gospel-minister, he is his people's constant remembrancer, and the remembrer of all his people: I remember you all, says the apostle, I remember you always, and in every prayer. This is a very great part of our ministerial duty, to pray for the people; not in our public offices only, but in our private addresses also, and this continually, and without ceasing: we should never rise off our knees, without bearing our people upon our hearts before the Lord. Did minister and people more strive together in their prayers for one another, there would be less strife and contention between them, one with another, ministers must be their people's remembrancers: St. Paul here remembered the Philippians, all the Philippians always, and in every prayer. 2. St. Paul could and did remember the Philippians with joy; though he was in a sadness himself, in a prison, yet he could think of them as a people converted by his ministry, with joy, making request with joy. When the ministers of Christ see any success of their labours in the lives of their people, it is matter of inexpressible joy to them, how sad soever the case is with them; as to the outward circumstances: when they sigh in a prison with respect to their personal sufferings, they can sing and rejoice, if they find their people's proficiency in knowledge and growth in grace: I thank my God for you, making request with joy. 3. The ground and occasion of this his joy, ver. 5. For your fellowship in the gospel; that is, for your ready embracing of the gospel at my first preaching of it to you, for the real subjection of some, and the professed subjection of all to the faith of Christ, whereby you were brought into fellowship with Christ and his church, and also for the continuance of you in the faith and profession of the gospel, from the first day until now. Learn hence, That when a people, upon the plain and persuasive preaching of the gospel, do readily receive and obey it, and remain constant in their profession of it, and obedience to it, it is matter of unspeakable thanksgiving and praise to the faithful ministers of Jesus Christ: I thank God for your fellowship in the gospel, from the first day until now; that is, for continuing in the faith, and persevering in your professed subjection to the gospel of Christ, I bless God for this.

6 Being confident of this very thing, that he which hath begun a good work in you will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ:

Here we have a farther cause assigned of St. Paul's joy on the Philippians behalf, namely, the firm and full assurance which he had of their perseverance in grace unto the end: God, that has begun, will perfect, that is, augment and increase it, till it arrive at perfection in glory. Note here, 1. The nature of grace described, or the proper title deservedly given to the grace of God, it is called a good work: he that hath begun a good work, &c. Well may regenerating grace be called a good work, because it is the living foundation and vital principle, from whence all good works do proceed and flow: the grace of God in the heart is the root of all true holiness in the life; as good works are necessary to salvation, so renewing grace is necessary to good works. 2. As the nature of grace described, so the author and augmentor of grace declared, and that is God, he that hath begun a good work in you, will perform it, that is, augment it, and increase it; as the good work of grace in the heart is God's work, and he is the author of it, so he will maintain it, and carry it on unto perfection, and be both the increaser and perfecter of it: God never doth his work by halves. 3. The certainty of grace asserted, being confident of this very thing: But what ground had St. Paul for this this confidence? Ans. Because grace is the care of the whole Trinity; all the persons, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, do concern themselves, both in the production, preservation, and perfection of it; the Father decrees it, the Son purchases it, the Spirit infuses it; the Father begets it, the Son excites it, the holy Spirit conducts it; and as they did all concur in its production, so do they all co-operate and work together for the preservation of it. Learn hence, That such persons, in whose souls Almighty God has begun a good work of grace, may with much assurance expect, by the influence of God's care, and the exercise of their own endeavours, that they shall hold out and persevere in a state of grace unto the end: until the day of Christ, that is, the day of judgment.

7 Even as it is meet for me to think this of you all, because I have you in my heart, inasmuch as both in my bonds, and in the defence and confirmation of the gospel, ye are all partakers of my grace.

In these words, our apostle assigns a ground and reason of that confidence which he expressed himself to have of the Philippians perseverance in grace and holiness, in the foregoing verse, namely, because they were partakers of the same grace with himself, and were ready to suffer for Christ, as he was; we may warrantably be persuaded of their perseverance in grace unto the end, in whom we see both readiness of obedience to the gospel, and also zealous and cheerful suffering for and in defence of the gospel. Thus did St. Paul here: Where note, The apostle accounted it a grace and favour from God, that he was thought worthy to suffer for the gospel, and the Philippians with him: Ye are partakers of my grace. Learn hence, That to suffer bonds and imprisonment for the gospel's sake, is a special grace and favour of God, not considered in itself, but in the fruits and consequence of it. A second ground of his confidence was their respect to him, I have you in my heart, and I find you have me in your hearts; you partake of the misery of my bonds, you suffer with me in my sufferings, and sympathize with me in my sorrows: they relieved and refreshed him in his imprisonment, which he underwent for the sake of Christ and his gospel; and from hence he had a good confidence that they would persevere unto the end. An operative love to the faithful ministers of Jesus Christ, especially when they are under persecution, is a good evidence of the sincerity of their love to Christ, and of their steadfastness and perseverance in grace unto the end.

8 For God is my record, how greatly I long after you all in the bowels of Jesus Christ.

These words are expressive of that passionate degree of Christian love which St. Paul bore to the Philippians; he durst appeal to God, as to the sincerity and fervency of it: God is my record, I call him to witness, and can appeal to him, as the searcher of hearts, how greatly I long after you; that is, how passionately and sincerely I love you, with the most intense and hearty affection, in the bowels of Jesus Christ. The expression may denote both the efficient cause, and the exemplary cause of his love: (1.) That the author of this his love unto them was Christ, he was the spring and procurer of it; and consequently, it was no carnal or selfish love, to serve his own ends and designs upon them, but truly spiritual. (2.) That Christ's love to him was the pattern and example, according to which he loved them, with no common love, but with an intense and intense affection, from the ground of the heart, and the most intimate bowels: no words can be more expressive of that fervent love and earnest longing, which St. Paul had for the welfare of the Philippians; a love which not only exceeds the love of all relations; he doth not say, I long after you in the bowels of a Father, or in the bowels of an husband, but in the bowels of Jesus Christ; humbly comparing his love towards them to the love of Jesus Christ; not for the degrees of it, nor for the fruits and advantages of it, but for the truth and sincerity of it: I greatly long after you all, in the bowels of Jesus Christ. Learn hence, That there is no stronger love, no more endeared affection between any relations upon earth, than between such ministers of Christ, and their beloved people, as they have been happily influential to convert to God; when present with them, they passionately love them, when absent from them, they affectionately long after them; imitating, as much as they can, their Lord Jesus Christ, both in the reality and sincerity, and also in the measure and degree of endearing affection: God is my record, how greatly I long after you all, &c.

9 And this I pray, that your love may abound yet more and more in knowledge and in all judgment; 10 That ye may approve things that are excellent; that ye may be sincere and without offence till the day of Christ; 11 Being filled with the fruits of righteousness, which are by Jesus Christ, unto the glory and praise of God!

After salutations given by St. Paul to his beloved Philippians, he next pours out his soul in fervent prayer and supplication for them; and the mercy which he prays for, is observable, first, namely, growth and proficiency in grace: This I pray, that your love may abound yet more and more in knowledge, and in all judgment: that their love to God, their love to him, and their love to one another, may yet more and more abound. Love is the root-grace from which most graces spring; therefore, he prays for the strengthening of that grace in particular, and that there may be found with them judgment, as well as affection in the exercise of it; we ought to love judiciously, as well as affectionately: The more judicious a saint grows in his Christian course; and the more understanding and judgment is found with him in the way of his duty, the stronger his grace is, and the more glory will he bring to God. The understanding and judgment being the guiding and leading faculties in man, there can be no more acceptable holiness in the will, than there is knowledge in the understanding; I can hate sin and love God, no more than I know of the evil of sin, and of the perfections that are in God: The more judicious then a Christian grows, the more his holiness grows; and accordingly, St. Paul's prayer is, that they may grow more and more in knowledge and in all judgment. 2. The great ends mentioned by the apostle, for which he did so earnestly desire their proficiency in knowledge and judgment, and their growth in love, and every other grace, namely, (1.) That they might approve things that are excellent, that is, all such things as the gospel requires: implying, that the things prescribed to us in the gospel, are things excellent and good for us, things worthy to be prescribed by God, and things reasonable to be practised by us; and that the approbation of these things, by a steadiness in judgment and practice, is every Christian's duty, and ought to be their great endeavour. (2.) That they might be sincere in their holy profession, incorrupt and pure, both in doctrine and manners. (3.) That they might be without offence, unblameable in conversation, and be kept from being occasions of stumbling unto others, even to the end of their days. (4.) He prays, that they may not only be inoffensive persons, but fruitful Christians, being filled with the fruits of righteousness, which are by Jesus Christ unto the glory and praise of God; that is, that they may abound in good works, undertaken in Christ's strength, and with an eye at God's glory. Learn hence, 1. That a negative holiness is not sufficient to salvation; it is not enough that Christians be harmless and inoffensive towards others, but they must labour after an holy fruitfulness in good works; they must be filled with all the fruits of righteousness. 2. That our works be truly good, and fruits of righteousness; it is necessary that they be done by Christ's strength and assistance, and with an eye at the glory and praise of God, in order to their acceptance: filled with the fruits of righteousness, &c. 3. That no shorter time ought to be assigned for our inoffensive walking, and fruitfulness in conversation, than the day of our death: unto the day of Christ, says our apostle, that is, till the great reckoning-day, when Christ will render to us our complete reward; if we be faithful and fruitful to the death, we shall then receive the crown of life.

12 But I would ye should understand, brethren, that the things which happened unto me have fallen out rather unto the furtherance of the gospel; 13 So that my bonds in Christ are manifest in all the palace, and in all other places; 14 And many of the brethren in the Lord, waxing confident by my bonds, are much more bold to speak the word without fear.

Our apostle's design in these words, is to prevent the Philippians stumbling, and being scandalized at his present sufferings, assuring them, that the things which happened to him, through the malice of his persecutors, have fallen out rather to the furtherance of the gospel, than any ways to the hinderance of it, as they feared. Learn hence, That the sufferings and persecutions which the messengers and ministers of Christ do undergo for the sake of the gospel, are oft-times so over-ruled by the wisdom of God, that they rather increase than diminish the church, and rather promote than prejudice the interest of the gospel. Next, he declares the special and particular advantages which had redounded to the gospel, by those sufferings which he had patiently endured for the gospel's sake. (1.) His bonds in Christ, that is, his imprisonment for the gospel of Christ, were manifest in the palace; that is, were manifestly taken notice of in Nero's court, and elsewhere in the city; so that people, inquiring into the cause of his sufferings, found, that it was not any misdemeanour, but that his preaching and practising the doctrine of Christianity, was the only reason of his sufferings. (2.) Another advantage which accrued to the church by his bonds, was this, namely, that many ministers of Christ, who preached the word of God far and near, hearing of his constancy under sufferings, were both encouraged and emboldened thereby; encouraged to shake off fear, and emboldened to preach Christ with greater resolution. Many of the brethren in the Lord, waxing confident by my bonds, &c. Note here, The title given by this great apostle to the inferior ministers of the gospel, he calls them brethren, and brethren in the Lord, putting himself and them in mind of their mutual and respective duties, which was to live and love as brethren; to admonish, exhort, and encourage one another, to stand up in defence of the just credit and reputation of one another, and jointly to set their shoulders to the work of Christ together. 2. That the ministers of Christ, observing how God upholds some of their brethren under sufferings and persecutions, should encourage themselves to go on with resolution in the work of the Lord, not fearing their own personal sufferings, knowing, that the same assistance which supported one, stands ready to succour others.

15 Some indeed preach Christ even of envy and strife; and some also of good-will. 16 The one preach Christ of contention, not sincerely, supposing to add affliction to my bonds: 17 But the other of love, knowing that I am set for the defence of the gospel. 18 What then? notwithstanding every way, whether in pretence or in truth, Christ is preached; and I therein do rejoice, yea, and will rejoice.

Our apostle had declared in the foregoing verses, that several of his brethren in the work of the ministry, through his constancy in suffering, were emboldened to preach Jesus Christ with more resolution than before. But here he discovers, that there was a vast difference between those preachers; all did not preach Christ alike, with the same mind, from the same motives, for the same sincere ends. Some, alas! preach Christ out of envy and strife; that is, envying the success of the apostle's ministry, and endeavouring to draw people off from approving him, to applaud them, hoping to grieve and gall them thereby; but others preached the gospel of Christ of good-will, with a purity of intention and sincerity of affection, both towards Christ, and towards himself, who, for the defence of the gospel, now lay in prison. However, seeing Christ was preached and made known by both, by some in pretence, by others in truth, the apostle rejoiced at it, and took comfort in it. Learn hence, 1. That such ministers of the gospel are gladly and joyfully to be heard, who preach Christ and his pure word soundly and truly, with what mind soever, from what motive soever, and for what end soever they preach Christ and his holy gospel. The word is his which they bring, how vicious soever the person, and how bad soever the intention be of him that brings it; and, if the message be his, it is our duty to receive it without prejudice, be the principle what it will in him that delivers it. Many preach in Christ's Christ's name, who perish in his wrath; for Christ takes notice of the inward intention, as well as of the outward action, and observes not only the matter which ministers preach, but the end for which, and the motive from which they preach, whether from love and good-will, or from envy and strife. 2. That such Christians who find their hearts inflamed with the zeal for the glory of Christ, and the salvation of souls, do, and will rejoice exceedingly, that Christ is preached, whoever the person is, or whatever the principle may be in him that preaches.

19 For I know that this shall turn to my salvation through your prayer and the supply of the Spirit of Jesus Christ, 20 According to my earnest expectation, and my hope, that in nothing I shall be ashamed, but that with all boldness, as always, so now also Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether it be by life or by death.

Still our apostles pursues and prosecutes his former design, namely, to prevent the Philippians being offended at his sufferings; and accordingly he shews, that as the gospel of Christ had gained much already, it should gain yet more, by his imprisonment and afflictions which he was very confident would tend to the furtherance of his salvation, through the help of their prayers, and the supplies of grace from the Spirit of Christ; where, by salvation, is meant deliverance out of his present sufferings, which he fully expected by the help and benefit of the church's prayers. Great are the expectations of the saints, even to temporal salvation and outward mercies, from the joint prayers and intercessions of the church of Christ; this shall turn to my salvation through your prayer. But if, by salvation, be meant eternal happiness, then his confident persuasion was this, That all the designs of his adversaries against him should be so over-ruled and ordered by God, that through the influences and supplies of the holy Spirit, all should work together for good, and his eternal salvation be advanced thereby, through the concurrence and assistance of their prayers. In the 20th verse he tells them, that according to his former expectation and hope, he was resolved that no terror should ever make him ashamed to own the truth of Christ, but that with a convincing boldness, he would now, as heretofore, appear in the defence of it, and that Christ should be magnified by him, in the body, whether by life or death; that is, whether my life be further prolonged, or be now, by martyrdom, ended: Christ will be magnified, if I live; the power of Christ will be magnified in my deliverance from death: If I die, his power will be magnified in enabling me to undergo death for his name and sake; so that I am at a point, either to live or die, as the wisdom of Christ shall determine; I am, as to myself, indifferent for either, well knowing that Christ will be glorified in me, and by me, both by life and death. Learn hence, That nothing lies so near the heart of a saint, as the honour and glory of Christ; this he resolves shall be promoted by him, living and dying, by his great services, supposing his life, and by his extraordinary sufferings and martyrdom, in case of his death.

Our apostle had declared, in the foregoing verse, his firm expectation that Christ would be magnified and glorified by him, both in life and death; in this verse he discovers what reason he had to think so; for, says he, To me to live is Christ, and to die is gain; that is, if I live, Christ shall be the scope of my life, and the end of my living; I resolve to live to his service; if I die, death will be a real gain and advantage to me: Intimating, that both life and death are gain to a good man, and that it is Christ that makes both life and death gainful and advantageous: To me to live in Christ, to die is gain. Words both short and sweet, few in expression, but large in extension; in them we are taught both how to live, and how to die. Observe, 1. The scope and end of a Christian's life, To me to live is Christ. 2. The hope and fruit of a Christian's death, To die is gain. Learn, That Christ is the believer's life, and death the believer's gain. The life of a real Christian is resolved into Christ, and his death is resolved into gain. Note, 1. Christ is the believer's life; both his life of grace, and his life of glory is resolved into Christ. As to his life of grace, Christ is the life of this life; he is the efficient or principal cause of this life; he is the exemplar cause or pattern of it; he is the final cause or scope of it; and he is the conserving cause, or preserver and maintainer of it. So for the life of glory, which believers have in reversion, Christ is also the life of that life; thus he has purchased it for them, he has given it to them, he has taken and keeps possession of it in their names, he has prepared it for them, and them for it, and put them into the full and actual possession of it, in his own time. 2. That death is the believer's gain; death in general, violent as well as natural death; it is not only not injurious, but advantageous; no hurt, but profit; no loss, but benefit; not only to die for Christ, but to die in Christ is gain; blest are the dead that die in the Lord, as well as those that die for the Lord. Death appears gain to the believer, if we consider the private evils it frees and delivers him from, namely, from sin, from all temptations to sin, from all inclinations to offend, from all possibility of sinning, from all temporal afflictions, from all sufferings for God, from all sufferings from man for God's sake; especially if we consider the positive good that the believer gains by death, namely, perfection in grace, fulness of joy, the blessed vision, the society of glorified saints and angels, and the spirits of just men made perfect. So then, if a state of perfect holiness and purity be better than a state of corruption and temptation, if a state of rest and peace be better than a state of labour and sorrow, if it be better to be triumphing above, than sighing and groaning below; then dead saints are better where they are, than where they were, and death to them is gain, and infinitely advantageous. 3. That the gain which comes by death to the believer, is procured by Christ, namely, by his meritorious satisfaction, by his glorious ascension and possession, by his prevailing intercession.

22 But if I live in the flesh, that is the fruit of my labour: yet what shall I chuse, I wot not. 23 For I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ; which is far better:

24 Nevertheless,

24. Nevertheless, to abide in the flesh is more needful for you.

But if I live in the flesh, that is, if I shall continue to live longer in this mortal body, this is the fruit of my labour; that is, I foresee what will be the blessed fruit of my labour, namely, the conversion and gaining of more souls unto God and Christ; at least, as it is worth my labour, so shall it be my endeavour to glorify Christ, by my continuance in the world. Learn hence, That as it is the end of a minister's life, so he makes it the end of his living, to glorify Christ, by gaining souls unto him: and in order to the obtaining this great end, he is willing, for the present, to deny himself the advantage of being with Christ. Observe next, St. Paul's strait which he was now in, which to chuse, either life, or death, if God should leave it to his choice; I am in a strait betwixt two, that is, I am divided in my thoughts and desires, whether to wish for life, or death; his ardent love to Christ and himself inclined him to desire a dissolution, I desire to be dissolved, and to be with Christ; but his affectionate regard to his beloved Philippians inclined him to desire a continuation of his time and talents; nevertheless, to abide still in the flesh is more needful for you. Learn hence, 1. That the life of pious ministers is far more profitable for their people than death. 2. That their death being a departure unto Christ, is far better, and more desirable to themselves than life; their life is profitable to civilize some, to convert others, to convince the erroneous, to confirm the weak; the world wants them, the church wants them, their flocks want them, their families want them, and they want them most, that think they could spare them best. But their death being a departure, an immediate departure unto Christ, is far better, and more desirable to themselves than life; having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ, which is far better: Better in point of honour; for as they here laboured in the work of the ministry for him, they shall there sit down upon the throne with him, Rev. iii. 21. Better in point of profit; He is heir and possessor of all things, and they shall be joint heirs, and joint possessors with him: Thus may the words be considered, with relation to St. Paul, as a minister of the gospel; but they may be further considered, with reference to him as a private Christian; I desire to depart. Hence learn, That it is not only warrantable, but highly commendable, for a Christian to be not only fearless, but desirous of death. There are (1.) Unwarrantable and sinful desires of death; as when they are rash and hasty, when they are positive and peremptory, when they are directing and prescribing to God, either as to the time, or kind, or manner of our dissolution, and when our desires are purely selfish, desiring death only as freedom from present evils, and as a prevention from future sufferings. (2.) There are warrantable and justifiable desires of death and dissolution; namely, when we desire it to free us from the indwelling presence of sin, to put us in a state of perfect holiness, to bring us to the sight of Christ, to give us the possession of that happiness, which was contrived by infinite wisdom, purchased by infinite merit, prepared by infinite power, and bestowed by infinite love. (3.) There are also commendable desires, or, the last-mentioned desires are highly commendable; they commend our faith, and proclaim our certain belief of a future state; they commend our love to God; to Christ; they commend our obedience, &c. Learn, 2. That the souls of believers, at their departure from the body, are with Christ. Quest. What is it to be with Christ? Anf. It implies intuition, we shall see him, and see him as he is, not as he once was, in a state of abasement; it implies fruition, we shall enjoy him, as well as see him, and enjoy him to satisfaction, Psal. xvii. ult. and it implies duration, we shall forever be with the Lord. Quest. But how doth it appear, that the souls of good men, upon their departure from the body, are with Christ? Anf. Thus; they are immediately capable of his presence and enjoyment upon their departure, and they are fully prepared for it: If we be not fit for heaven when we die, we shall never be fit; all is done upon us that was ever intended to be done; and neither Christ's ardent desires to have his children with him, nor the vehement longings of their souls for the fruition and enjoyment of him, can or shall be delayed; such delays would make their hearts sick; no, they expect satisfaction, and God will not disappoint their expectation.

25 And having this confidence, I know that I shall abide and continue with you all for your furtherance and joy of faith; 26 That your rejoicing may be more abundant in Jesus Christ for me, by my coming to you again.

St. Paul having in the foregoing verses, told the Philippians how needful it was for him to abide in the flesh, with respect to them, he here gives them a sort of confident assurance (which was given him by immediate revelation) that his life should at this time be preserved for the benefit of the church, and he be set at liberty, and that he should come and spend a part of his time amongst them, for the furtherance of their faith, and the increase of their joy, that so they might have more abundant matter of rejoicing in Christ, having received a new proof of his power and good-will towards them, in delivering him their apostle from death, and sending him to them again. Learn hence, 1. That God always can, and sometimes will, so calm the rage of persecutors, that they cannot execute the evil by them intended and resolved against his faithful ministers and servants: Notwithstanding Nero's cruelty, St. Paul had a confident persuasion, that he should come out of prison, and once more visit the churches. 2. That Almighty God, in great mercy to his church, doth sometimes prolong the lives of his faithful ministers, and most useful servants, and keep them longer out of heaven, that his people may reap the greater advantage by their labours here on earth. 3. That the more unexpectedly the life of a laborious minister, or a pious and extraordinary Christian, is given him by God, the more abundant ought the church to be in their expressions of joy and thanksgiving to God for such an invaluable blessing.

27 Only let your conversation be as it becometh the gospel of Christ: that whether I come and see you, or else be absent, I may hear of your affairs, that ye stand fast in our spirit, with one mind, striving together for the faith of the gospel; 28 And in nothing terrified by your adversaries: which is to them an evident token of perdition, but to you of salvation, and that of God.

Observe here, 1. The general charge given by the apostle to his beloved Philippians, that their lives should answer their light, and their practices correspond with their profession: Let your conversation be as it becometh the gospel. A gospel-profession requires and calls for a gospel-conversation; as the gospel is a gospel of truth and faithfulness, of sincerity and plainness, so our conversation should be sincere and upright, without deceit or fraud; as the gospel is a gospel of peace, so a Christian conversation is a quiet, calm, and peaceable conversation: Christians should be men of peace, peace-makers, peace-preservers, lovers of peace, and lovers in peace. The gospel is a gospel of love and mercy, of grace and goodness: the badge and cognizance of Christ's disciples, the mark and brand of Christ's sheep, is love unfeigned; thus a gospel-conversation is an amicable, loving, and charitable conversation. Again, the gospel of Christ is a gospel of meekness and humility, and its chief lesson is humility: Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart, Matt. xi. 29. and be ye clothed with humility, 1 Pet. v. 5. In a word, the gospel of Christ is a gospel of holiness and purity; a Christian conversation must be a pure, and holy, and spotless conversation: Saints by profession should be saints indeed; and there is a comeliness in a gospel conversation, both as to the inward and outward man; walk as becometh the gospel of Christ, that is, answerable to the precepts and commands of the gospel, answerable to the promises and encouragements of the gospel, answerable to the helps and supplies of grace which the gospel affords, answerable to that grand pattern of holiness which the gospel sets before us, and answerable to that high and glorious hope which the gospel raises us up to the joyful expectation of? This is to walk as becometh the gospel of Christ. 2. The apostle, having given a general injunction to walk as becometh the gospel of Christ, next gives a particular injunction for concord and unity amongst themselves, That ye stand fast in one spirit, with one word. Learn hence, That all those who would walk worthy of the gospel, should endeavour after a close, holy, and lasting union among themselves. We can never expect to thrive in grace, if we do not live in peace; let us prize unity and peace as the beauty and strength of the body, and let us pursue peace and union with the utmost strength of our soul. Observe, 3. Another duty exhorted to, and that is, an united contention, striving together for the faith of the gospel: Before, he exhorted them to an holy union; now, to an united contention; unite, but strive; yet let your striving be in communion, not in contention; strive together in all holy and united endeavours to comfort and confirm one another in the faith of the gospel. 4. He exhorts them, as to an holy union, and an united contention, so to an humble boldness, in nothing terrified by our adversaries; in nothing, that is, terrified at nothing they can do, and terrified in no degree at any thing they shall do. Be not afraid to be holy; for your adversaries can never hurt you, if they do not hinder you in your duty; the less they fear God, the less you need to fear them. 5. A double argument to persuade them to the foregoing duty, in nothing terrified by their adversaries. (1.) This will be to them an evident token of perdition; that is, an united, humble, peaceable boldness in your holy course, whereby you walk in the spirit and power of the gospel, without fright or fear, will be to your persecutors an evident token of perdition. Persecution is a black mark of a son of perdition, and a very evident token to a man's own conscience that he is in the way to destruction. (2.) But to you of salvation; that is, such as suffer patiently, yet resolutely, for the gospel, are in the way of salvation, and their sufferings shall promote their eternal salvation; it is added, Salvation, and that of God; now this implies two things: (1.) That the salvation of suffering Christians shall be sure, they shall certainly be saved, for God has undertaken for it: Now, if it be God that saves, who shall destroy? Satan will say, "Serve me, and I will save you;" but he is feeble, and cannot; false, and will not save: The world will say, "Cast in your lot among us, and we will save you harmless;" but there is no more trust to be given to the children, than to the father of lies: But if the God of truth and power says, "I will save;" who will say nay? (2.) That their salvation shall be great, as well as sure; he will save them with a mighty salvation, from their mighty sufferings and mighty fears: Suffer for Christ, and then fear none of those things which you shall suffer.

29 For unto you it is given in the behalf of Christ, not only to believe on him, but also to suffer for his sake;

These words come in by way of encouragement to the practice of the forementioned duty, namely, of courageous suffering for the gospel of Christ; he tells them, that as ability to believe on Christ, so likewise power to suffer for Christ, were both the gift of God, and, as such, purchased by Christ for them, and freely bestowed upon them. Learn hence, 1. That it is the duty of all the disciples and followers of Jesus, not only to believe in him, but cheerfully to suffer for him, when he calls them to it; not only to believe, but to suffer. 2. That suffering for Christ is the gift of God, as well as faith in Christ; unto you it is given, not only to believe, but to suffer; afflictions are the donatives of the gospel; suffering for Christ is the gift of Christ. (1.) Ability to suffer is his gift; it is the purchase of his merits, it is the fruit of his mediation. Preparation for suffering, and patience under suffering, are the gift of Christ. (2.) As abilities for suffering, so the comforts of suffering, are the gift of Christ; through him it is that his saints glory in tribulation, and their trials are not only tolerable but joyous. In short, to suffer for Christ is, first, a free gift; and, secondly, an honourable gift; and, thirdly, a special and peculiar gift: It is a gift peculiar to saints; yea, peculiar only to some saints: It is only peculiar to saints; the angels glorify Christ by doing, but not by suffering. I doubt not, but had the angels bodies of flesh, as saints have, they would be glad to lay their necks on the block for Christ, as saints do: But this is the peculiar privilege of believers, unto you it is given, and not to them. And although a suffering disposition, a readiness and preparation of mind to glorify Christ by suffering, is given to all believers; yet the honour of actual suffering death for Christ, is given but to a few. 3. That faith in Christ must go before suffering for Christ; it must first be given to us to believe on him, before we can suffer for his sake; then only are sufferings truly Christian, and an evidence of salvation, when the sufferer is first a believer; without the shield of faith, we can no more resist the fury of the persecutors, than we can repel the fiery darts of the destroyer.

30. Having the same conflict which ye saw in me, and now hear to be in me.

Here is the last argument made use of by the apostle to encourage them unto patient suffering for the gospel of Christ; as it would render them comfortable to Christ their head, so to him their apostle, who suffered many hard things when he was at Philippi, as they had seen; and stood ready to suffer, not only bonds, but death itself, now he was at Rome, which they heard of: Having the same conflict which you saw in me, and now hear to be in me. Here observe, 1. The title given by St. Paul to his sufferings for the gospel, he calls them a conflict. Learn, That Christian courage under sufferings cannot keep up without a mighty conflict: We must conflict with our enemies, with the rage of our persecutors; we must conflict with ourselves, and with our own spirits, to keep them from fainting under persecution; and we must even conflict with God himself, wrestle with him, by prayers, for extraordinary measures of strength to support us under sufferings, and to enable us to glorify God in and by them. Well might the apostle then call his sufferings a conflict. Observe, 2. St. Paul encourages the Philippians to conflict with sufferings from his own example before them, having the same conflict which you saw in me. Learn, That the prudent and patient sufferings of the ministers of Christ for the truth of the gospel are, and ought to be, a powerful encouragement to all their people to conflict with the like difficulties and trials for the testimony of Christ; the captain goes first, leads the van, his ministers follow, and their people bring up the rear; and, having suffered together, they shall be also glorified together; a suffering head, and suffering members, shall never be separated.

CHAP. II.

Our apostle in this chapter urges the Philippians with a most elegant obtestation, to be found in the exercise and practice of unity and humility.

IF there be therefore any consolation in Christ, if any comfort of love, if any fellowship of the Spirit, if any bowels and mercies; 2 Fulfil ye my joy, that ye be like-minded, having the same love, being of one accord, of one mind.

Here we have observable, 1. The important duty which the apostle exhorts the Philippians to, and that is love and unity; unity in judgment and opinion, unity in heart and affection, unity in design and endeavours; so necessary and advantageous is the duty of unity and concord among all the professors of Christianity, that all the cautions and warnings, all the advice and counsel, all the melting in:realties and passionate importunities of the ministers of Christ are little enough to excite persons to it, and direct them in the practice of it. 2. What an heap of arguments the apostle makes use of to excite and quicken the Philippians to the love and practice of this duty: If there be any consolation in Christ, any comfort of love any fellowship of the Spirit, any bowels and mercies. As if he had said, If ever you have tasted, by means of my ministry, any sweetness and consolation in Christ and his holy religion, if ever you have found any consort in his love, if ever you have enjoyed any communion with his Spirit, if ye be men, and have any bowels of mercy for yourselves, if ye be Christians, and have any pity for me in my bonds, fulfil ye my joy in this, that ye be like-minded, having the same love, being of one accord, and of one mind. O the tenderness, the gentleness and meekness of soul which was in St. Paul, and ought to be in every spiritual pastor towards his people, to win them, and to prevail upon them to love the truth and peace! Fulfil ye my joy, says the apostle; as if he had said, Sufferings I have enough already; O do not you, by your divisions and dissensions add more: I am already a prisoner, expecting the sentence of death, preparing for the sword of persecution, but none of these things move me; I can rejoice in a dungeon, sing in the stocks, triumph in death, if I can but hear you stand fast in one spirit, striving together for the faith of the gospel: But, if I hear that you are broken by divisions, my heart is broke; the news of differences and dissensions among you will be heavier to me than my chain, darker than my dungeon, sharper than Nero's sword: Do not thus add to my sorrow and sufferings; but as you have begun and occasioned joy in me, I beseech you fulfil and complete my joy, by your being of one heart, of one mind, entirely one.

3 Let nothing be done through strife, or vain-glory,

Here our apostle dissuadeth the Philippians from a double vice, destructive to unity, namely, contention and vain-glory, which are the very bane of unity and unanimity; let nothing be done amongst you through emulation and envy, through contention and vainglory: Pride and ambition are usually attended with strife and contention; a vainglorious person over-rates himself, undervalues others, and breaks the peace with all.

—But in lowliness of mind let each esteem other better than themselves.

Here our apostle directs to humility, in order to peace and unity; which humility he styles lowliness of mind, a grace whereby a man thinks meanly of himself, and highly of others, having a better opinion of other's wisdom and piety than his own; now this a man may do, and not sin; though he be mistaken; the publican judged the Pharisee better than himself: and though it was not so, God did not disapprove him for it, but he went away justified. It is no crime to judge another better than ourselves, though he hebe not so ; but it is pride to judge another worse than ourselves; though he be really so. Learn hence, That true humility doth not consist in lowliness of expression, but in lowliness of mind and opinion ; not the man that speaks meanly of himself, but he that thinks so, is the humble man. 2. That the humble or lowly-minded man is so conscious to himself of his own infirmities, so modest in the estimating of his graces and virtues, and so forward to hope and believe the best of others, that not only in outward expression, but in real estimation, doth he give others a preference before himself.

5 Look not every man on his own things, but every man also upon the things of others.

The apostle here dissuadeth from another sin which is very destructive of unity and peace, of love and concord, and that is the sin of inordinate self-love, whereby we regard only our own honour and profit, wholly neglecting the concerns of others : look not every man on his own things, that is, his own private advantage only or chiefly, but take care of the things which tend to the advantage of others ; not but that a Christian may and ought to look at his own things, but not wholly ; Our regard must extend further than ourselves, and our own things ; we must look on the things of others also ; we must be as just and true to another's reputation as to our own, and regard both the honour and profit of our neighbour as well as our own : And where Christians are of this public spirit and temper it contributes much, very much, towards the persevering and maintaining of unity and peace among them.

5 Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus :

That is, this humble mind. Here the apostle presses the duty of humility, from Christ's example ; he was a perfect pattern of humility when here on earth, example therefore should recommend this grace and virtue to us, which was so orient in the life of Christ, whose humility was as conspicuous as his innocency ; and accordingly the apostle descends, in the next verse, to give particular instances of the humility and humiliation of the Son of God.

6 Who, being in the form of God; thought it not robbery to be equal with God : 7 But made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of men : 8 And being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself and became obedient unto death, even the death of the crosses.

Behold here the greatest example of humility, of lowliness and abasement, that ever the world was acquainted with ; the mighty God become less than man ? To make a due estimate hereof, we must first observe, What Christ was before his incarnation and humiliation, namely, the great and mighty God ; for, says the apostle, he was in the form of God, and equal with God ; that is, being the substantial form, and essential image of the Father, enjoying the divine nature, with all its glory, and all the ensigns of majesty which God himself had eternally and invariably. As to be in the form of a servant, signifies that he was a servant ; so to be in the form of God, signifies that he was God : And observe, 2. He was in the form of God before he was in the form of a servant : And, being in the form of God, he thought it no robbery to be equal with God : Now if he thought it no robbery, it could be no robbery, and if no robbery, he must be equal, and if equal, he must be God by nature, as the Father is. Learn hence, That our Saviour possessed that glory which is truly divine, before he assumed our nature as man ; he had a peerage or equality with his Father in glory ; the angels adored him in heaven before his incarnation on earth. Isa. vi. 1, 2. Observe, 3. What mighty abasement the holy Jesus, God, blessed for evermore, underwent, when he humbled himself : He was found in fashion as a man ; he took upon him the form of a servant, and became obedient to death, even the death of the crosses. Behold here, the sun of righteousness under an (almost total) eclipse : He that was eternally beautiful and glorious, being the brightness of his Father's glory, was so veiled, clouded and debased in the day of his humiliation, that he appears not like a God, scarce like a man. Note, 1. He took upon him the form of a servant : now this was a lower degree of condescension, than the assuming the naked human nature ; for a servant is not simply a man, but a mean man, a man in a low estate. Lord, what abasement was here, that Christ, who was in the form of God, should degrade himself into the form of a servant, and take the human nature without honour, after it had lost its primitive innocency, after sin had blotted the original glory of it, and withered the beauty and excellency thereof ! O inconceivable condescension ! 2. He emptied himself, or made himself of no reputation ; that is, in the day of his incarnation he laid aside the robes of his glory, he emptied himself of that divine splendour and majesty which before he had ; not by ceasing to be what he was, but by assuming something to himself which before he was not, the Son of God descended from his throne, and put on our vile mortality ; he parted with his glory, that he might part with his life for our salvation. 3. He was made in the likeness of man, and found in fashion as a man ; that is, he was truly and really man, made in likeness of other men, without any visible outward difference : he was in all things like unto us, sin only excepted, Rom. viii. 3. He is said to appear in the likeness of sinful flesh, that is, in flesh that had the marks and miserable effects of sin upon it : Not that Christ assumed sinful flesh, or flesh really defiled by sin, but he assumed the human nature, attended with a whole troop of human infirmities, which sin first let into that nature, as hunger and thirst, weariness and pain, mortality and death : By reason of which, though he was not a sinner, yet he looked like one, and they that conversed with him took him for one, seeing all these effects of sin upon him. Lord, what a stoop was this ! To be made in the likeness of innocent flesh, had been much ; but to be made in the likeness of sinful flesh, rebellious flesh, flesh though not defiled, yet miserably defaced by sin ! O, what is this ! and who can declare his humiliation ? 4. The nature of this humiliation ; he humbled himself : The word imports both a real and voluntary abasement : Real ; Christ did not personate an humble man, nor act the part of one in a debased state, but was really and in very deed humbled, both in the sight of God and man. And, as it was real, so also was his humiliation voluntary: It is not said, he was humbled, but that he humbled himself; he was willing to stoop to this low and abject state for us; and it was the voluntariness of his humiliation that made it so acceptable to God, and so beneficial and serviceable unto us. 5. The degrees of our holy Lord's humiliation: he became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Here we have the depth of Christ's humiliation specified; it was unto death, and also aggravated, even unto the death of the cross: he humbled himself, not only to become a mortal man, but a dead corpse, and that you hanging on a tree, dying the death of a malefactor: There was pain, shame, and a curse, in the death of the cross; Christ underwent the pain patiently, the shame meekly, the curse obediently, all of them willingly and cheerfully, that the justice of God might be satisfied, his wrath pacified, his majesty reconciled, death and hell vanquished and destroyed. Behold the transcendency of Christ's love to the children of men! Greater love has no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends; but greater love had the Son of God than this, that he laid down his life for his inveterate enemies.

9 Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him, and given him a name which is above any name; 10 That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; 11 And that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

The former verses spake of the depth of Christ's humiliation, these, of the height of his exaltation. Where note, 1. The dignity itself, conferred by God upon Christ; God exalted him, highly exalted him, exalted him above all exaltation, as the word signifies. Christ, in his resurrection, was exalted, in his ascension, he was very highly exalted; in his sitting at God's right hand, he was very highly exalted, above all exaltation. 2. How the steps of Christ's exaltation did punctually answer the steps of his humiliation: the first step of his humiliation was his incarnation, by which he was made man, and, as our Surety, was made sin. The first step of his exaltation, was his resurrection, by which he was declared to be the Son of God with power, and as our Surety, having paid our debt, was released from the prison of the grave. The second step of his humiliation was his poor and contemptible life, and his painful, shameful, and accursed death: answerable thereunto is Christ's ascension into heaven, and sitting there at God's right hand, advancing him above all principalities and power, that is, above all the angels; and placing him next to himself in dignity and honour. 3. The connection between Christ's humiliation and exaltation, he humbled himself, and became obedient to the death; wherefore God hath highly exalted him. Where observe, That some make the humiliation of Christ the meritorious cause of his exaltation, and his exaltation the reward of his humiliation: others make the humiliation of Christ only the antecedent of his exaltation; he humbled himself, and God has exalted him to a dignity above all dignities and pre-eminency whatsoever, making him king and head of his church, and giving him all power, both in heaven and earth, requiring, that the divine honour due to God, should be given to him also. Note, 4. The particulars of our Lord's exaltation declared, and they are three. (1.) God hath given him a name above every name; that is, dignity and power, majesty and authority, over all creatures both in heaven and earth. (2.) That every knee, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth, should bow to the name of Jesus: every knee, that is, every creature, in heaven, earth, and hell, shall bow, that is, yield subjection to Christ, some voluntarily, others unwillingly; the good angels and good men paying a cheerful homage, the evil angels and bad men yielding a forced and constrained subjection to him. (3.) That every tongue must confess, that Jesus Christ is Lord: every tongue, that is every person, men of all nations and languages, shall confess Christ crucified, to be the Lord and judge of the world, acknowledging his royal sovereignty and dominion. 5. The end of Christ's glorious exaltation, it was to the glory of God the Father; that is, it pleased God the Father, for his own glory, that the Lord Jesus Christ, after he had been deeply humbled, should be highly exalted. Lastly, The apostle's great design and scope in setting before the Philippians the humiliation and exaltation of Jesus Christ, and that was to excite them to the grace and duty of humility, that the same humble mind should be in them which was also in Christ Jesus: As if he had said, Our Lord Jesus Christ humbled himself greatly for us, and afterwards was highly exalted by God above us; so in proportion may you expect to be exalted by God, if you humble yourselves, in order to maintain and preserve the church's peace and unity; for before honour is humility.

12 Wherefore, my beloved, as ye have always obeyed, not as in my presence only, but now much more in my absence, work out your own salvation with fear and trembling. 13 For it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure.

Note here, 1. The commendation given by St. Paul of his beloved Philippians, for their cheerful obedience to the precepts of the gospel; they always obeyed, that is, ever since their first conversion to Christianity, not only while the apostle was upon the spot with them, but since the providence of God necessitated his absence from them, not in my presence only, but now much more in my absence. But how came it to pass, that their obedience was greater, when they wanted the apostle for their instructor? Ans. In the absence of one teacher, they had another, and him a better than the inspired apostle, even the inspiring Spirit of God, who, in the apostle's absence, was more immediately present with them, by his inward motions, to excite and enable them, both to will and to do what is well pleasing to him. O how good is God, at the supplying the wants, and making up the losses of his people! If persecution drives his church's ministers into dungeons, and they cannot hear a voice behind them, they shall have the presence of his holy Spirit, and hear a voice within them, saying, This is the way.

way walk in it. Note, 2. A special duty which St. Paul exhorts the Philippians to be found in the practice of, namely, To work out their own salvation with fear and trembling: implying, that it should be every Christian's great work, to be daily working out his own salvation, that is, diligently making use of all means and faithfulnes, practising all duties in order thereunto. Observe here, 1. The excellency of the object proposed, and that is, salvation; there is salvation held forth and tendered by God to lost sinners, in the gospel. 2. The difficulty of salvation, supposed and implied in the word work; which signifies an exerting our utmost endeavours, in order to the attaining of it: The work of salvation is no lazy man's business, but a work of labour and difficulty, though the difficulties may be overcome by an industrious diligence. 3. The necessity of perseverance, in order to our attaining of salvation: Work out your salvation, that is, perfect and consummate the work which you have happily begun. 4. The manner how we should work out our own salvation, namely, with fear and trembling; intimating that an holy fear of God, and an humble fear of ourselves, will be of singular use and advantage to us in the working out of our salvation. Note, 3: The argument or motive to excite unto this labour and diligence in and about the work of salvation; and this is very encouraging, because God works with us, and in us, ver. 13. For it is God that worketh in you, both to will and to do: That God works with us, is great encouragement to us to work, but we must remember God works arbitrarily, and not necessarily; he worketh but of his own good pleasure, as a free agent, who can cease when he pleases; therefore work with fear and trembling, Learn from the whole, (1.) That we can do nothing without God. (2.) That he will do nothing without us: We can do nothing without his assistance, he will do nothing without the concurrence of our endeavours: he worketh in us, both to will and to do, and we must work with him, in order to the working out our own salvation.

14 Do all things without murmurings and disputings; 15 That ye may be blameless and harmless, the sons of God without rebuke, in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation, among whom ye shine as lights in the world, 16 Holding forth the word of life; that I may rejoice in the day of Christ, that I have not run in vain, neither laboured in vain.

Here our apostle seems to resume the exhortation which he began to press before, namely, to love and concord, to unity and peace among themselves; he exhorts them, as to do all things without contention, so without murmurings, and hot disputings, in which usually the laws of charity are violated, and the peace of the church, and quietness among Christians interrupted: And, to provoke them thereunto, he discovers to them the many great and blessed advantages which would rebound unto them by their unity and concord. (1.) Hereby, they should be blameless and harmless, the sons of God without rebuke, that is, very inoffensive persons, or, as the Greek word renders it, that ye in aybe the spotless sons of God; not absolutely spotless, pure, and perfect, but without such spots as are inconsistent with your sonship; there is a spot which is, and a spot which is not, the spot of God's children, Deut. xxxii. 4. Sins of infirmity, are spots found on the best of his children; sins of presumption, if at any time found upon you, they are not the spots of his children. (2.) Hereby they should shine as lights in the world, that is, in the Pagan world, and in the Christian church: This imports both the high dignity, and special duty of Christians, to be as so many suns, to arise and shine like mighty luminaries in the firmament of the world, casting out their rays and beams in a holy and heavenly conversation. (3.) Hereby they would hold forth the word of life; not only hold it fast for their own comfort, but hold it forth for others benefit, that is, in their Christian practice and profession; the lives of Christians should publish the word of life, to the intent, that the enemies of it may fall in love with it. Perhaps, as many have been converted to Christianity, by holding forth the word of life in practice, as by holding it forth from the pulpit: An holy life is the loudest proclamation, and the best way of holding forth the word of life. (4.) Hereby he should have joy and rejoicing, as well as they reap benefit and advantage: that I may rejoice in the day of Christ, that I have not run in vain, nor laboured in vain: that is, that I have not preached the gospel unprofitably amongst you. Here note, That the work of the ministry is a laborious work, a spending work; the apostle here sets it forth by running a race, which is a wasting and strength-consuming exercise: I have run, I have laboured. 2. That the labour and pains of the most faithful and indefatigable ministers of Christ may be, and too often are, lost upon, and in vain, unto the people that are constantly made partakers of them: They may run in vain, and labour in vain, as to their people; but, blessed be God, it shall not be in vain as to themselves, Isa. xlix. 4. Though Israel be not gathered, yet shall they be glorious. Note, 3. That the glory which shall be put upon our people in the day of judgment, who were converted to God by our ministerial endeavours, will add to our joy as ministers, and be our crown of rejoicing in that day: that I may rejoice in the day of Christ, &c.

17 Yea, and if I be offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith, I joy, and rejoice with you all. 18 For the same cause also do ye joy, and rejoice with me.

Behold here, how St. Paul, the under shepherd, imitates Christ, that great and good Shepherd, in his readiness to lay down his life for the sheep; not for their reconciliation, but for their confirmation: If, says he, it shall please God that I be, by martyrdom, offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith, that is, to establish you in the faith which I have taught you, and to confirm and seal the truth of it, with my blood, I will rejoice therein for your sakes, and I desire you to rejoice with me, and to bless God for me in so doing. Note here, The emphasis and elegancy of the apostle's words, If I be offered up: a manifest allusion to the Jewish sacrifices, in which there was wine poured out as a libation upon the sacrifice, and then offered up to God. Thus says he, If my blood, like wine, be poured forth, whilst I am employed by the preaching of the gospel, to render render you Gentiles an acceptable sacrifice, and a sweet smelling savour unto God, I should rejoice even thus to die in your service, and for the confirmation of your faith. Hence learn, That life itself is not, and will not be thought too dear, or accounted by the ministers of Christ too much to lay down in the service of their people's souls, and for the confirmation of their faith: If I be offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith, I joy and rejoice. 2. That the ministers of Christ should not preach any thing to their people, but what they dare seal and confirm the truth of with their very blood, if God calls them thereunto: St. Paul had before preached the doctrine of the gospel to the Philippians, and now he stood ready to seal it with his blood.

19 But I trust in the Lord Jesus to send Timotheus shortly unto you, that I also may be of good comfort, when I know your state. 20 For I have no man like-minded, who will naturally care for your state. 21 For all seek their own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's. 22 But ye know the proof of him, that as a son with the father, he has served with me in the gospel. 23 Him therefore I hope to send presently, so soon as I shall see how it will go with me.

Our apostle, having finished the first part of the chapter which contained exhortations to duty, comes now to the second part of it, containing arguments of comfort; and here, first, he comforts the Philippians, by promising to send Timotheus unto them shortly. Note here, 1. The greatness of St. Paul's soul, widened with desires to advance the kingdom of Jesus Christ; his pious zeal put him upon contriving some way of making a supply of his necessitated absence from the Philippians; what he could not do by himself, he desires and endeavours to do by another, even Timothy: him he promises to send as a living epistle, to instruct and exhort, to quicken and comfort the church at Philippi, in his constrained absence from her. "Blessed apostle! So that Christ might be advanced, thou caredst not by whom it were, whether by thyself, or by another: thou wert willing to stand in the crowd and be hidden, so that Christ might stand upon another's shoulders, and be seen!" I trust in the Lord to send Timotheus to you shortly. 2. St. Paul, being about to send Timothy to Philippi, sends first a commendation of him: and that which he particularly commends Timothy for, was, his affectionate love unto the Philippians, and his tender care and concern for them: I have no man like-minded, who will care for your state: now, this care in Timothy, for and towards the Philippians, is here recommended by St. Paul in several observable instances of it. (1.) It was a spiritual care chiefly he careth for your state, that is, for your spiritual state; not that he was without concern for their temporal happiness, but the prosperity of their souls was the prime object of his care. (2.) It was a solicitous care, the Greek word signifies an anxious care, a soul-cutting, a soul-rending care; his care was not to cut and wound the souls, to vex and grieve the spirits of his people, but he cuts his own soul with caring for his people. (3.) It was a sincere care, a natural genuine care he naturally careth for your state:

naturally, that is, heartily, sincerely, not artificially, and in appearance only: Some can artificially act the part of a zealot, when their own interest or applause make it necessary; but Timothy was unskilful in such arts, he did naturally, cheerfully, and constantly care for their state; there was a reality, yea, a large quantity of love, and hearty affection towards the Philippians found with him. (4.) St. Paul commends this care in Timothy towards them, for the rarity of it: I find none like-minded, that is, few, very few, like-minded with him, and equal-hearted to him in the cause of Christ: St. Paul had divers ministers now with him, but one Timothy; others sought their own things, but he the things of Jesus Christ: Yet I conceive this is not to be understood universally, but synecdochically; not as if all ministers, except Timothy only, sought themselves, and regarded their own private interest but the most and far greatest part did so, refusing to undertake such a tedious journey from Rome to Philippi, as Timothy stood ready to undertake. Learn hence, That it is a great sin in all, but especially in the ministers of Jesus Christ, to be of a self-seeking spirit. 3. He commends this care of Timothy's towards them, by their experimental knowledge of it, and acquaintance with it; for, when old Paul was at Philippi, young Timothy was an assistant to him, as a son to a father, obeying his counsel, following his directions, imitating his example, in all things tending to the edification of the church. Now from the whole, that is, from St. Paul's care to send Timothy, thus qualified, to labour in the gospel at the church in Philippi, we note, That such as have power to send forth ministers to flocks, and pastors to take care of the souls of a people, should send such as are both able and willing to spend and be spent for the good of souls, and, if it may be, such as are well known unto, and approved of, by the flock, for their zeal and diligence in the work of Christ. St. Paul here is a pattern for all patrons, laying before them the qualifications of the persons whom they should recommend to the cure of souls, such as, with Timothy, have a compassion for souls, a truly solicitous care and concern for the happiness and welfare of souls, such as the people have had some knowledge of, or at least a liberty to enquire after; the man of good ministerial abilities, not of great simoniacal gifts: For if patrons, in the execution of that trust, (but little considered) do seek only their own things, no wonder that their clerks seek not the things of Jesus Christ.

24 But I trust in the Lord that I also myself shall come shortly. 25 Yet I supposed it necessary to send to you Epaphroditus, my brother and companion in labour, and fellow-soldier, but your messenger, and he that ministered to my wants. 26 For he longed after you all, and was full of heaviness, because that ye had heard that he had been sick. 27 For indeed, he was sick nigh unto death: But God had mercy on him; and not on him only, but on me also, lest I should have sorrow upon sorrow.

Our apostle having, in the foregoing verses, declared his resolutions to send Timothy to the Philippians as soon as he should see how it would go with himself at Rome and what what would be the issue of his bonds; and having also discovered his own purpose to come himself to them, as soon as the providence of God should set him at liberty; in the mean time, he assures them, he would no longer detain their own special minister Epaphroditus from them, whom they had so kindly sent with a liberal supply unto him, in the prison at Rome; I supposed it necessary to send unto you Epaphroditus, my brother, my companion in labour, my fellow soldier, your messenger, and he that ministered to my wants. Here note, 1. How copious St. Paul is in the commendation of Epaphroditus; he calls him, his brother, his brother in Christ, his brother in the ministry, his companion in labour, his fellow-labourer in Christ's vineyard, travelling from one part of it to another, to plant and propagate the gospel of Christ; his fellow soldier, also, a faithful and constant associate with him in the Christian warfare: Their apostle or messenger, the bishop of Philippi, say the ancient fathers; their messenger, to carry the church's alms to St. Paul, say others: Behold here, in St. Paul's sending away Epaphroditus laden thus with commendation, the great modesty, sincerity, and humility, of this chief apostle. St. Paul had many prerogatives above Epaphroditus, he was immediately called by Christ, extraordinary fitted and furnished for his calling; he laboured more abundantly, and suffered more abundantly than all the rest; yet he almost equalizes and levels Epaphroditus with himself, calling him brother, fellow-labourer, fellow-soldier, and highly magnifies the gifts and graces of God's Spirit in him, without the least diminution; teaching such as are dignified in the church, and exalted by their merits above others, not to despise the persons, nor to extenuate and lessen the gifts and graces, and usefulness of their inferior brethren. Pride in any person is odious, but in a minister it is monstrous; they that have received more than others, and know better than others, ought to be patterns of humility unto others. 2. The reasons here assigned, why St. Paul judged it necessary to send Epaphroditus back to his charge at Philippi. (1.) He longed after his flock, ver. 26 He longed after you all, even unto heaviness; we do not read of his longing after his family, or his friends; or the fleece, but his flock, his church and charge at Philippi; this lay near his heart, this he longed to be with. (2.) This longing and heaviness was mutual, the Philippians longed for him, and were full of heaviness because of his sickness. When the head of a faithful minister of Jesus Christ akes, his people's hearts ake; mutual longings between ministers and people in case of absence, and mutual heaviness and mourning in case of sickness, is a certain argument and evidence of mutual love one towards another. Note, 3. How our apostle confirms the report of Epaphroditus's sickness, and celebrates the mercy and goodness of God in his unexpected recovery; indeed he was sick nigh unto death, but God had mercy on him, &c. Here observe, 1. The eminency of the person who was sick, Epaphroditus, a great man, a good man, a man of God, St. Paul's brother, companion, fellow-soldier, falls sick, when engaged in Christ's and the church's special service: Saints as well as sinners, ministers as well as people, are subject to sickness, diseases, nay, death itself may meet them in the work of Christ. 2. As the eminency of the person, so the extremity of the disease, he was nigh unto death. But why did not St. Paul, who had the gift of healing, help Epaphroditus now sick, as well as raise Eutychus when dead? Acts xx. 9. Ans. The apostles had not the gift of healing to make use of it at their pleasure, but as God was pleased by a special instinct and a strong faith to excite them to it, when it was his pleasure to have them use it: These gifts were given for the sake of unbelievers, to convince them of the truth of Christianity, but God did not think fit to have them ordinarily exercised upon believers. 3. The recovery of Epaphroditus, and the author of it, God had mercy on him; he who is Lord of life and death, said in mercy to him, "Return and live." When God preserves the lives, and restores the health of his faithful ministers, it is an act of no small mercy both to their people and themselves: To their people, as they became the greater instruments of their good: To themselves, as it increases their own reward; the longer a minister lives, the more glory he brings to God; and the more glory he brings to God on earth, the more glory shall he partake of with God in heaven; in short, the longer he lives, the more souls he converts, and every soul is as a new gem added to that crown, which shall one day be put upon his head, Dan. xii. 3. They that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars for ever and ever. Lastly, The share which St. Paul had in the mercy of Epaphroditus's recovery, God had mercy; not on him only, but on me also, lest I should have sorrow upon sorrow: Paul had much sorrow, a great load of sorrow upon him at that time; he was now among strangers, yea, among prisoners, in the midst of persecutors, and his mind oppressed with sorrow, partly for the Philippians, partly for Epaphroditus; therefore the Lord, in tender pity to him, did not take away by death his dear and useful companion, lest he should have sorrow upon sorrow, and cause his wounds to bleed afresh. Learn hence, So compassionate is God towards his dear children, that though he often causes them grief and sorrow, yet he will not overcharge them therewith nor add affliction to the afflicted, nor suffer them to be exercised and tried above what they are able.

28 I sent him therefore the more carefully, that when ye see him again, ye may rejoice, and that I may be the less sorrowful. 29 Receive him therefore in the Lord with all gladness, and hold such in reputation. 30 Because for the work of Christ he was nigh unto death, not regarding his life to supply your lack of service toward me.

Here, first, St. Paul assigns the reason why he was so careful to send back Epaphroditus to the Philippians, namely, to allay his own grief, and to increase their joy, that when ye see him ye might rejoice, and I be the less sorrowful. Next, the apostle exhorts them to receive him with all joy and gladness, and to give him, and all such as he was, due honour, and deserved respect; and doubtless, the Philippians received him with inexpressible joy as the minister of Christ risen from the dead recovered from the grave; received to life and service, when all hopes of enjoying him were cut off. O the folly and frailty of human nature! We prize our mercies more by the want, than by the worth of them. Lastly, He assigns a special reason why he would have them receive him with such demonstrations of joy, namely, because it was in their and his service that he was brought to the very brink of the grave, for the work of Christ he was nigh unto death; the work here meant is properly his journey to Rome, which was long and tedious; his watchings and pains-taking with and for the apostle there were very spending, he endeavoured to supply the absence and want of the whole church to St. Paul; his zeal for God, and his affection to St. Paul, carried him out beyond himself, beyond his strength, to the apparent prejudice both of his health and life. Learn hence, 1. That to relieve the members, but especially the ministers of Christ, in their necessities and wants, is the work of Christ; for the work of Christ he was nigh unto death: Ministers are not only engaged in the work of Christ when they preach, &c. but when they visit their flock, inquire into the wants of the poor, and administer to the necessities of the distressed, this is the work of Christ. 2. That sickness may overtake, yea, death itself may meet the faithful servants and ministers of Christ, when they are engaged in his own work: It was in the work of the Lord that Epaphroditus met with his sickness; and had he met with death itself, he had been happy; for, Blessed are they that die in the work of the Lord, they shall rest from their labours, and their works shall follow them.

CHAP. III.

The design of our apostle, in this chapter, is to arm the church of the Philippians against those false Judaizing teachers, who confounded Christ and Moses, circumcision and the gospel together; which he doth by several arguments.

FINALLY, my brethren, rejoice in the Lord.—

There is no duty which believers do more willingly hear, or more difficultly observe, than the duty of spiritual rejoicing; had our apostle called upon the blessed angels to rejoice, who have neither sin, nor sorrow, nor fear, nor sufferings, nor enemies to annoy them, that might have seemed agreeable; but is it at all congruous to persuade sinners, loaded with guilt, and defiled with corruption, clothed with infirmities, assaulted with temptation, persecuted by the world? To bid them rejoice, may seem strange: But the wonder will cease, if we consider the object which he directs them to rejoice in, and that is, the Lord; not in themselves, but in the Lord Jesus Christ: My brethren rejoice in the Lord. Learn hence, 1. That the Lord Jesus Christ is the great, sure, and perpetual joy of his own people; the object of joy is a present good, a precious good, a proportionable good, a perpetual good, such is our Lord Jesus Christ. 2. That it is the duty of all sincere and serious Christians to joy and rejoice in him. Finally, brethren, rejoice in the Lord; rejoice in his person, in the treasures of wisdom and knowledge that are found in him, which render him an object worthy of angelical adoration; rejoice in his mediation, in the great things he has done and suffered for you in the graces of his Spirit conferred upon you, and in the hopes of that glory to which he has intitled you.

—To write the same things to you, to me indeed is not grievous, but for you it is safe.

To write the same things, that is, not the same things which I wrote before, but the same things which I preached to you before, and which you often heard by word of mouth from me before; though I inculcate and press the same truths upon you by my writing, which I have done by my preaching, it is neither grievous nor burdensome to me, nor unnecessary or unprofitable for you. Learn hence, That the often repeating, and frequent inculcating of such truths as are most useful and necessary for the instruction and edification of the hearers, ought to be esteemed neither burdensome by the minister, nor wearisome by the people. Observe farther, That we have here St. Paul's judgment against oral tradition, which the church of Rome prefers before the written word; so did not St. Paul, knowing that what is delivered by word of mouth might soon slip out of the memory; but what is written, is remaining: Blessed be God for his written word.

Observe here, 1. The cautionary direction given the Philippians to beware of false teachers, who adulterated and corrupted the doctrine of Christ, by joining the works and observances of the law with the doctrine of the gospel, in point of justification, making them at least the partial ground of their confidence and rejoicing; beware of such, says our apostle. 2. The cutting reproof given to these Judaizing teachers, in that odious character he gives of them, and in that brand of infamy which he claps upon them. (1.) He calls them dogs; a term, not of diminution only, but of utmost disgrace; Is thy servant a dog? 2 Kings viii. 13. supposing that nothing could be thought more vile and base. The Jews called all the Gentiles dogs, because unclean; St. Paul here calls the false teachers dogs, sily, because, as dogs, they did rend and tear the simplicity of the gospel, and divide the glory of man's salvation betwixt faith and works; because, as dogs, they did hark out reproaches against the apostles and their doctrine, delivered in its native purity and simplicity; because, as dogs, they did take a great deal of pains to compass abundance of ground to gain their game; or, in our Saviour's words, They compass sea and land to make proselytes. (2.) Evil-workers, because, pretending to labour in the gospel, they did subvert and overthrow the great design of the gospel, pretending to be fellow workers with the apostles, but pulling down what they built up. (3.) The concision; so in contempt he calls circumcision, which these Judaizing teachers pleaded the necessity of; as Hezekiah called the brazen serpent Nehushtan; because circumcision, being no longer an ordinance of God, was no better than a cutting off the flesh; and they that made it necessary to justification, cut themselves off from Christ, and from the church of Christ; by urging the necessity of circumcision, they cut and rent asunder the church of God. Note here, 1:

How

How different the temper of this apostle was in different cases; in things of an indifferent nature, and less necessary, who more mild, indulgent and complying, breathing forth the spirit of the meek Jesus? But when opinions were broached, which tend to pervert souls, and to subvert the gospel, then he speaks fire and thunder, and no terms are bad enough for such seducers: Let us follow St. Paul, as he followed Christ, and learn when to be mild, and when to be zealous. 2. With what an excess of care he cautions the Philippians against these false teachers, saying, Beware, beware, beware; three times together in one short verse; thereby instructing the ministers of Christ, that their utmost zeal and diligence is necessary in warning their people to guard against seducers.

3 For we are the circumcision, which worship God in the Spirit, and rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh.

That is, we Christians are alone the true and spiritual circumcision, and accounted circumcised by God, because we have that which the outward circumcision signified, namely, the circumcision of the heart, and the mortification of all carnal lusts and desires; we have the substance of that ordinance which is infinitely more pleasing to God than the ceremony and the shadow; though you have the sign, we have the thing signified. But how doth that appear? Three ways; we worship God in the Spirit, we rejoice in Christ Jesus, we have no confidence in the flesh. (1.) We worship God in the Spirit; that is, 1. We give him the worship of our souls and spirits, and do not put him off with mere bodily worship, or with the old antiquated Jewish worship. 2. We worship God in the Spirit; that is, through the assistance of the holy Spirit; he excites and quickens to the duty, he assists and enables in the duty, and he encourages and emboldens the soul to expect audience and acceptance after the duty. Again, (2.) We rejoice in Christ Jesus; this was a second evidence of their being the true circumcision. Let them glory in their carnal ordinance of outward circumcision, we will rejoice in Christ Jesus, who had freed us from the slavery of the ordinance. (3.) We have no confidence in the flesh, not in circumcision, or any fleshly privileges, or carnal prerogatives; we confide only in Christ, and in nothing but Christ. Note, That by flesh here, is meant particularly, the circumcision of the flesh; but more generally, by flesh, may be understood, all the externals of religion, which men place their trust and confidence in, all outward privileges and ordinances are flesh, in the apostles sense here; prayer is flesh, ordinances are flesh, the righteousness of the law is flesh; nay, grace itself, trusted to and confided in, is flesh: The sincere and serious Christian rejoices in Christ Jesus, confides in him, but dares not place any confidence in the flesh.

4 Though I might also have confidence in the flesh. If any other man thinketh that he hath whereof he might trust in the flesh, I more: 5 Circumcised the eight day, of the stock of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, an Hebrew of the Hebrews; as touching the law, a Pharisee; 6 Concerning zeal persecuting the church; touching the righteousness which is in the law, blameless.

As if the apostle had said, "Let no man think that I undervalue the Jewish privileges, because I want them; shew me ever a Judaizing teacher of them all that can pretend to more, or so many of them as myself; so that, were this a ground of confidence, I can vie with any one of them in carnal privilege; Jewish prerogatives, and outward performances; yea, I can boast of as much self-righteousness as the best of them, and beyond them all, for I was circumcised, and had the seal of the covenant applied to me, yea, I was circumcised the eight day, the very day prescribed by the law; (the Jews maintaining that circumcision before the eighth day was of less value): Of the stock of Israel, one of that nation which God set apart for himself, when he rejected all the nations of the earth beside: Of the tribe of Benjamin, of a noble tribe, as well as descended of an honourable people; a tribe which kept close to God, when other tribes revolted to the worship of Jereboam's calves; a tribe honoured with the first of Israel's kings, king Saul: An Hebrew of the Hebrews, that is, born a Jew both by father's side and mother's side: As touching the law, a Pharisee; that is, as touching the interpretation and observation of the law, a Pharisee; or one of the strictest sects among the Jews for the profession of religion: Concerning zeal, persecuting the church; that is, as touching zeal for the Jewish religion, I have shewed that above others in my fiery and furious persecution of the church of Christ: I was active according as my judgment and conscience directed me: And as touching the righteousness which is in and by the law, that is, as to my personal obedience unto the law, I was blameless, without spot, as the original word signifies, that is, in my own account, and in man's esteem, my conversation not stained with any gross sin, but very exact in my deportment and behaviour, living up to my knowledge, my practice corresponding with my profession." Behold here a man that had a large stock of Jewish privileges and prerogatives: All these grounds of confidence the apostle had before his conversion; and he might have rested there, and have gloried, and confided therein, as well as the Jewdaizing doctors did, who gloried in their external privileges: But how far St. Paul was from this spirit and temper, the next verses informs us.

7 But what things were gain to me, those I counted loss for Christ. 8 Yea doubtless and I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord: for whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but dung that I may win Christ,

That is, the forementioned privileges, which heretofore he accounted gain, and thought to gain justification and salvation by, now, since his illumination, he counted them all loss; he saw he had lost his soul forever, had he trusted to these; but Christ being made known to him as the only way to gain pardon of sin and acceptance with God, he renounces all his former privileges, his former legal righteousness, he durst not lean upon these broken reeds, he would have no more confidence in the flesh, but in Christ only; what things were reputed gain to me, these I accounted loss for Christ's sake. And he repeats the words over again with confidence and assurance, that he might not be thought to speak unadvisedly, and in a heat; yea doubtless, and I count all things but loss: He did not only count them loss, but he had actually renounced them as such: An allusion to a merchant, who is content to suffer the loss of all his goods, to save his life. But how did St. Paul suffer the loss of them? Ans. He did not make shipwreck of holy duties, and cast off the performance of them, but he cast off all dependency upon them, and cast away all expectation of happiness and salvation from them, which he had before. Observe farther, He did not only count them loss, but cast them away as dung, as filthy carrion, as garbage cast to dogs, as the word signifies. Such things as these, the false teachers (whom he called dogs) might delight in; but as for himself, he could relish and favour nothing in them, in comparison of Jesus Christ. In the word, observe, 1. The low esteem and mean account which St. Paul had, and every enlightened Christian has, of the greatest advantages which this world doth or can afford; in comparison of Jesus Christ, and him crucified, I count all things but loss; all my spiritual privileges, with all my worldly advantages, I do, upon the greatest deliberation and thought, undervalue them all for the sake of Christ and his grace. 2. The high and honourable esteem which he had of the knowledge of Jesus Christ; he declares there was a transcendent excellency in it; for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord. The knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ, and of the way and method of salvation by and through him, is an excelling knowledge; every thing of Jesus Christ is excellent and worthy to be known; the dignity of his person, as God, as man, as God-man, or Mediator between God and Man; the dignity of his offices, as the great King, Priest, and Prophet of his church; the eminency of his example, the depth of his humiliation, the height of his exaltation, the transcendency of his love in all his undertakings for us, and the way and method of his justification of us by faith in his blood. We may conclude of the act, by the object; Christ is the most excellent object, therefore the knowledge of Christ is, and must be the most excellent knowledge; not only all the excellencies of the creatures are found in him in the most excellent manner, but all the excellencies of the God-head, the fulness of the God-head, dwell in him bodily, that is, personally and substantially. 3. The effect which this knowledge of Christ had upon our apostle; it enabled him to suffer the loss of all things: Those that have attained the excellent knowledge of Jesus Christ, will not think much to suffer the loss of any thing, yea, of all things, for the obtaining of him, and salvation by him. 4. The end and design of St. Paul, in parting with all for Christ, or the motive and encouragement which induced him thereunto, namely, that he might win Christ; that is, that he might obtain an interest in him, and the blessing purchased by him; for this was he willing to part with all his privileges, all his accomplishments, all his enjoyments, all his own righteousness, his exactness in the outward observation of the law; he renounced it all, not in point of performance, but in point of dependence; he renounced all confidence in it for his justification before God.

9 And be found in him, not having mine own righteousness, which is of the law, but that which is through the faith of Christ, the righteousness which is of God by faith:

Observe here, 1. The subject-matter of St. Paul's desire was to be found in Christ. Beza, upon the place, brings in the justice of God pursuing Paul as a malefactor; and Christ, as a city of refuge which he desires to flee unto, and be found in. By being found in Christ, then, understand ingrafting and incorporating into him by faith, to find acceptance with God, through him, as our surety and representative, and to persevere in our obedience to him to the end of our lives. Learn, That such as desire, above all things, to be found in Christ, are willing to do, to suffer any thing, yea, all things, and care not in what condition they be found, how poor and low, how afflicted and despised soever, so they may be found in Christ. Observe, 2. The manner how St. Paul desired to be found in Christ; this is expressed both negatively and positively. (1.) Negatively, not having mine own righteousness which is of the law; that is, not depending upon any thing that he could call his own, neither upon his spiritual privileges, nor natural accomplishments, nor religious performances, nor upon his most perfect righteousness, and best obedience, for his justification before God, knowing it to be both unwarrantable and unsafe so to do; unwarrantable, because our good works never had the impress of God's ordination for that end; they were never designed to justify our persons, but to justify our faith; and unsafe it is to trust to our own righteousness and best services, because of the many sinful imperfections cleaving to them: Alas! they cannot justify themselves; how then should they justify us? Our best duties deserve to be thrown as so much dung upon our faces: Surely, we may plead the excellency, and preach the necessity of good works, though we do not set them in Christ's chair: Such then as would be found in Christ, though they are ever so careful to maintain good works (which it is their duty and interest, their daily care and endeavour to do) yet they dare not rest in them, nor rely upon them for justification, or make any thing in themselves, or done by themselves, the ground of their confidence. Christ's perfect obedience, intitles us to heaven; our own imperfect (if sincere) obedience, will evidence that title. Some rely upon a natural righteousness, that which they call good nature; others rely upon a negative righteousness, because they are not so unrighteous as some; others rely upon a positive righteousness, a moral righteousness, in observing the duties of the second table, a religious righteousness, in performing the outward duties of prayer, hearing the word, receiving the sacraments. But though St. Paul was one of the most religious men that the Jewish religion ever had, yet he durst not be found with this righteousness alone, but desires to be found in Christ, not having his own righteousness, which is of the law. Observe farther, The way how the apostle desired to be found in Christ, is not only, (1.) Negatively; but, (2.) Positively declared, that which is through the faith of Christ, that righteousness which is of God by faith. Here note, 1. The righteousness which secures a guilty sinner from the dint of God's wrath is Christ's righteousness; he is made unto us of God righteousness, 1 Cor. i. 30. Now, this righteousness is here called, (1.) The righteousness of God, because of his appointing, ordaining and accepting it. (2.) The righteousness of faith, because this righteousness is made ours by faith: faith apprehending and applying the death and sufferings of Jesus Christ; the fruit and benefit of his undertaking, becomes the believing sinners, and God is at peace with him: Such as will be found in Christ, must have a righteousness, the meritorious, righteousness of Christ, to answer the demands of the law, and a personal righteousness of their own, to answer the commands of the gospel. St. Paul here, though a transcendent saint, though an eminent apostle, yet divests himself of his own righteousness, that he might be clothed upon with the righteousness of the Mediator, be found in him as his Surety in the day of account, and obtain pardon for the sake of his satisfaction. 2. That there is no gain to be had from this righteousness by a lost sinner, except it be apprehended by faith; it was not a righteousness of his own that St. Paul desired to be found in, but faith was his own, inherent in him, and acted by him, which did intitle him to that righteousness, called therefore here, the righteousness which is of God by faith.

10 That I may know him, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformable unto his death;

Our apostle had in the foregoing verse, expressed his earnest desire to be found in Christ, with respect to his justification; in this verse, with respect to his sanctification, he desires to know Christ, as the Messiah and Mediator, that he might experience the power of the resurrection, raising him from the death of sin, to a life of grace and holiness, and taste something of that comfort and joy which is found in suffering with him and for him; and to be made conformable to his death, by a daily dying unto sin: Knowing, that if he were conformed to him in the likeness of his death, he should be also in the likeness of his resurrection. Here note, 1. What it is that a person justified by the righteousness of Christ doth most desire, namely, a spirit of holiness, and sanctification, flowing from Christ, to enable him to live unto him: that I may know the power of his resurrection, that is, experience that divine power in my soul, quickening me to a life of grace, which Christ experienced in quickening his dead body when it lay in the grave. "It is as great a work of the Spirit to form Christ in the heart of a sinner, as it was to fashion him in the womb, or to raise him from the grave," (says the pious bishop Reynolds upon the place.) 2. That such as are justified and sanctified by the Spirit of Christ, are willing to have fellowship with him in his sufferings, not ambitious to share with him in the merit of his sufferings, but desirous to participate with him in the benefit of his sufferings, and also, to be conformed to him in their own sufferings; the members think it an honour to be like their head their suffering head, as well as their glorified head; and well they may; for in and under all their sufferings, especially for him, they have his presence with them, his compassion to moderate them, his strength to bear them, his intercession to preserve from falling away in them; and his crown, after they have suffered a while, to reward them for them.

11 If by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead:

By the resurrection of the dead, here, is not to be understood the general resurrection, for all men shall attain that whether they strive for it or no: but he intends, that complete holiness, and absolute perfection in grace, which shall attend the state of the resurrection; so he explains it himself in the next verse, Not that I have already attained, &c. or am already perfect; and he shews how diligent he was endeavouring, in the use of all possible means, to arrive at it, and attain unto it. Learn, That the glorious resurrection of the just, or grace consummated in glory, is attainable, and deserves and requires the utmost care and diligence of the most holy and zealous Christians, to be exerted and put forth, in order to the attaining of it.

12 Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect; but I follow after, if that I may apprehend that for which also I am apprehended of Christ Jesus. 13 Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended: but this one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, 14 I press toward the mark of the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

Our apostle here compares himself to a person running in a race: the prize which he did contend and run for, was perfection in grace. The highest decree of which in this life, consists in a desire and endeavour to obtain the largest measures and fullest degrees of holiness, that are here attainable: The manner how he ran for this prize, he tells us, was, by looking forward, not backward; he did not look back to the things which he had left behind, namely, to the privileges of Judaism, not to his past performances; but like a racer, kept himself continually upon the stretch, with his eye fixed firmly upon the prize at the end of the goal, that he might lay hold upon it, and be crowned with it. Note here, Christianity is a race; every Christian in his life must run this race; in his running he must look forward, and not backward, not reckon how much of the way is past, but make the best of the way to come: He must keep heaven, as the mark and prize he runs for, continually in his eye, to hearten him on against all hardships and discouragements whatsoever, and in a word, must be apprehended before he can apprehend: St. Paul was apprehended by Christ, and caught hold of by him, when he fled from him, otherwise he had never apprehended; Christ takes hold on us, before we have any desire to lay hold on him; we move as moved of him, and assisted by him.

minded: and if in any thing ye be otherwise minded God shall reveal even this unto you. 16 Nevertheless, whereto we have already attained, let us walk by the same rule, let us mind the same thing.

Let as many as be perfect, that is, grown Christians, instructed thoroughly in their Christian duty, who, compared with others, may be called perfect, be thus minded, as I am, namely, to believe the circumcision of the flesh abolished, and that no confidence is to be placed in any righteousness of our own, but in the righteousness which is of God by faith only; and if any, seduced by the Judaizing teachers, be otherwise minded, and think that the ceremonial law is not abrogated, nor the practice of circumcision abolished, God, in his due time will shew them their error, and convince them that none of those things are now necessary for the obtaining of his favour. Nevertheless, in the mean time, he exhorts all persons, according to the measures of light and knowledge which they had received, to walk according to the rule of the scriptures, preserving mutual love, and avoiding further rents and divisions. Observe here, That in the first and best age of the Christian church, there was, and we cannot expect but there ever will be, a variety of opinions, and differences in judgment, amongst the members thereof. 2. That, in this case, of unavoidable differences amongst good men, there ought to be mutual charity and meekness, moderation and forbearance, no censorious judging of each other, but look first at what is wanting in ourselves, and next, at what is useful in others; the one will make us humble, the other charitable, and both peaceable.

17 Brethren, be followers together of me, and mark them which walk so, as ye have for an example. 18 For many walk, of whom I have told you often, and now tell you even weeping, that they are the enemies of the cross of Christ; 19 Whose end is destruction, whose God is their belly; and whose glory is in their shame; who mind earthly things.

Here our apostle propounds his own example to their imitation; follow me, who have renounced all my Jewish privileges, all confidence in any thing of my own; and mark them for your patterns, who walk so as to have us for an example. O! how happy it is when the ministers of Christ go before their people, and tread out the steps which they are to take towards heaven, when they can say to their people, (without any upbraiding from their own consciences) be followers of us, and of all such as have us for an example. Next he warns them against following the doctrines and practices of the false teachers, the Judaizing doctors, those great zealots for the observation of the ceremonial law, and the rite of circumcision; these he paints out in their proper colours: (1.) He calls them the enemies of the cross of Christ, because they preached up the necessity of circumcision, and the observation of the ceremonial law; and so, in effect, denied Christ to be come in the flesh, or affirming, that he died in vain: Whose end is destruction, if they persist in their wicked doctrines and practices, their end will be everlasting destruction: Whose God is their belly, who chiefly mind the gratification and pleasing of a sensual appetite: They who serve their belly before God, or as they should serve God, do make a god of their belly; we may provide for the belly, but not serve it, that is to serve us, by fitting us to serve God, our neighbour, and ourselves. Whose glory is their shame; that is, they gloried in their wicked practices in general, wherof they ought to be ashamed, and the circumcision of the shameful member in particular; they are puffed up with that which should rather make them blush: They mind earthly things: The riches, honours, pleasures, applause of the world, are things wholly upon their hearts, counting gain godliness, not regarding Christ's interest, but only promoting their own designs. Lord! what a dismal character is this of those men that undertake to be teachers of others? With what a black coal doth the apostle draw their picture, and yet his hand was guided by the Spirit of God, whose judgment of them was according to truth.

20 For our conversation is in heaven; from whence also we look for the Saviour the Lord Jesus Christ;

As if the apostle had said, "As you love your souls follow not those false teachers afore described, for they are citizens of this world; but imitate and follow us who are citizens of heaven, where our Head is, where our heart is, where our happiness is: It is true, we live here below, but we belong to the corporation and society above, our citizenship is in heaven; for we have an high esteem of that happiness, and our chief concern is to make sure of it, and we please and delight ourselves with the joyful expectation of it, and will live answerably to our expectation; as we hope hereafter to live like angels in glory, so we now endeavour to live like the angels in holiness." Learn hence, All the faithful, both ministers and people, have a right to heaven, as to their city; they are therefore with their hearts and affections to be daily aspiring after it, and live in hopes of getting, ere long, the full possession of it.

21 Who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, according to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself.

Observe here, 1. All the faithful who have their conversation in heaven, do expect and look for Christ coming from thence, not as a terrible Judge, but as a gracious and powerful Saviour. 2. What they do expect at the coming of this Saviour, namely, the changing of their vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body. Note here, 2. The present condition of the body of man, it is in a vile condition, vile in its original; our body is made of vile dust; vile in regard of its moral vileness, and sinful vileness; vile in regard of its accidental vileness, as their body is the seat of their vile diseases, and subject to vile abuses; vile, considered with respect to its ultimate vileness at death; how does a body, as beautiful as ever was Absalom's, when death comes, run into rottness and putrefaction! our sin made us vile in the sight of God whilst we lived, and renders our bodies viler in the sight of men when we die. 2.

The future condition which the bodies of good men shall be in, at the appearance of Christ; this vile body shall be a beautiful and a blessed body, the body we lay down shall be rebuilt, formed and fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body; resembling his incorruptability and immortality, in purity and spirituality, in power and activity, and in happiness and felicity. 3. The efficient cause of this great and glorious change, with reference to the body, and that is Christ, He shall change our vile bodies, together with the means by which all this is to be effected and accomplished, namely, the wonderful power of Christ, according to the working whereby he is able to subdue all things to himself. Surely, it is as easy for Christ to give body to a soul at the resurrection, as to breathe a soul into a body every day in the work of creation. But the power of Christ is but a weak argument to build our hopes of the body's resurrection upon, without a revelation of his will; he can quench all the fire in hell in a moment; but where has he said he will do it? But now in the case before us, Christ is not only able to raise, but has declared he will raise and change our vile bodies: so that faith is enabled to make a sufficient reply to all the astonishing difficulties that reason can muster up; and those Christians that can now say, Our conversation is in heaven, may add, from thence we look for a Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned, &c.

CHAP. IV.

Our apostle, coming now to the conclusion of this excellent epistle, exhorts the Philippians to the practice of several duties of great importance to the honour of God, the credit of religion, and their own benefit and comfort.

THEREFORE, my brethren, dearly beloved and longed for, my joy and crown, so stand fast in the Lord, my dearly beloved.

Note here 1. The loving, affectionate and endearing compellations, which St. Paul bestows upon his beloved Philippians; he calls them his brethren twice in one verse, his dearly beloved and longed for, his joy and crown; thereby testifying his fervent affection towards them, his passionate longing for their spiritual welfare, and that their conversion, by his preaching, was matter of great joy and comfort to him, yea, the crown and honour of his ministry, my joy and crown: that is, my chief joy, and crown of rejoicing, that which he rejoiced in more than he could in any earthly crown. Behold in this glass the heart of every faithful ambassador of Jesus Christ. It would not please them so much to have an imperial crown set upon their heads, and to be made the emperors of the world, as to see souls brought off from the world, by their ministry, to the obedience of the word. This made the Philippians St. Paul's joy and crown at present, and gave him hopes that they would be his crown of rejoicing in the day of Christ: May the same mind be in us, which was in this great apostle. 2. The great and important duty which St. Paul here exhorts the Philippians to, and that is, steadfastness in the faith and doc- trine of the gospel in general; and in particular, in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made them free, without obliging themselves to observe circumcision, or any part of the ceremonial law: Stand fast in the Lord, my dearly beloved, my joy and crown. Learn, hence 1. That steadfastness in the true religion, and perseverance in the faith of Christ, is the great and indispensable duty of every Christian that has a due regard to his salvation. 2. That such a steadfastness in the faith of Christ, and his holy religion, is a present joy, and will be an eternal crown of rejoicing to the ministers of God.

2 I beseech Euodias, and I beseech Syntyche, that they be of the same mind in the Lord. 3 And I intreat thee also, true yoke-fellow, help those women which laboured with me in the gospel, with Clement also, and with other my fellow-labourers, whose names are in the book of life.

The former verse was an exhortation to constancy; this, to concord. Here note, 1. The persons exhorted to duty, two women of eminent note in the church, Euodias and Syntyche, who laboured with him in the gospel, that is, in offices proper to their sex, not in public preaching, but in private teaching of youth, and instructing other women in the principles of religion: Between these two good women, it seems, there was some difference, a want of love and unanimity; it is but too frequent for persons truly pious and painful in the work of the Lord to be at odds amongst themselves; and such are the fatal consequences of such differences, though between two persons only, that they are looked upon as worthy to be taken notice of by a great apostle. 2. The great care and pains which St. Paul takes timely to compose this petty difference between these two persons; he writes to an eminent minister of the church at Philippi, whom he calls his true yoke-fellow, (because they had faithfully laboured together in planting a Christian church in that city) to exert his utmost endeavours in reconciling these two disagreeing parties. Such as are sensible of the dangerous mischiefs of strife and contention, of discord and division, will account it their duty to look to breaches betimes, to quench such fires at their first kindling, and will call in all the help they can, by engaging the prayers and tears of God's ministers, and the endeavours of all faithful Christians, in order thereto; and all this care, God knows, is little enough in order thereto. 3. The charitable thoughts and good opinion which St. Paul had of his fellow-labourers at Philippi, he believed their names were in the book of life; that is, he adjudged them truly gracious persons, and in a state of salvation; though none can pass a certain and infallible judgment upon others, yet such as are holy in conversation in themselves, and contribute their utmost endeavours to promote holiness in others, may, in the judgment of charity, be pronounced persons whose names are in the book of life.

5 Rejoice in the Lord alway: and again I say, Rejoice.

Note here, 1. The duty exhorted to, Christian cheerfulness and joy, a duty which glorifies God, adorns religion, is beneficial to ourselves, by enabling us to bear afflictions, to glory in them, and to triumph over them. 2. The object of this duty, a glorious and replenishing object, Christ the Lord: Rejoice in the Lord. 3. The perpetuity and constancy of the duty, Rejoice always, that is, at all times, and in all conditions. 4. The difficulty of the duty, implied in the repetition of the command: Again I say, Rejoice. From the whole, observe, 1. That the Lord Jesus Christ is the great, sure and perpetual joy of his children and people. 2. That it is their duty to be joying in him always, and always rejoicing for him, and to rejoice in their knowledge of him, in his undertaking for them, in their interest in him, in their influences of grace and comfort derived from him, in their hopes of glory, to be eternally enjoyed with him. 3. That to get the heart up to this duty, at all times, and in all conditions, is no easy work, therefore the exhortation is doubled, Rejoice always; and I say again Rejoice; pointing out how averse we are to this spiritual and very beneficial duty.

5 Let your moderation be known unto all men. The Lord is at hand.

That is, Let your mildness and gentleness towards others, your meekness and patience under your own trials, be very conspicuous, because the Lord is at hand to execute judgment on his own crucifiers, and on the persecutors of his own people. Learn, That the consideration of the certainty and suddenness of Christ's coming to judgment, ought to be improved by us as an argument to all mildness and gentleness towards others, and to all meekness and patience under our present sufferings: Let your moderation be known unto all men, &c.

6 Be careful for nothing: But in every thing by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let your requests be made unto God. 7 And the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus.

Note here, 1. The duty exhorted to, namely, to be anxiously and solicitously careful for nothing; it is not care, but carefulness, that is, inordinate care, heart-cutting, distracting, soul-rendering care and solicitude, which is here forbidden; there is a prudent provident care for the things of this life, which is an unquestionable duty. 2. The remedy prescribed for the prevention of solicitous care, and that is fervent prayer: in every thing, by prayer and supplication, let your requests be made known. The people of God may and ought to have recourse to him in every thing. 3. The apostle directs to thanksgiving in every thing, as well as to prayer, In every thing by prayer and thanksgiving, &c. when afflicted, we are to be thankful for the expected benefit of afflictions; when tempted, to be thankful that God will not leave us to be tempted above what we are able; when we fall into sin, there is cause of thankfulness that we are not left to run into all sin, that we are not cut off in the very act of sin, and did not die in our sins; thus are we in every thing to give thanks. 4. The benefit and advantage which St. Paul assures them would redound unto them, by the practice of the forementioned duties, namely, Sweet peace which passeth understanding; that is, which none can conceive that have not felt it, and none can express that have experienced it. This peace, he tells them, will keep and guard their hearts and minds; a sound peace is the soul's guard against all inward terrors and outward troubles; as the persons of princes are secured by guards of armed and valiant men, who watch while they sleep; so are Christians guarded and secured by the peace of God, better than any prince ever was by a guard of forty thousand men. The peace of God shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus; that is, through the assistance of Christ Jesus.

8 Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things.

Here we have a very comprehensive precept, describing the duties of all Christians: Whatsoever things are true: truth is the principal character of our profession, and is to be expressed in our words and actions; whatsoever things are honest, venerable or grave, that is, answer the dignity of our high calling, and agree with the gravity and comeliness of the Christian profession; whatsoever things are just, according to divine and human laws; whatsoever things are pure and chaste, intimating, that we must preserve the heart, the hand, the tongue, the eye, from all impurity; whatsoever things are lovely, and of good report, as easiness to pardon, readiness to oblige, compassion to the afflicted, liberality to the distressed, sweetness of conversation, without gall and bitterness; these are of universal esteem with mankind, and soften the most savage tempers and dispositions. Note here, 1. That there are things naturally, honest, just, and lovely in their own nature, and praise-worthy in themselves; which do raise and refine the human nature; and, without a command, their goodness is a strong obligation to observe them. 2. That Christianity doth adopt morality, or precepts of good life and manners, into its frame and constitution, and it is indeed an integral part of the Christian religion; not that any moral precepts, though never so good, can raise a soul from the death of sin to a life of holiness, without faith in Christ, and assistance from his Spirit; but the morality which the scripture teach us, is founded not barely upon principles of reason, but divine revelation, and obliges us to the practice of moral duties, in obedience to Christ's command, in conformity to his example, in the strength of his assistance, and with an eye at his glory.

9 Those things which ye have both learned and received, and heard, and seen in me, do; And the God of peace shall be with you.

Note, 1. With what great confidence and good assurance St. Paul here recommended his own practice and example to his people's imitation; all those things which he had by his doctrine and life commended to them, were to be carefully observed and imitated by them: It is a blessed thing, when a people's eyes are taught by their minister's holiness of

of life, and their ears by the soundness of his doctrine. Our people have eyes to see how we walk, as well as ears to hear what we preach; therefore it is a minister's great duty, by strictness and gravity of deportment to maintain his esteem in the consciences of his people, yet always tempering gravity with a condescending affability: That minister only can go off the stage with honour and comfort, who has left behind him the good seed of sound doctrine, and the good savour of an holy example; that can say with our apostle, The things which you have both heard and seen in me, do. 2. The promise annexed to the foregoing precept, These things do, and the God of peace shall be with you. Where note, 1. Who will be with us, the God of peace: now he that is the God of peace, is the God of power; he that is the God of peace, is the God of patience, who, though he cannot punish, yet will pardon the infirmities of his people. 2. How he will be with us; the heart of God will be with us, the help of God will be with us, and the presence of God will be with us, to guide and direct us, to lead and conduct us, to cover and protect us; and, if God be with us, we shall shortly be with him. Learn hence, That those which obey the gospel, whatsoever or whomsoever they want, shall ever abide in a peaceable and blessed condition.

10 But I rejoiced in the Lord greatly, that now at the last your care of me hath flourished again; wherein ye were also careful, but ye lacked opportunity: 11 Not that I speak in respect of want: For I have learned in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content. 12 I know both how to be abased, and I know how to abound: Every where, and in all things I am instructed, both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need. 13 I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me.

Our apostle being now come to the conclusion of his epistle, acquaints the Philippians with what great joy he had received their charity sent unto him; and that it came no sooner, he believed did not proceed from any disrespect towards him, but only for want either of ability or opportunity of sending to him; yet withal gives them to understand, that he could bear want, or a strait condition, very well; for, having Christ for his teacher, he had learned in whatsoever state he was, therein to be content; he could bear either plenty or scarcity, fulness or want; yea, could do all things through Christ that strengthened him. Observe here, 1. The vicissitude and great uncertainty of St. Paul's outward condition; at one time he abounds, at another time he is abased; at one time he is full, at another in want; teaching us, that the dearest of God's children, in regard of their outward condition, are subject to variety of changes. 2. The general lesson which they have learnt, with reference to this variety of conditions, and that is the lesson of contentment; I have learned in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content. 3. The particular lessons learnt by him, both how to abound, and how to be abased: They are both hard lessons, but, of the two, perhaps it is harder to know how to abound, than how to be abased. Quest. (1.) When may a man be said to know how to abound? Ans. When he sets a due value and a right esteem upon the things of the world, and neither prizes them too high nor too low; when a man so uses his abundance, as to avoid the temptations which do attend and accompany that abundance; when he is willing to part with his abundance, at the call and command of God; and, in a word, when he attends more to the duties of his prosperous state, than to the sensual pleasures and satisfaction of it. Quest. 2. What is it to know how to be abased? Ans. Not to be discouraged, or suffer the spirit to sink or faint in the day of adversity; to be not only humbled by affliction, but humble under it; to suffer what God inflicts, without impatience or complaint, without sourness of spirit or discontent; to believe firmly that whatever we meet with, is from the hand of a father; that whatever we part with, is but a perishing creature; that God is able to restore all our lost comfort with advantage to us, and will do it, if it be good for us, either in kind or equivalency; this is to know how to be abased. Quest. 3. How doth it appear harder to know how to abound, than how to be abased? Thus; there are more duties, and harder duties, required of those that abound, than of them that want. There are more temptations, and stronger temptations, which attend those in abundance, than them that want. Hence it is that God gives so many solemn charges and commands to those that abound, to take heed to themselves, more than to those that are in want. See Deut. vi. 12. When thou art full, then beware lest thou forget the Lord thy God, and thy heart be lifted up. In a word, I do not remember one instance in all the Scripture, of a full or prosperous condition, which was ever so much as the remote occasion of a sinner's conversion unto God; but I find in Scripture, that an afflicted condition has been blessed to many for this end, 2. Chron. xxxiii. 12. Hos. v. 15. Job xxiii. 14. Observe, 4. The school which St. Paul learnt this great lesson in, to know how to be abased, and how to abound, and to be thoroughly content in every condition; it was not at Gamaliel's feet, but Christ's feet; I can do all things through Christ strengthening me; Christ was both his tutor and strengthener, he taught him his lesson and enabled him to practise it. Note here, 1. That a real Christian is able to do all things, all things that concern a Christian, all things that belong to the glory of God, and his soul's salvation; all things, not in a legal, but evangelical sense; not all things, nor indeed any thing with a sinless perfection, but all things in respect of his love to the whole law, in respect of his purpose and resolution, in respect of his desire and endeavours. Again, I can do all things; understand it in active sense, I can deny myself, believe in a withdrawing God, conquer the world, subdue unmortified corruption, and live a life of evangelical perfection: Take it also in a passive sense, I can suffer all things, I can bear Christ's cross, wear his yoke, endure any thing for him, or from him, when called forth to suffer. 2. That as a Christian can do all things, so his ability to do all things, lies not in himself, but in Christ. A believer receives an active power from Christ to enable him to do whatever he requires him to do; ability to subdue corruption, to conquer temptation; to bear affliction, and to glorify God in every condition; all this is from Christ; and the sincere Christian may say with this eminent saint, I do all things through Christ that strengthens me.

14 Notwithstanding, ye have well done that ye did communicate with my affliction. 15 Now, ye Philippians, know also that in the beginning of the gospel, when I departed from Macedonia, no church communicated with me as concerning giving and receiving, but ye only. 16 For even in Thessalonica ye sent once and again unto my necessity.

Although our apostle had declared, in the foregoing verses, that he had fully learnt the lesson of contentment in all conditions, and could bear poverty and want without complaining; yet withal he assures them here, that they did well in sending such supplies to him in prison by Epaphroditus, as they had done; and thereby testifying, by their Christian commiseration, that they shared with him in his afflictions and sufferings for Christ. Where note, 1. The apostle's thankful acknowledgment of the Philippians present liberality towards him, now in bonds, for preaching the gospel to them; and how he takes occasion from thence to make an honourable mention of their former bounty towards him, even from his first preaching of the gospel to them; nay, when he was gone from them at Philippi, and preached to those at Thessalonica, yet did the Philippians send their bounty after him more than once, which no other church had then done besides themselves. Learn hence, 1. That there is a rule of equity to be observed, as between other relations, so between ministers and people, that as they bestow labour and pains, so they should receive encouragement and maintenance, and this not barely as a gratuity, but as a due debt. 2. That the faithful ministers of Christ, though they may challenge a supply of temporal things from their people, for their spiritual things, as a due debt, yet do they fully receive it, and gratefully acknowledge it, to the honour and commendation of their people, with fervent prayer to God, that it may be fruit redounding to their account in the great day of account.

17 Not because I desire a gift: But I desire fruit that may abound to your account. 18 But I have all, and abound: I am full, having received of Epaphroditus the things which were sent from you, an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God. 19 But my God shall supply all your need, according to his riches in glory, by Christ Jesus.

Here remark, The modesty and great ingenuity of the apostle, in assuring them, that his praising their liberality so much was not upon design to get more; not because I desire a gift; that is, any further gift for my own private advantage; I am far from the thought of spunging upon you: But I aim at your advantage in this, that your liberality may afford you the fruits of a plentiful reward in the day of Christ, who will not forget your work and labour of love in ministering to the saints. Having thus guarded against all suspicion of greediness in himself, and evidenced that his commending of their liberality was not upon design, he proceeds again to praise their liberality yet farther, and extols it in such words as may cause admiration. Note, 1. How abundantly satisfied the apostle was with what he had received, I have all, and abound, I am full; as if he had had the treasures of the Indies in his coffers: Grace is content with a little, and thanks that little an abundance; the contented man is only rich. 2. How St. Paul gives an acknowledgment, under his hand, that Epaphroditus had faithfully delivered to him the whole of their charity sent by him; I have received of Epaphroditus all the things which were sent from you: Epaphroditus was their chief minister, or bishop, a person of great reputation, whose fidelity none could suspect; yet St. Paul gives it under his hand that he had executed his trust faithfully. Though a man be never so trust-worthy in himself, and be never so much intrusted by others, yet he ought, in wisdom, to guard against any suspicion which may be taken up against his honesty and faithfulness. 3. The high expressions which St. Paul makes use of, in setting forth the Philippians charity towards him; he calls it, an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable and well-pleasing to God; the very same words here which he makes use of, Ephes. v. 2. where he calls the death of Christ a sacrifice, and a sweet-smelling savour. The expression is borrowed from the Levitical sacrifices, which were of God's appointing and approving; and it imports, that our charity expressed towards the members, but especially the ministers of Jesus Christ, now under the gospel, is as acceptable and well-pleasing unto God, as the sweetest incense and the fattest sacrifices were under the law. Here note, That the Socinians, to lessen the meritoriousness of Christ's sacrifice, do parallel this text with that other, Eph. v. 2. "Is the death of Christ," say they, called a sacrifice and sweet smelling savour? so is the Philippians charity here called a sacrifice, but both in a figurative and metaphorical sense only." But mark the difference; St. Paul, Eph. v. says, Christ gave himself a sacrifice, which being once offered, was sufficient to take away sin, Heb. x. 10. but the Philippians are not said to give themselves a sacrifice, but their alms were as grateful to God as incense: If it be said, from Rom. xii. 1. That believers are required to present themselves living sacrifices unto God, and acceptable; I answer, So they are, and so they do present themselves gratulatory, but not expiatory sacrifices unto God, 2 Pet. ii. 5. Ye are a royal priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices acceptable unto God, through Jesus Christ. Christ's oblation and sacrifice was acceptable for itself; believers, and their eucharistical sacrifices, are acceptable to God only in, by, and through our Lord Jesus Christ, Heb. xiii. By him let us offer the sacrifice of praise continually. Note lastly, The assurance which St. Paul gives the Philippians, that God would abundantly recompense their charity into their own bosoms, ver. 19. My God will supply all your need, &c. As if he had said, "Do not think you shall want, because you have liberally supplied my wants; no, my God will supply you, for your supplying me; according to his riches, in glory, that is, according to his rich mercy, and glorious grace." There is no need to be supplied in the glory of the next life, but there is a glory in rich grace, which readily and plentifully supplies all our needs in this life. Note here, 1. That such as administer now to the wants of others, may fall into want, and be driven to straits themselves. 2. That the more forward they have been to supply the wants, and administer to the necessities of others, in the time of their abundance, the more they may expect from the bountiful hand of God, in the day of their necessity and distress, 20 Now unto God and our Father be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

Note here, 1. The endearing title given to Almighty God, God our Father; the word father is a title of great honour; the word our is a word of singular comfort. The appropriating, positive terms, mine, thine, ours, have a great sweetness in them, and breathe abundance of affection. As Luther used to say, "The comfort of the gospel lay in pronouns possessive, when we can say with believing Thomas, My Lord and my God; with blessed Paul, who loved me, and gave himself for me." Learn, That God is a Father in a more peculiar and special manner to all that are interested in his Son Jesus Christ. The word father implies spiritual generation, that we are begotten by him, and like unto him; it implies vehemency of affection, no bowels comparable unto a father's; it implies designed benefit by correction that he exercises unto profit. And in the word our is implied, that God is the Father of every believer, the weakest, as well as the strongest; we are the children of God, through faith in Christ Jesus; and it points out our duty also, that as there is one God and Father of all, so all believers should be of one heart and one mind amongst themselves. Note, 2. What it is which our apostle attributes and ascribeth unto God, namely, glory, and that for ever and ever: Glory, that is, the manifestation of all his glorious excellencies and perfections. Learn hence, that it is the fervent desire of all believers to have the worth and excellencies of God everlastingly acknowledged, and in a boundless manner displayed: Unto God be glory for ever and ever. This word, for ever and ever, is, upon different accounts, the saddest and sweetest word in all the Bible; when applied to the excellencies of God, and our interest in them, no word like this for comfort, This God is our God for ever and ever. O ravishing consolation! But when applied to sinners, and what they suffer from God as the desert, the due desert of their sins, then it is a word of the saddest weight, Rev. xiv. 11. the smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever, 2 Thess. i. 9. They shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord. It is the word for ever and ever that sets all hell a roaring, and it is the same word that fills heaven with joy and rejoicing.

21 Salute every faint in Christ Jesus. The brethren which are with me greet you. 22 All the faints salute you, chiefly they that are of Cesar's household.

Our apostle closes his letter with respectful salutations; he salutes in his own name all and every faint in Christ Jesus; the soul of the poorest and meanest faint was not neglected by this great apostle: He loved the brotherhood the whole fraternity of believers, the whole society of faints: All church-members are faints by external and visible profession, and ought to be so by internal renovation and spiritual regeneration, and one as well as the other are here saluted by the apostle: Salute every faint in Christ Jesus. Next, he sends the salutations of all the brethren that were with him, and of all the faints that were at Rome, all those whom he had there converted to Christianity, and particularly some of those that were in Nero's family, and called here Cesar's household. Where note, 1. That such a mighty efficacy had the preaching of the gospel, accompanied with the influences of the holy Spirit, that it entered the houses of the greatest persecutors, and changed the hearts of some who were most unlikely to receive and entertain it. Behold, here are some in bloody Nero's family converted to Christ, by the preaching of the gospel, those of Cesar's household. 2. That sometimes God endues the professors of the gospel in general, and young converts in particular, with such a spirit of zeal and courage, magnanimity and holy resolution, that they dare lift up a banner for truth, and publicly own the despised members of Christ, without either shame or fear: Those of Cesar's household do greet and salute you.

23 The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

He shuts up all with his usual apostolical valediction: By grace, we are to understand the free favour of God, as the fountain; and all good things, as so many streams flowing from that fountain: This is called the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, because purchased by his merit, and applied by his intercession. This grace he prays may be with them in the sweet effects of it, and in the sensible apprehensions of it, to enlighten, sanctify, comfort, and quicken them more and more. Knowing then the exceeding riches of grace which we have in Christ Jesus our Lord, let us glorify him, eminently, abundantly; and as we have all things by him, let us do all things for him, and to his glory.

C O L O S S I A N S.

This epistle was written by St. Paul when he was prisoner at Rome, about the same time in which he wrote the foregoing epistle to the Philippians. It is directed to the Colossians, that is, the church of Christians newly gathered in and about the city of Colosse in Phrygia, by the preaching of Epaphras; St. Paul not having seen their face in the flesh, chap. ii. 1.

Epaphras having founded a church here, and instructed the Colossians in the great and fundamental principles of the Christian religion, he left them for a time, and went to Rome, and was fellow-prisoner with St. Paul there. In his absence from them, the Colossians were infested with false teachers of two sorts; some were the Judaizing doctors, that is, persons converted from Judaism to Christianity, who sought to impose upon them, circumcision, and the observation of the ceremonial-law, long since abolished by the death of Christ; against these false teachers, most of the foregoing epistles were written and directed. The other sort of false teachers against whom this epistle is written, were such persons as were converted from Gentilism to Christianity, who obtruded upon the Colossians their philosophical speculations, and some of their heathenish practices, particularly, their worshipping of angels; under the notion then (as the church of Rome now) That Almighty God is an infinitely glorious Being, that man, sinful man, must not dare to approach him without the interposure of the angels, as Mediators between God and them. Now, in opposition to both these sorts of false teachers, St. Paul writes this epistle, shewing the former, that Christians, since the death of Christ, lay under no obligation to observe circumcision, or any part of the ceremonial law; and convincing the latter, that Christ, and not angels, was the appointed mediator between God and man; and that we, being reconciled to God by him, have access through him unto God in all our necessities.

C H A P. I.

In this chapter our apostle gives thanks to God for the spiritual graces conferred upon the Colossians, and prays fervently for their increase in knowledge, growth in holiness, courage under sufferings, &c.

PAUL an Apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, and Timotheus our brother, 2 To the saints and faithful brethren in Christ, which are at Colosse: Grace be unto you, and peace from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.

Observe here, 1. That this epistle to the Colossians contains many of the same things, and often the very same words, with that to the Ephesians, particularly the salutation here is the same with that to the Ephesians; in which, note, 1. The person saluting, Paul, once a persecutor, now a professor, yea, a zealous preacher of the faith of Christ, dignified with the title and office of an apostle, an apostle of Jesus Christ; that is, called and sent immediately by him to plant and propagate the Christian faith throughout the Christian world, but by the will of God: Christ, as Head of the church, is intrusted with sending out ministers into his church; but the Father's will, and Christ's will, do both concur and fully agree in sending forth his ministers to instruct and edify his church; and woe to such as intrude themselves into any office in the church without their call and commission; let them expect a blow instead of a blessing. 2. The apostle joins Timothy in the salutation; though Timothy was not an apostle or a penman of any part of the Scripture, yet because he was well known to the Colossians, and much valued and esteemed by them, and was a person of eminent worth and excellency in himself, and of singular serviceableness to the apostle, he therefore calls him his brother, being his fellow-labourer in the work of the gospel. Where the great humility of St. Paul is remarkable, and worthy of imitation; who who, though an inspired apostle, extraordinarily and immediately called by Christ himself, an aged person, long engaged in the work of Christ, yet is so far from despising young Timothy, his inferior, greatly his inferior in all respects, that he gives him all fitting respect, and puts honour upon him, in calling him his brother, they being fellow-labourers in the work and service of the gospel. 3. The persons saluted, the saints and faithful brethren in Christ, which are at Colosse. He calls all the members of this Christian church by the name of saints, they all making an outward and visible profession of sanctity and holiness; and many of them, no doubt, were what they professed, not only relative, but real saints; he styles them also faithful brethren in Christ, that is, implanted into Christ, some by outward profession, others by inward sanctification; or the expression, saints in Christ Jesus, may intimate to us, that all our grace and sanctity must be exercised and acted by strength derived from Christ, and all our holiness be accepted in Christ Jesus. 4. The salutation itself, Grace be unto you, and peace from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ. By grace, understand the free love, and gracious favour of God, together with all the effects and fruits of it; these are wished from God as a Father intimating, that God bestows not his special grace as a Creator, but as a Father in Christ; next he wishes them peace from our Lord Jesus Christ, he being the purchaser of our peace, upon whom was laid the chastisement of our peace, and by whom God is at peace with us, and reconciled to us. But why is there no mention of the Holy Ghost, as well as of God the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ? Because it is by the Spirit, that God the Father and Jesus Christ dwell in us, and do communicate this grace unto us; so that praying for this grace, is praying for the communion of the Holy Ghost.

3 We give thanks to God and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, praying always for you; 4 Since we heard of your faith in Christ Jesus, and of the love which ye have to all the saints;

Our apostle to give the Colossians a full assurance of the firmness of his love unto them, acquaints them, that himself and Timothy from the time they heard of their conversion, did never cease to give solemn thanks to God for it, and particularly, for that faith in Christ, and for the love which they bare to all saints, to all their brethren and fellow-members in Christ. Where note, 1. The person whom St. Paul offers up his prayers and praises, his supplications and thanksgivings to, and that is God; intimating, that religious invocation and adoration belong only to God; not to any creature, who can neither know, nor is able to supply our wants. This God whom St. Paul prayed to, is called the Father of our Lord Jesus; so he is, with respect both to his divine and human nature; in respect to his Deity, he is of the same essence with the Father, begotten of him from all eternity; and, in respect of his humanity, he is his Father, being, as man, conceived by the power of the Holy Ghost. 2. The mercies and blessings which St. Paul offers up his thanksgivings to God for, and this on the behalf of the Colossians; in general, they are spiritual blessings: In particular, (1.) For their faith in Christ Jesus; Christ alone is the proper object of our assiance and trust, and by faith we repose the more trust and confidence of our souls upon the sufficiency of his merits. (2.) For their love to all the saints. Where observe, That faith and love are inseparable companions: There is a necessary connection between them: Faith without love, is no living grace; love without faith is no saving grace. Observe also, The proper object of a Christian's love, it is the saints as saints, that is for their sanctity and holiness: and to all the saints, let their private opinions and personal infirmities be what they will: We have heard of your love to all the saints: Love is that brotherly affection which every true Christian chiefly bears to all his fellow-members in Christ for grace's sake: now the love of grace in another, being so good an evidence of the life of grace in ourselves, hence it was that St. Paul, hearing of the Colossians love to all the children of God, ceases not to give thanks unto God for it, as the fruit an evidence of their conversation. We give thanks to God and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, &c.

5 For the hope which is laid up for you in heaven, whereof ye heard before in the word of the truth of the gospel; 6 Which is come unto you, as it is in all the world, bringeth forth fruit as it doth also in you, since the day ye heard of it, and knew the grace of God in truth:

Here note, 1. St. Paul discovers the motive which excited the Colossians to such steadiness and constancy in the faith of Christ, and in love one to another: and that was the hope laid up for them in heaven: that is, the great and good things here hoped for, and there to be enjoyed. As the sinner's misery consists not in what he feels, but what he fears; so the believer's happiness lies not in what he has in hand, but what he has in hope: the reward which encourages his perseverance in faith and love, is laid up in heaven, that is, safely and plentifully, as a parent lays up his treasures for the use of his children: It is both lawful and laudable then for Christians to have an eye to the promised reward, as an encouragement to duty, for the hope which is laid up for you in heaven. 2. The means by which they came to the knowledge of this hope, it was by the word of truth, the preaching of the gospel to them by the ministry of Epaphras; this was so exceedingly blessed by God, that thereby the saving hope of this reward was wrought in them. Where note, The title given to the gospel, it is eminently the word of truth, having Christ for its main subject, who is the way, the truth and the life, and being confirmed by Christ the Testator's blood. Note farther, That the preaching of this word of truth, the doctrine of the gospel, is the great instrumental mean, appointed by God for begetting in us a lively hope of the reward laid up for us in heaven: for the hope laid up for you in heaven, whereof you have heard before in the word of the truth of the gospel. 3. The commendation here given of the gospel, which had begot in these Colossians a lively hope of the heavenly reward: It is commended, (1.) For being one and the same gospel which was preached by the apostles throughout all the world, which is come unto you, as it is in all the world; that is, with incredible swiftness into the most eminent parts and places of the world then known; an infallible proof of the divinity of the gospel, that it was thus owned and blessed of God. The gospel, at all times, and in places, is one and the same; and Christ, when he pleases, can swiftly drive the chariot of the gospel round about the world, and bring in not only persons and families, but cities, nations, and kingdoms, to the obedience of it. (1.) The gospel preached to them is commended for its fruitfulness, it bringeth forth fruit, as it doth also in you; that is, fruits of piety and holiness towards God, and fruits of righteousness and charity towards man. Learn hence, That it is matter of praise, and unspeakable thanksgiving, to the ministers of Christ, when the light of the gospel breaks forth among a people, where it never before shined, and is accompanied with early and constant fruits of piety, humility, faith and love, in the hearts and lives of those to whom it is preached.

7 As ye also learned of Epaphras our dear fellow-servant, who is for you a faithful minister of Christ;
8 Who also declared unto us your love in the Spirit.
9 For this cause we also, since the day we heard it, do not cease to pray for you, and to desire that ye might be filled with the knowledge of his will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding;

Note here, 1. The person who first preached the gospel of Christ to the Colossians, and converted them to the Christian faith, it was Epaphras: As ye learned of Epaphras, 2. The commendation given to Epaphras, and his character by St. Paul: he was regularly called to the work, and a diligent fellow-labourer with St. Paul in the work of preaching and dispensing the mysteries of the everlasting gospel to a lost world: who is for you a faithful minister of Christ. Learn hence, That the knowledge of life and salvation is ordinarily wrought in persons by the preaching of the gospel, by men called of God to that sacred function. Note, 3. A particular instance of the faithfulness of Epaphras towards the Colossians, he declared unto St. Paul their love in the Spirit; that is, their spiritual love and fervent affection to him, though they had never seen his face nor heard his voice. The faithful ministers and members of Jesus Christ do affectionately love one another, though they see not, the face of each other; there is no such loadstone of love as the grace of God: This will draw forth the heart and affections of a believer, to the ends of the earth, to pray for, to mourn over, and to rejoice with such of their brethren as they never saw, but of whose condition they have heard. 4. The kind return which St. Paul makes to them, for their love in the Spirit toward him; for this cause we do not cease to pray for you: there is no such way to attain an interest in, and to obtain constant benefit and advantage by the prayers of the ministers of God, as to be expressive of our love and affection both to God and them. 5. The especial blessings which he prays for on the Colossians behalf, namely, that they might be filled with the knowledge of his will, that is, attain to a more perfect and comprehensive knowledge of God's will and their duty, furnished with all divine wisdom and spiritual understanding, to regulate their lives according to their knowledge. Learn from hence, That there is a fulness of divine knowledge, which is attained by none, but should be aimed at by all, seeing they that know most of God's word and revealed will, come far short of what they should know. Learn, 2. That the knowledge, wisdom, and understanding which Christians should especially labour after, and attain unto, is of things spiritual: that ye be filled with knowledge and spiritual understanding. O let divine and spiritual knowledge be our chief care and principal business! it is called here spiritual understanding, because it is from the holy Spirit, and conversant about spiritual things, which far exceed the most refined notions concerning other things; and Christ tells us, that eternal life depends upon it, John xvii. 3. spiritual knowledge fits us for the service of God on earth, for the sight of God in heaven: And Christ has told us, that he will take a second journey from heaven, to render vengeance on them which know not God, and on them which do know (notionally) but obey not practically the gospel of our Lord Jesus, 2 Thess. i. 8.

10 That ye might walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing, being fruitful in every good work, and increasing in the knowledge of God;

Here the apostle sets down the end of his prayer in the forementioned manner for the Colossians, why he desired that their knowledge should so exceedingly increase; it was in order to practice, that they might walk worthy of the Lord, unto all pleasing, and be fruitful in every good work: that is the true end of knowledge, practical obedience. All knowledge without this, makes a man like Nebuchadnezzar's image, with an head of gold, and feet of clay: Some persons study to know, only to know, this is curiosity; others endeavour to know, only to make themselves known, that is vain-glory: But to know, that we may practise what we know, this is gospel duty. Quest. But how can any person be said to walk worthy of the Lord? Ans. Not with a worthiness of merit, but with a worthiness of meanness, when we walk as it is meet and fit for persons professing godliness to walk, when we walk as becometh the gospel of Jesus Christ, in obedience to his precepts, in imitation of his pattern, answerable to the helps and supplies of grace which the gospel affords, and answerable to the high and glorious hopes which the gospel raises us to the expectation of, this is to walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing. The second branch of the apostle's prayer, on the behalf of these Colossians, was, that they might be fruitful in every good work, that is, labour after an universal fruitfulness in good works. By good works, he undoubtedly means works of piety towards God, works of righteousness towards our neighbours, works of sobriety towards ourselves, works of charity towards all. By fruitfulness in these good works, he means an unwearied diligence, and persevering constancy in the doing of them, that our fruitfulness be an universal fruitfulness, an humble and self-denying fruitfulness, a proportionable fruitfulness, an abounding and abiding fruitfulness; this is to be fruitful in every good work. The third request, which in this verse he puts up for them, is, That they may increase in the knowledge of God. As fruitfulness in good works makes much for the increase of knowledge, knowledge, so increasing in knowledge will contribute very much towards our fruitfulness in good works; the way to grow in grace is to grow in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ, 2 Pet. iii. 18.

11 Strengthened with all might according to his glorious power, unto all patience and long-suffering with joyfulness;

In the former verses, prayer was put to God by St. Paul, to enable the Colossians to do his will, his whole will, acceptably in this verse he pleads with God, to strengthen them with an almighty power to bear afflictions, the sharpest and longest afflictions, patiently and joyfully: Strengthened with all might, unto all patience with joyfulness. Learn hence, 1. That the cross of Christ, or sufferings for Christ, are unavoidable, but not unsupportable; though they will shock an ordinary patience and constancy of mind, yet, might, all might, power, glorious power, which is here prayed for us, and elsewhere promised to us, can and will enable us to stand under them! Glorious power will be victorious power. 2. That patience, much patience very much patience, yea, all patience is needful, nay, absolutely and indispensibly necessary, to enable a Christian to bear some trials, and to glorify God in an afflicted condition. All patience, I say, is necessary in order to the cheerful bearing of afflictions, that is, patience at all times, patience under all crosses, patience, if possible, without any mixture of impatience; patience that may give a man the possession of himself, and quiet the whole man, the tongue, the hand, and the heart. Such measures and degrees of patience as will keep the heart from sinking, the tongue from complaining, the hand from revenging. Lord! grant, that whenever any of thine are called forth to suffer either for thee, or from thee, they may be strengthened with all might.

12 Giving thanks unto the Father, which hath made us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light:

Our apostle having prayed for the Colossians in the foregoing verses, here breaks forth into the duty of thanksgiving on their behalf, Giving thanks unto the Father, &c. Where note, 1. A description of heaven, or the blessed state of good men in the other world: It is an inheritance of saints, and an inheritance in light. (1.) It is an inheritance, now that is a possession only proper to children, Hereditas filiis debetur, non servis. It is an unmerited and undeserved possession, and it is the best donative that a father has to give unto his children: Particularly, this inheritance of heaven, which God gives to all, and yet to every one of his children, is the freest inheritance, the surest, the most satisfying, and the most delightful, and the most durable inheritance. (2.) Heaven is the inheritance of the saints, or of holy persons only; such as are really holy, universally holy, perseveringly holy, to them and only to them, does it belong; it is purchased for them, it is promised to them, it is given to them, they have already the first fruits of it in the Spirit's inhabitation, which is given to them as an earnest of heaven; it is prepared for them, and they are prepared for that; and it shall be finally adjudged to them at the great and last day. (3.) It is an inheritance in light, that is, an inheritance with God; an inheritance in joy, an inheritance in glory, and a common inheritance for all the saints: As the light of the sun is a common blessing to all that have eyes to see it, and every person in a room has the benefit of the light of the candle, as if he enjoyed it by himself alone; so is the inheritance of heaven, it is fully and entirely enjoyed by all the saints, as if there was but one to possess and enjoy it. Note, 2. The qualification of the persons who may, upon good grounds, expect to be made partakers of this glorious inheritance when they die, namely, such, and only such, as, by the assistance of God's grace, and the concurrence of their own care and endeavours, are made meet, that is, fit, prepared and ready for this inheritance whilst they live. Our persons must be justified by the blood of Christ, our natures renewed by the grace and Spirit of Christ, and our lives daily more and more conformed to the doctrine and example of Christ, or we can never partake of this inheritance; without likeness to God, we can have no expectation of living with him. 3. The duty belonging to and expected from them whom the Father has made meet for this glorious inheritance, and that is the duty of eternal thanksgiving, Giving thanks to the Father who has made us meet. As none shall enjoy this inheritance but such as are made meet for it; so those, all those who are made meet for it, must ascribe their meetness unto God, and give him thanks for it. It is a spiritual blessing, it is a transcendent favour, it is a discriminating favour, it is an everlasting favour; eternity will be too short to spend in the admiration of it, and in gratulations for it; let such of us as are interested in it, now begin the work upon earth, of giving thanks to the Father, for making us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light.

13 Who hath delivered us from the power of darkness and has translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son:

In these words our apostle declares how God makes his children and people meet for the inheritance of heaven and eternal glory, namely, by bringing them out of that dark state of heathenism, sin and misery, in which they lay, and translating them into a state of grace, called here the kingdom of God's dear Son. Who hath delivered us from the power of darkness: Here we have the deliverer, God the Father, ver. 12. he delivered us; all that are made meet for the inheritance in light, were once under the power of spiritual darkness: The deliverance itself, and the manner of the deliverance; he hath rescued by a strong hand, as the word imports, as Lot was delivered out of Sodom. Note, 1. That the state which every soul is in by nature, is a state of darkness; sin originally springs from darkness, it naturally delights in darkness, it ultimately leads to eternal darkness. 2. That it is God, and God alone, that can deliver a soul from the power of spiritual darkness. 3. That no power, short of Almighty power of God, is able to deliver a sinner from the dominion of sin, and the power of spiritual darkness; such is the ignorance and blindness of the understanding, such is the rebellion that is found in the sinner's will, so great the irregularity and disorder of the affections, and indeed of the whole soul, that the sinner is not only unable to deliver himself, but stands in a direct opposition to the grace of God, which offers to work deliverance for him, till, of unwilling, he is made willing, in the day of Christ's power, Psal. cx. 3. And translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son; that is, brought us into a gospel state, made us members and subjects of his kingdom of grace, and heirs of his kingdom of glory. Learn, 1. That Christ was God's Son, his dear and only Son, the Son of himself, and the Son of his bosom-love: He is called his Son, being so by eternal and ineffable generation; not upon the account of his miraculous conception only, nor in regard of his sanctification and mission only, nor in regard of his resurrection chiefly nor in regard of the dignity of his person, nor in regard of the dearness of his person; but he is very God of very God, begotten of his Father, by whom all things were made; and accordingly, he is, for nature, co-essential, for dignity, co-equal, and for duration, co-eternal with the Father, and consequently truly and really God; and he that denieth the divinity of the Son, in God's account, denieth the Father also. 2. That Christ, as God's dear Son, is a spiritual King, and exercises a kingly power in and over the souls of those whom he hath delivered from the power of darkness. 3. That such as are subjects of his kingdom of grace, shall certainly be translated into his kingdom of glory.

14 In whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins.

Here our apostle further declares how we are made meet for the inheritance of heaven, and delivered from the power of darkness, namely, by our redemption in Christ from sin, Satan, death, and wrath; by a price paid by the Mediator to the justice of God his Father. In whom we have redemption, that is, the fruit and benefit of Christ's redemption, which eminently consists in remission of sin. Note here, (1.) The deplorable state into which the whole race of mankind was brought by sin, namely, a state of slavery, and spiritual captivity unto sin; redemption supposes this; slaves and captives need a redeemer, none else. (2.) That there was no delivery from this slavery but by a price paid down to the justice of God: Redemption is a delivery by ransom and price. (3.) That no other price did, or could redeem us from our miserable captivity, but the blood of Christ; we have redemption through his blood. (4.) That although Christ did pay this ransom unto God, and not to Satan whose enslaved captives we are, yet, by virtue of the ransom paid, we are delivered from Satan's slavery, and sin's dominion: when God the judge was once satisfied, Satan the gaoler had nothing to do to detain and keep us any longer in prison. (5.) That forgiveness of sin, or a full and final discharge from sin's guilt, and from all obnoxiousness to God's wrath, was one special fruit of Christ's redemption; he died to deliver us from the wrath of God, and from the rage of our lusts too, otherwise he had but sealed us a patent to sin with impunity.

15 Who is the image of the invisible God, the first-born of every creature:

The apostle having mentioned our redemption in the former verse, describes the person of our Redeemer in this and the following verses, in such lofty characters, as evidently bespeak him to be a divine person, truly and really God, and consequently the fittest person to undertake so great and glorious a work, as the redemption and salvation of a lost and perishing world. Note here, 1. The Redeemer described by his eternal relation to God, he is the image of the invisible God, that is, his natural and essential image; thus he is, in respect of his eternal generation as God; as a child whom we call the express image of the Father, is of the same nature with his father, so is Christ of the same essence and nature with God; his nature is the same, his attributes are the same, his works the same, the worship given him the same; faith and affiance in him the same: John xiv. 1. Ye believe in God, believe also in me. Again, Christ is the image of the invisible God, as God-man; by him, as a lively image, did God the Father set forth unto us his glorious attributes of wisdom, mercy, righteousness, and power. The first person in the God-head is called invisible to the patriarchs; but the Son frequently appeared as a preludium to his incarnation, in which he appeared visibly to all. 2. Christ is here described, as by his eternal relation to God, so by his eternal relation to the creatures: He is the first-born of every creature; that is, (1.) He was before every creature, and therefore he himself cannot be a creature: The apostle says expressly, ver. 17. That he is before all things, that is, Christ had a being before there was any created: he was before all creatures both in point of dignity and in point of duration. Thus, Rev. iii. 14. Christ calls himself the beginning of the creation of God, that is, the principal and efficient cause of the creation, and so could not be a creature himself, but consequently most of necessity have been God from all eternity with the Father: Or else, (2.) By the first-born of every creature, may be understood, that he was Lord and heir of all the creatures; in allusion to the first-born among the Jews of old, who were Lords over their brethren, Gen. xxvii. 27. Behold, I have made him thy Lord: the first born is natural heir, and heir did anciently signify Lord. Now Christ is said in Acts x. 36. to be Lord of all, and Rom. iv. 14. He is called heir of all things: Now, how well may Christ be said to be the Lord and heir of all things, when all things were made by him, and without him was not any thing made that was made. Learn hence, That the Socinians have no ground from this text to reckon Christ among the number of creatures, he having a being antecedent to all creatures, yea, being Lord of the whole creation; and accordingly the apostle styling him here the first-born of every creature, never designed to insinuate, that the Son of God is a creature, as most evidently appears by the next verses.

16 For by him were all things created that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones or dominions, or principalities, or powers: all things were created by him and for him. 17 And he is before all things, and by him all things consist.

Mark the connexion: The apostle affirms Christ to be the first-born of every creature, namely, because were all things created, and by him all things consist: Now, if all things were created by him, surely he himself cannot be a creature: And thus the sense of the apostle's words runs easy; Christ is the image of the invisible God, the Heir and Lord of the whole creation, for by him all things were created; he that created all creatures, cannot himself be a creature; for it is impossible that any creature should create itself. Mark further, Christ is here represented as creator of the universe; all things were created by him in heaven and in earth, all the angels in their several orders, degrees and dignities. (2.) As he is represented the Creator, so likewise the upholder of every creature: as by him were all things created, so by him do all things consist. (3.) He is set forth as the last end of all the creatures; all things were created for him, as well as by him. Learn hence, 1. That all created beings, from the vilest worm to the brightest angel, are the workmanship of Christ's hand; they are not only creatures, but his creatures; he is their omnipotent Creator, and their rightful Lord. 2. That all things were created for him, as well as by him, for the manifestation of his own glory, as God; he that was the first cause, must be the last end: And accordingly, all the creatures throughout the whole creation do give glory unto Christ, some in an active way, as angels and saints; some in a passive way, as damned men and devils; some in an objective way, as sun, moon, and stars, giving us occasion to glorify the power and wisdom of the great creator. 3. That seeing the whole creation was at first made, and is still upheld by the power of Christ, it proves him to be evidently and undeniably God: He that created all things, and upholdeth all things by the word of his power, is and must be God. Vain here is the Socinian evasion, who, by creation, understood a renovation of the mind, and a reformation of the manners of men by the gospel; for Christ is here said to create all things in heaven, that is, particularly the angels in heaven; but they having kept their first station, wanted no renovation, so that it must be understood of the first creation of the natural world, and not of the renovation of the moral world. God forgive these men's perverting and bold practising upon the scriptures. Can any sensible man persuade himself, that when St. Paul says; that all things were created by Christ in heaven and earth, thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers, that the apostle should mean no more than the moral renovation of the world below by the preaching of the gospel, in which the angels were not concerned? For though Christ was an Head of confirmation to them, yet had they no need of a renovation, or being made new, having always kept their first station.

18 And he is the head of the body, the church; who is the beginning, the first-born from the dead; that in all things he might have the pre-eminence.

Our apostle having, in the foregoing verses, described what Christ is in himself, comes next to describe him with relation to his church; shewing, 1. That he is her Head, he is the Head of the body, the church; as the head and the members make one body, so Christ and his people constitute one church; he is of the same nature (as man) with his church, he poureth forth of the same Spirit upon his church, he is both an Head of authority, and an Head of influence to his church; he sympathizes with her in all her sufferings on earth, and longs for the full fruition and final enjoyment of her in heaven. 2. He is the beginning of the Christian church, the root, the fountain and foundation of it, the active beginning, or the first principle and author of it, and of all those influences of grace and spiritual life which do animate and enliven it. 3. He is called the first-born from the dead, (1.) Because he was the first that arose to an immortal life, never to die more; all others that were raised to life, besides him, died again, but death had no more dominion over him. Again, (2.) Because he was the principal and efficient cause of their resurrection; all that were raised before him, were raised by him, by a power derived from him: And, (3.) Because he is the pattern and exemplary cause of the resurrection: his members are not only raised by him, but like unto him, Phil. iii. 21. Fashioned like unto his glorious body. Was his body raised substantially the same? So shall ours be. Was his body wonderfully improved by the resurrection? So shall ours, in point of purity and spirituality, in point of power and activity, in point of immortality and incorruptibility. Was his body raised to be eternally glorified? So shall ours. How fitly then is our Lord here called the first born from the dead? Even herein he had the pre-eminence.

19 For it pleased the Father, that in him should all fulness dwell;

Still our apostle proceeds in describing the person of our Redeemer, and the admirable qualifications found in him for the work and service of our redemption; he declares here, that there was a perfect and complete fulness of all divine graces and excellencies dwelling in the Mediator, and that by the pleasure and appointment of God the Father; there is in him a fulness of merit for our justification, a fulness of grace for our sanctification, a fulness of wisdom for our direction, a fulness of power for our preservation, a fulness of mercy, pity, and compassion, to relieve and succour us in all our distresses. And this fulness which is in Christ, is an original and independant fulness, and it is an infinite and inexhaustible fulness; it is a complete and comprehensive fulness, and it is a ministerial fulness; the fulness that is in him of grace and comfort, is on purpose to communicate unto us, to be dispersed and given forth to all his members. No sooner had our apostle said, that he is the Head of the body, the church; but he instantly subjoins, that it pleased the Father, that in him should all fulness dwell, namely, for his church's benefit and advantage. Learn hence, That for any one to be, or pretend to be the church's head, it is necessary that he be endued with all the fulness of the Godhead, and of all ministerial graces; and therefore it is the highest degree of blasphemy in the Pope, a vain sinful man, to assume this title to himself, being destitute of this divine fulness; full indeed he is, but full of pride, full of sin; full of himself; and, without repentance for this and his other blasphemies, will, at length, be full of wrath.

20 And (having made peace through the blood of of his cross) by him to reconcile all things unto himself; by him, I say, whether they be things in earth, or things in heaven.

Here one special reason is assigned why all fulness dwelt in our Lord the Redeemer, namely, to fit him for the great work and office of a Mediator or reconciler, that so he might happily make up that breach which sin had made between God and the world, having removed the enmity which was betwixt them by his death and sufferings, called here the blood of the cross, that is, the blood which he freely and voluntarily shed upon the cross. Note here,

1. That God and man were once friends, though soon by sin made enemies; reconciliation doth suppose an antecedent friendship.
2. That though man was first in the breach, yet God was first in the offer of reconciliation; It pleased the father by him to reconcile all things to himself.
3. That as there was no possibility of ever making up this breach, but by a Mediator, but only Christ; By him, to reconcile all things to himself.
4. The universality of the subject reconciled, all things, both in heaven and earth: By things in heaven, (1.) Some understand the blessed angels; but there being no breach between God and them, Christ was the author of reconciliation, though he was an head of confirmation to them. Others understand it of a reconciliation between the angels and man, thus: Whilst man continued in his obedience to God, angels and men were in a state of perfect friendship one with another; but when man rebelled against God, the angels became averse to man for that rebellion; but God being reconciled to man by the death of his Son, the angels are become friends and ministering spirits to us, and both they and we constitute one church under Christ the head thereof; thus Christ reconciled all things in heaven and earth, that is, the angels in heaven he has reconciled to man on earth. But, (2.) Others, by things in heaven, do not understand the angels, but the saints departed, the patriarchs, prophets, and all the faithful now in heaven, or here on earth, they were all reconciled, in order to their being saved; intimating, that the blood of Christ did expiate the guilt of those perions who lived before him, as well as those that died after him: He reconciled all things in heaven and earth, capable of reconciliation, appointed to it, and that stood in need of it. Note, lastly, The instrumental means by which all this was effected, namely, by the blood of the cross; to make up the breach betwixt God and the fallen creature, cost the Mediator no less than his precious blood. Lord! Who can look upon sin as any other than an infinite and immense evil, which cost the Son of God his life to expiate the guilt of it? How can a little sin be committed against a great God?

21 And you that were sometimes alienated and enemies in your mind by wicked works, yet now hath he reconciled. 22 In the body of his flesh through death, to present you holy and unblameable and unproveable in his sight:

St. Paul having treated of Christ's work of reconciliation in general, in the preceding verse, in this he applies it to the Colossians in particular: Where observe, 1. He describes to them the miserable state and deplorable condition they were in before they were converted to the Christian faith; they were strangers, nay enemies unto God: Enemies in their minds, which implies a deep rooted enmity, advancing so high as to hate God, not as a Creator, but as a law-giver; not as a Benefactor, but as a judge and revenger of sin. O deplorable degradation, to be at enmity in our minds against him who is the author of our being, and the fountain of our happiness! 2. The gracious change wrought in their condition by virtue of Christ's mediation, you hath he reconciled; not only laid down his life to purchase reconciliation for them, but by the ministry of his word, accompanied with the operation of his holy Spirit, working upon their hearts, even then when they had a strong aversion from God, to accept of terms of peace and reconciliation with him: You, who were alienated and enemies in your mind by wicked works, now hath he reconciled. 3. The way and means by which Christ effected this work of reconciliation for them and us, namely, by taking upon him a true body, subject to fleshly infirmities, though without sin; and in that body suffering death for us, that we might be presented at the last day, perfectly holy unto God. In order to our reconciliation with God, it pleased Christ, the second Person in the ever-glorious Trinity, to assume a body of flesh, that he might be of the same nature with us, and in that body of flesh to die for sin; that the same nature which had sinned, might give satisfaction for sin. And further, to make us completely happy, he has not only taken away the legal enmity on God's part, but the natural enmity on our part; for he sanctifies those whom he reconciles initially in this life, but perfectly and completely in the next, where and when they shall be presented holy, unblameable, and unproveable, to his heavenly Father.

23 If ye continue in the faith grounded and settled, and be not moved away from the hope of the gospel, which ye have heard, and which was preached to every creature which is under heaven; whereof I Paul am made a minister.

Here our apostle declares to the Colossians, how they may know whether they were indeed of the number of those who were actually reconciled to God by the blood of his Son, namely, if they persevered in the faith, and continued grounded fast in their holy religion: If ye continue in the faith grounded and settled; implying, that it is the great duty of Christians, who have sat under the preaching of the gospel, to be well settled in the doctrine of faith, which they have heard and received; and that the best way to be settled, is to be well grounded; if we are not settled in religion, we can never grow in religion; an ungrounded Christian can never be a growing Christian; and if we are not well grounded in the faith, we can never suffer for the faith; for such as are sceptics in religion, will never prove martyrs for the sake of religion. Observe next, The universality of that tender, which by the preaching of the gospel is made unto all sorts of sinners, of reciliation with God, and acceptance through Christ; which gospel was preached to every creature under heaven; that is, to lost mankind, to some of all sorts; not in Judea only, but amongst the Gentiles also; to every human creature, no person, no nation being refused or passed by; plainly intimating, that an indefinite and universal tender of reconciliation with God, and salvation by Jesus Christ, is made unto all persons, by the preaching of the gospel. Happy they, whose hearts are inclined and disposed to accept of, and comply with them, who in the day of the gospel's visitation, do know the things of their peace.

24 Who now rejoice in my sufferings for you, and fill up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh for his body's sake, which is the church:

As if our apostle had said, "I am not only contented with, but I greatly rejoice in, my sufferings for you, converted Gentiles, and help, as much as in me lies, to fill up some part of that which is by God's decree, behind unfulfilled of the sufferings of Christ in my flesh, for his body's sake, which is the church." Note here, 1. That Almighty God has decreed such a measure of sufferings to his church, whereof Christ, as the Head, underwent a considerable part and proportion, when he was here upon earth, in his poverty, in his labours, in his sufferings, both in life, and at his death. 2. That there is yet a remainder of sufferings, assigned over by Christ unto his members, which must be filled up by them, whereof St. Paul had a great share, and every believer must have some share; for, as long as Christ has a member upon earth, there will be something for that member to suffer. 3. That those sufferings which Christ's members suffer, are the sufferings of Christ; the sufferings of the members are the sufferings of the Head, being undergone for the sake of the Head. Christ, in his natural body considered, can suffer no more; but in his mystical body, in his members, he daily suffers, and will suffer, until the measure of sufferings is filled up which God hath determined. Quest. But why are Christ's sufferings in and by his members thus to be prolonged, yea, perpetuated? Ans. Not by way of satisfaction for sin, not in order to reconciliation with God, but in order to the conversion of the world for example to others, for perfecting of their own graces, and for the increasing of their glory.

25 Whereof I am made a minister according to the dispensation of God, which is given to me for you, to fulfil the word of God; 26 Even the mystery which hath been hid from ages, and from generations, but now is made manifest to his saints: 27 To whom God would make known what is the riches of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles; which is Christ in you, the hope of glory.

Our apostle, in these words, seems to assign a reason why he underwent the sufferings mentioned in the former verse so cheerfully, even to rejoice in them; namely, because he was a minister of the church, by the special dispensation of God, to preach the mysteries of the gospel to the Gentile world. Learn thence, That such as are eminent in the church, and, as ministers of the gospel, do lay out themselves more abundantly in the church's service, they must expect to meet with a measure, and a full measure of sufferings beyond others. There are no such enemies to the devil's kingdom, as the zealous and faithful ministers of Jesus Christ; therefore he will be sure to revenge the ruins of his own kingdom. Observe farther, What it was that St. Paul was appointed by God to preach to the Gentiles, namely, that great mystery of their vocation and calling; this he calls here a mystery, a rich mystery, a glorious mystery, a mystery hid from ages, but not made manifest. Learn hence, That the doctrine of salvation by Jesus Christ, as a Redeemer, was long hid from the knowledge of the Gentiles; and that at last they were brought to the knowledge of Christ, and the participation of gospel privileges, was a great mystery awfully to be admired, and a glorious mercy with all thankfulness to be acknowledged, *to whom God would make known what is the riches of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles—*which is Christ, in you, the hope of glory,—which gospel, preached amongst you, and received and entertained by you, is an earnest and ground of your hope of glory. Note here, 1. That Christ is in, and among believers; he is among them by the preaching of the gospel, he is in them by the inhabitation of his holy Spirit. 2. That all true believers, whilst here on earth, have an hope of glory. 3. That Christ's indwelling presence in the souls of believers by the holy Spirit, is an earnest of that glory, and an evident demonstration of their hope of it: Believers have in them a glorious hope, they have before them a glory hoped for; Christ is the ground of both, by him we obtain the end of our hope, even the salvation of our souls.

28 Whom we preach, warning every man, and teaching every man in all wisdom; that we may present every man perfect in Christ Jesus: 29 Whereunto I also labour, striving according to his working, which worketh in me mightily.

Observe here, 1. What was the principle subject of the apostle's preaching, it was Christ; whom we preach; Christ was the matter of his preaching, and the great end of his preaching. 2. The manner of St. Paul's preaching; it was by informing the understanding and judgment, by directing the practice, warning men of the evil of sin, and of the danger of continuing in it. 2. The end of his preaching, it was to present every man perfect in Christ Jesus; that is, to render them complete both in knowledge and obedience. 4. The indefatigable pains and diligence used by the apostle in that work of preaching, intimated in the words labouring and striving, whereunto I also labour, striving. 5. The gracious help and blessed success which he had in his preaching, humbly and thankfully acknowledged, and ascribed unto God, according to his working which worketh in me mightily. From the whole, learn, 1. What was the sum of St. Paul's preaching, and ought to be of ours also, to bring men to repentance and faith in Christ, to advance them towards a perfection in knowledge and obedience, by informing their judgments and directing their practice. 2. That the faithful ministers of Christ do judge no labour and pains too great, no strivings or sufferings too much, no contending with the errors and sins of men sufficient, in order to the bringing of them unto God by conversion and repentance. 3. That such ministers as thus indefatigably labour and strive for the good of souls, shall not labour and strive alone, they shall be accompanied with divine assistance; Christ will strive with them, and work with them; Striving according to his working. 4. That when ministers have met with success in their striving, by Christ's working with them, they must ascribe nothing of praise to themselves, to their own piety, parts, or pains, but ascribe all to him that liveth by them, and worketh in them mightily.

C H A P. II.

Our apostle in this chapter cautions and warns the Colossians against all such corrupt doctrines as any sort of false teachers might be ready to obtrude upon them.

FOR I would that ye knew what great conflict I have for you, and for them at Laodicea, and for as many as have not seen my face in the flesh;

Observe here, 1. The holy agony which our apostle was in, and the mighty conflict he had with himself, upon the account of the Colossians; I would that ye knew what great conflict I have for you; namely, by prayer, care, study, and endeavour to do you good: Here we see how passionately good men long for the good of those whom they never saw; as members of the catholic church, they wish well to the whole, and to every part. 2. What was the ground and occasion of St. Paul's inexpressible agony and concern of spirit, for and on behalf of these Colossians; namely this, there was a number of men risen up who began very early to corrupt the purity and simplicity of the gospel and the Christian religion: A sort they were, partly of Judaizing and partly Paganizing Christians, the former joined the Jewish ceremonies, the latter the Gentiles impurities, even in worship with the Christian religion. Now the urgency of this case put the solicitous and concerned spirit of this great apostle into an inexpressible agony, as his words here intimate; I would you knew what a conflict I have for you and your near neighbours of Laodicea, and for as many as have not seen my face in the flesh. The men of the world little understand and less consider, what a burden of solicitous care lies upon the ministers of Christ, for, and on behalf of the whole church of Christ in general, which is continually in danger of being corrupted by false teachers, who every where lie in wait to deceive.

2 That their hearts might be comforted, being knit together in love, and unto all riches of the full assurance of understanding, to the acknowledgment of the mystery of God, and of the Father, and of Christ:

Our apostle having discovered, in the former verse, that inward anxiety of mind which he laboured under, on the behalf of these Colossians, doth, in these words, propose an expedient how the threatening danger might be averied, namely, by mutual love to one another, and by a clear and efficacious faith of the gospel; by these he reckons they would be so closely compacted together, as that no subtlety or violence could endanger them: If, by faith, they did cleave close to God and Christ, and by love keep close to one another, he firmly believed they would give no enemies an opportunity, either to be the successful authors, or the delighted spectators of their ruin. Learn hence, That the maintaining of sincere love amongst Christians, and the improving of their faith to greater measures of certainty and efficacy, in reference to the substantial of Christianity, are the best means to unite, establish, and preserve them against the fatal danger of a ruinous apostasy.

3 In whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge.

That is, in Jesus Christ, and in his gospel, are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, laid up as in a store-house; and from thence only are they to be expected and derived. The knowledge of Christ and his gospel is an extensive and comprehensive knowledge, a rich and enriching knowledge; the chiefest gain is loss, and the richest treasure is dung, when Christ's riches are displayed; and after all that we have or can attain unto, of the knowledge of Christ, his work is unsearchable, no finite understanding can reach the depth thereof, for in him are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge.

4 And this I say, lest any man should beguile you with enticing words. 5 For though I be absent in the flesh, yet am I with you in the Spirit, joying and beholding your order, and the stedfastness of your faith in Christ.

Note here, How exceedingly desirous the apostle was, that the Colossians might continue sound in the Christian faith, and be preserved out of the hands of false teachers, who, by false arguments, and ensnaring persuasions sought to beguile them in matters of religion: We are in greater danger from the subtle seducer, than we are from the fiery persecutor; sophistical arguments, and insinuating persuasions, captivate those persons whom violence could never have brought over to their party; therefore is our apostle so earnest with the Colossians, that none should beguile them with enticing words. Note further, How our apostle gives another reason of this his solicitous care for them, namely, his fervent affection towards them, notwithstanding his great distance from them, for though not in body, yet in mind he was present with them, and having received from Epaphras an account of the good order and government of their church, and of the stedfastness of their faith in Christ, the notices thereof were matter of exceeding joy and rejoicing to him; Though absent in the flesh, yet am I with you in the Spirit, joying, &c. Learn hence, That a church's stedfastness in the faith of Christ, and unity amongst themselves in gospel-order, doth render a church a joyful object to all beholders, and particularly to the ministers and ambassadors of Christ, who greatly rejoice therein.

6 As ye have therefore received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk ye in him; 7 Rooted and built up in him, and established in the faith, as ye have been taught, abounding therein with thanksgiving.

That is, "As you have received the doctrine of Christ Jesus the Lord; by the preaching of Epaphras, and therein have embraced Christ by faith, so do you constantly adhere to that doctrine, conforming your lives thereunto; and seeing you are thus implanted into Christ, be like trees, well and deeply rooted in him, or like a house, firmly built upon him, as the only sure and abiding foundation." Learn, That such as have received the grace of God in truth, ought to labour after stability in grace and establishment in the true religion, that they may stand like a rock, immoveable in assaults, and unshaken amidst all the batteries that may be made upon their faith by heretics and seducers.

8 Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ;

Our apostle comes now in a particular and special manner to warn the Colossians, that they beware of all the enemies of Christianity, whether Pagan or Jewish, for Christianity was opposed by both: The heathen philosophers and wise men did amuse the Christians with their vain speculations: The Jewish teachers were for imposing upon them the Levitical rites, which he calls rudiments or elements fitted for the infancy of the church; but these things were not now after Christ, that is, not according to the doctrine and mind of Christ. Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, &c. Where note That it is not philosophy, as such, which St. Paul warns them against; for true and sound philosophy is the improver of our reason, the guide of our faculties, and teaches us the true knowledge of God, and ourselves, and is no hindrance, but a great help to our religion; but it was the philosophy of the Greeks at that day which is here condemned, because it was vain and empty, fallacious and deceitful: It was vain, because it conducted nothing to true piety, and making them better; it was deceitful, because it hazarded their souls, and robbed them of happiness. Note farther, That the Mosiac rites and legal ceremonies, as they were prescribed by God, and adapted to the infant state of the Jewish church, had a goodness, yea, an excellency in them; but the observation of them, since the coming of Christ, is sinful, as being an implicit denial, that he is come in the flesh; accordingly, he warns them to beware of the philosophy of the Greeks, and the ceremonial rites of the Jews; neither of which, he tells them, were after Christ, that is, not according to the institution or injunction of Christ, but did draw away the heart from him, therefore, they were both unwarrantable and unsafe.

9 For in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily: 10 And ye are complete in him, which is the head of all principality and power:

Here St. Paul gives a reason of the foregoing caution against philosophy; for in him, that is, Christ, dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily: As if he had said, "Let no man impose upon you by a lame and imperfect philosophy, there is no need of that, for now there is introduced an absolute and complete doctrine, namely, that of our Lord Jesus Christ, which has the fulness of all divine wisdom in it, and the fulness of the Godhead dwelling bodily in himself, that is, personally and substantially." Where note, That the apostle says not, that the Godhead is assitant to Christ, but, that it resideth or dwelleth in him; as the Deity dwelt in the ark symbolically, so it dwelt in Christ bodily. Note farther, That Christ is not here said to be filled with the fulness of God, as the church is said to be, Eph. i. 23. in regard of the gifts and graces which she had received from him; but the whole fulness of the Godhead is here said to reside in him, which can argue him to be no less than really and truly God, his complete essence dwelleth in him: Well might the apostle therefore add, ver. 10. Ye are complete in him, wanting no requisite to salvation; ye need not go to the philosophers for knowledge, for in Christ you have complete wisdom; he is above all Pagan philosophers and Jewish Rabbies; nay, he is the Head of all principalities and powers, that is, above the highest angel in heaven. Here observe, That it was the opinion of the Paganists, as it is now of the Popish part of mankind, That almighty God was too high to be immediately approached, and therefore they applied themselves to angels as mediators betwixt God and them; but the apostle acquaints them, that the angel-mediatorship is vain, since Christ is also their Head and Lord.

11 In whom also ye are circumcised with the circumcision made without hands, in putting off the body of the sins of the flesh by the circumcision of Christ:

The apostle had asserted before, that we are complete in Christ: He proves it now, thus; we want not circumcision: Why? Because we have in Christ the thing signified by circumcision, namely, the spiritual circumcision of the heart, which consists in putting off, by the power of Christ's Spirit, the body of natural corruption; which done, there was no need of the outward circumcision made with hands, or the cutting off the flesh of the foreskin. Observe, Original corruption is a body, or, as a body to us, it cleaves as close to the soul, as the flesh to the bones. This body, with all its members, we must be cutting daily by spiritual circumcision, or real mortification; and, where that is done, God is well pleased: He regards not that circumcision which is outward in the flesh, which is made with hands, but that which is inward, the circumcision of the heart and of the spirit, whose praise is not of man, but of God.

12 Buried with him in baptism, wherein also ye are risen with him through the faith of the operation of God, who hath raised him from the dead.

Our apostle here compares Christian baptism with the Jewish circumcision, and shew, that the signification and spiritual intention of both was one and the same, obliging all persons who took the outward sign upon them to put off the old man and put on the new; to die unto sin, and live unto God. Accordingly, the ancients made use of divers ceremonies in baptizing adult and grown persons, thereby to represent the death, burial, and resurrection of Jesus Christ; immersion, or putting the person three times under water, either as our Saviour was under the earth three days, or in allusion to the three persons in the Trinity, in whose name we are baptized; and likewise emersion, their coming up out of the water, resembling our Lord's arising out of his grave. Note here, 1. That baptism under the New Testament, succeeds circumcision under the Old, and is a rite of initiation to Christians, as circumcision was to the Jews: For the apostle here proves, that by virtue of our spiritual circumcision in baptism, we have no need of the outward circumcision in the flesh. 2. That baptism is undoubtedly Christ's ordinance for infants of believing Christians, as circumcision was of old for the infants of believing Jews: For if under the gospel, infants be not received, by some federal right, into covenant with God, they are in a worse condition than children under the law; and the apostle could not truly have said, we are complete in Christ, that is, as complete without circumcision, as ever the Jewish church was with it, if we had not an ordinance, to wit, baptism, as good as their abrogated ordinance of circumcision. And the Jews would certainly have objected it to the reproach of Christianity, had not the Christians had a rite of initiation for their children, as they had of circumcision, which sealed the covenant to themselves, and their little ones, and was the door, by which all persons entered into the Jewish church. 3. The spiritual fruits and effects of baptism, namely, mortification of sin, and vivification in grace, by virtue of the death and resurrection of Christ, apprehended by such a faith as is of the operation of God, that is, produced by the energy of the gospel, and the efficacy of the holy Spirit. Learn hence, That neither sacraments, nor the death or resurrection of Christ in themselves, will avail to the mortification of sin, and the quickening of grace, if Christ himself be not applied to by such a faith, as is of the special operation of God, the faith of his working, and of his approving: This alone will effectually enable us to die unto sin and live unto God.

13 And you, being dead in your sins and the uncircumcision of your flesh, hath he quickened together with him, having forgiven you all trespasses, 14 Blotting out the hand-writing of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to his cross: 15 And having spoiled principalities and powers, he made a shew of them openly, triumphing over them in it.

Still our apostle proceeds in proving, that we are complete in Christ; and that the Colossians had no need of circumcision in the flesh, having all in Christ that was necessary for justification as well as sanctification. To satisfy them herein, note, 1. He acquaints them with their deplorable condition by nature, you being dead in your sins, without any hope of spiritual life, and by reason of uncircumcision of your flesh, aliens from the church of God (and strangers to all the promises made unto it) hath he quickened and pardoned, having freely forgiven you all your trespasses. O blessed privilege of justification, to have sin forgiven, trespasses forgiven, all trespasses universally forgiven, all trespasses freely forgiven! 2. What it cost Christ to purchase pardon for us, to discharge us from our obligation to wrath, and our obnoxiousness to the curse and condemnation of the law; no less than his precious life laid down upon the cross, blotting out the hand-writing of ordinances against us, and contrary to us, &c. An allusion to a practice amongst men, who cancel bills and bonds, and all obligations, wherein they stood bound, when once the debt is satisfied. Now, says the apostle, your debt of sin is paid to the justice of God by the death of Christ; and seeing the obligation is cancelled, it would be madness and impiety to renew it again, as those do, who plead for circumcision, and practise the legal ceremonies. Note 3. There was an obligation upon every man to undergo the curse of the law; for violating the commands of the law, there was an hand-writing against us. The obligation must be cancelled, before the condemning power of the law can be abolished, and sin pardoned: None but Christ could cancel this obligation; and not he neither, without paying the full sum payable from us: Christ when hanging on the cross, did nailed this hand-writing to the cross, which shall never be produced in judgment against the penitent believer; but this obligation remains upon the file uncanceled, with respect to all sinners who live and die in their sins, and they shall always lie in prison, ever satisfying, but never able fully to satisfy this obligation. Note, 4. That Christ hath not only by his death cancelled this hand writing, and nailed it to his cross, but has vanquished and triumphed over all our spiritual enemies: Satan, and all the powers of hell, are led like so many pinioned captives before the triumphant chariot of his cross, making them a spectacle of scorn and shame in the eyes of God, angels and men: having spoiled principalities and powers, he made a shew of them openly, &c. Observe here, 1. Christ's bloody cross was a chariot of triumph unto him. Lord! whilst thou wert bleeding and racking upon the gibbet for us, thou wert then rejoicing and triumphing for the benefits redounding to us. 2. That Satan, that great conqueror was conquered by Christ, and led in triumph before the chariot of the cross. O Satan, thou wert never thus baffled, befooled and disappointed before! When thou and thy agents were spoiling Christ, even then was he spoiling principalities and powers, and triumphing over them, when they were insulting over him: The serpent now bruised our Lord's heel, but had his own head and power forever broken: triumphing over them in it, that is, in and by his cross.

16 Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holy day, or of the new moon, or of the sabbath-days: 17 Which are a shadow of things to come; but the body is of Christ.

Here we have an inference or conclusion drawn by our apostle from the foregoing argument, that seeing the ceremonial law was now abolished, therefore none should take upon them to judge or condemn another for not observing any of the legal ceremonies, either those that related to meats, that is, the difference observed in meats, or the other relating to the difference to be observed in days. Here note, That the days observed amongst the Jews; were of three three sorts: Anniversary, which returned every year, called here an holy day: Lunary, which returned every month, the first day of every new moon: Weekly, which returned every week, and on the seventh day of the week: All which are abrogated, even the Jewish seventh day sabbath; and the Lord's day, or the Christian's first-day sabbath, substituted in its place, 1 Cor. xvi. 2. Observe here, 1. That there is both a sinful and a lawful abstinence from meats; that abstinence is sinful, when men abstain from some meats, upon pretence of holiness and conscience, as if some meats were unclean, or less holy in their own nature than others, 1. Tim. iv. 4. or as if simple abstinence at any time were a thing acceptable to God in itself, without respect had to the end for which it is sometimes required. But there is a threefold abstinence from meats, which is lawful; Political, enjoined by the magistrate for civil ends; Medicinal, prescribed by the physician for health's preservation; Ecclesiastical, when God by his providence, and the voice of his church, calls his people to fasting. 2. The reason alledged by the apostle, why Christians should not judge one another, with respect to meats and drinks, times and seasons, namely, because those legal ceremonies were but dark shadows of things to come; but the body and substance represented by those shadows, is Christ come in the flesh: And consequently, to observe the ceremonies, and regard these shadows under the gospel, is in effect to say, That Christ the body is not yet come. Here note, 1. The title given to the ceremonial worship, it is styled a shadow, because it was a dark and imperfect representation of the truth: What is a shadow, but the coming of a thick body between us and the sun? The legal ceremonies were interposed between Christ the true light and us, and so casts a shadow of him. 2. The title given to Christ with respect to the shadows of the ceremonial law, he is the body and substance of them: now as the shadow vanishes when the substance is come, so these ceremonial ordinances were to cease upon the coming of Christ, and to observe them now, under the gospel, is in effect to say, that Christ is not yet come in the flesh. 3. That the Jewish sabbath was a ceremonial ordinance, and part of that hand-writing of ordinances which was to be blotted out by Christ; and consequently the Christian is not obliged to observe it. As the distinction of meats and drinks, and the observation of the new moons, were confessedly ceremonial; so was also the Jewish sabbath, which with the rest was equally cancelled by Christ, as a part of the hand-writing of ordinances; so that to observe the Jewish sabbath, or to condemn the Christian for not observing it, is as much a denial that Christ is come in the flesh, as to observe circumcision, or any part of the ceremonial law.

18 Let no man beguile you of your reward, in a voluntary humility, and worshipping of angels, intruding into those things which he hath not seen, vainly puffed up by his fleshly mind: 19 And not holding the head, from which all the body by joints and bands having nourishment ministered, and knit together, increaseth with the increase of God.

errors of the Judaizing teachers, comes next to warn them against the practice of the Paganizing Christians, who were directed by their guides to worship the angels, covering their error with a plausible shew of humility, pretending it was presumptuous to go to God immediately, without the mediation of those excellent creatures; but thus the apostle tells them was a bold intruding into things they knew nothing of, God having neither revealed nor taught any such thing; and argued, that they were, vainly puffed up with the foolish imaginations of their own fleshly minds. Next he shews, that these angel worshippers do not acknowledge Christ for the Head of the church, while they apply themselves to angels as mediators; whereas he alone discharges the office of the Head, completely giving life and growth to his whole church, and to every member thereof; which members being furnished with spiritual life from him, and knit to him and one another by the joints and bands of charity and other graces, they grow and increase with such an increase of holiness as is from God, and tends to his glory. Note here, 1. That the nature of man is prone, extremely prone, to idolatry and false worship. 2. That it is as really idolatry to worship an angel, as it is to worship a worm; for divine worship is only due to a divine person. 3. That it is a renouncing of Christ, to make use of angels, or any other Mediator, besides Christ, unto the Father, not holding the Head. It was a notion, that early, and indeed universally possessed the minds of mankind, that God was not to be immediately approached to by sinful men; but that their prayers were to be presented by certain mediators and intercessors, who were to procure for them the favour of God, and the acceptance of their prayers. Hence they worshipped angels, and the souls departed of their heroes, whom they canonized, and translated into the number of their inferior gods, by whom they addressed their supplications to their superior gods. With this notion Almighty God was pleased to comply so far, as under the Jewish institution to appoint Moses a mediator betwixt him and them; and now under the Christian dispensation to appoint Jesus Christ to be the only Mediator betwixt God and man. 4. That it is usual for idolaters, and false worshippers, to cover themselves with a more than ordinary shew of humility: let none beguile you in a voluntary humility. True it is, that all duties of worship ought to be voluntary, as voluntary is opposed to constrained; but they must not be voluntary, as voluntary is opposed to instituted or appointed; God doth no more approve of that worship we give him according to our will, than he doth approve of our neglect of that which is according to his own will. But man, vain man, likes another way of worshipping God which is of his own framing, much better than that which is of God's own appointing.

20 Wherefore if ye be dead with Christ from the rudiments of the world, why, as though living in the world, are ye subject to ordinances; 21 Touch not; taste not; handle not; 22 Which are all to perish with the using; after the commandments and doctrines of men? 23 Which things have indeed a shew of wisdom in well-worship and humility, and neglecting, neglecting of the body, not in any honour to the satisfying of the flesh.

Our apostle being now in the close of this chapter, returns to expostulate, and argues the case with those who were willing to subject themselves to the observation of the old Jewish rites and ceremonies. He argues thus: "If ye say ye, you profess yourselves in your baptism to be spiritually dead with Christ, and to be freed by his death from the Levitical ordinances, why are ye subject to those ordinances? Such are, touch not, taste not, handle not: touch not any unclean thing, taste not any forbidden meat, handle not any consecrated vessel; all which observances were to perish necessarily with the very using: And whereas they were set off with a specious shew of wisdom, as if they were voluntary services and free-will offerings to God, he acknowledges, that they had indeed a shew of wisdom, a shew of humility, and a shew of mortification and austerities to the body, and not seeming to give any honour to the satisfying of the flesh; but all this had nothing of spiritual devotion and piety in it." Learn hence 1. That such as do by baptism profess themselves to be dead with Christ to the ceremonial law, may certainly conclude, that the Jewish ceremonies have no more any power over them, or that they ought to yield themselves to the observation of them: If ye be dead to Christ, why are ye subjects to ordinances? 2. That though God approveth and accepteth willing worship, yet not will-worship, what fair shew soever it may seem to have, either of wisdom, humility, or mortification; whatever is the product of our fancies, is a very fornication in religion, and an abomination in the sight of God, how pleasing soever it may be in the sight of men: and yet men are most forward to that service of God which is of man's finding out and setting up; man likes it better to worship a god of his own making, than to worship the God that made him; and likes any way of worshipping God which is of his own framing, more than that which is of God's appointing. Ah! Wretched heart of man, which whilst it seems very zealous to worship and honour God, hath not zeal to do it in any other way than in that which reflects the highest dishonour upon him.

C H A P. III.

Our apostle comes now to the practical part of this epistle, exhorting the Colossians to a conversation in all things answerable to the doctrine of Christ.

IF ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God. 2 Set your affection on things above, not on things on the earth.

Note here, 1. The nature of the duty to which we are exhorted; this is exprest both affirmatively and negatively: affirmatively, Seek the things above, and set your affections on them; negatively, Nor on the things here on earth; it being impossible to seek and set our affections upon both in an intense degree. Quest. But what is it to seek those things that are above, and to set our affections upon them? Ans. In these two words, four things are comprehended: (1.) An act of our understanding, that we know the worth of these things. (2.) An act of the will, to chuse these things, and with the ardour and vehemency of our affections to love them. (3.) An act of industry and endeavour in the pursuit of these things, if by any means we may attain them. Our affections are so many springs of motion to set our endeavours on work for the obtaining of what we love and desire. (4.) It implies a clear preference of the things above to things below, when they come in competition; set your affections more on things above than on the things below, and shew it by your readiness to part with these things. Note. 2. What is the object of this act, or what it is that we are to seek and set our affections upon, namely, the things which are above; God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, together with the blessed state and condition of heaven, and the happiness above; as all those dispositions and qualifications which are requisite for the obtaining of this happiness, and bringing us to the fruition of it; all these are comprehended in the latitude of the object, the things which are above. 3. The arguments which our apostle uses to excite us to this duty: (1.) If ye be risen with Christ, that is, if ye believe that Christ is risen, and if ye will bear a conformity and resemblance to him in his resurrection, and be made partakers of the power and virtue of it; for Christ's resurrection is not only a pattern, but a principle; it has a power and efficacy in it to raise us up to a spiritual life: If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above. (2.) A second argument is drawn from Christ's exaltation in heaven; he sitteth at the right hand of God; which words declare the exaltation of his human nature, and his being advanced to be the supreme King and Governour of his church. Now the force of this argument lies in the relation that is between the Head and the members, between Christ and Christians; as the head has an influence upon the members, so the members have an affection for the Head, which makes them aspire heavenwards, where there Head is; because their glorified Saviour, sitting at the right hand of God, by the power of his Spirit, draws out their affections towards him: If ye be risen with Christ, seek the things above. As if St. Paul had said, "Is Christ our Head risen, and ascended into heaven? Let us in our hearts and affections follow him thither, and patiently wait till he receive our souls, and raise our bodies, and take us wholly to himself, that we may be for ever with the Lord."

5 For ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God.

Here we have a fresh argument to enforce the foregoing exhortation, Seek the things above, for ye are dead, that is, dead to sin, dead to the world, therefore be not over-eager in pursuit of the things below. How affrighting a sight would it be, to see a dead man rise out of his grave, and converse with the world, and follow the things here below! As affecting is it to see Christians, who by baptismal profession do own themselves to be dead to the world, yet buried in the world; and, indeed of setting their affections on things above, pursuing, with the full bent of their desires, the things below. Ye are, dead,—it follows,— follows,—your life is hid with Christ in God:—Your life, that is, your spiritual life of grace, and your eternal life of glory, they are both hid with Christ, now with God in heaven. Hid in Christ, (1.) As the effect is in the cause, as the life of the branches is hid in the root, so is the life of a Christian hid in Christ; he is our root. Again, hid in Christ, that is, (2.) Deposited and laid up with Christ, committed to his care and custody, securely put into his hands. (3.) Hid with Christ, that is, dispensed by him, and derived from him at his pleasure; of his fulness we receive, when and in what measure he pleases. Note here, 1. Our life of grace only deserves the name of life; our natural life, short and uncertain in itself, and common to us with the brutes, deserves not comparatively, the name of life. 2. That Christ is the believer's life, he is both the author and efficient cause of it, the meritorious cause of it, and the exemplary cause and pattern of it. 3. That the Christian's life is hid with Christ. The phrase imports, (1.) Security and safety; what is hidden in Christ, and with him, must be safe, and out of the reach of danger; grace is incorruptible seed, that shall never die: The world, Satan and sin, may assault, but shall not overcome; neither lust within, nor the devil, nor the world, shall be able to vanquish that life which is hid in Christ. (2.) It imports obscurity; what is hidden, is concealed: The life of grace is totally hidden from the wicked, and hid, in some sort, from the believer himself, under spiritual desertion, under the winnowings of temptation, under the prevalency of corruption; much more is the life of glory hidden, it doth not yet appear; we can no more conceive of it by all we have heard, than we can conceive what the sun is by seeing of a glow-worm. (3.) Our life being hid with Christ, it imports plenty and abundance: I am come, that ye may have life more abundantly, John x. 10.

4 When Christ who is our life shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory.

That is, "When Christ, who is the author, and purchaser, and preserver of our life, shall appear to judge the world at the great day, then shall all believers, who have received spiritual life from him, be sharers in glory with him." Here note, 1. That Jesus Christ, by whom believers live a life of grace, and from whom they expect a life of glory, shall certainly appear, yea, and have a very glorious appearing; he shall be glorious in his person, glorious in his attendants, glorious in his authority, &c. 2. That when Christ appears in glory to judge the world, then it is that all believers shall enjoy a full glorification with him. 3. That the faith of approaching glory, at Christ's second appearance, is a strong argument to take off our affections from things below, and place them on things above. St. Paul's argument is, to press the Colossians to set their affections on things above, because Christ is above, and, when he appears, they shall appear with him in glory.

5 Mortify therefore your members which are upon the earth; fornication, uncleanness, inordinate affection, evil concupiscence, and covetousness, which is idolatry:

Note here, 1. That although the apostle told them in the third verse, that they were dead to sin, yet here, in the fifth verse, he bids them mortify sin; intimating, that the work of mortification, at the best, is but imperfect, and must be carried on daily and progressively; they were mortified but in part; the old man has a strong heart, and is a long time a-dying, after it has received its deadly wound: Sin lives a dying life, and dies a lingering death; Mortify therefore, &c. 2. What it is they are called upon to mortify, their members upon earth; where, by members, we are to understand all the lusts and corruptions of our hearts and natures, all the relics and remains of sin unsubdued and unpurged out of the soul; he instances in fornication, uncleanness, inordinate affections and desires, and covetousness, which loveth the world above God, and is therefore no better than idolatry. But why are these called members, and members upon earth? Ans. They are called members, in allusion to what St. Paul had called sin before, chap. ii. ver. 11. namely, a body of sin; therefore he calls particular lust members of that body; and also because they require and call for the members of the body, as instruments to bring them into act; likewise, because these lust are naturally as dear to men as their bodily members, they can as soon part, with a right hand or a right eye, as with a bosom and beloved lust; they are also called members upon the earth, because they are conversant about earthly things, because they will cleave to us as long as we live upon earth; and to intimate, that none of these must be carried to heaven with us, but be mortified on the earth. But what is it to mortify these members? Ans. To mortify sin, is to deny our consent to the solicitations of sin, to suppress the first motions of sin, to enervate the power and activity of sin. Learn hence, 1. That, in the holiest and best of God's children and servants, there are relics and remains of sin, to be daily mortified, and gradually subdued. 2. That after God has brought a person into a state of grace, it is his duty, and ought to be his endeavour, daily to mortify sin, and all the remains of unsubdued corruption. A caution, Take heed of concluding sin is mortified, because it is restrained, because the acts of sin are intermitted, because some particular sins are subdued: Is all sin hated of thee, loathed and left by thee? It is more to loathe a sin, than it is to leave a sin; sin may be left, and yet be loved; but no man can loathe a sin, and love it at the same time. 3. That covetousness is a sin, which, above others, a Christian should set himself against, and endeavour to mortify and subdue, it having a sort of idolatry in it, drawing our love, our trust, our fear, our joy, from God, and placing the supremacy of our affections in and upon the creatures. True, the covetous man does not believe his money to be God; but by his inordinate loving of it, and fiducial trusting in it, he is as truly guilty of idolatry, as if he bowed his knee unto it; for God more regards the internal acts of the mind, than he doth the external acts of the body. In like manner, the Papists do not believe their saints and angels to be gods; but by praying to them, and trusting in them for relief and help, they give them the inward worship of the soul, and consequently they are as guilty of idolatry, as if they did believe them to be God.

6 For which things sake the wrath of God cometh on the children of disobedience, 7 In the which ye also walked some time, when ye lived in them.

Here our apostle backs his exhortation to mortify sin, with strong arguments and motives; the first is taken from the wrath of God, which in its dismal effects, falls upon those who continue in, and under the power of those sins: For which things sake, that is, for the committing of which things, and for continuing impenitent after the commission of them, the wrath of God cometh upon them. Here note, 1. God's wrath is the due desert of man's sin; yet it is not so much sin, as obduration and impetineny in sin, that draws down wrath. 2. That believers themselves do stand in need of arguments drawn from the wrath of God, to make them afraid of sin, and to excite them to mortify and subdue it; for here the apostle propounded the terrors of divine wrath to these believing Colossians. The second argument is taken from their former continuance, yea, long continuance in these sins; in which ye also walked some time, when ye lived in them; that is, in the fore-mentioned sins ye yourselves also walked before your conversion, when ye lived in them, and took delight in the practice of them. Learn hence, That no argument will prevail more with a Christian to follow on the work of mortification closely for time to come, than the remembrance of his long continuance in sin in time past; in which sins ye walked some time, &c.

8 But now ye also put off all these; anger, wrath, malice, blasphemy, filthy communication out of your mouth. 9 Lie not one to another, seeing that ye have put off the old man with his deeds; 10 And have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge, after the image of him that created him.

In the foregoing verses, St. Paul exhorted the Colossians to mortify external and outward sins, as fornication and uncleanness; here he presses them to mortify internal and spiritual sins, such as anger, wrath, and malice, sins of the heart. The axe of mortification must be laid to the root of inward corruption, spiritual sins, heart sins: Though they are minoris infamiae of less infamy and reproach before men, yet they are majoris reatus, of greater guilt in the sight of God; therefore a sincere Christian has a special respect to these in the work of mortification; put off all these, anger, wrath, malice: Anger, or the sudden motions and rising of passion: Wrath is anger advanced to an height; and malice is anger accompanied with desire of revenge, a rooted displeasure: As jealousy is the rage of a man, so malice is the rage of the devil; it is the very soul and spirit of the apostate nature. No sin renders a man so like to Satan as wrath and malice. A malicious desire of revenge is so far beneath a Christian, that it is the baseness of man, yea, the spawn of a devil. This sin indulged, destroys the souls, as sure as murder, yea, it is no less than murder in the account of God, 1 John iii. 15. He that hateth his brother is a murderer. Observe next, The apostle exhorts the Colossians to guard against the sins of the heart. Put off blasphemy, filthy communication, and lying; that is, evil speaking, filthy speaking, and false speaking. Sins of the tongue are to be guarded and watched against, as well as sins of the heart; they are most scandalous, they dishonour God, and discredit religion, and wrong our own souls. The sins of the tongue are little considered, their great guilt not apprehended, but men must account for their open reproaches, secret backbitings, scoffings, derisions, whereby they endeavour to fix an ignominy upon their neighbour: And particularly, the sin of lying is here cautioned against, Lie not one to another. All lying is here condemned; the officious lie, tending to our own or our neighbour's profit; the pernicious lie, tending to our neighbour's prejudice; the jocular and jocose lie, tending to recreation and sport. The scripture condemneth all, without restriction, Rev. xxi. 8. All liars shall have their part in the lake which burns with fire and brimstone, Rev. xxii. 15. Whoever loveth and maketh a lie. Lying makes a man like the devil, who was a liar as well as a murderer from the beginning. Observe, lastly, The argument to enforce the exhortation to mortify all sin, the sins of the heart, the sins of the tongue, the sins of the life, and that is drawn from the consideration of their present state; they had in their baptism made a profession to put off the old man with his deeds, that is, their own sinful nature, and put on the new man in baptism, which being renewed by illumination and divine knowledge, and so conformed to the image of God, rendered them now the objects of his special love. Note here, That there were many ceremonies in baptism used in the primitive church, to which St. Paul alludes in several places in his epistles; as drenching in water, so as to seem buried in and under it, Col. ii. 12. Buried with him in baptism: Likewise putting off their old clothes at going in, and putting on new at their coming out of the water, to which St. Paul alludes here, when he tells them they had, namely, in their baptism, put off the old man, and put on the new. Whence learn, That there is no argument more moving and effectually exciting unto holiness of life, than that which is taken from our baptismal vow and profession; the obligation of this is very strong, if duly considered. The apostle makes use of it here as a potent argument, to quicken them to the mortification of all sin, seeing they had in baptism put off the old man, that is, professed and solemnly engaged so to do, and had put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness, &c.

11 Where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, barbarian, Scythian, bond, nor free: But Christ is all, and in all.

Where, that is, in which state of renovation, or under the present gospel-dispensation, there is found with God no respect to any man's person or nation, as before there was under the legal dispensation; now Jew and Gentile, male and female, bond and free, circumcised and uncircumcised, every one that fearth God, and worketh righteousness, is accepted of God, through Christ, who is all, in all things, to all believers: But how is Christ all in all unto his people? Thus, his teaching is all in all in the work of illumination, his Spirit is all in all in the work of conversion, version, his death is all in all in the work of satisfaction, his righteousness is all in all in the matter of our justification, his grace is all in all in our sanctification, his intercession is all in all in our acceptance, his peace is all in all in our consolation, his power is all in all in our resurrection, his presence is all in all in our glorification. O blessed Jesus! art thou thus all to me? I will labour to be all to thee; I will give thee all that I am, my soul with all its faculties, my understanding, my heart, and my affections, particularly my love and my hatred, my joy and my sorrow, my hope and my fear, my body with all its members: For thou hast created, redeemed, and wilt glorify the body as well as the soul; and therefore I will glorify thee with my body and with my spirit, which is thine; I will also give thee all that I have, by consecrating it all to the service of Christ, and resigning up all to the will of Christ, and will intitle thee to all that I do, by making thy word my rule, and thy glory my end, in all my actions and understandings.

12 Put on therefore (as the elect of God, holy and beloved) bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, long-suffering; 13 Forbearing one another, and forgiving one another, if any man have a quarrel against any, even as Christ forgave you, so also do ye.

Our apostle having now finished his exhortation to the practice of that great duty of mortification of sin, called here, a putting off the old man, comes next to mention several graces and virtues, which he exhorts them to be found in the practice of; and this he styles, a putting on the new man; teaching us hereby, that a negative holiness is not sufficient to salvation; it is not enough that we cease to do evil, but we must learn to do well; a man may go to hell for not doing good, as well as for doing wickedly. Farther, The particular graces and virtues which they are exhorted to put on. (1.) Bowels of mercy and kindness, that is, a tender pity towards, and an inward sympathy with, those that are in misery; and this expressed in outward acts of succour and relief, according to our ability. There is a natural pity which a man can hardly put off, it is seated in the very nature of man; and accordingly, unmercifulness is a sin against the light of nature, as well as against the law of God: But there is, besides this, a spiritual pity, which flows from pure love, and that a divine love; now, this is more an act of grace than of nature; this the apostle here exhorts the Colossians to, Put on bowels of mercy, they who have put on, and are clothed with, garments of holiness, will also put on bowels of mercy as a garment. (2.) Humbleness of mind, whereby a man, sensible of God's goodness, and his own infirmities, hath an humble apprehension, and a modest estimation of himself: The more holiness any person has, the more humility he has; humility is a certain evidence of our holiness because it is a great part of our holiness. (3.) Meekness and long-suffering, which moderate anger, and enable us to put up affronts and injuries. This is a spirit and temper divine, and truly Christ-like; none swabused and affronted as he; but being reviled, he blessed, and committed himself to him that judgeth righteously. When another hurts thee by unjust provocation, why shouldst thou hurt thyself by sinful passion? Christ was a Lamb for meekness; it doth not become any of his followers to be like lions for fierceness. (4.) Forbearance, and mutual forgiveness: Forbearing one another, and forgiving one another. No Christians are so perfect, but they are liable to offend one another; he must have no friends that will have a friend with no faults, and consequently they stand in need of forgiveness from each other. Learn hence, 1. That Christians are obliged, by the laws of their holy religion, to forbear and forgive one another. 2. They are obliged to imitate Christ in this duty of forgiveness; Christ forgives us universally, freely, sincerely, so as never more to upbraid us with the fault he has forgiven us; such a forgiveness are we to exercise toward our brother. As Christ forgave you, so also do ye. Lastly, The argument which St. Paul makes use of to press the Colossians to the practice of the forementioned duties, and that is drawn from their election and vocation: Put on as the elect of God, bowels of mercy. You that had the favour to be chosen of God out of the heathen world, to be his church and people, and are now holy and beloved of God, let the sense of this divine favour oblige you to humility and meekness, to long suffering and mutual forgiveness, yea, to the love and practice of universal holiness. If any man have a quarrel against any, &c.

Still our apostle makes use of the former metaphor, comparing the graces of the holy Spirit to garments, which he exhorts Christians to put on; he had mentioned the putting on of mercy, meekness, humility, &c. before, how he advises, to put on charity, or the grace of love, as the upper garment over and above all the rest, comparing it to a bond or ligament, which ties and knits all the members of the church together. Quest. But what is this grace of charity? Ans. It is a brotherly affection, which every true Christian chiefly bears to all his fellow-members in Christ, for grace sake; or a gracious propensity of heart towards our neighbour, whereby we will, and do, to our power procure all good for him. Quest. But why does St. Paul compare charity to an upper garment? Above all, put on charity. Because, (1.) The upper garment is larger and broader than the rest, so ought charity to extend itself to all persons, and upon all occasions. (2.) The upper garment is usually fairer than the rest, so doth charity shine brightest amongst all the graces. (3.) The upper garment distinguishes the several orders and degrees of men; thus Christians are known by love as by a livery, it is the bond that Christ's sincere disciples wear. Quest. But how is charity the bond of perfectness? The meaning is, that it is the most perfect bond of union among Christians, it kniteth together all the scattered members of the church, and make their graces and gifts subservient to the good of one another, so that the church is hereby made a complete intire body, which was lame without it. In this sense, charity is called the bond of perfectness.

15 And let the peace of God rule in your hearts to the which ye also are called in one body; and be ye thankful.

As if our apostle had said, 'Let that peace which God has given you within, and calleth you to exercise without, govern your lives, and direct you in all your actions towards men, and live in continual thankfulness to God.' Here note, That the original word to rule in the heart, signifies an umpire, or to act the part of an umpire, in appealing cause. Now, this peace, (1.) Inwardly hushes and stills all in the soul, when tumultuous affections are up, and in an hurry; when anger, hatred, and revenge begin to arise in the soul, this calms and composes all. (2.) Outwardly, peace of conscience produces peaceableness of conversation; where the peace of God rules in the heart, it disposes to peaceableness in the life. Now, this consists in these things, namely, in an unwillingness to provoke others, in an unaptness to be provoked by others, in a readiness to be reconciled when provoked, and in a forwardness to reconcile others that are at variance.

16 Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom;—

These words come in by way of direction and advice, to help the Colossians in the exercise of the foregoing graces; seeing it is the word of Christ, or the holy scriptures, which teach the forementioned duties, he advites that the word of God may dwell in, and take up its abode with them, richly and plentifully, that they may be furnished thereby with all true and sound wisdom. Note here, 1. The title given to the holy scriptures, they are the word of Christ, because they have Christ for their author, Christ for their object, and Christ for their end. 2. The advice given with respect to the word of Christ, Let it dwell: Not come for an hour, but to tarry; not to tarry for a night, but to take up its fixed residence and abode. 3. Where it should dwell, not in the ear, nor in the head only, nor in the memory barely, nor in the affections, but in the heart and soul, Psal. cxix. 11. Thy word have I hid in my heart, that I might not sin against thee. The law is written in his heart, none of his steps shall slide, Psal. xxxvii. 31. 4. How the word should dwell in us, richly, copiously, and plentifully, in its commands, in its promises, in its threatenings; let the word, the whole word, dwell in you, being diligently searched, heartily received, and carefully observed. 5. The persons to whom this advice is given by the apostle, all the saints at Colosse, the whole body of the people are enjoined a holy familiarity with the Bible, it is to be in their houses, in their hands, and in their hearts, that it may dwell richly in them. Why then, and with what face dare the church of Rome forbid the common people to read the Bible, calling it an heretical book? For a reason they very well know, namely, Because it is the most dangerous book against Popery, that ever was written in the world.

—Teaching and admonishing one another in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs, singing with grace in your hearts to the Lord.

Here our apostle declares one special benefit which the Colossians would receive, by having the word of Christ dwell richly in them; it would enable them to teach and admonish one another, and also to excite and stir up the affections of each other, by singing those psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs therein contained, or such others as were composed by the inspiration and direction of the holy Spirit of God; always remembering, not to sing gracefully only, but with grace; that is, with attention and devotion in our hearts to the Lord. Learn hence, That singing psalms, both in public assemblies, and private families, and therein praising and blessing of God for mercies received, is a great and necessary duty, to be jointly performed by all persons capable of them. 2. That in singing, a special regard must be had, that there be an inward harmony, and gracious melody in the soul, by the exercise of the understanding, and the orderly motion of the affections; if the heart and affections be not stirred up in this duty, the outward grace, though never so graceful, availeth nothing.

17 And whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God and the Father by him.

Here our apostle lays down a general rule for the right management of all our words and actions, in the whole course of life; Whatsoever ye do, do all in the name of our Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God for all the mercies you receive by Jesus Christ. Learn hence, 1. That all our thoughts, words and actions, must and ought to be done in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ; that is, to do all by the authority and command of Christ, to do all in the power and strength of Christ, to do all for the honour and glory of Christ, to do all after the pattern and example of Christ. 2. That all prayers and thanksgiving, as they are only due to God, so they must be performed by us through Jesus Christ, that so they may find acceptance with God; Giving thanks to God and the Father by him.

18 Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands, as it is fit in the Lord.

Observe here, 1. That St. Paul in the former part of this chapter, having laid down general exhortations, to live suitably to the gospel which the Colossians had received, comes now, in the close of the chapter to exhort them to the practice of particular duties in their respective places and relations, as husbands and wives, parents and children, masters and servants. Learn hence, That the doctrine of the gospel lays the highest and strictest obligations upon all those to whom it is revealed, to perform every personal and relative duty in an holy and acceptable manner, both to God and man. 2. The wives duty of subjection here required: Submit yourselves to your own husbands. This implies and comprehends in it, a reverent esteem of them, an affectionate love unto them, speaking respectfully of them, and to them, and yielding obedience to their commands. Observe also, The qualification and manner of this subjection, as it is fit in the Lord, that is, in all lawful things, and in obedience to the Lord's commands, and not in any thing contrary to his will: Thus obeying; the woman's subjection is service done to Christ; which may com-

19 Husbands, love your wives, and be not bitter against them.

Note, 1. The general duty of the husband declared, to love his wife with a special, peculiar, conjugal affection, and to discover this love by a tender care over her, an affectionate regard to her, cohabitation with her, contentment and satisfaction in her, a patient bearing with her weaknesses, or prudential hiding of her infirmities, a cheerful supplying of her wants, a readiness to instruct and direct her, a willingness to pray for her, and with her; where true love is found these duties will be performed. 2. A particular sin, which all husbands are to avoid in their conversation with their wives, and that is being bitter against them; not bitter in affection towards them; that is, cold and indifferent in their love to them; not bitter in expression towards them, speaking reproachfully to them; not bitter in their actions towards them, giving them bitter blows, which is contrary to the law of God and nature. Learn hence, That it is the will and command of God, that husbands should not behave themselves, churlishly, sourly, or imperiously towards their wives; not ruling with rigour, or being morose and rough, stern and severe in their carriage towards them, but to treat them with that endearing familiarity that is due to them, as part of ourselves.

20 Children, obey your parents in all things: For this is well-pleasing unto the Lord.

Note here, The duty bound upon all children, and that is, obedience to their parents; this implies inward reverence, outward observance, a pious regard to their instructions, a following their good examples. 2. The object of this duty, Obey your parents, that is, both parents; as obedience is due from all children, so it is payable to all parents, to mothers as well as fathers; nay, Levit. xix. 3 the mother is named first, because in regard of the weakness of her sex, she is most liable to contempt. 3. The extent of the duty, in all things, that is, in all lawful things, and in all indifferent things, in every thing that is not sinful; though to the child it may seem unnecessary or unreasonable, yet the parents' command is to be obeyed. 4. The argument and motive to excite and quicken to this duty, It is well pleasing unto the Lord; hereby they may do acceptable service unto the Lord, who will reward it with long life on earth, and eternal life in heaven. God takes a mighty pleasure in the performance of relative duties; they are not only pleasing, but well-pleasing to him; we are no more really, than what we are relatively in the account of God; that which we call the power of godliness, consists in a conscientious performance of relative duties.

21 Fathers, provoke not your children to anger, lest they be discouraged.

Here the parents' duty, that is the duty of both parents, is laid down, provoke not your children to wrath, that is, abuse not your power and authority over them, by being too severe unto them; imbitter not their spirits against you, by denying them what is convenient for them, by inveighing with bitter words against them, by unjust, unseasonable, or immoderate correction of them; give them no just occasion to be angry. The reason is added, lest they be discouraged; either dispirited or heartless, or desperate and hardened; lest by dejection of spirit, they become stupid. A parent's conduct must be moderated with prudence; shunning the extremes of too much indulgence on the one hand, and too great rigour and severity on the other.

22 Servants, obey in all things your masters, according to the flesh; not with eye-service, as men-pleasers, but in singleness of heart, fearing God; 23 And whatsoever ye do, do it heartily as to the Lord, and not unto men; 24 Knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance. For ye serve the Lord Christ.

Note here, 1. The general duty incumbent upon all servants, and that is obedience to such as are their masters according to the flesh, to execute all their lawful commands; such as are God's freemen, may be servants to men, though not the servants of men. 2. The qualifications and properties of this obedience which is due and payable from servants to masters, it must be in singleness of heart, in great simplicity and sincerity of spirit, and with an eye to their great Master in heaven; with an eye to the command of their great Master, with an eye to the presence of their great Master, to the assistance and acceptance of their great Master, and to the honour and glory of him also; and it must be done heartily, and with good will, as to the Lord, and not to men. Learn hence, That the meanest and basest services in the place and station in which God sets us, being done with right qualifications, and from sincere motives, and for sincere ends, is service done to Christ, and, as such, shall be accepted and rewarded by him. 3. The mighty reward which the Spirit of God prepounds as an encouragement to poor servants in their obedience to their masters, Of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance. No service so mean but shall be rewarded, if conscientiously performed; no distinction in heaven between servants and sons, all shall receive the inheritance there, who have done faithful service here; and as the meanest service done with right qualifications, is service done to Christ, so shall it be accepted of him, and rewarded by him: Knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive, &c.

25 But he that doeth wrong, shall receive for the wrong which he hath done; and there is no respect of persons.

That is, "Such servants as have wronged their masters or such masters as have oppressed their servants, God, who respects no man's person, nor regardeth the rich no more than the poor, will take his time to revenge the injuries and wrong done by either to each other." Note here, The severity and impartiality of divine justice; God, the righteous judge, will revenge the wrong every wrong, whensoever, and by whomsoever it was done; he will revenge it impartially, he will revenge it proportionably; a just retribution according to the wrong done, shall be rendered to every one.

by the righteous and just God; He that hath done wrong, shall receive for the wrong which he hath done; and there is no respect of persons.

CHAP. IV.

MASTERS. give unto your servants that which is just and equal, knowing that ye also have a Master in heaven.

Our apostle concluded the foregoing chapter with an exhortation to servants to discharge their duty with all fidelity to their masters, remembering, that whatever wrong is done by them, shall sooner or later, be revenged by God; he begins this chapter with advice to masters, to give unto their servants, that which is just and equal; that which is just, or that which is according to compact and agreement either explicitly or implicitly made; as work, wages, food, clothing, and all fitting accommodations; also that which is equal in reason and charity, as to oblige them to serve God faithfully, to serve their masters cheerfully, not exercising a magisterial, much less a tyrannical power over them; and the argument to enforce it is strong, knowing that ye also have a Master in heaven; remembering they have one above them, from whom they must expect the like. Learn, That justice is to be observed towards poor servants, and that there are several offices of humanity and charity which are due unto them by the command of God: Such are these, (1.) That we look upon them not barely as servants, but as brethren, partakers of the same common nature, and capable of the same grace with ourselves consequently not to treat them as vile persons. (2.) That we wink at some of their miscarriages which are not apparently sinful, and do not punish every transgression committed by them: He must keep no servant that will have a servant with no faults. (3.) That we do not rule with rigour, without giving some reason for what commands seem hard and difficult, and that we permit them to plead their cause, and to defend their right, provided they do it with humility, not contradicting, or refusing to execute the command of their master. (4.) That to well deserving servants we give something above their wages, allowing them all fitting encouragement, whilst they are with us; and when they go away, not suffering them to go empty from us. Thus doing, masters will give unto their servants that which is just and equal: But how ordinary is it for them that are a little above others, to forget there is one above them?

Note here, 1. The duty exhorted to, and that is prayer; a transcendent privilege, as well as an important duty. 2. The manner of the duty, and how it must be performed, with constancy and perseverance. (1.) Continue in prayer; that is, continue instant in prayer; not that every other duty is to be neglected, that we may always perform this, but we are always to keep our heart in a praying frame, and be found in the practice of the duty at all fitting seasons; we are then said to do a thing continually, when we do it seasonably; what a man does out of conscience, he will do with perseverance. Nature will have her good moods, but grace is steady. (2.) Watchfulness in prayer is here directed to, Watch in the same: particularly we ought to watch for the duty, in the duty, and after the duty: to watch for the fittest praying season, to watch our hearts in the season of prayer, that our thoughts do not wander, nor our affections flag; to watch after the duty, that our hearts be not lifted up by any assistance received in the duty; nor be too much dejected, upon the score of those infirmities that mingle themselves with our prayers: but direct the eye of our faith to Christ as our intercessor, who pleads for the gracious acceptance both of our persons and services, notwithstanding the imperfections of them both. Lastly, What must always accompany prayers for mercies we want, namely, Thanksgiving for mercies received: Watch in the same with thanksgiving. There is no such effectual way of begging, as thanksgiving; God is offended, when we are loud and clamorous in asking favours, but dumb and tongue-tied in returning thanks: Need will make us beggars, but grace only thankgivers.

3 Withal, praying also for us, that God would open unto us a door of utterance, to speak the mystery of Christ, for which I am also in bonds: 4 That I may make it manifest as I ought to speak:

Our apostle having directed the Colossians to the duty of prayer in general, here he requests an interest in their prayers for himself, and all the ministers of Christ in particular. Whence note, 1. That the ministers of Jesus Christ are, and ought in an especial manner to be remembered in the saints prayers. 2. The mercies he desires may be prayed for, on his behalf, namely, utterance and boldness: Ministers depend upon God, as for other ministerial gifts, so particularly for the gift of utterance, and it is their people's duty to be earnest and instant with God for the same: And as for utterance in delivering their message, so for boldness in suffering for it, when called to it. No prayers can be too much to strengthen the hands, and encourage the hearts of the ministers of Christ unto an holy boldness, who suffer persecution for what they preach; therefore is St. Paul here so earnest with the Colossians, as he was before with the Ephesians, chap. vi. 18. and with the Romans, chap. xv. 30. desiring them to strive together in their prayers for him: Where, by the way, remark, That the apostle thus passionately desiring the living saints to pray for him, but never desiring once the prayers and intercessions of the saints departed, nor of the Virgin Mary, is an evidence that he approved not of their prayers, nor looked upon them as mediators and intercessors with God then, as the church of Rome does now.

5 Walk in wisdom toward them that are without,

By them without are meant the Heathen, who are yet without the pale of the visible church, to walk in wisdom toward them, is a duty of great latitude, but imports particularly here, an endeavour to the uttermost to promote their conversion and salvation, by begetting in them a due veneration for the gospel, and a love and liking to the Christian religion. Learn hence, That private Christians, by walking wisely before them that are yet unconverted effectually to Christianity, may be exceedingly helpful to promote the entertainment of the gospel amongst them. They may pray, and pray in faith, for their conversion, and the further spreading of the gospel, in order to that end. The ardent devotions and the holy conversations of private Christians are excellent means to recommend the gospel and the Christian religion, and to represent them as most amiable and desirable.

— Redeeming the time.

Having in the former part of the verse, directed the Colossians to walk wisely before the unconverted Gentiles that were among them, in this latter part of the verse, he advises them to redeem every opportunity, for gaining over those infidels to the Christian religion. A Christian that knows the worth of time, will redeem it, will improve it for the soul, for the benefit of his own soul, and for the advantage of others: How this is done, see the note on Eph. v. 16.

6 Let your speech be always with grace, seasoned with salt, that ye may know how ye ought to answer every man.

Direction is here given to all Christians, for the right government of the tongue, and well ordering of the speech, that it be not corrupt and rotten, filthy or frothy, vain and unprofitable, but mild and courteous, savoury and gracious, wise and discreet. Note here, 1. That we are not left at random in our ordinary discourse, to let our tongue run riot and talk what we please, without any regard to the edification of others. 2. That there ought to be both a gracefulness and grace in our speech, some savour of piety, something that may testify there is grace wrought in ourselves, and tends to the working of grace in others. 3. That our speech may be thus savoury at all times, it must be seasoned with salt. (1.) With the salt of truth: There must be an agreement betwixt the thing and our words, without falsehood; and an agreement betwixt our tongue and our hearts, without dissimulation. (2.) With the salt of wisdom and prudence; this will teach us the time when, the manner how, and the measure how much to speak: those words must needs be unsavoury, that have neither truth nor prudence in them. The people wondered of old at the gracious words which came out of Christ's mouth; and we may justly wonder at the graceless words which come out of the mouth of many that are called Christians.

7 All my state shall Tychicus declare unto you, who is a beloved brother, and a faithful minister and fellow-servant in the Lord: 8 Whom I have sent unto you for the same purpose, that he might know your estate and comfort your hearts; 9 With Onesimus a faithful and beloved brother, who is one of you. They shall make known unto you all things which are done here.

Note here, 1. That although St. Paul had now with him but a few friends at Rome to comfort him in his bonds, yet he spares two of them to visit and comfort these Colossians.

See the public spirit of our apostle, who preferred the common good of the church at Colosse, before his own comfort at Rome. 2. The persons whom St. Paul sent to them, Tychicus and Onesimus, whom he styles brethren, faithful brethren, beloved brethren: Nothing endears persons so much to one another, as religion and the grace of God. These ties are stronger than those of nature: No such love as likeness occasions, especially likeness to God. 3. The design and end of St. Paul's sending these two persons to them, namely, (1.) To make known unto them all things done at Rome: All things, without exception, both in doings and sufferings, both in public and private, the apostle was ashamed of neither. Happy it is, when the conversation of Christ's ministers is such, both in public and private, that they need not be ashamed to have it known, or that the church may understand it. (2.) That he might comfort their hearts: But how could Tychicus and Onesimus do this? 1. By making known to them the true cause of his sufferings, that it was for the gospel's sake. 2. To keep them from discouragement at the report of his sufferings, that they might not be offended at his chain, nor sink under the burden of immoderate sorrow upon his account. 3. To comfort their hearts with the report of that holy joy and cheerfulness which the apostle had in his own spirit, under the present burden of his sufferings. See the note on Eph. vi. 22.

10 Aristarchus my fellow-prisoner saluteth you, and Marcus, sister's son to Barnabas, (touching whom ye received commandments. If he come unto you, receive him.) 11 And Jesus, which is called Justus, who are of the circumcision. These only are my fellow-workers unto the kingdom of God, which have been a comfort unto me.

Our apostle coming now to the conclusion of his excellent letter, sendeth (as his manner was) particular salutations to those he wrote to. These salutations were both from others and himself. Here we have three of St. Paul's companions sending salutations to the church at Colosse, namely, Aristarchus, a fellow-prisoner, Mark, sister's son to Barnabas, who, though he did desert St. Paul and Barnabas, and went not with them to the work, yet returning to his duty, he is recommended to the church's reception; and Jesus, who was called Justus, possibly from his just conversation. Jesus is the same with Joshua, signifying a Saviour: However, we do not find that any Christians, since their Lord's resurrection, did ever give their children the name of Jesus, out of a due reverence to their Lord and Master, who is God-man, blessed for evermore. Now we learn, That neither distance of place, nor length of time, ought to cool that love and good-will, that hearty and sincere affection, which Christians should bear to one another. Note farther, That, as in the large catalogue of salutations which St. Paul wrote to the saints at Rome, Rom. xvii. in which particular persons are mentioned, St. Peter's name is not once named: So here, in this catalogue of salutations sent from Rome, no mention is made of St. Peter's name neither; doubtless had he been now at Rome, he had sent salutations as well as the rest: here are salutations from from Acistarchus, Mark, and others, none from Peter. Behold here the weak ground which the Pope builds his pretended supremacy and headship upon, namely, that he is St. Peter's successor, who was bishop of Rome; now, though it can never be proved that St. Peter exercised any supremacy over the rest of the apostles, it can less be proved that ever he was bishop of Rome; nor is there any word in scripture to prove that he ever was at Rome, but rather the contrary; it is certain he was not at Rome when St. Paul wrote this epistle, there being only these, he says, whom he mentions, who are his fellow-labourers unto the kingdom of God.

12 Epaphras, who is one of you, a servant of Christ saluteth you, always labouring fervently for you in prayers, that ye may stand perfect and complete in all the will of God. 13 For I bear him record that he hath a great zeal for you, and them that are in Laodicea, and them in Hierapolis.

Our apostle next mentions the particular salutation sent from Rome to the church at Colosse by Epaphras, who is described from his own country; he is one of you, that is, a citizen of Colosse; by his office, a servant of Christ, that is, a minister of the gospel; by his fervour of affection towards these Colossians, evidenced by his prayers for them, he labours fervently for you in his prayers. The word signifies to strive as in an agony, pointing out our ministerial duty to us, not only to preach unto, and to pray with, but fervently to pray for our people. God forgive our forgetfulness of, our backwardness to, our remissness in this part of our duty. Too seldom do we hear our people upon our hearts, when we go in and out before the Lord. Oh! how far are we from praying ourselves into an agony for them, when our petitions freeze within our lips, which we put up for our own souls! One thing might here be noted further concerning Epaphras, he was minister of (some think bishop of) Colosse; yet was he born there, he is one of you, that is, of your city. Now, Christ tells us, a minister is in hazard to meet with disrespect in his own country, he is usually of no honor there: However, Epaphras being called to the work of God in the place where he was born, embraces it, and God gives him reputation with the people for his faithfulness in his place. Lastly, What was the subject-matter of Epaphras's prayer for his people at Colosse, namely, That they might stand perfect and complete in all the will of God: it is the desire and prayer, the care and endeavour, of every faithful minister of Christ, that his people may stand fast in their obedience, in universal obedience, in perfect and complete obedience to the will, the whole will of God, in all things; yet one thing more is observable in Epaphras, he had not only a great zeal for his own people at Colosse, but for them at Laodicea and Hierapolis, which were neighbouring churches. Learn thence; That the ministers of Christ are to look upon themselves as ministers of the whole church; and although they take care of a particular congregation, yet it is their duty to desire and endeavour, that all Christians, within the reach of their ministerial labours, may find some special benefit and advantage by them. Epaphras had a fervent zeal for the churches in Laodicea and Hierapolis, as well as at Colosse, and it was his commendation that he had so.

14 Luke the beloved physician, and Demas, greet you.

Still the apostle is sending salutations from Rome to the Colossians. 1. From St. Luke, who, of a physician for the body, becomes a physician for the soul, as Matthew of a publican, became a preacher. Luke well deserved the title here given him of beloved, in that he undertook the ministry at a time when civil authority did allow no maintenance for ministers, and when his employment as a physician would probably have advantaged him much more. Luke the beloved physician, greets you. 2. Demas also, yet now he sends salutations with the rest to the church at Colosse. St. Paul complains of his forsaking of him, 2 Tim. iv. 10: for the sake of this present world: Let no professor judge of himself by his external profession, by his performance of outward duties, by his associating himself with the people of God, nay, by his sufferings with the servants of God; (Demas did all this) but by their sincere love to Christ, and persevering faithfulness in the trying hour of temptation; we know not what we are, till sufferings appear.

15 Salute the brethren which are in Laodicea, and Nymphas, and the church which is in his house,

Our apostle had sent the salutations of others to them before, he sends his own now. 1. Generally to all the Christian brethren which were in Laodicea, to whom he directs this epistle to be read in the next verse. Now, to prepare them to hear it with greater attention, he sends salutations particularly to them, Salute the brethren in Laodicea. No particular people must desire or expect to monopolize and engross the whole of a minister's affections to themselves; but as he is the minister of the catholic church, so it is both his duty and desire, that all particular churches; yea, individual Christians, should share in his affectionate love towards them, in his care and concern for them. He salutes Nymphas in particulars, a person perhaps very eminent for piety and charity, as may be gathered from the following words; And the church which is in his house. By which, 1. Understand his family and household, who were so piously instructed, so religiously governed, so devoutly disposed, as if they had been a church. Learn thence, That masters of families should train up their household in religion and godliness, instructing, reproofing, exhorting, all that are under their care, that their house may deserve the name of a church: The church which is in his house. 2. Some, by the church in his house, understand a material house, or some particular room in his house, which he had given to a certain number of Christians for a place of public worship. Although the church, in the apostles times, had, not the countenance of civil authority, to provide either places for worship, or maintenance for ministers, yet such fervour of zeal was found in the breasts of Christians, that then, such as were of ability, wanted not for inclination to contribute liberally and freely, unto both; charity moved to give more often, than force of law can compel and contrain.

constrain now; Nymphas gives his house to be a place of public worship to the church. See the learned Mr. Mede on 1 Cor. xi. 22.

16 And when this epistle is read amongst you, cause that it be read also in the church of the Laodiceans;—

Here St. Paul directs to the reading of this epistle themselves, which the Spirit of God had directed him to write unto them, Let this epistle be read amongst you. All holy scripture is to be read and perused by every private Christian; the same Spirit that did indite the scriptures requires the reading and understanding of them. And further, St. Paul desires this epistle, Being read amongst the Colossians should be next read in the church of Laodicea; who being their neighbours, received the same poison or errors from the false teachers crept in amongst them, and consequently stood in need of the same antidote. That doctrine which is directed to some particular church or person, recorded in scripture, was of universal use then, and may be now, to all particular persons and societies.

—And that ye likewise read the epistle from Laodicea.

Much controversy has risen in the church about this epistle from Laodicea; some have affirmed that it was written by St. Paul to the Laodiceans, but lost; from whence they would infer, that the canon of the scripture is not entire: But supposing it were so, yet it follows not but that we have all things necessary to salvation in the holy scriptures. It is very probable that St. Paul himself, and several other apostles, wrote more epistles than are in the Bible: What then? We have what the wisdom of God thought fit to hand down to us, and what is sufficient to make the serious reader of it wise unto salvation. Surely Almighty God was not bound to bring down all that they wrote to us, but only what his own wisdom saw fit and necessary for us. Others understand it of an epistle from Laodicea to St. Paul, and that he answered it fully in this epistle to the Colossians, and sending it back, desired the Colossians might read it, for better clearing of some passages in his epistle to them. Lastly, Some understand it of the epistle to the Ephesians, Ephesus being the metropolis, or the chief city of Laodicea; and accordingly, some called the epistle to the Ephesians, the epistle to the Laodiceans: The truth is, there is a very great affinity betwixt the epistle to the Ephesians, and this to the Colossians: the doctrines, exhortations, and many expressions are the very same; so that it is no wonder if he desired they should be both read at Colosse, to let them see that he wrote the same doctrine to other churches which he had done to them.

17 And say to Archippus, Take heed to the ministry, which thou hast received in the Lord that thou fulfil it.

This Archippus is, with good reason, supposed to be the minister at Colosse, in the room of Epaphras, now with St. Paul at Rome. Some think, that in the absence of Epaphras, he was grown somewhat remiss and slack in his ministerial duty; he directs therefore the Colossians to admonish him to the exercise of greater diligence in discharging all the parts of his trust committed by Christ unto him, Say unto Archippus, Take heed, &c. Observe here, A double charge, (1.) A charge of message, Say unto Archippus: The Colossians must say it. St. Paul could have wrote a private letter to him; but they must excite him, yea, say to him to his face, not of him behind his back: It is the people's duty to stir up their ministers to the faithful performance of their duty; the fire of our ministerial zeal doth not burn so bright, but we may need our people's bellows to inflame it; but this must be done with prudence by the people, in a way of exhortation; not by the way of exprobration; so stir up your minister to his duty, that you forget not your own. 2. The charge of an office, Take heed to the ministry which thou hast received of the Lord, that thou fulfil it. Here note, 1. A duty enjoined, to fulfil the ministry: But what is that? Negatively, not to secure the success of our ministry, we may deliver our own souls, though our people's be not delivered; the nurse is not charged with the life of the child, but with the care of the child; she shall be paid whether it live or die: Nor is it absolutely to perform every part of our ministerial duty without the least deficiency; no, we rejoice in the testimony of our conscience, that in simplicity and godly sincerity we have done our duty: Positively, to fulfil the ministry, is to perform all the parts of our duty with care and faithfulness, persevere in diligence, particularly public preaching and private inspection. A non-preaching minister is no minister, a breastless nurse, a murderer of souls, a bell without a clapper, a cryer without a voice; yet doth not his work lye all in the pulpit, but the greatest part out of it: He is styled a watchman: For what? because he is to watch one hour with his people in a week? No, surely, but because he is to watch over them, and converse with them all the week upon occasion. Is not the physician to visit his patient, as well as to prescribe his physic? Doth the husbandman cast his seed into the ground, and never come into his fields to see whether it comes up, or how it grows? Verily, our people are great gainers by our profitable converse with them, and we shall be gainers by them too. We may gain more experimental knowledge by an afternoon's visiting our people, than by a week's study. Note, 2. The means here directed to, for the fulfilling of the ministry, Take heed to the ministry. What doth that import? (1.) Take heed to thy study; ministerial abilities are not rained down like manna upon us. The apostles did not study indeed; but one reason was, they had no time to study, they were itinerary preachers. (2.) Take heed to thy doctrine, that it be the true word of God, and delivered purely; not only in opposition to error, but in opposition to levity. (3.) Take heed, that is, to thy life and practice, that we may tread out the steps before our people, which they are to make towards heaven. Note, 3. The more pressing all up to the fulfilling our ministerial trust: (1.) We have received it: There is the importance of a special favour, and also the importance of a strict account; what we have received, we must give an account for. (2.) We have received it of or from the Lord; this implies assistance, that that God has called us to it, will assist us in it : Lo, I am with you always unto the end of the world; with you to assist, with you to succeed, with you to reward. Let Archippus then, and every one in the work of Christ, take heed to the ministry which he has received of the Lord, that he fulfil it.

18 The salutation by the hand of me Paul. Remember my bonds. Grace be with you. Amen.

Here our apostle closes his epistle with a general salutation under his own hand, intimating thereby, that he had wrote the whole with his own hands. He begs them to remem- ber his bonds; that is, (1.) To sympathize with him in his bonds. (2.) To pray for him in his bonds. (3.) To receive the word of God, which he had written to them in his bonds. (4.) To prepare for sufferings themselves, his bonds being but the forerunners of their bonds. Thus it is the people's duty to remember the pious ministers in their bonds. He adds, Grace be with you, wishing them an abiding interest in the special favour of God, with a multiplied increase of all spiritual blessings flowing from thence; increase of all grace to enable them to glorify God on earth, and to prepare them for glory with God in heaven. Amen.

FIRST EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL

T H E S S A L O N I A N S.

This epistle to the Thessalonians, though placed last, yet is supposed to have been written first by St. Paul to this particular church; and not without probability, because the gospel was more early preached at Thessalonica, than either at Rome or Corinth, as appears by the Acts of the Apostles.

Thessalonica was the chief city in Macedonia, whither St. Paul, in a vision, was directed to go and preach the gospel; accordingly he went, Acts xvi. and xvii. and laid very early the foundation of a Christian Church in this city, which consisting partly of Jews, and partly of Gentiles, they were severely persecuted by both. Now the apostle, hearing what hard things the Thessalonians suffered, he writes this epistle, to confirm them in the faith, and to prevent their being shaken by those persecutions.

To encourage them to perseverance in the faith, and patience under their present persecutions, he first informs them that it was nothing strange that they should thus suffer from those Jews and Pagans, who had killed the Lord Jesus, and their own prophets, and were contrary to all men; and then puts them in mind of the transcendent reward laid up for them, and the severe punishments that were prepared for their persecutors. And, lastly, He animates and encourages them, by the example of his own constancy, to perseverance in their holy profession; and concludes his epistle to them, with particular exhortations to holiness of life, and unblameableness in conversation.

C H A P. I.

PAUL and Silvanus and Timotheus, unto the church of the Thessalonians, which is in God the Father, and in the Lord Jesus Christ. Grace be unto you, and peace from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.

St. Paul begins this epistle, as he does the rest, with a very kind and gracious salutation; in which we have observable, the persons saluting, the parties saluted, and the salutation salutation itself: Note, 1. The persons saluting, Paul, Silvanus and Timotheus: Paul only was the inspired writer of the epistle, the other were his associates and assistants, instruments with him in converting the Thessalonians to Christianity, and whom they had a deservedly great affection for; he joins them therefore with himself, as asserters and approvers of the truth contained in this his epistle, that so he might procure the greater respect to the doctrines it contained; he therefore names them with himself, Paul, Silvanus, or Silas, as he is called, Acts xvii. and Timotheus: But why not Paul an apostle, or Paul a servant of Jesus Christ, as in other epistles, but bare Paul only? Ans. Because his apostleship was not at all questioned by them; the Thessalonians had a seal of it in their hearts: and there were no false apostles among them that denied his apostleship, as the Galatians and other churches had. The prudent and faithful ministers of Christ know, both how and when to use those titles of honour and respect which God hath given them, and also when it is convenient to forbear the assuming of them. 2. The persons saluted, The church of the Thessalonians: Thessalonica was the metropolis, or the mother-city of Macedonia, where a Christian church was planted by the ministry of St. Paul and Silas, but with great opposition from the Jews, who forced Paul to fly to Boreæ for his own safety, Acts xvii. and Jason, with others that entertained him had like to have been sacrificed in their own houses; yet there, in despite of the devil's rage, and persecutor's malice, doth God erect a glorious church, a Christian church, in honour of his Son, who purchased it with his blood. Learn hence, That when and where God will gather to himself a church, no opposition, either of men or devils, shall be sufficient to hinder it; as Rome itself, nay, in the court of Nero, under the very nose of that bloody tyrant, was a church collected, Phil. iv. 22. No wonder the devil struggles, when his kingdom totters; it follows, which (church) is in God the Father, and in the Lord Jesus Christ, that is, established in the knowledge, faith, worship, and obedience of God the Father; they were Gentiles, called off from their dumb idols, to serve the living and true God, and were distinguished from all other societies and communions whatsoever; they were in God the Father, and in the Lord Jesus Christ, that is, they enjoyed a blessed union with Jesus Christ by faith, and a sweet communion and fellowship both with Father and Son, by the bond of the Spirit. Behold the high dignity and glorious privilege of the Christian church, to be thus knit and united, both to the Father and the Son, by the agency of the Holy Spirit! To the church of the Thessalonians, which is in God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ. Note, 3. The salutation itself, Grace be unto you, and peace from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ. Where observe, 1. The option of blessings wished, grace and peace; grace, in scripture, signifies, first, the gracious favour of God towards us; and next, all the gifts of grace, all benefits and blessings issuing forth and flowing from thence; peace, usually signifies in scripture-language, all manner of outward prosperity and happiness. 2. The author and fountain from whence these blessings flow; (1.) From God the Father; (2.) From the Mediator, the Lord Jesus Christ; intimating, That whatever spiritual grace or temporal blessing we now receive from God, is from him, not barely as a Creator, but as a Father, a gracious Father in Christ, in whom he pours out the immensity of his love upon us, and through whom he conveys all kinds of blessings unto us.

2 We give thanks to God always for you all, making mention of you in our prayers. 3 Remembering without ceasing your work of faith, and labour of love, and patience of hope in our Lord Jesus Christ, in the sight of God and our Father;

Note here, 2. The holy wisdom of our apostle, who being about to magnify and extol the graces of the Spirit wrought in the Thessalonians, particularly their faith, their love, their patience and hope, instead of commending them for these graces, he breaks forth into thanksgivings unto God for them; We give thanks to God always for your work of faith, and labour of love, and patience of hope: His business was not to celebrate and commend them, but to admire the special grace of God conferred upon them, and conspicuous in them. Learn hence, That it is our duty, and will be our great wisdom, so to speak of the grace of God, which we see and observe in others, as that they may not be puffed up with any conceit of their own excellencies, but see matter of praise and thanksgiving due unto God only, and nothing to themselves. Note, 2. The special and particular graces which St. Paul observed in the Thessalonians, their faith, their love, their hope, together with the evidence of the sincerity of those graces; their faith was a working faith, that is, fruitful in good works; their love was a laborious love, promoting the good of all the saints; and their hope in the Lord Jesus, rendered them patient in and under all tribulations for his sake. There is no such way to judge of the truth of the inward habits of grace in the heart, as by observing the effects and fruits of that grace in the life: The apostle concluded they had true faith, because a fruitful faith; true love, because a laborious love; a good hope in Christ, because accompanied with patience under the cross of Christ. 3. St. Paul's offices and acts of love performed on the Thessalonians behalf, namely, thanksgiving and prayer. (1.) Thanksgiving, We give thanks unto God always for you all. But why, O blessed apostle, art thou so thankful for the graces of God's holy Spirit wrought in these Thessalonians? For thy own sake, no doubt, as well as theirs; he saw in them an eminent seal of his apostleship, the happy fruit and blessed effect of his ministry among them. This, O! This it was, that drew forth his very soul in thanksgivings to God. Learn, That the faithful ministers of Christ rejoice greatly at the sight and appearance of the grace of God in any person; but when they see it in their own people, as the seal of their ministry, and the blessed fruit of their own painful endeavours amongst them, this carries them out into transports of thankfulness; verily, the joy of their hearts is too big to come out at their mouths, they give thanks for such a mercy without ceasing. Yet, (2.) He subjoins prayers with his praises, adds supplications to his thanksgivings, making mention of you always in my prayers; to let them know, that there was still much grace wanting in them to keep them humble, as well as great grace in them to make him thankful: Our prayers for grace must be thankful prayers, or accompanied with thanksgiving; when we pray to God for more grace, we must be ever thankful for what we have received; and when we return thanks for grace received, we must be earnest and instant with God for further and fresh supplies of grace wanted. Note, 4. The frequency, yea, constancy of our apostle, in performing the duties of prayer and thanksgiving on the behalf of these Thessalonians, We give thanks to God alway for you, remembering you without ceasing, in the sight of God, and our Father; that is, as often as we appear before God our Father, we incessantly pray for you, and constantly praise God on your behalf. Where observe, The comfortable relation in which the saints of God do approach and draw near unto God in prayer, they come to him as a Father, yea, as their Father; in the sight of God, our Father. The holy Spirit of God vouchsafed to believers under the gospel, enables them to come before him in prayer, with a full assurance of his fatherly affection towards them, as being the sons of God, through faith in Christ Jesus, and it enables them to cry, Abba, Father; and they are very careful to improve this their relation to God, and interest in him, as a father, in prayer, on behalf of themselves, and all their fellow-brethren and members in Christ. Thus St. Paul here, We give thanks for you, and remember you, &c.

4 Knowing, brethren beloved, your election of God. 5 For our gospel came not unto you in word only, but also in power, and in the holy Ghost, and in much assurance; as ye know what manner of men we were among you for your sake.

Observe here, 1. One special ground and reason assigned why the apostle's heart was thus extraordinarily carried out in praise and thanksgivings unto God, on the Thessalonian's behalf, and that was the knowledge of their election, knowing your election of God; that is, knowing certainly and infallibly, by your proficiency in the forementioned Christian graces of faith, love and hope, that God had certainly chosen you out of the Gentile world, to be a church and people to himself, and that it was the good pleasure of God to gather a Christian church at Thessalonica; and also he did know and believe, with a judgment of charity, that Almighty God had chosen them to eternal life also, to be a part of his church triumphant in heaven, as well as of his church militant upon earth; the preaching of the gospel having met with such visible success amongst them. It was our unquestionable duty, and we learn it from St. Paul's example, in charity to number amongst God's chosen, in whom we see, as much as man may see, the fruits and signs of God's election. 2. The ground which St. Paul had to build his confidence upon, that the Thessalonians were a people chosen of God, and that was rational evidence, knowing your election of God; for our gospel came to you not in word only, but in power. Where note, The piety and prudence of St. Paul's charity, it was not weakly grounded and credulous, but guided by reasonable evidence; Charity hopeth all things, that is, all things which it hath good ground to hope, but nothing more than what probable evidence may induce it to hope.

St. Paul when he saw the apostasy of Hymenæus and Alexander into error and vice, without censoriousness and uncharitableness, pronounces, that they had made shipwreck of the faith, 1 Tim. i. 20. For he had sufficient reason to believe, there could be no faith where there was no holiness. There are a generation of men amongst us, who brand the ministers of God with censoriousness, and rash judging the present state of men, though they judge by their lives and actions; they would have us hope well concerning them, against hope, and judge quite contrary to rational evidence; we must believe them to have faith, when they have no knowledge; that they are right penitents, and sorrowful for their sins, when they make a sport of sin; that their hearts are chaste, when their mouths foam out nothing but filthiness; but let them know, we dare not bring a curse upon ourselves, by calling good evil, and evil good; our charity, though not causelessly suspicious, yet neither is foolishly blind. Observe, 3. The Thessalonians election, and that was the great and gracious success of his ministry amongst them. Our gospel came.—But how our gospel? Not as if he were the author of it, but the dispenser only; not our gospel by original revelation, but by ministerial dispensation only. But how did the gospel come amongst the Thessalonians? Not in word only, sounding in the ear, or reaching and resting in the understanding only, as a light to gaze upon; but in power that is, accompanied then with the power of miracles, now with a convincing, terrifying, humbling, renewing, and reforming power. It follows, and in the Holy Ghost; that is, the preaching of the word was at that time attended, as with a mighty power of miracle; so with an extraordinary effusion and pouring out the Holy Ghost upon them that heard it, prevailing upon them to embrace it, and to submit themselves unto it. With this miraculous power of the Holy Ghost was the preaching of the word accompanied then, with an enlightened, quickening, regenerating, and sanctifying power now; the ministry of the word is the great instrument in the hand of the Spirit, for the conversion of sinners, for the edification of saints, and for the salvation of both. Again, the apostles' ministration came unto them in much assurance, that is, with a full conviction both to them and him; to them with an evident conviction of the truth of his doctrine; and to him, it was a full persuasion, yea, a firm assurance, that God had chosen them to be a church and special people to himself; And lastly, As to his own conduct and conversation amongst them, he appeals to them, and to their own knowledge, whether it was not answerable to the doctrine delivered by him; Ye know what manner of men we were among you for your sake. Happy is it when the pious and prudent conversation of a minister amongst his people, is, and has been such, that, upon a fit occasion, he can and dare appeal to God and them as witnesses and observers of it; Ye know what we were among you: ye are witnesses, and God also, how holily, and justly, and unblameably we behaved ourselves among you, chap. ii. 10. An heterodox conversation will carry an orthodox preacher to hell; there is a preaching life, as well as a preaching doctrine; if religion be taught by the first, and irreligion by the latter, we sadly disappoint the end of what what is spoken; though like a cracked bell, we may be instrumental to ring others into heaven, yet for ourselves there is no remedy, but to the fire. we must go, either for our refining, or for our condemnation. The throne and the pulpit, above all places, call for holiness; the prince and the preacher, above all persons, are most accountable to God for their example: Ye knew what manner of men we were, among you.

6 And ye became followers of us, and of the Lord, having received the word in much affliction, with joy of the Holy Ghost: 7 So that ye were ensamples to all that believe in Macedonia and Achaia.

In these words, our apostle gives us another profitable evidence, that the Thessalonians were undoubtedly chosen of God, namely, because they were active and operative Christians; they did in their life and practice conform themselves to that excellent pattern and example held forth unto them by their preachers, Ye became followers of us. Where note, That there ought to be something worthy of imitation in the lives of ministers, something which their people may safely follow; and it is the people's duty, not only to lend an ear to their doctrine, but an eye to their pious conversation. It is added, Followers of us, and of the Lord: Followers of Christ, absolutely, as an unerring pattern; of his ministers, conditionally, so far as they followed Christ: But followers of the Lord here, seems to import their following of him in his sufferings and afflictions, as appears by the next words, Having received the word with much affliction. Such as are sincere, serious Christians, are followers of Christ in his sufferings, as well as in his example; they follow him in the sharp and thorny path of affliction, in which he went before them, they are willing to bear his cross, as well as to wear his crown, to suffer for him, as well as to be glorified with him. Observe next; The particular instance wherein the Thessalonians became followers of the apostles; it was this, That they preached the word to them with great desire, delight and joy, though at the same time they endured a great fight of afflictions, contending with the opposition both of men and devils, in preaching the word unto them: In like manner did they receive the word with much affliction, and adhere to it in the midst of persecution; and all this accompanied with such inward joy, as none but the Holy Ghost could be the author of in them: Ye received the word with much affliction, with the joy of the Holy Ghost. Learn hence, That upon preaching of the word, to have an heart open to receive it, to receive it with affliction, with much affliction, and yet with joy and rejoicing, with a cheerful spirit, and such a joy as the holy Spirit of God is the author and producer of, is a good evidence, that a person is chosen of God, and has a title to the everlasting inheritance. Farther, Our apostle, in a just and deserved commendation of these Thessalonians, tells them, to their great and singular honour, that as they were followers of them (the apostles) in sufferings, in patience, and cheerfulness; so they were themselves living patterns, and lively ensamples of courage and constancy under their sufferings, to all the neighbouring churches in Macedonia and Achaia. There is the grace of God received by us, a mark and evidence of our election of God, whom we have advanced to such a considerable proficiency and growth in it, as to become patterns and examples of piety to all that are round about us: Thus the Thessalonians here, Ye are become ensamples, &c.

8 For from you founded on the word of the Lord, not only in Macedonia and Achaia, but also in every place your faith to Godward is spread abroad, so that we need not speak any thing. 9 For they themselves shew of us what manner of entering in we had unto you, and how ye turned to God from idols, to serve the living and true God.

Still our apostle proceeds in a copious commendation of these Thessalonians, or rather in a thankful admiration of the grace of God shining in them; he tells them, and that without flattery, that the fame and report of their graces was spread abroad far and near, inasmuch that the sovereign churches, amongst whom he conversed, were able to give him a perfect account how the apostle's entrance amongst them at Thessalonica was; though not pompous, yet very prosperous, strangely succeeded, and singularly blessed. to the turning of them from dead idols, to serve the living and true God. Learn, That where true grace is rooted in the heart, though it be not immediately seen, yet it cannot long be hid, but it will discover itself in the genuine fruits and vital effects of it, to the deserved admiration, and withheld for imitation of all beholders whatsoever: From you founded forth the word of the Lord, &c.—And how you turned from idols, that is, how readily and speedily, how sincerely and heartily you turned from idolatry, your former idolatry, in which you had been educated and brought up; yet upon the preaching of our gospel, ye left it, and turned with indignation from it, to serve God, the living God, so called in opposition to their dead and dumb idols; and the true God, in opposition to their false gods. These words of the apostle teach us how to expound those words of our Saviour, John xvii. 3. This is life eternal, to know thee the only true God: Teaching us, that the Father is called the only true God, not in opposition to Jesus Christ, as the Socinians would insinuate, but in opposition to idols and false gods only. Now from this effect, which the gospel had upon the Thessalonians, to turn them from idols to serve the living God, we learn, That as every man naturally bears an idol in his heart, that is, sets up something there in God's stead, which attracts and draws off the chief of his affections from God, so wherever the gospel is heartily received and entertained, there will be an abandoning of, and returning from, whatsoever did usurp God's throne in the soul, and the person hereafter, will only love and serve the living and true God. You turned from idols, to serve the living and true God.

10 And to wait for his Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead, even Jesus, which delivered us from the wrath to come.

Here the apostle produces a further evidence of these Thessalonians conversion, namely, that they did not only turn from idols to serve God the Father, but did also believe believe in Jesus Christ his only Son : This act of faith is expressed by waiting, they waited for his Son from heaven, that is, by faith they expected that Christ, whom the apostle had preached to them, and was gone to heaven, would certainly come again from thence, to deliver his redeemed ones from the wrath to come, that is, from the punishment and vengeance eternally due unto them for sin. And the ground of this their expectation was, Christ's resurrection from the dead : To wait for his Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead. Note here, 1. A description, an heart-affecting, yea, a soul affecting description of that wrath which doth await every wicked and impenitent sinner ; it is a wrath to come ; after thousands, yea, millions of years, that sinners have lain under it, still it is wrath to come ; and they are as far from being delivered from it, as the first hour they fell under it. 2. That Jesus Christ delivered up himself to death, that he might be a Saviour and deliverer to his people from his wrath ; let it break forth when it will, not a drop of it shall ever fall upon any of them. 3. That believers may warrantably expect deliverance by Christ from this wrath, seeing God has raised him from the dead. 4. Therefore, may and ought they to wait and wish, to look and long for his coming from heaven, when deliverance from wrath will be perfected and completed.

CHAP. II.

The design of the apostle in this and the next chapter, is to acquaint the Thessalonians with the sincerity and success of his ministry amongst them ; and put them in remembrance of his meek deportment towards them.

FOR yourselves, brethren, know our entrance in unto you, that it was not in vain.

Observe here, How our apostle did burst and appeal to the Thessalonians themselves, as touching the sincerity and success of his public ministry among them : Ye yourselves know. It is not sufficient to a minister's comfort, that he be well reported of amongst strangers, for his zeal and diligence, for his sincerity and faithfulness, unless he can and dare appeal to the consciences of his own people, and call them to vouch and bear witness to his integrity : Ye yourselves know that our entrance in unto you, was not in vain. Our entrance in unto you ; that is, our first preaching amongst you, was not in vain ; that is, say some, it was not in vain in the matter, we did not preach about vain, useless and unprofitable niceties and speculations ; but our preaching was substantial sound and solid ; It was not vain in the manner, say others ; it was not undertaken rashly, and without a call, nor managed in a slight and vain manner : But the word in vain here, seems to point at these two things : (1.) That it did not want power and energy, but had the demonstration of divine assistance to confirm them in the faith that heard it, and also those that preached it, in expectation of success. (2.) It was not in vain, that is, it did not want fruit, it was not without a great and gracious success ; For the word vain, when it is applied to the message which the ministers of God bring, signifies the not accomplishing the great ends for which it was designed

Isa. lv. 11. The word that goeth out of my mouth, shall not return unto me in vain, but prosper, &c. Hence learn, That where a minister is regularly called to, and faithfully discharges his duty amongst a people, both by public preaching and private instruction, his labours seldom if ever, want fruit, in some degree or measure, either sooner or later, either manifest or secret, either for conversation or edification. We have the promise of Christ's presence with us, Matt. xxviii. 20. And if the fault be not ours, we shall certainly experience it ; both the presence of his power to strengthen us, and the presence of his gracious spirit to succeed us. Possibly we do not see any visible success at present ; but this may comfort us, there is more good done by the ministry of the word, than we are aware of ; and if we reap not the fruit of the seed we sow, they who come after us may ; but if neither they nor we reap fruit, our ministry shall not be in vain, with reference to ourselves ; yet shall we be glorious, though Israel be not gathered. But, oh ! that our people might share in that glory with us, and also shine as the stars, for ever and ever ! God grant we may never be called forth by Christ to give a judicial testimony against any of them at the bar of God, for not believing our report.

2 But even after that we had suffered before, and were shamefully intreated, as ye know, at Philippi we were bold in our God to speak unto you the gospel of God with much contention.

Here St. Paul discovers to the Thessalonians the great difficulties and dangers which he broke through at his first entrance amongst them to preach the gospel ; he acquaints them with the reproach and disgrace he underwent at their neighbouring city, Philippi, and the sufferings there endured for the gospel, which are recorded Acts xvi. 23. But nothing of that nature could discourage him, but that he rather waxed more bold in spirit, resolving to preach the gospel of God, though with much contention and opposition from the unbelieving Jews. Where mark, That the apostle calls his boldness, a boldness in God, because a boldness for God, and from God : It was not barely the fruit of a natural courage, but it was a zealous boldness in the cause of God, and proved a convincing, as well as a courageous boldness ; it is one necessary requisite and qualification in the ministers of God, in order to the rendering their ministry fruitful and successful, that a wise, humble, zealous and convincing boldness be found with them in their delivering the truths of God unto their people : We were bold in our God to speak unto you the gospel of God.

3 For our exhortation was not of deceit, nor of uncleannels, nor in guile ; 4 But as we were allowed of God to be put in trust with the gospel, even so we speak, not as pleasing men, but God, which trieth our hearts.

Here our apostle assigns a subordinate reason why his preaching was so successful amongst the Thessalonians, namely, because it was very sincere : There was both sincerity in the doctrine preached, and also in the preacher of that doctrine. Where note, 1. St. Paul calls his preaching an exhortation; doubtless because a great part of his preaching was, as ours ought to be, applicatory and exhortatory, earnestly and affectionately exerting the hearers to cleave unto the truths, whether doctrinal or practical, delivered to them. 2. How St. Paul removes from himself the opposites of sincerity, some of which point at the sincerity of the doctrine preached by him; it was not of deceit, or of ensnaring and seducing error, not suited to the corrupt opinions and wicked inclinations of men; nor of uncleanness, nothing that he either preached or practised did countenance and encourage men in their filthy lusts, as did the false preaching of the false apostles, and the Gnostics; Nor in guile; this points at the sincerity of his own heart in preaching, his exhortation was not in guile, that is, he did not seek himself, under a pretence of acting for God and his glory, nor propound his own worldly advantage as his ultimate end. Learn hence, It is the duty of Christ's ministers, not only to preach the pure word of God, but to preach it purely, in simplicity of heart, and with a single eye at God's glory, without looking at, or having any regard unto base, sinister ends, or bye respects. Note, 3. That St. Paul, having vindicated his ministry from all suspicion of insincerity, next assures them of his great uprightness in all his ministerial performances, making it his chief design to approve himself unto God, and to be approved of him, not in the least regarding to please men, but only in subordination to God. 4. The arguments or motives including him thus, in much sincerity, to approve himself to God in all his ministerial services; namely (1.) The consideration of that high favour and honourable trust which he had received from God: We were allowed of God, to be put in trust with the gospel: God did fit him for his trust, and then entrusted him with it, and he looked upon both as a favour and honour from God. 2. The consideration of God's omniscency and all-seeing eye, who trieth our hearts. The apostle well knew, that Almighty God was both a witness of his doctrine and conversation, and also privy to his intentions and purposes, his aim and end, as being a God that searcheth the heart; therefore he so preached, not as pleasing men, but God. Learn from both, That nothing doth more effectually constrain the ministers of Christ to the faithful discharge of their whole duty, than the consideration of the honour and weight of that trust which God hath conferred on them, and the remembrance that the eye of an all-seeing and heart-searching God is both upon and within them also: We so speak, being put in trust with the gospel by God, who trieth our hearts.

5 For neither at any time used we flattering words, as ye know, nor a cloke of covetousness; God is witness. 6 Nor of men sought we glory, neither of you, nor yet of others, when we might have been burdensome, as the apostles of Christ.

Still our apostle sees fit to proceed in vouching his own sincerity in preaching the gospel, and disowning flattery, covetousness, and vainglory, to have any influence upon him in the discharge of his ministerial trust. First, He used not flattering words, that is, speeches fitted to gratify the lusts and humours of men, or for gaining their favour, or courting their good opinion. Flattery in any is odious, in a minister it is monstrous; both because spiritual men ought to be most plain-hearted, and also because flattery about spiritual things is most fatal and pernicious, both to the giver and receiver. Secondly, He used not a cloke of covetousness, that is, he had no covetous design in his ministry; his great end, in that administration, was not worldly, or outward advantage to himself; and because a covetous design is secret, and man cannot judge of it, he appeals solemnly to God, that searcheth the heart, as a witness of his freedom from that design: I used no flattering words as ye know, nor a cloke of covetousness; God is witness: As if he had said, "Had I used flattering words, you might witness it; but I could have worn a cloke of covetousness so closely, that you could not have seen it, but God could; he can judge through the darkest cloud, and see through the thickest cloud and covering; but I appeal to him, whether I have put on such a cloke or no." An oath is then lawful to a Christian; he may solemnly appeal to God, and call him to witness the truth of what he speaks, in and upon a just and great occasion; thus St. Paul here, by oath, purges himself from covetousness of spirit. Thirdly, He purges himself from all ostentation and vainglory; he tells them plainly, he did not hunt after applause from others, nor sought so much as due respect in a fitting maintenance from themselves, though herein he assures them he did remit of his right; seeing, as an apostle of Christ, he might have been burdensome, that is, chargeable to them, by exacting maintenance from them. Learn, 1. Though every man may (much more a minister) have a due respect to his own honour and just reputation, yet to hunt after respect and esteem, and to seek it with the full bent of our desires, doth favour of vanity and vainglory. 2. Though the ministers of the gospel have an undoubted right to an honourable maintenance, yet it may be a pious prudence in them, at a particular time, to remit their right; and when they do so, with an eye at the glory of God, and the advantage of the gospel, God will recompense it to them.

7 But we were gentle among you, even as a nurse cherisheth her children: 8 So, being affectionately desirous of you, we were willing to have imparted unto you not the gospel of God only, but also our own souls, because ye were dear unto us.

St. Paul having cleared himself and his ministry, in the foregoing verses, from the charge and imputation of those foul vices of flattery, fraud, and covetousness, which the false teachers were guilty of; he next gives an account of his holy and humble, meek and gentle, courteous and affable behaviour amongst them, performing all duties towards them from a principle of tender love, even such as is found in a nurse to her babe, which makes her stoop to the meanest offices for it: We are gentle among you as a nurse, not an hired nurse, but a mother-nurse, who takes nothing for nursing, who bestows all her time and pains in nursing, who draws forth her breasts, and gives down her milk with pleasure to her nursery, lodging it in her bosom, carrying it in her arms, with all possible demonstration of a tender affection towards it, especially bearing with it in its forwardness and manifold infirmities; intimating to us, with what tenderness of affection a minister should be devoted to his people, bearing with them, and forbearing of them, and exercising all that indulgence towards them, which may mutually endear them to each other. Observe farther, Our apostle having resembled himself in general, to a nurse challenging her children, next instances in particular, wherein he stood ready to express, like a nurse, his indulgent care over them. Thus, 1. As the nursing-mother, if she be but a short time absent from her children, doth most vehemently long to see them, and draws forth her breast towards them with the utmost desire and delight; in like manner, was our now absent apostle most affectionately desirous of seeing and enjoying his beloved Thessalonians. 2. As the nursing mother, when she gets to the child, with unspeakable delight, feeds it with her own blood, concocted and turned into milk; so was the apostle desirous to impart, not the gospel only, but his own soul, that is, his life; implying, how ready he was to seal the gospel with his blood, and to confirm the Thessalonians in the faith of Christ. 3. As the moving, impelling, and impulsive cause of the nurse's indulgent care and indefatigable pains, is pure love, motherly affection, and no hope of gain; so was likewise the case of St. Paul, here towards these Thessalonians: We were willing to impart unto you our own souls, because ye were dear unto us. Learn hence, That there is no stronger love, nor more endeared affection between any relations upon earth, than between those ministers of Christ, and their beloved people, whom they have been instrumental to convert to God.

9 For ye remember, brethren, our labour and travel. For labouring night and day, because we would not be chargeable unto any of you, we preached unto you the gospel of God. 10 Ye are witnesses, and God also, how holily and justly and unblameably we behaved ourselves among you that believe:

Notwithstanding our apostle was free, wholly free, from all shadow and appearance of covetousness in the whole course of his ministry, yet it may seem as if some persons (probably the false apostles) did, though with the highest injustice, charge him with it; accordingly, to clear himself from that imputation, here he tells the Thessalonians, he laboured night and day in the business of his calling; making tents to maintain himself, that so he might not be chargeable or burdensome to any of them; or any ways retard or hinder the success of the gospel amongst them: labouring night and day, that we might not be chargeable unto any of you, we preached unto you the gospel of God freely. Yet observe, This was only a case of necessity; for at other times, and in other places, we find our apostles asserting his own right, and God's appointment, that every one that preacheth the gospel, should live of the gospel, 1 Cor. ix. 14. Next our apostle calls upon them to remember his labour and travel, that is, his pains and diligence in preaching the gospel; the words signify labour unto weariness, and labour after weariness, his painfulness, both in his preaching, and in his secular calling; and from his calling upon the Thessalonians to remember this, he learns us this lesson of instruction, namely, that it is the standing duty of a people to keep in their constant remembrance the great labour and pains which the faithful ministers of Christ do take amongst them, that so they may be duly thankful, both to God and them, and put a just value upon that spiritual good, which at any time, they have experienced and received from them; Remember, brethren, our labour and travel. Observe again, Having asserted his laboriousness in preaching to them, he next puts them in remembrance of his exemplariness in conversation amongst them, how holily, justly and unblameably we behaved ourselves amongst you; that is performing his duty with great integrity and uprightness towards God and man, so that none justly could blame him for neglect amongst them; and for the truth of this, he appeals to God as a judge, and to themselves as witnesses, ye are witnesses, and God also. Learn hence, That it is a great happiness, and unspeakable consolation, both to ministers and people, when the duties of religion, relating to both tables, are performed with such exactness, that they can and dare appeal to one another, as to their holy and unblameable conversation, and to God himself, as to the purity of their aim, and sincerity of intention.

11 As ye know how we exhorted and comforted and charged every one of you, as a father doth his children, 12 That ye would walk worthy of God, who hath called you unto his kingdom and glory.

Observe, That still our apostle appeals to their own consciences for his good behaviour amongst them: Ye know: Happy minister, that has a throne in the consciences of his people, unto which he can and dare, at all times, appeal, for the clearing of his innocency and integrity, in and before the face of the whole world! Observe next, That having compared himself to a nurse before, he resembles himself to a father now, we exhorted you as a father doth his children; as it is the office of a father to direct and instruct, to counsel and exhort his children; so the apostle did exhort, comfort, and charge the Thessalonians, that they may be strictly conscientious in the faithful discharge of their whole duty, both to God and man, and patient under all, and all manner of trials and afflictions whatsoever, which they did, or might meet with, in the way of well-doing. Note, That a mixture of meekness and gentleness, accompanied with authority and gravity, is an excellent composition in the ministers of the gospel: St. Paul having shewn, that, for gentleness, he was a nursing mother, declarereth here, that for authority and gravity, he was an instructing father. Lastly, The great duty which he did direct them in, and exhort them to, namely, to walk worthy of God, who had called them unto his kingdom and glory. Note here, 1. The duty exhorted to, namely, to walk worthy of God: How so? Not with a worthiness of merit, but with a worthiness of meetness, to walk as becomes them who profess the name of God, who bear the image of God, answerable to the high and holy privileges received from God. 2. The reason or argument enforcing the duty, he hath called you to his kingdom and glory, that is, to grace; and by grace here, to glory hereafter; such as are called to the one, are called to both: Grace is a certain pledge and earnest of glory, a low degree of glory; and glory the highest degree of grace; such as walk worthy of God now, shall live with him, ere long, to eternal ages.

13 For this cause also thank we God without ceasing, because, when ye received the word of God which ye heard of us, ye received it not as the word of men, but (as it is in truth) the word of God, which effectually worketh also in you that believe.

14 For ye, brethren, became followers of the churches of God which in Judea are in Christ Jesus: For ye also have suffered like things of your own countrymen, even as they have of the Jews:

Our apostle's great design, in this chapter, being to set forth the wonderful success which the preaching of the gospel had among the Thessalonians, and also to assign the causes of that success, he having, in the former verses, given the reason of this success on his own part, namely, his sincerity in preaching it, and his pious conversation in all things suitable to it; now he comes to shew the reason on their part, with all thankfulness to Almighty God for the same: First, they heard it; secondly, they received it; thirdly they examined it, and found it no fable, but the word of God, and, as such, entertained it with a divine faith; fourthly, the word thus received did work with a mighty power and efficacy in them that believed, that is, was accompanied with miracles, and miraculous operations of the holy Spirit, then to confirm them in the faith of what they did believe; and the word has also now an efficacious energy and divine efficacy accompanying it in the hearts of believers, working upon the will, not in a way of compulsion, but in a way congruous to the nature and liberty of the will, by a divine influx, Tollendo resistentiam, non voluntatis libertatem (as the great St. Austin speaks.) Observe next, St. Paul farther proves the efficacious success which the word had amongst the Thessalonians, from their constancy and patience under the sharpest sufferings for the word's sake; ye have suffered like things of your own countrymen: As if he had said, "You of the Christian church in Thessalonica, have shewn yourselves like to the Christian churches in Judea, in patient suffering persecution from your friends and kinsfolks, from your countrymen and fellow-citizens; as they did from the unbelieving Jews." Note thence, That where the word is efficaciously received, it makes the embracer of it endure the hardest trials and sufferings rather than renounce it. 2. That there neither is, nor can be, any better evidence that the word of God is effectually received, than when it enables Christians to bear afflictions, and undergo persecutions with Christian courage and holy resolution; ye have suffered like things: But of whom? Of your own countrymen at Thessalonica, as the churches in Judea did of the Jews. Learn thence, That such is the fury of a persecuting spirit, that when men are judicially given up of God unto it, they will break all bonds, both natural, civil, and religious; and turn barbarous and savage, like wolves and tigers, towards those of their own flesh, who dare not deny the truth, which they persecute and oppose. Here the churches in Judea and Thessalonica were persecuted alike by their own countrymen.

15 Who both killed the Lord Jesus and their own prophets, and have persecuted us; and they please not God, and are contrary to all men; 16 Forbidding us to speak to the Gentiles that they might be saved, to fill up their sins alway. For the wrath is come upon them to the uttermost.

Our apostles design being to encourage the Thessalonians to patience and constancy under their persecutions for Christianity, he acquaints them, that they did not walk alone in this thorny path, but that Jesus Christ, the prophets and apostles, went before them, and every step they took in it, was up to the knees in blood; they killed the Lord Jesus, &c. Where observe, The bitter and bloody persecution which the Jews were guilty of, they killed the Lord Jesus, and before him their own prophets, called their own, because of their own nation, and sent with a peculiar message to them; and now they persecuted, banished, and drove away St. Paul, and the rest of the apostles; they pleased not God, that is, they highly displeased him, dreadfully provoked him, they were haters of God, hateful to him, now hated of him, and, lastly, rejected by him; contrary to all men, that is, to the common interest of all men, by endeavouring to obstruct the preaching of the gospel, which bringeth salvation to all men; forbidding us to speak to the Gentiles, that is, to preach the gospel to the Gentiles, and consequently obstructing, what in them lay, the salvation almost of all the world; filling up the measure of their sins, till at last the wrath of God came upon them to the utmost, in their judicial obduration, and the final destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans; after which the Jews have been no more a people, but scattered abroad through the face of the earth. From the whole, learn, 1. That it is a singular support to suffering saints, to consider, that Christ and his apostles suffered before them; and by his sufferings, has sanctified a state of affliction and persecution to them. 2. That a spirit of persecution seems oft-times to run in blood, and passes from parent to child, through many generations. Persecution became, as it were, hereditary, and, in a sort, transient from one generation to another among the Jews; they killed Christ, stoned the prophets, and persecuted the apostles. 3. How St. Paul ranks and reckons them that are enemies to the preaching of the gospel, with the obstinate shedders of Christ's blood; they are enrolled amongst the capital enemies of mankind; they killed the Lord of life, forbidding us to preach to the Gentiles; such as are enemies to preaching, are enemies to the souls of men. Object. But what need so much preaching amongst us, who are converted from heathenism to Christianity? Ans. It is one thing to be converted from heathenism to Christianity, and another thing to be converted from sin to God. Object. But we have the Bible for that end, and can make use of that. Ans. Observe it, and you will find, that such as are no friends to the pulpit, are usually none of the best friends to the Bible; follow them to their families, how doth the Bible lie by as a neglected book amongst them; and it must must be a large charity, that can judge it is conscientiously used in the closet, when it is carelessly neglected in the family.

17 But we, brethren, being taken from you for a short time, in presence, not in heart, endeavoured the more abundantly to see your face with great desire. 18 Wherefore we would have come unto you (even I Paul) once and again; but Satan hindered us.

Observe here, That St. Paul having all along, in the chapter before us, compared himself to a tender father, and a nursing mother, for his affectionate love unto, and his solicitous concern for, these Christian converts; he doth in the words before us, declare, that this constrained absence from them, occasioned him no less grief than that of a tender father, when bereft of his beloved children; or that of an indulgent mother, when the child she loves as her own soul, is taken violently from her. We, brethren, being taken from you; the words intimate such a separation as death makes between a father and a child, which rends the parent's heart in sunder, and is like cutting off a limb or member from his body, exquisitely painful; intimating, that the enforced absence of a pastor from his beloved people, though but for a short season, is very afflictive. Ah! how heart rending then is a total and final separation from each other, occasioned either by natural or civil death! 2. St. Paul tells them, that though persecutors had deprived them of his bodily presence, yet not of his heart, for though not in body, yet in mind he was present with them; minister and people, like true lovers, are present with each other in soul, when separated in body. It is a singular comfort to Christians under persecution, that their enemies can neither deprive them of the presence of God, nor the prayers of their faithful ministers; their prayers may meet, when their persons are distant, and they may be present in spirit, in heart and affection, when at the ends of the earth. 3. How he expresses his desire and endeavour, his fervent purpose, and fixed resolution to come unto them, to see their face, to refresh them, and be refreshed by them; I endeavoured abundantly to see your face, but Satan hindered; that is, his instruments, persecutors, lay in wait for him, on the one hand, and caused some dissensions in other churches, which detained him from coming to them; on the other hand, Satan hindered. Learn thence, That such as obstruct the preaching and propagating of the gospel, and persecute the promoters of it, are Satan's instruments and ministers. 2. That such as do Satan's work, it is fit they should bear his name. Thus, Rev. ii. 14. The devil shall cast some of you into prison, that is, his servants: It is fit that master and servant should have both one name.

19 For what is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? are not even ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming? 20 For ye are our glory and joy:

Here in the close of the chapter, St. Paul acquaints the Thessalonians with the true reason why he had such an endearing affection for them, and such a fervent desire to be present with them, they were his hope, his joy, his crown of rejoicing; that is, they were then the cause of his hope, not the ground and foundation of his hope: that Christ alone was; but their conversion by his ministry was, in concurrence with other things, a good ground of hope concerning his own salvation; ye are now my hope, my joy, and crown of rejoicing. Where, note, A very remarkable gradation in the words; he calls them his hope, his joy, and his crown of rejoicing. His hope, that is, the matter of his hope, that they shall be saved; his joy, that is the occasion of his joy, in their conversion by his ministry; and his crown of rejoicing in Christ's presence at his coming, that is, the fruit and success of his ministry amongst them, would add to this crown, and redound to his glory in the day of Christ. Learn hence, 1. That there are degrees of glory in heaven, probably according to the measures and degrees of service we have done for God on earth; there is, no doubt, an equality of glory there, as to the essentials, but not with respect to the accidentals; besides the joy and satisfaction which the ministers of Christ are partakers of, in heaven, in common with other glorified saints, they have an additional joy and glory from the success of their pious and painful labours, which God has crowned with the conversion and edification of many souls. Lord! Who would not study, spend and be spent in the service of such a master? Is it not worth all our labour and sufferings, to appear in the presence of Christ, accompanied with all those souls whom we have instrumentally either brought home, or built up in the most holy faith, either converted, comforted, or confirmed in the way to heaven? To hear one spiritual child say, "Lord, this is the instrument by whom I believed;" another, "This is the minister by whom I was established;" a third, "This is he that quickened me by this example, and provoked me to love, and to good works: O blessed be God, that I ever saw his face, and heard his voice!" But, Lord, what will it be to hear thy blessed voice saying to us, "Well done, good and faithful servants, enter into the joy of me your Lord; I have kept an exact account of all your fervent prayers for your people, of all your instructive and persuasive sermons, of all your sighs and groans poured forth before me, on behalf of those whom ye would have persuaded to be happy, but could not!" Every tear from your eye, and drop of sweat from your face, shall now meet with an eternal recompence; you shall now find me, according to my promise, not unrighteous to forget your work and labour and love." O what a master do the ministers of Christ serve! Who would not sacrifice all that is dear for him, who has the assurance of such an exceeding and eternal weight of glory from him? 2. That the saints of God in heaven will know one another there: Why else doth St. Paul here comfort himself, that these Thessalonians, whom he converted to Christ, would be his crown of rejoicing in the day of Christ? Surely, this must needs suppose and imply his distinct knowledge of them in that day; if he did not know them, how could he rejoice in them? Doubtless we may allow, in that state, all that knowledge which is accumulative and perfective, whatever may heighten our felicity, and increase our satisfaction, as this must needs be allowed to do. Lord, make us faithful to the death, faithful ful to thee, faithful to our own souls, faithful to our people; and then, as they are now our hope and joy, so will they be our crown of rejoicing in the presence of the Lord Jesus at his coming. Amen.

C H A P. III.

WHEREFORE when we could no longer forbear, we thought it good to be left at Athens alone, 2 And sent Timotheus our brother and minister of God, and our fellow-labourer in the gospel of Christ, to establish you, and to comfort you concerning your faith;

At the latter end of the foregoing chapter, St. Paul acquainted the Thessalonians with his desires and intentions, to come once and again unto them, but was always providentially hindered. Now here he gives them to understand, that such was the fervour of his affection towards them, that although he could not come, yet he could not forbear to send to them, though he left himself alone, preferred their necessity before his own conveniency: When we could no longer forbear; that is, "When I could no longer satisfy myself without knowing your state and condition, I chose, though with much inconveniency to myself, rather to be left at Athens alone, in the midst of my afflictions and tribulations, than that you should be longer destitute of one to supply my absence, in order to your confirmation and comfort." See here a special instance of ministerial love and affection in St. Paul, preferring the church's good before his own comfort, and postponing his own conveniency to their necessity; though Timothy's company was very desirable, very necessary and useful for him, yet he denies himself to serve them; We thought it good to be left at Athens alone. Observe, 2. The person sent by him, Timothy, with his deserved character and commendation, a brother, that is, a Christian, a believer, a brother in Christ; a minister of God, that is, a preacher of the gospel; his fellow-labourer, or one that joined heart and hand with him in the preaching of the gospel from place to place. See here, a special instance of St. Paul's apostolical care for the churches of Christ, when he could not visit them in person, he sends to them, not any one he could come at, but the fittest he could get, one who was most likely, through God's assistance and blessing, to carry on the work he was sent about: I sent you Timotheus my brother. 3. The great end for which he was sent unto them; it was to confirm them, and to comfort them; to confirm them in the faith of Christ, and to comfort them under all their sufferings for the death of Christ. The strongest faith needs confirmation and establishment; and it is the ministers duty, in trying times especially, to guard his people's faith upon the stability whereof their strength and safety doth depend.

3 That no man should be moved by these afflictions. For yourselves know that we are appointed thereunto.

As if the apostle had said, "One great end why I have sent Timothy among you, is this, lest either upon the account of your own afflictions, or my sufferings, you should be moved from your steadfastness, either drawn away by fraud or flattery, or driven away by force and terror;" that no man be moved by these afflictions. Observe, also, The argument to confirm them in the faith, amidst all their sufferings and afflictions, and that is drawn from the pleasure and purpose, the ordination and appointment of God, concerning their afflictions; Ye yourselves know that we are thereunto appointed. Learn hence, 1. That the best of saints are subject to be moved by their afflictions. 2. That it is the high commendation of a Christian, not to stir or be moved from his steadfastness by the heaviest shock of affliction that may fall upon him; That no man may be moved by these afflictions. Some render the word appointed, set as a mark to be shot at; some saints, with holy Job, are set on purpose as a mark for the arrow of affliction to be levelled at, yet then are they to keep their ground, and stand immovable; we honour God abundantly, when we are immovable in our active obedience; and we glorify him eminently, when we are immovable in our passive obedience; when we stand to it in the midst of sufferings, and are no more moved either by cowardice or impatience, than a post that is shot at. This is the glory of a Christian, and his great duty, and it is the glory of God, and his certain due. 3. That believers are under a divine appointment from God himself, to undergo trouble and affliction. The ultimate destination of believers, is to rest (God hath not appointed them unto wrath, but to obtain salvation): But the intermediate destination of them is to trouble and affliction, in order unto rest, and to prepare them for that rest. Seeing then that afflictions are appointed to us, and we appointed to them, seeing there is a decree of God concerning them, a decree as to the matter of them, as to the time of them, when they shall commence, how far they shall advance, how long they shall continue, seeing every thing in affliction is under an appointment; how meek and humble, how patient and submissive ought the Christians spirit to be under them? And with what steadiness of expectation may and ought he to look up to heaven for a sanctified use and improvement of them? Let no man be moved by afflictions, &c.

4 For verily when we were with you, we told you before that we should suffer tribulation; even as it came to pass, and ye know.

Our apostle informed the Thessalonians in the foregoing verse, with the purpose and degree of God concerning the afflictions which were before them; in this verse he appeals to themselves, as to his own sincerity, in acquainting them, at their first conversion, that they must, through many tribulations, enter into the kingdom of God, and it came to pass accordingly; when we were with you, says the apostle, we told you, before it came to pass, that we should suffer tribulation, and it shortly after, came to pass as we told you. Learn hence, That it is the duty of the ministers of Christ to give timely warning of, and to acquaint young converts early with, the pleasure of God, to exercise all that belong to him with the cross, with variety of afflictions, trials, and sufferings, before they come, that so they may not stumble, nor be offended at them when they come. The sincerity of our apostle is here very remarkable; when he came first to preach the gospel at Thessalonica, he did not flatter them with the expectation of an earthly paradise of pleasure, but told them plainly that Christianity had a cross attending it, that a suffering hour would come, and they must expect it; when we were with you, we told you that we should suffer tribulation. Learn, 2. That when Christians have had timely notice from the ministers of God, and from the word of God, of approaching trial and troubles, before they come, they ought to fore-arm themselves, and not to faint or sink under them when they come, much less to forsake religion because of them, but to continue stedfast, knowing that the heavier the cross is, the weightier will their crown be; for affliction, there is glory; for light affliction, a weight of glory, and for light affliction, which is but for a moment, a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, 2 Cor. iv. 17.

5 For this cause, when I could no longer forbear, I sent to know your faith, lest by some means the tempter have tempted you, and our labour be in vain. 6. But now when Timotheus came from you unto us, and brought us good tidings of your faith and charity, and that ye have good remembrance of us always, desiring greatly to see us, as we also to see you.

Observe here, 1. One special end why St. Paul sent Timothy to Thessalonica, it was to know their faith, that is, their constancy in the faith; for he had a fear upon him, lest Satan the tempter had taken occasion, from the present persecution they were under, to turn them from Christianity; and that by their yielding to his temptation, and apostatizing from the faith, his labour in the gospel had been in vain amongst them. Here note, That the saints persecutions are called temptations, and ascribed to Satan the tempter, who, by his ministers and instruments, endeavours to hinder the progress of the gospel, and by persecutions, to terrify and turn men from the profession of it. Note farther, that there is an holy jealousy in the minds of the faithful ministers of Christ, who, though they hope the best, are apt to fear the worst, with reference to the poor people, lest they should run in vain, and labour in vain amongst them; for though their labour shall not be in vain, with respect to themselves, their reward is with the Lord (the careful nurse shall be paid, though the child dies at the breast) yet with respect to their people, they may be in vain, yea worse, for a testimony against them, St. Mark, vi. 11. Observe, 2. How happily the apostle's fear was prevented, touching these Thessalonians, by the return of Timothy, and the good tidings which he carried along with him, of the stedfastness of their faith, of the fervency of their charity, of their particular respect to himself, having always remembrance of him in their prayers, and making a respective mention of his ministerial labours, and diligence, and this always when they had occasion to speak of him. And lastly, By their passionate and impatient desire to see him (so much the original word signifies) to which he adds, that his desire was no less ardent to see them, though the providence of God had hitherto hindered him. Learn hence, That the best tidings which can be brought to the ear of a faithful minister of Jesus Christ, is this, That his people are found and stedfast in the faith, maintainers of charity, and promoters of good works, and do account highly of, and honourably esteem the ministers and ambassadors of Jesus Christ: Timothy brought us good tidings of your faith, charity, and kind remembrance of us. Learn farther, From the Thessalonians fervent desire to see St. Paul, and he to see them, that Christian love doth earnestly long to evidence itself in Christian fellowship, and passionately desires the communion of saints, for the mutual comfort and spiritual advantage of each other; the sweetest privilege, next to communion with God, is communion with his saints. O! What a pleasure is it, to behold the beautiful and blessed graces of the holy Spirit of God, sparkling and shining in each other, exciting and quickening one another, acquainting each other with their experiences, and making known to each other their griefs, their doubts and fears! No wonder then that the Thessalonians desired so passionately to see St. Paul, and he as earnestly to see them.

7 Therefore, brethren, we were comforted over you in all our affliction and distress by your faith: 8 For now we live, if ye stand fast in the Lord. 9 For what thanks can we render to God again for you, for all the joy wherewith we joy for your sakes before our God?

In these words, our apostle declares the transcendent joy and overflowing comfort, which was found in his soul, upon the knowledge he had received of the constancy and stedfastness of the faith of these Thessalonians: we were comforted in in our affliction by your faith: Of all comforts which the people of God can afford to the ministers of the gospel, there is none comparable with that which results from the unfainting perseverance in the faith, and the unblameable holiness of their life. No comfort can be greater than our people's gracious demeanour; this put a kind of new life into St. Paul, in the midst of all the sorrows and sufferings, the afflictions and persecutions he underwent. Now ye live, says he, if ye stand fast in the Lord, that is, a life of joy and comfort; or, we live, that is, it will be a mean to prolong our life, as well as add to the comfort of it; and the contrary tends to the shortening of our days. Those that do impair the cheerfulness of their ministers lives, such as deaden their spirits, and break their hearts, by their obstinate non-compliance with the rules of the gospel, are no better than murderers in the account of God. If ministers may, as all other persons do, value their lives by the joy and comfort of them, then may they say, with the great apostle, "We live, as we see any of our people stand fast in the Lord; and we die, as we see others stick fast in their sins." Observe farther, How highly thankful the apostle was to God, and what unspeakable praise he renders to him, for administering to him this occasion of joy, by the constancy and perseverance of the Christians faith at Thessalonica; What thanks can we render to God for you, and for all the joy wherewith we joy for your your sakes? The faithful ministers of Christ think that their hearts can never sufficiently be carried forth in thankfulness to God, for the success of their labour in the lives of their people: What thanks can we render? As if he had said, "I can never be sufficiently thankful, nor I can never fully express my thankfulness to God for this honour, this favour, this benefit, that any one soul should be brought home to God by my ministry, much more that a Christian church should be planted by my endeavours at Thessalonica; and that God should keep them steady and steadfast in shaking times, and support them under such persecutions and trials as would shock an ordinary patience and constancy of mind: O! What thanks can I render to God for this joy?"

10 Night and day praying exceedingly that we might see your face, and might perfect that which is lacking in your faith.

Observe here, How about going St. Paul was in the duty of prayer for the Thessalonians; his prayer was assiduous and constant, night and day; it imports frequency and constancy in performance of the duty. Luke iii. 37. His prayer also was very fervent and affectionate, praying exceedingly, excessively, as the world will bear: Spiritual affections are strong and vehement. Note here, the admirable pattern which St. Paul sets before all the bishops and pastors of the church to the end of the world, namely, to be much, very much in prayer, to abound in this duty. Observe farther, The subject matter of St. Paul's prayer, That he might see their face, and perfect what was yet lacking in their faith. Here note, That St. Paul's short stay among the Thessalonians, when he first planted the gospel, did not permit so full and complete an explication of the matters and mysteries of Christianity, as the apostle did desire; he therefore prays that God would bring him again amongst them, that he might supply what was wanting in their faith, that he might increase their knowledge, confirm their faith, inflame their love, excite their desires, quicken their endeavours, and carry on that good work to perfection in them, of which God had laid the foundation by him. Learn hence, 1. That even in the faith of the most renowned, as well as of the new converted Christians, there is some deficiency and defect. 2. That one great end of the ministry of the word is, to help faith forward towards perfection; that which was the instrument to beget faith, is also the mean of increasing and confirming it, namely, the ordinances of God in general, and the ministry of the word in particular. As faith cometh by hearing, so is it confirmed by hearing also: Longing to see your face, that we might perfect what is lacking in your faith.

11 Now God himself and our Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ, direct our way unto you.

Note here, 1. An implicit acknowledgement that our journeys intended, and visits designed to be given to our friends, are not in our power; but under the direction of God; we cannot visit a friend when we please, but when God will give us leave: we are not in our own disposal, but God's. Accordingly here, St. Paul begs of God to direct his way unto them, that all obstacles and impediments being removed, the providence of God might direct him, as in a right line, unto them, as the original word imports.

2. The persons whom he directs his prayers to, for this mercy, to God and Christ. Where note, That Christ is invoked as well as the Father, he is therefore God as well as the Father; because this invocation of him by all persons prove him omniscient, searching the hearts of men, and all omnipresent, being with his people in all places; and consequently proves our Lord Jesus Christ to be truly and undeniably God.

12 And the Lord make you to increase and abound in love one towards another, and towards all men even as we do towards you:

Still our apostle perseveres in prayer, on the behalf of his beloved Thessalonians; and the particular mercy he prays for, is, their abundant increase in the grace and duty of love, first amongst themselves and their fellow brethren in Christ; all Christians far and near; next towards all men, heathens, and infidels, their bitter and bloody persecutors not excepted. Where note, The true property of Christian love; it is, (1.) A brotherly affection, which every true Christian chiefly bears to all his fellow-members in Christ, for grace sake; and (2.) A gracious propensity of heart, which a Christian bears for God's sake to all mankind, whereby he wills, and to his power procures all good for them. And the Lord make you to increase and abound in love, &c.

13 To the end he may establish your hearts unblameable in holiness before God even our Father at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ with all his saints.

Here a particular and special reason is assigned, why he prayed so fervently for their abounding in love, namely, in order to their establishment in faith and holiness; teaching us, that as true love evidences the co-existence of all graces, so it gives stability and establishment to all graces. Learn hence, 1. That growth in grace is accompanied with stability both in faith and holiness. 2. That a general and abounding charity, being that by which we become most like unto God, tends exceedingly to our establishment in all grace, and renders us unblameable before God, at the appearance of Christ. 3. That there will be no possibility of appearing unblameable before Christ at his coming, without the love and practice of universal holiness in our Christian course. 4. That the perfecting of a saint's graces, and rendering him altogether unblameable, without spot or imperfection in grace and holiness, is reserved until Christ's coming: Then, and not till then, shall our holiness be perfected, our love improved to a seraphim's likeness; all burning; then shall we obey with vigour, praise with cheerfulness delight in God above measure, fear him without torment, trust him without despondency, serve him without lassitude and weariness, without interruption or distraction, and be perfectly like unto him, as well in holiness as in happiness, as well in purity as in immortality.

*Come then Lord, down to me,
Or take me up to thee.*

C H A P. IV.

Our apostle comes now in the remaining part of this epistle, to recommend to the Thessalonians several duties and graces, with which, as with so many jewels of invaluable price, they were to adorn their Christian conversation.

FURTHERMORE then we beseech you, brethren, and exhort you by the Lord Jesus, that as ye have received of us how ye ought to walk, and to please God, so ye would abound more and more.

In these words, we have a general exhortation given to the Thessalonians, That according to the doctrine and injunctions formerly given them for an holy conversation suitable to the gospel, they would make it their care and endeavour to abound more and more in the exercise of piety, and outstrip themselves in doing their duty towards God and one another: We beseech you, brethren, and exhort you by the Lord Jesus, &c. Where note, 1. With what great condescension and earnestness St. Paul applies himself to them; he styles them his brethren, and exhorts and beseeches them. The ministers of Christ must not only be teachers, but beseechers also, meekly and affectionately intreating persons to be kind to themselves, and comply with their present duty. Yet, note, 2. With what authority he backs his intreaty, he beseeches and exhorts by the Lord Jesus, that is, in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by his authority, and for his sake; so that he that despiseth the gentle exhortations of Christ's ministers, despiseth not men, but God; as the authority of a prince is despised, when his messages by his ambassadors are rejected. 3. The general and comprehensive duty which they are exhorted to namely, to walk so as to please God in their daily conversation, to be found in the practice of all the duties and virtues of a good life. Where observe, That St. Paul in the course of his ministry, did not only explain and unfold gospel mysteries, but urge and enforce moral duties: Ye have received of us how ye ought to walk. This must be a minister's care, to acquaint his people, that as the privileges of Christianity are very great, so the duties it requires are strict and exact; and those which we call moral duties, are an integral part of our religion; he that is not a moral man, is no Christian; let us preach and press second-table duties, with arguments drawn from the first, namely, that they be performed in humble obedience to the command of God, and with a single eye at the glory of God, and from an inward principle of love to God, and then we can never preach up morality too much, nor our people practise it too much. Lastly, The apostle exhorts them to abound more and more, that is in grace and holiness; Christians are to be thankful for, but not satisfied with, their present measures of grace received; God allows us liberty to enlarge our desires after an abundance of his grace and happy is it where there is found an holy covetousness going along with the grace of God, as there is an insatiable covetousness going along with the gold and treasure of this world: This, says the apostle here, will please God, when ye abound more and more.

2 For ye know the commandments we gave you by the Lord Jesus.

Here our apostle subjoins a reason, to enforce his foregoing exhortation; what he now required of them, was nothing but what at their first conversion to Christianity he had commanded them, and that in the name, and by the authority of Jesus Christ, to be performed by them; so that they were not his commandments, but Christ's by him, and, as such, to be esteemed of them. Learn hence, That the instructions and rules for an holy life, laid down by the apostles before the churches, are to be looked upon as the commandments of Christ, as being dictated by his Spirit, and delivered by his authority, and as such to be received of them, and obeyed by them.

3 For this is the will of God, even your sanctification, that ye should abstain from fornication; 4 That every one of you should know how to possess his vessel in sanctification and honour: 5 Not in the lust of concupiscence, even as the Gentiles which know not God.

This is the will of God, even your sanctification; that is, this is the will of God, eminently and emphatically revealed in his word, that Christians should be holy and pure, chaste and clean; not indulging themselves in those impure and filthy lusts of the flesh, fornication, and all manner of uncleanness, which the Gentiles, who knew not the true God savingly, were addicted to, and, in a most beastly manner, guilty of; but that every one should know how to possess and make use of his body, and all its members, as the vessel and instrument of the soul, in holiness and honour. Note here, 1. How the apostle descends from general to particular duties: He exhorted the Thessalonians, ver. 1. in the general, to walk so as to please God; here he exhorteth them in particular, to purity and chastity, both of heart and life, and to watch against all the violent eruptions of concupiscence in their earthly members; teaching us, that the ministers of God must not satisfy themselves with giving general exhortations to a good life, but must treat of particular sins and duties, and endeavour to put men upon the practice of the one, and to reclaim them from the other; thus doth our apostle here. 2. The particular duty exhorted to, sanctification; a comprehensive word, and of large extent; in the general, it consists in a conformity of our natures to the nature of God, and of a conformity of our lives to the will of God. In particular, sanctification here stands in opposition to all bodily uncleanness, as the next words do plainly shew, that ye should abstain from fornication, that all filthiness and uncleanness contrary to chastity; intimating to us, that as there are no sins that human nature is more inclined to, than the lusts of the flesh; so there are do sins that a Christian should more guard against, and strive to mortify and subdue, as being contrary to that purity of nature and life which the gospel directs; and the holy Spirit assists, unto. 3. The argument which our apostle here uses to enforce his exhortation to purity and holiness, This is the will of God: it is both the command of God that we should be holy, and the will of God to make us holy; now the signification of God's will ought to be a sufficient inducement to us to desire it, and endeavour after it. This is the will of God, even your sanctification, &c. 4. The remedy prescribed against all bodily uncleanness, and that is, a careful preserving the vessel of the body free from all fleshly pollution, and in that measure of purity and chastity which is suitable to the honour put upon it by God, in being made a temple for the Holy Ghost, That every one should know how to possess his vessel in sanctification and honour. Where observe, The title given to our body, it is called a vessel; it is, first, the Spirit's vessel, he resides in it as in his temple; and accordingly, it seems to be an allusion to the consecrated vessels of the temple, in which a more than ordinary cleanness, and purity was found: Secondly, It is the soul's vessel; it is its vessel or receptacle, in which for a time, it is preserved; and it is the instrument of the soul, by which it acts and performs its office and function. Now, it is every person's, every man and woman's duty, to possess their body, and to be masters of it, not to be possessed by it, or enslaved to it, but to keep it in subjection to, and as the instrument of the soul; the body is God's curious workmanship, it is Christ's precious purchase, it is the soul's receptacle, it is the Holy Ghost's temple: therefore, to be kept holy, pure and clean like the consecrated vessels of the temple. 5. Our apostle exhorts the Thessalonians, not only to abstain from the outward act of uncleanness, but to mortify and subdue the inward lust of concupiscence, ver. 5. or, as the word signifies, the feverish fit, or violent passion of burning desire, which boileth within, through all the members of the body without. There is a divine art in the exercise of chastity, and no small skill required to keep a man's soul and body free from fleshly uncleanness; in order to which, inordinate desires must be resisted, the outward senses guarded, enticing and ensnaring objects avoided, wanton company declined, meat, drink, and sleep, soberly used, our lawful callings diligently followed, the first motions to uncleanness suppressed, prayer to God renewed; and, if these prevail not, marriage, God's special remedy, holily made use of. Thus may Christians possess their vessels in sanctification and honour, not in the lusts of concupiscence.

6 That no man go beyond and defraud his brother in any matter: Because that the Lord is the avenger of all such, as we also have forewarned you and testified. 7 For God hath not called us unto uncleanness, but unto holiness. 8 He therefore that despiseth, despiseth not man, but God, who hath also given unto us his holy Spirit.

Here we have another positive duty pressed upon the Thessalonians, in which a great part of their sanctification or holiness would discover itself, namely, justice and equity in all their dealings, man with man. Thessalonica was a city of great trade and merchandise; therefore, the apostle directs them, in their traffic and commerce, neither by fraud nor force, to over-reach and go beyond one another: And the apostle saying, Let none go beyond or defraud his brother, that is, his fellow Christian, doth not suppose it lawful to defraud such as were not their brethren, but only let them see, that for Christians to defraud and cheat, to over-reach and go beyond one another, would be a very great aggravation of their crime, seeing the laws of their religion, as well as the light of nature, condemns all such injustice and dishonesty; And accordingly, the apostle adds a reason to enforce his exhortation, drawn from the dreadful effect of all such sins; namely, that it exposes and lays open the guilty person to the direful vengeance of God: The Lord is the avenger of all such. Learn hence, 1. That the wisdom of God has variously dispensed the gifts of providence to mankind; to some more, to others less; to some in one kind, in others in another; so that men cannot live without mutual commerce one with another. 2. That there is such a covetous and insatiable desire of wealth in the heart of man, that little regarding the measure of worldly things, which God has dispensed unto him, he lies at catch to take all advantages of his neighbour in matters of commerce, and, by defrauding and over-reaching him, seeks to encrease his own worldly estate with impairing of others: Let no man go beyond his brother: The apostle by forbidding this evil, plainly supposes man to be very prone and ready to fall into it. 3. That the sin of injustice in traffic and commerce, is so very heinous in the sight of God, that such men as are guilty of it, without repentance, must never expect to escape the vengeance of God, either here or hereafter; God is the avenger of all such. Observe next, The reason urged by St. Paul to enforce his foregoing exhortations to purity and justice. The first is taken from the design of God in their vocation; when called out of their heathenish state to Christianity, they were called not to uncleanness, but out of uncleanness to holiness. The second is taken from the heinousness of their sin who shall despise or reject the commands here given for holiness and sanctification: he that despiseth, despiseth not man, but God: To despise the minister of God in a command which he delivers from God, is to despise God himself; the apostle gave these commands by the direction of the holy Spirit, which was given him for that end: Who had also given unto his Spirit: Therefore, says he, he that despiseth, &c. Where note, That although the reason here given, why such as despised the apostle, despised God himself, be peculiar to St. Paul, who had the holy Spirit to guide him infallibly; yet so far as the ordinary ministers of Christ do follow the apostle's steps, and deliver nothing but what is agreeable to the word of God, the contempt of their message is a despising of God himself.

9 But as touching brotherly love, ye need not that I write unto you: For ye yourselves are taught of God to love one another. 10 And indeed ye do it towards all the brethren which are in all Macedonia. But we beseech you, brethren, that ye increase more and more;

Our apostle proceeds from an exhortation to chastity and justice, to press that of love, called here brotherly love, because it has all Christians, all our fellow-members in Christ for its object; and he persuades to the practice of it by a winning insinuation, that he need not say much upon this argument, because they were taught of God, that is, by the gospel of God, and influenced by the Spirit of God, to love one another. And observe we farther, The extensiveness of their love, it was not confined to a party, only to them in Thessalonica, but throughout all Macedonia; however, he desires them to extend it still farther, to abound more and more; that is, first, in the extent of it, Let it reach not only the saints throughout all Macedonia, but even to them at the ends of the earth: Secondly, In the measure of it, to excel even themselves in the degrees of their love. Learn hence, That neither brotherly love, nor any other Christian grace, doth advance to such an height in any saint here, but it is still capable of farther augmentation and increase, both intensively, by advancing to farther measures, and higher degrees of perfection, and extensively, reaching to more objects, who ought to be sharers in our love.

11 And that ye study to be quiet, and to do your own business, and to work with your own hands, as we commanded you;

It is supposed by some, that the charity and bounty of these Thessalonians, mentioned in the foregoing verses, occasioned some persons to be idle and carry tales from house to house, seeking by such flatteries and insinuations to maintain themselves without working; the apostle therefore commands every man to work at some calling, that they neither be a burden to the church, nor give a scandal to the heathen. Study to be quiet, that is, to be of a peaceable spirit and temper; and the original word imports an ambitious study; it ought to be our ambitious desire to live quietly and peaceably with all men; and to live so with some men will require study, and earnest endeavour: If it be possible live peaceably with all men, says St. Paul, Rom. xii. 18. Implying, that there are some men that it is impossible to live peaceably with; and whereas he adds, doing our own business, and working with our own hands; that apostolical injunction requires, that every person be well employed, and found in the way of an honest and industrious diligence, for no man is sent into the world to be idle; and as it is every man's duty, so it is also his privilege, to have a calling; the want of which exposes to innumerable temptations, for the devil finds an idle person always ready to run of his errand.

12 That we may walk honestly towards them that are without, and that ye may have lack of nothing.

Our apostle having exhorted the Thessalonians to industry and diligence in the foregoing verse, he presses it with a double argument in this verse. 1. Hereby they should walk honestly towards them that are without, that is, in a decent and seemly manner in the eyes of unconverted Pagans, who are said to be without, because without the pale of the visible church; and, 2. Because, by God's blessing upon their industry, they would attain to such a competency of the things of this life, as to lack nothing which the wisdom of God saw fit and convenient for them; so that by industrious diligence we please God, we profit ourselves, are serviceable to the public, we silence and stop the mouths of the enemies of religion, and beautify our profession with a becoming conversation.

13 But I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not even as others which have no hope.

Our apostle, from this verse to the end of the chapter, exhorts the Thessalonians to moderate their grief and sorrow for their friends who died in Christ, many of which, no doubt, were martyrs for the truth in those days of persecution: He lays down many consolatory arguments, as so many sovereign antidotes against immoderate sorrow for the death of pious relations; and, first, he acquaints them, that such sorrow as is excessive, would be more like Pagans than Christians, who mourn without hope of any life after this, that is, of a resurrection from the grave, and a state of future immortality. Our apostle doth not forbid sorrow for the dead absolutely, which Christ shewed for Lazarus, and the church for Stephen, but it is excessive sorrow only that is here condemned. Learn hence, 1. That all sorrow for the death of friends is not unlawful, or forbidden to Christians; the Christian religion doth not destroy natural affections, but teaches us to moderate them. 2. That there is a mighty difference between the Christian's sorrow for the dead, and theirs who are strangers to Christianity: The sorrow of the heathen was extravagant and excessive in the measure, foolish, cruel, and impious in the manner; they tore their hair, beat their breasts, cut their flesh, and ran howling up and down in the most desperate manner: But the christian sorrow is sober, moderate, silent, free from ostentation, under the government of reason and religion. 3. That the belief of a future state, and the hope of a joyful resurrection, is the cause of this great difference; it is ignorance of the happiness of glorified saints in heaven, which is the cause of our immoderate sorrow for their death, here on earth.

14 For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him.

St. Paul having, in the foregoing verse, dissuaded from immoderate grief and sorrow for the death of relations, comes now to lay down several considerations or consolatory arguments in order to it. The first word of comfort is this, That our relations over whom we mourn, are but fallen asleep; the grave is a bed, in which the saint is laid to rest, his body rests in a bed of dust, as in a safe and consecrated dormitory, till the morning of the resurrection: And, if the night be long, the morning will be the more joyous. The second comfort is, they sleep in Jesus, that is, in union with Jesus, as members of his body; in the faith of Jesus, that is, in such a belief of the doctrine of Christ, as is accompanied with an holy obedience to the commands of Christ. The third consolatory word is this, God will come, that is, to judgment, and when he cometh, will bring his sleeping saints with him, that is, he will bring their souls from heaven, their bodies from the grave. Body and soul united he shall take up to himself unto the clouds, and and then carry all his saints back with him into heaven. A fourth, is this, our relations are not alone in death; Jesus died; the Captain of our salvation marched before us through the black regions of death and the grave, and has performed the bed of the grave, by his own lying in it. Note here, The apostle says Jesus died, the saints sleep; a believer's death is called a sleep; I do not find that Christ's death is called a sleep, no his was death indeed, death with a curse in it: But the believer's death is turned by Christ into a sweet and silent sleep. Again, Jesus died and rose again, that is a comforting consideration, he was laid, but not lost in the grave; he rose by his own power, he rose as our Head and Representative, and accordingly, all his saints are risen in him, and shall rise after him; because I live, says Christ, you shall live also.

15 For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent them which are asleep.

In this verse St. Paul obviates an objection: Some might say, that the saints found alive at the last day might be sooner happy than the dead saints; no, says the apostle, they that are alive shall not prevent them that sleep, they shall not prevent their rising, nor shall they get the start of them, or get to heaven one moment before them. Learn hence, That the resurrection which the saints that sleep in Jesus shall be made partakers of, shall put them into as full a capacity of the glory of Christ's coming, as if they had remained alive in the body, till that blessed hour: Nay, the dead in Christ shall rise first, that is, the saints who sleep in the grave at Christ's coming, shall be so far from being made less happy or later happy, than the saints who shall be found alive, that they shall be first remembered; Christ's first care will be about his dead saints; they that have slept so long in their bed of dust shall be first awakened, before any thing be done about them that never slept; if there be any privilege, any joy, any triumph, greater than others, such as sleep in Jesus and especially such as have suffered for Jesus, shall be partakers of it at that great day.

16 For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of an archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first:

These words gives us the assurance of the certainty of Christ's second coming, and of the solemn manner of it, and the consequence of it. Observe, 1. The certainty of our Lord's coming; The Lord himself shall descend from heaven; that is, the Lord Jesus, the Mediator; he will not depute an angel, but descend himself, to finish that last part of his mediatorial office. Christ will come personally, for the judgment will be managed visibly; and for the recompence of his abatement, it is requisite that he that was judged by the world, should come and judge the world. Reason says, he may come and judge the world, for he made it; faith says, he must and shall come to judge the world, for he has promised it, John xiv. 2. Let us then keep up our faith, and our faith will keep up our hearts.

2. The awful and solemn manner of our Lord's coming, and that is threefold: (1.) He shall descend with a shout; the original word signifies such a shout is heard among seamen when they descry the haven, and with united voices cry out, "A shore, a shore." (1.) With the voice of an archangel; probable it is, that Christ himself shall give the word of command, both to the quick and dead, to appear before him, and that his command shall be proclaimed by an archangel. (3.) With the trump of God; the angel's proclamation shall be confirmed by the sound of a trumpet, which will be heard far and near, even by those who are in the graves, and in the depth of the sea. Learn hence, That our Lord's second coming at the great day, to judge the quick and the dead, shall be attended with such solemnity, that all the terror, majesty, and dreadful reverence, which has been ever seen upon the earth, shall fall infinitely short of it. Great was the terror on mount Sinai, at the giving of the law, and the disobeyers of his gospel. Observe, 3. The blessed consequence of his coming; namely, the resurrection of his saints: The dead in Christ shall rise first; the saints shall rise with the very same bodies which they laid down in the grave; and they shall rise first, that is, before those who are alive shall be changed: Though it is very probable that there will be no considerable difference of time between the glorification of the raised saints, and those that are alive at Christ's coming, yet it seems evident, that the dead saints shall be raised, and in their bodies be glorified, before them that are alive shall be changed.

17 Then we which are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord.

Observe here, 1. The triumphant ascension both of the living and sleeping saints, together into the clouds; We which are alive shall be caught up together with them into the clouds. This ascension shall be effected by the power of Christ, by the ministry of angels, and by the spirituality of the saints own bodies. Learn hence, That the descent of the saints of God into the grave, is not with so much weakness, ignominy and abatement, as their ascent after the resurrection, to meet their Lord in the air, shall be with power, triumph, and glory; Christ shall draw them clouds shall carry them, angels shall conduct them. Observe, 2. The blessed meeting of all the saints together in one body to take their flight together to meet the Lord Jesus, who comes from the third heaven to meet them in the lower region of the air, when Christ will own them in their persons, own them in their services, own them in their sufferings, and they shall receive their full and final benediction from the mouth of Christ, and take an everlasting possession of the heavenly kingdom, together with Christ. 3. The saints cohabitation and fellowship with Christ, together with its extent and duration, they shall ever be with the Lord; this implies the saints presence with Christ, their their vision and sight of him, their fruition and enjoyment of him, their delectation in him, their conformity to him. Learn hence, That the top and height of the saints blessedness in heaven consists in this, that they shall for ever be there with Christ.

18 Wherefore comfort one another with these words.

That is, draw matter of consolation to yourselves from the foregoing considerations, against the loss of your deceased friends; intimating, that the best and choicest of comforts, for supporting the spirits of men under afflictions: in general, and the loss of dear relations in particular, are drawn from the holy scriptures; comfort one another with these words, that is, with such spiritual words as he had now written.

CHAP. V.

Our apostle having, in the foregoing chapter, treated of Christ's second coming to judgment, in this he makes it his business to put all persons upon the practice and performance of such duties as would prepare and fit them for that solemn time.

BUT of the times and the seasons, brethren, ye have no need that I write unto you. 2 For yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night. 3 For when they shall say, Peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them, as travail upon a woman with child; and they shall not escape.

As if our apostle had said, "Although I have told you that there will be a general resurrection and future judgment, when Christ will certainly come in the clouds, and every eye shall see him, yet I suppose you do not expect that I should write to you of the particular time of his coming; for you have been told, that his coming will be like the coming of a thief, without warning, and without noise, when persons are most secure, least suspecting, and wholly unprovided for it; yea, as the pains of a woman in travail, which are unavoidable; the thief may perhaps not come, but the pains of child-birth must come, and also be painful when they come." Learn hence, 1. That the wisdom of God has thought fit to conceal and keep secret the determinate time of Christ's coming to judgment, and yet there is an itching curiosity in man's nature to search and pry into that profound secret, though the knowledge of it is not only impossible, but would prove unprofitable and hurtful to mankind, making the world secure and careless; whereas, not knowing the hour when our Lord cometh, it should oblige us to be upon our watch every hour. Note then, That our Lord will certainly come at one hour or other, but at what hour he will come cannot certainly be known yet there is no hour when we can promise ourselves that he will not come. Note lastly, That the pain and sorrow, the trouble and horror, which the day of the Lord will bring upon such as are unready and unprepared for it, no tongue can utter, no heart can conceive; the greatest of earthly and bodily torments, and sorrows, such as the pangs of a woman in travail, being but weak shadows and slender representations of it, the day of the Lord cometh as travail upon a woman with child, and they shall not escape.

4 But ye brethren, are not in darkness, that that day should overtake you as a thief. 5 Ye are all the children of light and the children of the day; we are not of the night, nor of darkness.

Note here, The wisdom and holy caution of our apostle in his application to the Thessalonians; he had in the foregoing verses asserted the certainty and suddenness of Christ's coming, namely, to destroy Jerusalem, and to judge the world. Now, lest these Christians should be terrified in their minds, and shaken with apprehensions of fear from that sudden destruction he had mentioned, he casts in a seasonable word of comfort here in the words before us, assuring them that were sincere Christians amongst them, that how sudden soever the coming and appearance of Christ might be, yet it should not find them unready and unprepared for it, because they were not in darkness, but in the light; and were not children of the night, but of the day; that is, they were not now in a state of heathenism, but Christianity; they were not any longer in their gross and natural ignorance of God, as they were before conversion, but they were the children of the light and of the day; living and walking in the light of the gospel, and in all holiness of conversation. Learn hence, that as sincere Christians are freed from the gross darkness of their natural state, from the darkness and ignorance of sin, and do walk in the light of an holy conversation, so their knowledge and practical holiness will be a good security against the terror of surprising afflictions, and particularly against the dread and terror of the day of judgment.

6 Therefore let us not sleep as do others; but let us watch and be sober. 7 For they that sleep, sleep in the night; and they that be drunken, are drunken in the night. 8 But let us who are of the day be sober, putting on the breast-plate of faith and love, and for an helmet the hope of salvation:

The apostle having acquainted the Thessalonians with the privilege of their converted state, that they were the children of the light, having received a light of knowledge, a light of grace and holiness, and a light of joy and comfort from the gospel, he comes next to infer the duties proper and suitable to persons in such a state; First, Negative, Let us not sleep as do others; sleep is not proper for the day, but the night; the sleep here intended, is the sleep of sin, and of sinful security, whereby as the spiritual senses of a man are bound up, so that he is both unapprehensive of his duty, and regardless of his danger. Secondly, Positive, Let us watch and be sober; that is, let us be always ready and prepared for Christ's coming; and that we may be so, let us be sound in the daily exercise of sobriety, at no time overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, and at that day overtake us unawares; the exercise of these two graces, watchfulness and sobriety, do best together, and can hardly be separated one from another; he that is not sober, cannot be watchful; and he that is not watchful, can never be ready, for Christ's coming: Let us therefore (says the apostle) watch and be sober. Observe next, Our apostle subjoins a reason to enforce his exhortation to watchfulness and sobriety, because sleep and drunkenness are works of darkness, performed in the night, and not suitable for the children of the day: They that sleep, sleep in the night; and they that are drunk, are drunken in the night. The old heathens had their Bacchanalia, their drunken feasts in the night; and in the apostles' times drunkenness was so shameful a vice, that men were ashamed to be seen drunken in the day-time: But, Lord, to what an height of impudence is the intemperance of our age arrived, when Christians blush not to do that at mid-day, which heathens were ashamed of at midnight! Observe farther, Another reason suggested why we should be thus sober and watchful, namely, because our life is a spiritual warfare: It is now a time of fighting, therefore not of sleeping, and intemperate eating and drinking; soldiers must be upon their guard and well armed; accordingly St. Paul directs to the two principle pieces of spiritual armour, to guard the most noble and vital parts, namely, the head and the heart; the helmet for the head, the breast-plate for the heart; for these two being the chief fountains of life and sensation, the preserving of them safe, is, in effect, the preserving of the whole man; and accordingly the soldiers that were upon their watch, and kept centinel, never stood without their helmet and breast-plate. In allusion to which, our apostle here directs us, as Christian soldiers, to put on the breast-plate of faith and love, and for an helmet, the hope of salvation, without which we can never be rightly and duly prepared for our spiritual warfare. Note here, Of what admirable use, faith, love and hope; are to a Christian; faith fortifies against destructive temptations, love will preserve from apostasy and revolting, and hope will be of universal use unto us in the exercises of our Christian course; it will be a cordial to comfort us, a spur to quicken us, a staff to support us, a bridle to restrain us, an helmet to defend us: Therefore let us who are of the day be sober, &c.

9 For God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation by our Lord Jesus Christ, 10 Who died for us; that whether we wake or sleep, we should live together with him. 11 Wherefore comfort yourselves together, and edify one another, even as also ye do.

Observe here, 1. A reason enforcing the apostle's exhortation to holiness of life, For or because, God has not appointed us to wrath; but to obtain salvation by Jesus Christ. Note here, 1. What a Christian is not appointed to; he is not appointed to wrath. 2. What he is appointed to, namely, to obtain salvation. 3. The means by whom a Christian doth obtain salvation, and that is by our Lord Jesus Christ. Learn hence, That God's ordination and appointment of us to happiness and salvation, doth not discharge us from care and endeavour after the practice of universal holiness; it is the greatest piece of folly imaginable, from the appointment of the end, to infer the refusal or neglect of the means. Learn, 2. That our Lord Jesus is the person appointed by God the Father, by whom alone all believers shall obtain salvation. 3. That nothing short of the death of Christ was sufficient to purchase salvation for us, we obtain salvation by Jesus Christ, who died for us. 4. That the great end designed by Christ in dying for us, was our living to him, in order to our living with him; a life of grace on earth, is our evidence for a life of glory in heaven; whether we wake or sleep, we should live together with him. Observe lastly, The great and important duty which he exhorts the Thessalonians to perform mutually to each other, and that is, to comfort themselves together with this hope, and to edify and build up one another in faith and holiness; wherefore comfort yourselves together, and edify one another, as also ye do; implying that as it is the duty, so it ought to be the endeavour of Christians to edify one another, both in their graces, and in their comforts.

12 And we beseech you, brethren, to know them which labour among you, and are over you in the Lord, and admonish you; 13 And esteem them very highly in love for their work's sake. And be at peace among yourselves.

In these words we have declared both the minister's office, and the people's duty; the minister's office, with respect unto his people, and the people's duty both towards their ministers, and one towards another. The ministerial office and function is here described, and consists of three parts, publicly to labour, privately to admonish, ministerially to rule. To labour in the word and doctrine, the word signifies a labour unto weariness. Our work is the most weighty work, and, blessed be God, the most worthy work too. Admonition consists of two parts, reproving of sins committed, and exhorting to duties neglected; rightly to do both, requires that the minister be a person of knowledge and understanding, of prudence and discretion, of courage and resolution, of integrity and unblameableness of conversation; to rule not magisterially, much less tyrannically, but in love, and with a spirit of meekness, exerting that power which Christ has given for edification, and not for destruction: Such a power as the shepherd has over the flock, to guide and conduct it; as the head has over the members, to influence and quicken them; as the father of the family has over the household, to take care of it, and provide for it. Observe next, The people's duty to their pastors, or spiritual guides declared; and this is twofold: (1.) They are to know them, and this with a knowledge of observation, and with a knowledge of approbation, and with a knowledge of imitation. (2.) They are highly to esteem them, paying honour to the function, reverence to their persons, and all this in love, and for their work's sake. Observe lastly, the people's duty one towards another, and be at peace among yourselves; such a people can never join hearts in duty that cannot join hands in love; Christian love is a nursing mother to all graces, and tends exceedingly to make the work of the ministry successful; but when strife and dissention, when discord and division prevails either amongst the people themselves, or between minister and people, farewell all expectation of success from the ablest ministry upon earth.

14 Now we exhort you, brethren, warn them that are unruly, comfort the feeble minded, support the weak, be patient to all men.

Here our apostle directs the ministers of Christ how to carry themselves towards their people, namely, that they should admonish those that are unruly, and walk disorderly, that they would comfort the feeble minded, such as are dispirited by, and dejected under their affliction, that they should bear with the weak in faith, and be patient towards all mankind. Note hence, That the church of Christ here on earth, is like an hospital of sickly and infirm persons, labouring under great variety of spiritual diseases, and consequently fit objects of Christ's ministers, to exercise their patience and pains upon; some unruly, some weak, some feeble-minded; every person, every member of the church is a patient, and every patient has his particular distemper, which calls for indefatigable diligence, and invincible patience, from such as are spiritual physicians.

15 See that none render evil for evil unto any man: but ever follow that which is good, both among yourselves and to all men.

Our apostle from this verse closes his epistle with a general exhortation to all Christians to be found in the practice of several necessary and important duties; the first of which is to abstain from all revenge, render to no man evil for evil; a malicious desire of revenge is so far beneath a Christian, that it is the baseness of a man. Let him that does the wrong look to it, could an heathen say; not only revenge in the action, but in the affection, is greatly sinful before God, and deeply penal also; as jealousy is the rage of man, so malice and revenge is the rage of the devil, it is the very soul and spirit of the apostate nature. But ever follow that which is good, &c. By good here, as it stands in opposition to rendering evil, must be understood good will and beneficence, or doing good to enemies, and this the apostle would have us follow, or as the word signifies, pursue with eagerness, as the hunter doth his game, and this continually. Ever follow that which is good without interruption, notwithstanding a multiplicity of injuries; and this not only among themselves, who were Christian professors, but even amongst heathens (with whom they lived) though bitter enemies to Christianity. Learn hence, That a Christian must not turn vindictive and impatient, or incline to any desires or motions towards private revenge, notwithstanding the malicious temper of his adversary continues; but instead of being overcome of evil, must labour to overcome evil with good; render to no man evil for evil, but ever follow that which is good, both among yourselves and to all men.

16 Rejoice evermore.

Observe here, 1. Three very extensive and comprehensive duties, which our apostle exhorts unto, all which have a kind of universality annexed unto them: Now the more comprehensive any duty is, the greater its obligation is, the first duty is to rejoice evermore, that is, to carry ourselves so holily towards God, and so circumspectly and unblamably before men, that we may always have cause for rejoicing, and in the midst of temptations, and in the midst of poverty and affliction, may actually rejoice in the expectation of present advantage by them, and in the hope of the glory of God, as the reward of them. Learn hence, That the children of God ought to make conscience of rejoicing in God at all times, and in all conditions: But is not there a time to mourn, as well as to rejoice? Yes, but it is no where said, mourn evermore; nay, holy mourning has the seed of spiritual joy in it, directly tends to it, and will certainly end in it; mourning is but a temporary, rejoicing is an eternal duty.

17 Pray without ceasing.

Note from the connection, That he that would rejoice evermore, must pray evermore; seldom praying and constant rejoicing will never stand together; according to our constancy in prayer, such will be the constancy of our joy. Note, 2. That frequent and constant prayer to God, is a duty required of all Christians; we are then said to do a thing continually, when we do it seasonably, when we pray at stated times, morning and evening every day, when upon extraordinary occasions we perform the duty in an extraordinary manner, and when we perform it with unfainting perseverance, both frequently and fervently, though we receive no present answer to our prayers; and, in a word, when the heart is always kept in a praying frame, this is to pray continually; and the reason for it is, because we stand in continual need of God, we want him continually, we sin against him continually, we are surrounded with temptations continually, we are exposed to troubles and afflictions continually, and we ought to glorify God continually; and if so, we must pray continually; not that a man should do nothing else but pray; for though we may do nothing without prayer, yet we must do many things besides praying.

18 In every thing give thanks: For this is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning you.

Observe here, 1. The duty required, and that is, Thanksgiving. 2. The extent of the duty, In every thing give thanks, that is, be thankful in every condition, and for every providential dispensation, both prosperous and adverse. Quest. "Should Christians be thankful for afflictions?" Ans. Yes, Because they are fruits of fatherly love, because they conform us unto Christ, because they prevent sin, and purge out sin, because they fit us for glory, and will add to our crown of glory at the great day. Quest. "But should Christians be thankful for sin, or when they fall into sin?" Ans. By no means. Rule, What we must not pray for, we may not give thanks for; we must pray to be kept from sin, therefore may not give thanks when we fall into sin; sin dishonours God, disrobes ourselves, exposes to God's wrath and curse, is the ground of our just detestation, therefore cannot be the ground of thanksgiving; yet when we obtain pardon of sin, or get any good by sin, we may and ought to rejoice at it. Observe, 3. The grounds and reasons of the duty. (1.) It is the will of God, his revealed will; this the law of nature directs to and the light of Scripture calls for; and he that performs it it spiritually, glorifies God abundantly. 2. It is the will of God in Christ Jesus, that is, this part of God's will is especially revealed to you by the doctrine of Christ Jesus, and by the example of Christ Jesus: Christ was both a great pattern and precedent of thankfulness all his life long: He thanked God frequently and fervently, and has made thankfulness a considerable part of our gospel service, Heb. xiii. 15.

19 Quench not the Spirit.

Still observe, 1. The coherence and connexion, he that would rejoice evermore, must pray without ceasing; and he that would rejoice in every thing, must be thankful in every thing; and he that would rejoice, pray, and give thanks continually, must evermore keep the Spirit unquenched; the way to keep one's self warm, is to keep the fire burning; Quench not the Spirit; that is, neither the graces of the Spirit, nor the motions of the Spirit. Note here, 1. That the holy Spirit of God in man is of the nature of fire, as fire it enlighteneth, it enliveneth, it warmeth, it consumeth, it purifieth and refineth, it ascendeth upward. 2. That this holy fire of the Spirit may be quenched; the gifts, graces, motions, and comforts of the holy Spirit are of such a nature, that if they be not cherished, they are quenched; Fire will go out as well by neglecting it, as by casting water upon it. 3. That it must be a Christian's special care, that the graces of God's holy Spirit be not quenched in him, nor any of its motions resisted by him. Sin in general quenches the Spirit, as water quenches fire; particularly, sins committed against knowledge and conscience; inordinate love of the world quenches the Spirit, as earth will extinguish fire as well as water. A cold, customary, formal appearance of holy duties, without the exercise of lively faith and holy love in the performance of them, will grieve and quench the Spirit, especially sensual lusts indulged, and anger, malice, and revenge harboured in the heart; the holy Dove will not rest upon that man, that has the heart of a vulture in his breast and bosom; and let us always remember, if we quench the Spirit in his motions, he is also quenched by us in his offices; he doth us many good offices, in prayer, he is our helper, our assistant, he quickens to the duty, and in the duty, and helps our infirmities, and makes intercession for us in our Christian course; he guides us, comforts us, and bears witness to our integrity in us: All these good offices will he cease to do for us, if he be quenched in us. Quench not the Spirit.

Note here, 1. How close this duty is coupled with the former, Quench not the Spirit; despise not prophesyings; plainly intimating to us, that the Spirit is then dangerously quenched, when prophesying, or the preaching of the word is sinfully neglected. 2. That by prophesying here, is not meant foretelling things to come, but the interpretation and application of the holy scriptures, which we call preaching. 3. That by not despising it, we are to understand, that it is our obliged duty to put an high value and esteem upon it, to attend to it, and have a great regard for it; to honour the public ministry, as an ordinance of God for instruction, conversion, and edification. Learn, That it is not sufficient that we do not slight the ordinance of preaching, nor declaim against it as vain and useless, (as the manner of some is) but we are to have an honourable esteem of it, and evidence that esteem by a due attendance upon it: More is intended by the Holy Ghost than is here expressed; for though he only forbids the sin, he intends the duty or grace in strict opposition to the sin, namely, That Christians ought to be so far from despising, that they ought to be very forward in embracing of the ministry and preaching of the word.

21 Prove all things; hold fast that which is good.

Note here, 1. The persons to whom this advice is given, to the church of the Thessalonians, not to the ministers, but to the people, ver. 12. Know them that labour among you, &c. 2. The advice itself, Prove all things; examine, try, and approve them, with a judgment of private discretion, not of public decision. Learn 1. That it is the duty of all Christians to examine the grounds of their faith and religion, and not to take them upon trust; otherwise their embracing the best religion in the world, is rather the result of chance than of judgment and choice. 2. That although all doctrines and opinions must be tried yet only that which is good must be retained. 3. That nothing is to be held fast but what is first tried: Suppose we hold that which is good, yet if we have not tried and proved it to be good, it is no better to us than that which is evil; to approve before trial is not good, though the thing approved be never so good. Inference, That this is a strong argument for the perspicuity and sufficiency of the holy scriptures, and against the necessity of a living Judge, for he that must try all things must also try the doctrine of this living Judge, and therefore, till he has made this trial, must not admit his doctrine as an article of Christian faith, for these words plainly teach, that what we hold fast, must be first tried: Try all things, and hold fast that which is good.

22 Abstain from all appearance of evil.

This advice genuinely follows upon the former; after we have tried all things, we must hold fast that which is good, and abstain from evil. Where note, The gradation used by our apostle, we must abstain from evil, from all manner of evil, from all appearance of evil. Yet observe, It is not the apostle's meaning that we abstain from all that which appears evil to others, for that would be to destroy our Christian liberty in things indifferent, and create in our minds continual perplexities, there is nothing almost we can do, but may appear evil to some: But St. Paul here enjoins us to abstain from every thing which, after trial, seems evil to ourselves, and is judged by us so to be; yet it is our duty not to give any just occasion of scandal to any, but to live not only sine crimine, but sine labe, not only without fault, but, if possible, without a flaw, that the world may have nothing to spot us withal.

23 And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly: and I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Note here, 1. That our apostle having exhorted the Thessalonians to labour after the highest measures of sanctification, breathes out his soul here in a most affectionate prayer to God, to sanctify them thoroughly and through-out; teaching us, that instruction and supplication should go together; after we have been instant with our people, we must be earnest and instant with God for them.

2. The person whom the apostle directs his prayer for sanctification to, The God of peace: But why doth he not style him the God of grace? Because peace and unity is one very eminent part of that sanctification the apostle had prayed for, and had exhorted them before unto, ver. 13. Be at peace among yourselves. Now this grace being once well rooted, all the other parts of sanctification thrive the better.

3. How thorough and prevailing a work of sanctification the apostle prays for; namely, that God would sanctify them wholly in spirit, soul, and body. By spirit, understand the superior faculties, the understanding, the will and conscience; by soul, the inferior faculties, the passions affections, and sensitive appetite; and by body, the outward man, the tabernacle of the soul. Now the apostle prays, that all these may be sanctified, because they are all defiled. Blessed be God, regenerating grace is as universal a principle as original sin was; it is in the understanding by illumination, in the will by renovation, in all the affections by sanctification, reducing those rebellious powers under the government and dominion of reason and religion. 4. Our apostle doth not only pray for their sanctification, but for their preservation also, that they may be preserved blameless to the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, that is, preserved in a state of grace and holiness unto the end; all the sanctified are preserved, instability is an argument of insincerity, within a while, all possibilities of falling will be removed, in the mean while take heed of falling, by thinking it is impossible to fall; for none are so near falling, as those who are most confident of their own strength and standing.

24 Faithful is he that calleth you, who also will do it.

Here our apostle comforts the Thessalonians with the assurance that God, who had called them to the knowledge of Christianity, would do what he had prayed for, namely, sanctify them wholly and preserve them blameless, and this because God is faithful, that is, always the same, true to his word. God will certainly do his part in and towards the work of sanctification and preservation; but in a way of concurrence with our care and industry; he will do nothing without us, as we can do nothing without him; God's faithfulness is a pledge to us of the performance of all his promises, and will most certainly put him upon the performance of them; but his promise to us always supposes, yea, exacts from us, the use of all means, and particularly the exerting of our own endeavours, in order to our preservation in grace, and perseverance in holiness.

25 Brethren, Pray for us.

Observe, Who it is that begs a prayer, a great apostle, St. Paul himself; and who it is he begs prayer from, the brethren, Christians, and fellow-members of the church at Thessalonica. Those that are most eminent for gifts and graces, are greatly desirous of the saints prayers; particularly the ministers of the gospel, as they stand most in need of, so are they most importunate for this spiritual alms, which they crave as earnestly as ever a beggar did bread at a rich man's gate. See on 2 Thess. iii. 1.

26 Greet all the brethren with an holy kiss.

Our apostle concludes his epistle with salutations to all the brethren and members of the church, without exception, poor and rich, advising them to manifest and testify their affection one to another, by a kiss given to each other, a ceremony of civility much in use in those eastern countries; yet requires, that it should not be a wanton, but an holy kiss; intimating to us, that our civil actions should have a relish and savour of holiness. Hence it is that St. Paul is so careful to give particular directions for the right ordering of our speech and discourse in common conversation, that it be grave and savoury, Col. iv. 6. Of our apparel, that it be such as becomes those that profess the gospel; and here, that our courteous salutations of each other should be chaste and holy, Greet one another with an holy kiss; their kiss of love and peace must truly signify what it makes shew of, that neither treachery, nor cruelty, nor hypocrisy, nor lust, may insinuate itself into such a symbol of holy love.

27 I charge you by the Lord that this epistle be read unto all the holy brethren.

Our apostle having now finished his epistle, gives a strict charge for the perusal of it. In which, note; 1. The duty enjoined, with the matter of it, namely, the reading of this epistle, and, for the same reason, all the rest, which had the like stamp of divine authority upon them. 2. The object or parties to whom this epistle is to be read; to the brethren, To all the brethren. 3. The solemnity of the injunction; I charge you, not I exhort, beseech, or intreat, but charge and enjoin you: nay, the word signifies, I adjure you; it has the force of an oath, and that under a curse: As if he had said, "I oblige you, under the penalty of God's curse, that this epistle be read." Learn hence, 1. That the scriptures ought to be in a known tongue, that they may be read unto, and read by the common people. 2. That to confine the reading of the scriptures to the clergy, and exclude the laity or common people from reading of them, is a very grievous sin, contrary to the intent and design of God in the first penning and composing of them. 3. That it doth in a special manner concern the ministers and spiritual guides, to take particular care that the holy scriptures be publicly read to, and privately read by, all their people; and in order thereunto, to excite parents to read them daily in their families, Duets. vi. 9. and in their closets, Col. iii. 16. And also, it is a great part of the minister's duty, to look after the putting forth the children of poor parents to school, that they may learn to read the scriptures for their instruction and comfort. Lord, what a reproach is it to this Christian nation, that in thousands of families the Bible signifies no more than, a chip! not a soul amongst them able to read a letter in it! This is a lamentation, the Lord put it into the hearts both of ministers and people, to use their utmost endeavours to roll away this reproach from us!

28 The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen.

Thus concludes our apostle his excellent epistle, with his usual valediction or farwel wish, desiring, that though the Thessalonians had been large partakers of the grace and Spirit of Christ, that yet they might receive fresh, farther, and fuller supplies from himself, the fountain of all grace and goodness. From whence note, That so inexhaustible is the fountain of divine grace, and so copious the streams of spiritual blessings flowing from it, that no such measures can be attained, but as more is wanting, more is had, more is provided, more is allowed, more is to be trusted after, and laboured for. Blessed be God for Jesus Christ, that over-flowing, that never-failing fountain of grace and comfort, in whom all fulness dwells, that of his fulness all his members may receive, further receive, grace for grace. Amen.

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL TO THE THESSALONIANS.

The second epistle to the Thessalonians is believed, very probably, to have been written by St. Paul, soon after the first, because the same persons, Silvanus and Timotheus, were still with him when he writ it, as they were at the writing of the first epistle.

Having, in his former epistle, expressed his longing desire to visit them, and finding by the intervention of other affairs, that he was from time to time providentially hindered from coming to them, he sends this second epistle to them, to supply the want of his presence among them. In which, he first congratulates their constancy in the profession of the gospel exhorting them to growth in grace, and perseverance in religion. Next, he rectifies a mistake which they lay under, concerning the coming of Christ to judgment, as if that day were then at hand, when it was very far off. there being a general and grand apostasy to precede it, comforting the Thessalonians against the dread and terror of it. Lastly, He commends divers Christian duties to them, requiring them to admonish and censure such idle persons among them who did not work. but lived upon other men's labours; and so concludes his epistle with particular recommendations of them to the special favour and grace of God.

CHAP. I.

PAUL and Silvanus and Timotheus unto the church of the Thessalonians, in God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ: 2 Grace unto you, and peace from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.

These two verses contain the inscription of this epistle in the very same words with the former, in the foregoing epistle. In which observe, 1. The writer of the epistle, St. Paul, joining himself with his two associates, Silvanus or Silas, and Timotheus or Timothy. 2. To whom it was written, To the church of the Thessalonians, in God the Father, that is, established in the knowledge of God the Father, and in the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ. 3. The usual salutation, Grace and peace, under which are comprehended all spiritual and temporal blessings: And these are set forth as flowing to us, first, from their fountain, God the Father: Secondly, From their means of conveyance, Jesus Christ, as Mediator; intimating, that whatever spiritual grace, or temporal blessing we now receive from God, we have it from him, not haerly as a Creator, but as a Father, as a gracious Father in Christ, in and through whom all kinds of blessings are conveyed to us. Now, 1. From St. Paul's using the very same form of words in this epistle, epistle, which he had made use of in the former, we may observe, That the holy Spirit of God, in inditing of the scriptures did not so much regard variety of words and style, as the purpose intended by these words; and accordingly the ministers of Christ, in the expounding and explaining of the scriptures, should rather study solidity of matter, than variety of expression, or elegance of style: It was none of the apostle's business, (God grant that it may be none of ours) to please the wanton wits, and gratify the luxuriant fancies of men, with a pompous sound of words, but solidity to instruct them in the great and necessary duties of the gospel, and to furnish them with the strongest arguments and motives to a good life. Plain truths, without any art or varnish may be conveyed with more warmth and vigour to the conscience, than all the charms of human eloquence from the most fluent and popular tongue. But though we must come in plainness, yet not in rudeness of speech. Note, 2. From St. Paul's writing this epistle to the Thessalonians, when he was providentially hindered in his purpose of coming to them, and preaching amongst them, we may learn, That as the wisdom of God has appointed several means for the edification of his church, sometimes preaching, at other times writing, so the ministers of Christ are obliged and bound to endeavour the church's edification by all means; when they cannot do it by public preaching, to endeavour it by writing; and when they can by both, their labours from the press and from the pulpit should be jointly employed in the church's service.

3 We are bound to thank God always for you, brethren; as it is meet, because that your faith groweth exceedingly, and the charity of every one of you all towards each other aboundeth: 4 So that we ourselves glory in you in the churches of God, for your patience and faith in all your persecutions and tribulations that ye endure:

Observe here, 1. The holy wisdom and pious prudence of our apostle, who being about to magnify and extol the graces of the Spirit wrought in the Thessalonians, particularly their faith and charity, instead of commending them for these graces, he breaks forth into praises and thanksgivings unto God for them; we thank God that your faith groweth exceedingly, and that the charity of every one of you aboundeth. His business was not to celebrate the praises and commendations of them, but to admire the special grace of God conferred upon them, and conspicuous in them. Learn hence, That as it is our duty, it will be our great wisdom and prudence, so to speak of the graces of God, which we see and observe in others, as that they may not be puffed up with any conceit of their own excellencies, but see matter of praise and thanksgiving due unto God only; and nothing to themselves. Observe, 2. The special and particular graces which St. Paul observed in the Thessalonians, their faith, and their charity, together with the evidence of the sincerity of these graces, namely, that their faith is a growing faith, their love an abounding and over-flowing love: Your faith groweth exceedingly, and your love aboundeth. Learn hence, That as the saving graces of faith and love do admit of degrees, and do not come to their height and perfection all at once; so all other graces do either increase or decrease, grow or fade together with these; the vigour or decay of these cardinal graces have an answerable influence upon all our other graces. But how did St. Paul know that their faith did thus grow? Ans. He knew the increase of their faith by their constancy in sufferings. Observe, 3. Our apostle doth not barely commend these graces of faith and love, which were found in the Thessalonians, but he makes an holy boast of them, he glories in them, and excites other churches to a praiseworthy imitation of them: We glory in you in the churches of God. But for what? Even for your courage and patience under sufferings, persecutions, and tribulations for the sake of Christianity, and for your constancy in the faith of Christ. Learn hence, 1. That persecutions, afflictions, and tribulations, for the sake of Christianity, (when maintained, especially in the power of it) are the common lot of God's faithful children and servants. 2. That it is the highest glory of a Christian to bear afflictions, and undergo persecutions for the sake of the gospel, with an undaunted courage, and an invincible patience. 3. That it is not unlaudable, but sometimes necessary and expedient, for a minister to glory in his people; not in their multitude, not in their riches, not in their greatness, not in their high estimation of his person and abilities, but in the eminent graces of God's holy Spirit in them, and in the great services and sufferings undergone by them.

5 Which is a manifest token of the righteous judgment of God, that ye may be counted worthy of the kingdom of God, for which ye also suffer:

As if he had said, "Which tribulations and persecutions, or, which patience under your present persecutions, is a sign and token, yea, an evidence and manifestation, that God, the righteous Judge, will reward you with a part and share in that kingdom for which you suffer, being in his account, worthy of it; not with a worthiness of merit, but with a worthiness of meetness, they being made meet and fit for heaven hereafter by their patience and constancy under sufferings and persecutions here." Learn hence, That as none can enjoy the kingdom of heaven, by meriting heaven, but by being made meet for heaven; so patience under sufferings and reproaches, under persecutions and sharp trials, is a special qualification to make us meet for the enjoyment of that glorious kingdom.

6 Seeing it is a righteous thing with God to recompence tribulation to them that trouble you:

Our apostle had shewn in the foregoing verse, that their patience under persecution was a manifest evidence of God's intending them a portion in that kingdom, for which they suffered persecution: Now, in this verse he denounces the persecutors doom upon them, namely, That the righteous nature of God did oblige him to recompence tribulation, and to repay trouble to all such as did trouble them, and unkindly persecute them for righteousness sake. Learn thence, That as persecutors generally do continue finally impenitent, so the heaviest stroke of divine vengeance shall fall fall on such, in the day of God's most righteous judgment: It is a righteous thing with God to render tribulation to them that trouble you.

7 And to you, who are troubled, rest with us.—

That is, "As God will certainly punish your persecutors, so he will, ere long, give rest to you his sufferers, together with us who are companions with you in the same sufferings; you that are troubled shall have rest with us, his persecuted apostles, you shall have rest as well as we, and you shall have rest together with us." Blessed be God, that there is a day undoubtedly coming, when all the troubles of his people shall be ended indeed, and all his suffering saints shall be fully and finally rewarded for all their services and sufferings; and this distribution of rewards and punishments, shall be in the presence of the whole world, at the great day, for the glory of Divine Justice. Then all those, who doubt or complain of God's justice, shall awfully admire and adore it: To you that are troubled, rest with us. Where note, 1. That the present time is a time of trouble to the people of God: their time of rest is hereafter. 2. That Almighty God alloweth his troubled saints a liberty to comfort themselves with the expectation and hope, that their troubles shall shortly end, and their everlasting rest begin. 3. That it addeth much to the excellency of that rest which the troubled saints expect, that it shall be enjoyed, not by a few of the most eminent sufferers, but by all of them; All you that are troubled shall rest with us; with us apostles, with all the prophets, and faithful servants of God. Hail, happy day! when all the saints shall sing and rejoice together; when there shall not be one wicked person among them to damp their mirth or to diminish their joy. How desirable is the communion of saints here! How happy do they esteem themselves when they can get together by themselves! But how joyful will the time and place be, when they get to heaven, where none shall corrupt their quiet, nothing shall disturb their rest! God will recompence tribulation, &c.

— When the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, 8 In flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ.

In these words we have an awful description of the day of judgment, and of the process of that solemn day. Where note, 1. The Judge described, The Lord Jesus, he shall be revealed from heaven; since his ascension, the heavens have contained him, and concealed him from our sight and senses; but he shall then visibly appear, and locally descend from the highest heavens, into the region of the air, He shall come in the clouds, and every eye shall see him. Note, 2. His noble attendants, the mighty angels, every one stronger than an host of armed men. As the work Christ comes about, is a great and mighty work, so he shall have instruments strong and mighty, sufficient for that work; yet doth Christ make use of the angels, not for necessity, but for majesty; he can do this work without them. 3. The manner of his coming, In flaming fire, by which the heavens and the earth shall be burnt up, and in which the damned shall be eternally tormented. 4. The end of his coming, To take vengeance on the ignorant, and on the disobedient, on such as know not God, and on them that do know, but obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus. Learn hence, 1. That it greatly tends to the comfort and support of persecuted Christians, that Christ their righteous Judge will come: He shall be revealed, and nobly attended; he shall come as an exalted King, accompanied with a glorious train of mighty angels. 2. That the dread and error of the day of judgment, will be a matter of comfort to the godly, no ways terrifying. Those very flames, which shall set the heavens and the earth in a blaze, and occasion dreadful consternation and fear to the wicked and impenitent world, shall be a comfortable sight to the godly, and the forethoughts of them may, and should yield comfort to them under their present troubles. 3. That ignorance, whether in Pagans or in Christians, doth very much, but disobedience to the gospel, doth very much more, expose persons, and lay them open to the vengeance of the great day; if Christ will render vengeance to them that know him not, much more to them that do know, but obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus.

9 Who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power.

Note here, The tremendous dreadfulfulness of that wrath and vengeance which at the great day will be inflicted on the ignorant and disobedient part of mankind; to denote the greatness of it, it is called destruction, not as if it were an abolishing of their nature, and utter extinction of their being, as the destruction of beasts is; but a loss of their happiness and well-being, as the destruction of the fallen angels was; and so set forth the duration of it, it is called everlasting destruction, a dying life, and a living death; their debt will never be paid, they shall never come out of prison; they will be always satisfying, but never able fully to satisfy Divine Justice. And note farther, As their punishment of sense is here described, so we have their punishment of loss declared: They shall be banished from the presence of the Lord, that is, for ever excluded from the sight of his blessed face, and the enjoyment of his gracious presence; the presence of his favour they shall never find, the presence of his fury they shall ever feel. Lord! how is thy presence here on earth, life, light, and joy to thine own people! How much more will it be so in heaven! But how terrible and dreadful will thy presence be to the wicked at the great day, even everlasting destruction! Lord, where shall the ungodly and sinner appear, when thou appearest! Thy very presence shall punish and torment them, and thy glorious power drive them away to the place of torment prepared for them: They shall be punished with everlasting destruction, &c. that is, destruction shall come forth immediately from the presence and glorious power of Christ upon them, and that without any measure of mitigation; the sentence denounced will be instantly executed, and the sinner that is banished from Christ's presence shall be everlastingly tormented by his power.

10 When he shall come to be glorified in his saints, faints, and to be admired in all them that believe (because our testimony among you was believed) in that day.

The former verses represented to us the great end of Christ's appearance to judgment, with respect to the wicked, it was for punishment, they shall be punished with everlasting destruction. &c. Now here we have assigned the gracious design of Christ's coming with relation to the godly; he shall come to be glorified in his faints. Where note, 1. The character of Christ's saved ones, they are faints, all such, and only such; not by visible profession barely, but by inward sanctification, and holiness of conversation also: And called also believers, who are endued with the grace of saving faith. 2. The end of Christ's coming, with reference to his own children. (1.) To be glorified in his faints; mark, not to be glorified by them, but to be glorified in them; the Head will not only be glorious in himself, but glorified in his members: The glory God gave the Son, he hath given the faints, and will put such a glory upon them in soul and body, as he himself shall be thereby glorified. (2.) Admired in all them that believe, that is, he will do such things for believers, as will be to their own and others admiration; things that will not only exceed their unbelief, but their faith too. Plainly thus, the Lord Jesus, at the great day, will put such glory upon believers, as never was expected, either by themselves or others, and consequently shall be admired, greatly admired, eternally admired by all beholders. But, Lord, if the glory put upon thy faints shall be thus admired, how much more shall thyself be admired, the bestower of that rich and transcendent glory? The glory of thy justice in the damnation of the wicked will be admired, but not comparably with the glory of thy mercy in the salvation of believers. Oh! how will this strike the adoring angels into an ecstasy of holy admiration, and transport thy admiring faints into an eternal rapture, when thou shalt come to be glorified in thy faints, &c.

11 Wherefore also we pray always for you, that our God would count you worthy of this calling, and fulfil all the good pleasure of his goodness, and the work of faith with power:

In these words, St. Paul assures the Thessalonians, that although he could not come to them, that yet he prayed fervently for them; we pray always for you: the faithful ministers of Christ can as soon forget themselves as their people in their prayers to God. Note next, What he prayed for, on their behalf. 1. That God would count them worthy, that is, fit and meet for their calling; that is, for the fore-mentioned glory which they were called to the expectation of, for they were already called; and therefore calling, here, must denote that unto which they were called, even the kingdom of glory. 2. That in order to this, God would fulfil, fully perform and accomplish his whole purpose, here called his pleasure, and the pleasure of his goodness, to shew that nothing but his own goodness was the cause of his own purpose. 3. He prays that God, by his own power, would strengthen the work of faith in them; and the work of faith with power. Where note, 1. That we are not only saved by God's good pleasure, but by faith. 2. That there is no saving faith, but is a working faith. 3. That faith is wrought by a wonderful power, which doth produce wonderful effects.

12 That the name of our Lord Jesus Christ may be glorified in you, and ye in him, according to the grace of our God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Our apostle declared, at ver. 10, how Christ should be glorified in his faints hereafter; now he prays that the name of Christ may be glorified in them here. Where note, That sanctifying grace maketh Christians a glory to the name of Christ, not by adding any glory to him, which before he had not, but by setting forth that glory which he already hath. Note also, That as the name of Christ is glorified in the faints now, so they shall be glorified in him, then, and glorified with him and by him. The same glory, for kind, shall be put upon the head and members: Grace is the only way to glory, and glory will be the certain reward of grace.

CHAP. II.

The former chapter was spent in a kind of consolation against trouble, this in a caution against errors, or to rectify their judgments concerning the time of Christ's second coming.

NOW we beseech you, brethren, by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and by our gathering together unto him.

As if the apostle had said, "Brethren, we beseech you, as you assuredly expect the coming of Christ, and do love, look, and long for that day when it shall go well with you, and Christ will appear to your glory, that you be not troubled, &c. Learn hence, That the coming of Christ to judgment is a truth well known, firmly believed, and earnestly desired by all true Christians; well known, because the apostles, when they went abroad to proselyte the world, usufally began with this point; firmly believed, for a day of judgment was never denied by any, but those whose interest it was that there should be none; and earnestly desired, in respect of Christ our Judge and Saviour, and in respect of ourselves, who shall be sharers in the happiness of that day. Observe, 1. The apostle calls the coming of Christ a gathering together unto him; intimating, that when Christ shall come all the faints shall be gathered together unto him; at the day of judgment there shall be both a congregation and a segregation; a congregation of all believers; to make up the number of Christ's train and attendants, and that in one troop they may be brought into his heavenly kingdom; and a segregation, he shall separate the sheep from among the goats, and sever the wicked from among the just. Matt. xiii. 44.

2 That ye be not soon shaken in mind, or be troubled, neither by spirit, nor by word, nor by letter; as from us, as that the day of Christ is at hand.

Note here, 1. The error which the apostle disproves, namely, that the day of Christ, that is, the day of judgment, ment, was then at hand, to come in a few years, which was very true with respect to his coming to destroy Jerusalem, but not as to the final judgment. Learn hence, That the time of Christ's coming to judgment must be patiently expected, but not positively determined. Note, 2. The effect which this error might produce, namely, trouble and unsettledness of mind; That ye be not soon shaken in mind, or troubled; implying, 1. That errors breed trouble and disquietude of mind. 2. That Christians should be so established, and have such a constancy of mind, that they should not be easily shaken and moved from the faith. Note, 3. A removal of all the supposed foundations of this error; or the means which these impostors used to entice the Thessalonians to embrace it; and they are three; namely, spirit, word, and letter; not by spirit, that is, be nor shaken in mind by any pretence of spiritual or divine revelation; nor by word, by any pretended message or word from us; nor by letter, that is, not by any thing contained in our former epistle, nor in any spurious or counterfeit writings, passing under the apostle's name, mentioning as if Christ should come in that age wherein they lived. We need not wonder That St. Paul is so careful to obviate this error of the present coming and appearance of Christ, because, should the Thessalonians have depended upon it, and found themselves deceived in their expectation of it, it might have caused great trouble to them, and even shaken their steadfastness in the faith.

3 Let no man deceive you by any means: For that day shall not come except there come a falling away first, and that man of sin be revealed, the son of perdition:

As if the apostle had said, "Let no man deceive you in this article of your faith, by any pretence whatsoever; for before Christ's coming, there shall come a great falling away from the catholic faith; and by that means the man of sin will be revealed, who is the son of perdition." Note here, 1. Such a proneness there is in the nature and mind of man to embrace and entertain error, when once vented, that there is need of repeated dissuaves from it, and to guard persons against the poison and insatiation of it; Let no man deceive you by any means. 2. A general apostasy or defection of the visible church from the faith of Christianity, must be before Christ's coming to judgment; Except there come a falling away first; it is foretold as a thing that would certainly come to pass. 3. The revelation of antichrist declared, That man of sin shall be revealed the son of perdition; where, by the man of sin understand not a particular or individual person, but a society and succession of men, such as is found in and amongst the Papacy, where the sodomy, blasphemy, incest, adulteries, sorceries, murders, treasons, which are not only committed, but countenanced, not acted, but authorized, do most evidently declare that there never was such an apostasy from Christianity since it had a being in the world, as is found amongst them. 4. This man of sin is also titled the son of perdition. 5. Actively, a destroying son, one that brings others to destruction. 2. Passively, a son that shall be destroyed; antichrist and all his adherents shall be destroyed, utterly def-stroyed by Jesus Christ, and his kingdom shall perish without hope of recovery; first destroying, and at last destroyed. Where note, That our apostle, at the first, the very first mentioning antichrist, doth declare his destiny; at his first rising he declares his fall and ruin.

4 Who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; so that he as God, sitteth in the temple of God, shewing himself that he is God.

Our apostle proceeds in the farther description of this man of sin, by a twofold note of distinction, namely, by his enmity and opposition, and by his dignity and exaltation. Observe, 1. His enmity and opposition; He opposeth himself, that is, against Christ, as his name, Antichrist, signifies; opposing him in his doctrine, in his offices, in his members, corrupting his doctrine, debasing his offices, persecuting his members. 2. His dignity and exaltation, which consist of two parts, 1. He exalteth himself above all that is called God, or is worshipped: that is, he exalteth himself above all magistrates, emperors, kings and princes, who are called gods, because representing his person, as his vicegerents, usurping a power over all civil authority, intruding and dethroning princes at his pleasure. 2. His arrogance is set forth in relation to God himself, that as God, he sitteth in the temple of God, shewing himself that he is God. By the temple of God, understand the church of God, the external visible church, which professeth the faith of Christ, and bears his name; in this temple of God he sitteth as an officer or bishop; and sits as God, that is, as a god upon earth; whom all must adore; kings kissing his feet, emperors holding his thrup, and claiming the same power that Christ hath in and over the church, namely, an universal supremacy, an absolute authority, and an unerring infallibility. And the usurped titles given to him, declare, that he sheweth himself that he is a God, he is called; supremum numen in terris; "The chief god upon earth;" and that from him it is affirmed, that no appeals are to be made; no, not to God himself; that he can change the sacraments delivered by Christ, and decree contrary to scripture. Now to accept of these flattering titles, and to pretend to such an unlimited power, is to shew himself that he is God.

5 Remember ye not, that when I was with you, I told you these things?

Observe here, That the doctrine of the rise and ruin of antichrist is necessary to be made known; for though these things were not to come to pass in their days, yet St. Paul taught them before when present, and now repeateth it again when absent, to fasten it upon their mind and memories; it is necessary to deliver this doctrine, both to warn the faithful against delusion, and fortify the faithful against persecution, to keep them patient under it; for when antichrist is discovered. Christians under his tyranny submit to suffering more cheerfully; suffering under antichristian persecutions is martyrdom, and suffering for Christ, as well as under Pagan persecutors.

6 And now ye know whas with-holdeth, that he might be revealed in his time.

Observe here, 1. How our apostle intimates to the Thessalonians, that antichrist was not then revealed, and consequently that they were not then to expect the coming of Christ to judgment; 2. The impediment that then hindered his revelation; Now ye know what with-holdeth; by which the Roman empire is generally understood; the man of sin could not rise to his greatness, so long as the Roman empire stood in its grandeur; for this seat could not be filled with two imperial powers at once: Whilst the Roman emperor possessed Rome, the seat was full, and till it was void it could not be the seat of antichrist. But why did not the apostle name it then? Ans. That he might not incense the Roman emperors against the Christians, as he must have done had he openly said, "Antichrist shall not come till the Roman empire is destroyed;" he therefore covertly says, Ye know what with-holdeth that he might be revealed in his time.

7 For the mystery of iniquity doth already work: only he who now letteth will let until he be taken out of the way.

That is, The beginnings of antichristianity are secretly and mysteriously already working, which will bring antichrist himself forth in time, even antichristian doctrines, and the affecting of antichristian dominion; only the empire that now hindereth must be removed and taken out of the way. Note here, So great an enemy is Satan to the salvation of mankind, that no sooner did Christ erect a kingdom in the world for saving sinners, but the devil set up his enigma in opposition thereunto. Antichristianism is almost as old as Christianity; the mystery of iniquity soon appeared after the revelation of the mystery of godliness; though truth be errors elder, yet error is not much truth's younger; The mystery of iniquity doth already work. And from these words, He that letteth will let till taken out of the way. Learn, That the greatest empire and monarchies upon earth have their final and fatal periods determined by God, beyond which they shall not stand; the Roman empire that letteth, shall be taken out of the way.

8 And then shall that Wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the Spirit of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming.

These words contain both the rise and ruin of antichrist, his revelation and destruction. Obs. 1. The title given to him, in the Greek, The lawless one, he that boasts himself to be above all law, and assumes to himself a power to dispense with all the laws of God, as we well know who does. Ob. 2. His revelation, Then shall that wicked be revealed. God has revealed antichrist to the world, let none wilfully shut their eyes against him, but let him be shunned and abhorred; if his adherents will not fall from him, but be partakers with him in his sins, let them expect to be partakers also with him in his plagues; to continue his adherents is dangerous, but to turn his disciples is more dangerous; for that is a downright apostasy, and flat revolt from

Christ to antichrist. How almighty God may dispense mercifully with errors imbibed in our education, we know not, but to turn our back on the truth wherein we have been educated, and instructed, makes it more dangerous to our salvation. Observe 3. Antichrist's ruin, whom the Lord shall consume and destroy. Here note, That the apostle had no sooner discovered antichrist's rise, but he presently declares his ruin; the Lord shall destroy him; that is, the Lord Jesus Christ shall destroy him gradually, he shall waste away by little and little; as his rise was, such shall his ruin be; destroyed and consumed he shall be, but not presently, because God has an use for him, work to do for him, to scourge his people, to try his people, to unite his people. Observe, 4. How antichrist's ruin is accomplished; 1. With the spirit of his mouth, or the breath of his mouth: The expression denotes, 1. the facility and easiness of his destruction; it is done with a breath, the breath of God will leave him breathless; as he hath stood by the flattering breath of men, so shall he fall by the consuming breath of God. The breath of God here denotes the preaching of the gospel, and intimates, that antichrist's destruction shall be by the ministry of the word, and the victorious evidence of truth; but besides this ministerial word, there will be a providential word, which God will make use of for antichrist's destruction: The former means we are to use, the latter God is to make use of. Again, 2: The destruction of antichrist shall be by the brightness of Christ's coming; at Christ's coming to judgment the final ruin and utter destruction of antichrist shall be accomplished; let not the church then be discouraged, though antichrist remains; after all endeavours used for his ruin, it is sufficient we are assured that antichristianism shall be finally destroyed; for the time, leave we that to God; if it be not till the day of judgment, or Christ's final conquest over all his adversaries, why should not we be contented to tarry for it, seeing infinite wisdom determines the time, as well as the thing itself? Then shall that Wicked be revealed, &c.

9 Even him whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all power, and signs, and lying wonders.

An account is here given how antichrist doth acquire and keep up his power in the world: The first and great instrument is Satan; after the working of Satan, is as much as, by the working of Satan, denoting not only his pattern, but his influence. The devil has a great hand over wicked men in the world, his way of dealing with them is most efficacious and powerful, he is certainly the first founder and main supporter of the antichristian state. Ob. The subordinate instrumental means, by which antichrist gained his power in the world; namely, by pretended miracles; with all power, and signs, and lying wonders; miracles are called powers, because the effects of extraordinary powers; signs, from their use, because they sealed their doctrine to which they are applied; wonders, because they breed astonishment in the minds of beholders: Now antichrist pretends to all these, but his are lying powers, lying signs, and lying wonders; because the greatest of his pretended miracles are fables, forgeries, impostures, diabolical delusions. Learn hence, That antichrist doth uphold and support his kingdom kingdom by a false shew of signs, wonders, and mighty deeds; they are mira, but not miracula; what he cannot prove by the oracles of God, he endeavours to prove by the miracles of Satan.

10 And with all deceiveableness of unrighteousness in them that perish; because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved.

Here we have a threefold description given of the subjects of antichrist's kingdom; they are described, 1. By the ways and means how they are drawn into this apostasy and defection, and that is, with all deceiveableness and unrighteousness; where, by unrighteousness, understand his false doctrine and wicked laws, which tend to the making of his disciples and followers injurious to God, unjust to men, and cruel to themselves; and by deceiveableness is meant all manner of deceits and wiles, tricks and cunning persuasions, to make the world believe his unrighteous errors to be pure and innocent truths. Learn, That such as are ring-leaders to error, are men of no conscience, but find out all unrighteous ways and means to make their tenets plausible, and pass for truth; they come with all deceiveableness and unrighteousness. Again, 2. They are described by their doom and misery which doth await them, they are such as perish; that is, such as are in an actual state of perdition, and without hastening out of it, are undone forever. Learn hence, That the subjects of antichrist's power and seduction are those that perish. And, 3. They are described by their sin, which is the cause and reason of this doom; because they received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved. Where mark, It is not enough to receive the truth in the light of it, but we must also receive it in the love of it, or it will do us no good; to make truth operative, there is required, besides knowledge, faith and love; there may be knowledge, without faith, and there may be faith without love, that is, without any affection to the truth believed; it was therefore a pious prayer of St. Austin, Fac me, domine, &c. "Lord make me taste that by love, which I taste by knowledge." As the certainty of truth calls for faith, so the amiableness, of truth calls for love; If truth be not received into the heart as well as the head, it will not secure against apostasy, nor prevent perishing.

11 And for this cause, God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie: 12 That they all might be damned, who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness.

The sin of those who are seduced by antichrist was mentioned in the foregoing verse; the judgment of such is here declared in these verses, which is twofold, delusion in this world, and damnation in the next. (1.) Delusion in this world. Here note, 1. The author of this judgment, God shall send them strong delusions; as it is a sin, God has no hand in it, but as it is a punishment, God has to do in it; there is a judicial tradition or delivering them up to a spirit of error, who do not receive the truth in the love of it, and this without the least shadow of unrighteousness, punishing sin with sin. 2. The degree or nature of the punishment, delusions, strong delusions; given up to the efficacy of error, which is discovered by the absurdity of those errors which they cleave unto, and; by the obstinate wherewith they cleave unto them. Learn hence, 1. That strong delusions may be, and sometimes are, of God's own sending. 2. That by God's just judgment there is an insatiation upon the followers and abettors of antichrist, that they swallow the grossest errors, and believe the strongest delusions to their own destruction. Note, 3. The issue and result of this punishment, that they should believe a lie: False doctrines are often called a lie in scripture; All the doctrine of the man of sin, with which he hath deceived the world, under the notion of truth, is one great lie: but besides this he approves and applauds the doctrine of equivocation, and teaches that in many cases it is necessary, and in some very lawful to lie: These they call pious frauds, but they are indeed diabolical forgeries. 4. Their dreadful punishment in the other world, That they might be damned, &c. Where mark, The punishment itself, damnation, for filling up the measure of their obduration, together with the justice and equity of it; expressed negatively, they believed not the truth, received it not with simplicity of mind, to be instructed and directed by it; positively, they had pleasure in unrighteousness, in unrighteous doctrines and practices. Learn hence, 1. That errors in judgment, as well as sins in practice, may bring damnation upon the souls of men. Error is as damnable as vice, for it is as contrary to the law of God as vice is. 2. That though all errors may bring damnation upon the men's souls, yet some may be said more especially than others to be damning errors, such are the errors of antichrist, the man of sin. O! How dangerous then is it to be found amongst his followers? To be sharers with them in their sins, will render us partakers of their plagues.

13 But we are bound to give thanks alway to God for you, brethren, beloved of the Lord, because God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation through sanctification of the spirit, and belief of the truth.

Our apostle having, in the foregoing verses, set forth a fatal apostacy from the sincerity of the Christian faith and worship, here in this verse exempts the Thessalonians from the number of those that were endangered by it; and this he makes mention of to their great comfort, and with thanksgivings to God; We are bound to give thanks, &c. Observe here, 1. The titles given to the Thessalonians by our apostle, brethren, and beloved of the Lord; not beloved of the apostle only but of the Lord also, both with an antecedent love, bestowing grace upon them, and with a consequent love, believing in his name, and suffering for his sake. 2. His obligation to bless God on their behalf, he gave thanks; this shewed his esteem of the blessing, he gave thanks always, which shewed how deeply he was affected with the blessing, and he owns it is a debt which was due them; we are bound to give thanks, &c. 3. The matter of his thanksgiving, or the mercy which he was thankful for, and that was their election to salvation; We are bound to give thanks, because God hath chosen you. Whence learn, That God's election, election either of ourselves or others to salvation, is, and ought to be great matter of thanksgiving unto God. 4. Their election is amplified, 1. By the antiquity of it from the beginning, that is, from all eternity, John i. In the beginning was the word, that is, before the beginning, before God began to create any thing the word was. 2. From the means of its accomplishment; and they are two, one on God's part, the sanctification of the Spirit; the other on their part, the belief of the truth. Where note, That election is to the means as well as to the end; and without the means, can the end never be attained: He that hath chosen us to salvation, hath chosen us to be holy, and to believe the truth, in order to salvation. 2. That sanctification and holiness is not the cause of our election, but the effect and fruit of it. 3. That sanctification being the fruit it is also the evidence of our election; Sic se aperit decretum thus the decree of God is made evident to us, the election of God is a secret in the bosom of God, it is only manifested to us by the effects, which are a sanctification by the Spirit, and a sound belief of the doctrine of the gospel: Where mark, a bare belief of the doctrine of the gospel saves none, unless accompanied with the sanctification of the Spirit. Note, 4. The necessary connexion between the sanctification of the Spirit, and the belief of the truth, even as between the cause and the effect, and they do also accompany one another; the gospel was a supernatural doctrine and it was fit that it should be accompanied with a supernatural operation, how else should it be known to be of God? The gospel and the Spirit are inseparable companions; where the gospel is little known, there is little of the Spirit found.

14 Whereunto he called you by our gospel, to the obtaining of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ.

The apostle comforted the Thessalonians in the former verse from their election in this from their vocation; whereunto that is, to which salvation, sanctification, and belief of the gospel God hath called you, by our preaching of the word, to the obtaining of the glory purchased, and conferred by our Lord Jesus Christ. Note here, 1. The author of the Thessalonians vocation, God the Father, he calleth you that is, God, who from the beginning chose you for salvation, None but God, (1.) Hath authority to call; he only is our proper Lord and rightful Sovereign, our Creator, and our Owner; therefore he has a right to call us to duty, and to require duty from us, Jam. iv. 12 There is one lawgiver who is able to save and to destroy. None but God, (2.) Hath power to call; for to effectual calling there is required not only the invitation of the word, but also the effectual operation of the Spirit; it is a work of divine power to give grace to graceless souls. Note, 2. The means, that is, the eternal and outward means, by which they were called; by our gospel, that is, by our preaching of the gospel to you. The ministry of the word is the great instrument in the hand of the Spirit for a sinner's effectual vocation, and bringing home to God. But why doth our apostle call it our gospel? Doth not that derogate from the authority of it, to appropriate it to any man? No: He calls it not his gospel by way of revelation, but in regard of dispensation only; and his gospel imported the great pains which he took in preaching of the gospel, and the hazard he ran in dispensing of the gospel to them. It is also a word of esteem, love and affection, what we love we call ours. Note, 3. The end of this calling, which is twofold. 1. Ultimate, to obtain the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ; that is, the glory of heaven, and of the whole man, whole-soul and body in heaven, called the glory of Christ, because purchased by him, promised by him, prayed for by him, conferred by him, and enjoyed eternally with him. 2. Subordinate, they are called to faith and holiness, in order to salvation; for there must be a likeness between the person calling, and the persons called; without likeness to him we can never love him; and without loving of him, must never expect to live with him. From the whole, learn, That such as are elected and chosen of God, are in time effectually called by faith and holiness to obtain eternal glory and happiness.

Our apostle having abundantly comforted the Thessalonians in the former verses from their election and vocation, he closes the chapter with an exhortation to them to perseverance and constancy in the truth; Therefore, brethren, stand fast. Observe, 1. The illative particle, therefore, that is, because God hath chosen and called you, and given you such assurance of his favour, and such advantages against error and seduction, therefore, let it be your care to persevere; assurance of salvation doth not encourage negligence, but engage to greater diligence. Observe, 2. The duty inferred, Stand fast: it is a military word, used by captains to their soldiers, to prevent a cowardly and treacherous revolt; he had been describing a great apostasy that would come, now bids them to be upon their guard and stand fast. Observe, 3. The means directed to, in order to their steadfastness and perseverance, namely, to hold the traditions which they had been taught, either by word or by epistle. Here Note, 1. The act, Hold with a strong hand, hold against all assaults, whether of error or persecution. 2. The object. The traditions taught, either by word, or by epistle. Where mark, That all the apostle's doctrine, whether preached when amongst them, or written to them in his absence from them, he calls traditions; so that holding the traditions here, is nothing else but perseverance in apostolical doctrine. From the whole, Note, 1. That what assurance soever we have of God's preserving us in the truth, yet we are bound to use all possible care and caution, in order to our own preservation. Note, 2. That it is our duty to stand fast in the faith of Christ, and profession of godliness, whatsoever dangers or temptations we may be exposed to. Note, 3. That the doctrine of Christianity taught by the apostles, is a tradition, and that holding this tradition, is the best means for standing fast in the faith of Christ. Note, 4. That whilst the apostles were in being, there were two ways of delivering the truth, namely, by word of mouth and writing, Whether by word or our epistle. Note, 5. That now, when they are long since dead, and we cannot receive the doctrine of life from them by word of mouth, we must stick to the scriptures and written word, against all pretences to unwritten tradition, or pretended revelations, because the scriptures are a perfect rule both for our faith and practice.

16 Now our Lord Jesus Christ himself, and God even our Father, which hath loved us, and hath given us everlasting consolation and good hope through grace, 17 Comfort your hearts, and stablish you in every good word and work.

Our apostle having abundantly comforted, and affectionately exhorted the Thessalonians in the former verses, now concludes with fervent prayer for them. Where, observe, 1. The persons prayed to, our Lord Jesus Christ, and God our Father. Where note, 1. That prayer must be made to God alone, he only knows all our wants, and he alone is capable of hearing and helping us. Note, 2. That Jesus Christ is here invoked together with God the Father: surely his Godhead is hereby proved, for he is the object both of internal and external worship, is God, our Lord Jesus Christ himself, and God even our Father, &c. Observe, 2. The ground of audience and success in prayer, which hath loved us, and given us everlasting consolation, and good hope through grace. Where note, 1. That God's love to sinners, manifested in their redemption by Jesus Christ, giveth great boldness and encouragement in the duty of prayer. Note, 2. That God hath given all believers solid ground of substantial and perpetual consolation, he hath given us everlasting consolation. Note, 3. That God has given all believers hope, a good or well grounded hope of eternal life, and this hope is a great encouragement to the duty of prayer. Observe, 3. The blessings prayed for; Increase of comfort, and perseverance or establishment. 1. The apostle prays for increase of comfort: Our Lord Jesus Christ and God our Father comfort your hearts. Where note, That all true comfort flows from God, and that the heart is the proper seat of spiritual comfort: Psalm, iv. 7 Thou hast put gladness into my heart. 2. For establishment and perseverance;—and establish you in every good word and work: By every good word, is meant sound doctrine; by every good work, holiness of life. Learn hence, That establishment in faith and holiness is a great and necessary blessing, earnestly to be sought of God in prayer; as at all times this blessing is to be sought, so especially in unsettled times, that when we are most in danger of falling by temptation, we may be kept by the mighty power of God through faith unto salvation.

CHAP. III.

Our apostle closed the foregoing chapter with a fervent prayer for the Thessalonians; he begins this chapter with requesting their prayers for him.

FINALLY, brethren, pray for us, that the word of the Lord may have free course, and be glorified, even as it is with you;

Observe here, 1. A courteous and loving compellation, brethren. There is a threefold brotherhood, which the scripture takes notice of betwixt Christ and believers, betwixt believers themselves, and betwixt the ministers of Christ and their beloved people. Observe, 2. St. Paul's passionate request and supplication, Brethren pray for us. Learn hence, That an interest in the prayers of all those that have an interest in God, is the passionate desire and earnest request of all the faithful ministers of Jesus Christ; there is nothing that the ministers of Christ do more want or need nothing that they so much desire and crave, as the spiritual alms of their people's prayers their work is a work of the greatest weight of the greatest labour, of the greatest difficulty and opposition; and, alas, their shoulders are no stronger than other men's, to stand under the weight of this burden; wonder not then they cry out so importunately for the help and benefit of their people's prayers. Observe 3. The subject matter which he desires them to pray for, that the word of the Lord may have a free course and be glorified; in the original, that the word may run and be glorified; a metaphor taken from a water course where the current flows freely, without interruption or obstruction.—Quest. When may the word be said to have free course? Ans. When it is freely preached, and successfully preached; when it is preached, without eternal opposition; and accompanied with the Spirit's internal operation. Learn hence, That it is the standing duty of the people of God to wrestle with God at the throne of grace, for the free course of the word in the labours of his ministers; pray that the word of the Lord may have free course and be glorified. But when may the word be said to be glorified? When God is glorified in and by the word, by the conversion of sinners, by the exemplary conversation of believers; then is God glorified when his word is entertained. Observe, 4. The argument to excite the Thessalonians to pray for the success of the word amongst others, namely, the great and good success which God had given it amongst them—that it may be glorified, as it is with you. Hence learn, That such as have felt the power of the gospel themselves, to their conversion and salvation, should pray, that others may partake of the same benefits by it and from it, together with themselves; herein they shew their love to God and charity to the souls of men.

2 And that we may be delivered from unreasonable and wicked men; for all men have not faith.

In the former verse, St. Paul desired the Thessalonians prayers with reference to the word; here he requests it with relation to himself, that his person might be preserved, as well as his preaching prosper; that so long as God had any work for him to do, he might be preserved from the rage and fury of the unbelieving Jews and persecuting Gentiles, who followed him from place to place to give him trouble; that we may be delivered from unreasonable and wicked men. Where note, The odious character with which the apostle brands the enemies of his ministry, he calls them unreasonable men, whom no reason nor argument could convince or satisfy; and wicked men, of vicious lives and debauched practices. They are usually the vilest and worst of men, the very dregs of mankind, who let themselves to persecute the preachers, and oppose the preaching of the gospel. Next, he subjoins a reason, why he did so earnestly desire their prayers for deliverance from dangers, because all men have not faith, neither fidelity nor faithfulness, much less sincere faith in our Lord Jesus Christ; for then they would not oppose his gospel, nor persecute us from place to place, for the plain and persuasive preaching of it. Where note, That what profession soever a person makes of godliness and religion, and how high soever his pretences are for external devotion, yet if he opposes the gospel, in the power, purity, and progress of it, he is, and may be deservedly stiled, an unreasonable and wicked man, who wants fidelity moral honesty, and real virtue, and acts only for his own interest, and to please a party.

3 But the Lord is faithful, who shall stablish you and keep you from evil.

Our apostle had prayed for the Thessalonians establishment before, chap. ii. 17. he assures them of it now; God will stablish you and keep you from evil; from all evil and particularly from the evil of apostasy; and the argument for assurance is drawn from the fidelity of God, and his faithfulness in all his promises: The Lord is faithful who shall stablish you. Learn hence, That the Christians establishment in grace, his perseverance in holiness, and preservation from sin, depends upon the power and faithfulness of God, in concurrence with their own united endeavours to establish and preserve themselves from falling; The Lord is faithful, &c.

4 And we have confidence in the Lord touching you, that ye both do, and will do the things which we command you.

As if the apostle had said, "Although I gave you the assurance of God's faithful readiness, according to his promise, to do every thing that is requisite on his part in order to your establishment in holiness and preservation from sin, yet you must not, you cannot, expect the assistance of God, except you also add your own endeavours, as I have commanded; and accordingly I have good confidence, that what I command you in the Lord, or by the authority of the Lord, both now and hereafter, at all times, shall be performed by you. Where note, The character of that obedience which the gospel directs; It must be universal and perpetual; ye do all things that I command you, and I have confidence that ye will do,

5 And the Lord direct your hearts into the love of God, and into the patient waiting for Christ.

As if he had said, "That we may not be mistaken in this our confidence, we pray, that the Lord will direct your hearts into the love of God, which will constrain you to this obedience." Where note, That to direct man's heart right into the love of God, is, the work of God; The Lord direct your hearts into the love of God. Note farther, that these Thessalonians did love God already; for the apostle had before commended their work of faith, their labour of love, and yet here he prays, that their hearts may be directed in the love of God, &c. Learn thence, That the hearts of the holiest and best of saints do stand in need of a more perfect and constant direction into the love of God; as ships that are best rigged need a pilot, so they that love God most, need to have their love ordered and directed to the best advantage of his glory. Observe farther, From the phrase here used (direct) that God works upon man as a rational creature; he changeth the heart indeed, but he doth it by direction, not by violence and compulsion. The Spirit's conduct is sweet, yet powerful; it changes the will but without offering violence to the freedom and liberity of the will; we are not forced but directed; the Lord direct your hearts.—Again, the Lord direct your hearts; it implies, there are many things that would wreath and bend our hearts another way, and divert our love to a contrary object, to the world and the flesh; therefore we had need pray with earnestness, The Lord direct your hearts into the love of God; it follows,—and into the patient waiting for Christ. Note her, 1. The true character of a sincere Christian; he waits for the coming of Christ: Such as love Christ fervently, long for his coming greatly. 2. How patience qualifies those holy ardours, and longing desires, which the saints have to be with Christ; though love sets us upon the wing to be gone, yet patience commands to wait for Christ's own time of going; vehement love needs the allay of patience; most need much patience to die, but some need as much patience to live: Therefore, says the apostle, The Lord direct your hearts into a patient waiting for Christ, intimating, that the saints of God have great need of patience to enable them to endure that state of distance and separation from Christ so long as they must endure it in this world: Well then might the apostle pray on behalf of the Thessalonians, The Lord direct your hearts into the love of God, and patient waiting for Christ.

6 Now we command you, brethren, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye withdraw yourselves from every brother that walketh disorderly, and not after the tradition which he received of us.

Our apostle here enters upon a new subject, namely, that of church discipline; not only exhorting, but commanding and requiring them to excommunicate from their society every brother or Christian professor walking disorderly and not after the tradition or doctrine delivered by him, against such persons. Note here, 1. That though the apostle did oftentimes intreat and beseech, yet he had authority to enjoin and command; We command you, brethren. 2. That this authority to command he had not of himself, but from Christ: We command you in the name of the Lord Jesus: A minister must look that his commands be grounded on the authority of Christ, or else they will lie with small weight upon the consciences of his people. 3. The special duty he commanded them to the practice and performance of, namely, to excommunicate scandalous and disorderly persons from their communion and familiar society; that ye withdraw yourselves. A man that is guilty of a notorious scandalous sin, ought to be suspended from familiar converse and society with the saints, to shew him into repentance, before a public declarative excommunication calls him out of the church; We command you to withdraw yourselves from every brother. 4. The offender described a brother; that is a professor of Christianity, be he who he will, and let his rank and station be what it will, if he walks disorderly, like a soldier that keeps not rank and file, as the word signifies, if he walks not after the tradition which he received of us, that is plainly, according to the rule and direction of the gospel, let him be avoided. Hence learn, That there is no church-member, whose rank and station, whose quality and condition doth exempt his disorderly scandalous walking from ecclesiastical censure: Withdraw from every brother that walketh disorderly.

7 For yourselves know how ye ought to follow us: for we behaved not ourselves disorderly among you. 8 Neither did we eat any man's bread for nought: but wrought with labour and travail night and day; that we might not be chargeable to any of you: 9 Not because we have not power, but to make ourselves an ensample unto you, to follow us.

In these verses, the apostle plainly intimates, whom he meant by the disorderly brother mentioned in the foregoing verse: It is the idle person, called disorderly, for this reason, because Almighty God, having fitted man for, and ordained him to labour, he that will not do so, deserts the order in which God has placed him, and thus renders himself disorderly. To condemn which practice, St. Paul propounds his own example to their consideration and imitation; declaring, that he did not eat any man's bread before he earned it, but wrought with his own hands in the day time, and sometimes part of the night, at his trade of tent-making, that he might not be chargeable to any of them; not but that he had power to demand maintenance for his ministry, but he chose rather to depart from his right, and to labour in his calling, to excite others to do the like. Note here, That had not St. Paul laboured in his calling of tentmaking, he had not been a disorderly person; but, lest any should think so, he takes away, and cuts off, all occasion of suspicion, by working with his hands; his ministerial office would have freed him from the charge and imputation of idleness, and made maintenance from the church his due; but idleness the apostle observed, was a growing sin, which needed an example as well as doctrine to subdue it; and accordingly the apostle sets one: I behaved myself not disorderly or idle among you, but wrought with labour and travail night and day. Note 2. It is commendable to follow good examples, but much more to set a good example: As ministers ought to be patterns, so people ought to be followers; and their sin will be much the greater, and their punishment much the sorer, who do not follow their ministers doctrine, when they have seen it exemplified in their conversation. 3. There have all along been some persons in the world, who have looked upon the work of the ministry as a very easy calling, yea, as an idle calling, that a little time, a little pains and labour is enough for it; whereas the labour of the ministry, in the exercise of the mind, may justly be esteemed the greatest of labours; yet we see people all along have not judged it so, but the ministers of Christ find it so. 4. From the poverty of St. Paul's condition, that he had nothing beforehand, but was forced to earn his bread before he ate it. Learn, That it pleases God sometimes to measure out a very hard lot to his own children, and to give but little of earth to those who glorify him most upon earth; and those upon whom he intends to bestow extraordinary measures of glory in heaven, are cut very short of these outward comforts. Here behold St. Paul, a chosen vessel, one of the holiest men, and the most serviceable man that lived in the world in his time, yet without a penny in his purse, but what he wrought for with his hands, nay, working night and day for bread! Lord! how endearing are thy children's obligations to thy goodness, for their easy and plentiful circumstances in the world! What a favour it is to have fulness upon earth whilst we live, and the assurance of thy everlasting fruition when we die!

10 For even when we were with you, this we commanded you, that if any should not work, neither should he eat. 11 For we hear that there are some which walk among you disorderly, working not at all, but are busy bodies. 12 Now them that are such we command and exhort by our Lord Jesus Christ, that with quietness they work, and eat their own bread.

Note here, 1. The solemn charge given by the apostle; for every man to follow some lawful calling, and to be found in the way of an industrious diligence; if any (being able) will not work, let him not eat (any part of the church's charity). So that the sin of idleness was directly contrary to the apostle's command, and to the apostle's example. Mark, it is not those that cannot work, but those that will not, whom the apostle excludes from the church's charity; poor men that will not work when they can, do forfeit the bread of charity from men; the rich men that live idly, do by that sin forfeit their food to God, yea even their lives and their souls too: If any man would not work, neither should he eat. Note, 2. The apostle exhorts every man to eat his own bread; implying, that the bread of idleness is stolen bread; idle persons shall be judged as thieves, though they eat that which was freely given them: Drones deserve no honey, what they eat is stolen from the industrious bee; that is truly our bread which we labour for ourselves, or recompense those who get it for us by their labour: God has sent no man into the world to be idle; but as the providence of God disposes of every man, though he has never so much worldly wealth, yet he must be some way useful and serviceable in his generation. 3. One of the bad effects of idleness pointed at by our apostle, namely, an intermeddling (as busy-bodies) in other men's matters; an idle person that doth nothing to any good purpose, yet has a deal of business to answer for: done to very bad purpose; not for labouring, but busy trifling; the busy body's business is very unprofitable business; the mind of man cannot be wholly idle, but must be employed in something, if not in doing good, of necessity; in contriving evil; usually none are so busy in other men's matters, as they that neglect their own; those disorderly persons, who did not work at all, yet were busy bodies, and, as such, censured by our apostle: I hear there are &c.

13 But ye, brethren, be not weary in well-doing.
 14 And if any man obey not our word by this epistle, note that man, and have no company with him, that he may be ashamed. 15 Yet count him not as an enemy, but admonish him as a brother.

Note here, 1. How far St. Paul was from the censoriousness and uncharitableness of those men, who condemn a whole society, a communion, a church in general, for the miscarriages of some particular persons in it. I hear, says he, there are some that walk disorderly; but ye brethren, are free from these misdemeanors; you are painful in your employments, diligent in your callings, charitable in your distributions, be not weary in these instances of your duty, but persevere in well doing; when the ministers of Christ reprove the stubborn and disobedient for the neglect of their duty, they forget not to encourage and exhort the faithful and obedient to a persevering diligence in their known duty. 2. He directs them how to manage refractory persons, such as remained contumacious and disobedient to the admonitions given by this epistle; continuing disorderly, and refusing to labour: His advice is two-fold; he tells them what he would have them not do, and what he would have them do, to such. (1.) Negatively, What they should not do; namely, not to cut them off from the church by excommunication, despairing of their repentance and reformation; extreme rigour is offensive to God, and injurious to the church, as well as too much lenity and forbearance, (2. Positively, He exhorts that they consider them as lapsed brethren, and treat them accordingly, as those that desire and endeavour to reduce and reform them; in order to which he directs, first, To note or mark the disorderly persons; that is, set a note of shame upon them. Next, To avoid all intimacy and familiarity with them. Lastly, To admonish them of their duty, that they may be brought, if possible to repentance.

16 Now the Lord of peace himself give you peace always. by all means.

Our apostle being now to take his leave of the Thessalonians closes his epistle with prayer: Where note, 1. The mercy prayed for, Peace, peace with God, peace with conscience, peace and unity among themselves as Christians, peace with the men of the world, strangers, yea, enemies to Christianity. 2. The person prayed to, the Lord of peace, understand Jesus Christ, the prince of peace, the purchaser of peace, the procurer of peace, and the preserver of peace. 3. The perpetuity of the mercy prayed for, The Lord give you peace, not for a short time, but for continuance, always, that is, at all times, and in all places, and with all persons. 4. The way and manner of obtaining this and all other blessings, it must be in the use of all means: The Lord give you peace by all means, that is, in the use of all lawful and laudable means. Learn hence, 1. That the Lord himself is the author; procurer, and preserver of all that peace which his people enjoy; and therefore his people may boldly trust him for peace and safety, who is, and will be styled, The Lord of peace. 2. That such as will obtain this blessing of peace, must pray for it, and endeavour after it in a diligent use of all lawful means, which is the usual way and method in which God dispenses it. 3. That it is a lasting peace, in peace always, amongst all persons, and at all times, that a Christian should pray for and endeavour after, that it may be enjoyed without cessation, and without interruption: The Lord of peace, &c.

—The Lord be with you all. 17 The salutation of Paul with mine own hand, which is the token in every epistle; so I write: 18 The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

Note here, 1. That in the former part of the verse he had prayed for peace on behalf of these Thessalonians and this prayer was put up to Jesus Christ: The Lord of peace give you peace, which, by the way, is a strong argument for the divinity of Christ; for none but God is to be prayed to, none but God can give peace, Isa, lvii, 19: I create the fruit of the lips, peace, peace. Our apostle now having prayed for peace, next prays for the presence of God: The Lord give you peace, the Lord be with you all. Learn thence, That God's gracious presence with his people in any plentiful measure, is annexed to their peaceable frame of spirit, and to their serious endeavours after peace and love, after unity and concord amongst themselves; and the contrary spirit and temper grieves the good spirit of God, and provokes him to withdraw his quickening and comforting presence from his people; for these two petitions seem to have mutual dependency upon each other, The Lord give you peace, and the Lord be with you all. Note, 2. That the salutation written with his own hand respects his own writing, which did serve as a token or certain mark whereby his own epistles were distinguished from all counterfeits. The sending of salutations, either by word or writing, that we may thereby testify our sincere affection to absent friends, is not a matter of decency only but of duty; not of compliment barely, but of conscience, The salutation of Paul with mine own hand. 3. His usual valediction and farewell wish, The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen. As if he had said, "May the gracious and undeserved favour of God in Christ, with all the fruits and effects, the benefits and advantages of it be conveyed to you all, without exception, and be the portion and privilege of every soul of you; and in testimony both of my affectionate desire and assured confidence, I say Amen, so be it, so let it be." Learn hence, That there is an inexhaustible fountain of rich grace in Christ, and so copious are the streams of spiritual blessings which flow from it, that wish we never so much to others, yet there still remaineth enough for ourselves. St Paul, who wisheth all grace to the Thessalonians, knew very well there was enough both for himself and them; and that how large a measure soever was bestowed upon them, there would not be the less remaining for himself; therefore doth he thus close and conclude his epistle, saying, The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

FIRST EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL.

T I M O T H Y.

Timotheus or Timothy is the name of the person to whom St. Paul directs this and the following epistle; a name given him by his parents, to testify their pious desire that this their son should fear and honour God, according to the signification of his name.

His grandmother Lois, and his mother Eunice, bred him up in the knowledge of the scriptures from a child; he became first the disciple, and then the companion of St. Paul; was ordained by him, was very assisting to him, and inexpressibly dear to this great apostle, who knew how to value true worth in what age soever he found it; inasmuch, that St. Paul seldom mentions his name but with a mark of honour and esteem, calling him his son, his dearly beloved son, his faithful fellow-labourer, &c. He was a person of eminent gifts, and of a gracious disposition, but of a sick and weakly constitution; and being entered very young into the work of the ministry, St. Paul thought fit in his absence from him, to write two epistles to him, and to all succeeding ministers of the gospel after him, directing how to demean and behave themselves in their ministerial functions.

In these two epistles, and that to Titus, we have a collection of canons truly apostolical directing all bishops and pastors of the church how to govern themselves, and how to guide their people.

C H A P. I.

PAUL an apostle of Jesus Christ by the commandment of God our Saviour, and Lord Jesus Christ, which is our hope;

Note here, 1. St. Paul asserts his apostolical authority, calling himself an apostle, not that Timothy questioned it, but he writes it for their sakes, over whom he was now presiding at Ephesus, that neither ministers or people might despise what Timothy did, it being enjoined both him and them by so great an authority as was that of an apostle, Paul an apostle of Jesus Christ. 2. What authority St. Paul had for executing this office of an apostle, it was by the commandment of God, and our Lord Jesus Christ; that is, by the appointment, injunction, ordination, and immediate commission of the Father and Christ, by his voice from heaven, as the rest of the apostles were called by a voice from Christ on earth: In 1 Cor. i. 1. he is said to be called by the will of God; not by his permissive will barely, but by his preceptive will particularly. 3. The title given to our Lord Jesus Christ, he is styled our hope, that is, the author of our hope, the object of our hope, the purchaser of what we hope for, the declarer to us of the hopes of glory expected by us. Where note, That our Lord Jesus Christ is undoubtedly and undeniably God, because he is our hope and trust; Now, if he were no more than a man, though never so excellent, to make him our hope, would be to make ourselves miserable: For curst is the man that trusteth in man, and maketh man his life, Jer. xvii. 5.

2 Unto Timothy, my own son in the faith: Grace, mercy, and peace from God our Father, and Jesus Christ our Lord.

Note here, 1. The endearing title which our apostle gives to Timothy, he calls him his son, his own son, his own son in the faith; because as some think, converted by him to the Christian faith: others, that he was more thoroughly instructed, edified, and encouraged by St. Paul, but converted before; possibly also, he may call him his son, because he was as assisting to him, as obedient and observing of him, as a son is to a father, he being a young man, and the apostle now aged; or it may be he calls him his son, because he resembled him in faith and doctrine, preaching and conversation, as a son resembles his father in face and manners. Consider Timothy as a spiritual son to St. Paul, begotten to the faith by him, and then the note is this, That the ministers of Christ cannot but bear a fervent and affectionate love to those that are their spiritual children, their sons in the faith, and converted to Christ by their ministry; consider him as an assistant to St. Paul, a co-worker and fellow-labourer with him in the work of the gospel, and thus affectionately beloved by him; and we may learn for our instruction, how fervently the ministers of Christ should love one another, speak respectfully of each other, secure the reputation one of another, strengthen each other's hands, encourage each other's hearts in the work of God: We have little, God knows, very little love from the world: Lord! how sad is it that we should yet have less one for another? See how the heart of St. Paul and his assistant Timothy were knit together in love, like father and son, to the great reputation, as well as the successful furtherance of the gospel!

3 As I besought thee to abide still at Ephesus when I went into Macedonia, that thou mightest charge some that they teach no other doctrine, 4 Neither give heed to fables and endless genealogies, which minister questions rather than godly edifying, which is in faith; so do.

Note here, 1. The tender care which St. Paul took of the new planted church at Ephesus; when his office called him into Macedonia, he leaves Timothy behind him at Ephesus, to water what he had planted, and to build upon that foundation which he had laid: when I went into Macedonia, I besought thee to abide still at Ephesus. Note, 2. The charge and command which St. Paul left with Timothy at his departure from him, to take care that no new or strange doctrine be taught, or any other doctrine received by the church, than what was delivered by him: charge some that they teach us no other doctrine. But who were these? Very probably they were the Judaizing teachers, who strenuously endeavoured to corrupt the purity, and deprave the simplicity of the gospel. Thence learn, 1. That though the doctrine of Christ and his apostles was abundantly sufficient to salvation, yet the church of Christ, even in the earliest days of Christianity, were in very great danger of being corrupted early by other doctrines, than those delivered by them. 2. That it is the great duty, and ought to be the special care of the ministers of God, that no new or strange doctrine be broached in the church of Christ: I besought thee—that thou mightest charge some that they teach no other doctrine. But a farther and more particular charge is given, ver. 4. That the church at Ephesus give no heed to fables or endless genealogies, which rather occasion wrangling disputes, than tend to edification in faith and holiness: By fables, we may understand vain and idle speculations, Jewish scruples, frivolous observances; whatsoever in preaching is delivered by us, which doth not answer the great end of preaching, namely, to build up men in faith and holiness, is trifling, and not preaching; what we deliver signifies no more than a fable or imaginary tale that is told, But what were these endless genealogies here spoken of? Ans. Not scripture genealogies, for those are not vain but useful; not endless, but determinate; but these were endeavours of some particular persons, who, that they might have a pretence to claim kindred with Christ, did make their genealogies endless, drawing down their line of descent from David, &c. or else endeavours to prove themselves sons of Abraham and Isaac, privileges which they highly valued themselves upon, and rested in, saying, We have Abraham to our father. Whatever they were, our apostle charges Timothy, that the church at Ephesus give no heed to them, nor to the preachers of them, and the reason is given, because they only occasion disputes, and tend not to edification.

5 Now the end of the commandment is charity out of a pure heart, and of a good conscience, and of faith unfeigned: 6 From which some having swerved, have turned aside unto vain jangling; 7 Desiring to be teachers of the law, understanding neither what they say, nor whereof they affirm.

In these words our apostle smartly reflects upon the Judaizing teachers, who were so zealous for their ceremonial law, that they mingled works with faith in the point of justification; the apostle tells them, that the end of the law, ay, and of the gospel too, is love; the end, that is, the aim, the scope, the design, the perfection and consummation, the perfecting end; the sense is, that all the duties which the law of God and the gospel of Christ doth enjoin, are designed only as means to advance and perfect our love both to God and man; the end of all Christ's doctrine is charity, or the bringing of men to love God and their neighbour. Observe next, The apostle describes the nature and quality of that love, which is the end and design, the intention and perfection of the law, and the fountain from whence this love must spring and flow, namely, from a pure heart, or a heart purified by the Spirit of Christ, from a good conscience, or a conscience purified by the blood of Christ, and from a faith unfeigned: Implying That love either to God or men, is not sincere, unless it proceed from a clean heart, and is accompanied with an holy and innocent life, and has faith for the root and principle from which it flows. Observe, lastly, How he taxes the Judaizing and false teachers, with swerving from charity, purity, and faith, and turning aside to vain janglings; and that whilst they affect to be thought learned teachers, and expounders of the law, they betray their own ignorance, not understanding either what they say, or whereof they affirm.

8 But we know that the law is good, if a man use it lawfully.

Lest any should have apprehended from the reflection he made upon the teachers of the law in the foregoing verse, that he did disparage and undervalue the law itself, our apostle in this verse declares, that the law rightly understood and preached was very good, given for, and serves unto excellent purposes, if we use it lawfully; that is, as we ought to use it, as God intended it, namely, as a perfect rule of life, to direct us in our obedience to God; but not so good to expect justification by it; not good in opposition to the gospel, but in subserviency to the gospel: the law is good if used lawfully. Observe here, 1. Something implied, namely, that the law of God may be used unlawfully: But how and when may it be said so to be?

Answer,

Answer, When it is converted to unprofitable dispute, as was the case here, when men oppose it to Christ, when they seek justification by it, and the like. Observe, 2. Something expressed, namely, That the law of God, considered in itself, is good and excellent, it is good in regard of its author, it hath the authority of God instamped upon it; good in regard of the matter contained in it; good in regard of the end of it, to lead us unto Christ, Rom. x. 4. Christ is the end of the law; good in regard of the use of it, and that, (1.) To the ungodly, to restrain them from sin, to convince them of sin, to condemn them for sin. (2.) To the godly, to discover sin more clearly and more fully, to drive them out of themselves, and from all expectation of righteousness and justification by any thing in themselves or done by themselves; to cause them to put the higher value, esteem, and price upon Jesus Christ, and the benefits received by him. Thus the law is good; and if so, wo to the Antinomians, who deny the use and excellency of the holy law of God, who vilify it, trample upon it, and because it is not good for justification, affirm it is not good at all: What! is not gold good, because you cannot eat it for food? It was never intended for that purpose: Is not obedience to the law as an eternal rule of holy living, and good works, agreeable to the demands of the law, necessary and good, though they never had the impress of God's ordination for our justification in his sight, he having provided a perfect and spotless righteousness for that purpose, which is highly pleading to him? Lord! in the day when thou shalt come to plead with the world for transgressing the law, how shall these men, who with tongue and pen have cried down the use and excellencies of thy law, shew their heads before thee?

9 Knowing this, that the law is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless and disobedient, for the ungodly and for sinners, for unholy and profane, for murderers of fathers and murderers of mothers, for manslayers, 10 For whoremongers for them that defile themselves with mankind, for men stealers, for liars, for perjured persons, and if there be any other thing that is contrary to sound doctrine.

Our apostle here declares the persons, 1. Whom the law was not made for, and them for whom it was made: It was not made for a righteous man; that is, say some, it was not made for him as a burden, to be an uneasiness to him, because he has a love to it, a delight in it, and does voluntarily conform himself to the observation of it: Others say thus, The law was not made for a righteous man, that is, the righteous man is not under the coercive or vindictive but directive power of the law only; he is not under the curse of the law actually, though all are under it meritoriously; and accordingly the law was never made to terrify, and affrighten, and condemn them: Next, the apostle declares for whom, for what persons, and for what purposes the law was made, intended, and designed, namely for restraining and condemning, first, and deligned; namely for restraining and condemning, first, in general, all lawless persons, sons of Belial, as the scripture calls them, that is, men without yoke; the moral law in general is a rule of holy living, and the gospel in particular is Christ's yoke now such as will not wear the yoke of Christ, must expect no benefit by the cross of Christ: Then he instances in particular, what and whom the law was made for, namely, to deter and restrain persons from all impiety and profaneness, from all disobedience and stubbornness, from murder and manslaughter, from sodomy, from whoredom, and all manner of uncleanness, either natural or unnatural, from theft, from perjury, from lying and falsehood, and summarily, to curb and restrain wicked men from the practice of every thing which is contrary to the pure and holy nature of God. Learn hence, That there is such a propensity and inclination in the corrupt and depraved nature of man to the practice of all sin, even the greatest, the vilest and the worst of sins, that the law of God, with all its threatened punishments, is not sufficient to deter, to terrify or restrain sinners from the commission of them; but such as will not be under the restraining, must lie under the condemning power of the law.

11 According to the glorious gospel of the blessed God, which was committed to my trust. 12 And I thank Christ Jesus our Lord, who hath enabled me, for that he counted me faithful, putting me into the ministry;

Note here, 1. The title given to the gospel, it is called, the glorious gospel of the blessed God; partly, because the glorious attribute and excellencies of God are more resplendent in the gospel, than in the law of God; as also, because the gospel brings more honour and glory to God than all the works of creation put together. 2. He styles God, the giver of the gospel, The blessed God, to signify thereby unto us his transcendent mercy and excelling goodness, in that being infinitely happy in the enjoyment of himself and his divine perfections, and incapable of any profit from, or advantage by, his creatures, he was yet pleased to give us his Son, his gospel, his Holy Spirit, to qualify us for, and bring us to the enjoyment of himself; According to the glorious gospel of the blessed God. 3. What humble and thankful returns St. Paul makes to Christ, for the high honour, the rich and special favour conferred upon him, in calling him to dispense this glorious gospel, in calling him to it, in enabling him for it, and rendering him faithful and successful in it? I thank Christ Jesus, who enable me, and counted me faithful, putting me into the ministry. Where note, That all the fidelity, ability, zeal, and courage, which the apostle had exercised in the whole course of his ministry, is attributed and ascribed unto Christ and not to himself; his faithfulness was not the cause or motive; but the effect and fruit of the grace of God in calling him to the ministry, 1 Cor. vii. 25. having obtained this faithfulness in him, and not conferred it upon him, there had not been such reason for this affectionate thanksgiving which here we find from our apostle, I thank Christ, who hath enabled me, counting me faithful.

13 Who was before a blasphemer, and a persecutor, and injurious. But I obtained mercy, because I did it ignorantly in unbelief.

Note here, 1. What a prodigious sinner St. Paul represents himself before conversion: I was a blasphemer, persecutor, and injurious: A blasphemer, the highest sin he could commit against God; a persecutor, the highest sin he could commit against the saints; injurious, the highest wickedness towards mankind; sins of such an aggravated and accumulated guilt, that they wanted but one ingredient, namely, sufficient knowledge, to render them the sin against the Holy Ghost. Be astonished, O heavens, at the great and infinite mercy of God towards great sinners! Even persecutors and blasphemers may be, and sometimes are, converted and brought home to God. 2. The reason assigned by him, why such distinguishing mercy was dispensed to him: He obtained mercy, because he did it ignorantly in unbelief. The word because, doth not import or imply, that ignorance in the apostle was the proper cause of mercy in God, but that it made St. Paul a more capable subject for receiving mercy, than he should have been, if he had maliciously sinned against knowledge; not that St. Paul by less sinning did merit the mercy of God; but his ignorance and unbelief being in a sort invincible, through the prejudices of education, they did much abate the malignity of his sin; for he was bred a Pharisee, which was a sect that had an implacable enmity against Christ and his holy religion. Note, lastly, The end and design of St. Paul in relating that his bitter persecution of Christianity was in the time of his ignorance, and not done deliberately, knowingly, maliciously; partly to justify the divine mercy and free grace of God, which pardoned his fury, his rage, and madness against Christ and his saints; for, he had done thus deliberately and maliciously, for secular ends and worldly advantages, it had been the sin against the Holy Ghost; which was unpardonable: And partly, he mentions his ignorance, to prevent the abuse of the divine mercy in men, and to let the world know that none might, or ought to take encouragement from his example, to be of a persecuting spirit, and yet hope for mercy when at the same time, they sin against light and knowledge. I would to God the persecuting Spirit amongst us would consider this, which is as bitter as ever in the breasts of some against their protestant brethren; but, blessed be God, legally restrained: They cannot now afflict those whom they do not affect; yet is it evident they do not rejoice, and are not so thankful for their own liberty as they should, because those whom they hate enjoy their's: Their case is vastly different from our apostle's; they cannot pretend to do it ignorantly, though through infidelity in some sort they may.

14. And the grace of our Lord was exceeding abundant with faith and love which is in Christ Jesus.

Still our apostle goes on magnifying the transcendent mercy and abundant grace of God; that called him first to be a Christian, and then an apostle; and he shews, that this great mercy of God had great effects in him of faith and love, both towards God and his saints. Where note How St. Paul, after his conversion, abounded and excelled in those graces which were opposite and contrary to the sins committed in his carnal and unregenerate state: He abounds in faith, in opposition to his former unbelief; and in love, in opposition to his former rage and cruelty. A Christian's fruitfulness in grace and holiness after his conversion ought to bear some proportion to his unfruitfulness in a sinful state before conversion; the grace of our Lord was exceeding abundant with faith and love; he now glorifies God by excelling in those graces which were opposite to his former sins.

15. This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners; of whom I am chief,

Observe here, 1. What an humble apprehension this great apostle had of himself; though then the greatest of saints in the esteem of others, yet the chiefest of sinners in his own account: For he doth not say, I was the chief of sinners; but, I am so; notwithstanding his repentance and remission, still he reflects upon his former unregenerate state and sinful condition. Learn hence, That when sin is mercifully pardoned, and cast behind God's back, the penitent sinner will and ought to set it continually before his own face, to keep him humble, sensible of, and thankful for the rich grace of God dispensed to him, and received by him; Sinners, of whom I am chief. Observe, 2. A most comfortable revelation made by the gospel concerning the redemption and salvation of a lost world, by our Lord Jesus Christ; He came into the world to save sinners. Where note, That the promised Messiah is come into the world; that Jesus Christ is that promised Messiah: Therefore he was before he came, his divine nature pre-existing from all eternity; and in the fulness of time he assumed the human nature into an union with his God-head. Note farther, That the design of his coming was to save sinners; therefore if man had not sinned, Christ had not come into the world: What need of a Mediator, had there been no breach? No need of a physician, had there been no disease. Farther, It was not absolutely necessary that Christ should come into the world to save sinners; but supposing God's purpose of saving sinners by way of a price and satisfaction Christ's coming into the world was indispensably necessary; for no mere creature could lay down a price satisfactory or the salvation of lost man. Observe, 3. The truth and certainty, together with the worth and excellency of the gospel revelation; This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation: For, what is the gospel but a revelation of pardon to condemned malefactors, a declaration of peace to proclaimed enemies, a proclamation of liberty to enslaved captives, an offer of cure to diseased persons? Oh! With what fervent zeal should this acceptable doctrine be preached by us, and embraced by our people; That Jesus Christ is come into the world to save sinners.

16. Howbeit for this cause I obtained mercy, that in me first Jesus Christ might shew forth all long-suffering, for a pattern to them which should hereafter believe on him to life everlasting.

Note here, That God is pleased sometimes to magnify his mercy in the conversion and salvation of the most notorious sinners, that so the greatest of sinners may take encouragement from thence to hope and trust in our Lord Jesus

Jesus Christ for pardoning mercy: Thus here, this great blasphemer and persecutor was received to mercy, for a pattern and example to all such sinners as should hereafter forsake their evil and wicked ways, and give up themselves sincerely to the obedience of the gospel; For this cause I obtained mercy. Such a conspicuous example of Christ's clemency and grace towards so great a sinner, whom he not only pardoned, but preferred to the dignity of an apostle, and sent forth to preach the gospel to the Gentiles, would be a strong motive to the Gentiles to receive the gospel with faith and obedience; there could be no reason for any of them to despair of mercy, when they saw such a pattern, such an illustrious instance of pardoning mercy before their eyes.

17 Now unto the King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God, be honour and glory for ever and ever. Amen.

Our apostle being ravished with a sweet sense of the greatness of God's pardoning mercy towards himself, concludes this whole matter with a pathetic doxology, and an affectionate thanksgiving unto God. As if he had thus said, "The sense of the aforementioned unspeakable mercy eddeth up my soul to speak with joy the praises of our God, who is eternal, immortal, invisible, the only God, absolutely wise, over angels and all creatures, to him be honour and glory for ever and ever."

18 This charge I commit unto thee, son Timothy,—

What charge? To stay at Ephesus, say some, for the benefit of the church there; to charge the false teachers not to give heed to fables, say others; to keep the doctrine committed to him by St. Paul as a faithful minister and soldier of Jesus Christ, against all opposition: These were the charges given.

—According to the prophecies which went before on thee, that thou by them mightest war a good warfare,

Here St. Paul encourages Timothy to go on in the course of his ministry with courage and faithfulness, according as it had been foretold or prophesied he should do. Here note, That amongst the gifts of prophecy, which were found in the apostle's time, and the discerning of spirits, this was one; to foretel and chuse out persons meet and fit to do God service in the ministry. Timothy was thus chosen by prophecy, that is, by the direction of the Spirit of God; he was designed and notified by the spirit of prophecy, and therefore the apostle bids him, as it had been foretold he should be a faithful minister, to approve himself to be such; According to the prophecies which went before on thee, war a good warfare. Learn hence, That young ministers ought to take heed, that what hopes, expectations, and good opinions others have had of them, and what prayers, promises, and engagements have been made for them, may not be made void, but made good by them, in the future course of their ministry.

19 Holding faith, and a good conscience, which some having put away, concerning faith have made shipwreck:

St. Paul had exhorted Timothy in the foregoing verse to war a good warfare; here he directs him to two weapons which he would have him use in that warfare, namely, faith and a good conscience; neither will do alone: Not faith without a good conscience, nor a good conscience without faith; hold both, faith in thy teaching, and a good conscience in thy practice: Hold them fast; for faith stands with a good conscience, and falls with a bad one. Learn hence, That in the most perilous times, when some lose their graces and comforts, their present peace and future hopes, that we may not lose what we have on earth, and what we look for in heaven, our continual care must be, to get and keep, to have and hold, faith and a good conscience. And mark the encouragement given to exercise this care; some through the neglect of it, concerning faith have made shipwreck. Our life is a sea-faring condition; a good conscience is the ark in which we are secure, made by God's own direction (as was that of Noah) and pitched within and without, as was his: A window it has in the top, to let in the light of heaven, but not the least crack or crevice below, to let in a drop of guilt, or endanger its own safety; it shoots off all the showers that fall downwards, and all the floods that rage upwards. Such a security is an innocent mind and a clear conscience; but if we do not hold fast a good conscience, but let it go, we have seen the last of faith, it sinks, it shipwrecks presently.

20 Of whom is Hymeneus and Alexander;—

That is, of the number of those who have made shipwreck of faith and a good conscience, are these two men. They made shipwreck of faith; but how? By renouncing Christianity expressly? No: But implicitly, by denying the resurrection, and maintaining such doctrines as utterly subverted and totally overthrew the faith.

—Whom I have delivered unto Satan, that they may learn not to blaspheme.

That is, whom I have inflicted the church's censure of excommunication upon, cast them out of the church, and delivered to Satan as God's executioner, who oft-times tormented the person with grievous diseases and bodily pains, called elsewhere, The destruction of the flesh, 1 Cor. v. 5. Learn hence, That excommunication rightly administered, is a very solemn ordinance; a shutting out of heaven him who is justly cast out of the church's communion here on earth. But observe, The charitable intention of the apostle in denouncing this sentence of excommunication; it was, That they might learn not to blaspheme. Mark, It was none of Satan's desire, but the apostle's, that they might learn not to blaspheme: Satan was then God's executioner, when the church wanted the continuance of the Christian magillrate, and his design was destruction, but the apostle's was reformation; not to ruin, but reclaim. Learn, That the end of the church's censure, in particular of excommunication, is not to serve to the destruction of the censured; much less to the private revenge of the censurer.

cenfurer, but to reform and reclaim the offender, that others may be warned, and the infection stayed.

CHAP. II.

Our apofle in this chapter directs Timothy to the management of his duty; and exhorts him to take fpecial care that prayers and fupplications be publicly made, and, fo far as, was in his power, privately for all men.

I EXHORT therefore, that firft of all, fupplications, prayers, interceffions, and giving of thanks be made for all men: 2 For kings, and for all that are in authority that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godlinefs and honefty.

Obferve, here, 1. The duty which Timothy is exhorted to take care of, and that is, of the duty of public prayer; I exhort thee, that fupplications, prayers and interceffions, with thanksgiving, be publicly made: Prayer being a foecial and principal part of public worfhip, the minifter of God muft be affiduous and conftant in it; depreciating evils threatened, fupplicating for mercies wanted, interceding on the behalf of others, and giving thanks for bleffings received. 2. For whom we are to pray in general for all men; becaufe we cannot pray acceptably for ourfelves, if we pray only for ourfelves: This is the nobleft exercife of charity, and which God has put in the power of the pooreft man upon earth to exercife; Let fupplications and prayers be made for all men. 3. For whom we are more epecially, and in the firft place to pray; for kings, and all in authority, who then were Pagans and perfecutors. - Mark, He fays not for lawful and rightful kings, but for fuch as have the pre-eminence and power in their hands, for all power is of God: And the powers that be, are ordained of God, Rom. xiii. 2. But why firft for kings? Becaufe they are fuch great inftruments of good to mankind, becaufe they moft want our prayers, as they encounter with more difficulties, are expofed to more dangers, and are liable to greater temptations than other men. 4. The arguments which the apofle offers, to engage us to this duty, That we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godlinefs and honefty; that is, that we may be fecured in the quiet and peaceable poffeffion of our civil rights and intereffs, and that we may be protected in the free exercife of our religion, and in the practice of godlinefs; for though no prince can take our religion from us, if we refolve to keep it, yet they may difturb us in the quiet and peaceable enjoyment of it; and therefore it is our intereff, as well as our duty, to pray for kings, and all that are in authority.

3 For this is good and acceptable in the fight of God our Saviour; 4 Who will have all men to be faved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth.

Our apofle fubjoins his reafons for our praying for all men, becaufe Chrift came into the world to fave all men, chap. 1. 15. Becaufe it is the defire of God, as well as the defign of Chrift, that all men fhould be faved, and becaufe fuch prayers are good and acceptable in the fight of God. Learn hence, 1. That to pray for all men, as well enemies as friends, epecially and particularly for rulers and magiftrates, is good, acceptable, and agreeable to Almighty God, as all acts of obedience to his commanding will are: This is good and acceptable in the fight of God. 2. That it is not only all forts of men that God and Chrift defire fhould be faved, but our Lord willed, together with his Father, the falvation of all men in general, fo far as to make a facrifice fufficient for all, if they repent and believe, and to offer a general pardon to all on condition of acceptance, and to fend his minifters amongft all with the word of reconciliation, accompanying it with an hearty defire that all would accept of it; in fhort, what Chrift offereth to all, he undoubtedly purchafed for all; but he offers to all pardon and life upon condition of acceptance; therefore, he is fo far willing that all men fhould be faved. 3. The means and method by which, and in which, God would have all men to be faved, namely, by coming to the knowledge of the truth. It is evidently falfe then, which fome confidently affirm, That a man may be faved in any religion; No, he cannot come to falvation but by the knowledge of the truth; without the knowledge of God, without faith in Chrift, where he has been revealed, and without obedience to the gofpel, where it has been made known, there is no poffibility of falvation; God would have all men to be faved, by coming to the knowledge of the truth.

5 For there is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the man Chrift Jefus; 6 Who gave himfelf a ransom for all, to be testified in due time.

The apofle's arguments runs thus: "We ought to pray for all, becaufe there is one God, who is good to all, and one Mediator between God and mankind, who took upon him the common nature of all men, and gave himfelf a fatisfactory and fufficient ransom for all, which was in due time testified and born witnefs to us by his apoftles." Learn hence, 1. That the only way or friendly intercourfe between God and fallen men, is by and through a Mediator: God cannot look upon fallen men out of a Mediator, but as rebels, traitors, and objects of his vindictive wrath; nor can fallen man, without a Mediator, look up to God, but as a provoked majefty, an angry judge, and a confuming fire. 2. That there is no other Mediator between God and man but Jefus Chrift, who was both God and man; for though the apofle calls him the Man Chrift Jefus, this is not added to exclude the divine nature from the Mediatorfhip, but emphatically to declare that nature, in which he gave himfelf a ransom for us; the human nature is the matter of our ransom; the divine nature gave worth and value to it; Chrift fuffered being man, and fatisfied being God. 3. That this one Mediator, Jefus Chrift, gave himfelf a ransom for all: Whoever perifties under the gofpel, it is not becaufe no ransom was paid for him, nor becaufe it was not fufficient for him, for it is moft notorious, that God has iffued forth an univerfal act of grace, offering pardon of fin, and eternal falvation to all men without exception, living under the gofpel, upon condition of their believing acceptance; if they reject and refufe it is to their unutterable and inevitable condemnation. 4. That Christ's mediation and intercession is founded upon redemption; because he gave himself a ransom for all, therefore is he, and he only, qualified to intercede for all, in virtue of that sacrifice which he offered for the salvation of mankind: Therefore, the distinction of the church of Rome, between a Mediator of redemption, and a Mediator of intercession, is groundless; for who dares plead with an offended God, as an intercessor on the behalf of sinners, that has not first, as a redeemer, satisfied the justice of God for sin? As there was no redemption wrought by any, but by Christ; as there is but one God, so but one Mediator between God and man, the Man Christ Jesus.

Christ's

7 Whereunto I am ordained a preacher and an apostle, (I speak the truth in Christ, and lie not) a teacher of the Gentiles in faith and verity. 8 I will therefore, that men pray every where, lifting up holy hands, without wrath and doubting.

Note here, 1. Our apostle declares his authority to publish the gospel to the Gentiles, and his integrity in the publication of it; I was ordained an apostle, a teacher of the Gentiles, in faith and verity. 2. That according to St. Paul's commission, he gave directions to all sorts of persons for the regular performance of their duty. And, first, concerning the duty of prayer: I will; that is, God by me declares his will, that all men pray, that they pray, every where, in the public assemblies, in their private families and apartments; lifting up the hands, in token of expecting to receive an answer from heaven: Lifting up holy hands; let their prayers be holy, accompanied with faith and charity; Without wrath and doubting; a peaceable heart is as necessary in prayer, as a pure hand: It is in vain to ask in prayer the favour of God, with anger and revenge in our hearts against man; to pray with doubting, is opposed to faith; to pray in wrath, is opposed to charity. As if the apostle had said, "Pray both in actual faith and love." There must be faith in prayer, otherwise we cannot lift up holy hands without doubting, there must be love otherwise we cannot lift up holy hands without wrath: Therefore, says the apostle, I will that men pray every where, lifting up holy hands, &c. He and his service must be holy, that will serve God acceptably.

9 In like manner also, that women adorn themselves in modest apparel, with shamefacedness and sobriety; not with broidered hair, or gold, or pearls, or costly array; 10 But (which becometh women professing godliness) with good works.

The next apostolical precept here given, is to women, concerning their apparel and attire, that at all times, but especially in public worship, they use such apparel as becometh modest and chaste women, expressing by their outward garb the inward gravity and modesty of their minds; not like proud and alluring persons, with embroidered hair, gold and pearls, to attract the eyes and hearts of the simple. Note, 1. That the attire, which all persons wear, ought to be such as may answer the end for which apparel was appointed; which was to hide and shroud our nakedness; for differencing and distinguishing of sexes; as also for distinguishing between the qualities and ranks of persons: Garments also are for defence and protection, and for decency, and ornament. 2. That though persons of quality are not prohibited to wear such garments, though costly, as becometh their degree, yet none are to study the external adorning of the body, so much, as to neglect the inner man by good works. 3. That all attire (1.) is forbidden which suspected women use, either to provoke lust in others, or to shew inclinations to it themselves. (2.) All such attire as, by the richness and costliness of it, shews pride and vanity of spirit, and an ambition to excel others; not but that there may be pride under mean apparel, and oftentimes is. (3.) All such attire as is unsuitable either to the time or place of worship. Note, 4. That this precept ought not to be slighted, by women, as of small moment; because the two great apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul, do both give it in charge unto them. Lastly, That the men are by no means to look upon themselves as unconcerned in this apostolical precept given to women: It is much more inexcusable in them to affect gaiety and gaudy dress; for it is vain and foolish, troublesome and uneasy, the nurse of idleness, attended with luxury and wantonness, and very often with immodesty and lewdness, and is the great bane very often of justice and charity. How many are fine and gay, but at the expence, and sometimes at the ruin, of the poor tradesman! And how oft is that spent in vain decking, which ought to be laid out in the poor's clothing!

11 Let the women learn in silence with all subjection. 12 But I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence.

Still our apostle is directing Timothy how persons should and ought to behave themselves at the time, and in the place of worship: Let, says he, the women, in your assemblies, learn in silence with all subjection to the better sex; for I suffer not a woman to teach publicly, and to usurp authority over the man, to whom God has given authority over her; but rather, according to her duty, let her learn in silence. Here note, 1. That it is only women's public teaching that is here forbidden: not their private teaching their children, or servants, or the younger women, or even their husbands themselves upon a fit occasion: Acts xviii. 26. we find Priscilla privately instructing Apollos. 2. That none ought to teach but who have authority; and teaching is exercising that authority: A woman therefore teaching publicly, doth usurp an authority not due unto her. 3. There were some women in the Jewish church endowed with extraordinary gifts of the Spirit, and particularly with the gift of prophesying, who did teach publicly; as Miriam, Deborah, Huldah, and Anna: And it is probable, that the speaking of these extraordinary women encouraged others to do the like, whom the apostle here directs his speech against: I suffer not a woman to teach, &c.

13 For Adam was first formed, then Eve. 14 And Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression.

Here St. Paul offers a double argument to enforce the duty of subjection upon the woman, and to prevent her usurping of authority over the man; namely, because the man was first in the creation: Adam was first formed, then Eve; and the woman was first in the transgression: Adam was first deceived, that is, first and immediately deceived, but the woman being deceived was first in the transgression; she was therefore guilty of her own and her husband's transgression; and accordingly, not only by the law of her creation, but as a punishment for her transgression, God has placed her in a state of subjection, and given the man authority over her; which authority she usurps over him, whenever she undertakes to be a public teacher of him. These two considerations doth the apostle make use of, to humble the woman, and to keep her within the sphere of her proper duty.

15 Notwithstanding she shall be saved in child-bearing, if they continue in faith and charity, and holiness with sobriety.

Our apostle having in the preceding verse, acquainted us with the woman's sin, that she was in the transgression, and first in the transgression; in this verse, he informs the woman of a part of her punishment for that her transgression; and that is, the severe pain and extreme peril of child-bearing. He acquaints her, 1. With her comfort and support under that punishment; and that is, an hope of salvation: She shall be saved in child-bearing. 2. With the condition, upon which, the hope of that salvation is grounded and bottomed; if she continue in faith and charity, and holiness with sobriety. Learn, 1. That pain in child-bearing is a part of that punishment which was inflicted by God upon the woman for her first sin; and accordingly the woman's sorrow and sensible feeling of the pains of child-birth ought to bring to her remembrance her original and first transgression. Surely when the woman feels the original punishment, it ought to remind her of her original sin, as a child ought to remember his fault at that very instant when he is under his father's rod. 2. That the infliction of this punishment (the pains of child-bearing) even unto death, is and shall be no hindrance of the woman's eternal salvation, if there be found with her those holy qualifications and gracious conditions which the gospel requires; partly in regard of the relation which God stands in to her, partly in regard of the covenant which God has made with her. A child is as much a child under the rod, as in the bosom; neither the father's stroke, nor the child's grief can dissolve that relation. 3. That faith and charity, holiness, and sobriety, with perseverance therein, are the great conditions of the gospel, upon which the woman's eternal salvation in that hazardous condition, doth depend. She shall be saved in child-bearing, &c. The words may also refer to the woman's temporal deliverance in the time of travail; and the sense runs thus: She shall be saved in child-bearing, that is, she shall go through the pains of child-birth with safety, if she continue in faith, putting her trust in God for deliverance, in charity, exercising compassion to those in like condition; and in the exercise of temperance, sobriety, and chastity, according to her matrimonial vow. She shall be saved in child-bearing, if she continue in faith, &c.

CHAP. III.

The design of our apostle in this chapter is to instruct Timothy in one of the most important parts and duties of his office, namely, to take great care whom he did admit into the sacred function.

THIS is a true saying, if a man desire the office of a bishop, he desireth a good work.

Note here, 1. Our apostle acquaints Timothy with the dignity, honour, and excellency of the sacred function: He that desireth the office of a bishop, that is, to rule and teach in the church of God, he desireth a good work, that is, an honourable employment. As if our apostle had said, "Know, O Timothy, that as to the office of a bishop, whoever desireth it, doth desire a very great and excellent work: It is not a bare name, title, dignity, a place of honour and command; but a work, a work of vast importance, labour and difficulty: Take heed therefore whom thou dost admit, and of those that are also admitted into the sacred function, to consider the great weight of this important service, to enterprize it with extraordinary dread and caution, looking upon their office, not with aspiring but tremendous thoughts: For who is sufficient to these things?"

2. A bishop then must be blameless, the husband of one wife, vigilant, sober, of good behaviour, given to hospitality, apt to teach.

Here we have St. Paul's positive character of a bishop, and what he ought to be, who is admitted into that high and honourable office in the church of God; he ought to be blameless, a person free from scandal, without any just ground of blame: The life of a bishop should shine so bright, that others may not only behold it, but admire it, and guide their lives by the example of it: The husband of one wife; that is, one at a time; not guilty of the sin of having many wives, or of putting away the wife by divorce, as the Jews frequently did for frivolous causes. Here note, 1. The apostle's command (that the bishop be the husband of one wife) doth not oblige him to marry, but it establishes the lawfulness of his marriage, if he sees sufficient reason for it. Nor, 2. Does the apostle here forbid successive marriages, as if when a bishop has married one wife, or more, he might not lawfully marry again; for this he elsewhere allows, 1 Cor. vii. 8. from this it may not be in a man's power to abstain; many lose their first, and sometimes their second wives so soon, that were not after-marriages lawful, all the ends of marriage must be frustrate as to them; yet may we suppose by these words, and many others, that St. Paul proposes a greater degree of chastity to church governors than to other persons. Vigilant, very diligent and watchful in the performances of his whole duty, not long absent from his flock, nor negligent when he is among them; sober, governing his passions and appetites, reducing these rebellious powers under the dominion of reason and religion; of good behaviour, in his words, in his habit and garb, in his deeds and actions, neither proud and supercilious, nor morose and sour, but affable and easy, kind and courteous, of a composed temper and grave behaviour; given to hospitality, pality, not to sensuality; it is not the keeping of a free table, and open house for all comers, which St. Paul points at; but charity in entertaining strangers, poor Christians that left their country by persecution, or such as travelled upon their lawful affairs from place to place, the free relieving of such as are necessitous, and exposed to want and hardship, is the hospitality pointed at by our apostle; apt to teach; that is, both knowing and willing, able to teach, and forward to it, having both skill and will, ability and dexterity for that part of his duty, one that is neither ignorant of his duty, nor negligent in the performance of it.

3 Not given to wine, no striker, not greedy of filthy lucre but patient not a brawler, not covetous;

The negative character of a bishop now follows, shewing what he must not be: Not given to wine; that is, to much wine, no inordinate lover either of wine or strong drink, no wine-bibber, nor sinner at wine in his own house, much less at taverns and public houses: No striker, either with hands or tongue, no quarreller, that cannot keep his hand from hurting, no word-striker, no striker with his tongue in passion and anger; a word, we say, wounds deeper than a sword; the ministers of God may wound the consciences of men with the sword of the Spirit, but they must not wound the reputations of men with their own wrathful spirits: We must use our tongues rather to heal than wound; or if at any time to wound, it must be in order to healing. Not greedy of filthy lucre; no inordinate lover of money, which makes a man base and fordid, both in getting, keeping, and spending; but patient, meek and forbearing, not rigidly, exacting his due, not acting summo jure, but rather parting with somewhat which in strictness may be his right, for peace sake; Not a brawler, or contentious person, often engaged in law suits, but of a mild and peaceable disposition: Not covetous, or enslaved to the love of wealth; possess he may the good things of this life, but not be possessed by them.

4 One that ruleth well his own house, having his children in subjection with all gravity; 5 (For if a man know not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the church of God?)

A bishop being a ruler in the church of God, Timothy is advised to chuse such a one to rule in the church that well and wisely governs his own family, having his children in due subjection, and both he and they behaving themselves with becoming gravity; and St. Paul subjoins a reason for this apostolical injunction, arguing from the less to the greater, thus: "The church is a large family, the bishop's house a less; the former requires a greater skill in governing of it than the latter: If then a man cannot rule a less province, how shall he manage a greater? If he cannot keep up his authority with decency and becoming gravity in his own family, how shall such a one be thought fit to be entrusted with the care of the church of God?" Great are the obligations which lie upon the ministers of God above all other men, to guide and govern their own families, to keep their children in due subjection and their servants in great order; because their family miscarriages reflect greatly upon their authority and prudence, and the world will pronounce them unfit for rule in the church of God, who cannot govern their own house: If a man know not how to rule his own house, &c. Learn hence, That he who knows how to rule his own house well, is in a good posture of spirit for public rule; the same wisdom, justice, and holiness for kind, but more extensive, acts in either sphere, and will regularly move in both.

6 Not a novice, lest being lifted up with pride he fall into the condemnation of the devil.

A novice, signifies, a young plant: here, a young, raw, unexperienced person: Yet not so much young in years as in knowledge; for Timothy himself was very young: Not a novice in religion then, not that one is unexperienced in the mysteries of the gospel, undertaking to teach others before he has learnt himself. And the reason for this injunction is weighty; Lest being puffed up with pride, he fall into the condemnation of the devil: Implying, that young raw, and unexperienced persons, when put into public office, are in very great danger of falling into the sin of pride, the devil's sin, and of exposing themselves to condemnation, the devil's punishment, because their knowledge is weaker, and their passions stronger, and their graces feebler, and they want that experience which should consolidate their judgments, are therefore in great danger of self-exalting; for none so proud and confident as the ignorant and injudicious. Note here, That when St. Paul says, Lest he fall into the condemnation of the devil, it is as if he had said, "Lest he be condemned for the sin that the devil was condemned for, which was pride; not that the devil will condemn him for his pride, for the more proud a man is, the more the devil approves him: Nor is it the devil's office to condemn, but to execute: he is the executioner, not the judge; he will not condemn for sin, but he will eternally torment them whom God condemns.

7 Moreover, he must have a good report of them which are without; lest he fall into reproach and the snare of the devil.

Note here, How needful it is for a minister to be of an untainted reputation; a bishop must be of good report, saith St. Paul; it is necessary for his own salvation that he be good, and for the salvation of others, that he be accounted so: Great is their sin, then, who go about to blast a minister's reputation, because something of reputation is absolutely necessary to render his ministry successful. Note farther, He must have a good report of them that are without, that is, without the church, unbelieving Jews or Gentiles, with whom he formerly conversed; lest becoming contemptible, and so not able to perform his duty as he should, he give occasion to the heathen to blaspheme Christianity, and to reproach him for his former course of life.

8 Likewise must the deacons be grave, not double-tongued, not given to much wine, not greedy of filthy lucre.

Note here, 1. That there are but two sorts of fixed church-offices mentioned by St. Paul, bishops and deacons;

as the church had its own bishop, so likewise their own deacons: These were at first instituted for the service of the poor; the alms of the church were brought to the altar, the deacons received them, and distributed them among the aged and impotent from house to house; Now to beware of those faults that are frequently committed in common conversation, as light and vain discourse, saying, one thing to one person, and the contrary to another. Let the deacons be grave, not guilty of levity, but serious and composed, men of a modest and becoming carriage; not double-tongued, nor over talkative persons, nor saying one thing to one person, and the contrary to another, according to the place or company they fell into: not given to much wine; not the thing, but the excess, is forbidden; not greedy of filthy lucre, seeking to get wealth by sordid ways and means.

9 Holding the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience.

That is, they must be sound believers, and of an upright life, maintaining truth of doctrine, and soundness of faith, by sincerity of heart and integrity of life.

10 And let these also first be proved; then let them use the office of a deacon being found blameless.

Here Timothy is directed not to put any persons suddenly into the office of a deacon, but first to prove them for some considerable time; and their sufficiency being approved, let them be ordained, and use the office of a deacon.

11 Even so must their wives be grave, not slanderers, sober, faithful in all things.

In the original it runs, Let the women; by which is meant, either the deacons' wives, or the deaconesses, who were appointed to take care of the poor women, as the deacons were of the men: Understand it of both; these qualifications are very excellent and well becoming of both they ought to be grave and sober not light and airy, no slanderers, not devils, says the original; the sense is, not railers, nor false accusers, but diligent and faithful in all business, and trusty in all affairs. It is not enough and sufficient that the ministers of the gospel themselves be of a grave and sober conversation, but their wives also must and ought to take especial care that they demean themselves answerable to their place and station, and suitably to the character which their husbands bear; so must their wives be grave.

12 Let the deacons be the husbands of one wife, ruling their children and their own houses well.

That is, "Let not any such be admitted deacon who has more wives than one, or that hath injuriously put away one, and married to another; and let them shew by the good government of their own children and household, that they are fit to govern the church of God." Note here, That the higher offices of the church were usually chosen out of the inferior; and accordingly, the qualifications for both offices, namely, that of bishops and deacons, are for the greatest part the same, both in this epistle, and in that to Titus.

13 For they that have used the office of a deacon well, purchase to themselves a good degree, and great boldness in the faith, which is in Christ Jesus:

That is, "Although the deacons be as servants to the bishops, yet such as use that office well, according to the foregoing rules, by so doing do purchase to themselves a good degree above the vulgar; and also have farther hopes of being advanced in the church to higher offices, and when they preach the word (as did Philip and Stephen) they might do it with great boldness, and with expectation of success, living suitably to the qualification of their function, and walking according to the rule of the gospel, which they professed and taught."

14 These things write I unto thee, hoping to come unto thee shortly: 15 But if I tarry long, that thou mayest know how thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house of God, which is the church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth.

As if the apostle had said, "I do hope to come to thee very shortly; but if I tarry long, or be prevented at last, as I am uncertain, I write these things to thee, that thou mayest know how thou oughtest to converse in the house of God, the church of the living God in which thou art a pillar and firm buttress of the truth." Some, by the pillar here, will understand the church, as being the foundation on which truth is built, and giving it authority; but she is therefore the church of Christ, because she holds the truth, and it is essential to her being to maintain and teach all necessary truths: she holds it forth, and publishes it to the world, sustaining it, and supporting it as a pillar doth the king's proclamation: The truth receives not its authority from the church, but the church receives authority by adhering to the truth. Others, by the pillar, understand Timothy, and that St. Paul is here exhorting, that according to his office, Timothy should be a pillar and buttress of truth in the church. Hence Gal. ii. 9. James, Cephas, and John, are said to be pillars there, as is Timothy here; a pillar in the church signifies a man that is well rooted and grounded, and strong in the faith; this he exhorts Timothy to be. Note here, 1. The church's surpassing dignity: She is called the house of God, in which he dwells; God is present in all places, even in hell itself, by the immensity of his being; but the church is his palace, the place of his peculiar residence. 2. The ministers of the church's important duty namely, as pillars to support, maintain, and uphold the divine truth against all those that seek to corrupt and suppress the same. Be thou, O Timothy, in the church of God, as the pillar and ground of truth.

16 And without controversy, great is the mystery of godliness: God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory.

Our apostle having exhorted Timothy, in the preceding verses, verses, to behave himself worthily in the church of God, and as a pillar supporting, maintaining, and upholding the truths of God, in this verse he reckons up six principal heads of evangelical truths, which are to be asserted and defended by him; ushering them in with this preface; Without controversy great is the mystery of godliness. Learn That our holy faith, our Christian religion is a mystery, a great mystery, an unquestionable mystery, a mystery of godliness, a mystery hidden in God, Eph. iii. or hidden in Christ, Col. iii. 3. hidden in the Scriptures, Rev. iii. 18. hidden in and under the types and shadows of the ceremonial law; nay, hidden even in the gospel itself, for we know but in part: And if Christianity be a mystery, then the knowledge of it is the effect of divine revelation and supernatural discovery, not to be known by the light or benefit of nature, but God reveals it to us by his Spirit: Farther, if it be a mystery, then the dispensation of it is a special favour, an arbitrary and voluntary discovery of it to whom, when, and how far God himself pleases: Finally, if it be a mystery, then it is to be apprehended by faith, and not to be fathomed by reason; faith looks at revelation, reason calls for a demonstration; faith embraces like Abraham, what reason laughs at, like Sarah; Without controversy, great is the mystery of Godliness. This is St. Paul's magnificent preface, which requires not only the assent, but challenges the obedience and adoration of our faith. Observe next, The six principle heads of evangelical truth here reckoned up for Timothy to study, to preach, and to defend. 1. God was manifested in the flesh; that is, the second Godhead appeared in our human flesh and nature. Astonishing mystery! That the Creator of the world should become a creature, lodged in a stable, and cradled in a manger! The infinite Deity and finite flesh met in one person, and yet the Godhead not humanized, nor the humanity deified, but both invisibly conjoined: the human nature was united to the Godhead miraculously, assumed integrally, united inseparably. 2. Justified in or by the Spirit; that is, the Spirit was Christ's witness, that he was no impostor or deceiver, but the promised and expected Messiah, working all his miracles by the power of the Spirit, raising himself from the dead, and thereby declaring himself to be the Son of God with power, by the Spirit of holiness; and by sending the Spirit after his ascension into heaven, down upon his disciples here on earth: Thus the Spirit justified Christ really and truly to be what he professed himself to be, and sealed his doctrine to the world, 3. Seen of angels; they celebrated his birth, and gave notice of it to the world, ministered to him in the wilderness, succoured him in the garden, were present at his resurrection, accompanied him in his ascension: Seen of angels. Lord, what a stupendous sight was this! For man to see an angel is wonderful, but for an angel to see God become man, was still amazing; they sang their gloria patri, at his birth, they beheld and applauded his happy victory over Satan in the desert. Oh! with what eyes did they look upon his bloody sweat in the garden! With what officiousness did they roll away the stone in the morning of the resurrection! And with what universal triumphs and acclamations did they accompany him to his celestial throne! 4. Preached to the Gentiles: the wall of separation between Jew and Gentile being broken down; Christ was, by his commissioned apostles, preached to the Gentile world; the Jews were once children, and we dogs; theirs was the bread ours were the crumbs; but now are we made fellow-commoners with them, heirs of the same, partakers of the same glory. 5. Believed on in the world: Christ came into the world in so despicable a manner, that he was disregarded by the world, who are allured and taken with pomp and outward magnificence: Therefore, that any should believe on him in the world, is a just wonder, and a mystery of godliness; though Christ be liberally preached, yet he is sparingly received. Isa. liii. 1. Who hath believed our report? Christ is believed on in the world: but, alas! comparatively but by few. Lord, enlarge the number of thy believers, and confirm that number in believing. 6. Received up into glory, where he sits in his glorified humanity, united to his glorious Deity, with all that blood and gore wiped off with which he was besmeared in the day of his passion, and his body shining brighter than ten thousand suns. This body the heavens must contain till the restitution of all things, when he shall come from heaven as he went into heaven attended with glorious angels, summon the whole host of saints to meet him in the air, that so they may ever be with their Lord; Oh! strengthen our faith in this desirable happiness, and set our souls a-longing for the full fruition and final enjoyment of it. Amen.

C H A P. IV.

Our apostle in this chapter acquaints Timothy with (that he may forewarn the church of) an apostasy and revolt from the Christian faith, though not in all parts of it, yet from several main and fundamental parts of it; withal assuring them, it was no more than what had been long foretold; for the Spirit spake expressly that in the latter times some should depart.

NOW the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils: 2. Speaking lies in hypocrisy, having their conscience seared with a hot iron; 3. Forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving of them which believe and know the truth.

As if our Apostle had said, "Although the mystery of godliness, the doctrine of Christianity, be so clearly revealed, and fully confirmed, yet the spirit of prophecy has very plainly foretold us, that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith once embraced by them, either in whole or in part; turning apostates by giving heed to impostures and doctrines of men, teaching errors suggested by devils, who cover their lies with hypocritical pretences, and are men of hardened hearts, seared consciences, profligate lives; forbidding some, whom they have seduced to marry, and commanding them to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving by them which do believe believe and know the truth." Observe here, 1. That the apostasy and defection of a considerable part of the Christian church in the latter times was foreseen and foretold very long before it came to pass; by Daniel, say some, chap. ix. 37, 38. &c. by St. Paul, say others in his second epistle to the Thessalonians; and in his first epistle to Timothy, the Spirit speaketh expressly, that some shall depart from the faith, that is, from the doctrine of the faith received, which we know the church of Rome has most notoriously done. 2. The cause of this apostasy and defection from Christianity, Giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils. Quest. But what is here meant by the doctrines of devils? Ans. These (says our reverend Archbishop Tillotson) can be no other doctrines than those tending to idolatry, which the scripture every where doth, in a particular manner ascribe to the devil, as the inventor and promoter of; therefore he tells us, that, in some ancient copies, the words run thus: In the latter times some shall apostatize from the faith; for they shall worship the dead having regard to doctrines of devils; so that the particular kind of idolatry into which some part of the Christian church should apostatize, is here pointed at, namely, That they should worship souls departed, or the spirits of dead men, which was part of the heathen idolatry, into which the children of Israel did frequently relapse: These departed souls were called demons, and were esteemed a middle sort of divine powers, between the supreme gods and mortal men, whose office it was to be agents and mediators between the gods above, and men below; thus is the holy city trodden down by the Gentiles, that is, overwhelmed with the Gentiles' idolatry. 3. The persons revolting, who they are foretold to be; not all, but some only: In the latter days some shall depart from the faith; not the whole visible church, but a very great and considerable part of it. Learn, thence, That the true church of Christ was never wholly extinguished, nor the light of the gospel ever quite put out, no, not in the greatest darkness that ever was, to overwhelm it; some (only) and not all, shall depart from the faith. Observe, 4. The persons described who should be the occasion of this apostasy and revolt, namely, such as speak lies in hypocrisy, and have seared consciences, that is, such stupid consciences as have lost the sense of good and evil, and do no longer do their office. These lies, which the apostate church of Rome is guilty of, the profound Mr. Mede styles, "Lying miracles, fabulous legends of the acts of saints and sufferings of martyrs, counterfeit writings under the name of the first and best antiquity." Lord! who could have coined or believed such monstrous stuff as the popish legends are fraught with, but such as are cauterized past all feelings and tenderness both of conscience and sense itself. 5. The doctrines discovered which these apostates would teach, namely, the forbidding of marriage to some, and enjoining abstinence from some meats as unlawful and unclean to others, both which are called doctrines of devils, that is, wicked and devilish doctrines. Learn thence, That the popish doctrine forbidding marriage, not absolutely to all, but with restriction and limitation to some, to wit, their clergy, and all such as shall enter into holy orders, is a devilish and wicked doctrine; for it forbids that which the word alloweth, nay, in some cases commandeth, Heb. xiii. 4. Marriage is honourable in all, and the bed undefiled; if honourable in all; then surely lawful for all; under the Old Testament, the prophets, priests, and Levites did marry; under the New Testament the ministers of God have a power to marry; 1 Cor. ix. 5. Have not we power to lead about a sister, a wife? And that they made use of their power, is evident from the following words, as well as other apostles, and Cephas. The other wicked doctrine concerning meats is also found in the church of Rome, who by a law do oblige some orders of men, as monks, to abstain from certain meats, reducing them thereby from their Christian liberty to a conformity to the legal rites, which may well be reckoned as an apostasy from the Christian faith; for although St. Paul, Rom. xiv. doth allow the forbearance of some sorts of meats to avoid scandal, yet he doth no where condemn the eating of them as unclean: The doctrine therefore of the church of Rome, forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, is wicked and devilish.

4 For every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving: 5 For it is sanctified by the word of God and prayer-

Here our apostle assigns a reason why Christians are not forbidden, under the gospel, to abstain from particular meats, namely, because the distinction of meats (clean and unclean) is taken away, and every creature of God is good in itself, and clean to us, and nothing to be refused as unlawful or unclean, if it be received thankfully from God's hand; for it is sanctified by the word, that is, by the gospel; it is made clean unto us, and lawful for us, that having taken off the difference of meats, and to the pure made all things pure. Note here, 1. The quality of all God's creatures as they come from him, and are given to us, every creature of God is good. 2. The use of God's creatures consisting in their lawfulness unto us, and our liberty unto them, nothing is to be refused; so that there is no sin in the use of them, nor no religion in the forbearing of them, or abstaining from them; this liberty was given us by God, and restored by Christ, therefore we must not suffer our Christian liberty to be impeached by Judaism. 3. A condition necessary on our part, lest the creatures otherwise good and lawful, should become unto us evil and hurtful, and that is thankfulness; If it be received with thanksgiving; with the thankfulness of the heart, expressed by the language of the lips. 4. The way and means by which the creatures become clean and sanctified to us; namely, by the word of God and prayer. 1. By the word of God, here observe, A threefold word of God, by which the creature is sanctified, namely, the word of donation, the word of benediction, and the word of promise. By the first he bestows his creatures upon us, by the second he blesses the creatures to us, and by the third he confirms his blessing in Christ; in whom, and by whom we have a covenant right unto, and a sanctified use of all the mercies which we do enjoy. 2. By prayer, namely, as it obtains from God, first, A right improvement; and secondly, A comfortable enjoyment of all that we do receive; or thus, the creature is sanctified to us by prayer in the procurement of it it; in the fruition of it, in the review and recognition of it, and God's mercy in it, with thanksgiving and praise, loving it after God, and for God, and in subordination to God. Thus then is every creature of God good; and nothing to be refused, being sanctified by the word of God and prayer.

6 If thou put the brethren in remembrance of these things, thou shalt be a good minister of Jesus Christ, nourished up in the words of faith, and of good doctrine, whereunto thou hast attained. 7 But refuse profane and old wives' fables, and exercise thyself rather unto godliness.

Our apostle proceeds, from this verse to the end of the chapter, to lay several directions before Timothy with reference to his ministerial office. The first of which is, that he suggest unto, or put the brethren in remembrance of these things which the apostle had taught him, in order to their preservation from the peril and poison of these impostors; thus doing he would approve himself a good minister of Jesus Christ, and one nourished up with the sincere doctrine of the gospel. Here note, That the ministers of the gospel are, in the first place ministers or servants of Jesus Christ; secondarily, and in subserviency, they are ministers of the church; as a nobleman's servant employed by him to distribute wages, or appoint work to the inferior servants, is secondarily a minister to the servants, but primarily a servant to his Lord. The second duty that Timothy is exhorted to, is the avoiding and rejecting the doctrines of abstinence from meats and marriage, and to regard them no more than an old woman's tale, and to exercise himself unto real godliness. Note here, Something that Timothy must forbear, and something that he must follow after: He must forbear and refuse profane old wives fables; if thou wilt not swim down the tide of these apostatizing times, take heed of steering thy course by profane, though ancient customs; refuse them with scorn, and reject them with anger; One way to prevent apostasy is to refuse ungrounded antiquity. That which Timothy is exhorted to follow after, is real godliness; this is his duty, both as a minister, and as a member of Jesus Christ; real godliness ought to be minded as every man's, especially every minister's chief and principal business; religion must be our chief occupation.

8 For bodily exercise profiteth little: But godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come.

By bodily exercise he meaneth corporal austerities, abstinence from meats and marriage; all the external exercises of religion: These do profit little, though but a little, in comparison of the profit of godliness. Where note, That fastings, humiliations and watchings, with other bodily exercises, which serve to bring down the pride and wantonness of the body, have their proper and necessary use, and are expressive of a just revenge which a sinner takes upon himself for former excesses; they are, when wisely managed, what God accepts, but the least that God expects from us: Bodily exercise profiteth little. But observe, The universal usefulness of godliness to all the purposes of life;

Godliness is profitable in all things. 1. It is profitable to make a man rich, to help him to get and increase an estate; because it makes a man wise and prudent, diligent and industrious, thrifty and frugal. 2. It is profitable to make a man renowned as well as rich; it is the only way to attain a good name and reputation; the godly man is a worthy and excellent man, and he is an useful and serviceable man, and such do seldom miss of a good reputation in the world; those that want goodness themselves will yet commend it in others. 3. It is profitable for pleasure, as well as for riches and honour: for a life of religion doth increase the relish and sweetness of all our sensible enjoyments, so far is it from abridging us of any earthly delights: And besides, it adds to us a world of pleasures of its own; thus godliness is profitable unto men in all things, having the promises of happiness both in this life, and that which is to come, annexed to it.

9 That is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation. 10 For therefore we both labour and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, especially of those that believe.

Note, that this phrase of a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, used here, was used before, chap. 1. 15. That Christ came into the world to save sinners. Learn thence, That this proposition that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners, and this, that such sinners as of ungodly will become godly, and persevere in the practice of godliness, shall be happy in the life that now is, and that which is to come; these two propositions are faithful and remarkable sayings, worthy of the acceptance of all reasonable creatures. Note farther, that the belief of this proposition, That godliness has the promise of this and the next life, will cause all Christians, as it did St. Paul, to labour and suffer reproach in the cause of God, and this without weariness and fainting. Note, lastly, the title given to Almighty God, the Saviour of all men, that is, the Preserver of all men; but especially of all good men, when their temporal preservation conduces most to the advantages of his glory and their good: or if it be understood of eternal salvation, we must take it thus, That he publishes and proclaims, offers and tenders salvation to all men, although believers only are actually saved, because they only accept the offers and conditions of salvation.

11 These things command and teach. 12 Let no man despise thy youth, but be thou an example of the believers, in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity.

Still our apostle proceeds farther in direction and advice to Timothy, both as to his preaching and his practice, both as to his doctrine and conversation. 1. As to his preaching, he requires it to be done with due authority: These things command and teach, that is, these things teach commandingly, and with a necessary authority; the ministers of God speak from God, therefore may command for God. 2. As to his conversation, he exhorts him to exercise such becoming gravity in his deportment, that though he was very young, none might despise him or his function, because of his youth; where piety and modesty meet in young ministers, it will preserve their youth from contempt; and where levity and vanity are found, it will expose not only youth but grey hairs to contempt and scorn. 3. He directs him to be not only precedent to all ministers, but a pattern to all believers; be thou an example of the believers, and that, 1. In word, or speech; look that thy discourse be wise and instructive, not idle nor impertinent, much less frothy and profane, but let something for edification always drop from thy lips. 2. In conversation, look that thy gravity be beyond thy years, make up in thy deportment what is wanting in thy age; observe a just equality, neither be too assuming nor too prostrate, behave not thyself either above or below thyself. 3. In charity, shew benevolence, and exercise beneficence towards all mankind, according to thy ability and opportunity; nothing gives a minister a greater advantage for the success of his labours than charitable distributions; this gives us a throne in the hearts of our people, when wisely managed. 4. In spirit, that is, in zeal and warmth of spirit, in fervency of affection, in an active and sprightly zeal for the glory of God and the good of souls, such a zeal as may render the industrious in feeding, governing, and instructing thy flock. 5. In faith that is, in fidelity too, and constancy in the true religion, not enduring either to be huffed or wheedled out of the truth; for it is a sacred depositum, an holy treasure, which we must transmit to our posterity as our forefathers did to us, with their precious blood. 6. In purity, in chastity and cleanness, abstaining from sensual lusts, from wantonness and worldly mindedness; chuse spiritual delight now, for they are the entertainment which we must live upon to eternal ages. By all this we see how much it is in a minister's own power to procure a due esteem to himself, at least to prevent his own contempt, since an holy and exemplary deportment, faithful and constant labours, never fail to do that in some measure: But if we fail here, what other methods soever we use, we shall find God making good his threatening, Sam. ii. 30. that they which despise him, shall be lightly esteemed: nor will any titles, dignities, or pre-eminencies above others, secure the guilty from the efficacy of this curse, which will cleave to their persons, yea, to their memories, like a girdle to their loins.

13 Till I come, give attendance to reading, to exhortation, to doctrine. 14 Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery.

St. Paul being uncertain when he should see this young labourer again, adds farther instructions to those already given him. And here, 1. He requires him to give attendance to reading, that is, be diligent in private reading the holy scriptures, to enable him to teach, instruct, and exhort others, what they ought to believe and know, and what they ought to practise and do. Where note, That the illuminations and teachings of the holy Spirit must not take off any ministers from reading and studying the holy scriptures, but we must fit ourselves the better thereby, to exhort, direct and instruct others. 2. He stirs up and exhorts

Timothy, not to neglect, but to excite, to use, and diligently improve those eminent gifts which were given him by prophecy, that is, according to the foregoing prophecies concerning him, and by laying on of the hands of the presbytery, when he was ordained. Where note, That the ceremony of laying on of hands in ordination, is very ancient and apostolical: not accidental or indifferent, but a very necessary rite in the performance of that service; neglect not the gift which was given thee, with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery. Note 2. That persons ordained, ought with great care and diligence, to stir up the gifts God's holy Spirit conferred upon them; for negligence quenches the Spirit of God in them.

15 Mediate upon these things, give thyself wholly to them; that thy profiting may appear to all.

He exhorted him to read the scriptures before, now to meditate upon what he read. Where note, That if those who were inspired, and divinely qualified, must yet read, meditate; study hard, and employ their whole time to fit themselves for the ministerial work, what shall we think of the ignorance and impudence of our lay preachers, who without any divine qualification, and without any call or commission, without giving themselves wholly to these things, dare presume to teach the scriptures, when they never understood them; nay, can hardly read them! Meditate on these things, and give thyself wholly to them; be in them, says the original, lay out thy whole strength and time in studying God's will, and making known thy people's duty. Three things are here implicitly condemned in persons set apart for the holy function; 1. Sloth and negligence: It is a painful service we are engaged in, and wo unto us if we be slothful in business, if we be sparing of our pains for fear of shortening our days, and hastening our end; verily the lamp of our lives can never burn out better than in lighting others to heaven. 2. Worldly mindedness, 1. Pet. v. 2. feed the flock but not for filthy lucre: The spiritual man must not so mind earthly things as to make them his principal aim and scope; for if so, he will act accordingly and defeat all the ends of his ministry. The apostles had no settled maintenance, but their subsistence to seek; yet were wholly in these things. How much more should we be so now, who have our maintenance legally secured? How should we seek the kingdom of God and the welfare of our people's souls, seeing all other things are added to us, in measure, though not in excess? 3. Incumbrance by worldly business: He that must give himself wholly to these things, what leisure can he find for magistracy, for managing law suits, for farming of lands, and for secular concerns: We cannot make a business of two things so widely different from each other. Can we be spiritual persons and yet mere secular in our thoughts and cares? Well therefore might St. Paul say to Timothy, But thou O man of God see these things, 1 Timothy, vi. 11. Observe, lastly, The reason which the Apostle subjoins why he would have Timothy do all this; That his profiting may appear to all men: He must read, meditate, pray, and study, that he may improve and profit himself; though he was inspired, yet he must not rely on the Spirit's assistance without his own endeavours; and his improvement by study study must appear not barely to himself, but to others, to his people as well as himself, yea, to all persons: His growth and improvement by study and exercise must be so conspicuous, that all his flock may bear witness to it, and bless God for it. Meditate on these things and give thyself wholly to them, &c.

16 Take heed unto thyself, and unto thy doctrine; continue in them: for in doing this thou shalt both save thyself and them that hear thee.

As if the apostle had said, "Have a special regard to the piety of thy life, and to the purity of thy doctrine, and this continually; so shalt thou do what lieth in thee, to save both thine own soul and the souls of all thy people." 1. Take heed unto thyself. Our lives must be such as become ministers of God and preachers of righteousness: For the eyes of God and the whole world are upon us; the observing eye of God, the censorious and insidious eye of the world, who will charge the miscarriages of a single person upon the whole order, and condemn all for the faults of one: Therefore let every one take heed unto himself; the honour of our profession requires it, the conscience of our duty challenges it, a due regard to the glory of God, and our own reputation commands it. 2. Take heed unto thy doctrine, that it be the pure and uncorrupted word of God, expounded agreeably to the sense of the ancient church, and of our own church in particular, which has with the greatest care followed the ancient pattern: Many errors are abroad in the world, which have adulterated the truths of the gospel; it is therefore prudential and necessary, that the ministers of God keep at a great distance from every opinion which looks like heretical, and to come within reach of suspicion: It is not enough for us to be innocent, unless we appear so. Note farther, The order of the words: St. Paul bids Timothy first to take heed to this life, and next to his doctrine; not first to his doctrine and then to his life; Take heed unto thyself and to thy doctrine: Because the success of our doctrine depends upon the goodness of our lives; it is this must render our doctrine operative and effectual: This is the principal thing; we must do as well as teach: For who will believe him in the pulpit, who contradicts himself in his conversation? Therefore takes heed to thyself and to thy doctrine. Note, lastly, The great benefit of this course, and the blessed advantage of it: We shall save ourselves, deliver our own souls by our diligence and care; for the faithful nurse shall be paid, though the child dies at the breast; and not only ourselves, but our people also; them that hear us; that is, We shall do our utmost, and all that lieth in us, to save the souls committed to us, that they may be our crown of rejoicing, in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ, at his coming." God will pronounce us pure and innocent from the blood of all men; and if our people perish, their blood will be upon their own heads; which God avert for his mercy's sake. Amen.

CHAP. V.

REBUKE not an elder, but entreat him as a father; and the younger men, as brethren;

2 The elder women, as mothers; the younger, as sisters, with all purity.

Our apostle here directs Timothy how to manage rightly that great and important duty of ministerial reproof: If aged persons, elders in office, orders in age, do transgress, they must be rebuked, not magisterially, but fraternally, with humility and gentleness, according to their years; not with austerity and roughness: The elder men as Fathers, the elder women as mothers,, both with just deference and due respect: The younger must also not be treated with contempt; but with gentleness; the younger men as brethren, the younger women as sisters, both without pride and fierceness, and with all purity; shunning all levity and wantonness, and eschewing all that favoureth of immodesty or unchastity in thought, speech, look, or behaviour. Learn hence, That although the ministers of God must not flatter or favour any person, to the prejudice either of truth or holiness, yet must they put a difference between persons in their reproof; they must not deal with the aged as they deal with the younger, (when we speak reproof, we must also speak respect to the ancient spiritual fathers) no more than natural children must behave themselves proudly against the ancient, and basely against the honourable.

3 Honour widows that are widows indeed. 4 But if any widow have children or nephews, let them learn first to shew piety at home, and to requite their parents; for this is good and acceptable before God. 5 Now she that is a widow indeed, and desolate, trusteth in God, and continueth in supplications and prayers night and day. But she that liveth in pleasure is dead while she liveth, 7 And these things give in charge, that they may be blameless.

Our apostle proceeds to give Timothy directions concerning widows, particularly those who were to be maintained by the church's charity, and to live upon it. Note, 1. The persons to be relieved and supported by the church's charity, Widows indeed; that is, such widows as were desolate, being deprived both of husband and maintenance at once; and having neither children, nor grand-children, nor near relations, in a capacity to relieve them; and they were also such as were resolved to continue in widow-hood: These he required should be honoured, that is, have respect shewn them, maintenance allowed them, employment provided for them, to visit the sick and poor, and give notice of their wants to the church, and to spend their time in the exercise of devotion, trusting in God: Continue in supplication and prayer night and day. 2. That such widows as had children and near relations, were to be taken care for, by them, and not by the church: Let them learn to shew piety at home, that is, relieve their own relations before they shew kindness to strangers, or before the church be burdened with them; where the original word is very emphatical and signative: Let them exercise religion and godliness towards their own house; implying, that to extend our charity to our nearest relations is a duty in the first place, and to perform it with cheerfulness, is an act of religion and godliness, and that it is in vain to pretend to religion, if we see a relation relation in want, and are able, but unwilling to relieve them. 3. The character which St. Paul gave of some widows in his time; they lived in pleasure; with the censure which he passed upon them, namely, that they were dead, whilst they lived: She that liveth in pleasure, that is, licentiously, sportingly, wantonly, profusely, to the dishonour of her husband's memory, and her own personal disgrace, she is dead in sin, dead to Christ, and his holy religion, whilst she lives in the world; and so is not to be looked upon by the church as a vital member of it, much less to be maintained by the church's charity. This is what St. Paul thought needful to give Timothy in charge concerning widows, that so they might be found blameless, and without scandal to religion.

8 But if any provide not for his own, and especially for those of his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel.

That is, "If any professing Christianity, and having ability, provides not for his own kindred, but especially for those of his own house, as parents or children, he liveth so contrary to the Christian faith, that in effect he denies it, and is worse than an infidel, who ordinarily take care of their parents, and make provision for their poor relations." The old Heathens had this among them as an universal principle of nature, To honour the gods, and provide for their parents; affirming, That no man can do any thing more acceptable to the gods, than by ...aping favours upon their parents; and that nothing can be a greater evidence of atheism and impiety, than to neglect and despise them. Learn hence, That it is, most unnatural to be hardened against those to whom we stand engaged by near relation or natural bonds; the light of nature teaches infidels much better.

9 Let not a widow be taken into the number under threescore years old, having been the wife of one man, 10 Well reported of for good works; if she have brought up children, if she have lodged strangers, if she have washed the saints feet, if she have relieved the afflicted, if she have diligently followed every good work.

Our apostle had given directions concerning such widows as were to be maintained by the church's charity in the preceding verses; he speaks now of such widows as were to be admitted into the church's service under the name of deaconesses, whose office it was to take care of the aged and impotent, to be stayed monitors to the younger women, to attend poor women in labour, and to assist at the baptism of the female sex. St. Paul advises, that none be admitted under threescore years of age, and none that was divorced from one husband, and married to another; Let not a widow be taken into the number, that is, of church widows or deaconesses, under threescore years old, having been the wife of one man only. Next St. Paul lays down the general and particular qualifications of such widows as should be elected into the church's service: The general qualification is fruitfulness in good works; If she has diligently followed every good work. Where note, It is not her age alone, nor her poverty alone, but her Christian behaviour before all, that give her a right to the church's service and maintenance. The particular qualifications follow: If she has brought up children religiously, if she hath lodged strangers or Christian travellers hospitably, if she has condescended to the meanest offices, not disdainning to wash the very feet of poor Christians in their journeyings; if according to her ability she has done all the good she possibly could, though much short of what she desired. Note here, That in those hot countries persons travelled on foot, and without shoes, wearing only sandals; and having few or no inns for entertainment, or but little money to defray travelling-charges it was a very great work of pious charity to entertain Christian strangers, to receive and lodge them in their houses, to wash and cool, refresh and cleanse, their feet, and to administer to their necessities; such widows as are thus qualified, he directs may be taken into the church's service, and partake of her maintenance.

11 But the younger widows refuse. For when they have begun to wax wanton against Christ, they will marry; 12 Having damnation, because they have cast off their first faith. 13 And withal they learn to be idle, wandering about from house to house; and not only idle, but tattlers also and busybodies, speaking things which they ought not. 14 I will therefore that the younger women marry, bear children, guide the house, give none occasion to the adversary to speak reproachfully. 15 For some are already turned aside after Satan. 16 If any man or woman that believeth have widows, let them relieve them, and let not the church be charged; that it may relieve them that are widows indeed.

Next, he tells him what sort of widows he would have him refuse and reject, and by no means admit into the number of deaconesses or the church's servants; namely, the younger widows, who were not past child-bearing; and therefore waxing wanton against Christ, would marry; that is, growing weary of the church's service, and desisting of marriage in the church, would revolt from the faith, and marry some infidel out of the church: Having damnation; that is, committing sin worthy of damnation, and bringing themselves into a damnable condition. Because they renounce their first faith, which they made profession of when they were baptized, turning apostates to please their infidel husbands, which the apostle calls, a turning after Satan, ver. 15. to the great scandal of Christianity. Observe, next, Our apostle shews, that such young widows are usually idle, wandering about from house to house, prying into, and tattling about other folks' matters; to avoid all which, he advises the young women, and particularly the younger widows, to marry, and serve God in a conjugal relation, bearing and bringing up their children, guiding their families, and giving no occasion to the enemies of religion to reproach either it or themselves. From all which we may note, That celibacy, or single life, is no such state of holiness ness and perfection as the church of Rome would persuade us: We see here it has its temptations and snares and those not a few nor small; and that our apostle, in some cases, and to some persons, recommends a married life before it. Observe, lastly, For a close of his discourse concerning widows, he advises, That if any Christian has any helpless widow in his own family, or amongst his relations, that he relieve and maintain her, if he be able, and not cast her upon the charity of the church, lest there be not a sufficiency to supply the wants of such as are widows indeed, aged and helpless; for any to eat the poor's bread, who are not poor, and to whom it does not belong, is robbery.

17 Let the elders that rule well be counted worthy of double honour, especially they who labour in the word and doctrine.

Our apostle proceeds next to give Timothy directions concerning elders; not old men in years, but elders in office, such as were employed in the governing of the church, and over and above that service, laboured even unto weariness in preaching of the word, and expounding the Christian doctrine, requiring that double honour be given unto such. Note here, 1. The elder's work and duty declared: To rule well; wisely to preside over, and discreetly to govern, the church of Christ; also to labour in the word and doctrine: to take pains in preaching the gospel upon all occasions: Those that are advanced to the highest eminency in the church, will not think themselves above this part of their duty. Note, 2. The honour and respect challenged on their behalf: Double honour is their due: namely, an honour of reverence, and an honour of maintenance, and a double measure of either: Some think it an allusion to the first-born, who was the priest of the family, and had a double portion amongst his brethren; the Levites succeeded them, and the ministers of the gospel these; who, when laborious in governing and teaching the church of Christ, deserve more honour and better maintenance than the unkind world is willing to confer upon them; who, instead of double honour, sometimes deny them civil respect: Note, 3. In that the apostle styles the minister's maintenance, honour, it follows, that their maintenance is not to be esteemed in the nature of alms, but of a tribute paid by an inferior to a superior; neither is our maintenance mercenary wages, but such as ought to be given as a testimony of honour, as well as in the nature of a reward. As then they are worthy of, let them never fail to receive double honour, who rule well, and also labour in the word and doctrine.

18 For the scripture saith, Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn: And, The labourer is worthy of his reward.

These words evidently shew, that by honour, in the former verse, is to be understood maintenance: A place is here out of Deut. xxv. where the law of Moses forbade the muzzling of the ox that treadeth out the corn, but allowed him feeding all the time of working: In like manner, the labour of the church's guides gives them a right to the church's maintenance and honour; but such as do not labour, have a right to neither.

19 Against an elder receive not an accusation but before two or three witnesses. 20 Them that sin rebuke before all, that others also may fear. 21 I charge thee before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, and the elect angels, that thou observe these things without preferring one above another, doing nothing by partiality.

Here our apostle directs Timothy how to proceed in church-censures against open offenders: Which plainly shews, that there was a right of judging and censuring offenders in Timothy, by virtue of his office. First, then, he begins to acquaint him with his duty in censuring an elder, and advises him never to admit an accusation against such, without the attestation of two or three witnesses: Because, (1.) It is the interest of the church of Christ, that the reputation of its ministers be supported. (2.) Because prejudiced persons will be ready to accuse without reason. Conscientious ministers shall never want accusers, if false accusers can but find judges that are willing to believe them: Therefore, against an elder, receive not an accusation, but before two or three witnesses. Next he advises him, when there is a just and sufficient cause for censuring an elder, to do it publicly. Them that sin, that is, such elders as sin, and are convicted of it, and so are become scandalous by it, rebuke before all the church, before all the clergy, as in a synod, putting them to public shame, that others may fear to sin, seeing thee to punish so publicly and impartially. Lastly, He concludes his advice with a very solemn charge to Timothy, before God and Christ, and the glorious angels, to observe these rules of justice in ecclesiastical judicature, without preferring one man before another, doing nothing by a partial respect of persons. Learn hence, That to heinous is the sin of unjust and unrighteous judging, especially in ecclesiastical persons, and of such fatal mischief to the church, that all imaginable care and caution ought to be taken to prevent both the sin and the danger of it. I charge thee before God and the Lord Jesus Christ, that thou observe these things.

22 Lay hands suddenly on no man, neither be partaker of other men's sins: Keep thyself pure.

A twofold sense and interpretation is given of these words. 1. With reference to ordination, and so they are a caution to the governors of the church, to admit none into the sacred function hastily, rashly, without due examination, and sufficient trial; to which are added words of greater terror, neither be partaker of other men's sins; which ought to make a mighty impression on the minds of those in whom the power of ordination is lodged, since the words do plainly import, that such as do ordain any rashly, intitle themselves to all the scandal they give, and are partakers of their guilt. Note here, 1. The nature of the office the ministers of Christ are ordained to; to rule and labour in the word and doctrine. 2. An authority to Timothy to admit persons into this office, by laying on of hands. 3. The great care and caution, the heedfulness and circumspection, necessary in admitting persons to this holy function; Lay hands suddenly on no man: The welfare of the church, the honour of religion, the salvation of men's souls, depend much, very much, upon those who are admitted into holy orders. The second interpretation given of these words is, that Timothy is here directed now to carry himself in censuring and absolving of penitents: 2. As if St. Paul had said, "When thou hast justly censured an offender, be not too hasty in absolving of him, (for this also was done by imposition of hands) till some trial be made of his reformation, lest by so doing thou becomest guilty of his future faults: But keep thyself pure from all sin, whose office it is to censure and reprove sin in others." In both these senses have these words been understood. Lay hands suddenly on no man; keep thyself pure.

23 Drink no longer water, but use a little wine, for thy stomach's sake, and thine often infirmities.

Note here, 1. There is a lawful use of wine to support nature, not to clog it; to cure infirmities, not to cause them; Drink it Timothy might, medicinally, and no doubt for cheerfulness and alacrity, that the body might be more fit and expediate for duty; use a little wine for thy stomach's sake. 2. That our meat and drink should be fitted for the preservation of health, rather than for the gratification of our appetite; the former is Christian duty, the latter is brutish sensuality. 3. That the apostles who had the gift of healing, could not make use of it when and upon whom they pleased; no, not upon themselves; but must help their own infirmities in and by the use of ordinary means. Thus Timothy here, drink no longer water alone, but use a little wine with it for thy stomach's sake, and thine often infirmities thence proceeding.

24 Some men's sins are open beforehand, going before to judgment; and some men they follow after. 25 Likewise also the good works of some are manifest beforehand; and they that are otherwise cannot be hid.

St. Paul had just before exhorted Timothy to keep himself pure from other men's sins, whether candidates or penitents, here comes in subsequent advice, in order therunto. As if our apostle had said, "Timothy, if thou be diligent to observe, and not over hasty either in ordaining candidates, or absolving penitents, thou mayest in some measure perceive who are worthy, and who are unworthy. If thou layest thine hands upon those that are actually faulty, thou partakest with them, by being an occasion of their sinning; but if thou canst not discover their faultiness beforehand, though they afterwards prove wicked it is not thy fault; God will at length detect them, yea, they will discover themselves, and when their faults are manifest, deal with them according to the discipline of the church." Learn hence, 1. That how much soever sinners attempt the hiding, yet cannot they actually hide themselves, or their sinnings, from God's sight and knowledge. They cannot be hid, says St. Paul, though men labour much to hide them: Oh, sinner! there is no way to hide thyself from God: Thou mayest by repentance hide thyself in God, in the love, in the favour, in the mercy of God, but from God thou canst not be hid. As the saints good works are open and manifest in the sight and to the view of God, so they that are otherwise cannot be hid: When can a sinner be hid from him who is every where? or what thing can be our covering from him, in whose sight all things are open? Lord! what will it avail to hide ourselves from men, when we lie open and manifest to the eye of God? They that are otherwise cannot be hid.

CHAP. VI.

LET as many servants as are under the yoke count their own masters worthy of all honour, that the name of God and his doctrine be not blasphemed. 2. And they that have believing masters, let them not despise them, because they are brethren; but rather do them service, because they are faithful and beloved, partakers of the benefit.—

Our apostle having, in the preceding chapters, instructed Timothy to give the necessary directions for the performance of several relative duties, in this chapter he particularly directs him to instruct Christian servants, to the acceptable performance of that great duty of obedience, which they owe to their respective masters, whether infidels or Christians. Christianity frees persons from sinful slavery and bondage, but not from civil servitude and subjection. Religion does not level persons, but allows of an inequality amongst them, superiors and inferiors; and as it gives the former a power to command, so it lays the latter under an obligation to obey. Observe, 2. The general duty required of all servants towards their masters, and that is to give them all the honour and obedience which is due in that relation; let them account their masters worthy of all honour. What masters? 1. Their infidel and unbelieving masters; they are required to carry it dutifully and respectfully towards them: 2. Their believing or Christian masters; they should not despise them because they are brethren; for Christian brotherhood consists with inequality of place and relation, and with subjection of one person to another: But they ought to serve such masters the more readily and cheerfully, because brethren, beloved of God, and partakers of the benefit, namely of redemption by Christ, and of the sanctifying grace of God. Observe, lastly, the grand argument which St. Paul uses to enforce the duty of obedience upon all servants, that the name of God and his doctrine be not blasphemed; that is, the men of the world will reproach religion; revile Christianity, and say that it teaches, or allows at least, that men be stubborn and disobedient: Where, note, That the poorest and meanest professor of Christianity may do much good or much hurt to religion. Some might be ready to say, "Alas! What credit or discredit can a poor servant do to religion?" Much every way: He may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour, Tit. ii. 9. by his Christian behaviour; and the name of God, and his doctrine, may be blasphemed by him, if he be negligent in his duty: None are so inconsiderable, but they are capable of serving the great ends of religion, and may honour God in some measure; and are capable of being honoured by him upon earth, and with him in the highest heavens.

—These

—These things teach and exhort. 3 If any man teach otherwise, and consent not to wholesome words, even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the doctrine which is according to godliness; 4 He is proud, knowing nothing, but doting about questions, and strifes of words, whereof cometh envy, strife, railings, evil surmising. 5 Perverse disputings of men of corrupt minds, and destitute of the truth, supposing that gain is godliness. From such withdraw thyself.

Note here, 1. The solemn charge which the Holy Ghost by St. Paul gives to Timothy, to teach and press these relative duties of servants toward their masters, with great zeal and affectionate earnestness, These things teach and exhort; as if our apostle had said, “They are duties of great moment, therefore, teach and press them earnestly.”— Doubtless there is much of the pleasure and will of God in these commands, and the honour and glory of God is much concerned in them, otherwise the Spirit of God had never been so earnest in the pressing of them: the power of holiness, in nothing discovers itself more conspicuously, than in the performance of relative duties; we are no more really, than what we are relatively; rational holiness is the brightest ornament of religion. 2. The high character which St. Paul gives of this doctrine, which urges the practice of these relative duties; he calls what he says and writes about it, wholesome words, even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ. Learn thence, that the words written by St. Paul, in this and his other epistles, are the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, that is, words agreeable to his mind and will, written with an eye to his glory, promoting his honour, correspondent with, and suitable to his practice when here on earth. 3. The odious character wherewith he brands those false flattering teachers, which preached contrary doctrine to what Jesus Christ by his apostles had delivered; he charges them with pride, ignorance, envy, strife, railing, evil surmising, and with supposing that gain was godliness; that is, their end in professing godliness was this, that they might make gain of it, and get preferment by it, making use of religion only as a block to take horse at: But to make use of religion in policy, for worldly advantage sake, is the way to be damned with a vengeance for religion sake. Lastly, St. Paul’s advice to Timothy, to withdraw from these men, from such withdraw thyself; hold no communion with them, maintain no disputes with them, for they dote about questions, and strive about words. Note here, from St. Paul’s bidding Timothy withdraw himself from them, that it is very evident that he speaks of persons who were then in being; the Gnostic heretics, according to some, the Judaizing teachers, in the opinion of others; that is, they of the circumcision, who taught things which they ought not, for filthy lucre sake. Whoever they were, St. Paul’s admonition to Timothy, to withdraw himself from such, teaches us, that heretical seducers are to be shunned and avoided, rather than disputed with, as unfit for our Christian communion, and common conversation. These things teach and exhort. If any teach otherwise, &c.

6 But godliness with contentment is great gain. 7 For we brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out. 8 And having food and raiment, let us be therewith content.

As if the apostle had said, “Although these seducers are for making a gain of godliness yet we know that godliness is great gain, especially godliness with contentment; with contentment, I say, which it becomes us to have, for we brought nothing into this world with us, and shall carry nothing away with us; having therefore food and raiment, let us be therewith content and satisfied.” Learn hence, 1. That godliness is the sincere practice of the Christian religion, so called, because it directeth and prescribeth to us the true and only way of worshipping and serving God. 2. That some men suit their godliness in their worldly ends, they make a trade and saving bargain of it. 3. That godliness, or the sincere practice of the Christian religion, is true gain, great gain, yea, the best gain, both for this world, and that which is to come. 4. That one great point of godliness, is to be content with what we have, yea, though it be only food and raiment. Contentment is a sedate and quiet temper of mind about outward things: It is the wisdom and will of God not to give all alike, but to some more, to others less, of these outward comforts; but nothing beside food and raiment is absolutely necessary, a little will suffice a contented mind; he is not rich that has much, but he that has enough: That man is poor who covets more, having food and raiment, &c. Lastly, The apostle’s argument to excite and move the Christian to this duty of contentment, without enlarging his desires, inordinately after the world, and the perishing satisfaction of it: For we brought nothing into the world, &c. Where remark, That the note of assurance is fixed rather to our carrying out than to our bringing in; the apostle doth not say, It is certain that we brought nothing into the world and we shall carry nothing out: But he says, We brought nothing in, and it is certain we can carry nothing out. The note of assurance is applied to the latter; for this reason, I conceive, because though all persons come naked, and bring nothing with them into the world, yet abundance is put upon them, and they are born heirs to vast possessions: But it is obvious to every eye, and most indubitably certain, that they carry nothing away with them. Death is called an unclothing; it unclothes the body, disrobing it of all its gaudy and glorious attire: yea, it unclothes the bones, our flesh wears off quickly in the grave: we proverbially say of a rich man, he has left a vast estate, left it behind him, carrying neither a foot of land, nor a farthing of money, with him; therefore doth St. Paul add, it is certain we can carry nothing out.

9 But they that will be rich, fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts which drown men in destruction and perdition:

Note here, 1. The parties described, they that will be rich; that is, whether God will or no; their hearts are set upon the world, they see it coming, and have it they will, if by any means right or wrong, they can come at it, ask nobody’s leave, no not God Almighty’s leave, but men they are resolved to be. 2. Their danger represented, they fall into temptation and a snare, and many foolish lusts, &c. Learn hence, That a will and resolution to be rich, is the occasion of much mischief to those that cherish and allow it in themselves; a will to be rich, is to make riches our principal business, our main scope, our great work, to pursue the world with the full bent of our wills; Now the bent of our wills is discovered, first, by intention, secondly, by industrious prosecution; when the mind is wholly intent upon getting wealth, and unwearied industry and endeavour is found in the pursuit of it. Now this is to make a god of the world; for that which is a man's aim, design, and end, is his chief good, and that which is our chiefest good is God. Learn, 2. That an hot and over-eager pursuit of the world, lays a man open to endless temptations, so that it is not only difficult, but impossible, to keep his innocency; and that being irrecoverably lost, drowns a man in perdition and destruction.

10 For the love of money is the root of all evil: Which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows.

Here we have the nature of covetousness, the evil and sin of covetousness, and the mischief and hurt of it declared. Note, 1. The nature of it: It is an inordinate love of money, an insatiable desire after wealth. 2. The evil and sinfulness of it: It is a root of sin, The root of all evil; the fruit of all sin grows from this root, distrustful care, tormenting fear, anger, malice, envy, deceit, oppression, bribery, perjury, vexatious law-suits, and the like; nay, farther, covetousness is the root of heresy in judgment, as well as of iniquity in practice: They have erred from the faith; that is, in point of doctrine, as well as in practice: It makes a man believe, as well as act, against the rule of faith, for filthy lucre. 3. The mischief and hurt of covetousness declared; it pierces, it pierces through with sorrows, yea, with many sorrows. But whom doth it pierce? First, Others: it pierces the poor, the needy, the widow, the fatherless, all that fall within the reach of its griping hand: Nay, it doth not spare its own master, or slave rather, but pierces him: They pierce themselves through, says the apostle, with many sorrows, with many more, and much worse sorrows, than they pierce others with. Riches ill-gotten, by covetousness or oppression, instead of making their owners heartily merry, make their consciences ake, and give them many a stitch in their side. None can tell what gall and wormwood springs from this bitter root both to themselves and others: The love of money is the root of all evil, &c. It is the root of all evil, of sin, and also of trouble and disquiet.

11 But thou, O man of God, flee these things; and follow after righteousness, godliness, faith, love, patience, meekness.

Observe here, 1. The apostle's compellation, or the title given to Timothy: Thou, O man of God. It is a title borrowed from the Old Testament, where it is frequently given to the prophets, who revealed the mind and will of God to the people. Now by giving it to Timothy, the apostle intimates his duty to him, to contemn the world, and flee the eager pursuit of riches. As if the apostle had said, "O Timothy! Thou art a minister, and man of God, solemnly dedicated to his service, and devoted entirely to his glory; see then that thou abhor and avoid that detestable sin of covetousness. Heavenly truths are the subjects of thy daily study: Oh! let not earthly things be the object of thy chiefest delight and love: But follow after spiritual riches, namely, righteousness and godliness, faith and love, patience and meekness; that godliness which gives contentment with food and raiment, that faith which assures us of a better and more enduring substance, that righteousness or justice which requires us to let every man enjoy his own, that love which makes us willing to distribute, that patience which makes us willing to submit to a low condition, that meekness which suppresses wrath against those that are injurious to us. All these virtues and graces are necessary to thee as a minister of God, they are certainly indications of a mind free from covetousness, and infallible preservations from it."

12 Fight the good fight of faith, lay hold on eternal life, whereunto thou art also called, and hast professed a good profession before many witnesses.

This whole verse is an allusion to the Olympic games, particularly to that of racing, where the garland or crown being hung up at the end of the goal, he that came first did lay hold of it, and take it to himself; and because these games were performed in the sight of many spectators, the apostle continues the allusion, and says, Timothy had before many witnesses professed his readiness to suffer for the faith. The sense of the apostle in this advice seems to be this: "Fight the good fight of faith: Go on by faith to overcome all temptations and difficulties; press toward the mark, till thou lay hold on the prize, which is eternal life: To which spiritual warfare and Christian race thou gavest in thy name, when, being baptized and ordained, thou madest a public profession of thy faith before many witnesses."

13 I give thee charge in the sight of God, who quickeneth all things, and before Christ Jesus, who before Pontius Pilate witnessed a good confession; 14 That thou keep this commandment without spot unrebukeable, until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ: 15 Which in his time he shall shew who is the blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings, and Lord of lords: 16 Who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto; whom no man hath seen, nor can see: To whom be honour and power everlasting. Amen.

Observe here, What a solemn adjuration and vehement charge is given in Timothy, by our apostle, to watch and guard against the sin of covetousness, and to avoid the eager pursuit of worldly wealth: I charge thee before God and Christ, that thou keep this commandment spotless and unrebukeable, until the coming of Christ, and mayest be found such at his appearing. 2. What a glorious display our apostle apostle here makes of the adorable attributes of God; He styles him the God that quickeneth all things; that is, all things that have or shall have life; the blessed and only Potentate, because all power is essential in him, and derived from him; who only hath immortality, that is, an original, primitive, simple independent, essential, immortality, that is only proper and peculiar to God; he only is essentially and necessarily of himself immortal; dwelling in that light which is unaccessible, and none can approach unto, and whom no man hath seen, or can see: God is invisible in his essence; he is not to be seen by any mortal eye on earth, the eye of faith sees him only here; nay, he is not to be seen by any glorified eye in heaven, in his divine essence; the nature and essence of God never was seen, nor shall be seen. But we are by the sight of God in heaven, to understand a more clear and full manifestation of God unto us, even so far as our glorified natures can bear it; it will be abundantly beyond expression, yea, beyond our comprehension. 3. The testimony which our apostle bears to our Lord Jesus Christ when here on earth; that before Pontius Pilate he witnessed a good confession; that is he did not deny the truth to save his life, but gave all his ministers and people an example of courage and constancy in owning the truth, and sealing it with his blood. I give thee charge in the sight of God, &c.

17 Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not high minded, nor trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy; 18 That they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate; 19 Laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold on eternal life.

Our apostle having, in a very solemn manner, exhorted Timothy to avoid that dangerous sin of covetousness himself, in the foregoing verses, he doth in these verses require him to lay the same charge upon others, particularly upon worldly rich men: Charge them that are rich. Note here, 1. Timothy's duty, not barely to exhort and teach, but to charge and command. True, the ministers of Christ are servants to their people; but servants to their souls, not to their wills, much less to their lusts: There is an authority in our office, which impowers us to command for God, as well as to intreat. 2. The subject of this charge: them that are rich in this world: Mark, No man is forbidden to be rich, nor yet to use such lawful means, by which, through God's blessing thereupon, men may be rich: But rich men need a charge; they want plain dealing from ministers, because they meet with so little of it from other men; for some flatter them, others fear them: God's ministers ought surely to deal faithfully with them. 2. The charge itself, and this is set down negatively and affirmatively; both twofold. (1.) The negative matter of the haughtiness of mind and spirit, is one special sin which great men are subject to. When God lifts them up by his providence, they lift up themselves by pride. There is a secret malignity in riches, when they meet with men's corruptions, to lift them up above their due region; though neither the wiser, the holier, the nearer heaven, for all their wealth, nay, perhaps, a great deal nearer hell for the abuse of it; yet still the rich think high, look big, breathe scorn, talk with disdain, forgetting that God gives them riches to exalt him, and not themselves. Next part of the negative charge is, That they trust not in uncertain riches: intimating, That the creature-confidence, or making an idol of wealth, is the dreadful bane and ruin of some rich men: Their actions say to the gold, Thou art my hope; and to the fine gold, Thou art my confidence: But the vanity and sinfulness of this appears, by the apostle's calling them uncertain riches: uncertain in their abode and continuance with us, uncertain in their promises and pretences to us; we expect more from them than ever we find in them. Note, 4. The positive part of the charge: (1.) To trust in God, the living God, a bountiful God: He giveth riches; they buy, they do not give; he giveth all things: All the wealth in the world cannot buy a mouthful of air, or ray of light, if God withholds it. God is the giver of all, he giveth richly all things; the most miserable man cannot number the rich mercies which he doth receive; and he giveth all things richly to enjoy; that is, he gives an heart to take and taste the comfort of what he gives; he gives not only possession, but fruition. Riches can do none of these things; why then should we trust in uncertain riches, and not in the living God? 5. Another duty exhorted to, and that is, to imitate God in the works of bounty: To do good. Rich men are to make their wealth the materials of good works; nay, they must not only do good works, but be rich in good works: They must do it cheerfully, ready to distribute, without grudging, and without delay: They must do it diffusively; willing to communicate; that is, to do as much good to the community as possibly they can, upon principles of humanity, and upon principles of Christianity also. 6. The encouragements given to this duty. (1.) Thus to lay out, is to lay up, and that as in a treasury; it is like scattering of seed, in order to an increase and harvest. (2.) Thus to lay out upon others, is to lay up for themselves, they have the comfort here, and the reward hereafter. (3.) It to lay up for themselves a foundation; not by way of merit towards God, but by way of evidence in regard of ourselves; a testimony of our reconciliation to, and acceptance with God. (4.) It is a good foundation for the time to come: All our glory, wealth, and substance, is no durable foundation, here to-day, and gone to-morrow, but good works are a bank in heaven: All is deposited in a safe hand, that we lay out for God. (5.) It shall be rewarded with eternal life: Laying up for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, &c. Now from the whole, learn, 1. That the wisdom of God has seen fit to make a great distinction between men in this world; some are poor, others rich, as God sees best for both. 2. That some are rich, who are not rich in this world; rich in faith, heirs of a kingdom, yet wandering in deserts, dens, and caves. 3. That there are many who are only rich in this world: Look beyond the grave, and they are poor men, miserable men, having great possessions in this world, but but no provisions for the next. 4. That the great design which all men, especially rich men, should pursue and prosecute in this life, is, how they may in this life secure and lay hold of eternal life: Blessed be God, it may be laid hold upon; it is worth laying hold upon; it is life; it is eternal life. Quest. But how should we lay hold upon eternal life? Ans. 1. In our judgments: By having them convinced of the transcendent excellency of it, and by having them approve of the strictest conditions upon which it is tendered. 2. In our affections: by strong and vehement desires after eternal life. 3. In our endeavours: by a diligent use of all means in order to the obtaining of it, and particularly by doing good, by being rich in good words, by being ready to distribute, and willing to communicate; for hereby shall we lay up for ourselves a good foundation against the time to come, and at length, lay hold of eternal life.

20 O Timothy, keep that which is committed to thy trust, avoiding profane and vain babblings, and oppositions of science falsely so called: 21 Which some professing, have erred concerning the faith. Grace be with thee. Amen.

Our apostle concludes this his epistle to Timothy with a very passionate and pathetic exhortation to him: That he would maintain the purity of the doctrine of the gospel, and preach that to his hearers, avoiding all idle speculations and philosophical niceties, which the heathen philosophers admired, despising in the mean time, the plainness and simplicity of the gospel: And he tells him farther, that some Christians, being taken with this sort of learning, have corrupted Christianity, turned heretics, erring concerning the faith; to prevent which, he begs for Timothy the grace of God, to preserve, sanctify and save him. Learn hence, That in the first beginnings of Christianity, the philosophers, by pretences of great learning, were the greatest despisers, and the bitterest enemies of Christianity. Secondly, That the generality of them were taken up with mere useless quibbling, striving about words and barren notions, instead of necessary and useful knowledge. Thirdly, That Timothy, and every minister of Christ with him, ought to preach the gospel, without any such human mixtures in the purity and plainness of it; and the people receive it, with a simplicity of mind, to be guided and directed by it. Lastly, That the sanctifying and establishing grace of God is necessary, and indispensibly needful, to preserve both ministers and people stedfast in the faith of the gospel, and to persevere in their obedience to it.

SECOND EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL

It is generally concluded, That it was not long before St. Paul's death that he wrote this epistle to Timothy; and some think it was the last epistle that ever he wrote, in which he foretells the near approach of his own death and martyrdom, chap. iv. 6. saying, I am ready to be offered up, and the time of my departure is at hand.

The design of our apostle in this epistle is twofold: First, to forewarn, and thereby fore-arm, his dear son Timothy against those heretics, and false teachers, which were then arising and creeping into the church; and next to excite him to the utmost care and diligence in the faithful discharge of his office; exhorting him to prepare for sufferings and persecutions, from his own example set before him.

CHAP. I.

PAUL an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God according to the promise of life which is in Christ Jesus; 2 To Timothy my dearly beloved son: Grace, mercy, and peace from God the Father, and Christ Jesus our Lord.

In these verses, the penman of this epistle is described, by his name, Paul, by the office, an apostle, by the person that sent him, Jesus Christ, by the end of his mission to preach, the promise of life; that is, the gospel in which the promise of life eternal is contained. Note here, 1. That it is God's call, and not barely God's permission; his commanding will, and not barely his permitting will, which must warrant a person's undertaking the sacred office, and prove him a true minister of Jesus Christ: Paul an apostle by the will of God. 2. That as Adam brought the sentence of death upon all, the promise of life is made to us in and through Jesus Christ; so that promise of life must have ministers to proclaim it, and to preach this promise is their proper work. Observe, 2. The person described, to whom this epistle is directed, and that by his name, Timothy, by his relation, a son, by his affection, a beloved son, a dearly beloved son. Some think St. Paul calls him his son because converted by him to Christianity; others, because more thoroughly instructed, edified, and encouraged by our apostle: possibly because he was assistant to him, a co worker and fellow-labourer with him in the work of the gospel, and for that reason most affectionately beloved by him. From whence learn, With what fervour of sincere affection the ministers of Christ should love one another, speak respectfully of each other, secure the reputation one of another, strengthen each other's hands, and encourage one another's hearts in the work of God. We have little love from the world Lord: how sad is it that we should have less one for another? Behold here how St. Paul's and his assistant Timothy's hearts were knit one to another; like father and son, to the great reputation, as well as successful furtherance of the gospel. 3. The apostle's salutation, in form of a prayer: Grace, mercy, and peace from God the Father, and Christ Jesus our Lord. Learn hence, That all spiritual blessings flow from God as the Father in Christ unto us; and that no grace, mercy, or peace can be had from God the Father, but in, by, and through our Lord Jesus Christ.

3 I thank God, whom I serve from my forefathers with pure conscience,—

But how could St. Paul, before conversion, be said to serve the God of his forefathers with a pure conscience, when he was a persecutor, and the chief of sinners? Ans. The meaning is, That he worshipped the same God, and the only true God; which his forefathers worshipped, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; and that he worshipped him in sincerity, according to his conscience, and the measures of light then received. Learn hence, That the church before Christ had the same faith, the same object of faith, and worshipped God, the same God, under the law, with us under the gospel: I thank God, whom I serve from my forefathers.

— That without ceasing I have remembrance of thee in my prayers night and day :

Behold here the ministers duty in a more special manner, to be much in prayer one for another; they stand greatly in need of this mutual help to strengthen each other's hands, and encourage one another's hearts in the ways of God: They should therefore without ceasing, remember one another at the throne of grace.

4 Greatly desiring to see thee, being mindful of thy tears, that I may be filled with joy.

Observe here, The vehemency of affection which our apostle expresses towards Timothy; he desired, greatly desired, to see him, and with the sight of him to be filled with joy. Note, That though we must love all Christians with a sincere love, yet may we love some Christians with a more fervent love than others; choice and useful Christians, endearing and endeared friends, may and must be loved above others: I desire greatly to see thee, &c. Observe, St. Paul declares how mindful he was of Timothy's tears; perhaps a flood of tears were shed at their last parting one from another. The best of men have a propensity to weeping, and, upon occasion, have shed tears; so had Jacob, Joseph, David, and Christ himself. True goodness promotes compassion; good men ever have been, and are men of tender and compassionate dispositions.

5. When I call to remembrance the unfeigned faith that is in thee, which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois, and thy mother Eunice: And I am persuaded that in thee also.

This is another reason why St. Paul so earnestly desired a sight of his dear son Timothy, namely, a remembrance of his faith, as well as of his tears; which faith is described by the quality of it, unfeigned; by the effect of it, it dwelt; by the subjects wherein, in Lois, Eunice, and Timothy, by the order in which, first, in the grandmother Lois, then in the mother Eunice, and lastly, in the child Timothy. Learn hence, That it is a most desirable and blessed thing when there is a succession of believers in a family, and to see faith transmitted down to posterity, when grandmother, mother, and grandchild, all walk in the truth. Thus here: And whereas Timothy received the advantage of a religious education from those two holy women, Lois and Eunice, we learn, That God often blesses the labours and examples of holy women, to raise up excellent instruments in his church.

6 Wherefore I put thee in remembrance that thou stir up the gift of God, which in thee by the putting on of my hands.

Observe here, 1. St. Paul's care in putting Timothy in remembrance of his duty, though he very well knew it before: Wherefore I put thee in remembrance. None are so well instructed in their duty, but they may and ought sometimes to be put in remembrance of what their duty is. 2. The duty which St. Paul puts him in remembrance of; namely, to stir up the gift of God, which was in him, by putting on of the apostle's hands. Where note, 1. What the gift was which he advises should be stirred up; namely, the Holy Ghost, in its ministerial gifts and sanctifying graces; particularly, a divine power, which disposed and enabled him to teach and live, to act and do, answerably to the duties incumbent upon him, as a minister of Jesus Christ. 2. What care Timothy must take of this gift; namely, to stir it up: The word is a metaphor taken from fire, which, if not stirred up, grows dead; and gives little heat. They that have received much grace; and many gifts from the holy Spirit, may yet be wanting to themselves in stirring them up. This stirring up the gift of God in Timothy, respects either the means that are to be used in order to the duty, such are, prayer, reading, meditation; or the duty itself, which consists in feeding the flock of God, in reforming abuses in the church of God, and in enduring hardship as a good soldier of Jesus Christ. 3. How this gift was bestowed upon Timothy; namely, by putting on of the apostle's hands, together with the hands of the presbytery, 1. Tim. iv. 14. Authority and power was given by the apostle, the presbytery concurring as his assistants. St. Paul did not lay his hands without the presbytery, much less did the presbytery lay on hands without the apostle, but he and they in conjunction. From the whole, learn, That no persons, especially ministers ought to suffer the gifts and graces of God's holy Spirit to remain in them unexcited and unstirred up: Stir up the gift of God that is in thee.

7 For God hath not given us the spirit of fear, but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind. 8 Be not thou therefore ashamed of the testimony of our Lord, nor of me his prisoner: but be thou partaker of the afflictions of the gospel, according to the power of God.

Here our apostle exhorts Timothy to an holy courage and undaunted resolution in the execution of his office. As if he had said, "Be not discouraged by persecution: for God hath not given us, his messengers, the spirit of fear, but of courage and fortitude; fearless we are of the frowns of men: Also the spirit of love, love to God and the souls of men, which will make the ministers of God indefatigable in their endeavours for the good of souls: Likewise the spirit of a sound mind, which enables God's ministers to curb their passions, inordinate lusts, desires, and perturbations of mind; an admirable spirit, to know when to be angry and severe, and when to be mild and gentle." Learn hence, That love is the genuine principle of obedience and ought to be that frame of spirit, that inward affection of mind, from whence all our services to God and our neighbour do proceed. Thus, having fortified Timothy against fear, in the seventh verse, he next fortifies him against shame, in the eighth verse: "Be not thou ashamed of the testimony of our Lord; that is, of giving testimony of the gospel of our Lord, whether by preaching of it, or suffering for it: Not to be ashamed of me his prisoner: for I do not suffer as a malefactor; nay, be thou a cheerful partaker of the same sufferings as myself, and for the same cause with myself, according to the power of God; that is, being strengthened with the almighty power of God." Learn hence, That the ministers of the gospel are to take care that they be always ready to suffer reproach for the gospel, but that they never bear reproach unto the gospel. Suffering for Christ will be sweet, if it be not imbibited by sinning against Christ.

9 Who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling; not according to our works, but according to his own purpose and grace which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began. 10 But is now made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour

Jesus Christ, who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the gospel: 11 Whereunto I am appointed a preacher and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles.

As if the apostle had said, "To fortify thee against the fear of those persecutions, and to arm thee against the shame of those reproaches, which may probably attend thee in the work of the gospel, consider, that the God whom thou serveest in this employment is he that hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling: Called us first to Christianity, and then to this holy function of the ministry; but to neither of them according to the merit of our works; as if we had done any thing to deserve either of these favours at his hands; but according to his own purpose and grace, given us in Christ before the world began; that is, which from all eternity he decreed and determined to accomplish by Jesus Christ; which gracious purpose of his is now clearly discovered by our Saviour Jesus Christ's coming into the world; who hath abolished death and brought life and immortality to light; that is, made a fuller and clearer discovery of it by the gospel; to preach which gospel I am a commissioned apostle, and for this I suffer; and God help you, when thereunto called, to suffer with with me." Learn hence, 1. That God himself is the author of man's salvation; He hath saved us: That effectual vocation doth accompany salvation; That the Christian's calling is an holy calling; that it is also an act of free and gracious favor in God to call; who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, &c. Learn further, That God's purpose or eternal decree to save before all time, was manifested by Christ's appearing in time: But now is made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ. Observe also, The happy effects of Christ's appearing: 1. To abolish death; not to root it at present out of the world, but to take away its dominion, its dread and terror, the whole power and disposal of it, Rev. i. 18. I am alive and have the keys of life and death. 2. To bring life and immortality to light; that is, immortal life more clearly manifested and discovered. Note here, 1. That the soul of man is immortal, and that there is another state, an immortal state, which remains for men after this life; otherwise, the justice of God's providence could not be sufficiently vindicated; but upon the supposal of a future state of immortality, it may. An account of the unequal providences of God in this world, is easy to him that believes the certainty of another; as good and evil are at present different in their natures, so shall they be in their rewards. 2. That the greatest discovery that ever was made of life and immortality to lost sinners, is made by Jesus Christ in the gospel. It was discovered, though darkly, to the Old Testament saints; but the discovery made of it by the gospel, as it was an unexpected discovery, a free and gracious discovery, so it was a more clear, more full, and final discovery of it: Christ hath abolished death, and brought life, &c.

12 For the which cause I also suffer these things; nevertheless I am not ashamed: for I know whom I have believed, and I am persuaded that he is able to keep keep that which I have committed unto him against that day.

For which cause, that is, "For the sake of the gospel, and not as an evil doer, I suffer patiently all afflictive evils, without either fear or shame, well knowing in whom I repose my faith and hope, my trust and confidence; and firmly believing that he is able to keep that which I have committed to him, my temporary life, yea, my eternal life, the life of my soul, my reward in heaven; I have committed all unto, and deposited all in God's hand, and I am sure he is both able and willing, he both can and will keep in safety, that which I have thus committed to him."

Note here, 1. That the knowledge of God must precede, or go before faith in God. I know in whom I have believed: Faith sees not him, in whom it believeth, but it knows him in whom it believeth. 2. There is no such way to secure the soul, as to commit it into God's hand; the way to make the soul safe, is to commit it to him to keep, and that in the way of well doing.

13 Hold fast the form of sound words, which thou hast heard of me, in faith and love which is in Christ Jesus. 14 That good thing which was committed unto thee, keep by the Holy Ghost which dwelleth in us.

By sound words, we are to understand the doctrine of the gospel; by a form of sound words, the truths and doctrines of the gospel methodically disposed and digested; to hold it fast, is, not to swerve from it in the course of our ministry but pertinaciously to adhere to it, not parting with it ourselves, nor suffering it to be adulterated and corrupted by others. This form of sound words some take to be the articles of our creed, in the words wherein we now have them, probably the same in sense, if not in words. This is called, ver. 14, That good thing which was committed to Timothy to keep; meaning, that summary of Christian doctrine which was committed to his care and keeping. Learn hence, 1. That evangelical words are sound words: All gospel-truth is of an healing nature. 2. That a form of sound words, or a methodical system of gospel-truths, is very profitable both for ministers and people. 3. That such a form of sound words is very faithfully to be retained and very carefully to be kept unto. 4. That faith and love are the hands whereby we are to hold the gospel truth: Hold fast the form of sound words in faith and love, which is in Jesus Christ. 5. That as Christians are to hold these evangelical truths fast in their judgments, so are they to hold them forth in their lives and practices: Keep by the Holy Ghost which dwelleth in us; that is, the power and assistance of the Holy Ghost will not be wanting to our endeavours, to help our memory, love, and practice, if we be not wanting to ourselves.

15 This thou knowest, that all they which are in Asia be turned away from me; of whom are Phygellus and Hermogenes.

By all in Asia, we are to understand very many, almost all, not every individual person: Some think they were teachers in Asia, others that they were private Christians; some that they were his companions and followers, who, when they saw him imprisoned, deserted and left him; and particularly, Phygellus and Hermogenes. Yet, note here, 1. That he doth not tax them of apostasy from Christ, when he accuses them of forsaking him; it is too harsh to say, that those that forsake a particular ruler of the church, do forsake Christ himself. 2. In that he says, All that are in Asia are turned away from me, that sin may, and oft-times has the major vote of its side, the generality go one way and usually the wrong way; sinners, like sheep, run after one another; like fish swim down the stream together.

16 The Lord give mercy unto the house of Onesiphorus; for he oft refreshed me, and was not ashamed of my chain, 17 But when he was in Rome, he sought me out very diligently, and found me. 18 The Lord grant unto him that he may find mercy of the Lord in that day: And in how many things he ministered unto me at Ephesus, thou knowest very well.

Our apostle having complained of many in Asia forsaking him, in the day of his sufferings, in the foregoing verse; in this, he makes a grateful commemoration of the kindness of Onesiphorus towards him, who refreshed him with his presence and relief, and was not ashamed of his chain, of his imprisonment, as others were. Learn, 1. It is no new thing for the most holy and innocent servants of Christ to suffer hardship, imprisonment, banishment, yea, even death itself, for the sake of Christ; and when they do so, to have friends forsake, and turn their backs upon them. Prosperity affords many friends, more flatterers; but who regards the prisoner in bonds? who cares for looking upon the dial when the sun is off? 2. That not to be ashamed of the saints in the day of their sufferings, but to own them, and administer to them in such a condition, is a certain sign of a sound and sincere Christian. Good Onesiphorus had this, amongst other evidences of his gracious state, that he was not ashamed to own a persecuted Paul in chains. Nay, he searched for the apostle very diligently, and found him; so far he was from hiding his eyes from him, and forsaking him, as the men of Asia did. Observe next, Our apostle's fervent and affectionate prayer to God, abundantly to recompence this labour of love in Onesiphorus towards him: First, He begs mercy for his whole household. The Lord give mercy to the house of Onesiphorus. Note, 1. How thankful the saints of God are for mercies received from God by the hands of men. 2. That acts of Christian charity to the suffering servants of Christ, do receive a considerable part of their reward, even here, in the hearty and affectionate prayers of the people of God on their behalf. How well did it fare with Onesiphorus and his household upon the score of St. Paul's prayer, The Lord show mercy &c. next he prays for Onesiphorus himself, The Lord grant that he may find mercy of the Lord in that day; that is, in the great day of judgment. Learn hence, 1. That the holiest of men, and best of saints, will stand in need of mercy; much mercy, when they stand before God at the great day. 2. That the merciful Christian, which has here shewn mercy to the ministers and members of Jesus Christ, may expect and shall find mercy in that day, when they stand in need of mercy. They that shew mercy in the evil day, shall certainly find great mercy in the great day :

C. A. A. P. II.

Our apostle in this chapter first exhorts Timothy to the practice of several duties belonging to his sacred functions; and next exhorts him from several sins which render the office of a bishop obnoxious to censures and his person to contempt.

THOU therefore my son, be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus.

St. Paul having acquainted Timothy with the hard things which he had suffered for the gospel of Christ, and withal informed him how many had flinched for fear of sufferings, forsaking him, and the cause of God defended by him; in this verse he exhorts Timothy to courage and holy resolution for Christ: Thou therefore, my son, be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus: That is, when others shew pusillanimity and cowardice, do thou shew thyself a strong and valiant man, not affrighted at the dangers that threaten in publishing and defending the gospel of Jesus Christ. Be strong in the grace of Christ; that is in the gospel of Christ, which contains a discovery of the riches of his grace, or be strong through the influences of the grace of Christ. Note, 1. That as all Christians in general, so the ministers of Christ in particular, do need courage, Thou, my son, be strong; nothing he does, but is an act of valour, all duties are attended with difficulties, which put the Christian upon disputing every inch of his way; they are only a few gallant spirits that dare take heaven by storm: And the ministers of Christ do meet with more difficulties than other men. Learn, 2. That our strength, both as Christians and as ministers, lies in Christ; and not in ourselves: Be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus: The strength of every saint, yea, of the whole host of saints, lies in the Lord of hosts.

2 And the things that thou hast heard of me among many witnesses, the same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also.

A second charge given to Timothy is, To take special care that the doctrine of the gospel, and the precepts of holy living, which he had heard St. Paul deliver, in the presence of many witnesses, should be handed down and transmitted to men of great fidelity and ability, whom he was to ordain and empower to teach it unto others. Where note, 1. A direction given to the guides and governors of the church, how they ought to manage themselves in the ordination of the ministerial office: This office is to be committed unto faithful able men; many may be useful in the church, that cannot be excellent, but he that is unfaithful, is only fit to make athcills. 2. That such as have the gospel deposited with them, may and ought to deposite it with others, and they with others, to the end of the world, thereby to prevent all innovations and diversities of opinions in matters of religion.

3 Thou therefore endure hardness, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ. 4 No man that warreth entangleth himself with the affairs of this life; that he may please him who hath chosen him to be a soldier. 5 And if a man also strive for the masteries, yet is he not crowned except he strive lawfully. 6 The husbandman that laboureth must be first partaker of the fruits. 7 Consider what I say; and the Lord give thee understanding in all things.

Still we find our apostle prosecuting the great and general design of this epistle, which is to direct Timothy in the faithful discharge of his office, as a minister of the gospel, and particularly to prepare for sufferings, and to inure himself to hardship, and to encounter with difficulties and dangers: Hence, he compares him to a soldier, to a wrestler, and an husbandman: (1.) To a soldier: Endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ. Learn hence, That every faithful minister is a spiritual soldier, warring under Jesus Christ, his Captain and chief Commander: Must the soldier be called, and do all by commission? so must the minister. Must the soldier be armed, trained up, and disciplined, and made fit for service? so must the minister. Must the soldier shun no dangers, stick at no difficulties, pass through thick and thin? Must he use allowed weapons, appoved armour of his general's directing, not of his own inventing? all this must the minister be and do. In a word, must the soldier please him that chose him to be a soldier, and in order thereunto, not entangle himself with the affairs of this life? Such a life of freedom from incumbrance by secular affairs, should the minister of God desire and endeavour after. Soldiers must be as free as may be from distractions; a soldier that fights in fetters, fights thereafter; he must put off his fetters before he puts on his armour; the minister's work lies in the affairs of the other life: Now, he that is entangled in the affairs of this life, will do little about the affairs of the next. He must also please his Captain, not please himself, his appetite, his pride his covetousness, much less must he please the enemy he is to fight against, the devil, the world, and the flesh. Again, 2. The minister is here compared to a wrestler: If a man strive for the mastery; that is, for the prize, the garland, the crown, at the end of the race, he shall be crowned, if he strives lawfully, if he runs fairly, according to the rules of the game, and perseveres finally till he comes to the end of the goal. Thus must the ministers of the gospel thrive for the crown of life, by putting forth all their strength, exerting their utmost endeavours; such as are now wrestlers, shall ere long be conquerors. Lastly, Timothy, and all with him in the work of the gospel, are here compared to husbandmen: As the husbandman must first toil and labour before he can partake of the fruits of the earth, he must plough and sow before he can reap and gather; so must the minister of God, by a laborious diligence, cultivate and improve the people, before he can hope to reap that great fruit and benefit, by gaining and converting of souls to Christ. God will regard no ministers but the laborious, he will never dignify drones in the church triumphant. Farther, by comparing Timothy to an husbandman, he intimates intimates to him his duty, not to be discouraged if he doth not reap fruit patiently; the seed sometimes lies under the clods long before it does appear; we must not despair of men too soon. And, lastly, By comparing Timothy to an husbandman, he seems to intimate, that he was to be sustained and maintained by those for whom he laboured. Thus having laid Timothy's duty before him under the metaphor of a soldier, a wrestler, and an husbandman; he counsels him to consider what he had said unto him, and desires of God to give him a right understanding and sound judgment in all things; intimating, that they that will have God's word and good counsel blessed by God to their understanding and practice, must ponder upon it, consider of it, and duly apply it to themselves; Consider what I say, and the Lord give thee understanding in all things.

8 Remember that Jesus Christ of the seed of David was raised from the dead, according to my gospel: 9 Wherein I suffer trouble as an evil-doer, even unto bonds; but the word of God is not bound:

Our apostle having, in the foregoing verses, exhorted Timothy to patience and constancy under suffering, comes now to direct him as to the matter and subject of preaching, particularly, that he insist upon the incarnation and resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ: Remember that Jesus Christ was the promised Messiah of the seed of David, not of Joseph. Timothy is here called upon to assert the incarnation of Christ, their being some heretics which did very early deny the truth of his human nature, as the Marcionites and Manichees; as there were others that denied the reality of his divine nature, particularly, Ebion and Cerinthus. Secondly, he calls upon Timothy to preach and press the doctrine of Christ's resurrection also, both because upon that depended the great evidence of his dignity, that he was really God, (his resurrection by his own power declared him to be God, Rom. i. 4.) and also because upon that depends the consolation and salvation of all believers. Remember, and frequently inculcate, that Christ was raised from the dead, according to my gospel; that is, according to the gospel of Christ preached by me. Christ's incarnation and resurrection, are truths much to be preached and inculcated by ministers, and frequently remembered and thoroughly considered by their people. It follows, Wherein I suffer trouble as an evil-doer, even unto bonds; but the word of God is not bound, that is, for which gospel, and for preaching which resurrection, I suffer as a criminal and reputed malefactor, yea, I suffer to that degree, that I am bound with chain for preaching Jesus and the resurrection: But the word of God is not bound; though they have restrained me, they cannot restrain that; that is loose and at liberty; when the dispensers of it are in bonds, that has its free course. Learn, That the preachers of the gospel have, from the beginning, met with great persecutions, they have suffered trouble as evil-doers even unto bonds. 2. That the persecution of preachers doth not hinder the progress and liberty of the word; when ministers are in prison, the word may have free passage, and holy men rejoice at its liberty, under their own confinement: Yea, the providence of God so ordered it, (see Acts the last) that

St. Paul, even during his imprisonment, preached the word with all boldness; his confinement had caused the gospel to spread in Rome. Thus God out-shoots Satan in his own bow: He thinks when he has the ministers of God in prison, he has done his work, but God over-rules and causes their imprisonment itself to fall out rather to the furtherance of the gospel; I suffer bonds, says the apostle, but the word of God is not bound.

10 Therefore I endure all things for the elect's sakes, that they may also obtain the salvation which is in Christ Jesus, with eternal glory. 11 It is a faithful saying; For if we be dead with him, we shall also live with him. 12 If we suffer, we shall also reign with him: If we deny him, he will also deny us: 13 If we believe not, yet he abideth faithful: He cannot deny himself.

St. Paul having acquainted Timothy in the foregoing verses with his sufferings, even unto bonds, here he lets him understand and know, why, and for who's sake, he did so cheerfully endure all these things, namely, for the elect's sake. Though the rest of the world rejected the gospel, yet the elect would be confirmed by his example, and obtain that salvation which in and through Jesus Christ was offered and tendered to them. Here note, That there is a certain election of God, which hath infallibly chosen to salvation all those who make their calling and election sure, by perseverance in holiness and good words. 2. That the faithful ministers of Christ do think no sufferings too much or too dear, for the sake of God's elect, (for the sake of believing Christians, who are a chosen generation (so that their sufferings may but further their eternal glory, happiness and salvation. To encourage yet again to a patient enduring all sorts of afflictions, he assures Timothy, that if we be rendered conformable to Christ in his sufferings, we shall be also in his glory; If we suffer for him we shall reign with him; if we be dead with him, dead to sin, and dead to the world, we shall also live with him, in conformity to his resurrection: But if for fear of suffering we disown him, he will also deny us; if we believe not, if we be unfaithful and forsake him, yet he will be true to his word, he will not forsake his own cause, but make good his threatening; his own veracity stands firm, and is as much engaged to execute the threatening, as to fulfil the promise.

14 Of these things put them in remembrance, charging them before the Lord that they strive not about words to no profit. but to the subverting of the hearers. 16 Study to shew thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed; rightly dividing the word of truth.

Observe here 1. The excellent advice which St. Paul gives to Timothy, to all the ministers of the church, and to all the Christian churches far and near, that they spend not their time in disputes, that they contend not about words, which have no tendency to make men either wiser or better, but serve only to violate the laws of charity, and cause men to wrangle eternally, and persecute one another with hard names and characters of reproach. Here note, 1. What those things are which ought not to be matters of contention among Christians; namely, 1. Such things in which we differ from each other, rather in words, than in sense; oft-times opponents mean the same things, but differ only in the way and manner of expression. 2. Such things as tend to little or no profit, either as to edification in faith, in love, or in practical godliness. Observe also, the apostles argument, why we should not contend about these things; because they tend to beget strife and contention among Christians, by dividing them into factions and parties, and also tend to the subversion of the hearers, causing them to doubt of the truth of the faith, about which the contending parties cannot agree; charge them therefore that they strive not about words of no profit but to the subverting of the hearers. Observe next, The solemn charge given to Timothy; as to the matter, manner, and method of his preaching; that the matter of it be the word of truth, the pure word of God, that it be divided rightly, to every one his portion, to every hearer his due, methodizing and distributing truth, as God would have it; terror to whom terror is due, comfort to whom comfort belongs. The original word rendered rightly to divide, some think a sacrificial word, alluding to the right dividing of the sacrifice, which was laid upon the altar, separating the precious from the vile, and severing the parts which were not to be offered from them that were, and cutting out the sacrifice in such manner as all had their share in them. As if St. Paul had said, "Study not for the applause of men, but for the approbation of God, as becometh a good workman, who needeth not to be ashamed of his work, whoever looks upon it; but let thy preaching and living be straight and conformable to the gospel, and thus study to shew thyself approved of God." Hence learn, That although curious and unprofitable trifling with words in a pulpit be vain and sinful, yet it is the part of a skilful teacher, to order, methodize and distribute truth in its proper place, and give every hearer his part and portion.

16 But shun profane and vain babblings; for they will increase unto more ungodliness. 17 And their word will eat as doth a canker: Of whom is Hymeneus and Philetus; 18 Who concerning the truth have erred, saying, That the resurrection is past already; and overthrow the faith of some.

St. Paul having now finished the exhortatory part of this chapter, and acquainted Timothy what he would have him practise and do, now comes to a dehortation, advising him, what he would have him avoid and shun; and here, first, he bids him shun profane and vain babblings; the vain babblings of the Heathen philosophers, and the profane notions of heretical and seducing teachers, particularly, the Gnostics the followers of Simon Magus and Menander, who were guilty of an apostasy from Christianity, by turning the resurrection into an allegory; affirming, that the resurrection of the soul to piety and virtue, was the only resurrection to be expected, disowning the resurrection of the body, and asserting, that the flesh was unfit to rise. Observe, secondly, The nature of erroneous doctrine declared; it is of a devouring, spreading, and destroying nature, their words will eat as doth a gangrene. Quest. How doth a gangrene eat? Ans. It eats speedily, it eats incurably, it eats mortally, as it is well known the gangrene doth; Quest. But what is it that heresies eat? Ans. Faith, peace and godliness: so here, they overthrow the faith of some, and increase unto more ungodliness. Quest. How comes it to pass that they so eat? Ans. The spreading and prevailing of heresies, may be ascribed partly to the subtilty and activity of seducers, partly to the curiosity and simplicity of the seduced, and partly to the justice of God, for the manifestation of those that are sincere, and the punishment of those that receive not the truth in the love of it.

19 Nevertheless the foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, the Lord knoweth them that are his; and, Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity.

As if our Apostle had said, "Notwithstanding that Hymeneus and Philetus, with others, are fallen away, nevertheless we know that the foundation of God, his holy covenant, standeth firm and sure, having a seal annexed to it, (as usually contracts have; whereby two parties do oblige themselves mutually to each other,) which seal on God's part has this impres or inscription, The Lord knoweth them that are his; and on our part is written, Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity." Learn hence, 1. That the covenant of God made with us in Christ Jesus, is a firm and sure foundation to build our hopes of perseverance and eternal life upon; The foundation of God standeth sure. 2. That the covenant (according to the nature of the covenants) is conditional; on God's part, promising assistance, acceptance, and rewards; on our part, a departing from all iniquity, and an obligation to the love and practice of all holiness. All that make a profession of Christianity ought to take especial care that their lives may answer their light, their practices correspond with their profession; Christianity being not a speculative science, but a practical art of holy living.

20 But in a great house there are not only vessels of gold and silver, but also of wood, and of earth; and some to honour, and some to dishonour: 21 If a man therefore purge himself from these he shall be a vessel unto honour, sanctified and meet for the master's use, and prepared unto every good work.

Our apostle had told us at ver. 17, and 18. of certain heretics, such as Hymeneus and Philetus, whose doctrines did eat like a canker or gangrene: he tells us here, that it is not to be wondered at, that there should be such persons in the church, because the visible church is God's great house: Now it is no uncommon thing in great men's houses, to have vessels of all sorts, some of wood and earth, others of gold and silver, some to honourable uses, and others to dishonourable. In like manner, it is in the church of Christ, there will be a number of orthodox and also of heterodox Christians, hypocrites and sincere Christians. He advises Timothy therefore, not to be scandalized at them, but to purge himself from them, to keep himself pure.

pure from heresy and impiety: hereby he would manifest himself to be a vessel unto honour, sanctified and meet for the master's use; that is, for the service and glory of God. and disposed for every good work. Learn hence, That all Christians, but especially the ministers of Christ, ought to be, like consecrated vessels of the temple; dedicated and set apart for our Lord's especial use and service; we are not only with other Christians dedicated by baptism, but consecrated at our solemn ordination: so that there is a sacredness upon our persons: And to prostrate ourselves to any lust, is a greater profanation than Belshazzar was guilty of, when he defecrated the holy vessels of the temple.

22 Flee also youthful lusts: But follow righteousness, faith, charity, peace, with them that call on the Lord, out of a pure heart. 23 But foolish and unlearned questions avoid, knowing that they do gender strifes.

Still our apostle proceeds in his holy cautionary directions to Timothy, what to avoid, and what to follow. He advises him, 1. To avoid and flee youthful lusts; by which may be understood, not only the lusts of the flesh, but also the lusts and vices of the mind, as ambition and pride, vain-glory and ostentation. Where note, That the flesh, with its affections and lusts, are such dangerous enemies to our holiness and salvation, that the holiness of ministers and best of men have need, very great need, to be warned of them, and cautioned against them: Flee thou, O Timothy, also youthful lusts. 2. He advises Timothy also to avoid foolish and unlearned questions, that is, controversies and disputes, knowing that such contentious wranglings do but engender strife. It is not unworthy our observation, that no less than four times, in these two epistles, do we meet with this precept from the apostle, to avoid these questions and disputes, and to apply to that which is practical, shewing of what great importance it is so to do; and we shall meet with it again in the epistle to Titus, chap. iii. 9. From whence learn, That disputes about matters which only serve to beget strife and contention, but tend little to edification in faith and holiness, are vain talking, unprofitable disputes, and as such to be avoided. Observe next, He directs Timothy what to follow, having shewn him what to avoid: Namely, to follow after righteousness and faith, peace and charity with all persons, but especially with all our brethren and fellow Christians calling on the same Lord, and professing the same faith with us. Where note, That we ought to have charity for, to maintain peace with, and by no means to separate from our communion, any person who serves Christ with a pure heart: Follow, says our apostle, charity and peace with all those that call on the Lord Jesus out of a pure heart.

24 And the servant of the Lord must not strive; but be gentle unto all men, apt to teach, patient, 25 In meekness instructing those that oppose themselves; if God peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth; 26 And that they may recover themselves out of the snare of the devil, who are taken captive by him at his will.

By the servant of the Lord here, we are to understand all the bishops and governors, the pastors and teachers of the church; by not striving, that they are not to irritate and provoke such as dissent and differ from them; not to strive indecently with the tongue, but by soft and gentle words, by close and hard arguments, endeavour to convince their judgment; for no man that is in an error thinks that he is so; therefore if we go about by violence to rend men's opinions from them, that will but hold them so much the faster; but if we have but so much patience and chastity as to unrip their errors by degrees, they will at last fall in pieces of themselves. The servant of the Lord must not strive, but be gentle to all, and patient; it follows farther, in meekness instructing, if God, peradventure—Where note, 1. The duty directed to: and that is, without bitterness and passion, but with great lenity and meekness, to instruct the erroneous, even when they oppose the truth; such especially as do it out of ignorance, and for want of better information; are particularly to be pitied, and patiently born with, together with those who labour under the prejudices and prepossessions of a contrary education: in meekness instructing those that oppose. 2. The benefit hoped for, and the advantage to be expected, by such meek and gentle methods of instruction, as are here directed to; (1.) That Almighty God may peradventure give them repentance, blessing such prudential and pious means for their conversion from error and seduction; and, (2.) That they may be recovered out of Satan's snares and temptations, they being at present captivated by him according to his will. Learn, 1. That if erroneous and misled persons will not bear gentle teaching, much less will they yield to sharp invectives, or provoking disputes. Yet, 2. Disputations wisely managed, like defensive wars, are both useful and necessary in defence of the truth, though they do not bring over-gainsayers. 3. That till erroneous and misled persons can be brought by consideration to be agents in recovering themselves, no teaching or disputing will be sufficient and effectual to recover them; That they may recover themselves out of the snare of the devil, who are taken captive by him. Lastly, Error is the devil's snare as well as sin: Error is as dangerous as vice: the one is an open road, the other a by-path, to hell and destruction; consequently, such a Christian as has a due regard to, and value for, his own salvation, will be as much afraid of erroneous principles as of debauched practices; That they may recover themselves out of the snare of the devil, who are taken captive by him at his will.

C H A P. III.

Our apostle comes now, by a prophetic insinuation, to foretel of greater evils and mischiefs, which should certainly arise towards the end of the world, which he calls the last days, and perilous times.

THIS know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come.

As if the apostle had said, "O my son Timothy, be not thou discouraged, neither let any of the successors be dismayed, at the sects and schisms, at the heresies and blasphemies, phemies, at the vice and impiety, which will be found in and amongst persons in the last days, when certainly known that perilous times shall come." Where, by the last days, understand all the times from Christ's first coming in the flesh, to his second coming to judgment; in the beginning of which times, several sorts of persons, yea, several sects and parties of men arose, to whom the following characters did belong; namely, proud, covetous, boasters and the like. As the Judaizing teachers who urged the necessity of circumcision, and the observation of the ceremonial law; all the Gnostics, and followers of Simon Magus, have these characters applied to them in those early days; and it were well that the church of Rome, in these latter days, could clear herself in these characters, which are found upon her, as the marks and badges of an apostate church. Learn hence, 1. That the days we now live in are the last days, and our times the last times. 2. That the last times are, and will be, the worst times, perilous times, full of sin, and full of trouble: Old age is the dregs of life, the world draws upon its lees, the dregs are apparent: in the last days perilous times shall come.

2 For men shall be lovers of their own selves; covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy. 3 Without natural affection, truce-breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, 4 Traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God.

Here our apostle reckons up the several sins, which would abound in these last days, and make the times perilous; persons professing Christianity shall appear inordinate self-lovers, insatiably covetous, vain-glorious boasters, proud, despisers of others, blasphemers of God and Christ, and the holy Spirit, by denying the presence and foreknowledge of the former, the divinity and Godhead of the latter. Learn hence, That sins, especially great sins, seldom go single and alone, but commonly generate and beget one another. Thus here, self-love begets covetousness, covetousness pride, and pride blasphemy! Thus men fall from one sin to another, and proceed from one degree of wickedness to another.

6 Having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof. From such also turn away.

This is the last, but not the least sin of the perilous times: The apostle, 1. Tells us what these men have, a form of beliness, that is, a vain empty shew of piety and religion, which discovers itself in external devotion, in a profession of the Christian faith, in an external shew of mortification, in a great zeal for some particular party, or private opinion. 2. What they want, the power of godliness, that is, the truth and sincerity of it, consisting in true love to God and our neighbour. 3. The apostle directs us as to our behaviour towards such men, from these turn away. Learn hence, 1. That a person may go far, and advance high in an external profession of piety and religion, and yet have no more than a form of godliness. 2. That, notwithstanding this, there is such a thing as the internal and inward power of godliness and religion, which few maintain, but most deny. 3. That Christians must shun familiarity with such as have the brand of the foregoing infamous sins upon them, and not hold correspondency with such as are the avowed enemies of Christ and his kingdom.

6 For of this sort are they which creep into houses, and lead captive silly women laden with sins, led away with divers lusts, 7 Ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth.

In these words, our apostle renders a reason why we should turn away from the forementioned sins and sinners, namely, because these heretical and false teachers before characterized, are of an insinuating temper; they vent not their errors openly, but in corners; they creep into houses, and there set upon women with their temptations, who have less ability to detect them; and first upon women, that they may better win their husbands over to compliance with them; and upon silly women, and such as were laden with sins and led away with divers lusts; they make a prey of such women as are weak in their intellectuals, and corrupt and wicked in their morals: which women always pretend to be learned, but are never able to come to the knowledge of the truth, and consequently, are an easy prey to seducers, and very capable-receptive objects for such deceivers to draw away. Learn hence, That seducers observe a method in seducing. They begin with women, weak women, and usually wicked and loose women. Carefully ought that sex to resolve, and shun conversing and disputing with them.

8 Now as Jannes and Jambres without Moses, so do these also resist the truth; men of corrupt minds, reprobate concerning the faith.

Jannes and Jambres were two famous magicians in Egypt; who withstood Moses when he was working miracles before Pharaoh to hinder him from believing; their names are not mentioned in scripture, but taken by St. Paul, either from public tradition or ancient Jewish records. Now, says the apostle, as the magicians refused Moses, so these heretical seducers resist the truth, making a violent and rancorous opposition against it. Thence learn, That there have been false teachers in all ages, who have with vehemency opposed the truths and the professors of it: Neither the members nor ministers of Christ shall ever want enemies to war with, whilst the seed of the serpent remains in the world. 2. The character of those men who resist the truth, they are men of corrupt minds, and reprobate concerning the faith; they have lost all sound judgment, and made shipwreck of faith and a good conscience. A corrupt head, a corrupt heart, and a vicious life, usually attend and accompany one another; loose principles dispose men to loose and licentious practices; such as are latitudinarians in opinion, are oftentimes so in practice too. An licentious head and an upright heart are incompatible; a good conscience and a true faith, like Hippocrates's twins, live and die together.

9 But they shall proceed no farther: For their folly shall be manifest unto all men, as theirs also was.

Here our apostle encourages Timothy, and in him all the succeeding ministers of the gospel, to the end of the world, against all the discouragements which either he or they might meet with from the impostors and seducers of the times, by assuring them of the issue and vent of these trials; first, That God will put a bar in their way, that they proceed no farther in their hypocritical and juggling practices. Learn thence, That heretics and seducers are limited and bounded by God: They cannot do all the mischief they would, and they shall not do all they can. Secondly, That God would make their folly and madness manifest to their own confusion: Their folly shall be discovered, and then abhorred, as was the folly and madness of Jannes and Jambres. Learn, That God will, in his own time, by the preaching of the word, discover false teachers and their delusions to the world.

10 But thou hast fully known my doctrine, manner of life, purpose, faith, long-suffering, charity, patience, 11 Persecutions, afflictions, which came unto me at Antioch, at Iconium, at Lystra, what persecutions I endured: But out of them all the Lord delivered me. 12 Yea, and all that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution.

A special mean is here propounded, how Timothy and his successors may be preserved from the seduction of false teachers, namely, by setting before themselves the example of the great apostle St. Paul; we are more easily led by precedents than by precepts; therefore the apostle propounds his own example as a pattern; Thou hast fully known my doctrine, my manner of life and conversation, my purpose to adhere to, my faith in Christ, my long-suffering and patience in undergoing persecutions for him at Antioch, at Iconium, at Lystra, and how God was graciously pleased to deliver me out of all. Learn hence, 1. That younger ministers ought especially to observe the doctrine and conversation of the elder, the pious way and walking of the graver ministers, and must follow them. Aged Paul propounds his virtues to young Timothy for imitation; Thou hast fully known my doctrine and manner of life; my doctrine to be sound and sincere, my life to be holy and unblameable. 2. That it is both lawful and laudable, at some times, and upon some occasions, to mention both the graces which God hath wrought in us, and also the sufferings and persecutions which we endure and undergo for him; Thou knowest what persecutions I endured at Antioch, Iconium, and Lystra. 3. That always opposition, and often persecution, attends the preaching of the gospel wherever it goes. St. Paul went to Antioch, from Antioch to Iconium from Iconium to Lystra, preaching the gospel; but persecution, followed him hard at the heels wherever he went: But observe how the goodness of God accompanied him too; Out of them all the Lord delivered me; not only our dangers but our deliverances also, must be recorded and observed. Observe, farther, How the apostle argues from his own from his own persecutions in particular, to all the godly's persecution in general; Yea, and all that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution: Mark, Not this or that godly man, but all, every one without exception; the better the men, the sooner persecuted, the devil shoots his arrow at the whitest and fairest mark: Again, all that will; he doth not say, All that wish well to godliness, but, All that will, all that are absolutely resolved so to do: And farther, if he will live, if he can or will keep his godliness in his heart, and not discover it in his life, he may escape hatred and persecution; but if he will live religiously, let him look for persecution. Observe, farther, It is said He that will live godly, not living civilly, but living godly, exposes to the world's scorn and hatred: In a word, his godliness in Christ Jesus, that is, such godliness as is exerted in the virtue, strength and power of Christ Jesus particularly. Godliness in Christ Jesus is real and true godliness; it is exact godliness, it is an active godliness, it is a prevailing godliness, it is a world-condemning godliness: such godliness cannot escape the world's hatred. Learn, That all those that shew forth the power of religion in an holy conversation, must certainly look for persecution.

13 But evil men and seducers shall wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived.

Our apostle having acquainted us, in the former verse, with the condition of the godly, that they must expect and prepare for persecution, he lets us, in this verse understand the miserable condition of the wicked, that they wax worse and worse: their proficiency is mere apostasy, they actively deceive others, and are passively deceived themselves, by the devil, that lying spirit, that grand impostor. Learn hence, That the prosperous state of wicked men is much more dangerous and miserable than the afflicted persecuted condition of the ungodly; the good by persecution grow better, but the wicked by living easy, wax worse and worse.

14 But continue thou in the things which thou hast learned and hast been assured of, knowing of whom thou hast learned them; 15 And that from a child thou hast known the holy scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus.

Several arguments are here made use of by St. Paul, to press Timothy to the duty of perseverance in the doctrine of Christ, contained in the holy scriptures: The first is drawn from the authority of the person from whom he had received that doctrine, to wit, St. Paul himself, an inspired apostle of Jesus Christ. Continue in the things which thou hast learned, that is from me, and by me, as an authorized apostle. All the servants of God, but especially the ministers of God, must continue constant in the faith, and steadfast in the truth received. The second argument for Timothy's adhering to the doctrine of the scriptures, is drawn from his long acquaintance with the scriptures, even from his childhood, yea, from his infancy; From a child thou hast known the holy scriptures, &c. And the argument lies thus; "Thou, O Timothy, has learnt the scriptures from from thy infancy; now what a shame would it be for thee, who hast been taught so early the true religion, to turn from it and forsake it; from a child thou hast known the holy scriptures, from a suckling," as the word signifies. From whence learn, That it is the duty of parents to instruct their children betimes in the holy and good word of God; we read before of the care that Timothy's mother and grandmother took in that matter. Observe, 2. The title given to the word of God, the holy scriptures; they are holy in their author, holy in their matter, holy in their penmen, holy in their end and design, which is to make us holy, John xvii. 17. The word of God is not only pure, but purifying, not only clean, but cleansing. 3. The high commendation, given of the word; It is able to make thee wise unto salvation; no knowledge can bring us to salvation without the knowledge of the holy scriptures; the philosophers will teach you moral wisdom, but not a word of salvation by a Redeemer, without whom our salvation is impossible; therefore it is here added, — wise unto salvation, through faith, which is in Jesus Christ. Learn thence, That the holy scriptures, though they instruct us in the way of salvation, yet cannot save us without faith in Christ Jesus.

16. All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness: 17. That the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works.

Our apostle closes this chapter with an exhortation to Timothy to persevere in his study of the holy scriptures, by an argument drawn, 1. From the dignity and authority of the scriptures; 2. From their utility; 3. From their perfection. 1. From their dignity and authority, they are given by inspiration of God; that is, they are not the contrivance of any man's wit and fancy, but a revelation of the mind and will of God; and those that wrote them, were excited to it, and assisted in it by the Spirit of God: No part of the scripture had either angels or men for its author, but every part of scripture is divinely inspired or breathed by God, both for matter and order, style and words. A second argument is drawn from the utility and sufficiency of the holy scriptures; they are profitable for doctrine and instruction, teaching us what to know and believe in order to salvation, concerning God and Christ and ourselves, &c. for reproof of error, and confutation of false doctrine, for correction of sin and evil manners, for instruction in righteousness, directing us how to lead a righteous and holy life, according to the will of God. A third argument is taken from the perfection of them, they are able to make the man of God perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works; that is, to make the ministers of Christ complete in knowledge, faith, and holiness, every way fitted for their work and duty as Christians, and as ministers. Observe here, 1. That the scriptures of the Old Testament, and not of the New, must be the scriptures here intended, they being the only scriptures which Timothy had known from a child; that was before the scriptures of the New Testament were written. 2. That the apostle doth not say that these scriptures were of themselves sufficient to make

Timothy wise unto salvation, but only that with faith in Christ Jesus they were sufficient for that end; much more then must the scriptures both of Old and New Testament together, when accompanied with faith in Jesus Christ, be sufficient for that end. 3. That the scriptures are a perfect, plain, and sufficient rule in all things necessary to salvation. 1. They are a perfect rule, because the writers of them were divinely inspired, and consequently their writings are infallible. 2. They are a plain rule; otherwise they would be no rule at all, of no more use to direct our faith and practice than a sun-dial in a dark room is to tell us the hour of the day: A rule that is not plain, whatever it may be in itself is of no use to us till it be made plain. 3. They are a sufficient rule, they are able to make the man of God perfect, and wise to salvation. Here the church of Rome distinguishes and says, the scriptures are sufficient to salvation, but not to instruction; to whom one of the martyrs replied, If so, God send me the salvation, and you the instruction. It is conceived by some, that this was the last epistle that ever St. Paul wrote; if so, this is the last charge that ever he gave, and concerns us the more to attend the solemnity of it. The chapter before us is St. Paul's egreca cantio, his last and sweetest song; by a spiritual sagacity he saw his end approaching, and the time of his martyrdom to be at hand; he therefore, like a dying man, adjures Timothy in a most awful and tremendous manner, to preach the word with all diligence and care, which he had so highly extolled in the foregoing chapter, as being able to make all persons wise unto salvation.

CHAP. IV.

I Charge thee therefore before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing, and his kingdom: 2. Preach the word; be instant in season, out of season; reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long-suffering and doctrine.

Observe here, 1. A most solemn adjuration and charge given, I charge thee before God, and our Lord Jesus Christ, the Judge of quick and dead. Lord! what opiate can stupify the conscience of a minister, that he shall not feel the awful authority of such a charge, or not be awakened by such ardent expressions? How can they appear before the most high and everlasting judge? What will be a sufficient defence before his enlightened tribunal? If such in the last judgment, who neglected to feed the poor with material bread, shall be placed at Christ's left hand; how can those whose office it is to dispense spiritual bread, if they neglect to do it, escape condemnation? 2. The subject-matter of the charge, to preach according to Christ's commission, Matt. xxviii. 19. Go, preach and baptize; to preach the word, not the fancies and inventions of men, but the wholesome word of God, and the whole word of God, both law and gospel: The one to keep men from presumption, the other from despair, to be instant and active, urgent and zealous in the discharge of this duty, in all the parts of it, in instruction, reprehension, and exhortation; and this with all long-suffering, patience and lenity, undergoing weekly meekly the contradiction of sinners and the reproaches of men: And for the time to do it, in season, and out of season; that is, to take all occasions and be thankful to God for all opportunities of preaching his word: The lazy may find a thousand excuses, but willing minds know no difficulties; they consider the price paid for souls, and the account that must be given of them. 3. The person to whom this charge is given; to Timothy, an ordained person, one set apart for the work: This is not a work common to all, but peculiar to some: God's Timothies only, who are called and set apart by imposition of hands for the work of the ministry, must preach the word; and such ought to take all occasions, and be very instant in so doing, 1 Cor. ix. 16. Necessity is laid upon us; yea, we be unto us if we preach not the gospel.

3 For the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine; but after their own lusts shall they heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears; 4 And they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables.

Here we have the reason of our apostle's solemn adjuration in the foregoing verses, by which he stirs up Timothy to a careful discharge of his duty; namely, in regard of the apostasy of the times, in which many would grow weary of sound doctrine, and follow fables. Here note, 1. The ground of this apostasy; men's hatred of the truth; They will not endure sound doctrine; that is, they will reject and abhor it; they love their lusts above God's law, and will not endure to hear it. A second ground of their apostasy is, a delight in false teachers; They heap up to themselves such as will claw their itching ears, and gratify their wanton desires, and in no wise disturb their lusts. Thirdly, Here is the doleful issue, and dreadful consequence of this their malicious contempt of the truth; They shall turn away their ears from the truth and be turned unto fables; that is, say some, to the fabulous divinity of the Gnostics, made up of Gentilism and Judaism; the fabulous traditions of the Jewish doctors, say others. Learn hence, 1. That Christian doctrine is sound doctrine, wholesome words. 2. Unsound persons cannot endure sound doctrine; sore eyes cannot abide the light. 3. That in the last days there will be many false teachers to claw and gratify itching ears. 4. That the more false teachers do abound, the more careful and industrious should the ministers of Christ be to oppose them, by preaching sound doctrine.

5 But watch thou in all things, endure afflictions do the work of an evangelist, make full proof of thy ministry,

Behold here a fourfold duty impressed upon Timothy; 1. Watchfulness: Watch thou in all things. As if he had said, "False teachers will beset you round on every side; therefore guard and watch every where." 2. Courage: Endure afflictions: He that fears the frown of men, can never discharge his duty faithfully to God. 3. Fidelity: Do the work of an Evangelist; which was an extraordinary, and therefore but a temporary office, to assist the apostles in preaching and publishing the gospel from place to place; they watered what the apostles planted. 4. Sincerity; Make full proof of thy ministry; so fulfil all the parts of it, that none may charge thee with the neglect of any part of thy duty: Let the world see that thou riskest it thine own and only work to win souls. Learn hence, 1. That the apostasy and looseness of the times we live in, must oblige all persons, but especially the ministers of Christ, to watch: Who should watch, if not the watchmen? 2. That ministers, of all men, need courage: They must inure themselves to endure hardship, and expect hard words, hard dealings, nick-names, and all kind of reproaches: and these must be endured with patience, with courage, and with constancy, 3. That ministers must make full proof of their ministry; that is, must fully and faithfully discharge all the duties of their calling, not do their duties by halves; but accomplish all the parts of their ministry, strengthening the weak, comforting the afflicted, reducing the wandering, and adorning their doctrine by a pure and unblameable conversation. This is to fulfil our ministry.

6 For I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. 7 I have fought the good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: 8 Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day: And not to me only, but to all them also that love his appearing.

Our apostle having now come almost to the end of his Christian and ministerial race, he first looks downward into his grave with comfort, ver. 6. and sees his death a pleasing sacrifice to God, and a sweet departure to him; I am ready to be offered and the time of my departure is at hand. Next he looks backward and reflects upon his well-spent life with joy: I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, ver. 7. Last of all he looks upward, and there sees heaven prepared for him, ver. 8. Henceforth is laid up for me a crown of righteousness. Observe, 1. St. Paul's intimation of his death: I am ready to be offered up; a sacrificial word: "I am ready to be poured out as a drink-offering: my death will be a sweet sacrifice to God, my blood being shed for Christ, as the wine was poured out on the meat offering." Learn hence, That the death of God's ministers, especially of such as die martyrs, is a most pleasing sacrifice unto God: Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of all, but especially of such saints. Observe, 2. St. Paul's narration of his life; I have fought, I have finished, &c. The words run in figures taken from the Olympic games, where was combating, wrestling, running according to the laws of the games, and judges appointed to declare the victories, and give to them the prize, a crown of garlands. The first metaphor is taken from a soldier, a combatant, a champion; I have fought a good fight. Learn, Every sincere Christian, but especially every faithful minister, is a spiritual soldier; their enemies are spiritual, their weapons spiritual, their warfare spiritual, their victory spiritual; they must be men of courage, men of conduct, men that can endure hardship, men of unity and activity among themselves. The second metaphor is taken from a strenuous runner; I have finished my course. "I am come to the period of my days, and to the end of my race;" alluding perhaps to his course of life after his conversion, which was wholly spent in running from place to place, to preach the gospel. And now he was come to the last stage or goal at Rome, where he was to receive his garland; his crown of martyrdom. Learn hence, A Christian's life is a race, which he must not only cheerfully begin, but perseveringly finish: So says the apostle here, "I, Paul the aged, have fought the good fight, &c. have not only begun, but finished my course." O what a comfort is it to be an old soldier of Jesus Christ! St. Paul is now reckoned to be 61 years of age when he suffered martyrdom; he runs his race patiently, cheerfully, reservedly, and perseveringly. The third metaphor is taken from depositaries, who faithfully keep things committed to their trust without embezzlement. This depositum, the Christian faith, St. Paul had kept; I have kept the faith: He kept, first, the grace of faith; secondly, the doctrine of faith inviolable, endeavouring to transmit it down to posterity, in despite of the legal Jew, or profane Gentile. Observe, 3. St. Paul's expectation of his reward: Henceforth is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, &c. Here note, The reward is a crown of righteousness; because given only to righteous men; the person rewarding; Christ, the righteous Judge; the person rewarded, me, St. Paul himself, and all the faithful that love Christ's appearing. The certainty of the reward; It is laid up, reserved, and kept safe, as an inheritance for a child: The time of the reward; In that day, the great day of the Lord, when he shall come to judge the quick and the dead. Learn hence, 1. That the reward which God has in hand for his faithful servants, is no less than a crown of glory. 2. That the time when this reward shall be fully and finally dispensed is the great day. 3. It is the propriety of the godly to look, love, and long for that day.

9 Do thy diligence to come shortly unto me. 10 For Demas hath forsaken me, having loved this present world, and is departed unto Thessalonica: Crescens to Galatia, Titus unto Dalmatia. 11 Only Luke is with me. Take Mark and bring him with thee: For he is profitable to me for the ministry. 12 And Tychicus have I sent to Ephesus.

Our apostle comes now, in this second part of the chapter, to treat of some private and personal affairs: And first, he desires Timothy to come speedily to him, having a great desire to see him, and be comforted by him before he died: The strongest of Christians may sometimes be helped by the weaker: a Paul may stand in need of a Timothy; there is not a member in the body, but is some way serviceable to the head. Secondly, He assigns a reason why he did thus desire Timothy's presence, because of Demas' and others absence; Demas had forsaken him, having loved this present world. The best may sometimes be forsaken by their bosom friends; Demas was such to St. Paul, yet left him: For what cause? For the love of the world. This, when it grows inordinate, will cause a man first to forsake his friend, and then his God. Thirdly, Crescens was gone to Galatia, Titus to Dalmatia, Tychi-cus to Ephesus; all of them, no doubt, to spread the gospel, to plant or water the churches. Good men will be doing good wherever they are, wherever they come or go. Only Luke was with him; nothing could separate that good man from him. A faithful friend loveth at all times, yet friendship (ela. amicitia) will vanish in adversity; but true Christian friendship is perpetual; the foundation of it is eternal. Lastly, He desires Timothy to bring Mark with him; not for rest or recreation, because he wanted a champion for his diversion; no, but to assist him in his work: Bring Mark; for he is profitable to me for the ministry. It is happy when the ministers of God affect the company, and desire the presence of each other, for spiritual ends and religious purposes.

St. Paul having desired Timothy's company at Rome, requests him to bring with him such things as he wanted, and stood in present need of. 1. His cloke; probably a garment which in the winter season he might want the warmth and benefit of, especially being in a cold prison. So long as we are upon earth, a prudential care must be taken to preserve our health; when winter approached, St. Paul sent for his winter garment to keep him warm: The body is the soul's organ or instrument by which it acts; therefore we must do what in us lieth to keep it in tune for the service of the soul. 2. His books; probably the books of the Old Testament; certainly no profane books; he had no leisure for, nor liking to any such. 3. But especially the parchments: These are thought to be note books of his own collecting, in which he had written several things for the help of his memory, and the benefit of the church. Behold here, 1. An eminent pattern of pious studiousness in St. Paul: Here was an aged man, an aged minister, that had already read much; a prisoner, no very proper place for study, were prisons then filled with such brutes as generally now; nay, a dying prisoner, one that looked for death and beheading every day; yet aged Paul, dying Paul, cannot live without his books; he must still be reading, learning, studying the scriptures especially, which are such a vast deep, as the line of an apostle could not fathom: Behold, I say, a pattern for such ministers as think they know enough, they have studied enough, and are too old to learn; so was not our apostle, when within a few months of his death. 2. Behold here, an eminent pattern of pious humility in Timothy, if bishop of Ephesus now, as some affirm, if only a minister of a particular church as others affirm; yet he was undoubtedly a very humble person; otherwise, St. Paul had not desired, and Timothy had certainly disdained to carry this luggage with him to Rome. Pride would have stooped to nothing of this, but thrown all to the dunghill; whereas true humility disposes a man, especially a minister of Christ, to become all things to all men.

14 Alexander the copper-smith did me much evil: The Lord reward him according to his works. 15 Of

Of whom be thou ware also ; for he hath greatly withstood our words.

Here our apostle, 1. Complains of the injuries and oppositions which he had met with from Alexander the copper-smith, who was before a great professor, but now become a grievous persecutor : He made shipwreck of the faith, 1 Tim. i. 19. which he did before profess ; nay, it is thought this man, Acts xix. 33. was near martyrdom, yet afterwards an opposer of the truth. The best things corrupted, become worst ; the sweetest wine makes the sharpest vinegar. Be not offended then, if at any time you see professors turn blasphemers ; nay preachers themselves turn persecutors. 2. An apostolical prediction, rather than a dreadful imprecation, passed upon Alexander : The Lord reward him according to his works. The Lord will reward him according to his works. The apostle by a prophetic spirit, saw what was coming upon him, and foretells his doom. Imprecations against the enemies of the church, if lawful, yet must be cautiously and very rarely used : What we find in scripture looking like such, are rather to be accounted predictions, than imprecations. Lastly, The caution given to Timothy to shun him : Of whom be thou ware also, for he is an opposer of the truth. Wicked men do not so much oppose the ministers, as the ministry ; not so much oppose preachers, as preaching : It is the light of truth which evil-doers hate ; because it has a searching, discovering, condemning power. St. Paul doth not complain of Alexander's unkindness towards him, but of his malicious resisting the truth, and hindering the preaching of the gospel : He hath greatly withstood our words.

16 At my first answer no man stood with me, but all men forsook me ; I pray God that it may not be laid to their charge-

Our apostle here complains of the timorousness of weak Christians in their carriage towards him, at his first appearing before Nero the emperor of Rome, or some of his officers, they deserted him, they all deserted him, very few durst own him : But this was out of weakness and timorousness, not out of maliciousness, as Alexander in the former verse ; therefore St. Paul prays for them, That God would not lay it to their charge, but pity and pardon their infirmity. Learn hence, How hard it will go with the holiest of saints, if God should lay but one sin, though a sin of infirmity, to their charge ; it would sink them to the lowest hell. Lord ! how sad must it then be to have the sins of a wicked man's whole life charged upon him ! 2. That the holiest servants of God, in a suffering hour, may and must expect to be left alone, forsaken of all their friends none daring to open their mouth, and speak a word for them. The apostle met with it here, and a greater than he before him ; when Christ was apprehended, all the disciples forsook him and fled.

17 Notwithstanding the Lord stood with me and strengthened me ; that by me the preaching might be fully known, and that all the Gentiles might hear : And I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion.

That is, " Though man forsook me, God stood by me ; the Lord Jesus strengthened me, that by me, thus standing up in defence of the gospel, the preaching of it might be fully known, and that all the Gentiles might hear the defence of it ; and thus for that time, I was delivered out of Nero's hands, that bloody lion's mouth." Learn, 1. That whilst God has any farther work for his servants to do, he will assist and sustain them in despite of all opposition and discouragement whatsoever ; though Nero roar, and persecutors rage, and friends desert, yet God will stand by, God will deliver, till his faithful servants have finished their work : The Lord stood by me, and I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion, says the holy apostle. See here the certain character of the church's enemies : They are lions ; lions for power, lions for policy, lions for terror, lions for cruelty ; God sometimes delivers his people, and saves them from, sometimes suffers his dearest children to fall into, the paws, yea, the mouths, of these devouring lions.

18 And the Lord shall deliver me from every evil work, and will preserve me unto his heavenly kingdom : To whom be glory forever and ever. Amen.

Mark, He do not say, The Lord will deliver me from every evil worker, but from every evil work ; though he doth not save me from my temporal enemies, blessed be God my spiritual enemies shall never hurt me, neither sin nor Satan. Lord It is a far greater favour to be preserved from sin, than from any temporal affliction that can befall us, yea, than from death itself : The Lord will deliver me from every evil work ; yea, farther, He will preserve me to his heavenly kingdom. God has a kingdom, an heavenly kingdom for all his saints, his suffering saints especially ; it is prepared for them, they are preparing for it, and they shall be put into the possession of it in due time.—He closes with a doxology here : To whom be glory for ever and ever Amen. As God has prepared an eternal kingdom for his saints, so they desire that God may have glory from them to eternal ages : Grace enlargeth the heart towards God, in fervent desires, that his glory may be eternized. The Lord will deliver me, &c.

19 Salute Prisca and Aquila, and the household of Onesiphorus.

Observe here, How mindful the apostle is of his absent friend ; though he was now in prison, and they a great way from him, yet he sends pious salutations to them. This Prisca or Priscilla, and Aquila, are often remembered by St. Paul, he lodged in their house at Corinth : The saints and servants of God forget not one another, when at the ends of the earth.—He salutes also Onesiphorus and his household, wife and children, and servants. Thus do pious governors procure a blessing upon their families as well as upon their persons. Onesiphorus is not only prayed for himself and saluted singly, but likewise his household also : Salute Prisca and Aquila, and the household of Onesiphorus.

Eraſtus is mentioned, Rom. xvi. 23. as chamberlain of the city of Corinth, one that ſhewed kindneſs to Paul: he was a great man, the treaſurer of the city of Corinth; yet neither his riches, nor his great place, could keep him from loving the apoſtle and the afflicted church of God: Rarely are great men good, and as rarely are good men great; yet ſome great men are good, and ſome good men are great. Lot and Abraham, Job and David were full of riches, yet full of piety, under the Old Teſtament: So was Nicodemus, Joſeph of Arimathea, and Zaccheus, under the New. Thus God magnifies the power of converting grace.—Trophimus have I left at Miletum ſick. This man was a citizen at Ephesus, a diſciple and companion of St. Paul, Acts xx. whom he was forced to leave ſick at Miletum. Note, Strength of grace cannot prevail againſt bodily weakneſſes and diſeaſes; ſickneſs may ſeize even the beſt men.

2. That the apoſtles had not the gift of healing, when they pleaſed, but only God gave it them.

21 Do thy diligence to come before winter: Eubulus greeteth thee, and Pudens, and Linus, and Claudia, and all the brethren.

Our apoſtle being greatly deſirous to ſee Timothy before his death, reneweth his requeſt and ſuit to him to make haſte and come before winter; the perſonal preſence of good men is much very much deſired by them. in order to excite and quicken each other, To encourage Timothy to haſten to him, he names ſeveral perſons of note that were then at Rome, who ſent ſalutations to him and would rejoice to ſee him: But where were all theſe, when our apoſtle was upon his trial? Anſ. They all forſook him, and not one of them ſtood with him. Behold what frailty there may be! and what fear will do, in perſons of choice not for eminentcy and grace in the church of God!

22 The Lord Jeſus Chriſt be with thy ſpirit. Grace be with you. Amen.

The apoſtle concludes this, like his other epiſtles, with an apoſtolic benediction, The Lord Jeſus Chriſt be with thy ſpirit: as if he had ſaid, “Be not ſad at my departure; for, though I muſt leave thee, yet the Lord will uphold thee by his grace and be preſent with thee by the influence of his holy Spirit.” The inward preſence of Chriſt with the ſpirits of his people, directing their ſpirits in thinking, judging, chuſing and reſuſing, is a ſweet privilege, and greatly to be deſired. Happy they who have the ſpirit of Chriſt perpetually preſent with them, who ſo live, that Chriſt may delight to dwell by his Spirit in them.—Grace be with you, that is, with all of you; he doth not ſay, riches be with you, or honours be with you, or the favour of man be with you, but grace, and the favour of God be with you. God’s ſpecial favour and diſtinguiſhing grace is to be ſought by all perſons, above and before all things.—Laſtly, Our apoſtle ratifies and ſeals up all with that concluding particle, Amen; teaching us, That whatever we ſhould pray for, ſhould be rightly underſtood, firmly believed, and carneſtly deſired, and heartily conſented to: They ſin in prayer, who underſtand not what they pray for, and who do not earneſtly deſire what they pray for: For in teſtimony of our deſires to be heard, we ſay, Amen.

THE END OF THE SECOND EPISTLE TO TIMOTHY.

T I T U S.

St. Paul's epistles to Timothy and Titus, are the church's canons, which the Holy Ghost indited, very sufficient to their use and end. O how happy had the church been in all ages, if strict canonical obedience had been paid, as well as sworn unto them. Titus was a Gentile, converted early to Christianity by St. Paul, who having great experience of his piety and prudence, left him in Crete, to govern the church of God in that island. This epistle to Titus is of the same nature, and wrote with the same design, as those to Timothy, only shorter; because Titus seems to have been the more ancient and experienced person; St. Paul briefly instructs him in all the parts of his duty; in electing church governors, in censuring false teachers, in instructing the ancient and younger persons; in pressing upon all persons obedience to magistrates, and a care to maintain good works.

C H A P. I.

Titus being placed by St. Paul in Crete, St. Paul writes to him how he ought to demean himself there, by appointing worthy and fit persons in every city bishops or elders, to teach and govern those that were converted to the faith of Christ.

PAUL a servant of God, and an Apostle of Jesus Christ, according to the faith of God's elect; and the acknowledging of the truth which is after godliness; 2 In hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before the world began, 3 But hath in due times manifested his word through preaching, which is committed unto me according to the commandment of God our Saviour; 4 To Titus mine own son after the common faith, grace, mercy, and peace from God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ our Saviour.

These verses contain the apostle's salutation, and the first part of this chapter; in which, observe, 1. the person saluting, described by his name, Paul; by his general office, a servant of God; by his special office, an Apostle of Jesus Christ; by the end of his office, to preach the faith, and thereby to pronounce the faith of God's elect, and to bring persons to the acknowledgment of the doctrine of the gospel, which is the truth according to godliness. Learn hence, That the great design and end of preaching the gospel, is, to produce faith in the heart, and holiness of godliness in the life, of those that sit under it; not that common, notional, and intellectual faith, which is oft-times found in unholy persons; but that lively faith, which is elsewhere called, The faith of the operation of God, and here, The faith of God's elect; even such a faith as is the parent and principle of obedience. Observe, 2. The apostle declares a farther end of his office, namely, to raise Christians up to a lively hope and expectation of that eternal life, which that God, who cannot lie, hath promised before the world began. But how could God then promise, when there was none to promise to? Ans. The promise was made to Christ, and in him to all his members: For there was a federal transaction betwixt the Father and the Son from all eternity; the Son promised to give his soul an offering for sin, and the Father engaged that he should see his seed, and the travail of his soul. 3. How God, who promised us in Christ eternal life, before all time, did accomplish and make good that word in the fulness of time. Ver. 3. He hath in due time manifested his word through preaching: that is, what God so long ago purposed in himself, and promised to his Son, he hath, in the fittest appointed season, made manifest by the preaching of the gospel, which is committed to me by the appointment of God and Christ. Learn hence, That the doctrine of salvation is much more clearly revealed to us that live under the gospel, than it was to the fathers of the Old Testament: Life and immortality, that is, the clear knowledge, and more full assurance of eternal life is now brought about, by the preaching of the gospel. Observe 4. The person saluted, Titus, described by his relation, St. Paul's son in the faith; he began him by his ministry unto God, was the instrument of his conversion to Christianity; His son after the common faith. Where note, That the church has but one faith common to all Christians, it has one common object of faith, Christ crucified; it has one common end of faith, eternal salvation. This is the end of every believer's faith and hope. Observe, lastly, The salutation itself: Grace, mercy, and peace from God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ our Saviour; that is, all spiritual, temporal, and eternal blessings, I most heartily wish unto you, from God the Father, and Jesus Christ our worthy Mediator. Learn hence, That whatever spiritual grace, or temporal blessing we now receive from God, is from him not barely as a Creator, but as a Father, a gracious Father in Christ, in whom he pours forth the immensity of his love upon us, and through whom he conveys all kind of blessings unto us.

5 For this cause left I thee in Crete, that thou shouldest set in order the things that are wanting, and ordain elders in every city, as I had appointed thee.

Observe here, 1. The erection of a power in the person of Titus: I left thee in Crete to ordain elders; "I who am an apostle of Christ, and have received a commission from him thus to do. I left thee, thee who wert so dear to me, so useful to me; yet, for the church's service, did I deny myself and part with thee." Behold here a blessed pattern for our ministerial imitation. St. Paul did, and could, most cheerfully sacrifice all his private advantages, the tenderest and inmost of his affection to the benefit of the church, and the interest of religion; let us go and do likewise. 2. The end of this institution, or the use and exercise of this power to order and to ordain, to correct and constitute; 1. To set in order things that are wanting; the ship of the church is never so well rigged, but something is wanting that might be added: Whilst the tabernacle of God sojourns here below, some pin or other will be lacking in it. 2. To ordain elders in every city, such as might govern and teach, and administer to God in holy things: Wherever a church is planted, there is an absolute necessity of a settled ministry, and a succession of ministers, without which it is impossible that religion should either prosper or long continue: And care must be taken, that such ministers be duly qualified, and regularly ordained, I left thee in Crete to ordain elders. 3. The limitation of these acts, according to the apostle's prescription, as I had appointed thee. Titus must do nothing but according to commission, and by special direction. Where note, That the ordering and governing of the church was not left arbitrary, no, not to Titus himself: But whatever he did was done by apostolical direction: For this cause I left thee in Crete, that thou shouldest ordain elders in every city, as I appointed thee.

6 If any be blameless, the husband of one wife, having faithful children, not accused of riot, or unruly. 7 For a bishop must be blameless, as the steward of God; not self-willed, nor soon angry, not given to wine; no striker, not given to filthy lucre; 8 But a lover of hospitality, a lover of good men, sober, just, holy, temperate; 9 Holding fast the faithful word as he hath been taught, that he may be able by sound doctrine, both to exhort and to convince the gainsayers.

Here St. Paul gave Titus, as he had before done Timothy, the character of such persons as were to be admitted into the sacred function. The character is twofold, positive and negative; he shews them both what they should be and what they could not be. The positive characters of a bishop, yea, of every one that administers to God in holy things, are these: He must be blameless, free from scandal, not blame-worthy; a minister's life should be so bright and shining, that all persons who behold it, may admire it, and guide their lives by the direction and example of it. The husband of one wife; that is, at once; the apostle's command doth not forbid successive marriages; for this he elsewhere allows; see the note on 1 Tim. iii. 2. Nor does the command oblige him to marry at all, but it establishes the lawfulness of a bishop's marriage, if he sees reason for it; yet, no doubt, but these words, the husband of one wife, St. Paul proposes a greater degree of chastity to church-governors, than to other persons. Having faithful children, not accused of riot, or unruly. Titus must not only look at the person he is to ordain, but the family and household of the person ordained, that they be well governed, because the honour of religion, and the reputation of the church suffers exceedingly, when any of the bishop's family, his children especially, are riotous and unruly; besides, the world will pronounce them unfit to govern the church of God, that cannot command their own families. As the steward of God; the steward is an appointed and deputed officer, he acts by commission, and distributes his Lord's allowance, according to his Lord's command, and is accountable for all he does; and as he is over the inferior servant, so must he be a pattern and precedent for them; a steward must be both wise and faithful: A lover of hospitality, sober, temperate; mark, of hospitality, not of luxury and sensuality: As he commends hospitality so he regulates it too, a lover of hospitality, yet sober and temperate; riotous house-keeping is not hospitality in St. Paul's account, but the liberal and free relieving of such as are in necessities and straits: Holding fast the faithful word, as he hath been taught. He must be a person well instructed, well settled and confirmed in the faith, of ability to defend the faith, and to stop the mouth of gainsayers: Just, holy, and a lover of good men, a person of strict holiness and piety towards God, of exact righteousness and justice towards man; and a sincere lover of all good men. These are the positive characters required in a bishop. The negatives follow, and they are five; not self-willed, not so adhering to his own resolutions, that nothing can divorce him from them; he that is of an inflexible will, had need be of an infallible judgment; not soon angry, and subject to passion, for he stands in God's place, and ought to resemble God in long-suffering and patience; not given to wine, that is, to much wine, no inordinate lover of it, no sinner at wine, either in his own house, or elsewhere; no striker, either with the hand, or with the tongue; not given to filthy lucre, seeking to get wealth by sordid ways and means: The sin of covetousness is not so base in any man, as in a minister; many are unjustly charged:

charged with it, but where it is really found, it is a sordid sin. How unfit is he to administer in holy things to God, who prefers the world before God! By making a god of the world, we make an idol of God.

10 For there are many unruly and vain talkers, and deceivers, especially they of the circumcision :
11 Whose mouth must be stopped, who subvert whole houses, teaching things which they ought not, for filthy lucre's sake.

A reason is here subjoined by our apostle, why Titus should take such special care to fill the church with able guides, namely, because there were a multitude of false teachers dispersed abroad, and scattered up and down every where, particularly, the Judaizing doctors, those of the circumcision, mentioned Acts xv. who would make Christianity nothing more than a supplement to the law of Moses. These, he tells Titus, must have their mouths stopped, not by force, for Titus had no power of the sword, but by confutation: he must take care to ordain such as might silence them, though not satisfy them. For, mark the efficacy of error, and the power of seduction, they subvert whole houses, they make proselytes without number. Learn hence, That such is the strength of error, and the weakness and unsteadiness of many Christians, that whole households may be subverted by the most gross deceivers. If the apostle's converts were thus easily and universally misled, no wonder if ours be so.

12 One of themselves, even a prophet of their own, said, The Cretians are always liars, evil beasts, slow bellies. 13 This witness is true: Wherefore rebuke them sharply, that they may be found in the faith; 14 Not giving heed to Jewish fables, and commandments of men that turn from the truth.

The next argument St. Paul makes use of to excite Titus to take great care how he behaved himself at Crete, and what bishops he left there, is drawn from the quality and nature of the people in that island of Crete, where God's providence and the apostle's care had placed him: He tells him, that one of their own prophets or poets, Epimenides, had given this character of them, That the Cretians were a lazy and a lying people, ready enough to be misled by the false teachers, particularly the Judaizing doctors, who imposed circumcision and other ceremonial rites upon them, which were now old fables, but tended to pervert men from the truth; therefore he charges Titus to reprove sharply and cuttingly, that they may be found in faith. The word is a metaphor taken from surgeons, who cut out dead flesh to the quick, but it is in order to healing; cutting words have done great cures: Many a disease, festered soul has been made sound, both in faith and manners, by severe reprehension. Learn hence, That although generally speaking, we ought to temper our reproofs with much gentleness and meekness, yet there is a time when we must reprove sharply, that men may be found in the faith. We may, we must speak cutting words, when kind words will not do. Wherefore rebuke them sharply, &c.

13 Unto the pure all things are pure: But unto them that are defiled and unbelieving is nothing pure; but even their mind and conscience is defiled.

Here our apostle intimates what those Jewish traditions and fables were, which those Judaizing doctors and false teachers would obtrude and impose upon persons at that time, namely, pretences that men were defiled by eating things unclean, by not observing their days, and keeping other ceremonial rites: But, says the apostle, to the pure all things are pure; that is, to believers who are sanctified by the Christian faith, and purified from sin and guilt, all meats, and days, and things of this nature, are clean and lawful, and may without sin be used, every creature being sanctified by the word of God and prayer. Here note, The honourable title which a gracious and merciful God puts upon good men, notwithstanding they have much impurity and sin inhering in them, and many sinful weaknesses and infirmities cleaving to them, yet God calls them pure. Unto the pure, &c. they are now initially so, and shall ere long be perfectly so. 2. A privilege purchased for them by the blood of Christ, and that is, the lawful liberty and use of all meats. &c. under the gospel, which were prohibited by, and forbidden under the ceremonial law; unto the pure all things are now pure,—But unto them that are defiled and unbelieving is nothing pure; Mark, He doth not say, to the defiled all things are unclean, but nothing is pure: They pollute all they touch: To an un sanctified man nothing is sanctified; whatever he does is unclean, either in the matter, in the manner, or in the end of his doing it; and the reason follows, because their mind and conscience is defiled. No wonder the streams are polluted, when the fountains are poisoned. The mind and conscience are defiled, partly by blindness, partly by stupidity.

16 They profess that they know God; but in works they deny him, being abominable and disobedient, and unto every good work reprobate.

Behold here the dismal character of many hypocritical persons in the Jewish church: They professed the knowledge of God; the true God; but in their works, in their lives and actions they denied him, and so became abominable both to God and man, disobedient to the law, and averse to every good work. Here learn, 1. That hypocrites are generally great professors; they profess great knowledge of God, and great zeal for him. 2. That to deny God is a very heinous sin, and an abominable wickedness: There is a twofold denial of God; first, in words, expressly and openly; secondly, in practice, clostly and consequentially; They profess that they knew God, but in works they deny him. There may be at once a professing of God and a denial of him: Many a man's practice speaks loud, that there is no God, when he makes a fair confession and profession of him with his mouth and tongue. Learn 3. That no sort of persons are so odious to God, and abominable in his sight, as those who make a profession of his holy name and truth, but walk contrary in their lives to that profession; They profess that they knew God, but in works deny him.

C H A P. II.

Our apostle in this chapter directs Titus how to discharge his duty faithfully, as a minister of Christ, in preaching the gospel, advising him to instruct all, both young and old, parents and children, masters and servants, in the practice of their relative and respective duties one towards another, that God might be glorified, and religion adorned.

BUT speak thou the things which become sound doctrine.

As if our apostle had said, Whatever the formentioned Judaizing doctors preach, though they do upon dreams, and feed their hearers with fables and fancies, to poison and corrupt their souls, and turn them from the truth; be sure that thou carriest thyself as becomes a sound preacher of the gospel, and speak only the things which become sound doctrine: The body may as soon be nourished with carrion, as the soul with rotten and unsound doctrine. Christian doctrine is sound doctrine: And the ministers of Christ, who feed his people, must take care that they bring such wholesome doctrine to their people, as may contribute greatly to their spiritual health and soundness; Speak thou the things that became sound doctrine.

2 That the aged men be sober, grave, temperate, sound in faith, in charity, in patience:

By aged men, we may understand all ancient men in general, and church officers in particular, in whom our apostle requires and calls for gravity and sobriety in behaviour, temperance in all things, that they be sound in faith, sincere in charity, and constant in patience. Where note, That our apostle exempteth none from the instructions, admonitions, and exhortations of the ministers of God. God's school is as well for the aged as the young, not only for initiating youth, but also for edifying the aged, and building them up in their most holy faith: The aged have but a little time to be in the world, their nature declines, their days are almost ended, they must therefore labour to recompence a decay of nature with increase of grace, the weakness of body with strength of faith: Let the aged men be sound in the faith. Note farther, That sobriety, gravity, temperance, soundness in the faith, eminent charity, and exemplary patience, are the great ornaments of persons in their old age.

3 The aged women likewise, that they be in behaviour as becometh holiness, not false accusers, not given to much wine, teachers of good things: 4 That they may teach the young women to be sober, to love their husbands, to love their children; 5 To be discreet, chaste, keepers at home, good, obedient to their own husbands, that the word of God be not blasphemed.

Instructions are here given for the good women, as before for the aged men, that is, for all in general: and such aged women in particular as were deaconesses, or servants to the church, that they being placed in the rank of church-officers, should act and walk as becometh holy persons, employed about holy things; particularly, that their deportment and behaviour be such, both in habit and gesture, as becometh holiness, that they be not false accusers, devils, the original signifiers, because false accusing is the devil's work; they that do his work shall bear his name: Not given to much wine; Excess in drinking is bad in men, worse in women, worst of all in old women, who ought to be patterns of piety and prudence, of sobriety and temperance, to the younger women; for St. Paul here directs them to teach the younger; that is, by their private admonitions and prudent examples, instruct them to be wise and sober, not light and airy; and to love their husbands and children in a fit and becoming manner, and to shew it in their behaviour; discreet and chaste in all their actions, keeping at home, and minding the affairs of the family; to be kind and obedient to their husbands, lest the miscarriages of young women should bring reproach upon religion, and the gospel be thought by the men of the world to infuse any thing into them contrary to moral virtue. Learn hence, That the wholesome doctrine of the gospel must be preached and practically applied to women as well as to men, as they cannot without the danger of damnation, despise or neglect the ministry of the word.

6 Young men likewise exhort to be sober-minded.

Note here, 1. That the ministers of God must apply themselves and their doctrine to the several sexes, ages, and conditions of their people; that every person, man and woman, young and old, superior and inferior, may know not only what is lawful, but what is expedient, most befitting their quality, and best becoming their age. Here our apostle directs Titus to exhort first the aged men, next the aged women; now the younger men, that they be sober-minded, settled in the truth, guided by sound judgment, not governed by passion, nor led by sense and appetite, nor puffed up with proud conceit: Where it is observable, that St. Paul's warnings here given in this chapter to the aged men, the aged women, and the younger men, do intimate to us what vices they are that all sorts of persons are subject to, and most endangered by; and this is the wise improvement that all should make of it, to watch against the sins of their age and condition, their complexion and constitution, their calling and vocation, every sin that doth so easily beset them, and obstructs and hinders them in their Christian course.

7 In all things shewing thyself a pattern of good works: In doctrine shewing uncorruptness, gravity, sincerity, 8 Sound speech that cannot be condemned; that he that is of the contrary part may be ashamed, having no evil thing to say to you.

St. Paul having directed Titus what doctrine to preach, comes now to instruct him what example to lead, in all things shew thyself a pattern of good works; as if he had said, In all the good which thou exhortest thy hearers to, be an eminent pattern of it thyself; that they may see that visibly in thy life, which thou predest upon them by thy preaching. By piety and good works second thy doctrine; there must be a sweet harmony between a minister's doctrine and his conversation; otherwife he pulls down faster than he builds up: An heterodox conversation will carry an orthodox preacher to hell. He closes this admonition to Titus concerning preaching, with this solemn charge, namely, That this doctrine be sound and profitable, sincere without mixture, grave without levity, sound words, that can never be confuted by gainfayers; which must be expected; but happy will you be if they can have nothing justly to charge your doctrine or conversation with. Learn hence, That the ministers of God have ever had, and must always expect some that will withstand, oppose, and gainsay them, as long as there is a devil in the world; and so long as the ministers of God endeavour to batter down the walls of his kingdom, he will raise storms about their ears. 2. That it is the duty, and must be the care and endeavour of all the ministers of God, to oblige themselves to such an exemplary piety of conversation, as may stop the mouth of slander, that the contrary party may be ashamed, having no evil thing to say against them.

9 Exhort servants to be obedient unto their own masters, and to please them well in all things; not answering again, 10 Not purloining, but shewing all good fidelity; that they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things.

Although Titus, according to some, was a bishop, yea, an archbishop, yet St. Paul exhorts him to look upon the instruction of servants as one part of his charge. Exhort servants; the souls of the poorest slaves and servants, for whom the Son of God died, must be of precious account with, and be particularly concerned for, by the highest ambassador of Christ: As all souls had an equal price, so must they have an equal care. 2. The general duty which servants are exhorted to, and that is, obedience to their own masters, in all honest and lawful things, whether their masters were Pagans or Christians: If Pagans, not thinking that their Christianity freed them from their just commands: if Christian masters, not thinking that they had therefore a greater liberty to be saucy with them, or less obedient to them. 3. The particular duties here pressed upon servants, 1. Not answering again, not crossing or contradicting what they are commanded, not saucily replying when they are reprov'd. 2. Not purloining, that is not stealing the least thing, nor taking any thing that is their master's, which is not allowed by their consent, but shewing all conscionable trustiness, and that great fidelity and honesty may be found with them. 4. The argument or motive to stir up servants to this conscionable care, and conscionous discharge of their duty, That they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things; that is, that they may put honour upon Christ and his holy religion, by beautifying their Christian profession by a suitable and becoming conversation. Learn, That it is in the power of the poorest and meanest servant to do much good or much hurt to the Christian religion: Some might be ready to say, Alas! What good or hurt, what credit or discredit can a poor servant do to religion? - Much every way: He may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour, by his Christian behaviour as a servant, and the name of God and his doctrine may be blasphemed by him, if he be negligent in his duty. None are so little and inconsiderable, but they are capable of serving the great ends of religion, capable of doing good service for God on earth, and of being eternally rewarded by God in heaven.

11 For the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men; 12 Teaching us that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously and godly, in this present world.

As if the apostle had said, Let all sorts of men, servants and masters, children and parents, old and young, discharge their duties faithfully to God and one another; for the grace of God, discovered in the gospel, has appeared to all men, teaching them to deny all doctrines and practices which are ungodly, and all worldly lusts of sensuality, and that we should live soberly, with respect to ourselves, righteously and charitably towards our neighbour, and holily towards God in this present world. Note here, 1. A choice and excellent description of the gospel; it is the grace of God, that is, the doctrine of God's free grace and gratuitous favour declared in Christ to poor sinners. 2. The joyful message which the gospel brings, and that is, salvation: The gospel makes a gracious tender of salvation, and that universally to lost and undone sinners. 3. The clear light and evidence that it does hold forth this message in and by; it has appeared or shined forth like the day-star, or the rising-sun. 4. The extent of its glorious beams, how far they reach, to all indefinitely, The grace of God bringing salvation has appeared unto all men; that is, it is tendered to all without restriction or limitation. (1.) As to nations, Jew or Gentile. (2.) As to persons, rich or poor, bond or free. (3.) Without restriction, in reference to the degree of their graces. Note, 5. The great lesson which the gospel teaches, negative and positive. 1. Negative, To deny ungodly and worldly lusts; where by ungodliness, understand all sins committed against the first table; by worldly lusts, all sins committed against the second table; called worldly lusts, because the object of them is worldly things, and because they are the lusts of worldly men. 2. Positive, to live. (1.) Soberly; he begins with our duty to ourselves, then to our neighbour, and last of all to God, and so proceeds from the easier to the harder duties: And observe the connection, soberly, and righteously, and godly, not disjunctively: as if to live soberly, righteously, or in pretence godly, were sufficient. A sobriety in speech, in behaviour, in apparel, in eating and drinking, in recreations, and in the enjoyment of lawful satisfactions. (2.) Righteously, exercising justice and charity towards our neighbour: He that is uncharitable, is unjust and unrighteous, and the unrighteous shall no more enter into the kingdom of God, than the unholy: And all a person's pretences to godliness are but hypocrisy, without righteousness toward our neighbour. (3.) Godly. Godliness has an internal and external part; the internal and inward part of godliness consists in a right knowledge of him, in a fervent love unto him, in an entire trust and confidence in him, in an holy fear to offend him, in subjecting our wills entirely to him, in holy longings for the fruition and enjoyment of him. The external and outward part of godliness consists in adoration and bodily worship; this is due to God from us; he was the Creator of the body as well as of the soul, the Redeemer of the body as well as of the soul, and will glorify the body as well as the soul; therefore we are to glorify God with our bodies, and with our spirits, which are the Lord's. Note, 6. The time when, and the place where this lesson is to be learnt, in this present world. Here is the place, and now is the time when this duty of living soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world, is to be performed by us. Learn, That a sober, righteous, and godly life in this present world, is absolutely necessary in order to our obtaining the happiness and glory of the world to come. Inference: If so, what a cheat doth that man put upon his soul, who trusts to a death bed repentance? Be it ever so sincere, how can it be said to be a living soberly, righteously and godly in this world, when just stepping into eternity?

13 Looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of that great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ:

Observe here, 1. The character given of that reward which the gospel promises to them that live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world; this is described, 1. By its futurity, it is hope, something expected, and to come; 2. By its transcendency, it is a blessed hope. Learn That the Christian's hope (or the good things hoped for) is laid up, not in this, but in the other world; because this world, and this present state, is not capable of that happiness which the Christian hopes for. It is too great, it is too good for earth, it is laid up in heaven. Observe, 2. The time and season when this glorious reward and blessed hope shall be dispensed and given forth unto the godly, and that is, at the glorious appearing of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ. Where note, A threefold description of Christ. 1. By the immensity of his Deity, he is the great God. 2. By the graciousness of his office, our Saviour. 3. By the glory of his advent, or appearance, looking for the glorious appearance of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ. Observe, 3. The Christian's duty, with reference and relation to this reward, and to the appearance of Christ, when it shall be dispensed and given forth, namely, to look and long for that joyful hour. Learn That the great duty incumbent on all the people of God; is to be continually looking and longing for, hoping and expecting of the coming and appearance of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; looking for the blessed hope, &c.

14 Who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works.

Observe here, 1. The way and manner how Christ came to be our Saviour, He gave himself for us. Note, 1. The giver, Christ, he gave. 2. The gift, himself. 3. The person for whom he gave himself, for us. Learn, 1. That all that Jesus Christ suffered, he did sustain and undergo freely and voluntarily. 2. That that which Christ gave for our redemption, was himself. 3. That it was especially for his church, that he gave himself, who gave himself for us. Observe, 2. The great ends for which Christ gave himself for his church, and they are two, 1. To redeem them from all iniquity. 2. To purify them a peculiar people to himself. 1. To redeem them from iniquity; redemption supposes a thralldom and bondage; redemption from iniquity supposes a thralldom and bondage to sin and iniquity: Our Redeemer therefrom is Jesus Christ, and by dying for us, he did, and only could redeem us: He gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity. 2. Another end of Christ's redeeming us, is to purify us to himself a peculiar people. Here note, That as redemption did presuppose a bondage, so purification supposes an uncleanness, that is, sin. 2. That Christ's redeemed people are a purified people, and a peculiar people, possessed by the Spirit of Christ with a zeal for good works. 3. That it was not only for us that Christ redeemed and purified us a peculiar people to himself, but ultimately for himself, and for his own and his Father's glory and complacency; that he might purify to himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works.

15 These things speak and exhort, and rebuke with all authority. Let no man despise thee.

As if he had said, Let these necessary practical truths be the subject matter of thy preaching, and according to the authority of thy office rebuke gainsayers, and let thy doctrine and behaviour in wisdom and gravity be such, as may keep and preserve thee from all contempt. The ministers of Christ are to take especial care that they neither expose their persons nor their office, by any indecencies, to contempt; Let no man despise thee.

CHAP. III.

Our apostle in this concluding chapter of his epistle, directs Titus to preach and press more general duties which concern all mankind, such as to be ready to every good work, to speak evil of no man; to shew meekness to all men, and to be careful to maintain good works.

PUT them in mind to be subject to principalities and powers, to obey magistrates, to be ready to every good work.

Observe here, That in those early days of Christianity, great scandal was brought upon religion by the unduful carriage of servants and subjects towards their masters and magistrates; and this upon a false notion of Christian liberty, advanced and propagated by the false apostles, Judaizing teachers, and Gnostic libertines; whereupon he requires Titus to put Christians in mind of their duty in that particular, and to inculcate it earnestly upon them, that the Christian religion might not be slandered upon this account. Put them in mind to be subject to principalities and powers. Learn hence, That the duty of subjection to governors and government, and of obedience to magistrates and rulers, is of very great importance, and ought to be enforced and frequently inculcated upon the people by the ministers ministers of God? because by nature all men desire liberty and to cast off the yoke of God: Every one would rule and govern, although the duty of subjection be much the easier duty. 2. From St. Paul's pressing Titus to preach up the doctrine of obedience and subjection to governors and government, learn, That there is no such way and method to live regularly under government, like planting the gospel among them, and making them subject to our Lord Jesus Christ.

2 To speak evil of no man, to be no brawlers, but gentle, shewing all meekness unto all men.

Calumny and evil-speaking has been a reigning vice in all ages, and a greater guilt is contradicted by it that men apprehend; every man ought to be as just to his neighbours reputation as his own? If what we report of another we know to be false, it is down right lying; if what evil we report of others be really true, and we know it to be so, yet it is a defamation, and contrary to that charity and goodness which Christianity requires; for to divulge the faults of others, though they be really guilty of them, without necessity, is certainly a sin, and included in this apostolical prohibition: To think and speak evil of others, is not only a bad thing, but a sign of a bad man; and in many cases it is as great charity to conceal an evil we hear of our neighbour, as it is to relieve him in his distress. The next exhortation is to be no brawlers, in the original, no fighters; that is, neither with tongue or hand, but meek and gentle, putting up a double wrong, rather than revenging a single injury, using all meekness towards all men. Meekness pacifies wrath and conquers animosity to a wonder, making him tame and gentle, who by opposition is furious and implacable; the hardest flint is sooner broken upon a pillow or cushion that gently yieldeth, than upon a bar of iron that furiously resisteth.

3 For we ourselves also were sometimes foolish disobedient, deceived, serving divers lust and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful, and hating one another.

Here we have a very weighty reason laid down by our apostle, why Christians should be found in the practice of the forementioned virtues of equity and lenity, of patience and charity, of meekness and long suffering one towards another; namely, because before their conversion they themselves lived in the practice of the forementioned vices as well as others, We ourselves also were foolish, disobedient, &c. That is, the servants of sin, and slaves to our lusts, suffering wrath to rest in our bosoms, till it boiled up to revenge; having formerly, therefore, been such ourselves we ought to pity rather than spurn at those that are so still. No argument will more effectually incline and dispose us to pity the miscarriages of others, than the consideration that we ourselves are prone and have heretofore been guilty of the same, or the like provocation ourselves.

4 But after the kindness and love of God our Saviour towards man appeared, 5 Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the holy Ghost; 6 Which he shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour;

As if our apostle had said, Though in our heathenish and unconverted state, we were as bad and vile as any, yet no sooner did the loving kindness of God to fallen man appear, by the illumination of the gospel, and the communication of his grace, not for any good works or deserts of ours, but of his mercy and free goodness, he saved us from that state of sin and misery by regeneration, signified and sealed in baptism, and by the renewing of the holy Ghost, which holy Spirit was poured forth in an extraordinary measure upon us (according to promise) after Christ's resurrection. Here observe, How every person in the Trinity acts distinctly in the work of our salvation: 1. The fountal cause, the spring and source of our happiness, lies in the kindness and love of God the Father. 2. The meritorious and procuring cause or the application of this love is Jesus Christ, in the work of redemption and mediation. 3. The immediate and efficient cause of the communication of that love of God the Father, procured through the mediation of Christ the Son, is the holy Spirit, in the work of regeneration.

7 Which he shed on us abundantly, through Jesus Christ our Saviour; 8 That being justified by his grace we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life;

That is, which holy Spirit was in its gifts and graces plentifully poured forth upon us, and dwelleth in us, not essentially but energetically, illuminating, guiding, strengthening and confirming of us: And the end of God herein is, That being justified by his grace, that is, by faith in his Son, we should be made heirs of eternal life, according to the hope which the promises of God have given us thereof. Learn hence, 1. That all the grace which is so plentifully poured forth upon believers, is by the means and mediation of our Lord Jesus Christ. 2. That justification being a sinner's absolution from guilt and punishment by the satisfaction of Christ the Redeemer, is yet an act of special grace and free favour in God That being justified by his grace. 3. That it is the blessed privilege of all justified persons, that they are now heirs to, and shall ere long be possessors of eternal life; they shall ere long have in hand,

8 This is a faithful saying, and these things I will that thou affirm constantly: That they which have believed in God might be careful to maintain good works. These things are good and profitable unto men.

Our apostle having, in the foregoing verses, spoken of justification by grace without works of righteousness, doth here immediately give a strict and solemn charge to Titus, 6 C 2 to press the necessity of good works; upon those who did believe and embrace the gospel on purpose to prevent all mistake and abuse of the doctrine of justification by faith, and free grace and mercy of God in Jesus Christ; intimating, That they who are justified by the faith of the gospel should be so far from thinking themselves hereby excused from good works, that they ought, upon that account to be the more careful to maintain and practice them, because by the very profession of the Christian faith and religion, they have solemnly engaged themselves so to do. Observe here, 1. That the great design of Christianity, and the end of God in the revelation of the gospel, was to reform the lives and manners of men, and to oblige all persons both to be good, and to do good. Learn, 2. From the apostle's vehement asseveration, This is a faithful saying, and his solemn charge, These things I will that thou affirm constantly, that there have been persons in all ages, who have exalted the virtue of faith, if not intentionally, yet indiscreetly, to the prejudice and neglect of a good life. As if by a mere speculative belief and profession of Christianity, men were discharged from the practice of moral duties. God grant that the decried morality of some persons may be an integral part of my religion. 3. That though good works are not necessary before justification to bring us into a justified state, yet they are necessary after justification, in order to our continuance in that state;— Not by works of righteousness which we done, that is, before faith; but he doth not exclude the works of righteousness in the new nature given to them, from being condition of their future happiness. As morality doth not make faith useless, so neither doth faith bring any excuse for immorality. 4. That it is not sufficient that believers do good works, but they must maintain good works; the words signify they must be patterns and precedents, they must be eminent and excelling in good works, and let their faith be never so excellent, if they do not add to their faith, virtue, it is but a fancy, a strong faith built upon a weak foundation.

9 But avoid foolish questions, and genealogies, and contentions and strivings about the law: for they are unprofitable and vain.

We have the same charge given to Timothy, 1 Epist. i. 4. See the note upon it. And learn hence, That disputes about matters, which only serve to beget strife and contention, and tend little to our edification in faith and holiness, are vain talk unprofitable disputes, to be declined and avoided by all wise and serious Christians: Avoid foolish questions, for they are unprofitable and vain.

10 A man that is an heretic, after the first and second admonition, reject: 11 Knowing that he that is such is subverted, and sinneth, being condemned of himself.

As if the apostle had said, Avoid and shun, and refuse communion with him that doth obstinately persist in dangerous heresies, and accordingly let him be excommunicated. Learn hence, 1. Who is an heretic in the apostle's sense, even he who is perverted from the true faith, and holds opinions which subvert the foundations of it; and one who is condemned in his own conscience, and sins against his own convictions: For the apostle here bids Titus not inform him of his errors, but admonish him of his fault; which shews, that the crime lay not in head, in his understanding, but in his will and affections: For, no man, who acts according to his judgment and conscience, how erroneous soever, is self condemned in that action. 2. lovingly dealt with, so long as there is any hope that they may be gained or won. 3. That the charity of the church, in her censure of excommunication, aims rather at the cutting off errors than of person.

12 When I shall send Artemas unto thee, or Ty-chicus be diligent to come unto me to Nicopolis: For I have determined there to winter.

Our apostle having finished all such common precepts as respected the whole church in Crete, he now passeth to such private affairs as did more particularly respect the person of Titus and himself. First, He desires Titus to come to him to Nicopolis from Crete, but not before he had sent thither Artemas or Ty-chicus to officiate in his place: Wonderful care of the holy apostle! And a mighty concern for the welfare of all the churches! St. Paul very well knew how fatal and dangerous it might be to the churches to be left destitute of their spiritual guides, though for a very small time. St. Paul knew the malice of the devil, the subtilty of seducers, and the weakness of Christians' faith, too well, to give all, or any of them, advantages of doing mischief in the absence of Titus from them.

13 Bring Zenas the lawyer, and Apollos on their journey dilligently, that nothing be wanting unto them.

Here we have a second private affair which is given in charge to Titus, namely that he help forward on their journey Zenas and Apollos, both apostolic men; the former an expounder of the law of Moses, the other an eloquent man, and mighty in the scriptures; both these cleaved to St. Paul, and therefore were worthily to be respected by Titus, whom the apostle therefore bid him be kind and courteous to, and help them forward with their journey. Learn thence, That Christianity is no enemy to, but a great promoter of all offices of humanity and civil courtesy towards all persons, towards strangers particularly, toward good men especially. Observe next, St. Paul desires Titus to take care that those servants of God be so supplied; that they lack nothing: Such as are engaged in the Lord's work must be carefully provided for, and care taken that they lack nothing.

14 And let ours also learn to maintain good works for necessary uses, that they be not unfruitful.

Let ours, that is, either, 1. Those of our order, the ministers of the gospel or those that are our converts, such as are Christians, let them study to excel in good works, be diligent in the labours of their calling, that they may have therewith therewith to supply the necessities of others, to the intent that they may not appear unfruitful. Learn hence, That as Christianity is no barren and fruitless profession, but all persons professing religion ought to take care that good works may accompany their faith; so the ministers of Christ in special ought to be careful herein, and by no means to bind their duty upon others, which they do not practise themselves; they must by charity and good works, second their doctrine, and so win persons to a love of religion.

15 All that are with me salute thee. —

By these words, St. Paul gives Titus to understand, that all the Christians that were then with him, did embrace him with an endearing and loving affection, and would have their mindfulness of him witnessed by a kind and familiar salutation. These salutations had more in them than humanity, civility, and common courtesy; they were attestations of a truly Christian love and brotherly affection, of one member of Christ towards another for grace's sake.

—Greet them that love us in the faith.—

That is, as Christians, as brethren, and fellow-members in Christ, verus amicus qui vere et in Deo diligit. Grace binds man to man in the strongest and most indissoluble bonds and ties.

—Grace be with you all. Amen.

This is the salutation of St. Paul, always written with his own hand, in all his epistles; although the epistles themselves were writ by others, he did it to prevent counterfeits, that no spurious writings might be obtruded upon the church: And whereas he says, Grace be with you all, it plainly intimates, that although this epistle be written by name to Titus, yet it was intended for the benefit and advantage of the whole church.

This epistle was written to a particular person, and upon a particular occasion. The person was Philemon, an eminent officer in the church of Coloss; and, as some say, successor to Timothy, as bishop of Ephesus. The occasion this: Onesimus a naughty servant, running away from his master Philemon, and carrying away probably something of his master's substance with him, by the providence of God comes to Rome, where St. Paul was then a prisoner and preacher in bonds: God blessed the apostle's ministry, for the conversion of this fugitive, who was brought to a true knowledge of Jesus Christ, and after his conversion, for a time administered to Paul in prison; but the apostle understanding that he was another man's servant, and particularly his dear friend Philemon's, sends him back to his master, earnestly desiring him to pardon him, and to receive him into favour,

C H A P. I.

PAUL a prisoner of Jesus Christ, and Timothy our brother, unto Philemon our dearly beloved, and fellow-labourer, 2 And to our beloved Apphia, and Archippus our fellow-soldier, and to the church in thy house. 3 Grace to you, and peace from God our father, and the Lord Jesus Christ.

Observe here, 1. The writer of this epistle described by his name, Paul; by his condition, a prisoner of Jesus Christ;

by his office a labourer, a soldier, a fellow-labourer, and a fellow-soldier with Philemon and Archippus. Where note, That to be a labourer, a soldier, and a prisoner for Jesus Christ, are the titles that St. Paul glories in, and not in worldly dignities. Paul a prisoner of Jesus Christ; yet was Paul a prisoner in libera custodia, not so closely confined, but he had pen, ink, and paper; God gave Paul then, as Joseph before, favour in the sight of the keeper of the prison: Let persecutors send their saints to prison, God can provide a keeper for their turn. Happy was it for thee, Onesimus, that Paul was sent to goal; his imprisonment prisonment was the happy occasion of thy spiritual liberty. 2. The persons to whom the epistle is directed; first, and eminently to Philemon the master, and to Apphia, the mistress of the family, in which, and with whom, Onesimus had dwelt, but was run from. St. Paul writes to both judging the mistress's consent necessary for taking this fugative back into her family, as well as the masters: Intimating thereby, That although the husband, by the ordinance and appointment of God, has the highest place, the first and chief power in the government of the family, yet the wife being given him of God, as an assistant and fellow-helper in government, her subordinate authority given her by God is to be owned and acknowledged. Next, this epistle is directed to Archippus, who dwelt with, or near Philemon; him he calls his fellow-soldier, and Philemon his fellow-labourer. Where note, That the ministers of the gospel are compared to soldiers; they have enemies to encounter and conflict with, Satan's temptations, the world's persecutions, sinners corrupt lusts and affections. Let the ministers of God then reckon beforehand upon a toilsome and troublesome life; if they resolve to be faithful, the devil will plant all his artillery against them. Last of all the epistle is directed to the church in Philemon's house: by which some understand the company of Christians that met together at his house to worship God; for Christians then had not liberty publicly to perform that duty. Others understand it of Philemon's own family, which speaks at once Philemon's privilege and duty, that he had such a well ordered family, that it was a little church; that is, it was a lively image and representation of the church, both in its doctrine and worship.

4 I thank my God, making mention of thee always in my prayers.

Observe here, Our apostle's holy insinuation and pious wisdom; that he might make, a more easy way for his petition, he labours to possess Philemon with an opinion of his endeared affection towards him, and of his continual prayers even by name for him: I thank my God, making mention of thee in my prayers. Where note, That St. Paul did, and we may make particular mention of persons and churches in our daily prayers to Almighty God: I make mention of thee always in my prayers.

5 Hearing of thy love and faith, which thou hast toward the Lord Jesus, and towards all saints: 6 That the communication of thy faith may become effectual, by the acknowledging of every good thing which is in you in Christ Jesus. 7 For we have great joy and consolation in thy love; because the bowels of the saints are refreshed by thee; brother.

Our apostle having discovered to Philemon his fervent prayers for him, next makes mention of the excellent graces which were so orient and shining in him, namely, his faith and his love; his faith in Christ produceth love to him and to all saints; not to a party of Christians only; hearing of thy love and faith towards the Lord Jesus, and in him towards all the saints. The saints are to be loved next Christ, and in and for Christ. Observe next, St. Paul prays that Philemon's faith and love might be made manifest, to be effectual for producing all sorts of good fruits in him and by him: That the communication of thy faith may become effectual. Observe, lastly, The great joy and consolation which the apostle had in the operativeness of Philemon's faith and love, whereby the bowels of the saints were greatly refreshed. Learn hence, That administering to the necessities of the saints, and relieving the bowels of the distressed members of Jesus Christ, is a blessed evidence of the sincerity of our love to Christ, and Christians: There is a frozen charity and a lip love found among many professors, whom Christ will own at the great day; but such as by offices and kindness performed with a tender and pitiful heart, do refresh the bowels of the saints, Christ reckons it as done unto himself, whatever is done to those his suffering members, Matt. xxv. and God himself is thereby refreshed, Phil. iv. 18. An odour of a sweet smell, and a sacrifice acceptable and pleasing to God. Note, lastly, What the condition of the holiest and best of God's servants in the world has been, is, and may be, namely, such, that their bowels may stand in need of refreshing, whilst the wicked are fat, fresh, and flourishing; but, blessed be God, if his children miss of refreshment from men, their time of refreshment will come from the presence of the Lord:

8 Wherefore, though I might be much bold in Christ, to enjoin thee that which is convenient, 9 Yet for love's sake I rather beseech thee, being such a one as Paul the aged, and now also a prisoner of Jesus Christ. 10 I beseech thee for my ion Onesimus, whom I have begotten in my bonds: 11 Which in time past was to thee unprofitable, but now profitable to thee and to me:

Observe here, The marvellous condescending humility of our apostle in these expressions: As an apostle, he was the highest ruler and officer in the church of God, and had the fullest authority and power that a person could have upon earth, to command, require, and enjoin Philemon to the practice of his duty; but he tells him, though he might be bold to enjoin, yet he rather chose to beseech: for love's sake I rather beseech thee. Learn hence, That church-rulers and governors, although they have a commanding power and authority, which upon occasion they may and must make use of, yet they should choose much rather in love to intreat, hoping that will work more kindly and effectually upon the minds of persons. Observe, 2. The arguments St. Paul uses as a ground of intreaty, I Paul desire and beseech thee, I Paul the aged, I Paul a prisoner. Note, He urges his years as an argument for granting his request; that he was aged, and an aged minister of Christ: If honour be due to an aged person walking in the way of righteousness, much more it is so to an aged minister, grey-headed in the service of Christ, and having faithfully discharged his duty there. He also urges his sufferings as well as his years; I Paul a prisoner of Jesus Christ. The sufferings of Christ's ministers in the cause of God should by no means lessen and diminish, but rather augment and increase that reverence, regard and respect which is deservedly due and payable unto them. 3. The person person whom he thus intercedes with affection for ; Onesimus, whom he calls his son begotten in his bonds ; that is, spiritual son, converted to Christianity by his ministry, when he was in prison. Where note, That endearing love and that fervent affection which the ministers of Christ bear to their converts, to such as they have gained unto Christ ; it equals, nay, perhaps exceeds the natural affection of parents towards their own children. Note, also, who they are that best deserve the name of fathers in the church, verily those that have begot most spiritual children unto God ; such as can say, " Lord, here am I, and the children which thou hast given me." Nevertheless, for our comfort, God will, at the reckoning-day, account and treat such as spiritual fathers who have been faithful, though unsuccessful, in the work of Christ, because they have cast forth the prolific seed of the gospel ; therefore the cause of sterility and spiritual barrenness cannot be imputed to them, they having exerted and put forth their best endeavours. Note also, The high honour which God confers upon his faithful ministers ; the scripture allows them, though but instruments, what is properly attributed to God himself, namely, to beget spiritual children ; this is God's work : Of his own will he begat us, James i. 18. God allows that to be in an inferior sense attributed to the ministry, which is strictly applicable only to himself. 4. How the apostle wisely answers the objections which Philemon might make against his request, of receiving Onesimus, that he had been vile, a fugitive, a thief, what not ? St. Paul implicitly owns all that, yet with a softening distinction, he was unprofitable in times past, but now profiteth both thee and me. Now St. Paul pre-occupating and answering this objection before Philemon made it, shews how hard it is for the best men to forgive and forget injuries done unto them, especially by their relations, those in their own families, whether children or servants. Note also, The character given of Onesimus before conversion, he was unprofitable. Lord, what an useless, unprofitable creature is an unsanctified and unconverted sinner ! unprofitable to God, unprofitable to others, unprofitable to his own soul ; but by conversion he becomes universally useful and profitable to all about him, but especially to himself ; others may have the benefit of our estate, our parts and gifts, but we ourselves shall have the chief benefit, comfort, and advantage of our own grace.

12 Whom I have sent again : thou therefore receive him that is in mine own bowels. 13 Whom I would have retained with me, that in thy stead he might have ministered unto me in the bonds of the gospel. 14 But without thy mind would I do nothing ; that thy benefit should not be as it were of necessity, but willingly.

Here are several arguments used by the apostle, why Philemon should receive Onesimus into his service again. 1. Because St. Paul had sent him for that end, a long and tedious journey from Rome to coloss, and because he came with the apostles commendatory letters, and in his name. We are not easily to reject those that come to us countenanced and encouraged with the commendations of the reverend and faithful ministers of God. In the close of the first argument, at the foot of the twelfth verse, observe the endearing title he gives Onesimus, he calls him his own bowels ; receive him that is my own bowels. O Lord ! certainly there is no stronger love, nor more endearing and endeared affection between any relations upon earth, than between the ministers of the gospel and such of their beloved people, whom they have been happily instrumental to beget unto thyself. How inexpressibly dear is the soul of a poor servant to a faithful minister of Christ, and how lovely when once converted ? Receive him, for he is as dear to me as if he had proceeded out of my own bowels. Again Another argument is this ; St. Paul sends him, because he was another's servant, even of Philemon his friend, and being very serviceable to the apostle, he would have gladly detained him ; but could not satisfy himself to do it, without Philemon's consent : Masters have such a right in their servants, and such a right unto their service, that they are not to be disposed of, without their consent. St. Paul, though he would yet he would not detain Onesimus, though a fugitive servant, without Philemon's knowledge : Christian religion is no destroyer, but an establisher of civil rights. Onesimus's conversion to Christianity, gave him no manumission and liberty from Philemon's service, and accordingly our apostle remits and sends him back to his old master Philemon.

15 For perhaps he therefore departed for a season that thou shouldest receive him for ever ; 86 Not now as a servant, but above a servant, a brother beloved, specially to me, but how much more unto thee, both in the flesh, and in the Lord ?

Here our apostle answers an objection which possibly Philemon might make : Thus, " Onesimus ran away from me, what reason have I to receive him again ?" The apostle seems thus to reply upon it : If his departing from thee was so managed by the wise and merciful providence of God, that it might be an occasion of thy receiving him again forever, then for all his departure thou oughtest to receive him. But verily thus it is, the wisdom of God has thus over-ruled the matter ; he went from thee a fugitive, thievish and purloining ; but he returns a convert, a Christian, a brother in the faith, and as such to be entertained by thee, being doubly related to thee, both as a servant, and as a fellow member of Christ. Observe here, 1. The large extent, and next, the over-ruling power of the divine providence : Its extent : It reaches not only to kingdoms and nations, but to families and persons, even to poor bond-slaves ; a fugitive runs not from his service, but the providence of God eyes and observes it, nay, wisely and mercifully over-rules it. Oh ! the depth of divine knowledge and wisdom, the providence of God concerns itself and has a hand in those actions of men which are sinful, without any blemish, to his holiness ; he concurs to the act but not to the alaxy and disorder of the action ; he that rides a lame horse, is the cause of his going, but not of halting. 2. The privilege of our spiritual conjunction in Christ, above any other civil conjunction. The former lasts for ever, the latter but for a short time ; the relation between husband and wife, parent and child, master and servant, alas, it is but for a moment. Death will soon dissolve all civil relations: But the spiritual relation and conjunction being effected, by the bond of the Spirit, is indissoluble, it is for ever. Death itself cannot dissolve it, yea, it knits the knot faster; He departed for a season, that thou shouldest receive him for ever. 2. That although Christianity doth not take away the degrees of persons, and the civil differences between man and man, yet it maketh us all equal and fellow brethren in Christ. Receive him now not barely as a servant, but above a servant, as a brother in Christ; you and he are now brethren by grace. Learn hence, That religious servants are more than ordinary servants, they are brethren in Christ; and when humility, fidelity, and prudence are found with them, as they are more than ordinary servants, so God expects that we should give them more than ordinary respect, and we sin in denying it. O servants, Would you have high respect shewed to you? Become then first humble servants to Jesus Christ, and then faithful and prudent servants where God has placed you, and you shall never want respect either from God or men; for them that honour God, he will honour.

17 If thou count me therefore a partner, receive him as myself, 18 If he hath wronged thee, or oweth the ought, put that on mine account. 19 I Paul have written it with mine own hand, I will repay it: albeit I do not say to thee how thou owest unto me even thine ownself besides.

Observe here, 1. Another argument wherewith St. Paul doth press Philemon to receive Onesimus, and it is drawn from a partnership and communion with him in the faith; if we are partners, and have communion and friendship one with another, as Christians, comply with my desires herein. Learn hence, That there is a communion, a fellowship, a partnership between Christians, and this communion which is between saints, should make saints respect on another. If thou count me a partner, receive him; yea, receive him as myself; a very high expression, still discovering that affectionate tenderness which St. Paul bare to this new convert. 2. Another objection answered; Philemon might say, "How can I receive him that has wronged me, robbed me, and run away from me? sure it is enough to pardon him; must I receive him too?" Our apostle implicitly grants, that there was a debt due from Onesimus to Philemon; If he has wronged, that is granting that he has done it. Where note, Religion destroys no man's property; nor does a community of saints make a community of goods; otherwise from this community, Onesimus, or St. Paul for him, might have pleaded an immunity both from restitution and punishment; St. Paul acknowledges, not denies the debt. But observe farther, He takes it upon himself; Put it on my account, I will repay it. It is not unlawful in itself, for one person to become bound and surety for another; yea, it is a work of mercy, which not only may be done, but sometimes must be done, but always with due caution and consideration. 3. The wonderful modesty of the apostle in mentioning his own praises and commendations, I say not that thou owest to me even thine ownself, implying what great things he had done for Philemon in his conversion, so great as made Philemon a debtor, not only of his own goods but of himself too: However, the apostle only glances at it modestly, and that upon a just and great occasion too: I do not say, (though I might have said it) that thou owest to me even thine own self besides.

20 Yea, brother, let me have joy of thee in the Lord: refresh my bowels in the Lord. 21 Having confidence in thy obedience, I wrote unto thee, knowing that thou wilt also do more than I say. 22 But withal prepare me also a lodging. For I trust that through your prayers I shall be given unto you.

Observe here, 1. A pathetic repetition of our apostle's former petition, with the force and strength of a fresh and additional argument. Thus, "O my brother, that which revives me in a prison, and refreshes my bowels, now I am in bonds, that assuredly thou oughtest to do; but thy remitting and receiving Onesimus will thus refresh me, therefore do it." Learn thence, That whatsoever Christians know will rejoice the hearts, and revive the spirits of one another, ought in mutual condescension and kindness to be performed each towards another upon their mutual requests. How unnatural is it for one member to vex and grieve another? As unbecoming it is in the body spiritual, as it is in the body natural, brother, let me have joy in the Lord, refresh my bowels in the Lord. Observe, 2. Our apostle's holy confidence in Philemon's obedience and compliance: Having confidence in thy obedience, I know thou wilt do more than I say. See here what credit and honour, conscience and obedience puts upon a man; Philemon's good conscience occasioned St. Paul's confidence: It is a special honour when the general course of man's life is so steady, so uniform and even, that either our ministers or pious friends dare to be confident in us, vouch for us, and engage for our obedience and compliance with whatever becomes us. 3. St. Paul having finished his request for Onesimus, speaks one word for himself, namely, that a lodging might be prepared for him, hoping it seems, for a deliverance out of prison, by the help of the church's prayers, Prepare me a lodging Religion is no enemy to hospitality; nay, it requires it, and encourages to it; Rom. xii. 13. Heb. xiii. 2. It is a duty incumbent upon all, but especially ministers; But an unkind world takes care that some have scarce bread sufficient for their families, much less have any ability for hospitality, or indeed for those necessary acts of charity which are required by God, and expected by man, to render their labours amongst their people both acceptable and successful. The ministers of God, when they ask bread of some, they give them a stone, and when they demand their dues of others, they sting like a scorpion: but blessed be God it is not thus universally. Note, lastly, What it was St. Paul grounded his expectation of deliverance upon, namely the help and benefit of the church's prayers, I trust through your prayers I shall be given unto you. Learn, That our deliverance from trouble is to be expected and sought by the means of the prayers of such as fear God; yet mark, Though prayer obtains much, yet it merits nothing at God's hand. I trust through your prayers I shall be given, that that is, freely given unto you : though we obtain blessings by prayer, yet not for the merit of our prayers. If mercy were due to us, thankfulness were not due to God. For I trust that through your prayers I shall be given unto you.

23 There salute thee Epaphras, my fellow-prisoner in Christ Jesus ; 24 Marcus Aristarchus, Demas, Lucas, my fellow-labourers. 25 The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit. Amen.

Our apostle being now come to the conclusion of his epistle, he shuts it up with salutations and prayer ; first he salutes Philemon from Epaphras, Marcus, Aristarchus, Demas, and Luke, some his fellow-prisoners, all his fellow-labourers. Here note, How graciously God provides for the comfort of his children in a prison ; he sweetened St. Paul's affliction with the saints communion : It was no joy to St. Paul that Epaphras was in prison, he had rather he had been preaching at Coloss : But, seeing he was a prisoner, the apostle, no doubt, was very thankful that he was in the same prison with him, where they had opportunity (it is hoped) to pray together, to discourse, encourage and comfort one another : And note the cause of Epaphras' imprisonment, in Christ Jesus, that is, for the sake of Christ Jesus. No doubt there were others in prison besides Epaphras, but none were St. Paul's fellow prisoners but he, because, though sufferers in the same prison, yet not for the same cause, Epaphras my fellow prisoner saluteth thee. Observe, Our apostle's concluding prayer, The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your Spirit. Here note, 1. The person prayed to, the Lord Jesus Christ our Saviour, our anointed King ; from Christ we are called Christians, because every one of us, in our measure, are partakers of a divine unction with and from him, 1 John ii. 20. Ye have an unction from the Holy One. This oil ran down from the head of our Great High Priest, to the very skirts of his garment. 2. The blessing prayed for, The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with thy spirit ; that is, " May the special favour of God, both in its effects and influences, in its graces and comforts, reside in thy soul and spirit ; may the blessed Spirit of our Lord Jesus evermore dwell in thee by his sanctifying impressions, by his powerful assistances, and by his quickening influences." 3. He doth not pray for Philemon solely, though for him eminently, but for all the saints at Coloss, who had obtained like precious faith with him : The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you, not thy, but your spirit : All the saints of God in general, yea, the whole race of mankind universally, must be remembered by us in our prayers. Amen, is a word that denotes our earnestness or desire to be heard, and our comfortable expectation of being answered : It teaches us, That whatever we pray for, should be rightly understood, firmly expected, and earnestly desired. They sin in prayer, who either do not understand what they pray for, or do not earnestly desire what they pray for, or do not believe God's readiness to grant what they pray for : Therefore, in testimony of our desire and assurance to be heard in prayer we say, Amen.

THE END OF THE EPISTLE TO PHILEMON.

E P I S T L E
H E B R E W S.

As touching the author and penman of this Epistle to the Hebrews, there have been many and various opinions; some have supposed it written by St. Luke, others by Barnabas, or Clemens, but most by St. Paul, which they attempt to prove from chapter xiii. 23. Know ye that our brother Timothy is set at liberty; because it is customary with St. Paul, when he writes epistles, to call Timothy his brother. And also from the words of St. Peter, 2 Pet. iii. 15. As our dear brother Paul has written unto you in all his epistles. Whence it is evident, that the apostle Paul had writ to them, to whom St. Peter was then writing; that is. to the believing Jews in general, and to those of the dispersion in particular. But since we are assured that the Spirit of God did indite the book, we need not be over solicitous to find out whose hand it was that held the pen.

The persons to whom this epistle is directed, are styled Hebrews; that is, the believing Jews converted to Christianity, chiefly those that inhabited Judea, and in and about Jerusalem: who though they had embraced the gospel, yet they adhered to the Mosaic rites. and Jewish ceremonies, joining them with Christianity, as necessary to salvation. Now, for this bare profession of Christianity, they were exposed to a bitter persecution by the unbelieving Jews. Our apostle, therefore, justly fearing lest their sufferings for Christianity should occasion their apostacy from it, writes this epistle to establish and confirm them in their holy profession, by acquainting them with the sad and fatal consequences of a ruinous apostacy, and the fruitlessness of former sufferings, without a resolute perseverance in the Christian faith, and patience under all tribulations.

That St. Paul did not prefix his name to this epistle, as he did to others, the reason supposed is this, because he was the apostle of the Gentiles, and not of the circumcision, or of the Jews; and his name being not over acceptable to them, he sets it not at the front of this epistle, lest the sight of it should have prejudiced the Jews, and taken them off from duly weighing and considering the wighty matters which he wrote about.

The general scope and design of this epistle is to inform the Hebrews, that the gospel-ministry, or dispensation under the New Testament by Jesus Christ, far surpasseth and transcendently excelleth the ministry of the Old Testament under Moses and the prophets: and to prove, that Christ was greater than the angels, a greater person and lawgiver than Moses, a greater priest than Aaron, a greater prince than Melchisedec; and that the Levitical priesthood, and covenant, were to give place to Christ our great High Priest, and to the new covenant established upon better promises.

C H A P. I.

In the first chapter of this epistle, the proofs of the eternal Deity of Jesus Christ are produced with such clear evidence of scripture-light, that only a veiled heart, and obstinate infidelity can resist.

GOD who, at sundry times, and in divers manners, spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets. 2 Hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son,

Our apostle intending here a comparison between the law and the gospel, shews first wherein they both agree, and next wherein they differ. They agree (first) in this, that God was the author of them both: Both law and gospel received their original from God himself; and God the Father, by way of eminency, was the peculiar author both of law and gospel. God, that God, who spake in times past by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son. Observe, 2. The difference between the law and gospel, with respect to the manner of their revelation. The revelation revelation of the will of God under the law was, 1. At sundry times: before the flood, by Enoch and Noah; after the flood, by Abraham, by Jacob, by Moses, and all the prophets. 2. In divers manners; sometimes by a lively voice, sometimes by dreams and visions, sometimes by inspiration and immediate revelation, sometimes by Urim and Thummim, sometimes by signs from heaven. 3. The revelation of the law was made of old, formerly, in times past; this of the gospel was made in these last days. 4. That was made to the fathers, this to us. 5. That revelation was made by the prophets, this by the Son, Jesus Christ. From the whole, learn, 1. That Almighty God did not leave the world only to the light of nature, and to know him barely by his works of creation; but bestowed upon them the invaluable blessing of supernatural revelation, thereby to bring mankind to the clearer knowledge of their duty. 2. That the revelation which God was pleased to make of himself, his mind, and will, was gradual, and by part, not all at one time, and in one manner, but at sundry times, and in divers manners. 3. That the gospel dispensation is the most perfect revelation of the will of God, which God ever did, or ever will make to the sons of men. 3. That as it is a perfect, so likewise a final revelation of God's mind and will to a lost world: A farther discovery of the mind of God for man's salvation is not to be expected: The gospel is the last effort which the divine mercy and goodness will make upon mankind, in order to eternal happiness; herein God has spoken to us by his Son: and, if we will not hear him, he will speak no more, we must expect no other; he can send no greater prophet, no dearer person to us than his own Son; and as he can send no greater, so he will send no other; for if we despise him, whom will we reverence? Now the dignity of this person, our apostle proceeds in this and the next verse to describe.

—Whom he hath appointed heir of all things,

The title of heir, which is here given to Christ, setteth out his dignity and dominion, together with the right he has to both: namely, that of the sonship; for what is an heir but his father's successor; Christ as a Son, being heir of all things, imports, that he is Lord of all, and has a sovereign empire and dominion over all persons and things over all angels and men, whether living or dead. Learn hence, That God the Father has given and granted unto Christ his Son, as Mediator and Head of the church, a sovereign power and authority over all persons and things, both in heaven and in earth, to be disposed of by him at his pleasure, and according to the sovereign purpose of his will; whom he hath appointed heir of all things.

—By whom also he made the worlds;

By whom not for whom, as the Socinians would suggest; the word signifies the efficient, not the final cause, according to Colos. i. 16, 17. By him were all things created, and by him all things consist. And by him, not as an instrument or created cause, for then must he be created by himself, seeing all things were made by him, and nothing made without him, John i. 3. but as the principal efficient cause, according to St. John v. 19. Whatsoever the Father doth, that doth also the son likewise. The Father doth all by the Son, and the Son doth all from the Father. And by making the worlds, we are to understand his forming of the old world, not his reforming of the new; for if so, the apostles might be said to make the worlds as well as Christ, because they had a principal hand in converting and reforming the world. But by the worlds, here understand the visible and material worlds, all things in heaven and earth, which were made by Christ, not as a subordinate instrument, but as a primary and principal agent, which sets forth the omnipotent power of Christ, and consequently proves him to be truly and really God. Learn hence, That the Lord Jesus Christ, by making the world and all things therein, by his own immediate power, has given a full and ample demonstration of his Divinity, or being essentially and really God.

3 Who being the brightness of his glory, and the expressimage of his person, and upholding all things by the word of his power, when he had by himself purged our sins, sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high.

Our apostle here proceeds in describing the Divinity of Christ's person, by whom the Father has made known his will to us under the gospel. He declares, 1. What he is, 2. What he does, or did. 3. The consequent of both, or what he now enjoyeth. Observe, 1. Our apostle declares who, and what Christ was, and is, namely, The brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his person. As the brightness of the sun is of the same nature with the sun, and of as long continuance as the sun, and cannot be separated from the sun, and yet the sun, and the brightness of the sun, are really distinct each from other. In like manner the Father and the Son are of one, and the same essence, coeternal and inseparable, yet the person of the one is distinct from the other. And as the sun communicates its light and influence to us by its beams, so doth God communicate his goodness, and manifest himself to us by Jesus Christ. Learn hence, That the Son is of the same essence with the Father, yet a person really distinct from the Father, and all the incomprehensible glory of the Father brightly shines forth in Christ his Son.

Observe, And the express image of his person.

That is, the express character of God the Father's person, his natural image, and essential likeness; all the perfections shining forth in God the Father, are substantially in Christ the Son: Is the Father eternal, omnipotent, omniscient, omnipresent? So is the Son, whose character he is, whose resemblance and image he bears; John x. 38. The Father is in me, and I in him; the same essential properties and nature being in each person, by virtue whereof their persons are said to be in each other. All the glorious perfections of the nature of God do belong unto, and dwell in the person of the Son of God. Observe, 2. Our apostle having declared what Christ is, next declares what he does; namely, that he upholdeth all things by the word of his power; that is, he exerts and puts forth the same omnipotent power in the work of preservation, which he did in the work of creation, keeping it from sinking into its original chaos of confusion. This work of conservation say some, is a greater act of omnipotency than that of creation; by the former, all things were brought out of nothing, by the latter, they are preserved from returning into nothing, which their own nature, and their perpetual conflict, by contrariety of qualities, would necessarily precipitate them into. Learn hence, 1. That such is the nature and condition of the universe, that it cannot subsist one moment without continual support; such is the dependent condition of the whole creation. 2. That our Lord Jesus Christ has the weight of the whole creation upon his hand, he upholdeth what himself created: and as well his upholding as creating, his conversation as well as creation of all things by the word of his power, do prove him truly and really God. Observe. 3. A farther evidence and proof of the divinity of Christ, produced here by our apostle; as he made the world by his omnipotent power, and upholds it by his wonderful providence, so he redeemed it by his blood, He by himself purged our sins. He that made the heavens, bowed the heavens; and came down from heaven, and became a sacrifice for sin on earth, and by himself alone by himself without a partner, by himself without a comforter, expiated the guilt of sin, and satisfied the justice of God for sin, suffering as he was man, and satisfying as he was God, who by himself purged our sins. Learn hence, That so great was the work of expiation of sin, that it could no otherwise be really effected and accomplished, than by the sacrifice and satisfaction of Christ, who was truly and really God. 4. The consequent of all that Christ did, or his glorious condition after his humiliation, having purged our sins, he sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high; that is, God the Father clothed him with the highest honour, and endowed him with the greatest power that heaven itself could afford; the right-hand is the place both of dignity and honour, and also of superiority and power: Christ's sitting at God's right hand imports his exaltation to the highest authority and most supreme dominion. Learn hence, That when our Lord Jesus Christ had finished his sufferings upon earth, he was placed in the seat of the highest honour and authority, at the right hand of God his Father in heaven, even to be the object of adoration both to angels and men, as the following verses declare, in which our apostle thus speaks:

4 Being made so much better than the angels, as he hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than they. 5 For unto which of the angels said he at any time, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee! And again, I will be to him a Father, and he shall be to me a Son. 6 And again, when he bringeth in the first begotten into the world, he saith, And let all the angels of God worship him.

In the foregoing verses, a comparison was made between Christ and the prophets, here between Christ and the angels and the preference and pre-eminence is given to him above them all. Angels were very glorious creatures, employed by God in giving of the law; but Christ whom God the Father employed in the dispensation of the gospel is far superior to them, and has an excellency above them. 1. A more excellent name, they being called ministers or servants, he styled a Son. 2. A more excellent nature, his being a divine, theirs an angelical nature: yea, his human nature, by virtue of its union with the Godhead, has a dignity surpassing the nature of angels. 3. A more excellent office and function, as Mediator between God and man, which belongs not to any angel. And, 4. Consequently a more excellent power and authority, with a right to adoration and worship, which the angels have not, but are commanded to worship him, When he brought his first-begotten into the world, that is, in the morning of the resurrection, when he was in a glorious manner begotten from the dead; the Father says, Let all the angels of God worship him; and therefore he that is to be worshipped, is greater than they that are to worship him. Learn 1. That the evidencing and declaring of Christ to be the Son of God, was the particular care and special work of God the Father; he said it, he recorded it, he revealed it: Thou art my Son. 2. That the Lord Jesus Christ, the Mediator of the new covenant, is, in his own person, God blessed forever, to whom divine honour and religious worship is due and payable from glorified angels: Let all the angels of God worship him. 3. That the command of God is the ground and reason of all religious worship; the angels are to worship Christ, but the ground of their doing it is God's command; He saith, Let all the angels of God worship him. 4. That it can be no part of our duty to worship the angels, who are our fellow-servants in the worship of Jesus Christ; they that are to worship Christ with us surely are not to be worshipped by us.

7 And of the angels he saith, who maketh his angels spirits, and his ministers a flame of fire. 8 But unto the Son he saith, Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever: a sceptre of righteousness is the sceptre of thy kingdom. 9 Thou hast loved righteousness, and hated iniquity: therefore God, even thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows.

Still our apostle goes on, comparing Christ and the angels together, and giving a transcendent preference to the one before the other. The angels are ministering servants, but Christ a Son; the angels are the prime instruments of the Father's providence, most zealous and active to accomplish his pleasure, but the Son is God; Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever. God, not by analogy and deputation, as princes are, nor with a limitation and diminution, as Moses was made a god to Pharaoh, but absolutely and really, as subsisting in the divine nature; to the Son he saith, Thy throne, O God, is forever and ever. Learn hence, That it is the divine nature of Jesus Christ that gives stability and fixedness, yea, immutability and unchangeableness to his throne and kingdom; Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever. And whereas the sceptre of earthly kingdoms are often unrighteously managed, and their thrones do ruinously fall, the sceptre of righteousness is the sceptre of Christ's kingdom: that is, all the laws, and and the whole administration of his kingdom by his word and Spirit, are all just and equal, righteous and holy; A sceptre of righteousness is the sceptre of thy kingdom. And, farther, the apostle declares, that the righteous administration of Christ in his kingdom, proceeds from his own habitual righteousness and love thereunto: Thou hast loved righteousness and hated iniquity, and for that reason was dignified and exalted by God over and above all his fellows. Learn hence, That Jesus Christ as Mediator, because of his love to righteousness, and hatred to sin, is dignified and advanced by God, not only above all men, but likewise above all angels. Therefore God, even thy God, hath anointed thee above thy fellows.

10 And, Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth: and the heavens are the works of thine hands. 11 They shall perish; but thou remainest: and they all shall wax old as doth a garment; 12 And as a vesture shalt thou fold them up, and they shall be changed: but thou art the same, and thy years shall not fail.

What proof more can be desired of Christ's Divinity, than what is here given by our apostle? the name and attributes of God are given to him, as also an everlasting throne and kingdom; divine honour is required to be paid to him: and here such divine works are ascribed to him, wherein no creature can have any share of efficiency with: such is the making of the world, Thou, Lord, laidst the foundations of the earth, and the heavens are the works of thy hand: Here we have Christ's omnipotency declared, Thou hast laid the foundations of the earth, and the heavens are thy handy-works: and his eternity and immutability asserted, When the heavens perish, thou remainest; when they wax old, and are changed, thou art the same. Learn hence, That the whole world, the heavens and the earth being made by our Lord Jesus Christ, is an evident proof that he is exalted above all creatures, and that he is an almighty and unchangeable God, Thou, Lord, hast laid, &c. 2. That such is the frailty of man's nature, and such the perishing condition of all created things, that nothing will or can yield stable consolation to us, but a firm belief of the omnipotency and immutability of our Lord Jesus Christ.

13 But to which of the angels said he at any time, Sit on my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool?

This verse contains a farther proof of Christ's pre-eminence above the angels, and that he is in reality the Son of God; namely, because he sits, in the quality of a Son, at the right hand of God the Father; equal to him in dignity, power, and glory, commanding all the visible and invisible world, most easily, yet irresistably; though gradually subduing his enemies to a consummate and complete victory. To which of the angels said he at any time? The words are an interrogation, which have the force of a vehement negation, and imply, that God the Father did never say this to any of the angels, nor put such honour upon any of them, as to say, Sit on my right hand, until I make thy foes thy footstool; but to Christ he said it, Psa. cx. 1.

The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool. Learn hence, 1. That Jesus Christ is a spiritual king; and as such as many enemies to his kingdom and government. Sin is an enemy to Christ and his kingdom; and makes an universal opposition to Christ and his government. Satan is a sworn enemy to Christ and his throne, and he exerts his enmity by temptations and persecutions. The world is an enemy also in the things of it, in the men of it, in the rule of it. The law is an enemy to Christ and his kingdom, not absolutely, but accidentally, by reason of the consequences that attend it: it slays them, Rom. vii. 9, 10, 11. which is the work of an enemy: In a word, death, the grave, and hell are Christ's enemies. 2. That all Christ's enemies shall, in Christ's time, be made his footstool; they are conquering now initially and gradually, they shall be conquered ere long finally and perfectly; and all his people shall be made complete sharers in his victory and conquest. 3. That Christ's sitting at God's right hand, in a certain and assured expectation of having his foes become his footstool, is an undoubted proof of the Divinity of his person, and that he is essentially and really God. To none of the angels, or any of the creatures, said he, at any time, Sit on my right hand; but to the Son he said, Sit on my right hand, &c.

14 Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them who shall be heirs of salvation?

This is the last testimony produced by the apostle to prove Christ's pre-eminence above the angels: He is a Son, they are but servants; not only servants to Christ, but servants to believers, to the church of Christ, to the heirs of salvation. Observe, here, 1. The nature of angels declared; they are spirits, without any thing material or corporeal belonging to them, yet having a power to assume a body, and appear in human shape, when they please. The scriptures describes them as excelling in strength, purity, and holiness, to be of great activity and swiftness, and giving intimation of several ranks and orders among them, distinguishing them by the names of principalities and powers, thrones and dominions; but what the difference of these names do import, none can positively declare. 2. Their general office declared. They are ministering spirits, they are God's domestic servants, they attend upon his throne, they expect his commands, they execute his pleasure, and are in a constant readiness to do his will. The angels are the great instruments of providence in the world; not that God needs them, or cannot manage without them; for he can do whatever he pleaseth in heaven and earth. God can steer all human affairs with the least nod and beck of his will, without any instruments at all; but his wisdom and goodness thinks fit to honour his creatures with his commands, that so they may be capable of his favour and rewards. 3. The special office and employment of good angels, with reference to good men: They are set forth, there is their designation and appointment, to minister, that is their general end and employment, for the heirs of salvation, that is their more special and peculiar business; they have a charge of the bodies and souls of the saints whilst alive; a special charge of their souls at death, to conduct them and the oath of God has confirmed it, that such sinners shall not escape; such as sin against the remedy must perish without the remedy.

— Which at the first began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by them that heard him; 4 God also bearing them witness both with signs and wonders, and with divers miracles; and gifts of the Holy Ghost, according to his own will?

Here we have a special reason assigned, why such as reject the gospel cannot escape divine wrath, because the gospel was first published and delivered by Jesus Christ; it was clearly, plainly, sweetly, and persuasively preached by himself first. The law was promulgated by angels, the gospel proclaimed by the Son of God, and afterwards by his apostles; and God confirmed their testimony by signs and wonders, by miraculous powers, and gifts of the Holy Ghost: All which did signify God's approbation of their doctrine, and gave the world a confirmation of the truth and excellency of it, and consequently gave credibility to it. Here note, That as the law of Moses was confirmed by miracles, so was the gospel of Jesus also: nay, herein this was superior to that. Moses wrought signs and wonders, but the gifts of the Holy Ghost were peculiar to the times of the Messiah, and were the proper confirmation of the gospel dispensation. Yet note farther, That though the apostles had a power to work miracles, yet it was according to God's will, and not at their own pleasure; they could not work miracles when they pleased, nor what they pleased: Whence it was evident, that not they, but God was the worker of them. And the more God's over-ruling will was seen in the miracles then, the greater confirmation have we of that doctrine now: Which (gospel) was at first spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by divers miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost.

5 For unto the angels hath he not put in subjection the world to come, whereof we speak. 6 But one in a certain place testified, saying, What is man, that thou art mindful of him? Or the son of man that thou visitest him? 7 Thou madest him a little lower than the angels; thou crownest him with glory and honour, and didst set him over the works of thy hands:

Still our apostle prosecutes his former design, which was to persuade the Hebrews, that more need is to be given to the word of Christ, the doctrine of the gospel, than to the word or law delivered by angels, because God had given a greater authority to Christ than ever he did to the angels, as appears by putting the world to come in subjection to Christ, and not to angels; yea, inasmuch as angels themselves are to be in subjection unto Christ, as a part of his kingdom, Unto the angels hath he not put into subjection the world to come? that is, the world of believers, gathered out of all nations by the preaching of the gospel, is put under Christ's immediate power, and subject not to angels, but to Christ himself. Learn hence, That it is the great privilage of the gospel-church, that it depends upon Christ as its immediate and only Head, and is not put in subjection to any other, either angels or men. The gospel-church was not put in subjection to angels in its first erection or institution, nor was it put into subjection unto angels, as to the rule and government of it when erected; but angels and saints are equally subjected unto Christ, who is both an head of vital influence, as also an head of authority, rule, and government, to the whole church and every member thereof. Observe next, the proof which the apostle brings for this out of the Psalms, Psalm viii. in which David breaks forth into admiration and wonder, at that glory and honour which God the Father put upon man at first in the work of creation, and next in the work of redemption: When the Son of God took the nature of man upon him; well might it then be said, Lord! What is man that thou wert thus mindful of him, and the sons of men, that thy dear and only Son did thus visit them? Learn hence, 1. That such was the inconceivable love of Jesus Christ the Son of God, towards the sons of men, that he was free and willing to condescend unto any condition for their benefit and salvation: He that was the Creator of angels, was willing for our sakes, to be made lower than the angels, a little lower, that is, for a little time lower than the angel, namely, during the time of his humiliation. 2. That this wonderful condescension of Christ to take the nature of man, his respect and care, his love and grace towards mankind, is just matter of great and eternal admiration. Oh! What is man that thou art mindful of him, and crownest him with dignity and glory.

8 Thou hast put all things in subjection under his feet. For in that he put all in subjection under him, he left nothing that is not put under him. But now we see not yet all things put under him.

We had an account of the depth of our Lord's humiliation before, of the height of his exaltation now, all things are and shall be put under him: for though God has given Christ dominion over all things, and all things are subject to his power, yet he hath not as yet exercised his complete power in ruining all his enemies, and reducing all his people to subjection; and this will not be seen until the last Saint be converted, and until death, the last enemy, be destroyed. But yet, in the mean time, Christ is exalted with great triumph to his kingdom in heaven, and there crowned with dignity and honour, and glory in heaven. It is easy to believe, that every thing shall be put under him that riseth up against him, in his own appointed time.

9 But we see Jesus, who was made, a little lower than the angels, for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honour; that he by the grace of God should taste death for every man.

Observe here, 1. That wonderful humiliation and abasement, the eximination and deep depression of the glorious Jesus; he was made for a little time lower than the angels; that is, he was made man, and mortal, and did suffer death; 2. The manner of our Lord's death, He tasted it, he did really taste of it, and but taste of it; he tasted death them to blessedness, and probably a care and charge of their bodies after death, as may be gathered from St. Jude, ver. 9. Learn hence, 1. That the highest honour of the most glorious angels in heaven, is to minister to the saints by God's appointment, here on earth. 2. That such is the love and care of God towards his saints, that he sends the most glorious attendants upon his own throne, to minister unto them and to take care of them. Behold then the astonishing regard which the great God has for good men, in that he appoints all his angels to minister to them, for the safeguard of their persons, for the success of their affairs, and for the security of their eternal salvation. Lord! what is man, that thou art thus mindful of him; that when thou madest him lower than the angels, thou should yet make the angels minister unto him? Behold also the impiety of the church of Rome, in worshipping of angels: Surely, if they are our fellow-servants, and minister unto us, we are by no means to worship them. See Rev. xix. 10.

C H A P. II.

Our apostle having proved his proposition, namely, that Christ, the dispenser of the gospel, was not only above Moses the deliverer of the law, but far superior to the angels themselves; he comes, in this chapter, to draw an inference from his foregoing discourse,

THEREFORE we ought to give the most earnest heed to the things which we have heard, lest at any time we should let them slip.

As if our apostle had said, seeing Christ is so excellent in his person, and seeing the gospel has such a glorious author as the blessed Jesus; let us take great heed that we esteem his person, revere his authority, reverence his ministry and his message, and that our enemies be not like leaking vessels, suffering the word at any time to slip and run from us. Learn hence, 1. That the consideration of the revelation of the gospel of the Son of God, is a powerful motive to an high estimation of it, and a diligent attendance on it. Therefore we ought to give the more earnest heed; that is, knowing the excellency of his person, and sublimity of his doctrine. 2. That the true and only way of honouring our Lord Jesus Christ, as the Son of God, is by diligent attendance and obedience to his word: Where there is no obedience to the gospel, there is no faith in, nor love unto Jesus Christ, the author and dispenser of the gospel. Learn 3. That there are sundry times and seasons wherein, and several ways and means whereby men are in great danger of losing the word if they attend not diligently to its preservation: Lest at any time, some lose the word in a time of prosperity others, in a time of persecution, some in a time of temptation. Learn, 4. That the word heard is not lost without great sin, as well as with the inevitable ruin of the soul's of men; if we suffer the word to slip out of our memories, that we forget it; out of our hearts, that we despise it; out of our lives, that we are disobedient to it; it is lost as to us, and will end in our loss, yea, in our ruin at last. 5. That the only way to prevent this sin and danger, under the word, is by a very diligent attendance upon it, and giving more earnest heed to the things contained in it; we are to attend to the word before we hear, to bring us to it: to attend upon it in hearing, that it may be remembered by us; and after we have heard it, that it may be practised by us. This consideration, That it is the word of Christ, the great and mighty God, the wisdom of the Father, that we are going to hear, will engage us to give the more earnest heed to the things we hear, Lest at any time we should let them slip.

2 For if the word spoken by angels was stedfast, and every transgression and disobedience received a just recompence of reward: How shall we escape if we neglect to great salvation;—

The apostle having set forth the transcendent dignity of Christ's person and office, and shewn that he was a more excellent prophet than Moses, a more excellent priest than Aaron, a more excellent king than Melchisedec, hereupon he infers, that such as despise the gospel, the doctrine of this blessed Jesus are far more excusable than those that were the transgressors of the law of Moses, If the word spoken by angels was stedfast: that is, if the law given by the ministry of angels was firm and inviolable, and all the transgressors of it were justly and severely punished; how can we escape perishing, if we neglect the gospel, which makes a discovery of that great salvation which was purchased by Christ for lost sinners? The apostle's argument is drawn (a minori ad majus) from the less to the greater. Thus if Almighty God was so severe against the violation of a far meaner institution, to wit, the law given by the ministry and dispensation of angels, how can we escape, that neglect to hear and obey the gospel, which makes a tender, yea, the only tender of salvation to a lost world? Note here, 1. The great care which God Almighty takes to make lost sinners happy: namely, by offering them a great salvation. 2. The great care which every one of us ought to take in order to our own happiness and salvation, and that is, not to neglect it. 3. The great guilt which they contract, and the inevitable punishment God will inflict on such as do neglect this great salvation. How shall they escape? Learn hence, 1. That there is a salvation held forth and tendered by Christ to lost sinners, in the gospel. That this salvation thus held forth and tendered unto sinners, is a great salvation; great in its author, Christ Jesus; great in the price paid for it, the blood of Jesus; great in the subject recipient of it, the whole man, soul and body; great in regard of the evils it saves us from, sin, Satan, the curse of the law, death and hell; great in respect of the gracious privileges it interests believers in. 2. That notwithstanding this salvation is so great, yet there are some that neglect it. 3. That it is impossible for such neglecters to escape. Quest. 1. What shall they not escape? Ans. The curse of the law the wrath of God, the sentence of Christ denounced, and the sentence of Christ inflicted. Quest. 2. Why shall they not escape? Ans. Because such persons sin against the remedy, the only remedy which the wisdom of God hath found out for man's recovery; and accordingly, the mouth of God hath spoken it, the hand of God hath written it; and that is, he died really and not in appearance only, he tasted it. Implying, that he underwent the bitterness of it. He found out experimentally what death was by dying, as a man finds out the bitterness of a thing by tasting. Again, he did but taste of it, he was not finally overcome and vanquished by it; he continued but a short time under it; it was not possible that he should be long holden of it; the dignity of his person rendered a short continuance of him under the power of death sufficient for our redemption.

3. The persons for whom he tasted death or died; for others, not for himself; that is, for their room and stead; he underwent that death in our stead, which we should have undergone in our own persons.

4. The extent of Christ's death, he tasted death for every man; that is, Christ by his death has made God propitious to every man, made sin remissible and every man saveable: The death of Christ renders God willing to be reconciled unto all sinners; faith renders him actually reconciled. The reason why every man doth not obtain salvation, is not for want of a sufficient propitiation.

5. The moving cause which inclined God to deliver up Christ to death, and to transfer our punishment upon him, and that was his own grace and free good-will, That he by the grace of God should taste death for every man.

6. The glorious reward of our Lord's sufferings with reference to himself, We see Jesus, for suffering death, crowned with glory and honour. As Christ's meritorious sufferings for us, so shall our patient suffering for him be rewarded with the highest glory in heaven, 1 Pet. v. 10. The God of all grace who hath called us into his eternal glory by Christ Jesus, after ye have suffered a while, make ye perfect, &c.

10 For it became him for whom are all things, and by whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings.

Observe here 1. The gracious title given to Christ; the Captain of our salvation; because the whole work of salvation, from first to last, our guidance and conduct through sin and suffering, unto glory and happiness, is committed to him. As a captain he conducts with care, he leads on with power, he discharges his trust with tenderness and love: He goes before us in obedience, in suffering through death, and into glory. That God made Jesus Christ the captain of our salvation perfect through suffering; that is, he was consecrated and set apart for the office of a complete priest by his own blood, when he offered himself without spot to God. Every Levitical priest was consecrated by the blood of a beast, sacrificed; Christ was consecrated by his own blood, for no other blood would be accepted. It is called the Father's act to consecrate and make him perfect; but indeed it was the Son's own immediate act; the Father's by designation and appointment, but his own by actual performance, offering himself through the eternal Spirit without spot.

2. That Christ being consecrated and perfected through sufferings, hath consecrated the way of suffering, for all that follow him to pass through it into glory. Upon this consecration of the way of suffering by Christ Jesus, a believer's suffering becomes, 1. Necessary and unavoidable; the head and the members must be made conformable to each other, Rom. viii. 29. They are thereby made. 2. Useful and profitable; Christ has taken the curse out of the cross, and sanctified the cross to a special end and purpose; hereby likewise all sufferings for the gospel are. 3. Made honourable; no greater honour than to suffer for Christ, Acts v. 41. The apostles rejoiced that they had the honour to suffer shame for his name. And lastly, sufferings hereby are made safe to the sons of God, yea, more safe than prosperity by far. Gold is not consumed, but improved and preserved in the furnace. Observe, 4. That such is the merit and desert of sin, and such the immutability and severity of the justice of God, that there was no way possible to bring sinners unto glory but by the death and sufferings of the Son of God; or, if possible, yet no other way so becoming God, it became him for whom are all things; and so expressive of his love and goodness to a lost world, it would have been unbecoming God, the supreme Governor of the world, to have passed by the desert of sin, without a satisfaction; therefore his wisdom contrived that grace should be exercised, and justice satisfied, that sin should be punished, and mercy magnified; that sinners should be saved and the glory of all God's attributes secured.

11 For both he that sanctified, and they who are sanctified, are all of one. For which cause he is not ashamed to call them brethren, 12 Saying, I will declare thy name unto my brethren, in the midst of the church will I sing praise unto thee. 13 And again, I will put my trust in him. And again, behold, I, and the children which God hath given me.

In these words, the union of Christ and us, by his participation of the same nature with us, is declared: he and we are all of one; that is, of one and the same nature, of one stock and original; it was the product of the wife, merciful, and righteous counsel of God, that the Saviour of men should have communion with them in their nature, that he might have right to redeem them by his propinquity and alliance with them; Both he that sanctifieth, and they that are sanctified are all of one. Learn hence, 1. That the Lord Jesus Christ was, and ought to be of the same nature and stock with those whom he did redeem, and sanctify unto God. Divine justice required, that the same nature which had sinned should suffer for sin. The wisdom of God was pleased to redeem man: Man must be redeemed by man: God as God could not die; therefore God becomes man, that he might be in a capacity to die; he that as man will redeem man, must be of the same nature with man. This Christ was, both by divine institution, and by a voluntary susception; He that sanctifieth, and they that are sanctified, are all of one. 2. That Christ, having taken our nature upon him, accounts it no disgrace to acknowledge and own us for his brethren; Christ will be ashamed of none of his brethren but such as are a shame unto him. 3. That notwithstanding the union of nature which is betwixt Christ and us, yet in respect of our persons, there is an inconceivable distance between him and us: so that it is a marvellous condescension in him to call us brethren brethren. Here note, That though Christ calls us brethren, yet it becomes us to call him Lord; and as such to adore and worship him, to glorify and serve him, to honour and obey him.

14 Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same; that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil:

15 And deliver them who through fear of death were all their life-time subject to bondage.

Observe here, 1. The reality of Christ's assuming the human nature asserted: As the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same. Which is in effect the same he had asserted in the foregoing verse, that He that sanctifieth, and they that are sanctified, are all of one; that is, of one natural and original. 2. A twofold reason assigned, why Christ thus condescendingly assumed the human nature, namely, that he might destroy the devil, who had the power of death, and deliver his people that were under the slavish fear of death. First, That he might destroy him that had the power of death. Here note, 1. The devil described in a very formidable manner, as one that had the power of death; not the supreme, but a subordinate power of death; a power of death as God's executioner to inflict it; the devil has the power of death, just as the hangman has the power of the gallows, to put those to death whom the judge condemns only. 2. Him that has thus the power of death has Christ destroyed, that is, disarmed and disabled, not destroyed his being, but disarmed him of his power and authority over the children of God. 3. That Christ did this by his own death; through death, that is, by his own dying, he destroyed him that had the power of death: It was upon the cross that he spoiled principalities and powers, and made a show of them openly; Christ by dying conquered death. The second reason of Christ's appearing in our flesh and nature, was to deliver his people from the slavery and bondage of the sinful and servile fears of death. Here note, 1. That there is a natural fear of death which is not sinful: Art thou afraid of death? Thou were not a man if thou didst not fear it: There cannot but be in nature an aversion to its own dissolution: and nature will always act like itself. 2. That there is a servile slavish fear of death, which hath both sin and torment in it: A fear of death as penal, and drawing after it everlasting punishment. 3. That unregenerate men, if a senseless stupidity has not benumbed them, and a spirit of slumber fallen upon them, are in bondage under the servile and slavish fear of death. It will daunt the stoutest man that ever lived to look upon death, when he can see nothing but hell beyond it. 4. That Jesus Christ, by dying, has freed all his children from this servile and tormenting fear of death. Christ has taken away the true reason of the fear of death, namely, the curse and condemnation of the law of God, The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law; death has its wounding power from sin, and sin hath its condemning power from the law. 2. Christ hath assured believers that they shall not be losers, but gainers, yea, great gainers by death, considering the private evils freed from, and the positive good they shall rest in.

16 For verily he took not on him the nature of angels; but he took on him the seed of Abraham.

It may be rendered from the original thus: He caught not hold on angels but on man he caught hold. A metaphor taken from a person that catches hold of another who is falling down some deep and dangerous precipice, to his inevitable destruction: Such a good and kind office did the Son of God for us, when he suffered angels to fall headlong from the state of happiness in which they were created, into that abyss and gulph of misery into which they had plunged themselves by their voluntary transgression; the like unto which had man also done, had he not been seasonably caught by the Son of God in the arms of preventing grace and mercy. Learn, That it was not the angelical, but the human nature: It was the nature of fallen man, and not of lapsed angels, which the Son of God did vouchsafe to assume, and take into a personal union with his God-head. Quest. Why would not Christ take upon him the nature of angels? Probably, because they were the first transgressors, and God might judge it decent that the first breach of the divine law should be punished with death, to secure obedience for the future: Or, 2. Because the angels sinned without a tempter, they had no superior rank of creatures already fallen, as man had, to seduce and draw them from their obedience to the Creator's will: Or, 3. Because the angels sinned against more clear and convictive light and knowledge; there was nothing of weakness, deceit, or ignorance, to lessen the malignity of their sin: they did not sin by misperception, but of purpose malice. But, after all, the reason why Christ took not hold on angels, but on man, the seed of Abraham, must be ultimately resolved into the sovereignty of God's will, who will be merciful to whom he will be merciful. Lord! why mercy, thy milder attribute, should be exercised towards man, and justice, thy severer attribute, be executed upon angels! Why vessels of clay are chosen, and vessels of gold rejected, must be resolved into that love which passes knowledge! And we shall never fully understand the riches of this indiscriminating grace, until thy dear Son shall appear at the great day as their Judge, and our justifier. Then shall we feel the comfort of these words, that Christ took not upon him the nature of angels, but the seed of Abraham.

17 Wherefore in all things it behoved him to be made like unto his brethren; that he might be a merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people. 18 For in that he himself hath suffered being tempted, he is able to succour them that are tempted.

In these verses our apostle illustrates what he had taught before, and confirms his foregoing proposition concerning Christ's participating of flesh and blood, and acquaints us here with one special end of it, namely, to be such an High Priest as our exigencies and necessities did require: For we being persons obnoxious to temptations and sufferings of all sorts, the wisdom of God, and the nature of the thing required it, that Christ our great High Priest, should in a special manner be able to relieve and help us:

In order to this, Observe. 1. How our apostle reports and re-asserts, that Christ was in all things, or every manner of way, made like unto his brethren; that is he assumed the human nature with all its essential properties, subjected to temptations and sufferings, but not to sin, for that would have been so far from conducing to the end aimed at, that it would have been utterly destructive of it. Had he been himself a sinner, he could never have satisfied the justice of God for our sins. 2. The general end of Christ's conformity to his brethren; namely, that he might be a merciful and faithful high Priest. That he might be our Priest, it was necessary that he should partake of our nature; for every high priest for men must be taken from among men; this is not work for an angel, nor for God himself as such: And that he might be our merciful and faithful High Priest, he was subject to sufferings and temptations. With great condolency and tender sympathy doth he exercise acts of mercy and compassion towards the human nature; and thus was he merciful, and with great condescension and care doth he take notice of all the concerns of his brethren under wants and sorrows, under all their temptations and sufferings: And thus is he our faithful as well as merciful High Priest. Learn hence, That such was the unspeakable love of Christ towards his brethren, that he would refuse no condition of life, neither sufferings nor temptations, to fit him for the discharge of his office, which he had undertaken for them. Christ suffered, and was tempted, that he might succour them that are tempted: He suffered under all his temptations, but sinned in none; he suffered being tempted; but sinned not, being tempted. 3. The special design and end of Christ's being our great High Priest; namely, To make reconciliation for the sins of the people. From whence learn, That the principal work of our Lord Jesus Christ, as our great High Priest, and from which all other actings of his in that office do flow, was to make reconciliation or atonement for sin; his intercession in heaven is founded on earth. The Socinians therefore, who deny the satisfaction of Christ, and his dying as a propitiation, or propitiatory sacrifice for sin, taking from us our hopes and happiness: from Christ, his office and honour; from God, his grace and glory; they do indeed allow of a reconciliation in words, but it is of men to God, and not of God to men: They plead the expediency of our being reconciled to God by faith and obedience, but deny the necessity of God's being reconciled to us by sacrifice, satisfaction, and atonement; so resolved are these men to be as little as may be beholden to Jesus Christ, that rather than grant that he has made any reconciliation for us by his blood, they deny that there was any need of such a reconciliation at all, never considering the inflexibility of God's justice, nor the impartiality of his indignation against sin. Oh! the depths of Satan; and Oh! the stupidity and blindness of those men that are taken captive by him at his pleasure.

C H A P. III.

Our apostle having, in the foregoing chapters, asserted the doctrine of our Saviour's priesthood, according to his constant method, he comes in this chapter to make application to that doctrine which he had declared and confirmed, that seeing Christ was so highly dignified and exalted, being the apostle and High Priest of our profession, we should diligently consider him both what he is in himself, and what he is to us. This teaches us; that all the doctrines of the gospel, especially those concerning the persons and offices of Jesus Christ, ought to be improved by us unto practice and obedience.

WHEREFORE, holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling, consider the apostle and high-priest of our profession, Christ Jesus.

These words are an exhortation to the believing Hebrews, to consider and ponder in their hearts the high dignity and excellency of Christ, as the great Prophet and Apostle of his church: and in them, Observe, 1. The title given to the Hebrews, unto whom the exhortation is directed; he styles them, 1. Holy brethren, so they were all by external profession, and many of them, no doubt, by internal sanctification. Learn hence, That all the professors of the gospel are obliged to be holy, and such as are real professors of it, are sanctified by the Holy Ghost, and made truly and really holy. 2. Partakers of the heavenly calling; that is, of that calling from heaven which makes you heirs of heaven, implying, that the only way to attain the saving knowledge of Christ in the gospel, is by means of an effectual heavenly calling. Observe, 2. The duty exhorted to, and that is diligent consideration, Consider Christ Jesus; that is, rationally attend unto, and with great intention of mind ponder upon the undertaking of the Son of God: For if you consider him in his person and offices, you will firmly adhere to him and his most holy and excellent religion, without entanglements unto Judaism. Learn hence, That the spiritual and deep mysteries of the gospel, especially those which concern the person and offices of our Lord Jesus Christ, do require our deep and diligent, our most attentive consideration. Observe, 3. The title given to Jesus Christ, the object of his consideration, he is styled the Apostle and High Priest of our profession; that is, the first and chief apostle sent of God to be the prime preacher of the gospel, the first legate sent from heaven, and the great High Priest that mediates between God and man. Here note, That the function of an Apostle and High Priest were the greatest functions that ever God instituted in his church: None greater than an High Priest under the law, none greater than an apostle under the gospel, both of them never conjoined in one man but here. Learn hence, That the Lord Jesus Christ is all in all unto his church, the King, Priest, Prophet and Apostle of it, all in one: Consider the Apostle and High Priest of our profession.

2 Who was faithful to him that appointed him as also Moses was faithful in all his house.

Because the Jews had generally too high an opinion of Moses, our apostle here enters upon a comparison between Christ and Moses, thus; "As Moses was faithful, so was Christ in declaring the will, the whole will of God unto his church. Was Moses universally faithful, faithful in all his house? So did the faithfulness of Christ extend itself to all the church. Did Moses do every thing according to the institution and appointment of God? So was Christ faithful to him that appointed him, doing all that in and for the church, which God had commanded him, and nothing else." Learn hence, That the worship of God in his household and family, the church, is, for the substance of it, no less perfectly and completely ordered and ordained by our Lord Jesus Christ, now under the gospel, than it was by Moses of old under the law; I say, as to the substance of it, not as to every particular circumstance. As, for example, The manner of celebrating the passover, in every minute circumstance of it, is set down by Moses, how it must be killed, and how eaten: but Christ has not so set down for the sacrament; a general command we have to do this in remembrance of him; but neither the time when, nor place where, nor gesture in which, is particularly and expressly mentioned. The gospel, which teaches us more spiritual way of serving God, is not so particular in the circumstantial of worship as the law was, and yet Christ was faithful to him that appointed him, as Moses &c.

For this man was counted worthy of more glory than Moses, inasmuch as he who hath builded the house, hath more honour than the house. 4 For every house is builded by some man: but he that builded all things is God. 5 And Moses verily was faithful in all his house as a servant, for a testimony of those things which were to be spoken after; 6 But Christ, as a Son over his own house: whose house are we, if we hold fast the confidence, and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end.

Our apostle having in the preceding verses, entered upon a comparison between Christ and Moses, and shewed in general wherein they were alike and did agree; he proceeds now to evince the preference of Christ, and to shew in sundry signal instances his exaltation above Moses: This man, meaning the Messiah, was counted worthy of more glory than Moses, &c. As if he had said, "Christ is as much more honourable than Moses, as the maker and master of the house is more honourable than the house: He that buildeth the house, hath more honour than the house; but Christ built the house, and Moses was only of the house, or a part of it; therefore Christ ought to have more honour than Moses, for all houses or families are founded by some man; but he that built the church is the same that made all things, namely; God." Another proposition, proving the same conclusion; we have in the next verses: thus, "He that is a son over his own house, is of more honour than a servant in the house of another. But Christ is a Son over his own house: Moses was only a servant in the house of another; therefore more honour is due to Christ than is payable to Moses. Learn hence, 1. That the church is God's house, a building of God, a sacred building, his special temple, the place of his constant and fixed residence. 2. That the building of the church, is so great and glorious a work, as that it could not be effected by any but him who was truly and really God: Such is the wisdom of its contrivance, that none but a God could build it, and such omnipotent power was required in the building of it, that we may admire its excellency, but cannot comprehend it. 3. That Christ, the builder of this church, the house of God, is worthy of all glory and honour upon the account of that his building; he had indeed an essential glory from all eternity, the same with that of God the Father, which was clouded for a season, by his taking upon himself the form of a servant: but there is a farther honour and glory which he received in his exaltation as Head of the church, and as Lord and Heir of the whole creation, which renders him the object of religious adoration. 4. That although every one that is employed as an instrument in building the house of God, and is faithful in his work and trust, is with Moses worthy of great honour, yet the honour of all such instruments put together, is inferior and subordinate to the glory and honour of Jesus Christ, the chief builder of the church. Whose house are we, if we hold fast the confidence, and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end. The apostle having thus confirmed his argument, returns (according to his usual manner) to make application of it unto the Hebrews, and improves it for enforcement of his exhortation unto constancy and perseverance. Whose house are we; that is, believers who worship him according to the gospel are so, upon this condition, that we hold fast our confidence; that is, the confident possession of our Christian faith, and the joy and glorying in our hopes of the promised blessedness unto the end. Learn hence, That as it is an eminent privilege to be of the house of Christ, or a part of that house, so the greatness of the privilege requires an answerable duty; because we are the house of God, it becomes us to hold fast our confidence unto the end. 2. That as at all times, so especially in a time of trial and persecution, constancy in our Christian profession, is and will be a good evidence, both to ourselves and others, that we are living stones in the house of God: His house we are, if we hold fast our confidence unto the end.

7 Wherefore as the Holy Ghost saith, To-day, if you will hear his voice, 8 Harden not your hearts as in the provocation, in the day of temptation in the wilderness: 9 When your fathers tempted me, and saw my works forty years. 10 Wherefore I was grieved with that generation, and said, They do always err in their heart; and they have not known my ways. 11 So I swear in my wrath, They shall not enter into my rest.

The apostle having proved our Lord Jesus Christ to be the great Prophet and teacher of his church, doth in these words draw an inference from the foregoing conclusion; namely, that seeing Christ is the chief Apostle and Prophet of his church, seeing he was a teacher sent of God to instruct the world in the practice of their reasonable duty, that therefore it is our obliged duty to hearken to Christ's voice, and that now to comply with his call and that presently. Wherefore, as the Holy Ghost saith, To-day if you will hear his voice, harden not your hearts. Observe here, 1. The person spoke of, and that is Christ; his voice, that is, the voice of Christ our great Apostle, speaking in his gospel. 2. A duty required of us in reference to his person, and that is, to hear and obey Christ's voice. 3. The circumstance of time, and the special season when this duty of hearing Christ's voice is to be performed, and that is presently : To-day if you will hear his voice. 4. A cautionary direction given to all those that sit under the dispensation of the gospel, and hear Christ's voice speaking to them therein ; namely, to take heed that they harden not their hearts. Learn hence, 1. That the voice which speaks unto us in and by the gospel, is Christ's voice. 2. That it is the great duty of all those that sit under the preaching of the gospel, to hear and obey Christ's voice. 3. That it is not only their duty to hear Christ's voice, and answer his call in the gospel, but to do it now, to do it presently, and without delay : To-day if you will hear his voice. 4. That it is the duty and ought to be the special care, of all those that sit under the dispensation of the gospel, and that hear Christ's voice speaking to them therein, to take heed that they harden not their hearts. Observe, lastly, from our apostle's drawing an instance out of the Old Testament, namely, that of the Jews in the wilderness, to instruct the Hebrews to make use of the present season for hearing the voice of Christ under the New Testament : we learn, that Old Testament examples are New Testament instructions. The example of our fore-fathers are of use and concernment to us, and ought to be the objects of our deepest consideration : Your fathers tempted me, and I was grieved with that generation.

12 Take heed, brethren, lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief, in departing from the living God.

The apostle having propounded the example of the Israelites, in the foregoing verses, to the consideration of the Hebrews, here he advises them to take care that they do not imitate the old Israelites in their unbelief, which will endanger our revolt from God now, as it did theirs then : Take heed lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief. Where note, The nature of sin in general, and of unbelief in particular, declared ; it is a departure from God, from the living God ; the root of all apostacy is cursed infidelity : Unbelief sets all the corrupt lusts and affections of the heart at liberty to act according to their own perverse nature and inclination ; for it makes the soul negligent, careless, and slothful in opposing sin. Note farther, That there is need of great care, and heedfulness, of circumspection and watchfulness, lest at any time, or by any means, there should be found in us an evil heart of unbelief, to occasion our backsliding from Christ, and the profession of our faith in him : Take heed lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief, in departing, &c.

13 But exhort one another daily, while it is called To-day ; lest any of you be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin.

These words afford us a special remedy against the fore-mentioned evil of apostacy, and that is mutual exhortation to constancy of religion : Exhort one another, ministers the people, and the people their ministers, and themselves mutually. Learn hence, That sedulous and mutual exhortation is a special means to preserve Christians from the sin and danger of apostacy from Christ, and his holy religion : Exhort one another daily. Observe next, How this duty is amplified by the properties of it, it must be frequent, Exhort one another daily ; and seasonably, while it is called to-day. We have but an uncertain season for the due performance of most certain duties ; how long it will be called to-day, we know not ; the day of life is uncertain, and so is the day of the gospel ? a summer's day for clearness, a winter's day for shortness ; our working day is a wasting day. Observe, lastly, The great peril and danger which attend the neglecters and neglecting of this duty, Lest any of you be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin. Learn hence, That sin is very full of deceit, or exceedingly deceitful. 2. That the deceit which is in sin and inseparable from it, tends exceedingly to the hardening of the sinner. There are three eminent evils in sin ; pollution, by which it defiles ; baseness, by which it dishonours ; deceitfulness, by which it deludes us with a false expectation of what it is never able to perform.

14 For we are made partakers of Christ, if we hold the beginning of our conscience steadfast unto the end ;

That is, hereby we shall declare ourselves to be made partakers of Christ and his saving benefits, if we persevere in the faith of the gospel, of which we have begun to make a profession ; intimating, That such Christians as do renounce the profession of Christianity, either through fear or flattery, were never made partakers of Christ, nor savingly united to him : No better evidence of our interest in Christ, than what perseverance given.

15 While it is said, To-day if you will hear his voice, harden not your hearts, as in the provocation. 16 For some, when they had heard, did provoke : howbeit not all that came out of Egypt by Moses.

The intention of our apostle in these and the following verses, is to confirm his preceding exhortation, to hearken unto the voice of Christ, speaking in and by the gospel ; and this he does by propounding the example of the Israelites, who came forth out of Egypt under the conduct of Moses, and heard the voice of God in the wilderness ; they all came out of Egypt under the conduct of Moses, and heard the voice of God in the wilderness ; howbeit all did not provoke, but only some. Note here, 1. How the apostle again repeateth over the words of the Psalmist, which he had mentioned before, v. 7, 8. To-day if you will hear his voice, harden not your hearts. From whence we may learn, that the repetition, yea, frequent repetition of matters of moment, is very useful and necessary : We can never hear that too often, which we can never learn too well. Note farther, The privilege which the Israelites of old enjoyed in the wilderness, and which we now enjoy under the gospel : Both theirs and ours is this, To hear the voice of God. This is a very great privilege, but privileges are as men use them ; in themselves they are very valuable, but unto us they are no more than as they are prized and improved by us. Many, yea, most of them to whom Christ himself preached, finally perished; they got nothing by hearing his doctrine, through their unbelief, but an aggravation of their sins, and hastening of their ruin. Christ himself, in his whole ministry, was a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence to both the houses of Israel. Let not his ministers then be discouraged at the smallness of their own success, knowing that they shall be a sweet savour unto God, as well in them that perill, as in them that are saved. Note lastly, That although many, very many in the wilderness that heard the voice of God provoked him, yet not all, ver. 16. Some when they heard, did provoke; howbeit, not all that came out of Egypt. Learn hence, That in the most general and visible apostacy of the church, God evermore reserves a remnant to himself to bear witness for himself by their faith and obedience: They provoked, howbeit not all. God always has, and ever will reserve a remnant of faithful and undefiled souls unto himself, to maintain and keep up his own kingdom in the world, and to have a revenue of special glory from them, and by them, so long as the world continues.

17 But with whom was he grieved forty years? was it not with them that had sinned, whose carcases fell in the wilderness? 18 And to whom sware he that they should not enter into his rest, but to them that believed not? 19 So we see that they could not enter in because of unbelief.

Observe here, the party grieved, God; the parties grieving, the people of Israel: The time of both forty years; the occasion of this grief, sin in general, unbelief in particular, hardness of heart, and final apostacy: the punishment of sin, their carcases fell in the wilderness. Learn, 1. That sin is the proper object of God's displeasure, the only thing he is displeased with for itself, and with the sinner for sin's sake, 2. That public sins, or the sins of societies, are great, very great provocations unto God: It was not for their personal and private sins that God was thus provoked, but for their confederacy in sinning. 3. From their exemplary punishment, their carcases fell in the wilderness; that God sometimes makes men who have been wickedly exemplary in sin, to be righteously exemplary in punishment. And to whom sware he that they should not enter into his rest, but to them that believed not? Observe, The rest here spoke of is the land of Canaan, so called, because God promised it to Abraham, to plant and settle his posterity in it; and because it typified heaven that eternal rest which God has prepared for his saints; into this rest the rebellious and unbelieving Israelites must not enter; God sware the contrary, he sware by himself, he sware in his wrath, he sware to make his sentence irrevocable and immutable. Lord! thine oath stands as a bar against all unbelieving sinners at this day, as it did against the Israelites of old, and cuts off all hope of future entrance into thy eternal rest which they have eternally forfeited: to whom sware he, &c. Learn hence, 1. That unbelief is the immediate root and cause of all provoking sins. Did men believe the happiness of heaven, they could not neglect it; did they believe the torments of hell, they would avoid them. 2. That the oath of God is engaged against all unbelief, and no unbeliever shall enter into the rest of God. ver. 19. We see they could not enter in because of unbelief.

C H A P. IV.

This chapter is of the same nature, and carrieth on the same design with the foregoing; both of them containing an exhortation to faith, obedience, and perseverance.

LET us therefore fear, lest, a promise being left us of entering into his rest, any of you should seem to come short of it.

As if the apostle had said, "Seeing you have so dreadful an example of God's wrath executed upon your fathers in the wilderness for their unbelief, take heed of their sin lest ye suffer the like punishment." Here note, 1. The manner of the exhortation, and how the apostle includes himself in the admonition, Let us fear; it is wise and safe for the ministers of God to include themselves in the exhortations and admonitions which they give to others; for they need excitement, and the means of establishment, as well as others. 2. The affection of fear, which our apostle recommends for their preservation from falling; by which he means a fear of care, diligence, and circumspection. Let us fear lest we come short and fail. Fear is a good monitor, and the best preservative from sin. 3. The duty exhorted to, lest a promise of rest being made, we should fall short of attaining it, as the Israelites did that fell in the wilderness. Learn hence, 1. That it is matter of great and tremendous consequence, to have the promises of God propounded to us; they are either a savour of life unto life, or of death unto death; one of these two will certainly be the consequent of their proposal. God will demand a strict account of the sons of men, of the entertainment given to his promises and threatenings. 2. That they which mix not the promises of God with faith, shall utterly come short of entering into God's rest. 3. That the failing of men through unbelief, doth no way cause the promises of God to fail or cease; The veracity of God is engaged for the stability of the promise; so that though men, by their unbelief, may disappoint themselves of their expectation, yet they cannot bereave God of his faithfulness.

2 For unto us was the gospel preached, as well as unto them: but the word preached did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it.

Observe here, 1. That the gospel is no new doctrine, no new law, but one and the same to all persons, and at all times, ever since the first publication of it in the original promise, Gen. iii. 15. It is the same for substance, though not for clearness of revelation; the same gospel was preached to Adam, to Abraham, to the Israelites in the wilderness, which was preached by Christ and his apostles, but with clearer light, evidence, and power in the administration of it:

it: Unto us was the gospel, the same gospel preached as well as unto them. 2. That the generality of persons, who have sat under the preaching of the gospel in all ages, have not savingly profited by it, The word preached did not profit: From the beginning it has been so, partly through carelessness, and want of due attention in the hearers, and partly for want of meditation upon, and particular application of the word unto themselves after they have heard it; partly through the neglect of prayer for a blessing upon the word they hear: For those and the like causes, the word preached did not, nor does not profit. 3. Unbelief in man's heart, is the great cause of that unprofitableness which is found in the word preached; unbelief hinders the efficacy of the word preached, by with-holding men from yielding their assent to the truths they hear, by hindering them from applying, from a particular and close applying of the word they hear, to their own consciences: And unbelief hinders men from calling upon God, by prayer, for a blessing upon the word they hear. 4. That the word preached them profits, and only then, when it is a mixed word: The original word is a metaphor taken either from seed, from meat, or from physic. As seed must be mixed with the soil, and with the dew and rain of heaven, or it will never spring and grow; or as meat must be mixed with the stomach, or it will not nourish; and as physic must meet and mix with the humour, gripe and put the patient to some pain, or it will never cure: So must the word be rooted in the heart, or it will never fructify in the life; it must be mixed with faith, with love, with humility, with patience, or it will never bring forth fruit with joy.

3 For we which have believed do enter into rest, as he said, As I have sworn in my wrath, If they shall enter into my rest; although the works were finished from the foundation of the world.

As if the apostle had said, There is a rest promised to us believers, as well as the typical rest, Canaan, was promised to the Israelites. Learn thence, That the state of believers, under the gospel, is a state of blessed rest. There is a spiritual rest which believers obtain entrance into by Jesus Christ, in the faith and worship of the gospel, besides their eternal rest in heaven. This spiritual rest consists in peace, with God, in satisfaction and acquiescence in God, and in means of communion with God. 2. That it is faith alone which is the only way and means of entering into this blessed state of rest: We who have believed do enter into rest: As unbelief cuts off from, so faith gives an entrance into the rest of God. It follows,—As I have sworn in my wrath, If they shall enter into my rest: Observe, Here is a threatening, confirmed by the oath of God, that they who believe not should never enter into his rest, and promise, that such as do believe shall certainly enter. Learn thence, That there is a mutual in-being of promises and threatenings in the covenant, which must be considered together, and cannot be separated each from the other. Where there is a promise expressed, there a threatening is tacitly understood; and where there is a threatening expressed, be it never so secure, yet there is a gracious promise included: Nay, sometimes God gives out a threatening for no other end, but that men may lay hold upon the promise. Thus the threatening that Nineveh should perish, was given out mercifully, that Nineveh might not be destroyed. It follows, Although the works were finished from the foundation of the world. That is, Almighty God, when he had perfected and finished the works of creation in six days, rested on the seventh day from his labour; shewing us, by his own example, that work and labour must precede our rest: After God had finished the glorious work of creation, he returns as it were into his own eternal rest, and directs to seek rest in himself; and, by his own example, teaches us; that our days of labour must go before our day of rest.

4 For he spake in a certain place of the seventh day on this wise, And God did rest the seventh day from all his works. 7 And in this place again, If they shall enter into my rest. 6 Seeing therefore it remaineth that some must enter therein, and they to whom it was first preached entered not in because of unbelief: 7 Again, he limiteth a certain day, saying, in David, To-day, after so long a time: as it is said, To-day if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts. 8 For if Jesus had given them rest, then would he not afterward have spoken of another day.

For the clear understanding of these words, we must know, that there is a threefold rest spoken of in scripture, all which are called His; that is, God's rest, being all of his appointing and providing: Namely, 1. The rest of the Sabbath-day, in remembrance of God's resting from the work of creation. 2. The typical rest in the land of Canaan. 3. An eternal rest with God in heaven; of which the sabbath and the Israelites rest in Canaan were a type and figure. Now the apostle's design is to prove that the rest which God principally intends for his people is this last rest, namely, an everlasting rest with himself in heaven: and this he evidently proves, because if that rest which they had obtained in the land of Canaan, under the conduct of Joshua, called (in Syriac) Jesus, had been all the rest which Almighty God ever intended for them, then it had been needless for David in the xcvith Psalm, which was penned a long time after, even some thousands of years, to make mention of any other rest. But this he does; and therefore inters, that there is a third rest yet to come, which, by the preaching of the gospel, was now proposed to them, and that under the same promises and threatenings with the former. If Jesus or Joshua had given them the true spiritual and eternal rest here spoken of, in Canaan, then would not David afterward have spoken of another rest after their rest in Canaan; which seeing he has done, the apostle concludes, there must yet remain a farther rest to be enjoyed by the people of God. From the whole note, That God has, by promise, given his people a full assurance of enjoying a rest upon condition of faith; and this another manner of rest than that of Canaan, which the Israelites of old did enjoy.

manner of rest than that of Canaan, which the Israelities of old did enjoy.

9 There remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God.

From the foregoing promises the apostle draws this conclusion, That there remaineth yet a more glorious, perfect, and complete rest for the people of God. Observe here, 1. Something implied, namely, That the people of God, while here on earth, have work to do, and labour incumbent upon them. Rest and labour are correlates, the one supposes the other; the apostle affirming, that there is rest remaining for them, strongly supposes that there is labour at present belonging to them. God's people are an industrious working people: Christ's present call is to service and duty. 2. That God has already given his people a foretaste of, and some entrance into rest, during their present state of work and labour, the better to enable them for that, and the more to sweeten that to them. The state of sin is a state of all labour and no rest; the state of glory is all rest and no labour; but the state of grace is a mixed state, partly of labour, and partly of rest; of labour in respect of ourselves, in respect of the world, against sin; under affliction and persecution: But of rest in Christ, in his love, in his favour, and grace; and thus our labour makes our rest sweet, and our rest makes our labour easy. 3. That there is reserved and laid up in heaven, for all the people of God that serve him laboriously and faithfully here on earth, a fore and certain, a complete and perfect, a glorious and everlasting rest; for its quantity, it is full of rest; for its quality, it is unmixed rest; rest and nothing but rest: For its duration, it is an eternal rest; the least fear of losing or leaving it, would im-bitter all the joy which the saints taste in the fruition and enjoyment of it.

10 For he that is entered into his rest, he also hath ceased from his own works, as God did from his.

Into the spiritual heavenly rest, mentioned in the foregoing verse, the believer is said to have entered, in this verse; and this is done two ways, initially, inchoatively, and imperfectly in this life; fully, finally, perfectly, and completely in the next. They have now a present title and right to enter into his rest, the actual enjoyment and full possession of it is to come. Observe, 1. Believers have already entered initially into this rest whilst here on earth, and accordingly have ceased from their own works; that is, the works of the flesh, the service of sin; these may have discarded by repentance and mortification. Here note, That before conversion a person is doing his own works, fulfilling his own will, and not God's; but after he ceases from all sinful works, inchoatively though not perfectly: He that hath entered into his rest, hath ceased from his own works. Observe, 2. That when believers have finished all their works of evangelical obedience, they shall then, and not till then, fully and finally enter into God's rest, and be for ever happy and in the enjoyment of it. All men desire rest, but it is not to be found on earth, but in heaven; not in the creature, but in God. O happy they, which, believing the excellency and glory of this rest, do work, wait, and wish for it, and with diligence and constancy, use all holy endeavours for the attaining and securing of it.

11 Let us labour therefore to enter into that rest, lest any man fall after the same example of unbelief.

As if our apostle had said, "Seeing there is such an eternal glorious rest prepared for, and promised to believers, then it is the duty, and ought to be the endeavour of every one of us to secure our title to it, and our interest in it, by a steadfast faith, and persevering obedience, lest, following the example of our forefathers in the wilderness, we fall and perish as they did." Learn hence, 1. That there is a rest promised to us under the gospel, as there was to the Jews of old under the dispensation of the law. 2. That the Jews heretofore, by sin in general, by unbelief and disobedience in particular, did fall short of the rest proposed to them, and never entered into it, but were destroyed by the just indignation of God. 3. That in the Israelites sin and God's displeasure, in the event of the one, and in the effects of the other, there was an example set forth, of what would be our lot and portion, if through unbelief we fall short of the rest which the gospel proposes to us: Let us labour to enter into that rest, lest any man fall after the same example, &c. It is our duty to improve examples, lest we be made examples of divine displeasure. 4. That we cannot rationally have the least expectation of escaping vengeance under the guilt of those sins, which others, in like manner, being guilty of, have not escaped; for with God there is no respect of persons. Did the Israelites miss of the earthly Canaan? So shall we of the heavenly, through unbelief.

12 For the word of God is quick, and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow: and is a discernor of the thoughts and intents of the heart.

As if the apostle had said, "Take heed especially of unbelief; for the word of God, or doctrine of the gospel, will quickly find you out, if you be guilty of it." There is a piercing power in the word of God, through the energy and efficacious operation of the Holy Spirit; it is here compared to a sword, because it does divide things most nearly united, and discover things most inward and secret, or rather God by the word doth this; he by the word pierces, even to dividing asunder of the soul and spirit; that is, the actings of the understanding, and the motions of the will and affections, it cuts asunder the most resolute and compacted purposes of the will; yea, it pierces to the marrow, that is, the most secret and close contrivances of the soul, the thoughts and intents of the heart. O mighty power of the word! and of God in and by the word, to convey strength to the weak, wisdom to the simple, comfort to the sorrowful, light to the blind, and life to the dead; it brings souls out of the captivity of sin into the blessed liberty of faith in Christ:

13 Neither is there any creature that is not manifest in his sight; but all things are naked and opened unto the eyes of him with whom we have to do.

There

There is not any one place in scripture, I think, which more fully informs us of the perfect and exact knowledge of Almighty God, as to all persons and things, than this before. Observe, 1. The object, all and every thing, our persons, our actions, the manner of our actions, the design and end of our actions; he knows what we have been and done, and what we will be and do. 2. The full manifestations and clear representation of all persons and things unto God. (1.) All things are here said to be naked, unclorbed, their dreis and paint taken off: These words are an allusion to bodies, which being stripped and unclorbed all see what they are; there may be many deformities, blemishes, yea, ulcers, upon a body undiscerned, while it is clothed and covered; but when naked, every scar appears, and nothing is hid: all things are naked in his sight; that is, he as plainly discerns what they are, as we discern what a body is that stands naked before us. The knowledge which God has of persons and things, is a clear and distinct knowledge. (2.) All things are here said to be open as well as naked, unto God; a metaphor taken, says St. Chrylston, from the sacrificed beasts, which being excoriated, their skins plucked off, they were cut down from the neck to the rump, so that all the inwards of the beast lay bare, and every part might be clearly seen: It is one thing to see a sheep alive, with its skin and fleece on, and another thing to see it naked and flayed; but a farther thing to see it opened and unboweled, with all its intestines and inwards exposed to the eye. Others think there is in the original word an allusion to anatomists, who open and dissect human bodies, the heart, the liver, the lungs, the bowels, all exactly appear, whether sound or decayed: Such a kind of anatomy doth God make upon man's heart; his piercing eye sees and discerns what is flesh, and what is spirit in us, what is faith, and what is fancy, what is grace in reality, and what in appearance only. Doubtless the phrase doth signify a most intimate, full, and thorough knowledge of all persons, and all things, which is found in that God with whom we have to do, and to whom we must give an account for all that we have done.

14 Seeing then that we have a great high priest, that is passed into the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession.

Our apostle comes now to assert the priesthood of Christ, and to set forth the dignity and excellency of his office; from whence he encourages the believing Hebrews to perseverance and stedfastness in the profession of their faith in him. Here note, 1. The eminency of the person, Jesus the Son of God; not by supernatural conception only, but by eternal generation also; this is the eminency of that person who is superior to men and angels. 2. The excellency of his office, a Priest, an High Priest, a great High Priest: Not barely equal with Aaron, but superior to him, and infinitely above him; the universal supreme Pontiff of heaven and earth, in comparison of whom, all other priests, even the highest of them, were but shadows. 3. His relation to us, We have him; that is special interest in him, making profession of obedience to him; and he is passed into the heavens, to open heaven to us, and to make intercession with the Father for us. This entrance of Christ's into heaven, was shadowed forth by the high priest's entrance into the holy of holies here on earth. 4. Our obligation to him, Let us hold fast our profession; that is, the profession of our faith in him, without wavering, with constancy and perseverance. Learn hence; 1. That great opposition ever has been, and always will be made unto the stedfastness of believers in their holy profession. The apostle's exhortation plainly supposes opposition. 2. That it is our duty, in the midst of all opposition, to hold fast our holy profession, without either apostatizing in the whole, or declining in parts of it. The glory of God is in the highest manner concerned in it, and assured destruction attends the omission of it, and that in a peculiar, terrible, and dreadful manner, chap. x. 29. Learn, 3. That believers have great encouragement unto, and assistances in the stedfastness and constancy of their holy profession, by and from the priesthood of Jesus Christ: For as he is our High Priest, he knows our temptations, pities us under them, affords us actual help and relief against them, he interceding with the Father, that our faith may not fail, and that we may be kept by the almighty power of God, through faith unto salvation. 4. That Jesus Christ, our High Priest, was the Son of God; and the necessity of his being so, did thus appear; 1. Before the entrance of sin there was no need of the office of priesthood between God and man: For every one was then in his own name to go to God with his worship, which would have been accepted according to the law of creation. 2. Sin being entered into the world, there was no more worship to be performed immediately unto God; two cannot walk or converse together, except they be agreed. 3. That the worship of God might be again restored in and to the word, it was indispensibly necessary that some one should interpose between sinners and the holy God; for should sinners approach him immediately in their own names, he would be unto them a consuming fire. 4. No creature could undertake the office of being a priest for the church of God, which now consisteth all of sinners: Neither the nature of the office, which was to interpose between God and sinners, nor the quality of the work, which is to make atonement for sin, would admit of it. 5. Jesus Christ therefore undertaking to be a Priest for sinners, it was necessary he should be what he was, the very Son of God: Seeing we have a great High Priest, even Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our profession.

15 For we have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin.

These words contain a farther description of Christ our great High Priest, by his merciful disposition towards his people: he is said to be touched; that is, sensibly affected with the infirmities, that is, the miseries, sufferings and calamities, which the human nature is exercised with, and exposed to. Our Lord Jesus Christ, now in heaven, doth exercise a tender and compassionate spirit towards his suffering children and servants here on earth; he has an experimental knowledge of what his people suffer, either from God, or from man, for God's sake, as one that is interested in them, as one concerned for them, as one related to them, yea, as being one with them. The sympathy of Christ with, and towards his suffering people, is a tender sympathy, an extensive sympathy, it reaches all our infirmities, a proportionable sympathy, answerable to every occasion, a perpetual sympathy; as long as he continues High Priest, and we remain subject to infirmities, so long will he be touched with the feeling of them. Observe farther, The assigned reason why our great High Priest is so sensibly affected with our suffering condition; namely, because he was in all points tempted as we are, sin excepted. Christ, by assuming our nature, became humbly affectionate, and by suffering our infirmities, became experimentally compassionate. Here note, That temptation may be without sin; it is not our sin to be tempted, but to comply with the temptation. 2. That Christ was tempted, yea, in all points tempted like unto us: His temptations were in all points like ours: he was tempted to sin, yet without sin. There is a twofold temptation to sin, inward and outward; inwardly Christ was not tempted to sin, outwardly he was, and with great vehemency assaulted both by men and devils to the worst of sins that ever man was; but he always resisted, and always overcame. Oh what a consolation is this unto us under all our temptations, that Christ was in all things tempted like unto us, but without sin!

16 Let us therefore come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need.

These words are an inference drawn from the apostle's foregoing discourse, "Seeing we have such an High Priest as is before described, let us come with boldness, with freedom and liberty to the throne of grace, &c." Note here, 1. There is a throne of grace which believers may come unto; God has a throne of justice, and a throne of grace: If he looks upon man according to the law of works, he must needs sit upon the throne of justice as a severe Lord, and strict judge, to condemn us; but being propitiated and atoned by the blood of Christ, his throne is a throne of grace and mercy, from which he represents himself to us as a God in Christ, as a God of forgiveness, as a God in covenant, and as a God that will have communion with us. 2. That believers may come boldly; and with confidence to this throne of grace; they have liberty to do it, they have authority to do it, and may have confidence and assurance of audience in the doing of it. 3. That all help, succour, and spiritual assistance in every time of need, is found with God, and proceeds from mere mercy and grace in God, That we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need. 4. That the way to obtain mercy, and find grace to help in every time of need, is by a due application of ourselves for it to the throne of grace.: Let us come boldly to the throne of grace, that we may find help in time of need.

C H A P. V.

Our apostle comes now, in this, and the following chapters, to discourse of the priesthood of Christ, as far more excellent than that of Aaron's, and consequently that there was all imaginable reason to persevere in Christianity, in respect of this office likewise.

FOR every high priest taken from among men is ordained for men in things pertaining to God that he may offer both gifts and sacrifices for sins:

Observe here, The apostle describes an high priest several ways. 1. By his original, He is one taken from among men; that is, of the same nature with themselves, otherwise, he had not been capable of those compassionate impressions which are required to the due discharge of his office. Thus Christ's participation of our nature was necessary to the discharge of his office as High Priest, and a manifest evidence that he will be tender and compassionate towards them whose nature he sustains and bears. 2. He is described by the general nature of his office, he is ordained for men in things pertaining to God; that is, he was to act and negotiate, for the good of sinful men, in things wherein they have to do more immediately with Almighty God; particularly to offer gifts, oblations, and sacrifices for their sins. Where note, That it was the entrance of sin that made the office of the priesthood necessary: Had it not been for sin, every one might have gone to God in his own person, but now God will not be immediately treated with by any, but through the interposition of a Mediator; and he having first made an atonement for sin. 3. The high priest is here described by the exercise of his office, and the special discharge of his body, which is, to offer both gifts and sacrifices for sins, that is, to give satisfaction and make atonement for sin. Here note, That the light of nature dictates to us, that something ought to be offered unto God, in acknowledgement of his supreme dominion; and because men are guilty of sin, and God essentially just, sacrifices must be offered, and a priest ordained to offer those sacrifices for the averting of his wrath, and procurings of his favour: But by what sacrifices God will be atoned, and by whom, and in what manner they must be offered, not the law of nature, but the light of scripture, divine revelation, must teach us: Every high priest taken from among men, is ordained for men; that is, instituted and appointed of God, for the service of man in things pertaining to God.

2 Who can have compassion on the ignorant, and on them that are out of the way; for that he himself also is compassed with infirmity:

Our apostle proceeds in giving the character of the high priest which God required under the law; he must have compassion for men, for sinful men, being compassed with sinful infirmities himself. Observe here, 1. A great and necessary qualification or endowment of an high priest, he was, and is one able to have compassion; that is able with all meekness and gentleness, with all patience and forbearance, hearing, to bear the infirmities, sins, and provocations of men, even as a nurse bears with the weakness and forwardness of a poor infant. Observe 2. The peculiar object of his compassionate care and regard; namely, those that are ignorant, and do wander out of the way; in these two words does the apostle comprise all sorts of sinners whatsoever, with all sorts and kinds of sin. 3. A special reason rendered why the high priest was thus compassionate, because he himself is compassed with infirmities; his own condition will mind him of his duty in this matter, being beset on every hand with infirmities of his own. Learn hence, 1. That it is a mighty privilege to us, that our Lord Jesus Christ, our great High Priest, was encompassed with the sinless infirmities of our nature. 2. That no sort of sinners are excluded from an interest in the care and love of our compassionate High Priest; such as are ignorant, and such as are out of the way, he has compassion upon both; none are excluded, but those who by unbelief do exclude themselves, and cause the blood of the reconciling sacrifice to cry against them.

3 And by reason hereof he ought, as for the people, so also for himself, to offer for sins.

That is, by reason of which infirmities he ought, both by God's command, and also from the reason and nature of the thing, as for the people, so also for himself, to offer sacrifices for sins. Note here, That it is a description of the high priest under the law, not of our Lord Jesus Christ our great High Priest under the gospel, because Christ had actually no sin of his own to offer for, being holy, harmless, and undefiled, separate from sinners. This expression therefore of offering for his own sins, belongs to the weakness and imperfection of the legal high priest. Learn hence, That it was a part of the darkness and bondage of the church under the Old Testament, that their high priests had need to offer sacrifices for themselves, and their own sins: This they did in the view of the people: They first took care to offer for their own sins, and then for the sins of others; whosoever dealt with God about the sins of others, ought to look well, in the first place, unto his own; it is a great evidence of hypocrisy for men to be severe towards the sins of others, and careless about their own sins. Learn, 2. That such was the absolute holiness, and spotless innocency of the Lord Jesus Christ our great High Priest, that what he offered was not for himself, but for his people. Atonement for sinners was made by him who had no sins of his own to atone for.

4 And no man taketh this honour unto himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron: 5 So also Christ glorified not himself to be made an high priest; but he that said unto him, Thou art my Son, to-day have I begotten thee. 6 As he saith also in another place, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec.

The foregoing verses declare the personal qualifications of the High Priest; here we have his call and commission to this office and function: The former made him meet for it, the latter gave him right unto it. No man taketh

this honour; that is, the honour of priesthood to himself, but only he that is called of God, as was Aaron, and his posterity. Note here, 1. That it is an act of sovereignty in God, to call whom he pleases to his work and service. 2. That as it is an act of sovereignty in God, so it is a special dignity and honour to us to be duly called to, as well as qualified for, his work and service. 3. That the highest excellency, and utmost necessity of any work or service to be here done for God, will, by no means, warrant our undertaking of it, and engaging in it, without a lawful call unto it. 4. That the more excellent any work of God is, the more express ought to be our calling to it. No man taketh this honour upon him, but he that is called of God: It were well if our lay-preachers considered this. So also Christ our great High Priest, glorified not himself to be made an High Priest, uncalled, but he dignified him who said unto him, Thou art my Son; and thou art a Priest for ever; without succession, after the order, similitude, and manner of Melchisedec. Learn hence, That the office of the high priesthood over the church of God, was an honour and glory to Jesus Christ; it was so to his human nature, even as it was united to his own power. Christ glorified not himself to be made an High Priest, implying that he was a glory and honour, though not assumed, but conferred: and that as Aaron was called of God, so was Christ, but in a more excellent and glorious manner. By this we understand the intolerable pride, and bold presumption of many in these times, who take upon them to officiate in matters of religion, though neither qualified for, nor called to this work; If ever any man or angel, then surely Christ might have taken this honour to himself, yet he did not uncalled: Verily, this will be the eternal condemnation of all such usurpers, who, without any commission from God or man, undertake what they do not understand.

7 Who in the days of his flesh, when he had offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears, unto him that was able to save him from death, and was head, in that he feared;

Observe here, 1. A special act of Christ's priesthood or priestly office, He offered up. 2. The subject-matter of his offering, supplications and prayers. 3. The intense manner of his offering, with strong cries and tears. 4. The person to whom he offered, unto God, who was able to save him from death. 5. The time of his offering in the days of his flesh; that is, in the time of this mortal life, when clothed with our frail nature. 6. The issue and success of all this, he was heard in that he feared. Learn 1. That the holy Jesus did not only take upon him our human nature, but the infirmities of our nature also. Christ had in this world a time of infirmities as well as ourselves. True, his infirmities were sinless, but sorrowful and grievous, which exposed him to all sorts of temptations and sufferings. 2. That the Lord Jesus Christ, our great High Priest, offered up most ardent prayers and supplications to Almighty God, in the days of his flesh, upon his own and our behalf. The text mentions prayers and supplications, with strong cries. 3. That Christ shed tears as well as blood for a lost world: He offered up strong cries and tears:
by

by this he shewed the truth of his humanity, and that he did not accept only the human nature, but did also assume human affections. 4. That Christ's prayers were always heard, either in kind or in equivalency; He was not specifically, heard as to the passing of the cup from him, when he prayed in the garden; but he was equivalently heard as to the support of his spirit, and as to supplies of strength, to enable him to drink the bitter cup with silence and submission; he was heard in that he feared, by being delivered not from death, but out of death, as his followers must expect to be delivered.

8 Though he were a Son, yet learned he obedience, by the things which he suffered:

Observe here, 1. Christ's eminent dignity; he was a Son, that is, the Son of God, and God himself; the Word was God, John i. 1. And as the word was made flesh, so he was nearer to God than any other person; he was a Son, a sinless Son, yet a suffering Son; and he learned obedience, by the things which he suffered. 2. As Christ's eminent dignity, by his exemplary obedience; he learned obedience; not by personal speculation, but by real experience; he experimentally understood what obedience was. Note here, That there are two ways of learning obedience. 1. By the comprehension of the mind. 2. By the experience of sense. Christ as God was perfect in knowledge, nothing could be added to him, but when he became man, then he came to understand and learn by sufferings, which was a new method and way of knowing. And the obedience which Christ learned, was free and voluntary, universal and complete, sincere and pure, persevering and constant. Christ learned this lesson of obedience, not barely to know it, but to do it; to learn to obey, is to obey by the things which he suffered; he did perfectly learn, and experimentally understand, what obedience was. O blessed Jesus! As didst thou, so may we learn practical obedience by the things which we suffer.

Observe here, 1. A choice and singular blessing and benefit spoken of, and that is, eternal salvation; which implies not only deliverance from hell, and redemption from eternal misery, but the obtaining of eternal life and happiness. 2. The author of this great blessing and benefit to mankind, namely, Jesus Christ our great High Priest, who, by making atonement for us, and reconciling us to God, is said to be the author of eternal salvation to mankind. 3. The way and means whereby he became the author of our salvation, and that was by being made perfect; the original word is an allusion to one that runs in a race, where he that wins receives the crown. Thus Christ having finished his course of sufferings, and received the reward of them, by being raised from the dead, and exalted to the right hand of God, he is said to be made perfect. 4. The qualification of the persons who are made partakers of this great benefit, or the condition upon which it is offered and tendered, and that is obedience, He became the author of eternal salvation to them that obey him. Quest. 1. How does

Christ become the author of eternal salvation? Ans. As a rule and pattern, as a price and propitiation, and as an advocate and patron: By the purity of his doctrines, as a rule; by the piety of his example, as a pattern; by the merit of his obedience and sufferings, as a propitiation; and by his prevailing intercession, as our Advocate now in heaven. Where note, That the virtue of his intercession in heaven is founded on his satisfaction here on earth, in shedding of his blood for us. Quest. 2. What obedience does the gospel require as a condition and is pleased to accept as a qualification, in those who hope for eternal salvation? Ans. Negatively, Not a bare external profession of obedience, though accompanied with professing and working miracles, but an hearty and universal conformity to the precepts of the gospel in sincerity and uprightness; allowing ourselves in the neglect of no known duty, nor in the practice of any known sin. Quest. 3. But is fallen man under a possibility now of performing this obedience? Ans. We are no more sufficient of ourselves, and by any power of our own, to perform the conditions of the gospel, than we are able to answer the demands of the law. But the grace of God is offered to us, and stands ready to assist us to perform the conditions which the gospel requires. Consequently, what the grace of God stands ready to enable us to do, if we be not wanting to ourselves, that may properly be said to be possible to us, and in some sense in our power to perform. Quest. 4. But is not making our obedience the condition of our salvation prejudicial to the freeness of God's grace, and the law of faith? Ans. In no wise; for it is acknowledged, that faith is the root of all true holiness and evangelical obedience; that we stand continually in need of assistance of God's grace, to enable us to perform that obedience which the gospel requires, and is pleased to accept; and that God confers eternal life upon us, not for the merit of our obedience, but only for the sake of Christ. The sum of all is this, That it is indispensibly necessary for a man to be a good man, that he may get to heaven; and that it is the greatest presumption in the world for any man to hope to attain to salvation without obedience, and a holy life: For though our obedience cannot merit heaven yet it does qualify and fit us for heaven: though it doth not make us worthy, yet doth it make us meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light. And whosoever finds fault with this doctrine, finds fault with the gospel itself.

10 Called of God an high priest after the order of Melchisedec.

These words may be looked upon as an evidence and testimony, that the Lord Jesus Christ was, and is the author of eternal salvation to all them that obey him, because he is a Priest after the order of Melchisedec; that is, because his priesthood is eternal. Note here, 1. That God was pleased to put a signal honour upon the person and office of Melchisedec, that in him there should be an early and excellent representation made of the person and priesthood of Jesus Christ. Melchisedec was an illustrious type of Christ; he was the first personal type of Christ that ever was in the world; after him there were many others, and he was the only type of the person of Christ that ever was in the world. Others were types of Christ in the execution of his office, but none but Melchisedec were ever types of his person; for being introduced without father, without mother, without beginning of days, of whom it is said, Who can declare his generation? And farther, Melchisedec was a type of Christ in those two great offices of a King and a Priest, which none but he ever was. 2. That the priesthood of Christ was not after the order of Aaron, which was to expire, and not to last long, but after the order of Melchisedec, which was to continue and last forever: Thou art a Priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec. The priesthood of Christ is an eternal priesthood, He ever liveth to make intercession for us.

11 Of whom we have many things to say, and hard to be uttered, seeing you are dull of hearing.

That is, of which priesthood of Christ, as compared with Melchisedec, we have much to say, which is not easy to make intelligible by words, to those that are ignorant and dull of understanding. Learn hence, 1. That all Scripture-truths are not equally easy to be understood, but require a peculiar diligence in our attendance upon them, that they may be understood. 2. That it is the incapacity of hearers, through dulness and slothfulness, and want of preparatory knowledge, which makes scripture-teaching no more and no better understood: All our miscarriages under the word, are to be resolved into our own sloth, negligence, and depraved affections; We have many things to say, but ye are dull of hearing.

12 For when for the time ye ought to be teachers, ye have need that one teach you again which be the first principles of the oracles of God; and are become such as have need of milk, and not of strong meat.

As if the apostle had said, "When, for the time that you have professed the Christian faith, ye ought to have been able to have been teachers of it to others, you had need yourselves to be instructed in the first rudiments of the Christian religion, and are become such as have need of milk, the food of babes, and not of strong meat, the food of men." Learn hence, 1. That the time when, and how long we enjoy the dispensation of the gospel, is a circumstance which must, in particular, be accounted for: whereas for the time, all have time, but all have not time alike: The day of the gospel is not of the same length to all nations, churches, and persons. 2. That it is reasonably expected by God that persons should thrive and grow in knowledge and holiness, proportionably to their time and means; and not doing so, is charged upon them as a great aggravation of their guilt: For the time ye ought to have been teachers; that is, of ability sufficient for the teaching of others. They had not learned of their teachers, when the apostle had reason to hope they had been able to teach their learners. Many, after long teaching, are ignorant, and ought to be taught again the same things which they had long ago heard. 3. That the holy Scriptures are to be looked upon consulted with, and submitted to, as the oracles of God; they are sometimes called the living, sometimes the lively oracles of God; because they are the oracles of the living God, and also life-giving oracles to them that obey him.

4. That there are, in the scripture, truths suitable to the spiritual instruction and edification of all sorts of persons; there is in it both milk and strong meat, plain doctrines and first principles necessary for all, and truths of a deeper search that are profitable to some. "In the Scripture, said one, there are shallows and there are depths: fords where the lambs may wade, and depths where the elephants may swim."

13 For every one that useth milk is unskilful in the word of righteousness: For, he is a babe. 14 But strong meat belongeth to them that are of full age, even those who by reason of use have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil.

Our apostle here speaks of the difference of doctrines under the metaphor of meats: From whence we may gather, 1. That the word of God in the dispensation of it, is food provided for the souls of men. 2. That the word, as food, will not profit the soul until it be eaten, and digested: It is not food prepared, but food received, that nourishes. When manna was gathered and eaten, it nourished the Israelites: But when gathered and laid by, it rotted and bred worms. Lord! what pains do some take to gather manna, to hear the word, but alas! it lies by them, and is of no use. Learn, 3. That as the gospel is the word of righteousness, so God requires and expects that all those who live under the dispensation of the gospel should be skilful in the word of righteousness. The gospel is the word of righteousness; it is so declaratively, it is so efficiently: Declaratively, as the severity of God against sin is hereby more fully revealed, and as the righteousness which God requireth, approveth, and accepteth for our justification, is therein declared: And the righteousness which God requireth in us, and expecteth from us, is hereby discovered also; and as it is the great instrument of working holiness in us, and making us inherently righteous so it is the word of righteousness efficiently as well as declaratively: Our justification is wrought in us, thereby, John xvii. 17. Learn 4. That the spiritual sense of believers, well exercised in the word of righteousness, are the best and most undeceiving helps in judging of what is good or evil, what is true or false, that is proposed to them: Such by reason of use, have their senses exercised, &c.

CHAP. VI.

Our apostle begins this chapter with an exhortation to the Hebrews to increase both in knowledge and obedience; exciting them to advance to an higher and more perfect degree of knowledge in the Christian religion, than the first principles and ground-work of it.

THEREFORE leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ, let us go on unto perfection;

In these words of the apostle, he seems to allude to the building of an house: As in that, we first lay a good and sure foundation, but do not rest there, but proceed in raising up up the fabric; in like manner, it is neither satisfactory nor sufficient to advance no farther in the Christian religion, than the knowledge of the first principles of it; but endeavours must be used to attain a more perfect degree and measure of knowledge in the mysteries of the gospel. Leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ, he means not leaving them so as to forget them, and lay them aside, but to leave them by going beyond them and advancing farther and higher in the knowledge of Christianity. Learn hence, 1. That in Christianity, and other sciences, there are certain rudiments and fundamental principles, which must and ought to be carefully taught. 2. That it is a necessary and useful practice, in the church of God, to teach the doctrine of Christianity, in the first principles of it, plainly and summarily to young beginners. 3. That when the ministers of the gospel have laid a good foundation of scripture knowledge in the understanding of their hearers, they must excite them by all pressing considerations to make a farther progress in their knowledge, and leaving the doctrine of the beginning of Christ, go on unto perfection.

— Not laying again the foundation of repentance from dead works, and of faith towards God, 2 Of the doctrine of baptisms, and of laying on of hands, and of resurrection of the dead, and of eternal judgment. 3 And this will we do, if God permit.

Still our apostle pursues his metaphor, in comparing Christianity to a building, and the first rudiments or principles of the Christian religion to a foundation which supports the superstructure. Next he summarily declares what these fundamental doctrines, and first principles of the Christian religion are, namely, these six. 1. Repentance, or a turning from all sinful works, called dead works, because they end in death; dead, because deadly; they proceed from death spiritual, and end in death eternal. 2. Faith towards God, or faith in God; that is, in the whole Trinity. Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Particularly, faith in the first original promise of God, to send Christ into the world to save us from our sins, and granting remission of sins by him. Here note, How closely repentance and faith are united and knit together; where the one is, there is the other; and where either is not, there is neither. He repenteth not, who hath not faith towards God, and he hath not faith towards God, who repenteth not. 3. The doctrine of baptism; that is, of both the Christian sacraments are seals. Persons admitted into the church by baptism, ought to be well instructed, as soon as capable of it, in the nature, use, and end of the sacraments; acquainting them not only with the nature of the outward sign, but with the necessity of the inward grace. 4. The doctrine of laying on of hands, to confirm the baptized persons in the faith, and to oblige and enable them to keep the covenant they entered into with God, when they were baptized; which was done before their admission to the Lord's table. Imposition, or laying on of hands, was an ancient and venerable rite, used in the primitive church upon several occasions; particularly, in ordination, in absolution of penitents, in healing the sick, in conferring the gifts of the Holy Ghost, Acts viii. 17. And, lastly, in confirmation, when baptized persons were brought before the church to acknowledge, confirm, and renew their baptismal covenant with God; and to receive the benefit of public prayer, and episcopal benediction, in order to the farther endowments of grace to perform their vows, adorn their profession, and be admitted to the Lord's table, as complete members of the visible church of Christ. 5. The resurrection of the dead, a doctrine denied by the Sadducees, derided by the Athenian philosophers, and perverted by heretics; but is a fundamental principle of the gospel; the faith whereof is indispensibly necessary unto our consolation, and has a peculiar influence upon our obedience. This is the animating principle of gospel obedience, because we are assured that our services shall not only be remembered, but rewarded also. 6. The eternal judgment, which will doom men to everlasting rewards and punishments in a future state. The ministers of the gospel ought to dwell much upon this fundamental principle of religion, to represent the dread and terror of that eternal day to all men, to the intent they may be excited and stirred up to take effectual care that they fall not under the vengeance of that fatal day. These six principles being laid down by the apostle, he tells them his resolution, to endeavour the carrying of them on to a more perfect degree and measure of knowledge in the mysteries of the gospel; in order to their becoming skilful in the word of righteousness: Leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ, let us go on unto perfection; which we will do, if God permit.

4 For it is impossible for those who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, 5 And have tasted of the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come; 6 If they shall fall away, to renew them again unto repentance: seeing they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame.

By the enlightened here, understand those that were baptized and embraced Christianity: The ancients called baptism illumination, and baptized persons the enlightened; because of the divine illumination which was conveyed to the minds of men by the knowledge of Christianity. By tasting the heavenly gift, and being made partakers of the Holy Ghost, understand such as had not only heard of the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghost, but had some experience of them themselves; as also of the spiritual benefits conferred upon them in baptism, by the Holy Spirit. By tasting the good word of God, understand some relish of the truth and goodness of the gospel, some pleasure in entertaining it, by reason of the gracious promises of eternal life and happiness contained in it. The gospel that proclaimed remission of sins, was a good word; this good word they saw confirmed by miracles, tongues, and prophecy, and so could not but be convinced of the truth of it, which is here called a tasting it; who have tasted the good word of God: It follows, and the powers of the world to come; that is, the power of the gospel-age; for the world to come, in the language of the prophets, doth signify the times of the Messiah:

Messiah: and thus, the powers of the world to come, are the miraculous powers of the Holy Ghost bestowed upon men, in order to the propagation of the gospel; such were the gifts of healing, casting out devils, working miracles. Others, by losing the powers of the world to come, understand some apprehensions of the resurrection and future judgment, with affections suitable thereunto. Now concerning these, says our apostle, if they fall away; that is, if they shall, after all this, apostatize from this profession, out of love to this present world, or from fear of persecution and sufferings, if they shall relapse either to heathenism or Judaism, it is impossible to renew them again to repentance: that is, it is a thing very difficult, hardly to be hoped for, that such wilful apostates should be restored again by repentance; seeing they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame; that is, they virtually, and in effect crucify him over again, as much as in them lies: For, denying and renouncing of him, they declare him to be an impostor, and consequently worthy of death. So that the plain sense of the words seems to be this? "If those that are baptized, and have received the doctrines of the gospel, and are endowed with the gifts of the holy Ghost, shall yet, after this, apostatize from Christianity, it is very difficult, and next to an impossibility, to recover such again by repentance; seeing they are guilty of as great a crime, as if in their own persons, they had put to death, and ignominiously used the Son of God." Here note, That it is not a partial apostasy from the Christian religion, by any particular vicious practice, but a total apostasy from Christianity, and more especially to the Heathen idolatry, which is here intended. From the whole learn, 1. That they which have been enlightened, awakened, and made partakers of the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit in some measure, and tasted the sweetness of the word and ways of God in some degree, may yet fall away. 2. That if such do fall away, it is very difficult, though not altogether impossible, to renew them again to repentance: And that for these reasons; 1. Because of the greatness and heinous nature of the sin, it being a downright apostasy from God, against the clearest light and knowledge, and fullest conviction of a man's mind; and the highest affront to the Son of God, who revealed the Christian religion to the world, and sealed it with his blood. 2. Because those who are guilty of this sin, do renounce and cast off the means of their recovery, and therefore it becomes extremely difficult to renew them again to repentance: They reject Christ and his holy gospel, and refuse the only remedy appointed for their recovery. 3. Because it is so high a provocation to God, to withdraw his grace and Holy Spirit from such persons, by the power and efficacy whereof they should be brought to repentance: God justly leaving those who so unworthily leave him. Lord! how fearful and fatal a condition is it, to begin in the spirit, and end in the flesh; to decay in religion, and apostatize from grace; to have had some work of the Spirit and word upon our hearts, so as to have light and love, some taste and favour of religion, some desires after, and hopes of heaven; and, after all, to cool and give over, and revolt and backslide, and have our latter end worse than our beginning? Seeing they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, &c.

7 For the earth that drinketh in the rain that cometh oft upon it, and bringeth forth herbs meet for them, by whom it is dressed, receiveth blessing from God: 8 But that which beareth thorns and briars is rejected, and is nigh unto cursing; whose end is to be burned.

The design and scope of our apostle in these words is threefold. 1. To set forth the excellency and necessity of the gospel, dispensed to us in the ministry of the word; he compares it to rain, which doth soften, refresh, and fructify the earth. 2. He discovers the different effect which the word of God, or the doctrine of the gospel, has upon different persons that sit under the preaching and dispensation of it; the sincere Christian becomes fruitful under the dews and showers of divine grace, and receives a blessing; but the barren and fruitless professor is like an howling wilderness, or dry desert, which, after innumerable refreshing showers, brings forth nothing but briars and thorns. 3. He declares the different state and condition of such persons. A people that answers God's care and cost, is like a field that drinks in the rain, bringeth forth herbs, and receives a blessing. But such a people, as, after all the refreshing showers from heaven, and after all the culture and labour of God's husbandmen on earth, shall remain bushes and briars, barren and unfruitful under all, or worse, than such; they are nigh unto cursing and their end is to be burned. Blessing attends the one, burning awaits the other. Note, 1. That what the rain is to the earth, that is the word of God, and the doctrine of the gospel to the souls of men. Is the rain of heavenly extraction? So is the word of God. Does the rain fall by divine perfection? So does the word preached. Does the rain distill down gradually and successively, not all at once? So does the word fall, here a little, and there a little. Does the rain mollify and soften, revive and refresh, fructify and make fruitful where it falls? So does the word preached, Col. i. 6. The word of the gospel is come unto you, and bringeth forth fruit, since the day you heard of it. In a word, as after plenty of rain there follows a great drought, and want of rain; so after a long and plentiful enjoyment of the gospel, if people do not prize and improve their mercies, God will cut them short, and deprive them of them. Note, 2. That it is possible for a people to sit long under the ministry of the word, that spiritual rain, that celestial dew may be daily dropping and distilling down upon them, and yet that people may be bush and briar after all; barren and unfruitful in the account of God. 3. That a people so remaining, and under such advantages, are nigh unto cursing, and their end is to be burned. Barrenness under the dispensation of the gospel, is always accompanied with an increase of sin, and of condemnation also: Those that are not, because they will not be healed and reformed by the preaching of the gospel, are righteously given up by God to extreme obstinacy, and final obduration.

9 But, beloved, we are persuaded better things of you, and things that accompany salvation, though we thus speak. 10 For God is not unrighteous, to forget your work and labour of love which ye have shewed shewed towards his name, in that ye have ministered to the saints, and do minister.

Observe here, 1. The holy wisdom of our apostle, in molifying the severity of the foregoing communication and prediction; and the good hope, and firm persuasion he had of the Hebrews perseverance in grace unto salvation, notwithstanding all the cautions and warnings he gave them of apostasy and apostates: I am persuaded better things of you, though I thus speak. We may represent the ugly and filthy face of sin to our best friends, to the end that they may hate it, and escape it: We may be confident of another's sincerity, and, as occasion requires, publicly testify that confidence to themselves: We are persuaded better things of you. Observe, 2. The ground of this confidence declared: 1. The graces of God's Spirit found operative to them; their faith in Christ, and love to all his members; it was a working faith and laborious love that was found with them they have administered to the saints, and do minister. Behold the nature of Christian love, it is an immortal fire, ever burning, never dying. 2. Another ground of this persuasion, was the knowledge of God's faithfulness in remembering and rewarding this their labour of love: God is not unrighteous to forget your work, and labour of love; that is, God is righteous, and will certainly remember and reward your faith, your charity, and good works; for he has promised so to do, and he is faithful that has promised: Learn hence, 1. That faith, if it be a living faith, will be a working faith. Obedience is the fruit of faith, and we ought to look on obedience as our work. 2. That it is the will and pleasure of God, that many of the saints and servants in this world be in such a condition, wherein they stand in need of being ministered unto. 3. That the best evidence we can have of the sincerity of our love, is its readiness to minister to the saints in all distresses. 4. That to minister to the saints in all distresses. 4. That both the labour of our sufferings, and the labour of our services shall be remembered, and rewarded by a righteous God: God is not unrighteous to forget, &c.

11 And we desire that every one of you do shew the same diligence, to the full assurance of hope unto the end.

Note here, 1. That although the apostle had a firm persuasion, that they were sincere and upright, and would hold on their way, yet he exhorts them to shew the same diligence which they had done, and to persevere to the end, as they had begun. Learn hence, That ministerial exhortation unto duty is needful, even unto them that are sincere in the practice of it, that they may abide and continue therein: we desire that you shew diligence unto the end. Note, 1. The special duty he exhorts them to, and that is to attain a full assurance of hope. Hope is a certain and assured expectation of good things promised, accompanied with love, and a longing desire to enjoy them. A full assurance of hope, is such a fixed, constant, and prevailing persuasion, concerning the good things promised, and our certain enjoyment of them, as will support us under, and carry us through all the difficulties and troubles we conflict with. Learn, That a good man may, in this life, arrive at an assurance of faith and hope, as touching the goodness of his condition in the life to come. The original word signifies a full gale of hope, a metaphor taken from sailors who enter the harbour with a full gale of wind both with facility and safety. The Christian's soul is a ship sailing in a tempestuous sea: Faith represents the pilot, love the sail, hope the wind that must fill the sail: be the pilot never so confident, the sail spread to the utmost, yet, without a gale of wind the ship lies becalmed, moves not towards the harbour. A Christian on earth without hope, is as a ship at sea without wind. 2. The special means directed to, in order to the attaining of this full assurance of hope, and that is, to shew diligence, the same diligence, and that to the end. Learn thence, That Christians ought by no means to wax secure, but to use all diligence to the end of their lives, for the heightening of their hope to a full assurance.

12 That ye be not slothful, but followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises.

Our apostle, having exhorted the Hebrews to great diligence in good works in the former verse, in this verse endeavours to excite and provoke them to it by the examples of deceased saints, who are now reaping the reward of their former pains, and inheriting the promises. Here note, 1. A cautionary direction given, that ye be not slothful, either timorous and faint-hearted, or remiss and negligent. God having engaged so firmly on his part, to let nothing be wanting which is requisite to enable us to persevere: if we miss of the promise, that is, of heaven, the good promised; we must thank our own sloth for it. 2. The great duty exhorted to, and that is, to be followers of the saints; be followers of them, that is, vigorously and constantly imitate them in their graces and gracious conversations. The graces of the saints (whether living or dead) are patterns presented to our imitation. 3. The particular and special graces in the saints which we are to imitate and follow, namely, their faith and patience: their faith, that is, their firm trust in God, and belief of his promises, relying on his word under all trials: and their patience, that is, their perseverance in well-doing, and patient expectation under all delays, and constant adherence to him under all difficulties. Learn hence, 1. That heaven is not ours by purchase, but by promise. 2. That heaven is a promised inheritance, which saints, by faith and patience, have possessed. 3. That by being followers of them in their faith and patience, we may also come with them to inherit the promises.

13 For when God made promise to Abraham, because he could swear by no greater, he swore by himself, 14 Saying, Surely, blessing, I will bless thee, and multiplying, I will multiply thee. 15 And so after he had patiently endured, he obtained the promise.

The apostle having told us in general, that the saints by faith and patience do inherit the promises, instances here particularly in Abraham, unto whom God made a promise of multiplying his seed greatly to him, and confirmed that promise by an oath; but Abraham waited long by faith and patience for the complete fulfilling of the promise; and so must we, God delights to be trusted by his people upon his word and oath : and when they do not live to see the promise of God fulfilled, they glorify him exceedingly, by dying in the faith and firm belief, that it shall be fulfilled in God's own appointed time. Note here, The wonderful condescension of God towards the infirmity of men. he swears, he swears by himself, he pawns and pledges his Godhead, and if he performs not what he promises and swears, is willing to forfeit it. O felices nos ? Quorum causa Deus jurat ! O miserissimi ! Si nec juranti credamus. " O happy man ! For whose sake God condescends to swear. O miserable man ! if we doubt of God's promise confirmed by his oath, in which he has laid down his Godhead as a stake and pawn, never to take it up again, if she fails in the least jot in the punctual performance of it."

16 For men verily swear by the greater, and an oath for confirmation is to them an end of all strife.

These words contain a reason, why God, in gracious condescension to man's infirmity, is pleased to confirm his promise with an oath ; it is to determine a controversy, and put an end to all strife depending between God and the fallen creatures : And this is the general reason for an oath amongst men, it is to put bounds and limits to the contentions and contradictions of men ; to make an end of all strife between them, which otherwise would be perpetuated and to bring the to a mutual acquiescency : An oath for confirmation is the end of all strife. Learn hence, 1. That there is, as we are in a state of nature, a strife and difference between God and us. 2. That the promises of the gospel are gracious proposals of the only way and means for the ending of that strife. 3. That the oath of God interposed for the confirmation of these promises, is every way sufficient on God's part, to put a period to this strife, and to establish a firm peace with us through the blood of Christ.

17 Wherein God willing more abundantly to shew unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath : 18 That by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation,—

Here the apostle acquaints with the design of God in confirming his promise, namely, to manifest the immutability of his counsel to us ; that is, by his decree and purpose for our salvation ; to the intent, that by his word and oath we might have strong consolation. So unspeakable is the weakness of our faith, that we stand in need of the utmost condescension of God for its confirmation. Note here, That God has made many promises for the confirmation of his people's faith. God's oath is a surety for his promises ; and that God's end, both in his promise and his oath is to give his people the highest assurance, and strongest consolation. Quest. Why are we so hard to believe God upon his single word ; yea, can scarce trust him upon his oath ? Ans. Because of our guilt ; now guilt is always full of fear, and fear full of suspicion and distrust ; and because the way of reconciliation is so rare and wonderful, that we can scarce conceive it, much less believe it ; also the privileges of the gospel are so glorious, that they exceed our belief : and because we ourselves are so false and fickle, both with God and one another, that promises, vows, and oaths, are all little enough to hold us. Now we are apt to measure God by ourselves, therefore he gives us his oath. Inference, 1. How ought we to bind ourselves to God by oath, seeing he condescends thus to bind himself to us ? 2. How unreasonable it is for the believer to distrust God upon his oath ? This is not only to accuse God of a lie, but to impeach him of perjury. 3. How absurd is it for the impenitent sinner not to tremble at the threatenings of God, which are confirmed by an oath, as well as his promises ? I have sworn in my wrath, &c.

—Who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us :

In these words there is an allusion to the cities of refuge spoken of under the law : God appointed six of them for those to fly unto, who were guilty of casual homicide, or killing a man by chance, that so they might avoid the fury of the avenger of blood. Now these cities of refuge were an illustrious type of Christ. Note here, 1. Christ is the believer's city of refuge, the only sanctuary for distressed souls. 2. That believer's do by faith fly unto him for refuge when the goils of sin, and the wrath of God for sin, do pursue and follow them. This flying for refuge doth imply diligence and earnestness, as in the case of life and death, yea, unwearied diligence ; and it implies continuance in this refuge, when once got into into it, not to stir out of it for all the world. Lord ! open the eyes, and awaken the consciences of an impenitent sinners, make them sensible that the avenger of blood is at their heels, and that their damnation slumbers not, if they do not presently fly from the wrath to come, and take sanctuary in thy Son.

19 Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the veil.

In these words we have the nature of a Christian's hope described, 1. By a metaphorical : 2. By a typical similitude. (1.) Observe the metaphor made use of, to set forth the nature and office of hope, it is compared to an anchor ; which hope we have as an anchor of the soul. Doth the anchor hold fast the ship, and keep it steady, both in storms and tempests, and in the midst of the most tumultuous waves ? In like manner, the hope of eternal glory quiets, stays, and strengthens the Christians' spirit, when tossed upon the waves of this troublesome world. Learn hence, 1. That believers are exposed to many storms and tempests here in this world ; their afflictions, persecutions, temptations, fears, &c, are compared fitly to storms, because of their fierceness and violence and because of their tendency to ruin and destruction. 2. That these storms would prove ruinous to the souls of believers, did not hope, the anchor of the soul, take fast hold on the promises of the gospel, which keep the Christian firm and invincible against all oppositions. Observe, 2. Hope is described by a typical similitude, it entereth into that within the veil. The veil here alluded to, is that which parted the holy of holies from the body of the temple a type of heaven. The heavens are as a veil to the sense and reason of man, there their sight and their thoughts are bounded, they can neither discern nor judge of any thing that is above or within that veil: But faith and hope pierceth through it; no created thing can keep them at a distance from God himself. As the anchor stays not in the waves of the sea, but pierces through them all till it comes to the solid bottom; so the Christian's hope fixes on nothing under heaven; but pierces through all, till it entereth into that within the veil; that is, till it fixes on God as the author, on Christ as the purchaser on the Spirit as the insurer, on the covenant as the conveyer of all grace, mercy, and peace. Here hope fixes itself, to hold the soul firm and stedfast in all the storms that may befall it. Learn hence, 1. That the hope and faith of believers are invisible unto the world; they enter within the veil, where the world's eye can never follow them. 2. That hope firmly fixed on God in Christ by the promise, will hold the soul steady, and keep the Christian right, in all the storms that may befall it.

20 Whether the forerunner is for us entered, even Jesus, made an high priest forever after the order of Melchisedec.

Observe here, The person spoken of, Christ; the subject matter spoken of him, his entering into heaven; and the quality in which he entered heaven; namely, as our forerunner. This denotes, 1. His public capacity, that he entered heaven in our name, and to negotiate our affairs. 2. His absolute precedency, he is our forerunner, but he himself had no forerunner, none entered before him in their own names, but in his, and upon his account, through the virtue of his merits, and by the prevalency of his mediation. Learn hence, 1. That there is a place and state of happiness above, prepared for pious souls, which Christ is entered into, and has taken possession of: This place may be considered in its amplitude and largeness, in its stability and firmness, in its sanctity and holiness, in its pleasure and delightfulness, in its glory and blessedness, in its eternity and everlastingness: And this place is by Christ prepared for believers; namely, by his death and satisfaction, by his resurrection and ascension, by his mediation and intercession. 2. That our Lord Jesus Christ is not only entered into heaven, but entered as our forerunner, to take and keep possession of it in the name and stead of all believers. To enter heaven as our forerunner, implies, that he entered in our natures, that he keeps possession of it in our names: As sure as the Head is gone before the members, so certainly shall the members follow their Head; as a forerunner supposes others to follow after; and it implies, that Christ will put us into the actual possession of heaven in his own time. Inference, 1. Is Christ gone before to heaven, then let us be willing to follow him in the way of obedience, and in the way of suffering, as well as to meet him in the end. 2. To make haste after him. Did he fly as an eagle towards heaven, and shall we creep like a snail? Is not the bosom of Christ more desirable than the arms of our dearst friends? Shall we not enjoy all comforts in the enjoyment of our Comforter? 3. Let our hearts at present be with him. O! Where should our hearts be, but where our Head is?

CHAP. VII.

Our apostle in this chapter continues his discourse concerning the priesthood of our Lord Jesus Christ, shewing us wherein Melchisedec was a type of Christ.

FOR this Melchisedec king of Salem, priest of the most high God, who met Abraham returning from the slaughter of the kings; and blessed him; 2 To whom also Abraham gave a tenth part of all: first being by interpretation king of righteousness. and after that also, king of Salem, which is king of peace; 3 Without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days, nor end of life; but made like unto the Son of God, abideth a priest continually.

Here observe, 1. The person spoken of described by his name, Melchisedec. Some take this Melchisedec to be Shem the son of Noah; but this cannot be, because his genealogy is exactly set down by Moses. Others take him to be one of the posterity of Japhet, the father of the Gentiles: In the midst of these sinners, above others, was Melchisedec raised up an illustrious type of Christ, the promised Messiah. See here, how God can raise up instruments for his service, and unto his glory, when, where, and how he pleaseth. And learn hence, that this signal prefiguration of Christ, in the nations of the world, at the same time when Abraham received the promises for himself and his posterity, gave a pledge and assurance of the certain future call of the Gentiles unto an interest in him and participation of him. 2. Melchisedec is here described by his office; he was king of Salem, and a priest of the Most High God; yea, the first that was so by special institution, and separated to the office by God's approbation: None went before him, and none succeeded him in his office. Here note, That the first personal instituted type of Christ, was Melchisedec, as priest; for in his kingly office he was not so directly typical of Christ. There were moral types of Christ's person before Melchisedec, as Adam, Abel, and Noah, which represented him in sundry things: But the first person, who was solemnly designed to represent Christ by what he was and did, was Melchisedec the priest, teaching us, that the foundation of all that the Lord Christ had to do in and for the church, was laid in his priestly office, whereby he made atonement, and reconciliation for sin. 3. Melchisedec is described by several actions and circumstances. (1.) He met Abraham returning from the slaughter of the kings: This meeting of Melchisedec and Abraham, after Abraham had gotten the victory over all his adversaries, was a type and representation of the glorious meeting of Christ and his church at the last day; then he will bring out of his stores in heaven for their eternal refreshment, as Melchisedec brought forth bread and wine to refresh Abraham returning from the slaughter of the kings. (2.) He blessed him, Gen. xiv. 19. And Melchisedec said, Blessed be Abraham of the most High God, possessor of heaven and earth. Sacerdotal blessings were authoritative, and that by special institution. In this blessing of Abraham by Melchisedec, all believers are virtually blessed by Jesus Christ:

Christ: Melchisedec represented Christ in what he then did, and Abraham represented all his believing posterity, in what he then received. (3.) Another sacerdotal act, or exercise of priestly power ascribed to Melchisedec, is, that he received of Abraham tithes of all; the one paid them in a way of duty, the other received them in a way of office. Note here, The antiquity of tithes, and how very ancient they were; they were paid in Abraham's time, long before the ceremonial law, and therefore cannot be said to be Jewish and Levitical. The patriarchs before the law, the Jews under the law, and the Christians in times of the gospel, have all paid this proportion: From whence some have concluded, that as the seventh part of our time, so the tenth part of our goods and estates were given to God from the beginning; the Lord of all our time, and proprietor of all our estate. Whatsoever we receive signally from God, in a way of mercy, we ought to return a portion of it to him in a way of duty. It is a certain sign that a man has not engaged God in getting an estate, when he will not entitle him to any portion of it when it is gotten. Observe, 4. The apostle proceeds unto other instances in the description of Melchisedec, wherein he was made like unto the Son of God, ver. 3. Without father, without mother, &c. which expressions must not be understood absolutely, but tropically, not of Melchisedec as a man, but as a priest; for as a man he had certainly both father and mother, though not recorded in scripture; he was assuredly born, and did not less certainly die than other men; but neither his beginning of days, nor end of life, are registered or rehearsed, that he might be the fitter type of Christ, concerning whom it is said, Who can declare his generation? But though Melchisedec, as a man, had father and mother, yet as a priest he had no predecessor nor successor; no predecessor from whom he might by birth receive his sacerdotal power; no successor who derived his priesthood from him: Now herein also was Melchisedec an illustrious type in Christ, who derived his priesthood from no mortal predecessor, but immediately from his heavenly Father; neither will he transmit it to any successor, but when all enemies are subdued, he shall resign his priesthood, together with his kingdom, to God the Father, who gave him both. 5. What is here asserted concerning Melchisedec; namely, that he abideth a priest for ever; that is, things are so related concerning him in Scripture, as that there is no mention of the ending of the priesthood of his order. We read of no resignation of his office, or of the succession of any person to him therein; and thus he remaineth a priest for ever. This was that which our apostle did principally design to confirm from hence, namely, that there was in the Scripture, before the institution of the Aaronical priesthood, a representation of an eternal unchangeable priesthood, to be introduced in the church; which he demonstrates to be that of Jesus Christ, of which Melchisedec's priesthood was a type.

8 Now consider how great this man was, unto whom even the patriarch Abraham gave the tenth of the spoils.

The words are the apostle's application of what was before discoursed; by comparing Melchisedec's excellency with Abraham's, he shews Christ's excellency above Melchisedec's, and he calls upon them to consider this; consider how great this man was. It will be fruitless, and to no advantage, to propose and declare the most important truths of the gospel, if those unto whom they are proposed do not diligently enquire into them, and duly ponder and consider of them. The Hebrews are here called upon to consider: But what? And whom? Why, who Melchisedec was, and how great a man he was? Note here, that the greatness of Melchisedec did not respect either the endowments of his person, or the largeness of his dominion, or his riches and wealth, in which sense some are said to be great in scripture: but he is pronounced great with respect to his office, and in regard of his nearness to God on that account, as also in his representing our Lord Jesus Christ. Observe farther, The proof here given of the greatness of Melchisedec, in that no meaner person than Abraham, than Abraham the Patriarch, did give the tenth part of the spoils unto him. Here remark, That notwithstanding the highest advantages and privileges which Abraham was possessed of, which rendered him almost adored by his posterity, yet when the meanest duty was presented to him, he readily complied with it. The highest privileges neither can or ought to exempt any person from the performance of the meanest duty. Duty is our highest honour, and chiefest advantage; but privileges, promotions, dignities, and exaltations, may become snares, and end in the ruin of men's souls. When a person is dignified and advanced in the church, if thereby he thinks himself exempted from the ordinary service of the ministry, he is guilty of horrid pride and ingratitude: But if he farther indulge himself in the course of idleness, sloth, sensuality, and worldliness, these are crimes unpardonable, and want a name to express them.

5 And verily they that are of the sons of Levi, who receive the office of the priesthood, have a commandment to take tithes of the people according to the law, that is, of their brethren, though they come out of the loins of Abraham. 6 But he, whose descent is not counted from them, received tithes of Abraham, and blessed him that had the promises. 7 And without all contradiction the less is blessed of the better.

Still the apostle goes on to give Melchisedec the preference above Abraham, and from thence to infer, that Christ whom Melchisedec typified, was much more excellent than Abraham, and all the Levitical priests which sprang from him. The argument lies thus: "The law allowed Aaron and the other priests to take tithes of their brethren that sprang from Abraham; but Melchisedec received tithes of Abraham, who was none of his people, yea, and blessed Abraham also, which is a demonstration that he was greater than Abraham; and consequently it is evident, that Christ is greater than the Jewish priests; to bless authoritatively, is an act of superiority: Now Melchisedec blessed Abraham, he is therefore greater than Abraham; because he that blessed is greater than he whom he blesseth." Behold here the excellency of the office of God's ministers, ministers, namely, to bless the people in God's name: They bless authoritatively, they bless declaratively, they bless optatively. God help them to take heed, lest, by their miscarriages, they prove a snare and a curse unto them whom they ought to bless.

8 And here men that die receive tithes: but there he receiveth them, of whom it is witnessed that he liveth.

Our apostle still carrieth on the same argument, proving Melchisedec's priesthood to surpass and excel the Aaronical and Levitical priesthood in the immortality of it: As the less is blessed of the greater, so is that which is immortal greater and better than what is mortal; But such is Melchisedec, and his order of priesthood. Indeed, in the Levitical order of priesthood, though the priests be superior to the people, and take tithes of them, yet they do die as well as the people: But we read not a word of Melchisedec's death, he is a priest for ever; that is, he did typically prefigure Christ, who doth properly and indeed live for ever. Melchisedec ever lives secundum historiam, Christ secundum veritatem. Learn hence, That the life of the church depends upon the everlasting life of Jesus Christ; He liveth for ever, when ministers die or have their mouths stopped. This great High Priest lives, upon whom the life and preservation, the continuance and salvation of the church does depend: Here men die that receive tithes. Note, From their mortality, that in the outward administration of God's worship, he is pleased to make use of the ministry of frail, mortal, dying men. Zach. i. 5. The prophets do they live for ever? Hereby it does evidently appear, that it is the power of God, and nothing else, which gives efficacy and succels to all gospel administrations, 2 Cor iv. 7. We have this treasure in earthen vessels, &c.

9 And as I may so say, Levi also, who receiveth tithes, paid tithes in Abraham. 10 For he was yet in the loins of his father when Melchisedec met him.

By Levi, we are to understand the Levites, or the Levitical priesthood; they being in Abraham's loins, are said to pay tithes in Abraham to Melchisedec, which the apostle produces as an evidence, that Melchisedec is superior to the Levites, and greater than they; and consequently, that Christ, whom Melchisedec did typify, must needs be more excellent than they also. The argument runs thus: They who receive tithes of others, are certainly superior to them of whom they do receive them; but Melchisedec received tithes of Abraham, and of Levi in Abraham's loins; therefore he is superior to them, and of a more excellent order than they: which is the great truth he hath been so industriously proving.

11 If therefore perfection were by the Levitical priesthood (for under it the people received the law) what farther need was there that another priest should rise after the order of Melchisedec, and not be called after the order of Aaron? 12 For the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law.

If perfection, that is, a perfect expiation and remission of sin, could have been made by the sacrifice which the legal priests offered, there should then have been no need that God should institute a priest of another and more excellent order, namely, his own Son, to be a priest after Melchisedec's order, and not after the order of Aaron. Where note. That perfection is denied in the Levitical priesthood, and ascribed to the priesthood of Christ. To perfect sinful man, is to free him from the guilt of sin, and from the direful and dismal consequences of sin, and to make him righteous and holy, capable of communion with God, both here and hereafter. Now this the Levitical priesthood could not do. But Jesus Christ has by one offering perfected for ever them that are sanctified, chap. x. 14. Thus the apostle infers the necessity of changing the priesthood: And next he tells us, ver. 12. That the change of the Levitical priesthood necessarily draweth along with it a change of the Levitical law, and the legal dispensation of the covenant of grace; for the Levitical priesthood and the Levitical law do both stand and fall together: The priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law. By the changing of the priesthood, understand the abolition of it; by the change of the law, understand the abrogation of it; by the word necessity, understand that the change was not casual and contingent, but absolutely needful, in regard of the imperfection and inability of the Levitical priesthood to effect any such thing. Learn hence, That the promulgation of the gospel, and the institution of Christianity, did abrogate the Levitical law, and make it of no force. This might be the reason why God did not only by the death and sacrifice of Christ, the great High Priest, abolish the Levitical priesthood, but also destroyed the temple itself, where he had put his name, and never suffered it to be rebuilt; denoting thereby the utter abolition of the Levitical priesthood, and the total abrogation of the ceremonial law.

13 For he of whom these things are spoken pertaineth to another tribe, of which no man gave attendance at the altar. 14 For it is evident that our Lord sprang out of Judah: of which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning priesthood.

In the foregoing verses, our apostle had asserted the change of the priesthood, and thereby the changing of the law. In these verses he proves it by the translation of the priesthood to another tribe; namely, from Levi to Judah. The Levitical priesthood was confined to one certain tribe, that of Levi, and to one certain family, that of Aaron: Whence it follows, that the tribe being changed, and God having instituted a priest of another tribe, the priesthood must be changed also. Now it being evident, that Christ sprang not of the tribe of Levi, but out of Judah, the apostle, from the changing of the tribe, strongly infers the change of the priesthood. Note here, 1. How it was a fruit of the manifold wisdom of God, and a very great mercy and favour to give the law, law, but a far greater to take it away, 2. If under the law, the whole worship of God did so depend on the priesthood, that, that failing, the whole worship was to cease, as being no more acceptable to God, how much more will all worship under the New Testament be rejected by him, if there be not a due regard therein to our Lord Jesus Christ, as the great and only High Priest of his church.

15 And it is yet far more evident: for that after the similitude of Melchisedec there ariseth another priest. 16 Who is made, not after the law of a carnal commandment, but after the power of an endless life. 17 For he testifieth, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec.

That the Aaronical priesthood was to be changed, and consequently the whole law of ordinances that depended thereupon, and that the time was now come wherein this change was to be made, is the grand truth which our apostle here designs the confirmation of; it being indeed that truth, wherinto our faith of the acceptance of evangelical worship is resolved: And accordingly he gives a farther proof of the change of the priesthood from the different manner of the priest's consecration. Thus the Levitical priest was set apart to his office by a number of carnal rites and outward ceremonies, which the law prescribed to be used at the consecration of Aaron and his sons, who were purified with water, anointed with oil, sprinkled with blood, clothed with priestly vestments, initiated with sacrifices, administered in an earthly tabernacle and temple. But says our apostle, the evangelical or gospel High Priest, Christ Jesus, was not constituted thus, or made a priest with such carnal rites and outward ceremonies, but with the power of an endless life: That is, he was consecrated Priest by the power of the Holy Ghost, having an immortal life suitable to his priesthood, an authority to give eternal life to as many as depend upon the benefit of his sacrifice and satisfaction, He was made, not after the law of a carnal commandment (with corporeal ceremony and carnal duration) but after the spiritual power of an endless life. Learn hence, That all the outward ceremony which seemed to be wanting unto Christ, in his entrance into his priestly office, was on the account of a greater glory. Aaron was made a priest with great outward solemnity, Christ with none at all; yet all Aaron's ceremonial glory was nothing in comparison of that excellent glory which accompanied those invisible acts of divine authority, wisdom, and grace, which communicated Christ's office unto him.

18 For there is verily a disannulling of the commandment going before, for the weakness and unprofitableness thereof. 19 For the law made nothing perfect, but the bringing in of a better hope did; by the which we draw nigh unto God.

Now the apostle comes to declare, that the Levitical priesthood being abolished, and the ceremonial law abrogated, the whole state of the church, and the solemn worship of God therein, must necessarily be changed also. This he foresaw would be a mighty surprisal to the generality of the Hebrews, to hear that they must quit all their concern and special interest in the law of Moses; and therefore he assigns a double reason for the abrogation and disannulling of that law; the weakness and unprofitableness thereof. Not that the law was weak in itself, or unprofitable to the end for which God made it; namely, to lead them to Christ, but weak and unprofitable for justification and salvation. They expected expiation of sin, sanctification and holiness by it, without any regard to Christ and his sacrifice, by whom alone it could be obtained. Those things the law could not effect in its best estate; how vain was it then for the Jews to expect them when it was abolished? Observe next, How the apostle proves the law to be weak and unprofitable, because it made nothing perfect, The law, that is, the whole system of the Mosaical ordinances, the legal covenant, made nothing perfect; that is, no person, how strictly soever he observed, could be justified and saved by it: It could not of itself cleanse from sin, reconcile us to God, justify our persons, sanctify our natures, and procure salvation for us. Lastly, Though the ceremonial law made nothing perfect, yet the gospel law, called here a better hope, because the promises of it are a good ground of hope, has efficacy, power and virtue, to do all those things for us, and by it we have freedom of access to God, The law made nothing perfect, &c. Learn hence, 1. That the law could not justify or sanctify any person, nor make him perfect, by reconciling him to God, and procuring salvation for him. 2. That believers of old who lived under the law, did not live upon the law, but upon the hope of Christ, or Christ hoped for; could justification and salvation have been had any other way, or by any other mean, Christ's coming had been needless, and his death in vain. 3. That the introduction of a better hope by the gospel, after a sufficient discovery made of the weakness and insufficiency of the law, did make all things perfect, or bring the church to that state of consummation, which was designed unto it. 4. That when all mankind were at an inconceivable distance from God, it was infinite condescension of grace to appoint his own Son, who was the blessed hope of the saints under the Old Testament, to be the only way and mean of our approaching unto him. When the law made nothing perfect, &c.

20 And inasmuch as not without an oath he was made priest: 21 For those priests were made without an oath; but this with an oath, by him that said unto him, The Lord swears and will not repent, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec: 22 By so much was Jesus made a surety of a better testament.

Our apostle has not yet done with his several arguments to prove the transcendent excellency of Christ's priesthood above that of Aaron's: His argument in the verses now before us lies thus; he that is made an unchangeable priest by the oath of God, is a better, greater, and more excellent priest, than any made so without it. But whereas the Levitical priests were made without an oath, by a law changeable at the will of the lawgiver; Jesus Christ was made a Priest by the unchangeable oath of God. The Lord swears and will not repent, Thou art a priest for ever. Learn hence, hence, 1. That nothing was wanting on the part of God, that might either give eminency and glory, or stability and efficacy to the priesthood of Christ: This was both due to the glory of his person, and also needful to encourage and secure the faith of the church. 2. That Jesus Christ, our great High Priest, being initiated into his office by the oath of God, his priesthood is liable to no alteration, succession, or substitution; but the church may continually draw nigh to God, in full assurance of his meritorious satisfaction and prevailing intercession, and receive from thence a solid foundation of peace and consolation: By so much was Jesus made a surety of a better testament. Observe here, 1. The title given the gospel-covenant, it is here called a better testament: But not for the substance, but for clearness; for substance, the old covenant dispensation and the new are the same; but the latter is made more clear, more free, more full, more surely ratified, by the death of Christ, and accompanied with a more mighty operation of the Spirit of God. 2. The title here given to Christ, he is the surety of a better testament. Our surety, because our sacrifice. The Socinians own Christ to be the surety of the covenant in respect of his holy life, and exemplary death, sealing it as a testimony by his blood, but deny him to be a surety in respect of his satisfaction, merit, and intercession. But alas! as our sinful condition requires a mediator of redemption, so our changeable condition requires a mediator of intercession; and, blessed be God, he has appointed one for both, even his own and only Son, who is the surety of a better testament. Learn thence, That the Lord Jesus was not only made a surety on God's part to us, to assure us, that the promise of the covenant on his part, should be performed, but was also a surety on our part, to furnish us with that grace and assistance which shall enable us to do, answer, and perform all that is required on our part, that we may enjoy the benefit of the covenant, grace here, and glory hereafter. Christ has undertaken, as surety of the covenant, first, to satisfy for sin, by offering himself a propitiatory sacrifice; and next to furnish forth a sufficiency of grace to enable for the fulfilling the conditions of the gospel-covenant. Thus was Jesus the surety of this better covenant.

23 And they truly were many priests, because they were not suffered to continue by reason of death: 24 But this man, because he continueth ever, hath an unchangeable priesthood.

Now our apostle is come to his last argument, by which he proves the excellency of Christ's priesthood above that of Aaron. The Levitical priests, he says, were many and mortal; their mortality was the cause of their multitude: they were cut off by death, and succeeded one another; but Christ is the one and the same to his church, yesterday, today, and for ever; he had no partner, has no successor, but executes an everlasting unchangeable priesthood in his own person. Note here, 1. That the multiplication of priests, particularly of high priests under the legal dispensation, was a manifest evidence of the imperfection of it; from Aaron the first high priest, unto Phineas the last, who was destroyed with the temple, are reckoned fourscore and three high priests, who succeeded one another: of these, thirteen are said to live under the tabernacle, eighteen under the first temple built by Solomon, and all the rest under the second temple: The ground of which multiplication of priests was this, because they were not suffered to continue by reason of death. Learn, 1. That the priesthood of Christ, as unchangeably exercised in his own person, is perpetual; and its perpetuity is a principal part of the glory of that office. He continueth for ever, having an unchangeable priesthood. Quest. But did not Christ, our great High Priest, die as well as Aaron, and other high priests? Ans. Yes, he died as a priest, they died from being priests; he died as a priest, because he was also to be a sacrifice. The apostle doth not say, that he did not die, but that he always abideth; he abode a priest even in the state of death, and after his resurrection he became immortal, never to die more; he ever liveth, he dieth no more, death has no more dominion over him. See how he describes himself, Rev. i. 18. I am he that liveth, and was dead: and behold I am alive for evermore; and have the keys of hell and death.

25 Wherefore he is also able to save them to the uttermost, that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them.

These words are a comfortable inference and conclusion, which our apostle draws from his preceding discourse concerning the eternity and unchangeableness of Christ's priesthood; seeing he lives for ever, he is therefore able to save to the uttermost, and that for ever. Observe here, 1. The complete power and ability of Jesus Christ to save sinners asserted: He is able to save, and that to the uttermost; that is, completely and everlastingly. Learn hence, That whatever difficulties lie in the way of salvation, and whatever oppositions do arise against it, either with respect to the guilt of sin, or to the power and dominion of it, the Lord Jesus Christ is able by virtue of his sacerdotal office, and in the exercise of it, to carry on the work through them all unto eternal perfection: Such is the dignity of his person, such is the sufficiency of his satisfaction, that he expiates the guilt of sin universally and perpetually. Observe, 2. The character and description given of the persons whom Jesus Christ thus perfectly and eternally saves, Such as come unto God by him; those, all those, and only those, whom God will save, are such as come unto him for salvation by and through our Lord Jesus Christ as mediator. Oh how injurious then are they to their own souls, who sit down desponding, either under the guilt, or under the power of their sins, and conclude them either so great that they cannot be pardoned, or so strong that they can never be vanquished or overcome! 3. The reason of this power and ability in Christ to save sinners to the uttermost assigned, and that is, the eternity of his priesthood, the perpetuity and prevalency of his intercession; Seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them. Here note, 1. The state and condition of Christ as an High Priest, he ever liveth. He is always living in heaven a threefold life. (1.) The eternal life of God in his divine nature; this he liveth in himself. (2.) A life of inconceivable glory in his human nature; this is a life which he liveth for himself. (3.) A mediatory life in heaven; and this he lives for us. Note, 2. What

2. What he doth as an High Priest in that state and condition; He maketh intercession for us. Learn, That the Lord Jesus Christ ever liveth to make intercession with his Father in heaven, on the belief of all penitent believers here on earth. We are not to conceive of Christ as an intercessor with his Father in heaven, in such an humble supplicating manner as when here upon earth, with knees bended down, and eyes lifted up to heaven, this is inconsistent with his glorified state. But it is such a pleading and petitioning with his Father as is in the nature of a claim and demand; and it is such a claim and demand made to his Father, as is accompanied with the presenting the memorials of his death unto him. Christ need not use his mouth to plead with his Father in heaven, the bare shewing of his wounded body pleads prevalently and perpetually, and this intercession of Christ is a standing evidence of the continuance of his love and care, his pity and compassion to us. Blessed be God that our great High Priest, who suffered for us, ever liveth in heaven to make intercession for us.

26 For such an High Priest became us, who is holy, harmless, undefiled, separated from sinners, and made higher than the heavens;

Observe here, 1. Something supposed and necessarily implied, namely, That if we intend to come unto God, we had need of an High Priest to encourage and enable us thereunto; Such an High Priest became us; implying that without an High Priest in general we can do nothing in this matter. 2. The care and kindness of God in providing for us, not only an High Priest but such an High Priest as our condition required, one that has made atonement for us, procured acceptance, given us assistance, preserved us in grace, and will preserve us unto glory; behold the infinite wisdom, love, grace, and goodness of God, in giving such an High Priest, as in the qualification of his person, the glory of his condition, and the discharge of his office, was every way suited to deliver us from a state of apostasy, sin, and misery, and to bring us to himself through a perfect salvation. 3. The double character given of this High Priest in his purity. (1.) He is holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners. Thus he was in his conception, birth, life, and death, never tainted or stained with the least sin, but both habitually and actually more pure and holy than any priest on earth, or angel in heaven. (2.) In his dignity, He is made higher than the heavens; advanced above all the inhabitants of that glorious place, where he ever liveth, and keeps his residence, remaining a Priest for ever not to sacrifice, but to apply effectually his former sacrifice to all believers.

27 Who needeth not daily, as those high priests, to offer up sacrifice, first for his own sins, and then for the people's: for this he did once, when he offered up himself.

This is, "As Jesus Christ, our great High Priest, had no sin for his own to expiate, like other high priests; but his business was to offer for our sins; so the oblation and offering he made upon that account, was not bullocks or rams, but himself in sacrifice, and that once, and but once upon the cross, which once offered sacrifice was abundantly sufficient to take away sin; whereas other high priests offered for their own sins, and for the people's sins, and that often, which was a token of their insufficiency and imperfection." Learn hence, 1. That no sacrifice could bring us to God, and save us to perfection, but that wherein the Son of God himself was both priest and offering; such an High Priest became us who offered himself once for all: 2. That the perfection of Christ's sacrifice makes the repetition of it needless, and the often repeating of it would argue the imperfection both of priest and sacrifice.

18 For the law maketh men high priests which have infirmity; but the word of the oath, which was since the law, maketh the Son, who is consecrated for evermore.

That is, the Levitical law appointed men to be high priests that laboured under infirmities, were sinners, and subject to mortality; but the promise made to Christ, and confirmed by God's oath long since the law was given, maketh the Son, and none but the Son (who is perfectly holy and consecrated to this everlasting office) a priest for evermore. Learn hence, 1. That there never was any more than two sorts of priests in the church; the one made by the law, the other by the oath of God. 2. That the great foundation of our faith, and the main hinge whereon all our consolation depends, is this, that our High Priest is the Son of God, and his everlasting continuance in his office is secured by the oath of God.

C H A P. VIII.

Our apostle having proved the excellency of Christ's priesthood in the former chapter; proceeds in this to shew his faithful execution of that his priestly office, for the good and benefit of his church.

NOW of the things which we have spoken, this is the sum: We have such an high priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens; 2 A minister of the sanctuary, and of the true tabernacle which the Lord pitched, and not man.

Observe here, 1. The apostle's preface, in which he doth briefly recapitulate the sum and substance of his preceding arguments, Now of the things which we have spoken, this is the sum. Learn hence, That when doctrines are important, and the matters treated of very weighty and momentous, we should endeavour by all means to make an impression of them upon the minds of our hearers, by a brief recapitulation of the things we have insisted on; thus doth our apostle here, Observe 2. A declaration of the first general pre-eminence of our High Priest, and that is taken from his present state and eternal condition. He is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens. A throne, a sceptre, a crown, are ensigns of majesty, and ornaments of sovereign power: To sit in the throne, throne, is to possess sovereign power and dominion: This Christ now enjoys in heaven, as the reward of his deep humiliation, and as the highest degree of his exaltation. Learn hence, That the principal glory of the priestly office of Christ depends on the glorious exaltation of his person. Observe, 3. Another pre-eminence of our Lord Jesus Christ, as our great High Priest; he is called a minister of the sanctuary. A minister; this intimates to us, that our great High Priest, in the height of his glory, condescends to discharge the office of a public minister in the behalf of his church. Our thoughts sometimes dwell upon what Christ did for us on earth, but too seldom are they taken up with the contemplation of what he is still doing for us in heaven. And a minister of the sanctuary or true tabernacle; that is, not of the literal sanctuary and tabernacle here below, for Christ never entered into that, but of the sanctuary of Heaven, in which dwelleth all that was represented in the sanctuary here below: Christ our great High Priest abides in the sanctuary of heaven for us continually; always representing the efficacy of that blood whereby atonement was made for all our sins. O blessed Jesus! They being continually in heaven, will draw our hearts and minds continually thither, if so be we are really interested in thy holy ministration.

3 For every high priest is ordained to offer gifts and sacrifices: wherefore it is of necessity that this man have somewhat also to offer, 4 For if he were on earth, he should not be a priest, seeing that there are priests that offer gifts according to the law: 5 Who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things—

That our Lord Jesus Christ is our great High Priest under the gospel, the apostle had sufficiently demonstrated and confirmed before. Observe here, How he next declares what is the nature, duty, and office of Christ as our High Priest: namely, to offer gifts and sacrifices. A priest that has nothing to offer is no priest at all; Christ therefore offered as well as other high priests: but what! Bulls and rams? In no wise: He offered himself, his whole human nature, soul and body. As to the typical sacrifices he did not, could not offer them, were he upon earth, because he was not of the tribe of Levi, whose proper office it was to meddle with those offerings; therefore leaving the shadow to them, he offered the substance, himself; that is, his own body, signified by those shadows. Learn hence, That there was no salvation to be had for us, no, not by Jesus Christ himself, without his sacrifice and oblation; It was of necessity that he should have somewhat to offer, as well as those priests had of old, according to the law. No salvation without atonement for sin; no atonement for sin but by sacrifice; no sacrifice sufficient for atonement but the death of Christ; and whoever looks for salvation otherwise than in the faith and virtue of that sacrifice, will be disappointed and deceived. But although the oblation was made by Christ on earth, yet the continual application of its efficacy to the souls of believers is made by Christ now in heaven; without which, neither their access to God, nor their peace with God could be maintained, v. 3, 4. In the fifth verse the apostle asserts, that the leuitical priests here below did perform those administrations which were but shadows of heavenly things above. Who serve unto the example and shadow of heavenly things. Where to serve, is to officiate as priests, in offering gifts and sacrifices: but this their service was not spiritual and heavenly, but carnal and earthly: yet a shadow and imitation of heavenly things. Learn hence, That God alone limits the signification and use of all his own institutions. The ministry of the priests of old was only in and about earthly things, not heavenly things, yet have a resemblance and shadow of heavenly things. We must not take any thing out of God's institutions which he has put in them, nor must we put more in them than God has furnished them withal. To expect that from any ordinance or institution of God which he never intended or designed, is to make an idol of the ordinance, and the way to render it useless, yea, pernicious and perilous to us; to put that into an ordinance which God never put into it, and to expect more from an ordinance than God ever promised, is to overthrow it.

— As Moses was admonished of God when he was about to make the tabernacle. For see, saith he that thou make all things according to the pattern shewed to thee in the mount.

The words imply, that divine institution is the only pure rule of religious worship: Moses did nothing of his own head when he built the tabernacle, but had his directions in every thing from God. If persons will carve out the worship of God according to their own fancies, they may please themselves perhaps, but they never can please their maker; for nothing is pleasing to God, as to the substance of religious worship, but what is of his own prescribing; consequently all that theatrical pomp which is found in the church of Rome, and makes the worship of God a dead thing, is a mere fornication in religion, and an abomination in the sight of God. All their human inventions are intolerable presumptions. And as Moses was bound to give directions according to the pattern given him, so the priests, in their administrations, were bound to follow Moses' directions. Yet after all, the things which Moses was concerned about, were carnal things; the tabernacle was earthly, the offerings carnal, yet shadows of better things, even of heavenly; for the sanctuary was a shadow of a heavenly sanctuary; the priest, of a better priest; the service, of a far better service: This seems to be the intention of our apostle.

6 But now hath he obtained a more excellent ministry, by how much also is he the mediator of a better covenant, which was established upon better promises.

Our apostle, in these words, proves the excellency of Christ's ministry or priesthood above that of Aaron and his sons, from the excellency of the new covenant (or the new dispensation of the covenant of grace) above the old, of which he was the mediator. Now the more excellent the covenant, the more excellent the ministry. Learn hence hence, 1. That the gospel-covenant, or the new covenant, was the best covenant that ever God made with man; not but the old and new covenant were the same for substance, though not for clearness; indeed temporal things were types and shadows of better things, even of heavenly things: And accordingly believers under the old testament were saved by a covenant of grace as well as we. Learn, 2. That the gospel-covenant is therefore a better covenant, because established upon better promises; their promises of old were chiefly temporal, though not only temporal things promised us also; but more rarely, and with the exception of the cross, or rather they are thrown in as additions to spiritual promises, Matt. iv. 33. But the promises of the covenant of grace are therefore better, because strength and assistance is engaged for, and graciously offered, in order to enable us to perform the conditions of them: The law required sinless obedience; the gospel accepts sincere obedience, and offers grace to perform it. Learn, 3. That Jesus Christ is the mediator of this better covenant: As there was a covenant made between God and man, so there was need of a mediator that the covenant might be effectual; for a mediator is necessary, both where there is a controversy and difference, and also where there is an imparity and distance between persons: In both respects Christ is mediator; and his mediation was needful, that he might bring us to God. God stood upon terms before he would pardon sin. Justice must be satisfied, and that by blood, and that blood of infinite value; therefore Christ is first a sponsor before a mediator; he first satisfies for the breach, before he goes about to make up the breach between God and the sinner.

7 For if that first covenant had been faultless, then should no place have been sought for the second. 8 For finding fault with them, he saith, Behold, the days come (saith the Lord) when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah: 9 Not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers, in the day when I took them by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt; because they continued not in my covenant, and I regarded them not, saith the Lord.

Observe here, 1. What is charged on the first covenant, and that is faultiness. By which we are not to understand any sinful faultiness, but defectiveness and imperfection only: For it was not faulty in the matter and substance of it, and it was instituted and ordained by God, but therefore called faulty because it was obscure, was not so surely ratified, and not attended with that virtue, power, and efficacy which the new covenant is accompanied with. Observe, 2. Wherein consisteth that defectiveness and imperfection of the first covenant which is here complained of; namely, 1. In its inability to justify and save us, because of our inability, through the weakness of the flesh, to answer the demands of it, Rom. viii. 3. What the law could not do in that it was weak, &c. The law was not properly weak to us, but we were weak to that. 2. The legal covenant required exact obedience, but afforded no spiritual assistance for the performance of what is required: But the covenant of grace, the new covenant, is called a ministration of the Spirit; and under the gospel we are said not to serve in the oldness of the letter, but in the newness of the spirit. Now, says the apostle, ver. 8. Almighty God finding fault with the Jews for breach of the former covenant, declared by the prophet Jeremiah, chap. xxxi. 31. That the covenant he would make with all the true Israelites for time to come, should not be like that which he made with their fathers in Egypt, which they continued not in the observation of (wanting those assistances from the Holy Spirit to enable them thereunto, which are procured for us by Christ); accordingly, I regarded them not, saith the Lord, but gave them up for their sins, into the hands of their enemies. Observe, lastly, How Almighty God makes the imperfection of the old covenant, and the Israelites instability therein, the reason of his making a new covenant with us, in which grace and assistance is offered to enable us to obey and persevere in obedience: Finding fault with them; that is, for the breach of the former, he saith, Behold the days come that I will make a new covenant with them. From the whole, note, 1. That the grace and glory of the new covenant are much set off and manifested by comparing it with the old. Note, 2. That nothing but effectual grace from Christ will secure our covenant obedience one moment: What greater motives, or stronger outward obligations to obedience could any people under heaven have, than the Israelites had? But they quickly turned out of the way: therefore, in the new covenant, is this grace promised in a peculiar manner, as we shall see in the next verse.

10 For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, saith the Lord; I will put my laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts: and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people.

Observe here, 1. The persons with whom this covenant is made, the house of Israel, and the house of Judah; not made with them as a political body, because their policy was to be dissolved, but as a part of the universal church. Observe, 2. The author of this covenant, and that is God himself, I will make it, saith the Lord. Note, That the abolishing of the old covenant, and establishing the new, is an act of sovereign wisdom, grace and authority in God: I will make a new covenant. Observe, 3. What is the great and comprehensive promise of the new covenant: I will put my laws into their minds, and write them in their hearts; that is, 1. I will make a clear and perspicuous revelation of my mind and will unto them, and give them a thorough knowledge and understanding of my laws, so that their own consciences shall condemn them when they do transgress them. And, 2. By my Holy Spirit I will make a deep and efficacious impression of them upon their hearts and spirits. Where, note, That the precepts of the old covenant are all of them turned in promises under the new; their perceptive and commanding power remaineth, but grace is promised for the performance of them. Note further, That the work of grace, in the new covenant passeth on the soul in all its power.

powers and faculties, to their change and renovation: I will put my laws into their minds, &c. And consequently; to deny the necessity and efficacy of the sanctifying and renewing grace of God in the habits and acts of it, is plainly to overthrow the evangelical covenant. Observe, 4. What is the relation which is here said to ensue between God and his people; I will be to them a God, &c. Here note, 1. God's relation to us; I will be to them a God, I who am all-sufficient in myself, will be your all-sufficient preserver, and your all-sufficient rewarder. As nothing less than God's becoming our God can relieve and help us; so nothing more can be required thereunto. Note, 2. Our relation to God, They shall be to me a people; that is, a special and peculiar people, owing dependency upon him, and professing all subjection and obedience to him. And observe, God undertakes for this, they shall be to me a people. Learn thence, That God doth as well undertake for our being his people, as he doth for his being our God: He that assumes them into that relation freely, will preserve them in it powerfully; I will be to them a God, &c.

11 And they shall not teach every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying Know the Lord, for all shall know me, from the least to the greatest.

These words are not to be understood absolutely, but comparatively: They are a promise, that under the new covenant dispensation the Holy Spirit shall be so plentifully poured forth, and the light of the gospel so clearly shine forth, that there shall not be such need as under the law, to teach men the knowledge of God, and their duty to him; they shall not need, in such a manner as formerly, to instruct one another in the meaning of the types and shadows of the law: they shall all know me: that is, all ranks and degrees of men, all sorts and conditions of persons, shall own me to be the Lord. Note here, What abuse is put upon this text by some, who bring it to set aside the necessity of human teaching; for it is by such teaching that God gives men the knowledge of himself. Learn hence, That there is a duty incumbent on every man to instruct others according to his ability and opportunity, in the knowledge of God. But, Lord, pity us, we have more that mutually teach one another sin, folly, vanity, yea, villany of all sorts, than the knowledge of God, and the duty we owe unto him! This is not what God here promiseth believers in a way of grace, but what he hath given up careless unbelieving professors to, in a way of vengeance.

12 For I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more.

This is the great fundamental promise of the covenant of grace, pardon of sin. Thence learn, That free and undeserved grace, in the pardon of sin, is the original spring and foundation of all covenant mercies and blessings. Observe farther, How copiously the Spirit of God sets forth the benefits of pardoning grace, I will forgive and forget; I will be merciful, and remember no more; pardoning mercy is full, as well as free. Observe lastly, The aggravating names here given to sin, it is called unrighteousness, because nothing can be more unequal and unjust, than for man to sin against God his creator, his ruler and benefactor; and iniquity, or a transgression of the law, an erring and swerving from the rule of holiness, which we are to walk by. Learn hence, 1. That the aggravations of sin are great and many, which the consciences of convicted sinners ought to have great regard unto. Learn, 2. That we can never understand aright the glory and excellency of pardoning mercy, unless we are convinced of the greatness and vileness of our sins in these several aggravations of them. Learn, 3. That the covenant of grace fully assures us, that there are riches of grace, and abundance of pardoning mercy in God, which disposes him, for Christ's sake, to be merciful to penitent sinners' unrighteousness, and to remember their transgressions no more, how many and heinous soever they have been.

13 In that he saith, A new covenant, he hath made the first old. Now that which decayeth, and waxeth old is ready to vanish away.

The apostle having, in the foregoing verses, proved the insufficiency of the old covenant, and the necessity of the new, and given the preference to the latter above the former; in this last verse he acquaints us with the abrogation of the old covenant, it is made old; and with the abolition of it, it is ready to vanish away: As old things lose their power, strength, and vigour; so the old covenant lost its binding power and obliging force. And as that which waxeth old moulders away by little and little, till at last it does totally vanish, and utterly perish; thus the legal dispensation by little and little decayed, until it wholly ceased at last; yea it is observable, that the whole policy and Jewish government did vanish away, and totally expire in a few years after the writing of this epistle. Learn hence, 1. That the outward appearance of the legal administration was glorious, and very taking to the Jews: The fabric of the temple, the ornaments of the priests, the order of their worship, had a glory in them which dazzled the eyes, and captivated the minds and affections of the people. Learn, 2. That all this glory did gradually vanish, and at last totally disappear; all the glorious institutions of the law were at best but as stars in the firmament of the church, and consequently were all to disappear at the rising of the sun of righteousness: In that he saith, a new covenant, &c.

C H A P. IX.

Our apostle in this chapter makes a comparison between the old and new covenant, between the legal and evangelical dispensation, shewing that the former was to cease, and that it was greatly to the church's advantage that it should do so.

THEN verily the first covenant had also ordinances of divine service, and a worldly sanctuary.

In this, and the following verses, the apostle gives us a particular and distinct view of the typical ordinances in the old covenant under the Mosaic dispensation, and also of their accomplishment in Jesus Christ: And here in general he acquaints us, that the first covenant had an outward legal service, with sundry rites and ordinances of divine worship, and a worldly sanctuary, raised by men, of earthly materials; a temporary tabernacle; verily the first covenant had ordinances of divine service, &c. Observe here, That there was never any covenant between God and man, but had some ordinances and institutions of divine worship annexed unto it; the original covenant of works, had the ordinances of the tree of life, and the tree of knowledge of good and evil. The covenant of Sinai, whereof the apostle here speaks, had a multitude of them, and the gospel covenant is not destitute of them; witnefs our sacraments and public worship. Observe, 2. That all ordinances for worship must be resolved into divine ordination or institution, or that which renders them acceptable and well-pleasing unto God: A worship not ordained by God is not acceptable to God: it had ordinances of worship. Observe lastly, How God can animate outward carnal things with an hidden invisible spring of glory and efficacy. So he did their sanctuary with its relation unto Christ, which was an object of faith, which no eye of flesh could behold.

2 For there was a tabernacle made; the first wherein was the candlestick, and the table, and the shewbread; which is called the sanctuary. 3 And after the second vail, the tabernacle which is called the holiest of all: 4 Which had the golden censer, and the ark of the covenant overlaid round about with gold, wherein was the golden pot that had manna, and Aarons rod that budded, and the tables of the covenant: 5 And over it the cherubims of glory shadowing the mercy-seat: of which we cannot now speak particularly.

In these verses, the Holy Ghost by the apostle sets before our eyes the beautiful face of God's public worship, under the ceremonial law. And first, He describes the place appointed by God for his solemn worship. This was, first, the tabernacle, then, the temple: The tabernacle was an ambulatory temple; the temple a standing tabernacle. The tabernacle was a type and figure of Christ's incarnation, whereby the fulness of the Godhead dwelt in him bodily, as it dwelt typical in the tabernacle; this tabernacle had two parts, the sanctuary, or holy place, and the sanctum sanctorum, or the holy of holies. Our apostle tells us what sacred utensils were by God's appointment in both these places. 1. In the sanctuary there was the candlestick, representing that fulness of light which is in Christ, and which is by him communicated to the whole church. The table whereon stood the shewbread, typifying the saints communion with Christ, and with one another; also the shew-bread itself, which typified Christ, as being the only bread of life to his church, the only spiritual food of the soul that nourishes it into life eternal. 2. In the holy of holies there was the golden censer, which was to hold the incense: This represented the intercession of Christ, which gives efficacy to the prayers of all believers: The prevalency of all our prayers depends on the incense which is in the hand of our merciful High Priest. The ark of the covenant overlaid with gold: this, with the mercy-seat, which covered the ark, was the most glorious and mysterious utensil of the tabernacle, the most eminent pledge of the divine presence; called the ark of the covenant, because the two tables, in which the ten commandments were writ by the finger of God, were kept in it; next the golden pot, in which the manna was laid up, and miraculously kept from putrefaction, (which of itself would have stunk in a few days) a type of Christ the bread of life. Then Aaron's rod that budded: This originally was the rod of Moses, wherewith he fed his sheep in the wilderness, and afterwards wrought his miracles; and particularly smote the rock with it till it gushed out water. When Aaron was called to the office of the priesthood, it was delivered unto his keeping. This rod of Moses, wherewith he smote the rock is commanded to be laid up in the tabernacle, because the spiritual rock that followed them was to be smitten with the rod of the law, that it might give forth the waters of life unto the church. Last of all, the tables of the covenant; that is, the two tables of stone cut out by Moses, and written on by the finger of God, containing the ten commandments, which were the substance of God's covenant with the people. These two tables of stone were, by the express command of God, put into the ark, and there was nothing else in the ark but them. The pot of manna, and Aaron's rod, were laid up in the holy of holies, near the ark, but not in it, which were of no effectual use in the service of God, but only kept as sacred memorials. Having thus described what was in the ark, next the apostle tells us what was over the ark, namely the cherubims and mercy seat. The cherubims were Alata animalia, winged creatures, of human shape, but with wings, to denote their angelical nature; there were two of them, one at each end of the ark, shadowing the mercy-seat; from between these cherubims, over the mercy seat; it was that God manifested his majestic presence, spake unto Moses, and gave out his oracles as a prince speaks from his throne. The mercy-seat was of pure beaten gold; the measure of it exactly answering the ark: This covered the ark wherein the law was; and was a type of Christ, who fully covers our sins, the transgressions of the law, out of God's sight; and is therefore called by the apostle, Rom. iii. 25. our propitiatory, or propitiation, or mercy-seat. For if thou, Lord, shouldst mark iniquities, according to the law, who could stand? These are the particular things which the apostle thought fit to take notice of, in the Jewish tabernacle; all which we see pointed at Christ; and there was in them all, more or less, a representation of the person and mediation of Christ. Hereunto they were designed by divine wisdom, to denote, that in him alone is God well pleased, in him alone will he be glorified.

6 Now when these things were thus ordained, the priests went always into the first tabernacle, accomplishing the service of God.

Our Apostle having given an account, in the preceding verses, of the structure or fabric of the tabernacle, in the two parts of which belonged to the priests; namely, the holy place, and the holy of holies, (for of the first court, the court of the people, he says nothing); he comes now to discourse of the service, which, by the appointment of God, the priests were to perform in this magnificent structure.

Where observe, 1. The persons administering, the priests only, and they of the posterity of Aaron: All others were forbidden upon pain of excision. 2. The general foundation of the service of these priests in the sanctuary, they entered into it, but were to go no farther; they must not so much as look into the holy of holies; no, nor yet abide in the sanctuary when the high priest entered into the most holy place. 3. The time of this their entrance into the sanctuary to discharge their service, always; that is, every day, and at all times, as occasion did require. 4. The service itself, accomplishing the service of God; these services were either daily or weekly: Daily, were dressing the lamps, supplying them with holy oil, morning and evening; also the service of the golden altar, on which the priests burnt incense every day. The weekly service of the sanctuary was the changing of the shew-bread every sabbath-day in the morning. All the service was typical, representing the continual application of the benefits of Christ's sacrifice unto his church to the end of the world. The tabernacle itself, and the inhabitation of God in it, was a type of the incarnation of the type of God. All the utensils of it were representations of his grace. He is the light and life of the church, the lamp and the bread thereof. The incense of his intercession renders all our obedience acceptable unto God; and accordingly, there was continual application unto these things without intermission, every day: Signifying unto us, that a continual application unto God, by Christ, and a continual application of the mediation of Christ by faith, are the springs of the light, life, and comfort of the church.

Having thus described the priest's service in the first part of the temple, ver. 6. he comes now to declare the service and administration of the high priest in the second part of the temple, or holy of holies. ver. 7.

7 But into the second went the high priest alone, once every year, not without blood, which he offered for himself and for the errors of the people.

Observe here, 1. The person administering described, The high priest alone; none of the priests were permitted to be so near him as the sanctuary when he administered in the most holy place. Thus sacredly was the presence of God, in the holy of holies, made inaccessible, not only to the people, but even to all the priests themselves. The great truth which was represented and shadowed forth was, that there is no entrance into the gracious presence of God, but by our great High Priest the holy Jesus. The high priest alone, and no other person, entered into the holy of holies. 2. The high priest engaging in his service, He entered through the veil into the holy place. This was a type both of the entrance of Christ into heaven, and of our entrance by him into the throne of grace. We read,

Matt. xxvii. 15. of the rending of this veil, at the death of our Saviour, from top to bottom: Signifying thereby, that the way was laid open into the holy place, and the gracious presence of God discovered, and made accessible to all that come into him by Jesus Christ. 3. The time of this service expressed, it was once only every year; and the day, the precise day of the year, determined, Lev. xvi. 29. to wit, the tenth day of the month Tizri, answering our Septemer, called the great day of atonement? on which day such a complete atonement was made for sin, that the Jews had a say, "That on the day of expiation all Israel was made as innocent as in the day of creation." 4. The nature of this service; the apostle tells us, it was not without blood, that is, he did it by blood, sprinkling it seven times with his finger towards the mercy-seat, Lev. xvi 11, 12. There is an emphasis in the expression, not without blood, to manifest the necessity of the death and blood-shedding of Jesus Christ our great high Priest, and the impossibility of our entering into the gracious presence of God without the blood of the reconciling sacrifice Christ Jesus. 5. For whom this blood was offered; first, for himself, then for the people; that is, for his own sins, and the sins of the people: This argued the great imperfection of that state; whereas Christ our great High Priest was not to offer up the blood of goats, but his own blood, not for himself at all; by one offering he hath for ever perfected them that are sanctified.

8 The Holy Ghost this signifying, that the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest, while as the first tabernacle was yet standing.

The apostle, in this verse, declares the spiritual use and signification of the Levitical service, and what the Holy Ghost did intend thereby; namely, that the true and proper means to enter into heaven, the holy of holies, was not so fully and clearly manifested; and that heaven, represented by the holy of holies, was as yet inaccessible: for Christ first entered into heaven as our forerunner, with his blood to appear before God, and thereby to prepare the way for our entrance after him. Hence learn, 1. That the Holy Ghost's design, in all the Levitical service, was to direct the faith of believer's to Christ the promised Messiah, who was signified thereby; the Holy Ghost thus signifying. 2. That although typical institutions, attended diligently unto, were sufficient to direct the faith of the Jews unto the expectation of a real expiation of sin, and a gracious acceptance with God thereupon; yet the clear manifestation of the way of expiation of sin by the blood of Christ, is the great privilege and discovery of the gospel. 3. Although the standing of the first tabernacle was a great mercy and privilege, yet the removal of it was a greater, because it made way for the bringing in of that which was much better, the gospel-state.

9 Which was a figure for the time then present, in which were offered both gifts and sacrifices, that could not make him that did the service perfect, as pertaining to the conscience, 10 Which stood only in meats and drinks, and divers washings, and carnal ordinances, ordinances, imposed on them until the time of reformation.

As if the apostle had said, "The first tabernacle was but a figure, or typical representation of good things to come, serving only for the present non-age of the church: for the gifts and sacrifices then offered could not, of themselves, perfectly justify, sanctify, or save any man, nor could they pacify the conscience of the sinner. Where note, That conscience cannot be satisfied until God's wrath be pacified. Now, the ceremonial rites could not pacify God's wrath, because they could not satisfy God's justice: nothing but the blood of Christ could do that, which those sacrifices were only typically representations and prefigurations of. Observe farther, The apostle's reasons why those legal rites could not make them perfect; namely, because the nature of them was such; that they reached only to the outward man, consisting only, for the most part, in meats, drinks, and divers washings, that concerned the flesh and body of man, which did not, of themselves, commend any man to God, and were imposed upon them as a yoke, until the time of the reformation; that is, the time of the Messiah, the time of the New Testament dispensation. Note here, The great imperfection of the Jewish dispensation, it was weak and imperfect, and consequently not to be continued. Note farther, That nothing can give peace to conscience but what gives satisfaction to God's justice. Whoever seeks it any other way, than by virtue of Christ's atonement, will never attain it in this world, or in that which is to come: No offerings could make him that did the services perfect, &c.

11. But Christ being come an high priest of good things to come, by a greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands, that is to say, not of this building; 12 Neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood, he entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us.

Our apostle having shewed, in the preceding verses, how and after what manner, the levitical priests executed their office, he comes now to declare how, and after what manner, Christ, our great High Priest, did also execute his. And, 1. As the levitical priests had a tabernacle, an earthly sanctuary, to officiate in; so Christ had a greater and more perfect tabernacle to execute his office in, namely, that of his own body, not like theirs, made with hands, but miraculously formed in the virgin's womb, by the overshadowing power of the Holy Ghost; in which tabernacle the fulness of the Godhead dwelt substantially. The human nature of Christ was that tabernacle in which the Son of God administered his sacerdotal office in this world, and wherein he continueth yet so to do in heaven by his intercession. And well may this tabernacle be called greater, being so not in quantity and measure, but in dignity and worth; and more perfect, that is, more perfectly fitted and suited to the end of a tabernacle, both for the inhabitation of the divine nature, and the means of exercising the sacerdotal office, in the making atonement for sin, than the other was. Learn hence, That the human nature of Christ, in which he exercised and discharged the duties of his sacerdotal office, in making atonement for sin, is the greatest, most perfect, and excellent ordinance of God, far excelling those that were most excellent under the Old Testament. The glory of this tabernacle of our Saviour's body in heaven, will be the object of holy admiration unto all eternity, as it was admirably fitted and perfected for service and usefulness here on earth. 2. The apostle declares, That as Christ had a more excellent tabernacle, so he was incomparably a more excellent High Priest than ever the legal dispensation had; They entered the holy of holies, He entered heaven; They entered often, He but once; They entered with the blood of goats and calves, He in his own blood. And the effect, fruit, and benefit of it was unspeakable: thereby he obtained eternal redemption for us. Note here, That whereas it is said that Christ entered into heaven with his own blood, it is not so to be understood, as if he carried the material blood which he shed with him into heaven, in a vessel, or otherwise, as the high priest carried the blood of the sacrifice in his hand into the most holy place: but that Christ presented his body in heaven, out of which the blood was shed, and, by the merit of his death, made expiation for sin, and purchased eternal redemption for sinners. Learn hence, That the entrance of our Lord Jesus Christ, as our great High Priest, into heaven, to appear in the presence of God for us, and to save us thereby to the uttermost, was a matter so great and glorious, that it could not be accomplished, but by his own blood. No other sacrifice was sufficient to this end: not by the blood of bulls and goats.

13 For if the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh; 14 How much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot to God, purge your conscience from dead works to serve the living God?

The apostle had asserted, in the former verse, That eternal redemption was the fruit of Christ's sacrifice; he proves it in these, and that by an argument drawn from the less to the greater: thus, "If, says he, the blood of bulls and goats, and the water that was mixed with the ashes of the burnt heifer, (or the red cow, mentioned Numb. xix.) purified from ceremonial uncleanness, and procured the external sanctification of the flesh, or outward man; how much more shall the blood of Christ, who, by the external Spirit, (that is, his Godhead, his divine nature) offered up himself, his whole man, soul and body, a sacrifice, without spot, to God the Father, be able to purge our consciences from all spiritual impurity and uncleanness of sin. (that dead, because deadly work) and render us fit to serve the living God in an holy course of Christian obedience? Note here, 1. That Christ's offering himself to God was a special act, as High Priest of the church, wherein he gave up himself in a way of most profound obedience, to do and suffer whatever the justice of God required unto the expiation of sin, even to the shedding of his blood. 2. That Christ's Godhead it was, which rendered the suffering of his manhood infinitely meritorious; or that Christ's blood was effectual, not simply, as it was material blood, but as offered by the eternal Spirit; his blood, though not the blood of God, yet was the blood of him that was God. 3. That the purging of our consciences from dead works is an immediate effect of the death of Christ, and a benefit which, upon our faith and obedience, we are made partakers of. 4. That the best works of men, antecedently unto the purging of their consciences by the blood of Christ, are but dead works, unsuitable to the nature of the living God. Lord help us to remember, that when we come to hear, to pray, or perform any act of worship, that we are doing it to the living God. O how improper for, and unsuitable to, a living God, are dead services, without life, without heart, without spirit?

15 And for this cause he is the Mediator of the New Testament, that by means of death, for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first testament, they which are called might receive the promise of eternal inheritance. 16 For where a testament is, there must also of necessity be the death of the testator. 17 For a testament is of force after men are dead: otherwise it is of no strength at all whilst the testator liveth.

These words represent unto us one special benefit accruing by the death of Christ, namely, the ratification of the gospel covenant; for by this means he took upon him the glorious office to be the mediator of the new covenant, that by the intervention of his death he might make satisfaction for the sins of believers under the Old Testament, as well as for those that live under the new; and that as well those that lived before Christ's coming in the flesh as since, might, by virtue of his death, obtain the promised eternal inheritance. Note here, That God designed an eternal inheritance unto some persons: that the persons designed are them that are called; that the way and manner of conveying a right and title to this inheritance, was a promise: that there was an obstacle to the enjoyment of this inheritance, which was transgression against the first covenant; that this obstacle might be removed, and the inheritance enjoyed, God made a new covenant, which had a mediator, who expiated sin by the sacrifice of his death. Note farther, That the efficacy and merit of Christ's death and mediation extends itself to all that are effectually called, as well those that lived before his coming in the flesh, as to those that lived since. Note lastly, How the covenant of grace is here called a Testament, because it received its ratification and confirmation by the blood of Christ. All things required in a testament are here found, namely a testator deceased, Christ Jesus; legacies bequeathed, temporal, spiritual, and eternal blessings; legatees named, the heirs of promise; conditions required, upon which only the legacies may be obtained, faith, repentance, and sincere obedience; seals annexed, baptism, and the Lord's supper; witnesses subscribing, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost. The sum is this, That the death of Christ is the foundation, life, and soul of the new covenant; and that the new covenant is of the nature of a testament, and the benefits promised therein; to wit, remission of sin, reconciliation with God, sanctification on earth, and glorification in heaven, are legacies freely left us by our deceased testator, who was dead, but is alive again, and lives for evermore, to execute his own will and testament, of which the scripture is the instrument, and the sacraments the seals. Learn from the whole, 1. That there is an irrevocable grant of the whole inheritance of grace and glory made unto believers in the new covenant. 2. That as the grant of these things is free and gracious, so the enjoyment of them is secured against contingencies, by the death of Christ the great testator.

18 Whereupon neither the first testament was dedicated without blood. 19 For when Moses had spoken every precept to all the people according to the law, he took the blood of calves and of goats, with water, and scarlet wool, and hyssop, and sprinkled both the book and all the people, 20 Saying, This is the blood of the testament which God hath enjoined unto you. 21 Moreover, he sprinkled likewise with blood both the tabernacle and all the vessels of the ministry. 22 And almost all things are by the law purged with blood; and without shedding of blood is no remission.

Our apostle having entered upon a comparison between the first and second covenant in the former verses, he goes on to prosecute it in these; shewing that both of them were dedicated, that is, confirmed by blood. The first covenant which God made with Israel in Horeb, had not its sanction without typical blood. The using of the blood for the sanction of leagues and covenants was a very ancient rite, and probably signified, that the parties confederating did thereby engage blood and life for the observation of them. Now that the covenant between God and Israel was thus solemnized, and received its confirmation by blood, the apostle makes appear from the history of Moses, Exod. xxiv. unto which he appeals; where we find the sprinkler to be Moses, the sprinkling to be blood, the things sprinkled where the book wherein the covenant was written, and the people who engaged themselves in the covenant. Now the use and end of this sprinkling upon the people, was the confirmation of the covenant on their parts as the sprinkling of it upon the altar was the confirmation on God's part. And the words added to the actions were, this is the blood of the covenant; that is, this is the blood by which the covenant is confirmed, and made inviolable betwixt God and you: He calls it the blood of the covenant, because it was a sign of it, and a seal confirming it. In like manner, the new covenant was confirmed by blood, even by the blood of Christ, as is evident from his own words, Luke xxii. 20. This cup is the new testament in my blood for remission of sins. Remission of sin is one principal blessing promised in the new covenant; but this promise had been in vain, if Christ's blood had not been shed to satisfy divine justice, and thereby make sin remissible: For though men had repented, and could have made even hell itself to weep with his tears, yet his sins could not have been remitted, had not this blood made it remissible:

So that the blood of Christ is the firm and immoveable basis and foundation upon which the new covenant was fixed. This is the first part of our apostle's design in these words; namely, to prove the necessity of Christ's blood for confirmation of the new covenant. Next, he proves the efficacy of that blood for taking away of sin; telling us, that the tabernacle, the vessels, and all the utensils thereunto belonging, yea, all things which were purified, were ceremonially purified by blood; and that, as without shedding of blood then there could be no remission, so no acceptance with God now without the shedding of the blood of Christ. Learn hence, That in all things wherein we have to do with God, and whereby we approach unto him, it is the blood of Christ, and the application of it to our own consciences, that gives a gracious acceptance with God; without this all is unclean and defiled now, as without shedding of blood there was no purification then.

23 It was therefore necessary that the patterns of things in the heavens should be purified with these; but the heavenly things themselves with better sacrifices than these.

As if the apostle had said, "If the tabernacle and utensils thereunto belonging, which were patterns and types of heavenly things, must be consecrated by the blood of bulls and goats, much more must the heavenly things themselves, which were shadowed by them, be purified and consecrated by better blood than the blood of beasts, even with the precious blood of Jesus Christ." Learn hence, 1. That there is such uncleanness in our natures, in our persons, in our duties, in all our services, that, unless they and we are purified by the blood of Christ, neither we nor they can have any acceptance with God. 2. That the sacrifice of Christ is the one only everlasting fountain and spring of all sanctification and sacred dedication, whereby the whole new creation is purified and dedicated unto God. 3. That neither heaven itself, nor heavenly things, could have been made meet for us, or we for them, had not they been dedicated, and we purged, by the sacrifice of Christ. By heavenly things here we may understand heaven itself, of which the tabernacle was a type. Now as the purification of the tabernacle was only to prepare it to be a place in which their persons might be presented before God; in like manner, was heaven itself prepared and purified for us by our Lord's entrance into it, with his own atonement, or propitiatory sacrifice. Christ's entering into heaven, and his appearing with his blood of sprinkling in the presence of God for us, procures the acceptance of our prayers and praises whilst we live, and our admission into those heavenly mansions of bliss and glory prepared for us when we die.

24 For Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us.

Observe here, 1. The person spoken of, and that is Christ, our great high priest, the mediator of the new covenant. 2. What is spoken of him, 1. Negatively, That he is not entered into the holy place of the sanctuary, or tabernacle made with hands, that is, built by the hands of men, which was a figure of the true holy of holies, to wit, heaven. All God's appointments in his service have their proper season, their proper glory, beauty, and use; even the tabernacle, and the external utensils thereof, made with men's hands, had so, whilst they had the force of a divine institution. 2. Positively, He is entered into heaven itself, the place of the peculiar residence of the presence, majesty, and glory of God: where all his blessed saints enjoy him, and his holy angels minister unto him. Observe, 3. The end of our great high priest's entrance into heaven declared, now to appear in the presence of God for us. The priests of old, when they entered the holy place, were forced soon to go out again to prepare for a new sacrifice: But his word now is expressive of the whole season and duration of time; from the entrance of Christ into heaven, until the consummation of all things: There is no moment of time in which it may not be said, he now appeared in the presence of God for us. Learn hence, That the continual appearance of our Lord Jesus Christ for us in heaven, as our great high priest, in the presence of his Father, is the foundation both of our safety and our comfort, from whence relief may be derived upon all occasions, whatever difficulties, temptations and trials may be before us.

25 Nor yet that he should offer himself often, as the high priest entereth into the holy place every year, with blood of others; 26 (For then must he often have suffered since the foundation of the world) but now once in the end of the world, hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself.

Our apostle in these words, sets forth the excellency of Christ's sacrifice from its singularity; it needeth no repetition, as their sacrifices of old did: Their sacrifices were repeated often, and their repetition was an evidence of their imperfection; but Christ's once offering himself a sacrifice was sufficient, in regard of the infinite worth and dignity of his person: Once in the end of the world, in the gospel-age, the last age of the world, hath he appeared to take away sin by the sacrifice of himself. Here note, That the virtue of Christ's sacrifice once offered, did extend itself to all times, and purchased pardon for sins committed in all ages, even long before it was offered: For the death of Christ must be considered, not as a natural, but as a moral cause; not as a medicine that heals, but as a ransom that frees a captive. A captive may be released upon assurance given that a ransom shall be paid: Though it be not actually paid. Thus the death of Christ was available to purchase pardon for believers before his coming, because he interposed as their surety; and is therefore called the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, not only in respect of God's decree, but Christ's efficacy: The salvation we derive from him, was ever in him; Christ's once offering was sufficient; his sacrifice may be often commemorated, but only once offered. Such indeed is the absolute perfection of the once offering of Christ, that it stands in need of, and will admit of no repetition in any kind.

Note farther, That this once offering of Christ is always effectual unto all the ends of it; now and hereafter, even no less than it was in the day and hour when it was actually offered. This sacrifice needs no repetition like those of old, but is always fresh in the virtue of it, and needs nothing but renewed application by faith for the communication of its effects and fruits unto us: for by one offering he hath for ever perfected them that are sanctified. Through the sufferings of Christ were necessary to the expiation of sin, yet he suffered neither more nor oftener than less, and would have been useless. Note lastly, The great end for which Christ once became a sacrifice, namely, to put away sin; plainly implying, that sin had erected a dominion, a tyranny over all men, as by a law; that no power of any mere creature was able to disannul or abolish this law of sin; that the destruction and dissolution of this law of sin, was the great end of Christ's coming, to discharge his priestly office in the sacrifice of himself: Now in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away, to abolish and destroy, &c.

27 And as it is appointed unto men once to die, but after this the judgment: 28 So Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many; and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time; without sin, unto salvation.

These words may be considered relatively and absolutely. Relatively thus; "As God has appointed that all men should once die penalty for sin, and then be judged, so did he determine that Christ should once suffer penalty, to expiate sin, and take away the guilt of it fully. And as after death men must appear the second time to judgment; so after his once offering to take away sin and death, Christ shall appear the second time to bestow upon us eternal salvation." Note here, That Christ's being offered to take away the sins of many, cannot be meant of his taking them away in the Socinian sense, to wit, by his holy doctrine, which was confirmed by his death, but of his bearing our sins by way of imputation: For this is evident from the opposition here between his first appearance and his second: Christ was once offered to bear our sins, but he shall appear a second time without sin? Why? Did he not appear the first time without sin? Yes, certainly he did, as to any inherent guilt; for the Scripture assures us he had no sin. What then is the meaning of the opposition, at his first coming he bore our sins; at his second coming he shall appear without sin? The words can have no other imaginable sense but this; that at his first coming he sustained the person of sinner, and died as a sacrifice; but at his second coming he shall appear as a judge, to confer eternal life on those who are made partakers of the sacrifice of his death. Thus the words are to be considered relatively. Absolutely thus, It is appointed for all men once to die. Here is the first word of certainty, all men must die: then the word of singularity, they must once die, not often; once and but once; they die by statute and appointment. The supreme Lord of life and death appoints man his time, both for coming into the world, and going out of it: We come in at his command, and leave it at this dispose. And after death the judgment: The word after signifies the order of time; for death goes before, and judgment follows it. The judgment is both particular of every individual person, and general and universal of all: after which follows the final, eternal, and unalterable condition of man, either in a state of misery, or felicity. The parties judged will be angels and men: the person judging, Jesus Christ: he, by redeeming mankind, obtained right and power to judge mankind; such a Judge as the power of the mightiest cannot daunt; such a Judge as the subtilty of the wisest cannot delude; such a Judge as the riches of the wealthiest cannot bribe: In a word, such a Judge as there is no appealing from, or repealing of his sentence. O great day! when the stiffest knee shall bow at the tribunal of Jesus Christ, and the strongest back shall break under the insupportable burden of a Redeemer's wrath! when the Alexanders and Cæsars, which once shook the earth, and made the world to tremble, shall revere and lie prostrate at the foot of Christ! And, Lord, seeing that judgment is before us, let us seriously believe it, daily expect, duly prepare for it; let no profit tempt us, no pleasure entice us, no power embolden us, no privacy encourage us, to do that thing which we cannot account for at thy tribunal. Amen.

C H A P. X.

Our apostle's design in this chapter, is twofold; first, To shew the weakness and imperfection of the Levitical sacrifices considered in themselves, and the necessity and efficacy of the sacrifice of Christ. Secondly, To improve this doctrine unto faith, obedience, and perseverance in our Christian profession unto the death; by several weighty arguments.

FOR the law having a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image of the things,—

In the former part of this chapter, the apostle proves the impotency and imperfection of the levitical sacrifices by sundry arguments; namely, first, from the nature of them, they were but shadows; from the plurality of them, they were many; from the repetition of them, they were often; and from the inefficaciousness of them, they could not take away sin. The former of these is taken notice of, in this first verse, The law having a shadow of good things to come. An allusion probably to the art of painting wherein a shadow is first drawn; and afterwards the very image itself: or a metaphor taken from the shadow of a body in the light of the sun. As a shadow is the representation of a body; a just and true representation of it, and of nothing else, yet but an obscure representation of a body; the life, vigour, and spirit of a body, cannot be represented by it: Thus was it between the sacrifices of the law, and the sacrifice of Christ; the blood of those sacrifices were representations of Christ; they were a just representation of Christ: He was the idea in the mind of God, when Moses was charged to make all things according to the pattern shewed him in the mount; and they were but an obscure and dark representation of him; the glory and efficacy of these good things appeared unto not visible in them. Learn hence, That whatever there may be in religious institutions, and the diligent observation of them, if they only shadow forth Jesus Christ, and do not actually exhibit him to the faith of believers, with the benefits of his mediation, they cannot make us perfect, nor give us acceptance with God.

— Can never with those sacrifices which they offered year by year continually, make the comers thereunto perfect. 2 For then, would they not have ceased to be offered? because that the worshippers once purged should have had no more conscience of sins. 3 But in those sacrifices there is a remembrance again made of sins every year.

Here we have a second argument to prove the impotency and weakness of the legal sacrifices; and it is drawn from the repetition and non-cessation of them. Thus, "Those sacrifices which were often repeated, year by year, could not of themselves make satisfaction for sin, or purge the conscience of the sinner from guilt. Had justice been satisfied, and conscience quieted, there had been no reason why those sacrifices should have been so often repeated. But the case was otherwise, for in their most solemn sacrifices there was a commemoration and confession made of their former sins by the high priest every year; which was an intimation to them, that they needed a new and better sacrifice for the expiation of sin; namely, that of the Messiah, in and by which alone remission of sin was to be expected, and obtained." Learn hence, 1. That the repetition and reiteration of the same sacrifices, is an evident demonstration of their weakness and insufficiency. Accordingly the church of Rome, by affirming the sacrifice in the mass to be the very same with that which Christ offered on the cross, do prove an insufficiency in the sacrifice of Christ for the expiation of sin, if the apostle's argument here be good: for he affirms, that all sacrifices that must be repeated are weak and insufficient. Learn, 2. That although repeated sins have need of repeated confession, and renewed pardon, yet they have no need of a sacrifice; For he who is once purged has no more conscience of sin, that is, though he knows he has many sins, yet he has not a trembling, tormenting, accusing conscience, because he is purged, and his sins pardoned, through that one sacrifice of Jesus Christ: Learn, 3. That the discharge of conscience from the guilt of sin, by virtue of the sacrifice of Christ, is a full demonstration of the sufficiency of the virtue of that sacrifice; and that there needs no reiteration of it, but only fresh applications made unto it by repeated acts and exercises of faith.

4 For it is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins.

The intendment of our apostle in these words, is to prove, that the sacrifices of the law could not expiate sin, nor make reconciliation with God, which the sacrifice of Christ alone was ordained and appointed to. Here observe, 1. The subject-matter spoken of, The blood of bulls and goats: they were accompanied with great solemnity and pomp of ceremony in their celebration; and the people had a great esteem and veneration of them in their minds; but when all was done, that which was offered was no more than the blood of bulls and goats. 2. That which is denied of these sacrifices, namely, the taking away of sins: To take away sin, is to make an atonement for sin, to expiate the guilt of it before God, by a satisfaction given, or price paid, that it shall never bind over the penitent sinner unto punishment. 2. The manner of the negation; It was impossible that the blood of bulls and goats should take away sins. Impossible from divine institution; they were never designed for that end, therefore could never effect it; for the virtue of every institution depends upon its designation to its end. Now the blood of bulls was only designed to represent the taking away of sin, but never by itself to effect it. And it was also impossible from the nature of the thing; for how could the blood of a beast expiate the sin of a man? satisfaction must be made for sin in and by the same nature that had sinned. Learn hence, That it was utterly impossible that sin should be taken away before God, and from the blood of Christ: it is this alone that cleanseth us from all sin, for he alone was the propitiation for them.

5 Wherefore, when he cometh into the world, be faith, Sacrifice and offering thou wouldst not, but a body hast thou prepared me. 6 In burnt-offerings and sacrifices for sin thou hast had no pleasure. 7 Then said I, Lo, I come (in the volume of the book it is written of me) to do thy will, O God. 8 Above, when he said, Sacrifice and offering, and burnt-offerings, and offering for sin thou wouldst not, neither hadst pleasure therein (which are offered by the law :) 9 Then said he, Lo, I come to do thy will, O God. He taketh away the first, that he may establish the second. 10 But the which wilt we are sanctified, through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all.

Our apostle having shewed the weakness and insufficiency of the Levitical sacrifices in the former verses, he comes now to declare the efficacy and sufficiency of Christ's sacrifice, and of his blessed undertaking, to do, fulfil, perform, and suffer all things required by the will and wisdom, by the holiness and righteousness of God, unto the complete salvation of the church. And this he doth by a quotation out of the Old Testament, Psal. xl. 6, 7, 8. Where Christ is brought in, as newly made man, speaking to his Father, in and after this manner: "Forasmuch as thy wisdom did institute, and formerly appoint sacrifices, as types to prefigure the sacrifice of thy Son, but thou didst not intend their long continuance, when he should once be offered up; pursuant to this holy will and pleasure of thine, I am now come into the world: Thou hast prepared me a body, an holy and innocent human nature, fit to be united to my glorious Godhead; in which nature I will suffer, and, by my sufferings, satisfy thy justice for sin; and, by the sufficiency of my sacrifice, put a period to all the Levitical sacrifices that did precede me, and prefigure figure me. Learn hence, 1. That in the fulness of God's appointed time, Christ came into the world to accomplish that which the Levitical sacrifices did only prefigure, but could not effectuate. 2. That in order thereunto, Christ did assume the human nature, and offered in himself that nature willingly to his Father, as a sacrifice to atone divine displeasure. 3. That by this one sacrifice and oblation of Christ, which he performed in obedience to the will of God, all that believe in him are justified and saved, do obtain remission of sin; grace here, and glory hereafter; By which will we are justified, through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all.

11 And every priest standeth daily ministering, and offering oftentimes the same sacrifices, which can never take away sins: 12 But this man, after he had offered one sacrifice for sins, for ever sat down on the right hand of God: 13 From henceforth expecting till his enemies be made his footstool: 14 For by one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified.

Our apostle still proceeds upon his former argument, namely, to assign a farther difference between Christ and the Levitical priests. 1. The Levitical priesthood consisted of a plurality of persons; the priests were many; by reason of death they had many successors; but the evangelical priesthood consisted but of one single person, the Lord Jesus, called here, this man. 2. The Levitical priesthood consisted of a plurality of sacrifices; there were also many, many in number, and many in kind, bulls, lambs, goats, &c. but the sacrifice which Christ offered was but one, as to the kind, namely, That body which was prepared, ver. 5. 3. The Levitical sacrifices were oftentimes offered, ver. 11. but the sacrifice of Christ was but once offered. 4. The Levitical sacrifices could never take away sin; but Christ by the sacrifice of his death took away sin for ever, fully and everlastingly. 5. The Levitical priests stood and ministered, ver. 11. Every priest standeth daily. This is the posture of servants; but Christ sits, which is the posture of a Lord; This man after he had offered sat down. 6. They stood daily ministering and offering, because their sacrifices could not take away sin; but Christ did his work fully by one offering, and after that sits or rests forever in heaven. Learn hence, 1. That Christ crucified is the only divine and proper sacrifice under the gospel, Divine, because its institution and appointment was of God: proper, because all the essential properties of an expiatory sacrifice were found in this. It was a living creature offered by a priest; it was offered to God, and it was a sweet savour unto him; and it is the only proper sacrifice of the gospel: Doing good is called a sacrifice; Heb. xiii. 16. Righteousness is called a sacrifice; Psal. iv. 5. but not properly, but allusively and metaphorically only. Learn 2. That the sacrifice of Christ is but of one kind, and was but once offered; yet is of such unspeakable value, and everlasting efficacy, as to take away sin fully and finally, and to perfect all them that are or shall be sanctified to the end of the world. The virtue of this sacrifice reacheth backward as far as Adam, and reacheth forward to the last believer springing from Adam: And as it reacheth backward and forward to all believers, in former, present, and future ages, so to all the sins of all believers, which are fully purged and expiated by it; the design and end of this oblation being to atone, pacify and reconcile God, by giving a full and adequate compensation and satisfaction to the justice of God, for the wrong done to the holiness of his law. Thus our Jesus, by one offering, has perfected forever them that are sanctified.

15 Whereof the Holy Ghost also is a witness to us: for after that he had said before, 16 This is the covenant that I will make with them after those days, saith the Lord, I will put my laws into their hearts; and in their minds will I write them: 17 And their sins and iniquities will I remember no more. 18 Now, where remission of these is, there is no more offering for sin.

Our apostle had asserted the perfection of Christ's sacrifice in the former verses, he proves it in these by the testimony of the Holy Ghost, recorded, Jer. xxxi. 31. where after he had promised a new covenant instead of the old, and had said, This is the covenant I will make with them after these days, namely, when the days of the Old Testament are expired, then he says, I will put my laws into their hearts, and their sins and iniquities will I remember no more. Now seeing God promiseth, under the new covenant, sanctification and remission of sin to all believers, of which covenant Christ is Mediator, and by whose death the covenant is ratified and confirmed, therefore this one sacrifice once offered up is abundantly sufficient. And if remission of sins be obtained by Christ's one sacrifice, there needs no repetition of it, nor any other offering for sin. Learn hence, That the sacrifice of Christ was of that excellent virtue and transcendent merit, that by once offering it took away sin, all sin, and made it eternally remissible; and upon faith actually and eternally remitted: To what purpose then should there be any more offerings for sin? Yea, they who look for and trust to any other, fall into that sin for which there is no remission provided in the covenant, nor shall any other offering be accepted for them for ever; for, they despise both the wisdom and grace of God, the blood of Christ, and the testimony of the Holy Ghost; whereof there is no remission. Here now we are come to a full end of the doctrinal part of this epistle, concerning the nature of Christ's priesthood, the necessity and efficacy of his sacrifice, the power and prevalence of his intercession. O glorious mysteries; the light of the church of the Gentiles, the glory of the people Israel, the foundation and bulwark of evangelical faith!

19 Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, 20 By a new and living way, which he hath consecrated for us, through the vail, that is to say, his flesh; 21 And having an high priest over the house of God: 22 Let us draw near with a true heart, in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and our bodies washed with pure water.

The apostle having thus finished the doctrinal part of his discourse, and informed their judgment of the excellency of the evangelical service above the Levitical sacrifices, he comes now in the applicatory part of his discourse, to direct their practice in several weighty and important duties, which appeared to be incumbent upon them; as namely, to draw near to God, ver. 22. to persevere in the Christian profession, ver. 23. to stir up one another to love and good works, ver. 24. to continue in Christian communion, ver. 25. The first duty exhorted to, is to draw near to God, seeing we have boldness, &c. Let us draw near with a true heart. Note here, 1. The duty exhorted to, and that is, to draw near to God; in general, to worship him; in particular, to pray unto him, and seek remission of sin and eternal life from him; to come unto God as clothed with glorious majesty, sitting upon a throne of grace, and propitiated by the blood of Christ. 2. The manner of performing this duty, with a pure heart and in full assurance of faith: with the heart, or we give him a skin instead of a sacrifice; with sincerity of heart, which is the life and soul of all acceptable worship; and with a full assurance of faith, grounded upon the fidelity of God, and the immutability of the promise. 3. The qualifications of the person: He that draws near to God, must, 1. Have his heart sprinkled from an evil conscience, that is, his soul cleansed by the blood of Christ, and freed from the accusations of an evil condemning conscience. 2. His body washed with pure water, to wit, the laver of regeneration, which was signified by the legal washings. 4. The encouragement we have thus to draw near to God; and that is threefold, 1. We have a new and living way unto the holiest by the blood of Jesus; an allusion to the legal dispensation, wherein the high priest had a way to pass through the vail with blood into the holiest, to expiate the people's sins, and obtain mercy for them: Ours is called a new way, because newly made manifest; and a living way, because it leads to and ends in life eternal; or a living way, in opposition to the typical way of going into the holiest, which was a dead way to all but the high priest, and to him too, if he entered above once a year, and then also if he entered without blood. Farther, this new and living way is here said to be consecrated through the vail of Christ's flesh: that is, made passable for penitent sinners, the throne of grace made accessible through the blood of a Mediator. When Christ died, the vail of the temple was rent, to signify that our great High Priest was ready to enter the Holy place of heaven, to procure eternal redemption for us. 2. Encouragement is boldness, or freedom and liberty to enter into the holiest; a freedom for our prayers to enter heaven whilst we live, and a right and liberty for our person to enter it when we die. 3. The mean, whereby we obtain this liberty, By the blood of Jesus. We, that before could not come near him for our sins, may now come near him by faith in the blood of his Son; for that blood satisfied justice, merited divine favour, and made God accessible. Learn hence, 1. That as sin had made God inaccessible to sinners, as sinners; so the blood of Christ, that new and living way, has made him accessible to believers. 2. That although, from the first promise of Christ, there was always a way for believers to come to God, yet was not so manifest, as it was after Christ's death and ascension, and the gospel's revelation.

23. Let us hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering: for he is faithful that promised.

The second duty which the apostle exhorts the Hebrews here unto, is perseverance in the Christian faith and hope, in order to the actual enjoyment of the great reward. Where observe, 1. The duty itself, to hold fast the profession of our faith: not blindly, without due examination; but, having examined the grounds and foundations of our faith; to maintain the profession of it against all temptations and terrors of the world, occasioned by sufferings and persecution, and against all the cunning arts and insinuations of busy and disputing men, whose design is to unhinge us from our religion; and make us proselytes to their party and faction: Thus let us hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering. 2. The reason of enforcing this duty, because he is faithful that promised. Mark the gradation: We have a promise, even a promise of eternal glory, as the reward of our perseverance. This promise is God's promise, not man's, and the promise of a faithful God, who neither can or will change his mind: he can as soon change his being as change his word and promise; He is faithful that has promised.

24. And let us consider one another to provoke unto love, and to good works.

Observe here the duty exhorted to, To consider one another, that is, to watch over one another. This consideration respects the gifts, the graces, the temptations, the dangers of one another, and is the foundation of all those mutual duties of warning, exhorting, and admonishing one another: Duties, God knows, generally lost amongst us, and with them is the glory of the Christian religion departed from us. Learn hence, That the mutual watch of Christians over each other, and their mutual exhortations of each other unto gospel-duties, is necessarily required, as a special mean for their preservation in their Christian profession. Observe, 2. The duty we are to provoke and be provoked unto; and that is, to love and good works; that is no true faith which can be separated from love; and that is no true love that is separated from good works. The great end of christian communion amongst believers, should be to excite one another to love; which is the spring and fountain of all good works; and to provoke one another to good works; as the genuine effect and fruit of a sincere love to God and our neighbour.

25. Not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is; but exhorting one another: and so much the more as ye see the day approaching.

Observe here, 1. That in the apostles times there were Christian assemblies, in which christians did meet together to worship and serve God, and to edify and comfort one another; and in times of peace and liberty, they had convenient places erected and separated for that end and use.

The light of nature, as well as of scripture, dictates that God is to be worshipped solemnly and publicly; that public worship pleases him most, and that he accepts it best. 2. It was the manner and custom of some then to forsake the public assemblies; some out of sloth and negligence; others out of fear of persecution: This was a dangerous sin, and so continues. God and Christ esteem themselves forsaken, when their worship and worshippers are causelessly forsaken. 3. The duty intimated and directed, to, not to forsake the assembling together, as some do; for christian assemblies are the life, the food, and nourishment of our souls: consequently forsaking of church assemblies is usually the forerunner of apostasy. 4. The great inducement and encouragement to this duty, because the day approacheth. What day? Answer. The day of Jerusalem's approaching destruction, to them; the day of death and judgment coming upon, and hastening towards us. Learn hence, That the intimations given of approaching judgments, ought to influence unto special diligence in all evangelical duties. 2. That to see evidently the approaches of death and judgment, and yet not to be sedulous and diligent in the duties of divine worship, is a sign and token of a backsliding frame, tending unto final apostasy; from Christ and his holy religion.

26 For if we sin wilfully, after that we have received the knowledge of the truth there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins, 27 But a certain fearful looking for of judgment, and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries.

In these verses the apostle gives a vehement enforcement of his preceding exhortation, to an unfainting perseverance in the profession of christianity; and this is drawn from the dreadful consequences of apostasy. We have here the nature of the sin expressed, the impossibility of deliverance from the guilt of it declared, and the punishment that will unavoidably follow upon it asserted. Observe, 1. Wherein the nature of this sin consists, if we sin wilfully, that is, by renouncing christianity. Where note, How our apostle puts himself in among the number; to shew that there is no respect of persons in this matter, but those who have equally sinned, shall be equally punished. Note farther, That the apostle, by sinning wilfully, does not mean every wilful sin, and that there is no recovery after any voluntary sin committed; but by wilfully, he means obstinately, maliciously, and with despise. Observe, 2. The season and circumstance of this sin, After we have received the knowledge of the truth, that is, after the gospel has been preached unto us, and we, upon conviction of its truth, and sense of its power, have taken upon us the public profession of christianity: After we have dedicated ourselves to Christ in baptism; and joined ourselves unto the body of his church: After all this, to relinquish and renounce the christian profession, either for fear of suffering, or love of this present world, exposes us to an unutterable and inevitable condemnation. 3. What the apostle charges as an aggravation of this sin, namely, that it cannot be expiated, There remains no more sacrifice for sin: For God has no other Spirit to offer as a sacrifice for sin, if this be rejected; and no other Spirit to make that sacrifice effectual, if the Holy Spirit be despised, and finally resisted; and therefore no ground of hope can remain for such apostates. The punishment of sins unpardonable is unavoidable: It is an eternal degree of divine justice, that the sacrifice of Christ shall never benefit that man, who finally falls away after, he has received the knowledge of the truth. 4. The dreadful and tremendous judgment here threatened to apostates, and what they must eternally expect, namely, the fiery indignation, and fearful wrath of the just and holy God. From the whole learn, 1. That there is an inseparable connection between apostacy and eternal ruin. 2. That the minds of wretched apostates are oftentimes filled with dreadful expectations of approaching wrath. 3. The dread and terror of God's final judgment against apostates, is, in itself, inconceivable, and accordingly shadowed out by things of the greatest dread and terror in the world. 4. That God's fiery indignation, though it shall devour his adversaries, yet shall it never eat them up; it shall eternally prey upon them, but never consume them, or annihilate their being. O mysterious fire! whose strange property is always to torture; but never to kill; or always to kill, but never to consume. God grant that we may never experimentally know, or feelingly find, either where hell is, or what it is.

28 He that despised Moses's law, died without mercy, under two or three witnesses: 29 Of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy, who hath trodden under foot the Son of God, and hath counted the blood of the covenant, wherewith he was sanctified, an unholy thing, and hath done despite unto the Spirit of grace?

The apostle here confirms what he had before spoken of the sad and certain destruction of apostates; and compares it with the punishment inflicted on the breakers of Moses' law. If those, under the testimony of two or three witnesses, of that apostacy died without mercy; how much sorer punishment is due to the contemners of Christ, who tread under foot, that is, vilify and undervalue our Lord Jesus Christ, esteeming him as one that died a public malefactor; counting the blood of the covenant an unholy thing; that is, a common thing; making nothing of the solemnest rite that ever was used in the world for the confirmation of any covenant, to wit, the shedding of the blood of the Son of God, and doing despite unto the Spirit of grace: as it he were guilty of lying and falsehood, in bearing witness of the divine power of Christ. Learn hence, 1. That although to transgress Moses' law was an heinous offence, yet to sin wilfully against the gospel, after we have received the knowledge of it, is far more heinous. 2. That to revolt from and rebel against God, loving sinful man, against Jesus Christ ransoming and redeeming captive slaves, and against the Holy Spirit sanctifying and cleansing polluted souls, comes nearest the sin of devils; and as the sin is the more heinous, so the punishment must be far more grievous: for God has allotted different degrees of punishments unto different degrees and aggravations of sins. Learn 3. That the punishment of final apostasy is eternal without the most distant hope of mercy, and without the least relaxation of punishment; for they shall have judgment without any mercy.

30 For we know him that hath said, Vengeance belongeth unto me; I will recompense, saith the Lord. And again, the Lord shall judge his people.

The apostle had declared in the verses before, the certain judgment of apostates: Here he declares the judge, the Lord; and the judgment, vengeance; Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord: Where, by vengeance, is meant vindictive justice in punishing sinners. The apostle's argument seems to lie thus; "If God professes himself an avenger of all sin and injury done to his people, as he certainly doth, Duet. xxxii. 36. much more will he shew himself an avenger of so horrible an indignity offered to his Son and his Holy Spirit." Learn hence, That the consideration of the righteous nature of God, and that inclosure he has made of vengeance, to himself under an irrevocable purpose for its execution, gives undoubted assurance of the unavoidable destruction of all wilful apostates.

31 It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.

Our apostle, in these words, winds up his whole argument against the wilful despisers of the gospel, taken from the aggravation of that sin, with the severity of the punishment that would certainly befall them that are guilty of it. Note here, 1. The description given of God, he is the living God: so called, both by way of opposition unto all dead and dumb idols, and also with respect to his lively power and strength, whereby he is able to avenge the sins of men; and likewise to signify the eternal duration of his existence. He ever liveth to execute his wrath, and inflict vengeance on the apostate sinner. Learn, That the name of the living God is either full of terror or comfort to the souls of men. O Lord! thine attributes, which are the principal delight of all sincere christians, and the sincere object of their hope and faith, are an eternal spring of dread and terror to all impenitent sinners. Note, 2. What is the effect and fruit of all sin in general, and of apostasy in particular, namely, a falling into God's hands. There is a threefold hand of God mentioned in scripture; his protecting hand, his correcting hand, and his wrathful and revenging hand. It is safe and comfortable to fall into God's protecting hand; it is profitable and beneficial, though not pleasing and delightful, to fall into God's chastening and correcting hand; but to fall into his angry hand, his wrathful and revengeful hand, this is sad and fearful: either to fall under this sentence of his wrath in this life, or under the full and final execution of that wrath in the life to come. 3. The tremendous dreadfulfulness of that wrath; it is a fearful, dreadful thing, that which no tongue can utter, no heart conceive. Who knoweth the power of thy wrath? Psalm xc. Learn hence, That the wrath and vengeance which the ever-living God will certainly inflict upon all wicked sinners in general, and upon all wretched apostates in particular, is very dreadful and tremendous: and so must needs be, because it is a wrath inconceivably great, and unavoidably sure and because it is the wrath of a just God, of an almighty God, and of an ever-living God.

32 But to call to remembrance the former days, in which, after which ye were illuminated, ye endured a great fight of afflictions.

Our apostle here proceeds to a new argument to persuade Christians to perseverance, drawn from the consideration of their former sufferings for christianity: "Since ye were illuminated, that is, baptized into the christian faith, ye endured courageously afflictions, a fight of afflictions, yea, a great fight of afflictions." Learn hence, That the wisdom of God oft-times permits and suffers persons, at their first conversion, to fall into manifold trials and temptations: carnal relations now first scold, then frown, and at the last cast off. The world hates them, marks them out for persecution, loads them with calumny and slander. But observe farther, the apostle directs them to call to remembrance their former sufferings: He does not mean the remembrance of what was bitter and afflictive in their sufferings, but the cause for which they suffered, and the presence of God enjoyed by them in and under their sufferings: This would encourage, embolden, and strengthen unto duty. Learn hence, That a wise management of former experience is a great direction and encouragement unto future obedience.

33 Partly whilst ye were made a gazing-stock both by reproaches and afflictions; and partly, whilst ye became companions of them that were so used.

Here our apostle particularly mentions the sufferings which the primitive saints underwent for the sake of christianity, and reduces them to three heads, shame, pain, loss: They suffered in their names, by being disgraced; in their persons by being scourged; in their estates, by the spoiling of their goods. Let all that make profession of the name of Christ expect and provide for such sufferings, especially for reproaches. We may put a due value upon our names and reputations, but must not be over-solicitous about the preservation of them. Let us keep in the way of our duty, and leave our good name to God's care and keeping. The world first thunders out reproaches, then falls into a storm of persecution. Learn hence, That all temporary sufferings, in all their aggravating circumstances, in all their formidable dress and appearance, may be, and oft-times are, the lot and portion of those who have undertaken the profession of christianity. Ye endured a great fight of afflictions, whilst ye were made a gazing-stock to the world. The christians here were exposed to the world as it were upon a stage, or in a theatre where multitudes might gaze upon them, exile, and make a sport of them.

34 For ye had compassion on me in my bonds, and took joyfully the spoiling of your goods, knowing in yourselves that ye have in heaven a better and an enduring substance.

The first words of this verse, Ye had compassion on me in my bonds, prove St. Paul to be the author of this epistle; for for who else could there be, whose bonds for the gospel were so known, and so famous among the believing Jews? His bonds were first at Jerusalem, afterwards at Rome, the two capital cities of the Jews and Gentiles. And St. Paul declares here what a tender sympathy and fellow-feeling with him in his sufferings they did express: ye had compassion on me in my bonds, that is, ye owned me in my sufferings, ye sympathized with me under my sufferings, ye administered to my succour and relief when burthened with my sufferings. Observe next, he reminds them their deportment under their own sufferings; Ye took joyfully the spoiling of your goods. Probably, the bread which they eat, the clothes which they wore, the beds whereon they lay, were taken from them by their persecutors: yet all this spoil was taken joyfully; not more joyfully by the spoilers, than it was by the spoiled. Learn, It is the peculiar glory and excellency of the gospel, that it gives insuperable joy unto the christian's mind, under the greatest outward sufferings: They endured joyfully the spoiling of their goods. Observe lastly, The reason of this their christian patience under sufferings; they had a substance; they had a substance in heaven; and they had a better substance in heaven than they lost upon earth; and they knew they had it, knowing in yourselves that ye have in heaven a better, &c. Learn hence, That faith, by giving an incomparable preference to the things of heaven, above all perishing things on earth, affords abundant joy and full satisfaction in the loss of them all, upon the account of an assured interest in better things.

35 Cast not away therefore your confidence, which hath great recompense of reward.

As if he had said, "Seeing you have endured so much, never shrink back from a bold and courageous profession of Christ and his holy religion, which will be crowned with a great recompense of reward." Observe, 1. The exhortation, Cast not away your confidence and courage in the free possession of christianity, like cowardly soldiers, that in the heat of the battle do cast down their shields and armour, and run away. The christian is a spiritual soldier; he must not shrink, or give back, but die a conqueror rather than be taken prisoner. 2. The reason which enforces the exhortation, (Which hath a great recompense of reward), mark, the reward is certain, and that it is due to such as persevere. Perseverance and the reward are inseparably joined together; so that the one shall infallibly follow the other. Hence learn, That in all times of suffering, and in the approaches of them, it is the duty of believers to look upon the glory of heaven, under the notion of a refreshing and all-sufficient reward; Cast not away your confidence, &c.

36 For ye have need of patience; that after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promise. 37 For yet a little while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry.

Ye have need of patience: But had they it not already, when they endured such a great sight of afflictions? Yes, assuredly; the meaning thereof is this: "Ye have need of the continual exercise of patience;" implying; that without the constant exercise of patience, none can pass through tribulation to the glory of God, and their own advantage. We have need of patience to perform difficult duties, to resist strong temptations, to wait for an answer of our prayers, and also to wait for the reward of our patience. After we have done the will of God, we have need of patience to enable us to wait for the receiving of promise, that is, the good promised. Here note, that the glory of heaven, firmly believed, will powerfully sustain the christian spirit under sufferings. 2. That patience is as necessary to enable us to expect and wait for the reward of our sufferings, as it is needful and necessary to support and uphold us under sufferings. Observe farther, The comfortable assurance which the apostle gives, both of the certain coming, and speedy coming of Christ to reward their faith and patience: he that shall come will come, and will not tarry. Note, here, The christian's suffering season will be short, Christ will come to call him off. He will come, and will not tarry; and when he comes, no difficulties shall be able to stand before him, but such as have suffered patiently, shall be rewarded gloriously.

38 Now the just shall live by faith, but if any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him.

These words, The just shall live by faith, are taken out of the prophet Habakkuk, and are three times made use of by St. Paul, in his epistles, Rom. i. 17. Gal. iii. 11. and in this place. By the just man, understand a justified man; by the life which he lives, understand a life of sanctification and of glorification, a life of grace and holiness, and a life of glory and happiness. Learn, That whatever life the believer lives, after a more excellent manner, and for more excellent purposes and ends than other men, he lives that life by the help and assistance of his faith.—In the following words, But if any man draw back, &c. Observe, 1. The crime supposed, if any man that has embraced christianity, shall, either for sufferings feared or felt, draw back from his holy profession. The word signifies to sneak and slink away out of fear; and the apostle means by it, a quitting our profession of christianity for fear of suffering. Learn hence, That in and under great, sharp, and long trials, persons are in danger of drawing back from that profession of the gospel wherein they are engaged. Observe, 2. The sentence pronounced upon this crime, My soul shall have no pleasure in him; that is, God will be exceedingly displeased with him, and punish him very severely; intimating, that apostacy from God's true religion, is a sin highly provoking to him, and will be most severely punished by him. Here note, That these threatenings imply, that there is a possibility of their falling away, considered in themselves; but not that they are ever totally deserted by the Holy Spirit, and left under the reigning power of sin. These threatenings are intended to awaken their care, and have a singular influence on their preservation. From the whole learn, That backsliders from the gospel are, in a peculiar manner, the abhorrency of the soul of God: If any man draw back, &c.

39 But we are not of them who draw back unto perdition; but of them that believe to the saving of the soul.

Observe here, 1. A two-fold opposite state, namely, them that draw back, and them that believe, that is, persevere in believing: we are not of them that draw back. Intimating, 1. That in the visible church there ever have been, are, and will be, a number of hypocrites, who, for fear of suffering in a time of persecution, will draw back. 2. That it is every christians duty to evidence to his own conscience, and also to give evidence to others, that he is not of this sort or number: we are not of them who draw back. Observe, 2. A two fold opposite event, perdition on the one hand, and salvation on the other. The first of these is denied, the latter is affirmed, concerning these Hebrews: we are not of them that draw back unto perdition, &c. Where note, 1. The actual influence of apostasy on the one hand to destruction; nothing can free apostates from eternal ruin. 2. The actual influence of faith on the other hand to the saving of the soul. Thence learn, That sincere faith will carry men through all difficulties, hazards, and troubles, unto the certain enjoyment of eternal blessedness. We are of them that do believe, &c.

CHAP. XI.

Our apostle having, in the close of the foregoing chapter, spoken of the just man's living by faith, he comes, in this chapter, to give an excellent description of it, and passes many high encomiums upon it, shewing both what it is, and what great things it has done in all ages of the church.

NOW faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen.

Observe here, 1. The thing described, or the subject spoken of, and that is faith; that faith whereby the just man lives, the apostle here speaks of, though not as justifying, but as it is effectually useful in our whole life, especially unto constancy and perseverance in the christian profession, which was the great duty urged and enforced in the foregoing chapter. 2. The description itself, it is the substance of things hoped for. 1. That is, it is a confident and firm expectation of the good things which God has promised, giving the good things hoped for, a real substance in our minds and souls. 2. It is the evidence of things not seen; that is, it evidences the reality and certainty of future things, it realizes the invisible realities of another world unto our minds, and causes us to believe them as strongly as what we see with our bodily eyes. Learn hence, That a lively faith gives such a reality, certainty, and present being to things hoped for, and yet to come, as if they were visibly seen and actually enjoyed.

2 For by it the elders obtained a good report.

Having in the former verse described faith, in this and the following verses he enters upon the just praise and deserved condemnation of this divine and excellent grace, which has such an universal influence into all the parts of the christian life. In this verse, to commend that faith which he had in the former verse described, he brings in the experience of the elders, or Old Testament saints, all true believers from the foundation of the world, who by faith obtained from God a good testimony, recorded in the holy scriptures. By it, or through it, as a condition appointed and ordained of God; not for it, or by the worth and influence of it, as a meritorious cause, the elders or saints of God, from the beginning of the world, obtained a good report. Learn hence, 1. That the Old Testament saints had the same kind of faith that we have, and were saved in the same manner that we are; they had the same promises, the same terms of grace, the same meritorious purchase by the blood of Christ: He is therefore called the Lamb slain from the beginning of the world; slain in God's purpose and decree, slain in the types and figures of his death; though his blood was not actually shed, yet was it decreed to be shed, and so was as effectual to them as to us. 2. That the renown of the Old Testament saints was their faith, that made them famous; not their priority in living before us, not their longevity in living many years beyond us, not upon account of their other graces, which yet rendered them truly excellent; are they said to obtain a good report, but upon the score and account of their faith. Abel was famous for righteousness; Enoch for walking with God, Abraham for obedience; Moses for meekness, but the crown is set upon the head of their faith only; by it the elders obtained, &c.

3 Through faith we understand that the worlds were framed, by the word of God, so that the things which are seen were not made of things which do appear.

The design of the apostle in these words is to prove, that faith satisfies itself in the word of God, concerning the way and manner of the world's creation; for though the world be now visible, and the things contained in it are said to be seen, yet the original framing and making of the world has a principal place among things not seen. Learn hence, That by faith ascending to divine revelation, and not by reason, we understand the truth and wonders, the seasons and causes, the manner and end of the world's creation. Reason indeed tells us that there was a creation, consequently a creator; but reason without divine revelation could never have discovered the circumstances and manner of the creation, which wholly depended upon the will of God. Reason and nature could never have known them, had not God in his word first revealed them: The old heathens could never determine who made the world, nor when, or how it was made, nor whence, and out of what it was made. Reason may propound the question, how was the world made, and all things therein? But revelation must resolve it. A poor child learns more by his catechism, than all the philosophers ever learnt by their profound researches, and painful studies. Through faith we understand that the worlds were framed, it follows, by the word of God, that is, both by his external and internal word, his word of command, saying, Let it be; He speak, and it was done, Pſal. xxxiii. 9. And alſo by his eſſential and ſubſtantial word, Jeſus Chriſt, by whom God made the worlds, Heb. i. 2. in that order which Moſes has hiſtorically related. Obſerve, laſtly, How and after what manner the world was made, not out of any pre-jacent or pre-exiſtent matter, but out of nothing: That which was not at all, could not be ſeen: the things that are ſeen, were not made of things that do appear. Here note, that the power of God framed many things out of nothing, as the heaven of heavens, the dwelling place of God, and angels, immediately; other things mediately out of the chaos, that is, ſuch rude, undiſpoſed, and unſit matter, as had no diſpoſition to receive ſuch a form, as it did actually receive from the power of God; and may therefore deſerve to be called a creation out of nothing. Learn hence, That in the works of creation, though other attributes of wiſdom and goodneſs viſibly appeared, yet none were ſo eminently conſpicuous as the power of God. Well might St. Paul ſay, Rom. i. 20. That herein was manifeſted his eternal power and Godhead.

4 By faith Abel offered unto God a more excellent ſacrifice than Cain, by which he obtained witness, that he was righteous, God teſtifying of his gifts: and by it he being dead yet ſpeaketh.

From a general declaration of the nature of faith in the foregoing verſe, our apoſtle proceeds to give inſtances of the efficacy and power of faith in particular perſons, in this and the following verſes. And he begins here with Abel. But why not with Adam? Becauſe Adam was the firſt ſinner, and the greateſt of ſinners; and although received to grace and mercy, yet after his fall Moſes ſpeaks little of him, nothing very notable; neither did Almighty God put that honour upon Adam which he put upon his ſon Abel; he had the honour to ſhed his blood for Chriſt, and for teſtifying his faith in him; and accordingly Abel is here repreſented as the firſt evangelical believer, By faith Abel, &c. Obſerve, 1. The action which Abel performed, he offered ſacrifice to God; he offered a ſacrifice moſt excellent, and he offered it by faith. But did not Cain bring his offering of faith too? Yes, no doubt, he believed the being of God, and conſidered him as a creator and preſerver, and accordingly offered the fruits of the earth, as an acknowledgment that all theſe things were made, preſerved, and beſtowed on man by God. But Abel's faith was fixed on God, not only as a creator, but as a redeemer alſo, accompanied with a ſenſe of ſin and guilt truſting in the ways of redemption and recovery which God hath provided. Here note, That the performance of the outward duties of divine worſhip, is not the rule of the acceptance of men's perſons with God, but a difference and diſtinction is made from the inward principle, whence thoſe duties do proceed. Cain and Abel both offered ſacrifice, but not from a like principle, nor yet for a like end. Obſerve 2. The effect and fruit of Abel's faith, it procured a teſtimony and witness from God himſelf that he was righteous; he teſtified that he had reſpect to his perſon by the approbation of his offering. Our perſons muſt be juſtified before our performances can be accepted. God has firſt reſpect to the offerer, then to the offering; for the perſon muſt recommend the gift, not the gift recommend the perſon. Laſtly, The privilege of Abel's faith: by it, being dead, he that ſpeaketh. Some underſtands the words in a paſſive ſenſe, he is ſpoken of; he being dead, there is an honourable mention of him. Religion is the trueſt honour, and the righteous ſhall be had in everlaſting remembrance. Others in an active ſenſe, and ſo the words import, that the dead ſaints do yet ſpeak, and that ſomewhat worthy to be heard and obſerved; they ſpeak by the precious graces with which they were enriched; they ſpeak by the holy life they maintained, by the good works they wrought, by the eminent ſervices they did for God and man, by their ſharp trials, by their bitter ſufferings; by theſe they ſpeak, to the honour of religion, and to the furtherance of the goſpel. God's Abels, his dead ſaints, do thus ſpeak when laid in the duſt.

5 By faith Enoch was tranſlated, that he ſhould not ſee death; and was not found, becauſe God had tranſlated him: for before his tranſlation he had this teſtimony, that he pleaſed God.

The ſecond inſtance is Enoch, concerning whom our apoſtle aſſirms, that he was tranſlated, and that he was tranſlated by faith; tranſlated from one condition to another; from grace to glory, from earth to heaven. He was gathered by God, both in body and ſoul, to himſelf; and in a way of eminent grace and favour freed from death. Hereby God gave the world a convincing teſtimony, that the body is capable of eternal life and happineſs. But how was he tranſlated by faith? Anſw. Not efficiently; faith was not the efficient cauſe of his tranſlation. That was an immediate act of divine power; not meritoriouſly, for it is recorded as an act of ſovereign grace and favour; but inſtrumentally only; he was by faith brought into that ſtate and condition of favour and acceptance with God, as to have this peculiar privilege conferred upon him. Some we find are carried to heaven by ſpecial prerogative, by privileged diſpenſation: By faith Enoch was tranſlated, &c. But obſerve farther, What went before his tranſlation, and that was his pleaſing God; before his tranſlation he had this teſtimony, that he pleaſed God. Such as would live with God hereafter, muſt ſtudy and ſeek to pleaſe God by walking with him here; would we come where Enoch is, we muſt walk as Enoch did. There is no hope of living with God in heaven, if we do not pleaſe him here on earth.

6 But without faith it is impoſſible to pleaſe him; for he that cometh to God, muſt believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently ſeek him.

Without faith, that is, without juſtifying faith, without faith in the Meſſiah, for that is the faith here ſpoken of, there is no poſſibility of pleaſing God, and if ſo, then no poſſibility of being ſaved without faith. This appears partly from the divine conſtitution, God has ſo appointed it, partly from the nature of the thing itſelf; faith being the first regular motion of the soul towards God, no works, no duties, no performances whatsoever can please God without faith. He that cometh to God, that is, hath any access or approach to him in a way of worship, or any access or acceptance into his grace and favour, he must believe, 1. God's being; 2. God's bounty: that he is: and that he is a remainder of such as diligently seek him. Learn hence, 1. That the first point of faith, if we would have any thing to do with God, is firmly to believe that there is a God: He that cometh to God, must believe that he is. 2. That the fountain of all obedience and service to God, is a firm belief of his being a rewarder of all them that diligently seek him. 3. That the whole issue of our finding God when we seek him, depends upon our diligently seeking of him; he is a rewarder of them, of all and only them, that diligently seek him.

7 By faith Noah, being warned of God of things not seen as yet, moved with fear, prepared an ark to the saving of his house; by the which he condemned the world, and became heir of the righteousness which is by faith.

Observe here, 1. The person spoken of, Noah, an eminent person in the line of the church, and one that walked with God, and found grace in the eyes of the Lord. 2. What was spoken of him; he was warned of God, touching his design and purpose to destroy and drown the old world. 3. What was the effect of this warning, it produced in Noah fear and obedience; fear of the threatening, and obedience to the command; he was moved with fear, and prepared the ark. 4. The exercise, yea, eminent exercise of Noah's faith; neither the difficulty of the work, nor the length of time, an hundred and twenty years; nor his want of success all that time of preaching, nor the contempt and scorn cast upon him by the whole world, could weaken his hands, or discourage his heart, in the least from going on with his work. 5. The consequent of Noah's faith and obedience with respect unto the world, he condemned the world; not as a judge properly and authoritatively, but as a witness, by plea and testimony; he condemned it, by his doctrine, by his example, and left it altogether without excuse. 6. The fruit and effect of Noah's faith and obedience with reverence to himself: He became heir of the righteousness which is by faith: that is, of the happiness promised to them who are justified by faith; he was evidenced and declared to be a righteous person.

8 By faith Abraham, when he was called to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance, obeyed; and he went out, not knowing whither he went.

The next illustrious instance of the efficacy of faith we have here in the person of Abraham, who obeyed the call and command of God in leaving his own native country, to go he knew not whither, and to receive an inheritance he knew not when. Where note, 1. The foundation of Abraham's faith and obedience, and that was the call of God; he had an immediate command to go out of his own country into a certain place with a promise to receive it for an inheritance: Get thee from thy country, relations, friends, and all outward enjoyments, is a command becoming the greatness of God to give; and self-denial in fact, or resolution to comply with such a command from the great God, is the foundation of all sincere profession. 2. What was the principle of Abraham's obedience in complying with this call of God, and that was his faith: By faith Abraham, when he was called, obeyed. True faith, where ever it is, bringeth forth sincere obedience; these two can no more be separated than the light and the sun, than the fire and heat; obedience is the daughter of faith, and the faith the parent and principle of obedience. 3. The difficulty, and therein the excellency of his obedience; he obeyed, and went out, not knowing whither he went. If faith be once satisfied in the call and command of God, it will follow him when it cannot see a step of its way; over hills and mountains, through dales and valleys, fearing nothing. He that has God's call, need not fear God's conduct.

9 By faith he sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tabernacles with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise. 10 For he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God.

The apostle spake of the place which Abraham was called from, in the foregoing verse, namely, out of Ur of the Chaldees: He here speaks of the place he was called to, Canaan, styled the land of promise, that is, the land which God had newly promised to give unto him. Where note, 1. Abraham's act of obedience; he sojourneth in the land of promise, as in a strange country; he was there a sojourner, not an inheritor, moving up and down from place to place, until God thought fit to settle him and his posterity. Abraham was a sojourner both in his condition of life, and his disposition of heart. Canaan was a type of heaven, and accordingly Abraham expected a better country, with a city which had foundations, whose builder and maker is God. Learn, That the children of God here on earth, where they have best right, and most possessions, are but strangers and pilgrims. Note, 2. The manner of his sojourning in this land, dwelling in tabernacles. This was both an act of policy, and an act of piety; of policy, that they might live peaceably, without giving umbrage to the natives, or occasioning any envy or grudge from them; and of piety, to express their hopes and desires of a better country. 3. Abraham's companions, his fellows, and followers, in this act of obedience; he sojourned with Isaac and Jacob as heirs of the same promise. Where mark, How all the saints of God are of the same spiritual disposition; they are animated by the same Spirit, governed by the same laws; they act from the same principle, and for the same end, and desire nothing more than to live together, and to enjoy God and one another. Note, 4. The reason rendered why Abraham esteemed himself but as a stranger in Canaan, because his thoughts ran much upon heaven, of which Canaan was a type; He looked for a city which had foundations, &c. Where observe, 1. Abraham's act of expectation, he looked for it, he rationally.

nally expected it; it was not a blind hope, but well built on the power and promise of God. 2. What he looked for, a city; not Jerusalem, an earthly city, as some would have it, for that was not possessed until eight hundred years after, and then only by his posterity for a limited time; but an heavenly city, a settled, quiet habitation, a suitable dwelling for them that have had a life of trouble in this world. 3. The city itself described, 1. By the nature of it; it has foundations, in opposition to tents and tabernacles which had no foundation, but were moving, ambulatory dwellings, supported only by stakes and cords; this city is founded upon the eternal power, the infinite wisdom, and immutable counsel of God. 2. By the maker and builder of it; God; he is the contriver, framer, and erec-tor of this city; and as he is the maker, so he is the disposer of it also; please God, and he will give it thee, none can give it thee without him, he will never give it thee without pleasing of him.

11 Through faith also Sarah herself received strength to receive seed, and was delivered of a child when she was past age, because she judged him faithful who had promised.

Our apostle having spoken of Abraham's faith before, makes an honourable mention of his wife's Sarah's faith here. It is a blessed thing when husband and wife are one in the faith, as well as one flesh. When the constant companion of our lives draws with us in the same yoke of religion. Note, 1. The person whose faith is here commended, Sarah herself, a woman, a barren woman, and a barren woman well stricken in age; a woman weak in sex, may be strong in faith. Though Sarah at first laughed, yet she afterwards firmly believed. And the apostle takes no notice of the former but applauds the latter. Oh! with what great indulgence doth God cover the failings of his children, but proclaims aloud their graces to the world! Men do not thus; they will overlook all that is good in others, and report only what is amiss. Sarah's laughing, Rahab's lie, Job's impatience, are not mentioned, but their graces are remembered. Who would not serve such a gracious master, that winks at our failings, but accepts and rewards our weak services and sincere graces? 2. The commendation and fruit of Sarah's faith, she received by it strength and ability for conception; probably she recovered her youthful vigour, and received a general restoration of nature, to an ability for all its primitive operations, which was before decayed by age; she received strength to conceive seed when past age. Learn hence, That it is the property of faith to expect a blessing absolutely above the use of means; when we have a particular and special warrant from God so to do, as Sarah had in this case. Note, The ground of Sarah's faith, Because she had judged him faithful that had promised, that is, she resolved her faith into; and rested upon, the veracity of God in the accomplishment of the promise which is the proper and immediate object of faith. Learn, That wherever we exercise and put forth faith, we must take care and be sure that we have a promise to exercise it upon, otherwise it is not faith, but fancy: God's promise, and not God's power, is the ground of faith; it is not what God can do, but what he will do, and what he has engaged and promised to do, that is the ground of faith: He can quench all the fire in hell: but where has he said he will do it? She had judged him faithful who had promised.

12 Therefore sprang there even of one, and him as good as dead, so many as the stars of the sky in multitude, and as the sand which is by the sea-shore innumerable.

The words acquaints us with that gratuitous remuneration and gracious reward which God gave Abraham and Sarah, as the fruit of their faith, namely, the blessing of a numerous posterity; there sprang of them, and both of them, as good as dead, with reference to the procreation of children, a numerous issue, like the stars of heaven, and the sand of the sea. Hence learn, That the God of nature, at his own pleasure, works things above the power of nature in its ordinary efficacy and operation; by weak and dead means he often produces mighty effects. 2. That whatever difficulties and oppositions lie in the way of the accomplishing God's promises, they shall have an assured accomplishment on God's part, if faith be kept up in lively exercise on our part.

13 These all died in faith;—

That is, all the fore mentioned saints, Abel, Noah, Abraham, and Sarah, they all died in the faith of the promised Messiah, believing he should come, and expecting salvation by his coming. It is not enough for a Christian to live in the faith, but he must also die in the faith; and to die in the faith is an honourable and happy manner of dying; it is a greater happiness to die in the Lord, than to die for the Lord; if a man die for the Lord, and be not in the Lord, he is not blessed in his death: A man may die for the Lord's cause, yet not for the Lord's sake, but out of vain-glory.

—Not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on earth.

Observe here, The great trial which the faith of the Old Testament saints was put unto; they died, not having received the promises; that is, they went to their graves before the great blessings God had promised were accomplished. Faith is contented with the promise, though it wants actual possession of the good things promised. God would have believers, in all ages of the church, to live by faith, and promises not actually performed: And it is a great honour to God, when we are ready to die, to go to the grave with assurance, and to profess our confidence that God will make them good: These all died not having received the promises. Yet observe, The actings and exercise of their faith towards these promises, which they had not yet received in their accomplishment: 1. They saw them afar off, at a great distance: It is the property of faith to eye the blessings promised at a distance; so that no distance of time or place can weaken faith as to the accomplishment of divine promises. 2. They were persuaded of them: This imports the mind's satisfactory acquiescing in the truth of God for the accomplishment of his promises: A firm persuasion of the truth of God's promises, and a quiet waiting for the accomplishment of them at a great distance, is an eminent fruit of faith. 3. They embraced them, the word signifies, they saluted and hugged them. Whence note, That faith is an act of the will, as well as of the understanding: there is in faith adherence as well as assent; an embracing as well as a persuasion; the heart cleaves to the promise with love, delight, and complacency, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth; So they were in outward condition, wandering from place to place; so they were in affection and disposition, looking upon this world as their pilgrimage, and heaven as their home and proper country; because thence they are born, there lies their inheritance, there are all their kindred, there is their longest abode. Christians should not only account, but confess themselves pilgrims, and discover it by their journeying and mending their pace heavenward.

14 For they that say such things declare plainly that they seek a country. 19 And truly if they had been mindful of that country from whence they came out, they might have had opportunity to have returned: 16 But now they desire a better country, that is, an heavenly. Wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God; for he hath prepared for them a city.

As if the apostle had said, "They that say such things, namely, that they even in the land of promise, are pilgrims and strangers, do declare plainly that they seek a country, where they may rest and dwell, when this their pilgrimage on earth is ended." Now this country was not Chaldea, but heaven; a glorious city which God prepared for them, as an abundant recompence for their earthly country, which they left at God's command. Here note, 1. That heaven is the Christians proper country; they are born from heaven, their conversation is in heaven; their eternal habitation is there, their head and husband, their friends and kindred are there; and it is theirs by a right of donation, by a right of purchase, by a right of possession, and by a right of conquest. 2. That this heavenly country is by far the better, yea, the best of countries; best in regard of the largeness and extent of it; best in regard of the safety and security of it; best in regard of the order and government of it; best in regard of the company and society dwelling in it; all laity, none but saints, none but perfect saints; best in regard of the immunities and privileges belonging to it, and in regard of the duration and continuance of it; a country that can never be invaded, never be conquered. 3. That the sincere Christians have strong desires after, and vehement longings for, this better, this best of countries: Now they desire a better country: And God is not ashamed to be called their God—they that by their faith give glory to God in acknowledging his faithfulness in this life, he will never be ashamed of them, either in life, or at death, or after death. Learn 1. That it is the greatest privilege, honour, and advantage, that any can be made partakers of, that God will bear the name and title of their God: 2. God's owning of believers as his, and of himself to be their God, is an abundant recompence of all the hardships which they undergo in this their pilgrimage. The top and sum of all happiness, is to have the Lord for our God.

17 By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac: And he that had received the promises offered up his only begotten son; 18 Of whom it was said, that in Isaac shall thy seed be called: 19 Accounting that God was able to raise him up, even from the dead; from whence also he received him in a figure.

The next person instanced in, for the fame of his faith, is Abraham who was deservedly styled the father of the faithful: Him God tries in a very extraordinary manner, by putting him upon offering up his son Isaac. Where note, That where God gives much grace, he tries grace much; the greater the faith, the greater the trial; strong faith must prepare for strong trials. Here Abraham's faith was tried, whether he would depend upon God's promise above reason; his obedience was tried, whether he would yield to God's command against nature; his love was tried, whether his affection was not more warm towards his son than to his God; and his fear was tried whether he did reverentially acknowledge and stand in awe of God, by adoring his sovereignty and dominion over him. Trials are the best touchstone of faith; without which men will want the best evidence of its sincerity: And great trials in believers are an evidence of great faith. Observe farther, The excellency of Abraham's faith and obedience upon this trial, he offered up his son Isaac; that is, he did in part and was ready to have done it thoroughly, had not God countermanded him. Learn hence, That where there is a divine command obliging us to obedience, it is the wisdom and duty of faith, to close his eye against all insuperable difficulties and dangers. Abraham objected not against the horrid nature of the command, to kill his son, his own son, his only son, the son of the promise; but deliberately, and upon due consideration, was ready to execute what God required. Lord! what a strong faith was here, fortified with an impregnable resolution, that could make Abraham hold out three days against the violent assaults of his own nature, and the charming presence of his own son, enough to melt his heart; yet nothing made him stagger in his duty, but he performs a most miraculous act of obedience, in defiance of all difficulties. Observe, lastly, The fruit and success of Abraham's faith; he believed God could and would raise Isaac from the grave, and he receives him again in a figure, as one snatched out of the very jaws of death. There is no such way to enjoy the continuance of an earthly comfort as by resigning it up to God: Accounting, that God was able to raise him up even from the dead, &c.

20 By faith Isaac blessed Jacob and Esau concerning things to come.

Note, That there is a blessing by way of prayer, and a blessing by way of prophecy, foretelling what shall befall persons sons in time to come; of this kind is Isaac's blessing. The patriarchs were in a peculiar manner directed and guided by God, and their blessing was a conferring of a right to the parties blessed. Thus Isaac blessed Jacob and Esau concerning things to come; that is, concerning the great and future things which should happen unto their posterity after them. Note here, Esau's (wicked men) having their portion in outward blessings as well as Jacobs, as well as the best and holiest of men; partly as they are God's creatures, partly as they descend from parents in covenant with God, and partly because they make some profession of the name of God: And God will be behind-hand with none, but so far as they do good they shall see good.

21 By faith Jacob, when he was a-dying, blessed both the sons of Joseph: And worshipped leaning upon the top of his staff.

Observe here, in dying Jacob, the frame and carriage of holy men in their dying seasons to bless their children, and worship their God. Jacob blessed Joseph and his two sons, laying hold on the covenant made with Abraham. It is no small privilege to be born of parents taken into visible covenant with God, and no small comfort; when God comes to take away such parents from us, to have the benefit of their blessings and prayers. Jacob, when dying, blessed both the sons of Joseph; and as he blessed them, so he worshipped God with religious worship, and in a devout manner, leaning upon the top of his staff. Learn hence, That our addresses to God, ought to be exceeding reverent, both as to the frame of our souls, and also to the gesture of our bodies; we cannot always be affectionate in prayer, for affection depends upon the vigorous motions of the bodily spirits; but we should always be reverent and serious in prayer, otherwise it is no worship. Learn farther, That where faith gives a willing mind, bodily infirmities shall be no let and hindrance from duty.

22. By faith Joseph, when he died, made mention of the departing of the children of Israel; and gave commandment concerning his bones.

Here we have a two fold instance of Joseph's faith when dying. 1. He made mention of the departing of the children of Israel; he said unto his brethren, Behold, I die, but God shall bring you unto the land which he hath sworn unto your fathers. See how the good man dies in the faith of the promise. Thence learn, That it is of singular use, and great advantage to the church, that such believers as have been eminent in profession, should, in their dying moments, testify their faith in the promises of God; so did Jacob before, so did Joseph now. The second instance or evidence of Joseph's faith was, that he gave commandment concerning his bones; that is, he took an oath of his brethren that they should carry his bones out of Egypt and bury them in Canaan, thereby owning and professing himself to be of the posterity of Abraham; and thereby also encouraging the faith and expectation of his brethren and their posterity, to hope for their deliverance out of Egypt, and be put into the possession of the promised land; so that it is evident that there was faith, much faith, shewed by Joseph in disposing of his bones. The papist's plea from hence, for paying veneration for their relics, is weak and contemptible: This was a special charge given in faith to do what was done; and to shut them up in a coffin, and decently bury them, was all that was done. Now to take example from hence, to dig men's bones out of their graves, to enshrine them, and place them upon altars, to carry them in procession, to adore them, to ascribe miraculous operation to them, casting out of devils, and the like, is fond and ridiculous.

23 By faith Moses, when he was born, was hid three months of his parents, because they saw he was a proper child; and they were not afraid of the king's commandment.

In these words the faith of Moses's parents is celebrated; the birth of Moses fell out in the very height and fury of Pharaoh's persecution, when the king had given commandment to destroy all the male children; Moses was then born and hid by his parents; and preserved as a deliverer of the church of God. Oh! how blind are all the persecutors and opposers of the church of God! When they think all things secure, and their counsels so deeply laid, that God himself cannot deliver out of their hands, then doth the Almighty lay in provision for his church's deliverance, and their destruction. Now was Moses a deliverer born and hid. But observe a double cause of Moses's hiding: the first external, They saw he was a proper child; they had a persuasion that God would provide a person to be their deliverer; and they saw something divine in Moses to stir up their faith, and raise their expectation, that he might be the person. The second internal and moving cause, They were not afraid of the king's commandment, or bloody decree. Learn hence, 1. That the commands of kings and princes have oft-times been a very great trial to the children of God; so was Nebuchadnezzar's command to worship the golden image, and such was Pharaoh's command here. 2. Kings and princes must not be obeyed in things contrary to the word of God: obedience without reserve is to be paid to none but God.

24 By faith Moses, when he was come to years, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter;

The next person whom our apostle instances in, is Moses himself, whose faith and self-denial were most evidently conspicuous in all the instances of them. Observe, 1. His great self-denial, with all the enhancing circumstances of it: When he came to years, he refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter. Note here, 1. The circumstance of time, When he came to years: It was no childish act, when he knew not what he did, but when he came to age, and understood: Nay, farther, this was when Moses was newly come to age, in the prime and vigour of his time, when he had just began to taste the sweetness of youthful pleasures: The world appears a dead and dry thing in the winter of old age, but looks green and beautiful in the spring of youth: but Moses when come, just come, to years, refused it. 2. The circumstances of his education, he had been bred from a child in a princely way and manner, he never knew what belonged to a low estate: Those that never had much, forsake but little when they forsake all: Want will never much pinch those who never understood plenty; but those that have enjoyed fulness all their days, for them to stoop voluntarily, from the height of ease and honour, to the depth of affliction and hardship, is admirable. Thus did Moses, he refused honour, and chose affliction. 3. The circumstances of his obligations, Pharaoh's daughter had saved his life, adopted him for her son, given him princely breeding, He was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians; and let her heart upon him as her own. However Moses breaks through all and away he goes. But whither went he? Why, to a company of poor bondmen, labouring at the brick-kilns, to take his lot of suffering with them. 4. The circumstances of his expectations; how very fair and certain a prospect he had of enjoying the crown of Egypt; he did not refuse it because he despaired of attaining it, for he was an adopted heir unto it. Lastly, That all this was not a rash and sudden determination, but a deliberate and advised choice, Acts vii. 23. St. Stephen says, he made this choice, when he was full forty years old; that is, when he was of ripest judgment, and in the height of prosperity and reputation: He did not only, as Josephus says, at three years old cast a crown, given him for a play-toy, to the ground and trample it under his feet; but as the apostle says here, when he came to be a man, he treated it with no more respect, but refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter. Behold here Moses' faith, and eminent self-denial, in choosing rather to suffer affliction with the worshippers of the true God, than to gain a kingdom by renouncing God and his holy religion. From whence learn, That faith is a grace which will teach and enable a person openly to renounce all worldly advantage at God's call, when we cannot enjoy them with an upright mind, and a good conscience. Quest. But how did Moses come to know his stock and race, that he was an Hebrew born, and not an Egyptian, no son of Pharaoh's daughter? Answ. He found himself circumcised, and so belonged to the circumcised people. The token of God's covenant received in infancy, duly considered, is a most effectual mean to preserve persons in the profession of the true religion. Add to this, that his own mother was his nurse, and continually with him, and probably his father frequently; who being persons fearing God, took care very early to impress him with the principles of the true religion, and with the detestation of the Egyptian idolatry.

25 Choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season.

Observe here, 1. The common lot and usual condition of God's people in this world; it is an afflicted state and condition. 2. That wicked men oft-times enjoy pleasures in the ways of sin, whilst good men meet with much affliction in the work of holiness. 3. That notwithstanding this, all wise and good men do rather chuse afflicted godliness, than pleasant and prosperous wickedness. 4. That a spiritual eye can see an excellency in the people of God, when in the lowest suffering condition; will join itself unto them, and appear with, and for them, though it be with great loss, and much hazard. Moses here chose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the short sinful pleasures of Pharaoh's court.

26 Esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt; for he had respect unto the recompense of the reward.

The former verse acquainted us with the general choice which Moses made of affliction with the people of God; this acquaints us with one sort and particular kind of affliction which he chose, namely, reproach for Christ; this he counted his glory, his riches, his treasures, beyond all the riches and treasures of Egypt. Note here, That the people of God have been, and usually are, a people under reproach; not only a persecuted, but a reproached people; the foundation of all sufferings is laid in reproach: this is the cover for all. The Jews, by reproaches, first stirred up the rage of the people against Christ before they attempted to take away his life. Note, 2. The reproach of good men is the reproach of Christ, because he and they are but one mystical body, and because of the near union that is between them. The reproach of the wife is the reproach of the husband, especially if she be reproached for his sake, and upon his account. Again observe, What an high esteem a gracious person has of reproaches in the cause of Christ; he esteems them his glory, his treasure, his greatest treasure; he rejoices and takes pleasure in them, and very much values himself on them. Verily no man deserves the name of a christian till he has such an esteem of Christ, and value for him, that the worst things in the world, even persecution and reproach, should be preferred by him before the great things of the world, when they stand in competition with him, or in opposition to him. Lastly, The ground of Moses' faith, self-denial, contempt of the world, and all its excellent actions, and that was the recompense of the reward he had respect unto; for he had respect unto the recompense of reward. Where note, That there is a reward laid up for good men; that it is lawful, yea, laudable, very expedient, yea, very necessary and needful, for a christian to eye his reward, and to have respect unto it in the whole course of his obedience; and this doing will be a mighty encouraging motive to undergo all hardships and difficulties in the way to religion; he had respect, &c.

27 By faith he forsook Egypt, not fearing the wrath of the king: for he endured as seeing him who is invisible. 28 Through faith he kept the passover, and the sprinkling of blood, lest he that destroyed the first-born should touch them. 29 By faith they passed through the Red sea as by dry land; which the Egyptians assaying to do were drowned.

Our apostle having described the faith of Moses, with respect to his sufferings with the people of God, in the former mer verses, comes, now to instance in the power and activity of it with respect to their deliverance, in these verses. Where note, 1. The spiritual fortitude which attended his faith, he forsook Egypt, not fearing the wrath of the king; even the wrath of the greatest king upon the earth is to be disregarded, if it lays against our duty to God. 2. The reason or ground of this his fortitude and courage, he endured as seeing him who is invisible; that is, he saw him by faith whom he could not see by sense; he saw him in his omnipresence, power, faithfulness, and had a fixed trust in him at all times, and on all occasions. Learn hence, That there is nothing insuperable to faith, whilst it can keep a clear view of the power of God. Note, 3. The commendation of Moses' faith, from a due observation of a double ordinance of worship, namely, the passover and the sprinkling of blood. As to the former, Moses' faith in keeping the passover had respect to its divine institution, to the command for its perpetual observance, to the sacramental nature of it, to the mystical or typical signification of it. Learn hence, That a vigorous and lively exercise of faith, is always required unto the right and due celebration of a sacramental ordinance; by faith he kept the passover: it follows, — and the sprinkling of blood. This was a temporary ordinance and observation, annexed to the first celebration of the passover, not repeated afterwards; the sprinkling of the blood on the side-posts of their houses, was a token that the destroying angel should pass over those houses, and none should be destroyed in them; but this rite, though it ceased with the first passover, yet it abides forever in its mystical signification; God hereby teaching us, that unless we are sprinkled with the blood of Christ, our Paschal-lamb, no other privilege can secure us from the displeasure of God, and everlasting destruction; by faith he kept the passover, and sprinkling of blood, ver. 28. Note, 4. A farther instance of the power and efficacy of Moses' faith in passing through the Red sea, ver. 29. Probably he entered first into the sea, at the head of the people, himself, both to conduct them, and to encourage them; the waters doubtless were raised to a very great height on both sides of them; and though they were a wall to them, yet it was a mighty act of faith, to put themselves between such walls, as were ready every moment to fall upon them, had they not been under an almighty restraint. Learn hence, That faith will overcome all tears and dangers, and find a way through a sea of difficulties, under the call, and at the command of God. But how came it to pass that the Egyptians going in the same path through the Red sea, were drowned, in which the Israelites were preserved? Ans. The Egyptians' entering in was an act of presumption, the Israelites was an act of faith. God commanded the Israelites to go through; now as faith gives courage to obey God in difficult duties, so it gives encouragement to hope that safety shall evermore accompany duty.

30 By faith the walls of Jericho fell down, after they were compassed about seven days,

After the faith of Moses and the Israelites at the Red sea, we have here the faith of Joshua and the Israelites before Jericho, recorded and related. Jericho was a walled and well fenced city, and a frontier town, that kept them from entering into Canaan. God commanded them not to fight, but to walk, to go round the city seven days, and he would give them an unexpected entrance into it; they believe and obey, and the success was according to their desire; By faith the walls of Jericho fell down, &c. Here note, 1. The grace exercised, faith; they believed God upon his word, they enter Canaan at this frontier town; God remembers his promise, and disappoints not the faith and expectation of his people. 2. The readiness and exactness of the people's obedience, they compassed the town so many days, they do what God commands, and no more; here is no mount raised, no engine planted, no sword drawn, they only walk, not fight. Doubtless the men of Jericho made themselves merry with this sight, and said one to another, "What, will these men beat down our city with their eyes? Will they conquer us only by gazing upon us?" And farther, As the army must only encompass the city, so must the priest blow with ram's horns, a contemptible mean! Had they made use of the silver trumpets of the sanctuary, that had been a good ground to hope for success, they being the symbols and sacred signs of God's presence with them; but verily trumpets of ram's horns seemed more fit to move laughter, than to do execution; yet assuredly, no ram of iron could have been so forcible for battery as these ram's horns, when God had appointed them. It is the praise of omnipotency oft-times to work by improbabilities. 3. The event and success which followed their faith and accompanied their obedience, The walls of Jericho fell down. Nothing can stand before the power of God, and the faith of his people. If we will believe God's promises and execute his commands, we need no shifts nor artifices, no power nor policy of our own to work deliverance for us. Learn hence, That when faith makes use of the means prescribed by God, though it cannot discern what influence the means can have to the end aimed at, yet the issue and event shall certainly be according to God's appointment and faith's expectation, 31 By faith the harlot Rahab perished not with them that believed not, when she had received the spies with peace.

Observe here, 1. The person spoken of, Rahab, a Gentile, an Amorite, an harlot, who kept a victualing house in Jericho, and so was both harlot and hostess, defiled both in body and mind with idolatry and adultery. 2. What is spoken of her: She believed; by faith, Rahab, &c. She was converted to God before the spies came to her, by what she had heard of him and his mighty works. Behold here a blessed instance! 1. Of the sovereignty and freedom of God's grace. 2. Of the power and efficacy of divine grace, in calling and converting a person given up by her own choice to the vilest of sins, even to the ravings of lust: But no sinner nor sin is to be despaired of, in whose cure sovereign grace is engaged. Observe, The effect and fruit of her faith, she received the spies with peace; that is, entertained them safely, concealed them, gave them intelligence, exposed herself to danger in the conveyance of them; an eminent fruit, a special evidence, and an high demonstration of her faith; indeed she told an officious lie; but God pardoned it, and the apostle here makes no mention of it; the Holy Ghost lays, as it were, the finger upon the scar, and covers it out of sight, contrary to the practice of the malignant world, who overlook all the good, and reflect only upon the evil of an action; whereas God takes notice of the good, but passes by the evil. 4. The benefit and advantage she received by her faith, she perished not; that is, when the credulous and idolatrous people of Jericho were destroyed, she and her family were preserved. From the whole learn, 1. That God is ready to shew wonderful mercy to penitent sinners, if they return to him, and believe in him, how great soever their sins have formerly been. 2. That true faith, wherever it is, will shew itself by some eminent effect, and notable fruits of it. 3. That the rewards of faith are excellent, and truly glorious; as she was preserved from the common ruin at Jericho, so shall all believers be saved from that wrath and destruction which shall come ere long upon the impenitent and unbelieving world.

32 And what shall I more say? for the time would fail me to tell of Gideon, and of Barak, and of Samson, and of Jephthah; of David also, and Samuel, and of the prophets: 33 Who through faith subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions, 34 Quenched the violence of fire, escaped the edge of the sword, out of weakness were made strong, waxed valiant in faith, turned to flight the armies of the aliens. 35 Women received their dead raised to life again:—

In these, and the following verses, our apostle sums up the remaining testimonies which he might have produced to shew the great things which faith had assisted persons to do, and also enabled them to suffer the hardest and most terrible things that could be encountered with; in the verses now before us, an account is given us, of the great things of all sorts, which faith has enabled us to do; particularly, it was faith that made them fearless whom God raised up, in the days of the judges, to conflict with the enemies of the church; it was faith that assisted them in the combat, and rendered them victorious in the conflict: it was faith rendered Gideon successful over the Midianites, Barak over the Canaanites, Samson over the Philistines, Jephthah over the Amorites, David over the Jebusites and Moabites; it was faith in the promise of God that made them courageous, and rendered them victorious: there is nothing so great, so difficult, or seemingly insuperable, that should hinder us from acting faith in all things, even things more great and excellent than the conquest of earthly kingdoms. Observe next, Our apostle having enumerated the persons believing, he now reckons up the noble acts and honourable achievements of their faith, Through faith they subdued kingdoms; So did Joshua subdue all the kingdoms in Canaan, and David all the kingdoms about it, viz. Moab, Ammon, Edom, Syria, and the Philistines; these were subdued by faith, because what they did was in obedience to God's command, and in the accomplishments of his promises, for he had given all those kingdoms by promise to the Israelites, before they were subdued by them; thus they are said to subdue kingdoms by faith. Yet note, That they made use of all other heroic virtues besides faith; courage, valour, military skill, and military stratagems; faith excites all graces and virtues, and puts them in motion. Wrought righteousness; they executed the judgment of God on the enemies of the church, and administered justice impartially to all that were under their rule and government; and this working righteousness was a fruit of faith, for unbelief is the cause of all the injustice and oppression that is in the world. Obtained promises, that is, the good things promised; so did Abraham by faith obtain a promised Son Joshua, a promised Canaan, David a promised kingdom: but there was a great space of time between the promise and the performance, which put their faith sometimes hard to it. Stopped the mouths of lions; thus Daniel, chap. vi. because he believed in his God, ver. 23. and the faith which heretofore stopped the mouths of lions, can stop the rage of the most savage oppressors and persecutors, whenever God pleases. Quenched the violence of the fire; so did the three children's faith, Dan. iii. not a hair of their head was singed, they knew not which way God would deliver them, but they commit themselves to the omnipotency and sovereignty of God in the discharge of their duty, with a full persuasion that one way or other he would deliver them. Escaped the edge of the sword, as did David the sword of Goliath and Saul, though sometimes his fear prevailed that he should one day perish by the sword of Saul. Fear may be in cases of danger, and yet faith at the same time have the principal conduct of the soul; by faith David escaped the edge of the sword; so did the Jews the sword of Haman, and Elijah the sword of Jezebel. Out of weakness were made strong; some apply this to Gideon and his three hundred men, Judg. vii. 15. others to Hezekiah, who by the power of faith was, in a wonderful manner recovered, and restored from a desperate sickness to perfect health, Isa. xxxviii. Waxed valiant in fight, so did Joshua, Gideon, Barak, Jephthah, and David, who through faith in the promise, and of the presence of God with them, feared neither the number nor strength of their enemies. David often declares, that God girded him with strength to the battle, and taught his hands to war, and his fingers to fight; so that though an host encamped against him, yet his heart was not afraid. Turned to flight the armies of the aliens; those aliens were the heathens and idolaters, Philistines and the Midianites, who were enemies to Israel, and to the God of Israel, and they made them fly, and turn their backs; for as they for God out of a principle of faith, so God fought for them, according to the faithfulness of his promise, which was the ground of their confidence and courage. Women received their dead raised to life again; this is applied to the widow of Zerephath, and the Shunamite, 2 Kings iv. 36. 1 Kings xvii. 23. They were raised, with joy and thankfulness, These ten instances did the apostle select and chuse out of many, to give, of the great things that had been done through faith, thereby to assure the Hebrews, and us with them, that there is nothing too hard nor difficult for faith to effect, when it is set on work, and managed according to the power of God.

—And

—And others were tortured, not accepting deliverance that they might obtain a better resurrection. 36 And others had trial of cruel mockings and scourgings, yea, moreover, of bonds and imprisonment. 37 They were stoned, they were sawn asunder, were tempted, were slain with the sword; They wandered about in sheep-skins, and goat-skins, being destitute, afflicted, tormented; 38 Of whom the world was not worthy: They wandered in deserts, and in mountains, and in dens and caves of the earth.

Our apostle having in the foregoing verses acquainted the Hebrews with the great things which faith enabled the Old Testament saints to do, he lays before them an account of the hard and difficult things which faith enabled them to suffer, and here reckons up the sharpest and bitterest sufferings that human nature perhaps can be exposed to; but to do the greatest things, and to suffer the hardest, is all one to faith. Faith stands ready for both, as God shall call. Note here in general, that the evils enumerated are of such various sorts and kinds, as to comprise every thing that may befall believers on the account of their christian profession: Do we meet with temptations, scornings, mockings, scourgings, bonds, imprisonments, yea, death itself, by all sorts of tortures and extremities? This is our encouragements, that others, in the cause of God, have undergone them, and been carried victoriously through them; but the particulars in this little book of martyrs follow. Others were tortured, not accepting deliverance. In this passage and several others here following, the apostle is concluded to refer to the story in the Maccabees, which though written after the closing of the canon of the scripture, when there was no extraordinary prophet in the church, yet the matters of fact were then fresh in memory, and are here alluded to, particularly Eleazar, 1 Mac. vi. 28. who was beaten to death, when he had been persuaded and allured to accept deliverance by transgressing the law; and also the mother and her seven sons, they expected a better resurrection, better than what their persecutors offered them, even a glorious resurrection of their bodies at the last day. Others had trials of cruel mockings, as Micaiah, 1 Kings xxii. 24. and others; and scourgings, as Jeremiah; chap. xx. 2. &c. and xxxvii. 15. Also bonds and imprisonments, as Joseph in Egypt and Jeremy in the dungeon; some were stoned, as Zacharias the son of Jehoida, 1 Chron. xxiv. Others sawn asunder, as Isaiah under the tyranny of Manasseh; others were tempted with fair promises and great rewards, but refusing, were slain with the sword. Learn hence, That torments in the case of religion have been a very old invention of the devil and the world, and they have placed great hopes of prevailing by them; but no instruments of cruelty, no endeavours of health, shall ever prevail against the faith of God's elect. They wandered about in sheep-skins, &c. This some refer to Elijah, who was destitute and fed by ravens, 1 Kings xvii. 4. but it has been the portion of many of God's faithful servants to be driven from their habitations, sometimes by the cruelty of the laws, sometimes by force and violence. Of whom the world was not worthy; that is, the men of the world think the saints of God not worthy to live amongst them, whereas the world is not worthy of such excellent company; and therefore, as soon as their work is done, God removes them. Learn hence, 1. That God's esteem of his people is never the less because of their outward sufferings and calamities, whatever the world judgeth of them; they esteem them the filth of the world, and the off-scouring of all things; but God is of another mind. 2. Let the world think as highly and as proudly of itself as it pleases, God thinks it at all times, but especially when it persecutes his people, base, and unworthy of their society. They wandered in deserts and mountains: Behold here the state and condition of some of the servants of the Living God, who, when driven from all inhabited places, took up their lodgings in deserts and mountains, in dens and caves of the earth. Learn hence, That oftentimes it is much better, and more safe for the saints of God to be in a wilderness, among the beasts of the fields, than in a savage world, inflamed by the devil into rage and persecution.

39 And these all having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promise.

That is, "All the forementioned scripture saints, with others that lived from the beginning of the world, and the first giving out of the promise of the Messiah, Gen. iii. 15. all and every one of these obtained a good report through faith, that is, a good testimony that they pleased God; nevertheless they received not the promise, that is, the actual exhibition of the promise, Christ the promised Messiah; the promise they had, but not the thing promised, this was not in their days exhibited. Christ was not then come in the flesh; this promise was made by God to the elders from the beginning, but not actually accomplished until the fulness of time." Learn hence, That the Old Testament saints had from the beginning the promise from God, concerning the exhibition of Christ in the flesh for the redemption of the world; which promise they were persuaded of the truth of, embraced it with desire, longing for the actual accomplishment of it, and thus enjoyed the benefit of it as well as we.

40 God having provided some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect.

The better thing here spoken of, is the coming of Christ in the flesh. Lord, what were we? And how were we better than they, that this better thing should be reserved for us? They saw the promise afar off, we enjoy it at hand, That they without us should not be made perfect? without us, is as much as without the things which are actually exhibited unto us. God never intended or designed, that the instant condition of the church should be made perfect before the exhibition of Christ; that is, that they should be justified and saved by any sacrifices or services done in their time, but by looking on the sacrifice and satisfaction of Christ, whereby both they and we are perfected. Learn, That it is Christ alone who was to give perfection and consummation to his church; all the outward glorious worship of the Old Testament, though it pleased God, yet had no perfection in it; this God reserved for our times, that they without us, &c.

C H A P. XII.

Our apostle comes now to reinforce his exhortation to patience and constancy in the cause of Christ, from the testimony before insisted on, with new additional motives, encouragements, and directions.

WHEREFORE, seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses,—

As if the apostle had said, “ Seeing we, who are now called forth to suffer, have before us so many instances of the faithful, who, like a cloud of witnesses, have gone before us, and by the help of their faith conquered all impediments that lay in the way of their salvation, let us take encouragement from them to quit ourselves like men; and as runners in a race, let us cast off all worldly incumbrances which will entangle us, and avoid all sin, especially a bosom corruption, which easily besets us, and as easily overcomes us, and let us run with patience and perseverance the race of christianity set before us. Note, 1. That the Old-Testament saints are here called witnesses, a cloud of witnesses, and a cloud encompassing us; they are witnesses of this grand truth, namely, that faith will carry believers safely through all that they may be called to do and suffer in the profession of the gospel; they are called a cloud of witnesses, partly for their number, there being a great multitude of them; partly for their direction, there being a leading virtue in them. As there was a cloud that went before the children of Israel to lead them in the wilderness, so this cloud of witnesses leads us up and down the wilderness of this world, in the darkest night of our sorrows and sufferings; and they are said to encompass us, because the scripture every where encompasses us with them, so that we can be in no suffering state or condition, be never so sad, but we may turn our eye, and behold the face of some or other of these worthies looking upon us, and encouraging of us to patience and perseverance; and therefore, to saint in our profession, whilst we are encompassed with such a cloud of witnesses, is a great aggravation of our sin. Learn hence, That it is a special honour which God puts upon his saints departed, especially such as suffered and died for the truth, that even, after their death, they are witnesses to faith and obedience in all generations.

—Let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us, 2 Looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith;

Note here. 1. Christianity is a race, a race set before us by God, and it is our duty faithfully and perseveringly to run it. 2. That in order to the running of this race, all impediments must be laid aside: Let us lay aside every weight, and the sin that doth most easily beset us. By every weight is generally understood the world, its riches, honours, pleasures, preferments, which oft-times are a peculiar obstruction to constancy and perseverance in the profession and practice of christianity; this dead weight must be laid aside, by mortifying our hearts and affections towards the world, for it is inordinate love to these things which gives them their weight and incumbrance; where this grace is in its due exercise, the world cannot influence the mind into any disorder, nor make it unready for its race. By the sin which doth so easily beset us, some understand all sin in general, others a bosom-beloved sin in special, others timorousness and fear in particular; all softness and tenderness, with respect to suffering. In the original word rendered easily beset us, some think there is an allusion to the long garments worn in the eastern countries; which, dangling about a man's heels, unfit him for running a race. As a man that has a burden on his back, or a long garment hanging down to his heels, is altogether unfit to run a race; so unready are they for the spiritual race, who are entangled with the love of the world, or with any sinful compliances.

3. That patience is a grace very necessary to enable a person to run the race of Christianity which God has set before him. Such is the inevitableness and unavoidable nature of the Christian's trials; such the multiplicity and variety of them; such the long duration and continuance of them, that there can be no perseverance without patience. 4. The way discovered, and the means declared, how, and by which we attain this grace and patience, namely, by looking unto Jesus. Learn hence, That looking unto, and beholding of Christ in his patience, is a notable mean to excite and stir us up to the practice and performance of our duty. Note, 5. The special title given here to Christ, he is styled the author and finisher of faith in his people; he is deservedly stiled the author of our faith; because his holy ordinances are special means of faith, and his holy Spirit the producer of faith in the souls of his people, and his precious blood the purchaser of faith, and all grace, for his people. And he is the finisher of our faith too, as well as the author of it, inasmuch as he has, by his promise, engaged to perfect what he has begun, Phil. i. 6. Being confident of this very thing, that he that hath begun a good work in you will perform it, &c. And inasmuch as he doth by his intercession plead with the Father for the believer's preservation in faith, and perseverance in holiness unto the end; I have prayed that thy faith fail not, Luke xxii. 32.

—Who, for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God. 3 For consider him that endured such contradiction of sinners against himself, lest ye be wearied and faint in your minds.

Observe here. 1. How our apostle having propounded the example of suffering saints before, to provoke them to patience and constancy under their tribulations, he propounds now the example of a suffering Saviour, and bids them consider him; Qualis sit, compare his sufferings with your own, consider what he was and who you are: was not he the Son of God? Had not he all glory and power in his hand? Yet he endured, &c. consider him therefore. Learn hence, That the frequent consideration of Christ in his sufferings, is the best mean to keep up faith, and encourage patience under our own sufferings. Observe, 2. How our apostle particularly enumerates the sufferings which our Lord Jesus underwent, he endured the contradiction of sinners; that is, the great opposition made to his doctrine, the slander cast upon his miracles, the indignities offered to his person, the malicious and unwaried attempts against his life. Next he endured the pain of the cross, and despised the shame of the cross. Pain and shame are the two constituent parts of all outward sufferings, and they were both eminent in the death of the cross; no death more cruel and painful, no death more opprobrious and disgraceful, and never did these appear in any person's death to that degree of extremity, as in the death of Christ; yet he patiently endured them with an holy composure of soul, without reviling the villianous Jews, or threatening them with that vengeance and destruction which it was in his power to have brought upon them every moment. Lord! never any example of patient suffering like to thine, nor can any equal to it be given in human nature. Learn hence, That the manner of Christ's enduring sufferings, particularly pain and shame; ought to be continually before us, that God may in some measure be glorified by us; according thereto, when we are called into a suffering condition.

Observe, 3. What it was that carried Christ through his sufferings, it was the joy that was set before him; that is, say some, his glorious exaltation; rather the prospect of that glory which would redound to God and his church by his patient suffering: The glory of God, and the salvation of mankind, were now set before him, and he valued them above life, honour, reputation and ease, and every thing that was dear unto him. Accordingly it was called his pleasure, Isa. liii. 10. Learn hence, That herein is Christ our great example, in that he was influenced and acted, in all that he did and suffered, by a constant respect to the glory of God, and the salvation of his people: for the joy that was set before him, he endured the cross, &c.

Observe, 4. The reward of our Lord's patient suffering declared, he is therefore set down at the right hand of the throne of God. God's throne implies his majesty and power, the right hand of his throne implies the highest honour, dignity and power, next to God. Christ's advancement above angels, and all creatures; is hereby intimated: This glorious estate was the great reward of his sufferings; he became obedient unto death, therefore God thus highly exalted him. Observe lastly, The advantage we shall reap and receive by eyeing Christ in, and intimating his patience under all our sufferings; it will prevent our being wearied and faint in our minds. Learn hence, 1. That such sufferings may befall us in the way of our profession, as may cause us to faint and grow weary. 2. That when we do begin to faint and grow weary under sufferings, it is our duty to look unto Jesus, and consider him as an example of the greatest patience and constancy of mind: look unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith, and consider him who endured, &c.

4 Ye have not resisted unto blood, striving against sin,

Here the apostle subjoins another reason why the Hebrews should be reconciled to a suffering condition: because what they had already suffered was but a flea-bite, compared with what Christ and the forementioned cloud of witnesses suffered; he and they resisted unto blood, which you never yet did; Ye have not yet resisted unto blood, &c. By blood is meant death and loss of life; though they had resisted bravely, and suffered manfully, yet their lives were safe. Learn hence, 1. That such as are engaged in the christian profession have no security, but that they may be called forth to the utmost sufferings, even to the sealing of it with their blood. 2. That whatever befalls us on this side blood, is to be looked upon as a fruit of divine tenderness and mercy towards us. 3. It is highly dishonourable to faint in the cause of Christ and the gospel, under lesser sufferings, when we know there are greater to be undergone by ourselves and others, on the same account. 4. That it is a noble struggle to resist even unto blood, in opposing sin, and striving against it, both in striving against the sin which others commit, and in striving against the sin which others, by promises or threatenings, would tempt us to commit. O how honourable a warfare is it to be engaged against such an enemy as sin is!

5 And ye have forgotten the exhortation which speaketh unto you, as unto children—

As if he had said, "By growing weary and faint in your minds, you will plainly shew, and evidently declare, that you have forgotten that exhortation which God gives, Prov. iii." The want of a diligent consideration and due remembrance of God's promises, recorded in Scripture for our encouragement unto duty, and support under difficulties, is very sinful, and of dangerous consequence unto our souls, —My son, despise not thou the chastening of the Lord, nor faint when thou art rebuked of him.

Note here, 1. A sweet and endearing compellation, my son. Learn hence, That good men, when under the greatest trials and heaviest afflictions, are God's sons; he calls them sons, and he deals with them as with sons. 2. The nature of the saints afflictions declared; not judgments, but chastisements and fatherly rebukes; the original word signifies such a correction as a Father gives his child for his instruction, and bringing him to a sense of his duty. Learn hence, That all the afflictions which God lays upon his children are not the effects of his vindictive anger, but the fruits and effects of his paternal love. Note, 3. A cautionary direction given against two very dangerous extremes in the time of affliction, namely despising correction and fainting under it. It is the duty, and ought to be the endeavour, of all the children of God, when under his fatherly hand, to take care that they neither despise his chastisements, nor faint under them: When God has taken away one of our comforts, to say, "Let him take all if he will; if my children must die, let them die; if my estate must go, let it go." This is to despise. God cannot bear to see us bear his hand thus lightly. The other extreme is fainting: if, when goods are taken away, the heart is taken away, and when relations die, the spirit of a person dies with them, Despise not thou the chastening, &c.

6 For whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth.

A reason is given in these words, why we should not faint under divine chastisements, because God chasteneth every one whom he loves. Here note, That love is antecedent unto chastening, and that chastening is consequential unto love. 2. That divine love and fatherly chastenings are inseparable; whom he loveth, that is, whomsoever he loveth, he chasteneth, none goes free. 3. That no person then has any reason to complain of his portion of fatherly chastisements, seeing it is the constant way and manner of God's dealing with his children. 4. That in and under all our chastisements, the resignation of ourselves to the sovereign pleasure, and infinite wisdom of God, is the only means to preserve us from fainting and weakness.

7 If ye endure chastening, God dealeth with you as with sons: for what son is he whom the father chasteneth not? 8 But if ye be without chastisement, whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards, and not sons.

Observe, 1. He does not say, If ye be chastised, but, if ye endure chastisements, God dealeth with you as with sons; if ye endure them with faith and patience, with submission and perseverance, so not as to faint under them. Learn hence, That a patient endurance of chastisements is of great price in the sight of God, as well as of singular use and advantage unto us. Afflictions and chastisements are no pledges or assurances of our adoption, but when and where they are endured with patience. Observe farther from these words, What son is he whom the father chasteneth not? 1. That every one of God's sons, more or less, stand in need of his fatherly chastisements. 2. That God is very careful, as a wife and tender father, to correct and chasten all his children. 3. That God, in correcting of his children, dealeth with them as with sons; he is the world's sovereign, but the believer's father; as he is the governor of the world, he treats men righteously in his judgments; as he is the Father of believers, he treats them graciously in afflictions. Observe again from these words, If ye be without chastisement, whereof all are partakers, (that is, all sons are partakers) that all true children are under God's fatherly discipline; and all that are not under his discipline, are not his children, then are ye bastards and not sons. Learn hence, 1. That God's family, or visible church in this world, has some bastards in it, sons that may have gifts and outward enjoyments, but are not heirs, and have no right to the heavenly inheritance. 2. That this is a great evidence of it, that they are not the genuine sons of God, because they go unchastised; not that they are altogether without affliction, for they are in trouble like other men, but they are not sensible of divine chastisements in their afflictions, they do not receive them, bear them, and improve them as such, but are impaired by their afflictions, rather than improved by them; they come cankered out of the furnace, and leprous out of Jordan; afflictions that should refine them from their dross, and purify them from their filth, boils their scum and impurity more into them. Learn, lastly, That a joyous state of freedom from affliction, is such as we ought to watch over with great jealousy and fear, lest it should be a leaving us out of the discipline of the family of God; not that we may desire afflictions as such, much less exorcitate and torment ourselves; but we may pray that we may not want any pledge of our adoption, leaving the ordering and disposal of all things to the will of God.

9 Furthermore, we have had fathers of our flesh, which corrected us, and we gave them reverence: shall we not much rather be in subjection unto the Father of spirits, and live? 10 For they verily for a few days chastened us after their own pleasure; but he, for our profit, that we might be partakers of his holiness.

These words are a fresh argument to persuade christians to a patient enduring of divine chastisements: the argument is drawn from the less to the greater, thus: "If our earthly parents chastened us only a few days, and after their own pleasure, and yet we were subject to them, how much more ought we to be subject to God our heavenly Father, who chastens us for our profit, that we may be partakers of his holiness?" Note here, 1. Earthly parents do and may chastise the children of their flesh, and they ought to reverence them for so doing, and pay a reverential submission to their paternal chastisements. 2. That the motive of, and rule which parents too often follow in correcting of their children, is their own will and pleasure; they have frequently a greater regard to their own passions, than to their children's advantage, and correct oftener in humour than in reason, erring sometimes in the matter, sometimes in the manner, sometimes in the measure of their corrections. 3. That great is the difference between divine and parental chastisements. (1.) In their author, one is the father of our flesh, the other of our souls and spirits; they are the immediate product of his power, which is a fundamental reason for our patient submission to God, in and under all afflictions. (2.) In their end, the one for their own pleasure, the other for his children's profit, to make them partakers of his holiness by renovation, sanctification, and mortification: The carrying on of these things in us, is that which God designs in all his chastisements. Learn hence, That we can have no greater pledge and assurance of divine love in afflictions than this, that God by them brings us nearer to himself, and makes us more like himself; if under divine chastisements we find no increase of holiness, they are utterly lost, and we have nothing but the trouble and sorrow of them. Note lastly, The duty we owe to God, the Father of spirits, and that is subjection, together with the benefit and advantage of it; by being in subjection to the father of spirits, we shall live. Now this subjection unto God, consists in an acquiescency in his right and sovereignty to do what he will with his own, in an acknowledgment of his wisdom and righteousness in all his dealings with us, in a mighty sense of his care and love, and in an entire resignation of ourselves to his holy will in all things. And behold the advantages and benefit of this subjection to God in our chastisements, we shall live a spiritual life on earth, and an eternal life in heaven. The rebellious son under the law, that refused subjection to his earthly parent, was stuffed to death: see Deut. xxi. 18. and died without mercy; but they who yield subjection to God in their chastisements shall live and not die.

11 Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous: nevertheless, afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby.

Our apostle, in these words, seems to obviate an objection against a compliance with his exhortation to bear divine chastenings with silence and submission; and this is taken from the trouble and sorrow wherewith chastisement is accompanied; this he takes for granted is so, but takes of all the weight of the objection, by opposing the benefit of affliction thereunto. Learn hence, 1. That all afflictions for the present are grievous to the flesh, and painful to human nature. 2. That though afflictions are grievous, yet their fruits are gracious to a believer: God in his sovereign wisdom doth so dispose and manage his people's afflictions, that he makes them end in an happy fruit, even in the fruit of holiness and sanctification; and after affliction has done its work, and wrought kindly, God comes in with comfort and joy, and cheering cordials follow bitter physic. Observe farther, How the benefit of chastisement is expressed in a threefold gradation. Affliction yieldeth fruit: it is no dead and dry thing, but this rod blossoms, and brings forth almonds. The fruit it yieldeth is the fruit of righteousness, namely, patience, submission to the will of God, weanedness from the world, mortification of sin, purity of heart, holiness of life, farther readiness and greater fitness for suffering; these are the sweet fruits which God enables his to gather from the four tree of affliction. And this fruit of righteousness, which affliction yields, is peaceable fruit, because it is a pledge and evidence of our peace with God, and because it brings peace into our minds. By these fruits of righteousness our hearts are quieted, our minds composed, all tumults allayed, and we enabled to possess our souls in peace. O happy fruit of affliction! blessed is the man whom thou chastenest. Observe, lastly, Who they are that are blessed with these special benefits of affliction, only those that are exercised thereby. The original word is an allusion to those in the public games, who strip themselves naked, and put forth all their strength for mastery. To be exercised by chastisements, is to have all our spiritual strength put forth, all our faith and patience tried to the utmost. Learn hence, That a christian can never find any benefit in chastisements unless he be exercised by them, that is, unless his graces be stirred up by them to an holy and constant exercise, for hereby alone they yield the peaceable fruit of righteousness.

12 Wherefore lift up the hands which hang down, and the feeble knees. 13 And make straight paths for your feet, lest that which is lame be turned out of the way, but let it rather be healed.

As if our apostle had said; "Seeing so glorious fruits spring from sanctified afflictions, be not dejected in mind, nor suffer fear to seize upon you, which weakens the hands and enfeebles the knees, and causes them to smite one against another; but be resolute for God, make straight paths in the way of christianity, not stepping once out of it to avoid persecution, lest they who are already lame and feeble, the weak and wavering christians, be disheartened and moved by your example to turn out of the way, but let them rather by your constancy be confirmed in their christian course." Learn hence, 1. That in the running of our spiritual race, we must put forth our utmost strength and activity; but where the course is long, and difficulties great, we are apt to grow weary and despond, our hands hang down, and our knees grow feeble. Learn, 2. That faintness and weariness in duty, and dejection and despondency as to success, are great evils, and of fatal consequence unto others as well as ourselves, which therefore we must with all intention of mind watch against: Lift up the hands that hang down, and the feeble knees. Learn, 3. That negligent and careless walking in time of prosperity, and pusillanimity and weakness in time of trial, is a great mean of turning aside those that are lame and weak out of the paths of visible holiness, lest that which is lame be turned out of the way. 4. That the sight and due consideration of a christian's courage and constancy, will tend very much to the healing of the lame and weak christians whilst they are in the way, whose recovery, when quite turned out, will be very difficult, if not impossible.

14 Follow peace with all men, and holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord.

Our apostle having now finished his exhortation unto patient perseverance in the profession of the apostle under all sufferings and afflictions, he next proceeds to a prescription of practical duties incumbent upon christians at all times in the daily course of their conversation, two of which are contained in this verse, namely, to follow peace and holiness; the former contains our duty to man, the latter our duty to God. Here observe, That both duties are enjoined in one and the same precept, and also with one and the same penalty: Without which, that is, without following of both which, without pursuing and endeavouring after both, no man shall see the Lord. Indeed, if a person follows holiness, though he cannot obtain peace, he may see God, provided he pursues peace, and the fault none of his that he doth not find it; but if he does not pursue peace, though he pretends never so much to holiness he cannot be happy; for a christian must be of a peaceable, as well as of a pious conversation: Peace and holiness, peaceableness and purity, are here joined together, and he can neither be happy in this or the next world, that puts them asunder. Observe farther, The manner how peace and holiness must be followed, namely, with intense endeavours: The original word imports a vehement pursuit, a metaphor taken from huntsmen, who follow the chase, and pursue their game, though it flies before them: If peace may be had, though it be had upon hard terms, we must endeavour to secure it, for it can never be bought too dear, if it be not purchased by sin and baseness. A frame and disposition of seeking peace with all, is eminently suited unto the doctrine and grace of the gospel. A forward spirit, ready for strife and contention, easily provoked, and retaining long a sense of injuries, is directly contrary to the spirit and temper of the gospel. Observe likewise, How that holiness towards God must be accompanied with peaceableness towards man. It is evangelical holiness, which is here required; which must be an inward holiness an universal holiness, a sincere and real holiness, an humble and self-denying holiness, a growing and progressive holiness, a constant and persevering holiness, and such an holiness towards God, as is always accompanied with righteousness towards men. Lastly, The absolute necessity of holiness in order to eternal blessedness; without it no man shall see the Lord. The future sight of God in glory depends peremptorily on our present holiness, not as the meritorious cause of it, but as a necessary qualification and preparation for it, and as it is the indispensable condition of our obtaining of it. The soul is by holiness made meet and fit for the enjoyment of God in happiness, Col. i. 12. Lord! how miserably mistaken will they be, who expect to see God to their comfort hereafter, who have lived and died in an unholly state here?

15 Looking diligently, lest any man fail of the grace of God; lest any root of bitterness springing up, trouble you, and thereby many be defiled.

Our apostle having declared what our duty is with respect to ourselves, in the foregoing verses, here acquaints us how much it is our duty to take care of, and watch over others, to do what in us lies, that none may fall short of the grace of God, that is, fall from the grace of God, and the profession of Christianity; so that it is very plain, that apostasy is the sin here pointed at, their falling back from christianity to Judaism, for fear of persecution: This is deservedly called a root of bitterness springing up, according to Deut. xxix. 18. A root that beareth gall and wormwood. Learn hence, 1. That looking diligently unto the good of others, and to prevent their falling into sin, especially into the sin of apostasy, is a duty we are obliged to by the light of nature, and the royal law of love. 2. That the root of apostasy from God, and the profession of christianity, may abide invisibly in and among eminent professors of religion. It is here called a root, because at the beginning it is hidden in the hearts of men, and cannot be discovered until it springs up; and it is called a root of bitterness, because of its noxious and poisonous qualities, its bitter effects and fruits. 3. That there is no man professing the gospel who comes short of the grace of God, but it is by reason of himself and his own sin: Unbelief, negligence and sloth, are the true causes why such persons do fail of the grace of God.

16 Lest there be any fornicator, or profane person, as Esau, who for one morsel of meat sold his birthright. 17 For ye know how that afterward, when he would have inherited the blessing, he was rejected: for he found no place of repentance though he sought it carefully with tears.

Our apostle proceeds in these verses to warn them against such sins as would occasion their apostasy and falling from the grace of God, and they are fornication and profaneness: Lest there be any fornicator, &c. Where note, How the apostle puts fornication and profaneness together, because they usually go together; fornicators, such especially as are habitually so, do always grow profane, and profane persons do set light by fornication, and they are sins very seldom forsaken; few fornicators and profane persons do ever come to repentance. By fornication understand all conjunction with women out of wedlock, be it with single or married persons. By profane persons, understand such as mock religion, who lightly regard its promises and threatenings, who despise or neglect its worship, who speak irreverently of its concerns. 2. The instance which the apostle gives of a profane person, in the person of Esau: Lest there be any fornicator, or profane person, as Esau. The scripture makes no mention of his fornication; but the way whereby he manifested his profaneness is declared; namely, that for one morsel of meat he sold his birthright. Which birthright had many privileges belonging to it, as namely, a double portion of the paternal inheritance, a right of rule and government over the family, power and dominion, dignity and superiority belonging to him, but especially the honour of the priesthood, all which did belong to the first born. Add to these the blessing which run from Abraham in the patriarchal line, and was communicated from father to son, containing an inclosure of all church-privileges, and preservation of the promised seed. Now Esau, by selling his birthright, did virtually renounce his right unto this blessing, wherein the promised seed and the church state were contained, and doing all this upon a slight consideration, for a morsel of pottage, or a morsel of meat; and in a regardless manner, utterly unconcerned at what he had done. This was his profaneness; and accordingly the scripture says, Thus Esau despised his birthright. Learn from hence, How much it concerns all persons not to glory in their outward privileges: Esau here was the first born of Isaac, circumcised according to the law of God, and partaker in all the worship of God, yet he proved an outcast from the covenant, and promises thereof. Profane Esau! The 17th verse acquaints us with the fruitfulness of Esau's sorrow for parting with his birthright, and the unprofitableness of his endeavours in order to the recovery of it; when he would have inherited the blessing afterwards. This afterwards, say some, was not less than forty years, for he sold his birthright when he was young, and when he designed the recovery of the blessing, Isaac was old: Thus long did he live in sin, without any sense of it, or repentance for it; but falling into distress, it fills him with perplexity, and he seeks the recovery of the blessing: And herein he was a type of all unbelievers, and obdinate refusers of the grace of Christ. Learn from his example, That there is a time coming when the profane sinners upon earth will be found upon their knees at God's door, seeking, and that earnestly, with strong cries and tears, for the obtaining of that blessing which they now sinfully undervalue, and scornfully despise. Afterwards Esau would have inherited the blessing, and sought it carefully with tears. It follows, he was rejected; that is, by his father Isaac; and found no place with him for repentance. Isaac would not change his mind, nor recall the blessing, which as a prophet of God he had conferred on Jacob. Learn hence, then, That such sinners as now neglect the seeking seeking of the blessing in God's time, have great reason to fear that they shall not find it in their own time; though they seek it with tears sater than those of Esau. Profane conteniners of the grace of God, ought to fear being excluded from the mercy of God; and as Isaac did not, God will not repent or altar his righteous sentence upon them. This sad event had the profaneness of Esau, and the like will they meet with who despise the grace of God.

18 For ye are not come unto the mount that might be touched, and that burned with fire, not unto blackness, and darkness, and tempest, 19 And the sound of a trumpet, and the voice of words; which voice they that heard intreated that the word should not be spoken to them any more: 20 For they could not endure that which was commanded, and if so much as a beast touch the mountain, it should be stoned, or thrust through with a dart. 21 And so terrible was the sight, that Moses said, I exceedingly fear and quake.

Our apostle's design being to bring over the Hebrews fully from Judaism to christianity, he enters here upon a description of both states, shewing the excellency of the one above the other. He describes first the legal state of the church under the Old Testament, and the manner of their forefathers entering into covenant with God at Mount Sinai. And then he sets forth the evangelical state, whereunto they were called, and into which they were entered. In the verses now before us, he sets forth the dread and terror of the Mosaic dispensation, and the way and manner how their forefathers under the Old Testament entered into their church state; telling them, that they came to a mount that might be touched, that is, to Mount Sinai in the desert of Arabia, a barren and fruitless place, full of bushes and brambles, but without water or food: intimating, that such as are under the law, in a state of sin, bring forth no acceptable fruit, unto God; and as there was no water in the desert, but that which the people lived upon was brought out of the rock: and that rock was Christ; it intimates, that from Christ alone were all their and our refreshments: The law affords none, but thunders from its fiery mouth, wrath and a curse. Farther, this mount is said to be what might be touched; that is, a sensible, carnal thing, exposed to feeling; intimating how low and inferior the giving of the law was in comparison of the promulgation of the gospel, which was from heaven. The law was given from a mount that might be touched by man or beast, though if either touched it they must die, to intimate the bondage and fear the people were in, who might not so much as touch the mountain where were the signs of God's presence: But the blessing was promulged from heaven, and the Son of God sent down on purpose from thence to plant and propogate it here in the world. The second thing which the apostle tells them they were come unto, was to fire that burned. This fire that burned on the mount was a token of God's presence, and a distinct mean of filling the people with dread and fear. This fire represented the purity and holiness of God's nature his jealousy and severity against sin. Thus the law represents to us the holiness and severity of God, with his anger and displeasure against sin and sinners, but there leaves us consumed, without relief by Jesus Christ. Unto fire the apostle adds blackness, and darkness, and tempest; which blackness and darkness might be caused by thick clouds and smoke that covered the mount. This darkness was a type of that utter darkness of hell, which the transgressors of the law deserved; and the tempest and terrible storms were emblems and signs of God's fiery indignation and fearful vengeance on the wicked violators of his holy law, and might also point out and signify the effects of the law then delivered; namely, to bring the soul into darkness, that it can see no light either for its direction or consolation; and it raises a tempest in the mind, of disquieting, perplexing thoughts, without relieving or encouraging a sinner to look out after any relief, until Christ in his gospel says, Behold me, behold me. It follows, ye are come to the sound of a trumpet: This was not a real trumpet but the sound of a trumpet formed in the air by the ministry of angels waxing louder and louder, to signify the nearer approach of God; also as this trumpet did summon the people to appear before the Lord as a legislative trumpet, in like manner there shall be a judicial trumpet, to summon the world to appear before Christ at the great day. After the sound of the trumpet followed the voice of words; that is, the voice of God in a terrible manner promulging the law out of the midst of the fire, in a language understood by that people. As the sound of the trumpet, so the voice of God was loud, majestic, terrible, and like thunder. Quest. But why was there such vast solemnity used at the giving of the law? Ans. To signify the majesty and authority of him who was the supreme lawgiver, even the Lord of heaven and earth: and that the greater the outward solemnity was, the greater the inward impression might be upon the minds of the people; and to signify, that if the promulgation of the law was to awful, that the transgression of it would be fatal, and the transgressors' punishment very dreadful. Observe lastly, The event of this sight and hearing on the part of the people: Fear made them desire that they might hear this voice no more: And God's design, in all, was to cause them to long for, and look after that great prophet, Christ Jesus, by whom God would speak unto them more comfortably, and by whom they might have access to the throne of grace more freely. They intreated that the word should not be spoken unto them any more, because it heightened their fear and dread to the utmost. Learn from hence, That the sight and voice of God will be very dreadful to us; and there will be no appearance for us before him with confidence and peace, unless we have an answer in readiness with us to all the words of the law, even all that the law requires of us; and such as trust to their own works and merits to answer for them, or to any thing whatsoever, besides the blood and sacrifice, the mediation and satisfaction, of Jesus Christ, the surety of the new covenant, will find themselves eternally deceived. The next evidence the apostle gives of the dreadful promulgation of the law, and consequently of the miserable state of them that are under its power, appears in this, that people could not endure that which was commanded; that is, the severity of that command, that if a beast touched the mountain, it should be stoned or thrust through with a dart. All this was to shew the absolute inaccessibleness of God, in and by the law, and at what distance we ought to keep ourselves from every thing that falls under the course of the law. It is added last of all, That Moses himself did exceedingly fear and quake. From whence observe, How all persons concerned were brought to an utter loss and distress at the promulgation and giving of the law, from whence no relief is to be obtained, but by him alone who is the end of the law for righteousness unto all them that believe.

22 But ye are come unto mount Sion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels: 23 To the general assembly and church of the first-born which are written in heaven, and to God the judge of all, and to the spirits of just men made perfect; 24 And to Jesus the mediator of the new covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel.

Our apostle having given an account, in the foregoing verses, of the state of the Jewish church under the law, comes now to declare that more excellent state whereunto believers are called in and by the gospel. The privileges here summed up, partly respecting the church militant, and partly the church triumphant. Observe then, The glorious privileges of the gospel-state, and what believers are said to come to whilst militant here on earth. 1. They are said to come unto mount Sion, the city of the living God, the new Jerusalem; not to mount Sinai, which was full of terror and discomfort, but to mount Sion, full of all spiritual blessings. Where note, The gospel-church is called the city of the living God. A city is a place of safety and a place of honour, a place of peace and rest. The souls of sinners can find no place of rest or safety under the law, but we have all these things by the gospel; rest in Christ, peace with God, safety in divine protection, &c. And as a king dwells in this city, so God dwells in the church of believers; "That is my rest for ever, here will I dwell," says God, "for I have a delight therein." Oh, what manner of persons ought they to be who are the denizens of the city of God! Alas! the great number who pretend highly to the church, and its privileges, are citizens of this world only, and altogether unfit for this holy society. 2. Believers are next said to come to an innumerable company of angels: to come to these, is to be of their society: and they and we are one in Christ; the angels above, and believers below, make up but one corporation or family; they are our fellow-citizens, and our fellow-subjects. True, they are above us, and at a mighty distance from us, yet upon occasion very near us; and though we do not see them, yet they love us, have a special care of us, and are ministering to us, as heirs of the same salvation with themselves. 3. They are come to the general assembly and church of the first-born; that is, they are of the number of God's regenerated and adopted ones, of those that are born again, whose names are registered in heaven. As the first-born under the law had a right to the inheritance, to a double part of the inheritance; so they, who are interested really in the gospel-church, have a right to all that God has provided, and Christ hath purchased, even to the whole inheritance of grace and glory. O glorious privilege, to be brought into this blessed society, this general assembly of the first-born! Especially if we consider what company, what society, what assembly we belong unto without it, which is no other than that of devils, and the seed of the wicked serpent. 4. They are come to God the judge of all; that is, they have access to God by Jesus Christ; access to his favour, by justification, and access into his presence by prayer and supplication, yea, access to him as a judge, without terror or consternation. Blessed privilege! Believers have a comfortable access to God as the judge of all; with all their causes and complaints, he will hear them, plead their cause, and judge for them, and make their oppressions unsafe to the greatest of the sons of men. 5. Believers are said to come to the spirits of just men made perfect. Come to them, though not in the same place with them, until death; yet we and they have the same God and sovereign, the same head and Saviour, the same expectation of a glorious resurrection. Note here, 1. There are spirits of men in a separate state and condition, capable of communion with God and the church. 2. That all the spirits of just men departed, are made perfect; their race is consummated, perfect deliverance from all sin and sorrow is completed, and a full reward enjoyed; their faith is heightened into sight, and all their graces elevated into glory. 3. That yet are they spirits still, and no more than spirits; and though perfected spirits, yet there is wanting the last finishing stroke from the hand of God to render the bodies as well as the spirits of just men for ever perfect in the morning of the resurrection. 4. Believers are here said to come to Jesus the mediator of the new covenant; as if the apostle had said, "Your fathers came to a mount of fire and smoke, of darkness, terror, and death, where there was no mediator to make their peace with God, no blood to cry for mercy, and to cleanse them from sin; but you, by forsaking Judaism, and coming over to Christianity fully, are come into that society where Christ is mediator and priest; where the blood of Christ sprinkled upon your souls cries aloud for mercy, and cleanses from all sin. And to the blood of sprinkling which speaketh better things than the blood of Abel. Intimating, that Christ's blood solicits God with stronger cries for mercy, than did ever Abel's for revenge. Quest. But what are those better things which the blood of Christ speaks above and beyond the blood of Abel? Ans. 1. It speaks better things from God unto us, namely, that his justice is satisfied, his wrath appeased, the condemning guilt of sin expiated, and the majesty of God fully reconciled to all believers. 2. It speaks better things to God for us, namely, to be at peace with us, to rest in his love towards us, to furnish us with all grace here, and to fit us for glory hereafter. O blessed Jesus! thy blood never cried as Abel's did, for vengeance on him by whom it was shed, but pleaded for pardon, and obtained pardon on the behalf behalf of many of them. Happy they! who by faith are made partakers of this typical blood of sprinkling, which speaks better things than the blood of Abel.

25 See that ye refuse not him that speaketh. For if they escaped not who refused him that spake on earth, much more shall not we escape, if we turn away from him that speaketh from heaven.

Our apostle having, in the foregoing verses, given a summary account of the two states of the law and the gospel, with the incomparable excellency of the latter above the former, he gives them an exhortation and cautionary direction to take heed that they did not turn a deaf ear to so excellent a person as Christ was, preaching to them by his doctrine: see that ye refuse not him that speaketh. Here note, in general, That to refuse any who speak unto us in the name and authority of Christ, is to refuse Christ himself. This may be applied to all the faithful preachers of the gospel, however they may be despised in and by the world. But it is here the person of Christ that is particularly intended. To refuse him here, is either to reject his doctrine, and not to receive it, or having received it, to renounce it; so that this refuse includes both unbelief and apostasy, either of which are fatal and dangerous to the sons of men. Observe next, The reason drawn from the heinousness of the sin, and the grievousness of the punishment; if they escaped not who refused him that spake on earth; that is, Moses, who delivered his message here below, much more shall not we escape, if we turn away from him that speaketh from heaven; that is, Jesus Christ his Son, sent down from heaven, personally to deliver his holy doctrine; and now speaking to us from heaven by his holy Spirit, in his ministers and apostles. Note here, 1. That Christ did in former times speak unto his church by Moses and the prophets. 2. That in these latter times he vouchsafed to speak unto his church personally himself. 3. That after he personally disappeared and left the world, he vouchsafed still to speak unto his church by the Spirit in the ministry of the word. 4. That though to refuse Christ, when speaking here on earth, was a grievous sin, and deserved a fearful punishment; yet to refuse him now speaking from heaven, is a more grievous sin, and deserves a greater punishment, considering who speaks, what he speaks, and from whence he speaks; the gospel was a mystery brought to us from the bosom of the Father, the clearest revelation of God's will, and the fullest manifestation of his love, and yet, few regard it, most reject it, to their uniterable and inevitable condemnation.

26 Whose voice then shook the earth; but now he hath promised, saying, Yet once more I shake not the earth only, but also heaven: 27 And this word, yet once more signifieth the removing of those things that are shaken, as of things that are made, that those things which cannot be shaken may remain.

As if the apostle had said, "The voice of God, at the promulgating of the law on mount Sinai, shook the earth: but he promised after this to shake all nations, and that Christ, the expected Messias, the desire of all nations, should come, which is now fulfilled." Quest. But what means our apostle by God's shaking not the earth only, but also heaven? Answer. He means thereby all the Mosaical worship, all the Judaical state, these were shaken at the coming of Christ, in order to the introduction of the immovable gospel-state, which was perpetually to remain. Learn hence, That the coming of the Messias was to be the last dispensation of God for the salvation of mankind, and consequently was to be perpetual and unchangeable. The apostle argues from the words, once more, that the former dispensation should be removed, to make way for that which should perpetually remain. Several things are here asserted by our apostle, 1. That there were some things which were intended by God to be shaken, namely, the Levitical priesthood, and all the Jewish sacrifices and services; these things are to be shaken, moved, yea, altogether removed out of the way. 2. That there were things that could not be shaken or removed, but remain; these were the gospel-state, the christian religion, which shall continue until time shall be no more. 3. That the former things were removed, that the latter might be introduced and established; the law and the gospel were inconsistent; the legal and evangelical administration could not stand in force together, therefore there was a necessity for the nulling of the one, in order to the establishing of the other. 4. That the removal of the law, to bring the more perfect administration of the gospel, doth prove the stability and immutability of the gospel, that it stands fast for ever; there shall be no more shaking, no farther alteration in matters of religion to the end of the world. For thus it follows.

28 Wherefore, we receiving a kingdom which cannot be moved, let us have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably with reverence and godly fear. 29 For our God is a consuming fire,

Observe here, 1. That the apostle calls the dispensation of the gospel, a kingdom that cannot be shaken, in opposition to the law, which was an imperfect and alterable dispensation; the gospel-revelation is full and final, there is no need of any farther revelation after this, nor of any change of that religion which was brought from heaven by the Son of God, in regard of the perfection of it, and its admirable fitness to reform the world, and recover mankind out of their lost estate and lapsed condition, and to bring them to eternal happiness; and this by the purity of its doctrine, and the power of its arguments, to work upon the minds of men by the clear discovery of the mighty rewards and punishments of another world; we have received now a kingdom that cannot be shaken. 2. The inference which the apostle draws from the perfection and perpetuity of this revelation which God has laid of all made to the world by his Son, let us have grace to serve God acceptably; that is, let us live as become to those to whom God had made so clear and perfect a revelation of his mind and will; we have all the advantages of divine revelation which the world ever had, and the best and most perfect that the world ever shall have; we have not only Moses, but Jesus; not only the moral law, but the glorious glorious gospel, which the Son of God came down on purpose from heaven to declare to the world. Observe, 3. The manner how God must be served, with reverence and godly fear. Reverence in divine service looks at God's glorious excellency and majesty, and at our own unworthiness, together with that infinite distance between him and us; and godly fear is a religious awe upon the soul in holy duties, from the consideration of the great danger of sinful miscarriages in his worship. 4. The reason making the foregoing duty necessary, For our God is a consuming fire. Our God, intimates a covenant relation. Note hence, That the believer's God is a consuming fire, but not to believers: or if so, not to consume their graces, but their corruptions only, or at most their corruptible comforts. 2. That though God takes us near to himself, and into covenant with himself, yet he expects that we consider who he is, and what he is, even a consuming fire, and a jealous God.

CHAP. XIII.

Our apostle being now come to the conclusion of this most excellent epistle, closes it, with an exhortation to several evangelical and moral duties, whereby pointing out to the ministers of the gospel, the right order, and best method of preaching, namely first to unfold the mysteries of the gospel, with the grace of God therein, and then to improve it to practical holiness in the duties of obedience.

LET brotherly love continue.

Love being the fountain and foundation of all moral duties, our apostle begins with it, and places it at the head of all the rest, as comprehending our whole duty towards our neighbour. Note here, The duty commanded is love; the special duty recommended is brotherly love, or that brotherly affection which every true christian chiefly bears to all his fellow-members in Christ for grace's sake; and the manner of the injunction or command is, that this brotherly affection do continue and constantly abide, not in the pretence and appearance of it only, but in the truth and reality of it, for there are innumerable occasions which will be ready to impair and weaken it, if it be not well grounded; alas! unsuitableness of natural tempers, differences in judgment, and matters of opinion, inconsistent worldly interest, readiness to provocation, or to be provoked, pride on the one hand, or envy on the other, will sadly occasion the temporary decay, yea, at least the total loss of this noble grace, if it be not well grounded, and deeply rooted. Learn hence, That brotherly love is very apt to impair and decay, if we endeavour not continually its preservation and revival. Lord, how marvellous is it, that so many amongst us can persuade themselves that they are christians, and yet be not only strangers, but enemies to this grace and duty of love! How is the power and glory of christianity weakened through want of it! and verily, until this holy love be again revived amongst us, the interest of christianity will run very low, yea, the concerns of religion will more and more run to ruin.

2 Be not forgetful to entertain strangers: for thereby some have entertained angels unawares:

The second duty here exhorted to is hospitality, especially towards strangers, which consisted in receiving them into their houses, and furnishing them with all needful accommodations. In those eastern countries inns were not so ready as with us, and christians were generally poor, not able to bear their own charges in their travelling from place to place. Strangers, even amongst heathens, were accounted sacred, and under the peculiar protection of God. And a punishment was appointed for those that were inhospitable towards them. Hospitality is a prescribed duty, but this part of it, to wit, the entertaining of strangers, which was so great a virtue in ancient times, is now driven out of the world by the wickedness of some, and the covetousness of others; few strangers are worthy to receive entertainment, and as few have hearts to give it. Observe farther, The manner of prescribing this duty, Be not forgetful to entertain strangers; no doubt a positive command is included in the prohibition, forget not; that is, remember to do it, be always in readiness for the discharge of this duty; our hearts ought to be always in a gracious disposition towards such duties as are attended with difficulty or charge; the liberal mind deviseth liberal things. Observe, lastly, The reason enforcing the duty, hereby some have entertained angels unawares: so did Abraham and Lot entertain three angels, in the appearance of men, not knowing who or what they were. By receiving strangers out of faith in Christ, and love to God, we may receive precious saints, and (which is more) some blessed angel sent to keep them, and (which is most of all) Jesus Christ himself; who at present resents, and will hereafter acknowledge and reward, such kindnesses shewn to his members as done to himself, Matth. xxv.

3 Remember them that are in bonds, as bound with them; and them which suffer adversity, as being yourselves also in the body.

Hospitality towards strangers was expressed in the foregoing verse; here, compassion towards sufferers, such as are captives, prisoners in bonds, either upon a religious or civil account. Here note, 1. That bodily bondage is a bitter bondage; captivity is a most grievous calamity. 2. That we are very prone to forget others' captivity, when we ourselves are in prosperity. 3. That such as are in bonds for Christ's sake especially, and his holy gospel, ought particularly to be remembered by us, they are and ought to be the peculiar objects of our compassion; although, considering the cause in which they suffer, it is better, and more honourable, to be in the bonds for Christ, than to be at liberty with a raging persecuting world; for bonds and imprisonment for the truth, were consecrated to God, and made honourable by the bonds and imprisonment of Christ, himself, and commended to the church in all ages, by the bonds and imprisonment of the apostles, and the primitive witnesses to christianity. Note farther, How we are to be mindful of them, and in what manner, by visiting of them, administering to them, sympathizing with them, praying for them, and all this as bound with them, which implies an an act of union, as members of the same mystical body, and suffering in and for the same common cause; remember them that are in bonds, as bound with them; it follows, and those that suffer adversity, as being in the body. This implies, that there are many kinds of afflictions besides bonds; that we are prone to forget those who suffer lighter and lesser afflictions; if they be not in bonds, we are ready to forget them, though they suffer much adversity; but the command is more general, to remember all that are in any kind of adversity, whether they suffer in body, name, or estate, by sickness, pain, losses, reproaches, or any kind of calamity; the professors of religion are exempted from no sorts of adversity, and under every kind of it we must remember them, and sympathise with them, because we ourselves are, in the body with them; that is, say some, we are members of the same mystical body with them, and therefore when one member suffers, all the members are to suffer with it. Yourself, are in the body; that is, say others, in the same state of natural life, subject and obnoxious to the same sufferings, and within the reach of the same adversities. Learn hence, That a sense of our own being continually obnoxious unto sufferings during this life, ought to incline our minds to a diligent consideration of others in their sufferings, so as to discharge all duties of love and helpfulness towards them, as an evidence of our interest in the same mystical body with them, and as a ground of just expectation of the like belief and compassion from them.

4 Marriage is honourable in all, and the bed undefiled:—

Our apostle having, in the former verses, directed christians to their duty one towards another, in this, and the following verses, he directs them to perform their duty towards themselves; and because the two radical comprehensive lusts of corrupted nature are uncleanness and covetousness; he therefore commends unto their care and practice those two great duties of chastity and contentation, the former in this, the latter in the next verse. Now here observe, That to prevent the former sin, the ravings of unbridled lust, our apostle prescribes the remedy which God appoints, marriage; that is, the conjunction of two individual persons that have freedom in choice and consent, and have power over themselves, not being within the degrees of affinity or consanguinity prohibited, between whom there results such an indissoluble union, that thereby they become one flesh; such marriage he affirms to be honourable, and to be so esteemed in regard of its author, God himself, Gen. ii. 18. in regard of the place, paradise; in regard of the time, in man's innocency; in regard of the end and usefulness of it, the continuation of the race of mankind? thus it is honourable, and ought to be had in honour. The apostle adds, that it is thus honourable in all; that is, among all orders, ranks, and degrees of men that are called thereunto; the remedy is equally provided by God for all; and therefore for the church of Rome to deny it to their clergy, it to usurp authority over the consciences of men, and to judge themselves too pure for an institution of their maker, which our first parents in innocency did not think themselves too pure for. Learn hence; 1. That divine institution is sufficient to render any state or condition of life honourable, and consequently the state of marriage. 2. That which is honourable by divine institution, may be rendered abominable by the miscarriages of men. 3. That it is an horrid contempt of the authority of God, and a bold usurpation over the consciences of men, to forbid the state of marriage unto any, which God has made honourable among them all. Next to the state of marriage, the apostle adds the duty of that state, the bed undefiled, in opposition to the defiled bed of whoremongers and adulterers, and the preservation of marriage-duties within their due bounds.

—But whoremongers and adulterers God will judge.

Having exhorted to conjugal purity and chastity in the former part of the verse, he adds a very cogent reason and forcible motive of it in the latter words, because whoremongers and adulterers God will judge; that is, all persons who in a single state of life do know one another carnally, without a marriage-vow or covenant between them; if both parties be single, their filthiness is called fornication; if either of them be married, adultery; neither of them shall escape the judgment of God; that is, temporal punishment in this life, and eternal damnation in the next. Learn hence, That whatever light thoughts men have of the sin of uncleanness, yet we are assured it doth in its own nature deserve eternal condemnation, and such as live and die impenitently in it, shall certainly perish for it; and if so, then all occasions of, and all temptations leading to those sins, are to be avoided, as we love our souls; for of all sinners, those who have habitually given up themselves to the lusts of the flesh, are most rarely and difficultly brought to repentance.

5 Let your conversation be without covetousness; and be content with such things as ye have. For he hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee. 6 So that we may boldly say, The Lord is my helper, and I will not fear what man shall do unto me.

Observe here, A dehortation, or negative precept, Let your conversation be without covetousness. By conversation, we are first to understand the disposition of the mind, then the actions of the life, both ought to be free from all inordinate love to, and endeavours after, more of this world than God is pleased to give unto us. By covetousness, we are not to understand, as if a provident and prudential care for the things of this life were forbidden, or as if all endeavours to maintain our right to what God has given us were unlawful; but by covetousness is meant an eager and insatiable desire after, accompanied with restless and unwearyed endeavours for the things of this life, proceeding from an undue valuation of them, and an inordinate love unto them. Learn hence, That as all sin in general, so covetousness in particular, is inconsistent with a christian conversation, according to the gospel. No sin at this day doth more stain the glory of christianity than this doth. Alas! the prodigal lives of debauched persons, their blasphemies, adulteries, drunkenness, and such like, do not half the mischief to religion which this sin doth, because the persons guilty of it pretend to religion, which the other concern not themselves with. 2. A positive injunction, Be content with those things which ye have. Contentment is a gracious disposition of mind, whereby the christian rests satisfied with that portion of the good things of this life which the wisdom of God assigns him, without complaining of the little which God gives to him, or envying the much which God bestows on others. Yet know, that contentment with what we have, is not inconsistent with, nor exclusive of an industrious diligence, and an honest and moderate care to increase what we have, for ourselves and families. Honest industry is the command of God, and he has given us six days in seven for the exercise of it; but it is utterly exclusive of all covetous desires, of all anxious cares, of all priding ourselves in, and boasting of, what we have received, contemning and despising others, a vanity which men of weak minds are only guilty of. 3. The argument to enforce the duty; For he hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee. The words are a promise, a promise of God, a promise of his presence and providence to assure us of both, and that he will never leave us. He uses five negatives, I will not leave thee, I will not, I will not, I will not forsake thee. Where note, That the vehemency of the expression, by the multiplication of the negative particles, is both an effect of divine condescension, and gives the utmost security of the faith of believers, that God will be present with them, and comfortably provide for them; so that the words are a strong reason to dehort from covetousness, and to exhort to contentedness; for having God present with us, to take care of, and provide for us, we have all things in him, and a promise from him, that we shall not want any thing that is good and needful for us; only we must allow God this liberty, and give him leave to judge what is needful, and when it is needful. 4. That though the foregoing promise is made to Joshua, yet the apostle applies it to all believers, and draws comfort from it; We may boldly say, The Lord is my helper. Here note, That whatsoever promise is made in particular to any one believer, if there be not some special reason which confines and ties it to his person, every believer may apply it to himself. This promise which God made particularly to Joshua for his support, under the great difficulty in conquering the land of Canaan, the apostle here applies to the case and state of particular believers; We may therefore boldly say, &c. Believers having the same grounds that he had, may use the same confidence that he did, though our circumstances and his are not the same. All the promises of God's gracious presence made to the prophets and apostles of old, all believers may apply to themselves in their suffering state.

Remember them which have the rule over you, who have spoken unto you the word of God: whose faith follow, considering the end of their conversation.

The next duty recommended to them is respect to the spiritual guides, and ecclesiastical governors, whom God by death, or persecution at any time, removes from them, and that is to preserve their memory fresh amongst them as a precious treasure; Remember them that have the rule over you. Secondly, To propound their holy conversation to their daily view, in a christian imitation of those evangelical graces, and moral virtues, which were so orient and exemplary in their rulers' lives. Learn hence, 1. That it ought to be care of the church's guides to set before their people, and leave behind them, such an example of faith and holiness, as that it may be the duty of the church to remember them, and follow their example. 2. That it is the standing duty of that people whom God hath honoured with the enjoyment of a spiritual guide and ruler, perseveringly to follow their faith in the soundness of it, and in the steadfastness of faith, and to imitate their conversation, by exemplifying those evangelical graces, and christian virtues, which did so orientally shine forth in the lives of their ministers.

8 Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever.

These words may be understood three ways; with respect to the person of Christ, to the office of Christ, and to the doctrine of Christ. 1. With respect to the person of Christ, he is eternal and immutable in every state of the church, and in every condition of believers he is the same, and always will be the same in his divine person; he is, ever was, and ever will be, all in all unto his church. 2. He is the same, yesterday, to-day, and for ever; not only in respect of his person, but in regard of his office. The virtue of the legal sacrifice expired with the offering, but the precious oblation of Christ hath an everlasting efficacy to obtain full pardon for believers: His blood is as powerful to propitiate God, as if it were this day shed upon the cross. 3. He is the same, &c. in regard of his doctrine, that remains unchangeable and irrevocable. The gospel is the last revelation of the mind of God, made known by Jesus Christ, that ever will be laid before the world: Such therefore as reject him, and his doctrine, reject the last remedy, the only remedy, and must needs perish, without any probability of recovery. Learn from the whole, That our Lord Jesus Christ was, from the beginning of the world the immutable object of his church's faith, and the consideration of Jesus Christ in his eternity, immutability, and indeficiency in his power, as he is always the same, is the great encouragement of believers in the profession of their faith, and a mighty support under all the difficulties they meet with upon the account thereof.

9 Be not carried about with divers and strange doctrines.

There is an inference in these words, from what was asserted in the former, concerning the immutability of Christ, and his doctrine; namely, thus; Seeing that the doctrine of Christ taught by the apostles is as Christ himself, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever, therefore the apostle dehort them from being carried about with divers and strange doctrines; that is, in short, the doctrines of those that mingled Judaism and christianity together, by cleaving to the legal observation. Note here, The nature of the false doctrines, and what efficacy they have upon the minds.

minds of men; in themselves they are light and vain like the wind, tossing men up and down as the wind and the waves do the ship that wants ballast, turning them out of their course, and endangering their destruction; therefore says the apostle, Take heed that ye be not carried about, &c.

—For it is a good thing that thy heart be established with grace, not with meats, which have not profited them that have been occupied therein.

By meats, here, understand disputes and controversies about the difference of meats: By grace, understand the doctrine of the gospel, and the sanctifying grace of the Holy Spirit, which fixes and establishes the heart, and keeps the christian steady and stedfast. Learn hence, That it is far better to have the heart filled with divine grace, than the head with disputes and controversies in religion: It is good that the heart be established with grace, and not with meats. The reason is added, They have not profited them that are occupied therein: that is, to observe the doctrine concerning a religious distinction of meats, since the gospel has been entertained, is altogether unprofitable and unavailable: yea, meats of themselves profited not those who observed them, even whilst the institutions concerning them were in force. Learn hence, That those who decline from the grace of God, as the only mean to establish their hearts in peace with him, do labour in that whereby they shall receive no advantage.

13 We have an altar whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle.

These words are brought in as a farther reason why the christian Hebrews should not return to Judaism, or any other doctrine different from the gospel of Christ; We christians, says the apostle, have an altar; that is, a sacrifice, a priest offered upon, and sanctified by, the altar of the cross. Note here, That the church of Christ under the New Testament has its altar, as well as the Old Testament dispensation had theirs. The altar which we have is Christ, alone, and his sacrifice; for he was both priest, altar, and sacrifice, all himself, and still continueth so to be. 2. That this altar is every way sufficient in itself for the ends of an altar; and therefore the introduction of any other sacrifice requiring a material altar, is derogatory to the sacrifice of Christ, and exclusive of him from being an altar. Observe next, The persons excluded from having any right unto, or expectation of benefit by, this altar, namely, such as serve the tabernacle; that is, such as cleave still to the worship appointed for the Jewish tabernacle, and adhere to the Mosaical observation. They have no right to this altar by any divine institution, no right by virtue of their office, and relation to the tabernacle. Learn hence, That all privileges of what nature soever, without a participation of Christ, as the altar and sacrifice of his church, are no advantage to them that enjoy them.

11 For the bodies of those beasts, whose blood is brought into the sanctuary by the high priest for sins are burned without the camp. 12 Wherefore Jesus also, that he might sanctify the people with his own blood, suffered without the gate. 13 Let us go forth therefore unto him without the camp, bearing his reproach.

As if the apostle had said, "As the beasts slain for atonement, whose blood was brought into the sanctuary, were not to be eaten by the priest, but burnt without the bounds of the camp of Israel; in like manner, Christ, when he was to be offered up, to sanctify the people with his own blood, went without the gates of Jerusalem to suffer; signifying, that as they rejected him as unworthy to live with them, so he departed from them, and their political and legal state. Accordingly, Let us go forth unto him without the camp; that is, let us go unto him from the Jewish state and ceremonial law, bearing his reproach of the cross, which must be expected by us. Observe here, That Jesus Christ in his offering did offer himself unto God: That the end of his offering was to sanctify the people: This he designed, and this he accomplished by his own blood, so called emphatically, partly in opposition to the sacrifice of the high priest, which was the blood of bulls and not their own; and partly to testify what our sanctification cost Christ, even his own blood. Observe farther, The circumstance of place where our Lord suffered, it was without the gate of the city of Jerusalem; intimating, that he had now finally left the city and church of the Jews, and accordingly he denounced their destruction as he went out of the gate, Luke xxiii. 28, 29, 30. And by thus turning his back upon the temple, he plainly shewed, that he had now put an end to all sacrificing in the temple, as unto divine acceptance; and by going out of the gate, he declared that his sacrifice, and the benefits of it, were not included in the church of the Jews, but equally extended unto the whole world; and by going out of the city as a malefactor, and dying an accursed death, he plainly declared that he died a sin offering; that his death was a punishment for sin. Observe lastly, Our duty to go forth to him without the camp; this implies a relinquishing of all the privileges of the temple and city. 1. A turning our backs eternally upon all Jewish observations. 2. An acceptance of the merit of his sacrifice. 3. The owning of Christ under all that reproach and contempt that was cast upon him in his suffering without the gate, and not being ashamed of his cross. 4. In our conformity to him in self denial and suffering; all which are comprized in this apostolical exhortation, Let us go forth to him without the camp, bearing his reproach. The sum is this, "That we must leave all to go forth to a crucified Saviour; and if we resolve so to do, we must expect and prepare to meet with all sorts of reproaches."

14 For here have we no continuing city, but we seek one to come.

These words may be considered either relatively or absolutely: Consider them with relation to their context, and their sense is this; "How cheerfully ought believers, according to the advice in the foregoing verse, to go forth to Christ without the camp, bearing his reproach, when they consider their present state and condition, that they have no city here below, that was now the seat of divine worship, whereunto it was confined, as the Jews did at Jerusalem, before the abolishment of their ceremonial worship; but they they seek one to come, even the heavenly Jerusalem, where they shall worship God in his temple day and night?" Consider the words absolutely in themselves, and two things seem to be intended and designed by them. 1. That our condition in this world is very uncertain and unsettled, we have no continuing city here. 2. It implies a tendency to a future settling, and the hopes and expectations we have of a happier condition, into which we shall enter when we go out of this world. Learn hence, 1. That the world never did, nor ever will, give a state of satisfactory rest unto believers; it will not afford them a city of rest, hardly a place of refuge; they must therefore arise and depart, for this is not their rest. 2. That, as God has prepared a city of rest for believers, so it is their duty to seek and secure it, and continually endeavour the attainment of it, in the way of his own appointment.

15 By him therefore let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, the fruit of our lips, giving thanks to his name. 16 But to do good, and to communicate, forget not: For with such sacrifices God is well-pleased.

Our apostle having, at the tenth verse, declared, that we christians have an altar, to wit, Jesus Christ; here we are directed to offer a sacrifice, without which an altar is of no use: By him let us offer a sacrifice of praise to God continually. Where note, 1. Christians are to offer a sacrifice to God, and to none but God; no creature, angel or saint, has any part in it: Praise them we may, but offer a sacrifice of prayer or praise to them we may not. 2. That the christians sacrifice, which he presents to God, and none but him, is not propitiatory but gratulatory, a sacrifice of praise. We pretend to no expiation of sin, we owe that to a better sacrifice. What we offer is the fruit of our lips, not the fruit of our fields, or of our flocks, but of such lips as confess to his name. 3. The time when, and the person by whom this sacrifice of praise is to be offered to God, and that is continually, constantly, morning and evening; not putting Almighty God off with less under the gospel, than the Jews offered him under the law, which was the morning and evening sacrifice: And all this by Christ; By him let us offer, by him who is our peace may we find access. It is his merit and mediation that crowns our sacrifices and obtains acceptance for it. 4. Another sacrifice especially recommended to our care, as exceeding acceptable and well-pleasing unto God, and that is the sacrifice of almsgiving, beneficence and bounty, doing all the good we can, and communicating to the relief of such as want; but to do good, &c. As if the apostle had said, "Take heed you do not put God off with the fruit of your lips, the prayers and praises which cost you little, but now he calls for the labour of your hands, and for a part to be given to him in his poor members, of what he has given to you; therefore be sure you forget not to do good and communicate, for with such sacrifices God is well-pleased, with none better pleased than this, pleased with none without this:" Intimating, 1. That it is dangerous to the souls of men, when attendance unto one duty is abused, to countenance the neglect of others; when men give God daily a sacrifice of prayer and praise, but withhold from him in his members the sacrifice of almsgiving; they give him the fruit of their lips, which cost them nothing; but to do good and communicate, which will cost them something, this they forget. 2. That such works and duties as are peculiarly useful to men, are peculiarly acceptable unto God: With such sacrifices God is well-pleased.

17 Obey them that have the rule over you, and submit yourselves. For they watch for your souls, as they that must give account: That they may do it with joy, and not with grief; for that is unprofitable for you.

Two things are here observable: 1. The minister's duty towards his people. 2. The people's duty towards their ministers. In the former, note, 1. The duty required, to rule, to watch: God makes the bishops and pastors of his church here guiding rulers in church-affairs; they rule not with rigour, but with lenity and benignity; they watch over them, that they may guide and lead them with rational guidance and conduct. 2. The subject of this ruling power and authority, it is not over their estates, but their persons, particularly and principally their souls: They watch for your souls; as Jacob watched over Laban's so do the ministers watch over Christ's flock, by day and night. 3. The great engagement and obligation that lies upon them thus to rule, and thus to watch; they must give an account, that is, of their work and office, of their duty and discharge; there is a great shepherd, a chief shepherd, as Christ is called the prince of shepherds, to whom all inferior shepherds must give an account of their office, of their work, and of the flock committed to their charge. 4. The different accounts that will be given by the ministers of God at the great day, some with joy, others with grief. It is matter of the greatest joy to us when we find souls thriving under our ministry, and blessing God for the benefit they find by it; but on the other hand, the sadness of our hearts under the barrenness and unprofitableness of many under our ministerial labours, is not easily to be expressed. O God; with what sighing, with what groaning, with what inward heaviness and mourning, our accounts unto Christ are now given and accompanied, thou only knowest, and wilt make manifest at the great day. Observe, 2. The people's duty declared with reference to their spiritual guides and rulers, and that is, to obey them, and submit themselves; Obey them that rule over you, and submit yourselves: obey their doctrine, and submit to their discipline, but neither with a blind and implicit obedience: Obey their doctrine, teaching you all things whatsoever Christ has commanded them; and submit to their rule whilst it is exercised in the name of Christ, and according to his institution. Learn hence, 1. That the Lord Jesus Christ, as supreme Head of his church, has ordered and ordained that there shall be officers of his church, to guide and teach, to rule and watch over it to the end of the world. 2. That the due obedience of the church in all its members unto the rulers of it, in the discharge of their office and duty, is the best mean of its edification, and an happy cause of order and peace in the whole body: Obey them, &c.

18 Pray for us. For we trust we have a good conscience, conscience in all things willing to live honestly. 19 But I beseech you the rather to do this, that I may be restored to you the sooner.

In these words, observe, 1. A request made by the apostle to these Hebrews for prayer; pray for us: The prayers of the meanest saints may be useful to the greatest apostles, both with respect to their persons, and the discharge of their office. 2. The ground which gave him confidence to ask their prayers, and assurance that he should receive them; we trust we have a good conscience in all things. Behold here with what modesty and humility the apostle speaks of himself, even in things of which he had the highest and fullest assurance; we trust we have a good conscience in all things. Quest. What is a good conscience? Answ. A good conscience is a conscience enlightened by the word of God, a conscience awakened by the Spirit of God, a conscience purified and pacified by the blood of Christ, a conscience universally tender of all God's commands. Observe 3. The testimony given of his having a good conscience, willing in all things to live honestly; a resolution and will, accompanied with constant endeavours to live honestly, is a fruit and evidence of a good conscience; the word willing denotes readiness, resolution, and endeavour. 4. How he presses for an interest in their prayers, with respect to his present circumstances, and his design of coming to them; I beseech you the rather to do this, that I may be restored to you the sooner.

20 Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, 21 Make you perfect in every good work to do his will, working in you that which is well-pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ: to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

Our apostle having in the former verse desired their prayers for him, in this verse he adds thereunto his own prayer for them, a most glorious and excellent prayer, enclosing the whole mystery of divine grace in its original, and the way of its communication by Jesus Christ, a prayer evidently proceeding from a spirit full of faith and love. Observe here, 1. The title assigned and given to God, The God of peace. But why the God of peace, rather than the God of power, or the God of grace, or the God of glory? Because the divine power was not put forth in raising Christ from the dead until God was pacified: Justice incensed exposed him to death; but justice appeased freed him from the dead. 2. The titles assigned and given to Christ, and they seem to express his threefold office, of a prophet, in that he styles himself the great shepherd of the sheep; of a priest, that he is said to be brought again from the dead, by the blood of the everlasting covenant; and of a king, in that he is styled our Lord Jesus Christ. Note, Christ is a shepherd, that great shepherd of the sheep; a shepherd, because as a shepherd he rules and governs his people, as a shepherd he leads them by his heavenly doctrine and instructive example, as a shepherd feeds them with his word, yea, with his precious body and blood; he is stiled not the but that shepherd, namely, that was promised of old, the object and the hope of the church from the beginning; and that great shepherd, because great in his person, great in his power, great in his undertaking, great in his glory and exaltation, above the whole creation; and the great shepherd of the sheep, because they are his own, a little flock in the midst of wolves, which could never be preserved, were it not by the power and care of this great shepherd. Observe, 3. The work assigned to God as a God of peace, he brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus Christ. Christ is said to raise himself in regard of immediate efficiency, but God the Father is said to raise him in regard of sovereign authority. God the Father, to whose justice the debt was due, by letting Christ out of the prison of the grave, acknowledged himself satisfied; the God of peace, to evidence that peace was now perfectly made, brought Christ again from the dead. But how did he do this? It is answered by the blood of the everlasting covenant, that is, by the blood of Christ himself, which ratified and confirmed the covenant. 4. The things prayed for, 1. Perfection in every good work to do the will of God; it is not an absolute perfection that is here intended, but a readiness to every good work or duty of obedience. 2. To work in them that which is well-pleasing in his sight; by this understand the actual gracious performance of every known duty. Note, That the efficacy and actual efficiency of divine grace, in and unto every act of obedience and duty, is here prayed for, and relied upon. Observe lastly, A doxology, or ascription of all glory to Christ, to whom be glory, &c. All grace is from him, and therefore all glory to be ascribed to him: The whole dispensation of grace will issue in the eternal glory of Jesus Christ.

22 And I beseech you, brethren, suffer the word of exhortation; for I have written a letter unto you in few words. 23 Know ye that our brother Timothy is set at liberty; with whom, if he come shortly, I will see you. 24 Salute all them that have the rule over you, and all the saints, They of Italy salute you: 25 Grace be with you all. Amen.

Our apostle had shut up and closed his epistle before; he adds these verses by way of postscript: Now he begs of them kindly to accept, and wisely to improve the exhortations given them in his epistle, wherein he had handled many weighty matters in few words. He lets them know that Timothy was set at liberty; and probably gone forth to preach the gospel, with whom, if he returned shortly, he hoped to come unto them, being desirous to see them: And thus, with salutations to them in general, and to church-governors in particular, both from himself and the Christians in Italy he wishes them an increase of all grace, and an abundant sense of the love and favour of God in Christ; saying, Grace be with you all. Amen.

S T. J A M E S.

The epistle of St. James, together with the six following epistles, have gone under the name of catholic epistles for many ages, because, say some, they were not written to a particular city or country, as most of St. Paul's epistles were, but to all the Christian Jews abroad dispersed into several countries throughout the world, whose suffering condition rendered the consolation which this epistle affords very needful and necessary, as being greatly supporting. The author and penman of it was St. James, commonly called James the Less, and our Lord's brother, the son of Alphaeus, styled also James the Just, and bishop of Jerusalem; consequently its authority cannot reasonably be questioned. The design of the epistle is, first, to establish the Christian Jews in a well ordered religious course of life, and to fortify them against suffering from the unbelieving Jews: Secondly, to correct a pernicious error about the sufficiency of a naked faith, and empty profession without practice, &c. which sprung from a misunderstanding and abuse of the way of justification by faith: The design of St. Paul in ep. Rom. (of which we have the same in Acts. iv. 12.) was so manifest that Christ was the only one, and Christianity the only way, to set us criminals clear with God, so as to bring us to himself in glory. And St. James shews us, that it is not the bare belief and profession of the Christian faith, but the power and practical improvement of it, that must make or render it saving to us.

C H A P. I.

JAMES, a servant of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ, to the twelve tribes which are scattered abroad, greeting, Observe here, 1. The author and penman of this epistle described by his name, James; by his office, a servant of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ; that is, by special office as a dispenser of his gospel. It is the highest honour that can be conferred upon the greatest person, to be the servant of Christ, especially in the quality of an ambassador. Note also, How St James styles himself the servant of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ. Some read the words conjoined others disjoined; conjoined thus, James, a servant of Jesus Christ, who is God and Lord, and thus the fathers urged this text against the Arians; to prove the divinity and godhead of Christ; others read the words disjoined, thus James a servant of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ. This latter reading seems most natural, and less strained, and affords an argument for proving the divinity of Christ no less weighty than the former; for as the Father is Lord as well as Jesus Christ, so Jesus Christ is God as well as *the Father, and God will have all to honour the Son as they honour the Father. 2. The persons to whom this epistle is directed, to the twelve tribes scattered abroad, that is, to such and so many of the Jews as were converted to christianity, and were now dispersed and scattered into several countries and nations: to them is St. James excited and moved by God to write and direct this excellent epistle. Here note, by the way, these three things: 1. That God's own people in general may be dispersed and driven abroad from their countries and habitations; it is no new thing to suffer in this kind, Heb. xi. 38. those, of whom the world was not worthy, wandered in deserts and mountains, woods and caves. 2. The severity of God towards the people of the Jews, in particular they were a sinning people, a sinful people, weary of God, sick of his worship, severe to his Son: and God grows sick and weary of them, and according to his threatening, Dent. xxviii. 64. scattered them from one end of the earth unto the other, among all people. Lord! how dangerous and unsafe it is to rest upon, and glory in our outward privileges! None had more, none had greater privileges than the Jews, yet for their sins the land spewed them out, and God dispersed them, and made them an hissing and a bye-word among the nations. 3. The tenderness of God's love and care towards the faithful amongst them in and under this dispersion, he stirreth up St. James to write to the scattered tribes, and to apply seasonable comforts to them, and to all christians with them in their suffering state, which accordingly he does throughout this whole epistle.

2 My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations; 3 Knowing this, that the trying of your faith worketh patience. 4 But let patience have her perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire wanting nothing.

Our apostle's design in this epistle being to support the believing Jews under their great sufferings for the cause of christianity, he first acquaints them with the nature of those sufferings which they might expect to fall under for the same; he calls them temptations, that is, trials, they are correcting trials for sin, and they are experimental trials of the truth of grace, and of the strength of grace; the afflictions of God's children are trials castigatory, probatory trials. Note 2. The advice given in these trials, to count it joy, all joy, when they fall into temptations, yea, into divers temptations; not that afflictions are in themselves joyous, the temptation or trial is not matter of joy, but of sorrow and heaviness considered in itself, but because of their good effects and sweet fruits, in proving our faith, and increasing our patience; but mark, he says, when ye fall into temptation; not when ye run yourselves into them, or draw them upon yourselves; we loose the comfort of our sufferings, when, either by guilt or by imprudence, we bring them upon ourselves. Here note, That trials, how evil and afflictive soever in themselves, and in their own nature, yet administer occasion of great joy to sincere christians, Rom. v. 3. We glory in tribulations: it denotes the highest joy, even to exultation and rapture; that there is joy resulting from the consideration of the glory that redounds to God, of the honour done to us, of the benefit done to the church, and ourselves by confirming the faith of others: evidencing the sincerity of grace to ourselves, preparing us for, and giving us a swifter passage to heaven. 3. Our apostle's argument to press them to joy in, and rejoice under their afflictions; and this is taken, 1. From the nature of them, they are trials of faith. 2. From the effect and fruit of them, they beget or work patience. Learn hence, 1. That the afflictions which the people of God meet with, are trials of all their graces, but especially of their faith. This is a radical grace; we live by faith, we work by love: Now of all graces, Satan has a particular spite against the christian's faith, and God has a particular care for the preservation and perfection of it, Knowing the trial of your faith worketh patience; that is, it administers matter and occasion for patience, and by the blessing of God upon it, it produces and increases patience; often trial puts us upon frequent exercises, and the frequent exercise of grace strengthens the habits of grace: Consequently the more our trials are, the stronger will our patience be. But let patience have her perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing. That is, "Let your patience and perseverance under sufferings resolutely continue and hold out to the end;" this the apostle urges, because some persons bore out the first brunt and onset of persecution, but being exercised with adversity and length of trials, they fainted. Now, as if the apostle had said, "If we will be complete christians, our patience must run parallel with our sufferings: thus shall we be perfect, not with an absolute perfection, but with a perfection of duration and perseverance." Learn, That afflictions sanctified by God do tend exceedingly, not only to the increasing, but perfecting of a christian's patience. Quest. But when has patience its perfect work, making the christian perfect and entire? Answer. When there is a strong faith, as the foundation of that patience; when there is a christian fortitude and courage, enabling us to sustain trials; when there is an exact knowledge of our duty to bear afflictions with a meek and quiet spirit, with a forbearing and forgiving spirit, yea, with a praying spirit, which includes the height of charity, under the highest provocations; in a word, when there is found within us and entire trust and dependency upon God's power and promise, and a cheerful submission, and quiet resignation of our wills to his most holy, wise, and righteous will, in and under the sharpest trials and heaviest afflictions that can befall us; then has patience had its perfect work, and the suffering christian, in a gospel qualified sense, may be said to be perfect and entire, wanting nothing.

5 If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him. 6 But let them ask in faith, nothing wavering. For he that wavereth is like a wave of the sea, driven with the wind and tossed. 7 For let not that man think that he shall receive any thing of the Lord.

Observe here, 1. A truth necessarily supposed, that every man, more or less lacketh wisdom to enable him patiently to bear, and prudently to manage, the afflictions of this life: and that there is need of great wisdom to enable us to glorify God in a suffering hour. 2. The person directed to in order to the obtaining of divine wisdom, for the patient bearing of afflictions; Let him ask it of God. He that wants wisdom, let him go to the fountain of wisdom. God gives not his blessings ordinarily without asking, and the best of blessings may be had for asking; of the two it is better to ask and not receive, than to receive and not ask. 3. A great encouragement for all that lack wisdom to go unto God for it, drawn first from the bountiful manner of his giving, He giveth liberally, without upbraiding. Secondly, From the certainty of the gift, It shall be given him. God's liberality in giving what we ask, and many times more than we ask, yea, more than we can either ask or think, is a mighty encouragement to faith and fervency in prayer, to perseverance and importunity in praying; especially if we consider what is added, that as God giveth liberally, so he upbraideth not; that is, he neither upbraids them with their frequency and importunity in asking, nor yet with their great unworthiness of receiving; but instead thereof, subjoins an assurance of granting. It is a mighty encouragement.

encouragement to pray, when we consider there is not only bounty in God, but bounty engaged by promise. Observe, 4. The condition required on our part must be observed and fulfilled, as well as the promise made on God's part: But let him ask in faith, nothing wavering. Quest. What is it to ask in faith? Answ. The person praying must be in a state of believing: The petitioner must be a believer; the thing asked for must be an object of faith, by being the subject-matter of some promise; a fervent prayer for that which God never promised, is a foul sin. Again, The manner of asking must be faithful, with a pure intention of God's glory, with cheerful submission to God's will, with fiducial recumbency upon God's promise, with great fervency and warmth of spirit; he that will prevail with Jacob, must wrestle with Jacob for a blessing. 5. The evil and danger of wavering and doubting in the matter of prayer; the evil of it is this, that it is perplexing and tormenting to the mind: He that wavereth is driven and tossed like a wave of the sea; an elegant similitude to set out the nature of doubting, when upon our knees in duty. And the danger of it is expressed, Let not that man think he shall receive any thing of the Lord. Note, That doubtful and unbelieving persons when they pray, though they receive something, yet they can expect nothing. Let him not think to receive any thing; if he does, it is more than could be expected, because more than God has promised. Doubting in prayer is a provocation to God; and when a man's prayer is a provocation, how can he expect his prayer should either be heard or answered?

8 A double-minded man is unstable in all his ways.

By a double-minded man, we are to understand one that is divided in his own thoughts between two different ways and opinions, as if he had two minds, or two souls; many such there were in the apostle's days, Judaizing brethren, that sometimes would sort with the Jews, sometimes with the christians; many such there are in our days, divided betwixt God and the world, between holiness and sin; like a needle between two load-stones, always wavering to and again, pointing frequently to both, but never fixed to either: Such a man, says our apostle, is unstable in all his ways; that is, in all his actions. Learn hence, That whilst men's minds are divided between God and their lusts, they must necessarily lead very anxious, uncertain, and unstable lives, always fluctuating in great anxiety and uncertainty; for he is always at odds with himself, and in perpetual variance with his own reason: Where men's minds are double, their ways must necessarily be unstable.

9 Let the brother of low degree rejoice in that he is exalted: 10 But the rich, in that he is made low: because as the flower of the grass he shall pass away. 11 For the sun is no sooner risen with a burning heat, but it withereth the grass, and the flower thereof falleth, and the grace of the fashion of it perisheth: so also shall the rich man fade away in his ways.

Our apostle having finished his necessary digression concerning prayer, in the foregoing verses, returns now to his former argument, concerning bearing affliction with joy; and urges a strong reason here to enforce the duty, Let the brother of low degree; that is, such a christian as is brought low by persecution and sufferings for Christ, let him rejoice that God has exalted him, and made him rich in faith, and an heir of the kingdom: Nothing is more certain, than that the greatest abuses and sufferings for Christ are an honour and exaltation to us; he adds, But let the rich rejoice in that he is made low, that is when he loses any thing for Christ: As if the apostle had said, "Let the poor christian rejoice, in that he is spiritually exalted, and the rich man rejoice, in that he is spiritually humbled; a rich man's humility is his glory." Observe next, The apostle rendereth a reason why the rich man should have a lowly mind, in the midst of his flourishing condition, because all the pomp and grandeur of riches fades like a flower, and he himself also is beautiful, but fading; fair, but vanishing: And he pursues this similitude of a flower in the eleventh verse, shewing, that as the flower fadeth presently before the heat of the scorching sun, so the rich man fades, and all his riches are both transitory and passing. Learn hence, That it may and ought to comfort a christian that suffers loss for Christ by persecutors and persecution, to consider, that the things which he loseth for the sake of Christ, are things which he loseth which could not have been kept long by him, had they not been rent from him; but that which he secures by his perseverance, is an everlasting treasure reserved in the heavens for him; and by parting with that which he could not keep, he makes sure of that which he can never lose: Well therefore may the rich man rejoice in his humiliation; Let the brother, &c.

12 Blessed is the man that endureth temptation: for when he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love him.

In these words the apostle lays down a forcible argument to persuade christians to her sufferings and persecutions with invincible patience, drawn from the blessedness which attends such a condition: Blessed is the man that endureth temptations, &c. Note here, 1. The character of the person whom God pronounceth blessed; namely, Not the man that escapeth temptations and trials in this life, but he that bears them with courage and constancy, with patience and submission. 2. A description of that ample reward which shall be conferred upon such sufferers; They shall receive the crown of life: where observe, The felicity of a future state is set forth by a crown, to denote the transcendency and perfection of it; and by a crown of life, to denote the perpetuity and duration of it. Note, 3. Here is an intimation of the time when this transcendent reward shall be dispensed, namely, when the suffering christian has finished his course with patience and perseverance: When he is tried he shall receive, &c. Learn from the whole, That a patient and constant enduring of trials and afflictions in this life, shall certainly be rewarded with a crown of blessedness and immortality in the life to come.

13 Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God. For God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man. 14 But every man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed. 15 Then when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin: and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death.

There are three sorts of temptations spoken of in scripture, temptations of seduction, temptations of suggestion, and temptations of affliction; the last were spoken of in the former verses, Blessed is the man that endureth temptation: the second sort are spoken of in this verse, Let no man say when he is tempted to sin, I am tempted of God, &c. Note here, 1. That God is not the author of sin, nor tempts any man to the commission of it; if he did, our evil actions could not be properly sins, nor justly punishable by God; for no man can be justly punishable for that which he cannot help, and no man can help that which he is compelled unto; and it is very unreasonable to suppose, that the same person should both tempt and punish. To tempt unto sin, is contrary to the holiness of God: And after that to chastise for complying with the temptation, is contrary to the justice of God; God then is not the author of the sins of men. 2. That men are very apt to charge their sin upon God, and to lay their faults at his door. Let no man say so; intimating, that men are very ready and apt to say so; and that is not only a fault, but an impious assertion, to say that God tempts any man to sin. Let no man say: He speaks of it as a thing to be rejected with the utmost detestation, a thing so impious and dishonourable to God. 3. The reason and argument, which the apostle brings against this impious suggestion, God cannot be tempted of evil, neither tempteth he any man; that is, he cannot be drawn to any thing that is evil himself, and therefore it cannot be imagined he should have any inclination or design to seduce others: He can have no temptation to sin from his own inclination, for he has a perfect antipathy against it; and there is no allurements in sin to stir up an inclination in God toward it, for it is nothing but crookedness and deformity: And how can he be supposed to entice men to that which his own nature does abominate and abhor? For none tempts others to be bad, but those who are first so themselves. Inference, 1. No doctrine then ought to be asserted, or can be maintained, which is contrary to the natural notions which men have of God, as touching his holiness, justice, and goodness. Inference, 2. If God tempts not us, let us never tempt him: This we do, when we tempt his providence, expecting its protection in an unwarrantable way; as when we are negligent in our calling, and yet depend upon God's providence to provide for our families, which is to approve our folly, and to countenance our sloth. Note, 4. The true account which our apostle gives of the prevalency and efficacy of temptation upon men, it is their own innate corruption, and vicious inclination, which doth seduce them to it, Every man is tempted, when he is drawn aside of his own lust, and enticed. Mark, He does not ascribe it to the devil; he may and does present the object, and by his instruments may and does solicit for our compliance: His temptations have a moving and exciting power, but can have no prevailing efficacy but from their own voluntary consent; it is our own lusts closing with his temptations which produce the sin: For God's commanding us to resist the devil, supposes that his temptations are not irresistible. Learn hence, That man's worst enemy, and most dangerous tempter, is the corruption of his own heart and nature; because it is the inmost enemy, and because it is an enemy that is least suspected: A man's lust is himself, and nature teaches us not to mistrust ourselves; What reason have we then perpetually to pray, that God would not lead us into temptation, but keep us by his good providence out of the way of temptation, because we carry about us such lusts and inclinations as will betray us to sin when powerful temptations are presented to us! There is no such way then to disarm temptations and take away the power of them, as by mortifying our lusts, and subduing our vicious inclinations. 5. The account which our apostle gives of the pedigree, birth, and growth of sin: When lust, that is, our corrupt inclinations, and vicious desires have conceived, that is, gained the consent and approbation of the will, it bringeth forth and engageth the soul in sin; and sin, when it is finished in the deliberate outward action, and especially when, by customary practice, it becomes habitual, bringing forth death, the wages of sin: the first approaches of sin are usually modest but afterwards it makes bolder attempts; our wisdom is to resist the first beginnings of sin, for then we have most strength, and sin least; to suppress sin in the thoughts, to mortify lust in the heart, before it breaks forth in the life, and at last issue and terminate in death.

16 Do not err, my beloved brethren. 17 Every good gift, and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning.

As if he had said, "Be not deceived about the causes of good and evil; sin and death are certainly from ourselves. Let us therefore never ascribe either our sins or our temptations unto God; but every good and perfecting gift is of God's free donation and grace, even from above, from the Father of lights, (both of the light of nature, and the light of grace) with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning from good to evil; he is unchangeable in his nature and being, and in his attributes and properties." Learn hence, 1. That we are very prone to err in our notions and apprehensions, as touching the authors of good and evil; too ready to conclude either God or Satan to be the author of the sin we commit, and ourselves the authors of the good we do: Do not err, my beloved brethren, in this matter. 2. That as sin, which is nothing but evil and imperfection, is not from God, but wholly from ourselves, and our own corrupt hearts; so whatever is good, perfect, or praise-worthy, is wholly from God, and not from ourselves; we are neither by nature inclined to that which is good, nor are we able of ourselves to perform it; both inclination and ability are from God, who is the fountain of goodness and perfection, and can never cease to be so, for with him is no variableness, nor shadow of turning. 3. That God being the infinite Father of lights, he hath no eclipses or decreases, no shadows or mixtures of darkness, but always shines with a settled and constant brightness, always is, and was, and to all eternity will be, immutably the same, and never undergo the least change, either of his essence and being, or of his properties and perfections; With whom is no variableness, &c. A nothing argues greater imperfection than inconstancy and change, so the greater and more glorious the divine perfections are, the greater blemish and imperfection would mutability be; were God changeable, it would darken all his other perfections, and raze the foundation of all religion; for who could either fear or love, trust or serve that being who is fickle and inconstant! What security could there be in his promises? And who would regard the terror of his threatenings, were he not invariable, and without shadow of changing.

18 Of his own will he begat us with the word of truth, that we should be a kind of first-fruits of his creatures.

These words are very expressive of four things, namely, of the efficient cause, the impulsive cause, the instrumental and the final cause of our regeneration. Observe, 1. The author and efficient cause of regeneration; he that is the Father of lights, mentioned in the foregoing verse, begat us, Note, That God, and God alone, is the prime efficient cause of regeneration; it is subjectively in the creature, it is efficiently from God: Christ appropriates this work to God, Matt. xi. 23. The Scriptures appropriates it to God Psal xxxiv. 9. called his saints. And God himself appropriates it to himself, Ezek. xxxvi. 27. I will put my spirit within them. &c. Observe, 2. The impelling, impulsive, and moving cause of regeneration, his own will: Of his own will he begat us; by his mere motion, induced by no cause, but the goodness of his own breast, of his own will, and not naturally, as he begat his Son from eternity; of his own will, and not necessarily, by a necessity of nature, as the sun enlightens and enlivens, but by an arbitrariness of grace; of his own will, and not by any obligation from the creature; by the will of God, and not for the merit and desert of man. 3. The instrumental cause of our regeneration, the word of truth, that is the gospel, which is the great instrument in God's hand for producing the new birth in the souls of his people. Here note, The gospel is called truth by way of excellency, the word of truth, that is, the true word; and also by way of eminency, as containing an higher and more excellent truth than any other divine truth the gospel declares the truth of all the Old Testament types. 4. The final cause of our new birth, that we should be a kind of first fruits of his creatures, that is, of his new creatures, the chief among his creatures; the first fruits were the best of every kind to be offered to God, and were given as God's peculiar right and portion; thus the new-creature is God's peculiar portion taken out of mankind, which being consecrated to God by a new begetting, they ought to serve him with a new spirit, new thankfulness, as lying under the highest obligations unto new obedience.

19 ¶ Wherefore, my beloved brethren, let every man be swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath. 20 For the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God.

As if the apostle had said, "Seeing God has put such an honour upon his word, the word of truth, as by it to beget us to himself; therefore be swift to hear it, prize it highly, and wait upon the means of grace readily and diligently; but be slow to speak, that is, to utter your judgment of it, much more slow in undertaking to be a teacher and dispenser of it; also slow to wrath, or to contentions about the words and points of divinity: Wrath and passion hinders all profit by the word, either preached, read, or discoursed about; and a forcible reason is rendered why all wrath should be suppressed, because the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God; that is, man's sinful anger will never put him upon doing those things that are just and righteous in God's account: or there is a figure in the words; more is intended than expressed; the meaning is, that the wrath of man is so far from working the righteousness of God, that it worketh all manner of evil." Learn hence, That man's anger is usually evil, and very unrighteous; Anger, justly moderated, is a duty, but such a duty as is very difficultly managed without sin; rash, causeless, and immoderate anger, gratifies the devil, dishonours God, discredits religion, wounds our own peace.

21 Wherefore lay apart all filthiness, and superfluity of naughtiness, and receive with meekness the engrafted word, which is able to save your souls. 22 But be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving your own selves.

These words are a direction given for the right hearing of, and due profiting by the word of God. In order to the former, our apostle shews, 1. What we must lay aside, namely, all filthiness, and superfluity of naughtiness; that is, all sensual lusts, and angry passions. And, 2. Receive with meekness, calmness, and submission, the engrafted word; that is, the word planted and sown in our hearts by the hands of Christ's ministers; which is able to save our souls; that is, from hell and damnation; yet does not the word save of itself, but God by the word; the power of the word is not intrinsecal, but extrinsecal, derived from God, whose the word is. Learn hence, 1. That as all sin in general, so anger, wrath, and malice in particular, ought to be laid aside by us at all times, but then especially when we go forth to hear the word of God. 2. That the word must be received with all meekness of spirit, if we would hear it with profit and advantage; there must not be found with us either a wrathful fierceness, or a proud stubbornness, or a contentious wrangling, but humility and brokenness of spirit, docibility and tractableness of spirit, under the word, otherwise all our hearing will be an addition to our sin, and an aggravation of our condemnation. 3. That the word must not only be apprehended and received by us, but implanted and engrafted in us, or it will never be able to save our souls; receive the engrafted word which is able to save your souls. Quest. But how may we know when the word is an engrafted word? Answ. When it is a fruitful word, Col. i. 6. The word of the truth of the gospel is come unto you, and bringeth forth fruit. 4. Though hearing of the word be a duty, yet it must not be rested in; be hearers, but not only hearers: Alas! bare hearing of the word is the least part of christianity, and the lightest part of christianity; though we be intelligent hearers, though we be very diligent and attentive hearers, though we be affectionate hearers, yea, though we make great proficiency in knowledge by our hearing, yet all this will deceive us at last, if nothing farther be added to it. 5. That the doers of the word are the best hearers, yea, the only hearers in God's account: Not to hear at all is atheistical, and produces no religion; to hear, and not to know and be affected with what we hear, is stoical, and breeds a blind religion; to know, and not to do, is Pharisaical, and breeds a lame religion; the practical hearer is the only approved hearer in the account of God: A good understanding have they that do thy commandments, Psa. cxi. Lastly, Without this, all our hearing is but self-deceiving; and this is the most shameful deceit, the most dangerous deceit, and, if timely care and endeavours prevent not, an irreparable and eternal deceit.

23 For if any be a hearer of the word, and not a doer, he is like unto a man beholding his natural face in a glass: 24 For he beholdeth himself, and goeth his way, and straightway forgetteth what manner of man he was,

In these words our apostle declares the vanity and unprofitableness of a bare hearing of the word, by a similitude taken from a man looking in a glass; though he sees in a glass his own natural face which he was born with, whilst he is looking in it, yet no sooner is he gone from it, but he forgets the figure and fashion of his own countenance, having had only a slight and transient view of it; so in like manner, the preaching of the word has not an awakening influence, and leaves not an abiding impression upon most hearers, who are willing to be deceived, and to deceive themselves, by a bare and naked hearing of divine truths. Learn hence, That the word of God is a glass, or as a glass, in which the soul's complexion may be seen: In this glass we may see both God and ourselves. Christ's beauty, and our own deformity, both our disease, and our remedy. 2. That the glass of the word must not be carelessly and cursorily looked into, with a slight and superficial glance, but if we desire to have all the spots and blemishes of our souls thoroughly discovered, we must keep it before our eyes continually, and dress our souls by it.

25 But who so looketh into the perfect law of liberty, and continueth therein, he being not a forgetful hearer, but a doer of the word, this man shall be blessed in his deed.

Observe here, 1. The title given to the word of God particularly the gospel, it is called liberty, a law of liberty, and a perfect law of liberty: partly because it calleth us to a state of liberty and freedom, and teacheth us the way to true liberty and offers us the assistance of a spirit of liberty; partly because it spareth none, but dealeth with all persons freely, without respect of persons; the gospel, or word of God, then is a law of liberty. 2. The duty here required, with reference to this law of liberty, namely, to look into it, and continue therein, to look into it with an accurate and narrow inspection, as the disciples did into Christ's sepulchre, and as the angels look into the mysteries of salvation, 1. Pct. i. 12. To look into the law of liberty, implies deepness of meditation, and liveliness of impression; and continuing therein, imports perseverance in the knowledge, faith, and obedience of the gospel, in order to our fruitfulness in good works: If ye abide in me, and my word abide in you, says Christ, ye shall bring forth much fruit, John xv. 5. 7. Observe, 3. The reward promised and insured to such as look into the gospel, that law of liberty, that continue in it, and are doers of the work required by it, they are blessed in their deed; there is a blessedness annexed to the doing of that work which the word of God requires; yet mark the distinctness of scripture-phrase; the apostle doth not say, that the doers of the word shall be blessed for their deed, but in their deed; it is an evidence of our blessedness, not the ground of it, the way, though not the cause of blessedness.

26 ¶ If any man among you seem to be religious and bridled not his tongue, but deceiveth his own heart, this man's religion is vain.

Observe here 1. That there have been, are, and ever will be many professors of religion, who seem, and only seem to be religious. That an unbridled and ungoverned tongue, is a certain sign and evidence of a man's bring only seemingly religious; it seems there were many unbridled tongues, in the apostle's days, amongst the professors of christianity, which put the apostle upon spending the whole third chapter about the government of the tongue; the grace and word of God are bridles, which we are to put on to restrain us from sinful and excessive speaking. 3. That such a man as pretends to religion, and seems to be religious, without bridling and governing of his tongue, all his religion is but vain and self-deceiving: Vain; that is, empty in shew and appearance only, nothing in truth and in reality: Or vain, that is, ineffectual; it doth not perform its office, it does not answer its end their religion will do them no good, stand them in no stead; that faith, that hope, those prayers which consist with the reigning evils of the tongue, are vain self-deceiving; that religion which cannot drive the devil out of the tongue will never prove Christ to be in the heart; that religion which cannot tame the tongue, will never save the soul; though some evils of the tongue may consist with grace, yet an unbridled tongue cannot consist with it: Deceit in our lips is as bad as falsehood in our dealings, and violence in our tongue as bad as violence in our hands; and if thy religion be vain, all is vain to thee; thy hopes are vain, thy comforts are vain. The sum is, that an unbridled tongue, in a religious professor, is enough to prove his religion is vain.

27 Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father, is this, To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world.

Observe here, 1. That the apostle doth not set down the whole whole of religion, but an eminent part and instance of it only: pure religion is this, that is, this is the practice of religion, without which all religion is vain; this is an eminent fruit, which springs from the root of pure religion; if pure religion live in the heart, the fruits of pious charity will appear in the life. 2. That acts of charity, when they flow from a religious principle, do commence acts of worship: To visit the widow and fatherless, considered in itself, may be only an act of indifferency and civil courtesy; but when it is performed as an act of duty, in obedience to the command of God, or as an act of mercy and pity, for the supply of their wants by our purse, or for the comforting of their hearts by our counsel; being thus done out of conscience, it is as acceptable to God as an act of worship. 3. How the apostle joins charity and purity together; a pretence to the one without the other, discovers the insincerity of both; the relieving of the afflicted, and a life unspotted, must go together, or God accepts of neither: Pure religion is this, To visit the widow, and keep himself unspotted, &c. that is, from the defilement and pollutions of the world by the lusts thereof; plainly intimating, 1. That the world is a filthy place, a dirty defiling thing. What company almost can you come into, generally speaking, that is not sooty and leprous? How hard is it to converse with them, and not be polluted and infected by them? even as hard as it is to touch pitch and not be defiled. 2. That it is our duty, and ought to be our daily endeavour, to keep ourselves as untainted by, and unspotted from the world as we can: And that we may escape the pollutions which are in the world through lust, let us be instant in prayer, diligent in our watch, that if we cannot make the world better, that shall never make us worse. 3. That we should more and more grow weary of the world, and long for heaven, where there is nothing that defileth, where we shall have pure hearts, pure company, every thing agreeable, and this not for a few years, but for everlasting ages. Lord! when shall we ascend on high, to live with thee in purity?

CHAP II.

Our apostle in this chapter admonishes against the sin of respecting persons in religious matters because of worldly advantages; and cautions against that fatal opinion of the sufficiency of a bare and naked faith, in order to salvation, without the presence and testimony of works.

MY brethren, have not the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory, with respect of persons. 2 For if there come unto your assembly a man with a gold ring in goodly apparel, and there come in also a poor man in vile raiment; 3 And ye have respect to him that weareth the gay clothing, and say unto him, Sit thou here in a good place: and say to the poor, Stand thou there, or sit here under my footstool: 4 Are ye not then partial in yourselves, and are become judges of evil thoughts?

For the better understanding of these words, let us consider, 1. What the apostle doth not; 2. What he doth concern. 1. What is here not condemned, namely, (1.) The paying of civil respect to all persons, according to their character, and a different respect to persons, according to their different qualities: Honour is to be given to whom honour is due, and the rich are entitled to respect; and that they receive it from us, is no ways displeasing unto God. (2.) Much less does our apostle here speak against honouring magistrates, or paying respect to our ecclesiastical or civil rulers and governors in their courts of judicature: Civility, yea, Christianity, calls for outward respect and reverence to them that are above us, especially if in authority over us. But positively, that which is here condemned, (1.) In general, is partiality in our respect to persons in religious matters, for in the things of God all are equal; the rich and the poor stand upon the same terms of advantage; external relations and differences bear no weight at the gospel-beam; therefore, to disesteem any of the poor members of Christ, as such, is to disesteem and undervalue Christ himself. Holiness is not less lovely to him because clothed with rags, nor unholiness less loathsome because it goes in a gay coat with a gold ring. Wickedness is abominable to Christ, and ought to be so to us, though it sit upon a throne, and holiness shines in his eye (and may it in ours also) though it lies upon a dunghill. (2.) That which seems here to be condemned in particular, is the accepting of persons in judgment, upon the account of outward advantages, proceeding not according to the merits of the cause in their ecclesiastical and civil judicatures, but according to external respects. Our apostle would by no means have them pay a deference to a rich man in judgment because of his riches, or gay attire, nor to pass over the poor saints in their assemblies, for want of the gold ring, and goodly apparel, seeing their faith clothed them with a greater and more valuable glory, which renders them more honourable than any riches or gay clothing could do. And mark the apostle's vehement expostulation, which carries with it the force of a severe reprehension: Are you not partial, and become judges of evil thoughts? As if he had said, "Are ye not condemned in yourselves, and convinced in your own consciences that you do evil? are you not become judges of evil thoughts; that is, do you not pass judgment from your evil thoughts, in thinking the rich worthy of respect in judgment for his gorgeous attire, and outward greatness, and the poor fit to be despised for his outward meanness? Is not this an evil, a very evil thought in you, to think him the best man that weareth the best clothes, and him a vile person that is in vile apparel?" From the whole learn, 1. That men are very prone to honour worldly greatness in general, yea, to give too great a preference to it, even in matters of judgment. Man is very often swayed in judgment by the power, pomp, and splendour of men; we are apt to think that they that are worthiest are most worthy: Thus men, good men, may mis-judge of men; but thus to accept the persons of men, either in spiritual or civil judgment is a provoking sin.

5 Hearken, my beloved brethren, hath not God chosen the poor of this world, rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which he hath promised to them that love him ?

To prevent the growing evil condemned in the foregoing verse, of undervaluing those that are rich in grace, because poor in estate, the apostle in this verse declares how God himself gives countenance to the contrary practice ; he confers a threefold dignity upon them ; they are chosen by him, they are rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom of heaven now : As if the apostle had said, " Are they fit to be despised by you, that are thus highly dignified and enriched by God ? " And to stir up their attention to what he speaks, he utters in his interrogation with this, Hearken, my beloved brethren, &c. Learn hence, That such as are poor in this world, and discerned of men, may yet be chosen of God, rich in grace, and heirs of glory. This he does, to demonstrate the sovereignty and freeness of his grace, and the glory of his wisdom. The first choice that Christ made of persons to be his followers were poor men ; and ever since, generally speaking, they are the poor that receive the gospel : God has more rent, and better paid him, from a smoaky cottage than from many stately palaces, where men wallow in wealth, and forget God.

6 But ye have despised the poor. Do not rich men oppress you, and draw you before the judgment-seats ? 7 Do not they blaspheme that worthy name by the which you are called ?

Our apostle here charges them downright with that sin which he had been before condemning, namely, an undue respect of persons, despising the poor whom God himself had chosen and honoured : But ye have despised the poor. Despising the poor, is a sin not only against the word, but against the works of God : it is against his word and express command, backed with a severe threatening, enter not into the vineyard of the poor ; that is, oppress them not, for his avenger is mighty, and God will plead his cause for him. It is also against his works and his end in the creation ; for God never made any creature for contempt ; he then that despiseth the poor reproacheth his maker, that is, condemneth the word of God ; which is as much seen in making poor, as in making rich ; in making vallies, as in making hills. Observe farther, The apostle shews them what little reason and cause they had as to vilify the poor, so to idolize and adore the rich ; do not rich men oppress you by tyranny, and draw you before the judgment-seat, like the vilest malefactors ? Do not they blaspheme the name of Christ ? that worthy name from which you are called christians, and spit in the very face of your holy religion ? Learn, 1. That wicked rich men are oft-times oppressors, sometimes persecutors ; they have frequently both will and power, both disposition and occasion to do both. 2. That oppressors and persecutors are generally blasphemers ; they blaspheme the name of Christ, that worthy name which whosoever nameth ought to depart from all iniquity, 2 Tim. ii. 19.

8 If ye fulfil the royal law, according to the scripture, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, ye do well : 9 But if ye have respect to persons, ye commit sin, and are convinced of the law as transgressors.

Observe here, 1. The honourable title put upon the law of God, a royal law : Royal in its author, Jesus Christ, Heb. xiii. 25. Christ's voice shook mount Sinai : Royal in its precepts, the duty it requires of us is noble and excellent, nothing but what is our interest as men, our honour and happiness as christians, and what tends to the perfecting and ennobling of our natures : Royal in its rewards : True, our work can deserve no wages ; however, our royal Master will not let us work for nothing. Satan, as a master, is bad, his work much worse ; but his wages worst of all. Christ is a royal Master, obedience to his law is royal service : And how royal is his reward, in making us kings and priests unto God on earth, and crowned kings and princes with God in heaven ! Observe, 2. Our duty declared, with relation to this royal law, namely, to fulfil it : If ye fulfil the royal law, according to the scriptures, that is, if ye pay a sincere respect to the whole duty of the law, if you come up in your obedience to that universal love of God and your neighbour which the law requires, ye do well ; where, by neighbour, we are to understand every one to whom we may be helpful ; the command to love him as ourselves, shews the manner, not the measure, of our love ; the kind, not the degree ; the parity and likeness, not the equality of proportion ; we must mind the good of our neighbour as really and truly, though not so vehemently and earnestly, as our own. 3. How the apostle convicts them for walking contrary to this law, in honouring the rich and despising the poor, and in judging according to men's outward quality and condition : If ye have respect to persons in this manner, ye commit sin, and are convinced of the law as transgressors. How does the law convince ? Not only by reproving, but by proving : It shews us a rule, and saith, " There have ye departed from it ; here is a line, and there ye have transgressed it ; either gone over it, or gone beside it." Learn hence, That the rule of the word discovers wickedness fully to the conscience of the sinner, who winks hard, and is loth to lie under the convictions of it.

10 For whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all.

Here the apostle doth suppose a case which ought to make every person very conscientious in his obedience to the whole law of God, namely, that in case a man were careful to observe all the laws of God except one, his living in the breach of that one shall be so far from being connived at upon the account of his obedience to all the rest, that he shall be liable to the punishment which is due to the transgression of the whole law ; to the same punishment for kind, I say, not for degree ; because the more and greater sins men are guilty of, the greater and severer shall be their punishment, which consists in being for ever banished from the presence of God, and in being imprisoned with devils and damned spirits, which is called eternal death. Learn hence, That whoever allows himself in any one sin, be it either of omission or commission, willingly, constantly, and with allowance from conscience, and doth not convert and turn from it unto God, he is certainly in a state of damnation, because he affronts the sovereignty, and contemns the authority of that God that made and enacted the whole law, and also stands in a prepared readiness and disposition to break any other, yea, all other laws, in the grossest manner, whensoever any forcible temptation may assault him. Add to this, that living in the breach of any one law, will make a person unfit for the enjoyment of God, as well as living in the breach of all.

11 For he that said, Do not commit adultery ; said also, Do not kill. Now if thou commit no adultery, yet if thou kill, thou art become a transgressor of the law. 12 So speak ye, and so do, as they that shall be judged by the law of liberty.

As if the apostle had said, " He that threatened adultery with death, threatened also murder with death ; it is the same lawgiver that forbids both, and his authority is as truly contemned in transgressing one as both these laws. Disobedience to God, in any one law, is a virtual denying of his authority to prescribe any law to us, and lays a foundation for universal disobedience ; for if Almighty God's sovereignty be disowned in any one instance, it may as well be so in all others ; the same reason that leads to the observation or violation of one law, doth oblige us to keep or break all the rest, and that is the authority of the lawgiver. The whole law hath an equal obligation upon the conscience." From hence the apostle draws this inference, that persons should so speak and so do, so order their speeches and their actions, as they that shall be judged by the law of liberty. Note here, 1. That all we say and do, all our actions and expressions, do fall under the judgment and sentence of the law of God. 2. That the law of God, in the hand of Christ, is the law of liberty ; we are freed from it as a covenant, freed from its condemnatory curse, from its rigorous exactions, bondage, and terrors. The law to a believer is a law of liberty, and to others a law of bondage and death. 3. That it will be a great help to us in our christian course, to think often that all our words and actions must come into judgment ; it is agreeable to the liberty of the gospel to believe and remember, that all we say and do must be judged by the law of liberty.

13 For he shall have judgment without mercy, that hath shewed no mercy ; and mercy rejoiceth against judgment.

That is, He that whilst he lived shewed no mercy, but had opportunity and ability to shew it, shall have judgment without mercy ; that is, shall be very severely handled by God in the great day, and the sentence that shall pass upon him will be insupportable : But mercy rejoiceth against judgment, or triumpheth over judgment ; that is, mercy in some degree of exaltation ; such a mercy as has covetousness, hard-heartedness, and penuriousness, with all its enemies, under its feet ; such mercy qualifies, strengthens, and enables the person in whom it is found, to be confidently secure that he shall receive no prejudice or hurt, by that judgment which God shall pass upon the world at the great day. Learn from hence, That merciful men, whose hearts and hands are much exercised in doing good, and shewing mercy, by means of the consciousness of these God-like dispositions in themselves, are, or may be, full of a joyful and blessed security, that they shall stand in the great judgment of the world, and find favour and acceptance in the eyes of the judge ; when all unmerciful, covetous, and hard-hearted persons, shall fall under the sentence, and be ground to powder by it.

14 What doth it profit, my brethren, though a man say he hath faith, and have not works : Can faith save him ? 15 If a brother or sister be naked, and destitute of daily food ; 16 And one of you say unto them, Depart in peace, be ye warmed, and filled ; notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body ; what doth it profit ? 16 ¶ Even so faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone.

Our apostle here enters upon the second part of his discourse contained in this chapter, namely, to shew the vanity of a fruitless faith ; that such a faith as is not the parent and principle of obedience, and productive of good works, is altogether ineffectual and unprofitable. Faith of no kind, when it is alone, is justifying ; as there can be no good works without faith ; so where true faith is, it will be fruitful in good works, otherwise faith is no more faith ; no believing without obedience will avail us ; therefore St. Paul and St. James both agree to render to faith the things that are faith's, and not to take away from works the things that are works. What doth it profit a man to say he hath faith, &c. As if our apostle had said, " Let not any person think his faith sufficient to justify and save him without the works of charity and mercy." Alas ! a mere worldly profession is a poor unprofitable thing ! What will professing christianity, and saying we believe, avail to salvation, if we obey not Christ, and live not according to the gospel ? Will good works feed the hungry, or clothe the naked ? Is it not like a mocking of them ? Even so a notional knowledge, and a bare profession of faith, if it brings not forth the fruits of holiness and obedience towards God, of justice and righteousness, of love and mercy towards our neighbour, it is an effectual dead thing ; like a dead corpse, without a quickening and enlivening soul ; it is altogether dead as to our justification and salvation. Learn hence, 1. That a fruitless faith is certainly a dead faith. It is dead, because it does not unite us to Christ ; it is lifeless, because there is no liveliness in such a person's performances ; for though faith be not always alike lively, yet if sincere, it is always living, and enables the christian to live unto Christ, and to bear much fruit, John xv. 5. He that believeth, (that is, believeth) in me, &c. Observe, 2. The comparison which St. James here makes between faith and charity ; from whence he draws this conclusion, " If charity towards the poor, professed in words, but without works, be counterfeit, than faith in Christ, professed in like manner, without obedience, is also counterfeit and false ; but charity charity towards the poor in words, and not in deeds, is a counterfeit charity; accordingly faith in Christ, without obedience to his commands, is a false faith; a dead faith, in regard to the effect; because it will never bring them, in whom it is, to life and salvation."

18 Yea, a man may say, Thou hast faith, and I have works: shew me thy faith without thy works, and I will shew thee my faith by my works.

St. James brings in these words by way of dialogue, between a sincere believer that has true faith, and a false-hearted hypocrite that only pretends to it; thus, "Thou sayest thou hast true faith, though thou hast no works to evidence its truth; I say, I have true faith, because I have good works, which are the genuine effects and fruits of it. Come we now to the trial, and let it appear who faith true, thou or I; if thou that hast no works sayest true, prove thy faith to be true some other way. Works thou hast none, shew thy faith then by something else; but that is impossible, therefore thou vainly boastest of that which thou hast not; but, on the other side, says the sincere believer, I can make good what I say, proving the truth of my faith by the fruits of it in my works; this is a real demonstration that my faith is no vain ostentation, as yours is." This way of arguing is very convincing; it gripes the conscience of the hypocrite, and covers them with shame and confusion of face. Learn hence, That good works are the evidences by which Christ will judge of our faith now, and according to which Christ will judge of us and our faith at the great day. These two, faith and good works, ought to be as inseparable as light and the sun, as fire and heat. Obedience is the daughter of faith, and faith the parent and principle of obedience.

19 Thou believest that there is one God; thou doest well. The devils also believe and tremble.

As if the apostle had said, "Be thou either Jew or Christian, thou believest that there is a God, and assentest to the articles of religion; herein thou doest well, but this is no more than what the devils do; for they also believe and tremble; and if thou hast no better faith, and no better fruits of thy faith than they, thou hast the same reason to tremble which they have." Observe here, 1. That a bare and naked assent to the truths of the gospel, yea, to the fundamental truths and articles of religion, is not faith that will justify and save: The devils have it, yet have no hopes of salvation with it; they believe that there is a God, and a Christ that died for others, though not for them; so that an atheist, that does not believe a God, is worse than a devil; for he believes that there is a God, whose being the atheist denies. 2. That horror is the fruit and effect of the devil's faith; the more they know of God, the more they dread him; the more they think of him, the more they tremble at him. O God! All knowledge of thee out of Christ is uncomfortable; thine attributes, which are in themselves dreadful and terrible, being beheld by us in thy Son, do yield comfort and sweetness to us.

20 But wilt thou know, O vain man, that faith without works is death? 21 Was not Abraham our father justified by works, when he had offered Isaac his son upon the altar? Seest thou how faith wrought with his works, and by works was faith made perfect? 22 And the scripture was fulfilled which faith, Abraham believed God, and it was imputed unto him for righteousness: and he was called the friend of God. 23 Ye see then how that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only.

Our apostle here goes on to prove, that a person is justified by works, that is, by a working faith, from the example of Abraham; and the argument lies thus: "If Abraham of old was justified by a working faith, then we cannot be justified without it at this day; but Abraham, the father of the faithful, and the friend of God, was justified by a working faith, therefore faith without works will justify no man. As Abraham was justified, so must we and all others be justified; because the means and method of justification were ever one and the same, and ever will be uniform and alike. But Abraham was justified by a working faith, his faith was full of life, efficacy, and power, in bringing forth obedience unto God; witness his ready compliance with that hard and difficult command, the offering up his son Isaac. Seest thou how faith wrought with his works? that is, how his faith did both direct and assist him in that work. Heb. xi. By faith Abraham offered up Isaac, and by works was his faith made perfect, that is, declared to be perfect; for Abraham was justified five and twenty years before he offered up his son, but his conquering the difficulties of that work, shewed the perfection of his faith: And as the goodness of the fruit declares the excellency of the tree, so the fruit of obedience evidenced the sincerity of Abraham's faith." From thence then it may and must be concluded, that a barren and empty faith is a dead faith; dead, because it may be found in and with a person dead in trespasses and sins; dead, because it receives not the quickening influences of the Spirit of God; dead, because it wants operation, which is the effect of life; dead, because unavailing to eternal life. Observe farther, The honourable character, and noble testimony here given of Abraham, for and upon the account of his faith and obedience; He was called the friend of God. All true believers are God's friends, as friends they are reconciled to him; as friends they enjoy communion with him, and communications from him; as friends there is a conformity of wills and affections between them, they like and love, they will and choose the same things; as friends they desire and long for the complete fruition and enjoyment of each other. Lastly, The inference which St. James draws from this instance of Abraham, Ye see then how that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only. By faith only, he means faith that is alone, solitary, and by itself, without works. Quest. But doth not St. James, by affirming, that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only, contradict St. Paul, who says, By the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified in God's sight? Rom. iii. 20. Ans. Not at at all, 1. Because they do not speak, ad idem, to the same thing; St. Paul speaks of justification before God, St. James of justification before men: St. Paul speaks of the justification of our person, St. James of the justification of our faith. 2. They do not speak iisdem, to the same persons: St. Paul had to do with false apostles, and judaizing christians, who sought to substitute the works of the law, and a righteousness of their own, instead of, or at least in conjunction with, the grace of God; but St. James had to do with hypocritical professors, who abused St. Paul's doctrine of free grace, and took encouragement to sin, affirming, that if they believed, it was sufficient, no matter how they lived; therefore St. James urges the necessity of good works, as evidences of the sincerity of our faith. The sum of the matter is this, what God has joined none must divide, and what God has divided none must join; he has separated faith and works in the business of justification, according to St. Paul, and none must join them in it; and he has joined them in the lives of justified persons as St. James spake, and there we must not separate them. St. Paul assures us, That works have not a co-efficiency in justification itself; but St. James assures us, that they may and ought to have a co-existence in them that are justified.

25 Likewise also, was not Rahab the harlot justified by works, when she had received the messengers, and had sent them out another way?

Here the apostle declares, that Rahab was justified by a working faith, as Abraham was before her, which appeared in her entertaining the spies, lodging them in her house, and dismissing them with all possible privacy, which was a notable evidence of her faith in the God of Israel, her faith being accompanied with great self-denial, and exposing her to a mighty hazard. Indeed, Rahab's faith was mixed with great infirmity, she told a lie; but that is overlooked by God, and her faith only recorded, not her failing divulged, Rahab's lie, Sarah's laughter, Job's impatience, are not mentioned: We discover corruption in the very exercise of our graces; but oh! how good a Master do we serve, that pardons our infirmities, and accepts our sincerity! Learn hence, That the duties and services of believers, though blemished with many defects, do find acceptance with God; and shall not fail to be rewarded by him. Rahab's faith was seen in receiving the spies, her weakness and infirmity appeared in her lying; God pitied and pardoned the one, and accepted and rewarded the other.

26 For as the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is dead also.

In this verse the apostle sums up the whole matter, by comparing a dead faith to a dead corpse; as that is imperfect, wanting its best and noblest part: So faith without works wants that which dignifies and completes it. Faith, without holiness to enliven it, is a dead body, without the spirit to quicken it. Again, as a dead corpse is useless as well as imperfect; though it has eyes, it sees not; feet, it walks not; mouth, but speaks not; thus it is with a dead faith, being unaccompanied with a good life; no believing; without obedience will avail us; for though there is no merit in our obedience that we should be saved for it, yet is there such a necessity of obedience, that we shall never be saved without it. Again, as a dead corpse is noisome to us, so is a profession of faith without obedience noisome to God: He says to all the workers of iniquity, Depart from me, I know you not, I approve you not. As the body without the spirit is dead, that is, as the body is known to be dead, if we perceive no vital actions flowing from the soul, so is faith dead, if we see it not demonstrated by effectual operation; as it is necessary to the being of a living body that it be united to the soul, so it is necessary to the being of a living christian's faith, that it brings forth works of obedience in the Christian's life.

CHAP. III.

Our apostle in this chapter shows the great necessity we lie under to watch over our words, and to avoid the sins of the tongue, and this both as an argument of our sincerity, and as an ornament to our profession.

MY brethren, be not many masters, knowing that we shall receive the greater condemnation.

For the clearer understanding of these words, let us consider, 1. What the apostle does not forbid, namely private and brotherly admonition, which proceeds from christian love one towards another, much less does he condemn public and authorized reproof: God has made it the duty of all to admonish and reprove each other charitably; he has made it the duty of others to admonish and censure evil-doers authoritatively; this therefore is not forbidden. 2. What it is that is here forbidden, namely, such a reproof of others as is supercilious and masterly, managed with sharpness and severity, rashly and rigidly. As if the apostle had said, "Be not magisterial and censorious towards your brethren, as if every one of you had many masters in him:" censuring of others is an arrogation of mastership over others, and the assuming of a power over them which God never gave us, it is a bold usurpation of God's authority; we may admonish, reprove, and warn; but it must not be in a lordly manner, in a masterly way, which is reviling rather than reproofing; we must consider what may stand with charity, as well as what will consist with truth; every evil must not be divulged, but some must be covered with a cloke of love; there may be, and oft-times is, a great deal of malice in reporting truth. Observe next, The remedy prescribed against censuring others, namely, the considering ourselves that we shall thereby receive the greater damnation; sharp reprovers in judging others, pronounce a doom upon themselves; such as reprove either out of office, or out of charity, ought to look to themselves, lest in reproofing others they condemn themselves.

2 For in many things we offend all. If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man, and able also to bridle the whole body.

As if the apostle had said, "We had need to be very candid in censuring others, for we all of us offend in many things things ourselves, especially with and by our tongue, which is an engine of more mischief, both to ourselves and others than any other member of the body; and accordingly he is called here, not a gracious man, but a perfect man, one that has attained to the fullest measures, and highest degrees of grace, that can bridle his tongue: To be able to bridle the tongue is an argument of considerable growth, and happy progress in grace; he that can bridle his tongue, can bridle his whole body, that is, governs all the other actions of his life; he is a very extraordinary christian.

3 Behold, we put bits in the horses mouths, that they may obey us; and we turn about their whole body.

As we rule the whole body of a horse by a bridle in its mouth, so by bridling our tongues, we shall rule and govern all the actions of our lives. Note, That as hot and hard-mouthed horses, so the tongue of man is apt to run out, unless well bridled; nor is any bridle strong enough to hold it in, but the bridle of grace; nay, not that at all times. The grace of God is both spur and bridle to the tongue of man: Grace, like a spur, provokes to speak for God, and for the good of others; and grace, like a bridle, stops us from speaking what may grieve the spirit of God, and justly offend others. None rule their tongues well without grace, and every one that has grace doth not rule them well; it is a great part of perfection not to offend in word.

4 Behold also the ships, which though they be so great, and are driven of fierce winds, yet are they turned about with a very small helm wither soever the governor listeth. 5 ¶ Even so the tongue is a little member, and boasteth great things. Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth! 6 And the tongue is a fire, a world of iniquity: so is the tongue amongst our members, that it defileth the whole body letteth on fire the course of nature; and is set on fire of hell.

The design of our apostle, by this and the former similitude, is to shew, that little things well governed can govern great bodies; as the rider by a small bit can govern the horse at pleasure, and the pilot, by a small rudder, can manage the ship with ease; so the government of that little member the tongue, is a special mean for governing the whole man. Next he compares the tongue to fire, in regard to the danger that attends it: Will a spark of fire set an house, a town, a city in a flame, and lay it in ashes? In like manner will a fiery tongue inflame a family, a society, a church, a kingdom: Yea, the whole world, by strife and contention, putting all into combustion; such a tongue being set on work by the devil, and kindled by that fire which came from hell; but verily, a tongue set on fire from hell, shall, without repentance be set on fire in hell. Learn hence, That a wicked tongue is of an hellish original, the fire of such a tongue is blown up by the breath of hell; let us abhor contentions, revilings, and reproaches, as we would hell itself.

7 For every kind of beasts, and of birds, and of serpent, and of things in the sea, is tamed, and hath been tamed of mankind: 8 But the tongue can no man tame; it is an unruly evil, full of deadly poison.

Our apostle here goes on in shewing how difficult it is to govern the tongue; it is wilder than the wildest beasts, they are more tractable, and may be sooner tamed than a tongue be governed; it is an unruly evil, that will not be held in. Nature has set a double guard about the tongue, namely, the teeth and the lips, and grace has laid many restraints upon it, and yet it breaks out full of deadly poison; intimating, that the tongue is as deadly as a venomous beast. In the wild desert there are lions, bears, and tygers, but these assault us but now and then, and can only rend the skin, but a contentious tongue is always troublesome to the soul and spirit; Man tameth the beasts, and God tameth man: And the apostle's calling the tongue an unruly evil full of deadly poison, plainly imports that a wicked tongue is venomous and hurtful; a slanderous tongue is a deadly poison, nothing can secure against it but innocency and a good conscience; if we fall by it, let this comfort us, that there will be a resurrection of our names, as well as of our persons; let us always then keep in the way of our duty, and commit our good name to God's care and keeping.

9 Therewith bless we God, even the Father; and therewith curse we men, which are made after the similitude of God. 10 Out of the same mouth proceedeth blessing and cursing. My brethren, these things ought not so to be. 11 Doth a fountain send forth at the same place sweet water and bitter? 12 Can the fig-tree, my brethren, bear olive-berries? either a vine, figs? so can no fountain both yield salt water and fresh.

Observe here, 1. Our apostle informs us what is the proper use of the tongue; namely, to bless and praise God; speech being the most excellent faculty, is to be consecrated to divine uses; it is both a good man's work and his recreation to bless and praise God. 2. The final use which some men put the tongue unto, and that is, to curse with it, to curse men that have the natural image of God upon them, yea, holy and good men, that have the divine image of God stamped upon them; that is, the abuse of some men's tongues, their mouth is full of cursing and bitterness, 3. The same tongue cannot, should not bless God and curse men; to pray and brawl with the same tongue is shameful hypocrisy; to go from worshipping to railing and reviling, to speak to the God of heaven with a tongue set on fire of hell, is a monstrous impiety. 4. How the apostle discovers the mighty absurdity of blessing and cursing with one and the same tongue, and of putting the best member to the worst use; the good aggravates the evil, and the evil disparageth, yea, disproveth the good; to suppose that the same tongue should acceptably bless God, and at the same time sinfully curse men, is as irrational and absurd, as to imagine that the same fountain should send forth salt water and fresh, sweet water and bitter; and, as if a fig-tree should bring forth olives, or a vine bear figs: Our apostle argues and reasons from what is impossible in nature, to what is absurd in manners; contrary effects from the same cause is against the order of nature; in like manner grace is uniform, and always acts like itself; to bless and curse, to pray and revile, is wholly inconsistent with grace: Nature abhors contradictions, and so does the grace of God: Though a christian has a double principle in him, the flesh and the spirit, yet he has not a double heart; his spirit is single and sincere in what he does, in all he does both for God and man.

13 ¶ Who is a wise man, and endued with knowledge amongst you? let him shew out of a good conversation his works with meekness of wisdom.

As if our apostle had said, "If any among you desire to approve yourselves more knowing than others, wiser and better than others, as you would be thought when you censure and despise others shew it to the world by a better conversation, by your abounding fruitfulness in good works and by such meekness of spirit as will be an evidence of true wisdom." Hence we learn, That the wise man is a meek and patient man; as pride and folly, so wisdom and meekness, are companions; the more wisdom a man has, the more he can check himself, and curb his passion: Moses is renowned in scripture for his wisdom; and for his meekness; we all affect the reputation of wisdom, let us discover it by humility, in being lowly within ourselves; and by our meekness in bearing with and forbearing one another; yet must our meekness be a wise meekness, it must be a meekness of wisdom; our meekness must be opposite to fierceness, but not to zeal; Moses was very meek in his own cause, but hot as fire in the cause of God; meekness and zeal are consistent, let us then shew out of a good conversation our works with meekness of wisdom.

14 But if ye have bitter envying and strife in your hearts, glory not, end lie not against the truth. 15 This wisdom descendeth not from above, but is earthly, sensual, devilish, 16 For where envying and strife is, there is confusion and every evil work.

Observe here, 1. How the apostle points at the root of all tongue-evils; we pretend zeal and justice, zeal for God, and doing right to ourselves; but the true cause is envy, called bitter envying, as being bitter in its root, bitter in its fruit, bitter to others, bitter to ourselves; this is a painful evil, an unprofitable evil, a foolish sinful evil; it makes another's good our grief. But why so? The good of another is no hurt to us; we have not the less because another has more; Leah's fruitfulness was no cause of Rachael's barrenness; why then should it be the occasion of Rachael's envy? Thy portion is not impaired because thy brother's is increased. 2. How envy and strife are here joined together; if you have envying and strife in your hearts; when envy is found in the heart, strife will soon be found in the tongue for envy is the mother of strife; natural corruption doth most of all bewray itself by envy; it has an early spring, and a late autumn; we have it as soon as we come into the world, and it is an hard matter to leave it before we go out of it again; Children suck it in with their milk, and the old man buries it in his coffin. 3. What are the bitter effects and fruits of envy and strife; namely, confusion and every evil work; an envious spirit is an unquiet and wicked spirit; the devil worketh by no instruments more than by envious, discontented and malicious person. Pride and envy were the two first sins that crept into the world; the first man was ruined by pride, the second destroyed by envy, the whole world could not hold two brothers when the one was envied by the other: Cain's envy tasted blood, and verily the sinner's envy thirst after it; well therefore may the apostle say, Where envying and strife is; there is confusion, and every evil work, &c.

17 But the wisdom that is from above is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy.

Our apostle here enters upon a comparison between earthly wisdom, and spiritual heavenly wisdom; between wisdom that is not, and wisdom that is from above. Observe, 1. That wisdom which is not from above characterized and described. (1.) It is earthly, it is suited to earthly minds, and it is employed about earthly things: Earthly wisdom is mere folly, it is said to be wise only for this world and to have such an unfavoury spirit as will relish nothing but what is earthly. (2.) Sensual: such wisdom as tendeth only to gratify the senses, and is conversant about outward pleasures, which are the pleasures of the beast, and not of the man: Such sensual satisfactions do only please the sensitive appetite, which is the highest rational pleasure to mortify and subdue. (3.) Devilish: because it is such wisdom as is found in the devil: he is only wise to do mischief. As a man has a fleshly part in common with the beast, so there are some sins which the scripture calls fleshly and beastly lusts, as uncleanness, riot, excess, and the like; but as man has somewhat in common with the angels, namely, his spirit and soul, so there are some sins which are called Satan's lusts, John viii. 44. His lusts he will do Thus envy, pride, wrath, revenge, malice, slander, these sins make a man devilish, like unto Satan; hence is St. Paul's exhortation, 2 Cor. vii. 1. To cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit. Lord, pity the deplorable ruins of mankind, compassionate fallen man, who hath not only somewhat of the beast, but also somewhat of the devil, in him by nature. O deplorable degradation! And should he sacrifice himself, he could not save himself without a sanctifier; he must be restored to the divine likeness here, or never enjoy his maker hereafter. 2. He next describes spiritual wisdom to us, and that, first by its original it is from above: All wisdom is known by its descent; carnal wisdom is of the earth, earthly; spiritual wisdom is from above, and has an heavenly Author, and its original and descent is heavenly: The wisdom that is from above. Secondly, He describes spiritual wisdom by its effects and fruits, by its properties and qualities, and reckons up eight of them. (1.) True wisdom is pure and holy wisdom, and sinless craftiness; The heart of such a person is clean, though not wholly free from sin, and his way is undefiled: This pure wisdom will not brook the filthiness either of error in judgment, or sin in practice: Error is a blot as well as sin, and is as damnable as sin; the one is an open road road, the other a secret path to hell and destruction; he that is wise, and has a due care of his soul's salvation, will be as much afraid of erroneous principles, as he is of debauched practices. (2.) Peaceable: True wisdom teaches to avoid all strife and contention: There is a sweet connection between wisdom and peace; the wisest are the meekest men; they are peaceable and peace makers; not ready to provoke others, nor easily provoked themselves: Such as see most need of pardon from God, are most ready to pardon others, to live peaceably with all: Yet note, Though wisdom be pure and peaceable, yet it is first pure, then peaceable; as God is the first and best of Beings, so purity is the first and best of blessings; the chief care then must be for purity and truth; but next to purity we must regard peace: Truth must be preferred, but peace must not be neglected; we must treat with God by prayer, and treat with man by condescension, as far as a good conscience will suffer, for obtaining and preserving peace. (3.) True wisdom is gentle, in opposition to strife and contention; the word also signifies moderate and patient, Phil. iv. 5. 1 Tim. iii. 3. Such a christian is moderate in doubtful opinions moderate in his judging of others, moderate and patient in his whole conversation, receding sometimes from his own right for peace's sake, (4.) Easy to be intreated: not inflexible, but persuadable: He that has an inflexible will, had need have an infallible judgment. Indeed there may be a flexibility and easiness to a fault; some good natures (as they are called) are easily drawn away to sin by evil company, and wicked counsel; in such a case, to turn a deaf ear to all entreaties is not obstinacy, but religious resolution. (5.) Full of mercy: this has a double object, such as want, and such as offend; and so there is mercy in giving and in forgiving it: It is the glory of a man to pass by a transgression, and the honour of a christian to put on bowels of mercy; without this garment we shall appear naked at the bar of God. (6.) Full of good works: Religion is not a dry rod, but it blossoms and brings forth fruit; fruits of humanity and civil courtesy, as well as fruits of piety and pious charity: When we begin to be religious we must not leave off to be kind and courteous: Be pitiful, be courteous, 1 Pet. iii. 8. (7.) Without partiality: that is, without making any difference between person and person, because of outward respects, which is an high point of wisdom; folly discovers itself in nothing more than by doing upon outward splendour. Fools, like children, account nothing good but what is gay; but wisdom teaches us to value and put an estimate upon persons and things, according to their intrinsic worth, and doth nothing by partiality. (8.) Without hypocrisy: In true wisdom there is no prevailing guile, but a true simplicity, and godly sincerity found with it, and this is the highest piece of wisdom; the hypocrite is the greatest fool; the sincere christian is the truly wise, and the only wise man.

18 And the fruit of righteousness is sown in peace of them that make peace.

Our apostle here concludes his discourse, by shewing the happiness of those who are possessed of that wisdom from above, which is pure and peaceable, &c. They sow a seed which will yield them present fruit, and bring heavens of joy and comfort into their bosoms, and also entitle them to an everlasting reward in that kingdom wherein dwelleth righteousness. Learn hence, 1. That all the actions of this life are the seed sown for the life to come; and every one's harvest hereafter will be according to his seed time here; our rewards shall be according to our works. 2. That the rewards of righteousness and peaceableness are reaped and received here initially, and shall be ere long enjoyed perfectly; The fruit of righteousness is sown in peace of them that love peace. 3. That true lovers of righteousness ought to be lovers of peace, and peaceable persons lovers of righteousness; mercy and truth must meet together, righteousness and peace must kiss each other: Peace without righteousness is but a sordid compliance; righteousness without peace is but a rough austerity; our duty is to couple a sweet goodness with a severe righteousness.

CHAP. IV.

Our apostle in this chapter discovers the root from whence all strife and contention proceeds; namely, from men's carnal lusts and corrupt affections; accordingly thus he speaks:

FROM whence come wars and fightings among you? come they not hence, even of your lusts that war in your members?

The Jews, to whom St. James directed this epistle, had at that time great wars and fightings, not only with their neighbours, but even among themselves; in every city there were wars and fightings among them. Now, the apostle here puts it to their consciences to tell and declare whence these animosities and contentions, those wars and fightings, did proceed: come they not hence, even from your lusts? Plainly intimating, that the cause of all civil dissensions are mens corruptions: War stirs first within, before it breaks forth without; were there not a fight in ourselves there would be no fighting with others: Lust within is the make-bait in all societies and communities without. Pride and covetousness, envy and ambition, make men injurious to one another; worldly and sensual lusts first war in ourselves, before they disturb the common peace.

2 Ye lust, and have not: ye kill, and desire to have, and cannot obtain: ye fight and war, yet have not, because ye ask not. 3 Ye ask and receive not, because ye ask amiss, that ye may consume it upon your lusts.

The Jews, at the writing of this epistle to them, did vehemently lust after liberty and freedom from the Roman yoke and for dominion and government over other nations; believing that their Messiah was to be a temporal prince, who should enable them to lord it over the heathen world; "Now, says our apostle, though you lust for liberty and dominion, yet you have it not; and though in an eager pursuit after these things, ye kill and slay, yet you do but lose your blood and labour, for ye cannot obtain what you thus inordinately seek, and irregularly covet; you should go to God in prayer for what you desire : But if at any time you do pray, it is not in a right manner, with a right intention, and for a right end. It is to consume it upon your lusts ; namely, that having the liberty you desire, you may possess the good things of this world you lust after, and may lord it over the heathen world." Learn hence, That we pray amiss when our aims and ends are not right in prayer. 2. That then our aims and ends are not right in prayer, when we ask blessings for the use and encouragement of our lusts. 3. That prayers so framed are usually successless ; what we ask amiss we are sure to miss, if the Almighty has any kindness for us. In prayer we must consider three things, the object, the manner, and the end : We must not only guard our affections, but secure our intentions ; for prayers that want a good aim, do ye also want a good issue : Ye ask, and receive not, because ye ask amiss.

4 ¶ Ye adulterers, and adulteresses, know ye not that the friendship of the world is enmity with God ? Whosoever therefore will be a friend of the world, is the enemy of God.

It is spiritual, not corporal adultery, which these words take notice of : the inordinate love of this world is called spiritual adultery ; because it draws away the love of the soul from God, and dissolves the spiritual marriage between God and the soul : Ye adulterers and adulteresses, know ye not that the friendship of the world, which stands in competition with, and indisposes you for the doing of God's will, is enmity with God ? and that whosoever will be thus a friend of the world, is the enemy of God ? To love the world as God's competitor, is enmity to God ? and he is God's enemy that loveth it predominantly. Learn we to love every creature with a creature-love ; for God reckons we love him not at all, if we love him not above all.

5 ¶ Doth ye think that the scripture saith in vain, The spirit that dwelleth in us lusteth to envy ?

Some by the spirit here understand the holy Spirit of God, and make the words run in the form of an interrogation, thus, " The Spirit, that dwelleth in us Christians, lusteth he to envy as yours doth ? Nay, rather is he not the Spirit of love and goodness ?" Others understand our own spirit ; our corrupt nature is mightily carried forth this way, even to envy the good of others : it is usual in scripture to call the bent and propensions of the soul, either to good or evil, by the name of a spirit. Note hence, That God's own people have much, too much, of a spirit of envy remaining in them, unmortified and unsubdued by them : The spirit that is in us lusteth to envy.

6 But he giveth more grace, wherefore he saith God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace unto the humble.

The sin of envy being censured before, our apostle next condemns the sin of pride ; he uses a military term when he tells us, that God resisteth the proud ; it signifies, that he sets himself as in battle array against the proud, in a direct opposition to him ; there are no sort of sinners whom God sets himself so much against to punish and plague as proud sinners : such are wholly out of his favour ; he beholdeth them afar off, and they are subjects of his high displeasure ; like naked men in an army, they stand exposed to his wrath they have no shelter, nothing to keep off the threatening from them : for there can be no shelter from divine wrath, but in divine love. There are two eminent works of divine providence in the world, the one is to lift up and exalt the humble, the other is to abase and pull down the proud ; some pride themselves in their natural parts, others in their acquired parts ; some in their moral virtues and evangelical graces, others in their holy duties and spiritual performance ; we seldom do well, but we think too well of ourselves. Learn hence, That pride is a common sin, and provoking ; yea, a very provoking sin, and so must needs be, because it is an usurpation of the place and power of God, and sets itself against all the commands and threatenings of God : God resisteth the proud, but he giveth grace to the humble : grace, that is, 1. Favour ; the humble shall have his favour, and the proud his frown. 2. God giveth grace, that is, more grace, farther measures of grace, to the humble ; as we lay up our richest wines in the lowest cellars, so does God lodge his choicest graces in humble and lowly hearts ; he giveth not only grace, but more grace, to the humble ; such as are low in their own eyes, are under the special protection and direction of the Most High God.

7 Submit yourselves therefore to God. Resist the devil, and he will flee from you.

That is, " Submit to his government and authority, to his preceptive and commanding will, and to his providential and disposing will : submit yourselves to the guidance of his word, to the direction of his Spirit, to the conduct of his providence ; submit your whole selves to the whole law and will of God ; let all our thoughts, affections, words, and actions, be guided according to the strict rules of the word of God ; but resist the devil, by no means do not submit or yield an inch to him ; the only way to overcome Satan is, not by yielding to him, but by resisting and opposing of him ; Satan is both a conquered enemy and a cowardly enemy, though he has a bold face, yet a faint heart ; resist him, and he will flee from you. Observe here, 1. The devil's active enmity and continual hostility against man, implied and supposed : Satan is continually busy with us, that is, the apostate spirit, and the spirit of apostasy lodged in our natures : Where ever we see malice, revenge, envy, hatred, pride, and self-love, there is that evil spirit which is so inimical and injurious to us, that is, Venerum serpentis diabolici, " The sting and poison, the very soul and spirit of the apostate nature." 2. The christian's duty discovered, and that is, not to yield but resist and oppose ; we must either resist him, or be taken captive by him if we do not resist him, we shall never get rid of him ; if once we parly and treat with him, we must expect to be triumphed over, and trampled upon by him. 3. The certainty of success declared, he will flee from you ; every denial is a discouragement to Satan, the strength of his temptations lies in our treachery and falleness ; we are false within ourselves, otherwise all his power and malice could not hurt us ; however, if we continue our resistance, the holy holy Spirit will come in with his assistance, he will be our second in the field, and we shall find, that stronger is he that is in us, than he that is in the world; the God of peace will bruise Satan under our feet shortly.

8 Draw nigh to God, and he will draw nigh to you—

Observe here, 1. Man by nature, since his fall, is afar off from God, not barely by a natural distance as a creature, but also by a moral distance as a sinner; God made man near him, but when man sinned he departed from him; now we draw nigh to God by conversion, and in all the actions of repentance: there is a first and a second conversion; a first conversion from a sinful state, a second conversion from sinful acts, by both we draw nigh to God; but the drawing nigh to God here principally intended, is by approaching to him in prayer, and in the use of every holy ordinance: and humbling of the soul before God, is a drawing nigh unto him; hence it is that good men delight so much in prayer, and other holy duties; they meet with God in them, and draw near to God by them; and they that meet with God, meet with all delights. 2. As the duty required, draw nigh to God, so the encouragement annexed, he will draw nigh to you: God will certainly draw nigh to that christian, in a way of mercy, who prepareth his heart to approach and draw near to him in a way of duty: the Lord is nigh to all them that call upon him; nigh to comfort, nigh to quicken, nigh to guide, nigh to support.

—Cleanse your hearts ye sinners; and purify your hearts, ye double-minded.

Mark! to signify to us our deep pollution, and universal pollution; we are called upon both to cleanse and to purify, and that both our hands and our hearts. Quest. But why is cleansing of the hands set before purifying the heart? must we sweeten the streams before the fountain? Ans. It is not unusual in scripture to put that first which is visible first, as calling before election, 2 Pet. 1. 10. And because grace (having once entered into the heart) discovers itself by an immediate cleansing of the hands; so that if we would have an holy life, we must get a clean heart. Learn, 1. That unclean persons can have no communion with God. 2. That they who draw nigh to God, must cleanse their hands; because the sins of our hands do keep us at a distance from God, and God at a distance from us. Commerce with God in an ordinance is one thing, and communion with him is another; a man may have a commerce or trade with an enemy for profit-sake, whilst he refuses to hold communion with him in a way of friendship and intimacy of acquaintance. 3. That double-minded men have corrupt hearts: double mindedness is a dividing of the heart between God and something else; whereas God calls for the whole heart, the whole mind, the whole soul, the whole strength. 4. That this double-mindedness hinders both our drawing nigh to God, and God's drawing nigh to us; an heart divided between God and the world, between conscience and lust, between religion and self-interest, will hinder all intercourse and sweet communion betwixt God and us in the duty of prayer.

9 Be afflicted, and mourn, and weep: let your laughter be turned to mourning, and your joy to heaviness. 10 Humble yourselves in the sight of the Lord, and he shall lift you up.

The next duty we are exhorted to by the apostle, is a deep humiliation, and a voluntary afflicting of our souls before God for sin, and upon the account of any calamity, either on ourselves or others. Learn hence, That as the afflicting hand of God does increase upon a person, a family, or a people, so ought the humiliation and mourning of that person, family, or people, to increase; we ought not only to be humbled when God afflicts, but also to be humbled in proportion to what God afflicts; great afflictions call for great humiliations: woe to that person, that family, or that people, who will not be afflicted when God afflicts them, nor humble themselves, when God humbles them; who, when God casts them down, will hold up their heads in mirth and jollity: God loves to see us bear our cross, but he cannot endure to see us make sport with it, or slight of it: If God once perceives us driving away our sorrow with harp and viol, or drowning it with wine, he can quickly turn our wine into water, and our laughter into the voice of weeping: Now is it not better to turn our mirth into mourning, than to have God turn it into mourning? They who turn their mirth into mourning, shall find comfort after their mourning; but they shall know nothing but mourning, whose mirth God turns into mourning: be afflicted, therefore, and mourn, and weep. Quest. But how comes the apostle to make use of so many words to one purpose, be afflicted, mourn, weep, humble yourselves, &c.? Ans. All these heaps of expressions do import and imply, 1. The necessity of the duty. 2. The difficulty of the duty. 3. The continuance of the duty, and accordingly much enforcement is necessary; flesh and blood loves pleasure, but declines sorrow and heaviness; nature loves no bitter draughts, though bitter things are sometimes the best things; therefore the apostle's call to afflict our souls, and humble ourselves in the sight of God is repeated; and mark the encouragement given thus to do, humble yourselves in the sight of God, and he shall lift you up: Submission and humility is the true way to exaltation and glory; the way to rise is to fall: He that humbleth himself shall be exalted, Luke xiv. 11. He shall lift thee up in due time, 1 Pet. v. 6. Wait God's leisure, and the promise shall surely be fulfilled; the world looketh upon humility as the way to contempt, but God pronounces it the way to honour; before honour is humility.

11 ¶ Speak not evil one of another, brethren, He that speaketh evil of his brother, and judgeth his brother, speaketh evil of the law, and judgeth the law: but if thou judge the law, thou art not a doer of the law, but a judge. 12 There is one lawgiver, who is able to save, and to destroy. Who art thou that judgest another?

These words, as generally delivered by our apostle, are a dissuative from the sin of detraction, or speaking evil of one another, either by secret whispering, or open backbiting; a very common but most unbecoming sin amongst Christians.

Christians- What pleasure do some persons take in divulging the faults of others, in aggravating their faults, in defrauding them of their necessary excuse and mitigation, though at the same time they are conscious of it, by lessening their good actions through the supposition of their false aims and ends! It is an injurious and unworthy jealousy, when a person's actions are fair, to suspect his intentions, by mentioning his failings, but suppressing his worth and excellencies: It becomes christians neither to give way to this growing evil themselves, nor give ear to it in others. But there seems to be something special and particular in these words, which respects the Jews, to whom this epistle is directed; as if the apostle had said, "Give over your reproach and censoriousness against the Gentile christians, who do not observe your ceremonial law, your feast, your sabbath, your circumcision; for both the law of Christ, and the law of Moses, which you profess to own, do bind you to love your neighbour as yourself, and forbids such uncharitable censures: So that by condemning your brethren, you condemn the law, and set yourselves above it; and all this in contempt of the law, and the Lawgiver, who is one, and is able both to save and to destroy." There are some that are neither able to save and destroy; there are others able to destroy, but cannot save. Satan is a destroyer, but he cannot save any, nor can he destroy all; if he could, none should be saved. But there is a Lawgiver, who can save and destroy, who can give life, and take it away, and both as often as he will: He can save those that obey his laws, and destroy all those that transgress them: Therefore, seeing Christ, and none but Christ, has authority to give laws, it is not for you to impose ceremonial observances upon your brethren, and to censure and judge them for not observing them, when Christ has set them at liberty from the observation of them.

13 Go to now, ye that say, To-day, or to-morrow we will go into such a city, and continue there a year, and buy and sell, and get gain. 14 Whereas ye know not what shall be on the morrow. For what is your life? It is even a vapour that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away. 15 For that ye ought to say, If the Lord will, we shall live, and do this; or that. 16 But now ye rejoice in your boastings. All such rejoicing is evil.

For the clearer understanding of these words, consider, 1. What is not here forbidden or condemned by our apostle; namely, prudential resolutions for a right management of human affairs: It is lawful for men to take up a purpose to go to such a place, and follow their trade there, to buy, and sell; and get gain in an honest way; but no man must be peremptory in this, because we know not what shall be on the morrow, such determinations must be made with submission to divine providence: If the Lord will, we shall do this, or that, referring all to his pleasure, who alone doth whatsoever pleaseth him. 2. What is hereby intimated to us, and what is the duty incumbent upon us, namely, (1.) That we have no assurance of our lives, nor of any of the comforts of our lives, for one day, and therefore ought to refer all our actions, our enterprises, and undertakings to the will of God. What is your life? &c. (2.) That in regard of the great frailty of our lives, and the great uncertainty of issues and events, it is the height of presumption to promise ourselves great things, without the leave of God's providence; as our times are in God's hands, so are our actions also in God's power, both as to the performance of them, and as to the success of them; Say not then, To-day, or to-morrow, we will go into such a city, &c.

17 Therefore to him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin.

Observe here, 1. That sin of ignorance are sins, and render men greatly culpable, though ignorance will in some degree lessen their punishment. 2. That to sin against light and knowledge is a very heinous aggravation of sin; because the knowledge of our duty lays us under the greatest obligation to do it. 3. That the greater advantages and opportunities any man has of knowing his duty; and the more knowledge he sins against in not doing of it, the greater is his sin, and the more grievous will be his condemnation.

GO to now, ye rich men, weep and howl for your miseries that shall come upon you. 2 Your riches are corrupted, and your garments are moth-eaten. 3 Your gold and silver is cankered; and the rust of them shall be a witness against you, and shall eat your flesh as it were fire. Ye have heaped treasure together for the last days.

These words may be considered either relatively or absolutely. Consider them, 1. With relation to the Jews, to whom they were written immediately, and they are a prediction or denunciation of that judgment which was coming upon the rich men of the Jewish nation; which prediction, Josephus assure us, was filled by the slaughter and spoiling of the rich Jews throughout Galilee and Judea, the zealous sparing none but the poor and low: Thus did the vengeance of God, and does to this day pursue and follow that wicked people, who killed the Lord of life, and their own prophets, who brought judgment on themselves to the uttermost. Consider the words absolutely in themselves, and they are a severe and cutting reprehension to covetous rich men, for the sordid tearing of that wealth which God had given them for public service. And the apostle gives us, (1.) A description of their sin. (2.) A declaration of their punishment. Observe, 1. A description of the sin of the covetous rich worldlings, they chose rather to have their goods to be corrupted and spoiled, than to be employed to good uses; their victuals might have refreshed the bowels of the hungry, but they rather suffered them to putrify and stink; the garments which lay useless in their wardrobes, might have clothed the backs of their naked brethren, but they had rather let them be moth-eaten; their gold and silver might have been applied to many good uses, but they had rather it should be cankered, and rust in their chests. 2. The punishment denounced against them for this their sin, the rust of their gold and silver shall witness witness against them; that is, their consciences shall at once convince them of their base covetousness, and torment them for it; and this corroding of their consciences, shall have an impression upon their bodies, it shall eat their flesh as it were fire; and all that treasure which, with wrong to others, and violation to their own consciences, they had heaped together, was but heaped up for the spoiler, and the violence of the last days. Learn, 1. That it is hard to possess riches without sin, an hard matter to have them, and not to be hindered from heaven by them. 2. That a covetous hoarding, and sordid sparing of wealth, which our suffering brethren want, brings a curse both upon our persons and estates. 3. That sore miseries, and dreadful judgments, shall come upon wicked rich men, which, if believingly apprehended, would cause them now to weep and howl. We do not hurt with our wealth, say some; aye, but what good do you do with it: Where are the poor members of Christ, whom ye have relieved with the superfluities of your table? But can many say truly, They have done no harm with their estates? Lord! What carelessness in religion; what contempt of God, what riot and excess, is found amongst many that abound in wealth, who expend more upon a lust in one day, than would maintain a poor family many years. 4. That in the day of judgment, not only our actions, but all the circumstances of our actions, shall be brought forth, and produced as arguments of conviction; the rusty iron, the cankered silver, the moth eaten clothes, shall be produced; the stones of the wall, built by oppression, shall cry, "Lord, we were built by oppression and violence; and the beam out of the timber shall answer it, True, Lord, even so it is, Hab. ii. 11. The circumstances of men's sins at the great day will be so many memorials to put them in mind of guilt, and God in mind of vengeance.

4 Behold the hire of the labourers who have reaped down your fields, which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth: and the cries of them which have reaped are entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth.

The next sin which our apostle convicts the rich of, and condemns them for, is the sin of oppression, and of the worst sort, even of labourers and servants; their covetousness was the cause of this oppression. There is no sin so heinous and base but covetousness may be a mother or a nurse to it; what more sordid than for the rich master to detain the wages of the poor labourer? Yet, Behold the hire of the labourers crieth: though they did not, durst not complain, yet their hire kept back did complain. Learn hence, That as all oppression is very sinful, so especially the detaining of the labourers wages when their hire is delayed or denied, both are exceeding sinful; and accordingly we find oppressors in scripture joined with the vilest of sinners, even with forcerers, adulterers, and false swearers. And to testify that God cannot want witnesses against oppressors, he tells us, their hire shall cry as well as the poor themselves: "The beam, and the stone out of the wall shall cry," Hab. ii. Remember we then that secret wrongs are known to God: the poor may not always know who wrongs them, but the Lord fully knows, and their wrongs and oppressions will cry against us, when they know not against whom to cry. And note, The person gloriously described who is the poor's avenger; he is the Lord of Sabaoth, or the Lord of hosts, who has all power in his hand, and all creatures at his command. How bold and daring then is the oppressor to afflict the poor, who have the Lord of hosts for their avenger?

5 Ye have lived in pleasure on the earth, and been wanton; ye have nourished your hearts as in a day of slaughter.

The next sin he charges them upon, is sensuality, luxury, lasciviousness, their eating and drinking to excess in their feasts, pampering themselves for the slaughter and the thambles. These are sins very natural to corrupt nature, but chiefly incident to the rich. Pride, idleness, fulness of bread, and living in pleasure, are too frequently sins that do abound in rich men's houses; though their abundance is no excuse, but rather an aggravation of their sin: God allows us to use pleasure, but not to live in pleasures; and by calling it pleasure upon earth, he intimates, 1. That sensual delights are only enjoyed here in this world: 1. That their desires ran after these earthly pleasures only: The pleasures of the beast only pleased them; whereas the delights of sense are so far from being the chief pleasures for which God designed us, that on the contrary, he intended we should take our chief pleasure, not in gratifying, but in restraining our sensual appetite, in reducing that rebellious power under the government and dominion of reason and religion.

6 Ye have condemned and killed the just, and he doth not resist you.

By the just, may be understood Jesus Christ, that just One, whom the nation of the Jews condemned and killed; and also such of his members, orthodox christians, whom the judaizing christians persecuted. By their condemning the just, understand how they proceeded against them under a pretence and colour of law; before they would actually kill, they pretended legally to condemn. Learn thence, That God takes notice not only of the open violence offered to his people, but also of all the injuries done unto them under the form of a legal procedure; it is a mighty provocation when public authority, which is the defence of innocency, is made the pretence of oppression: It follows, Ye have killed the just: This is added to let us know that oppression will proceed as far as death. Wickedness knoweth no bounds; good men are oft-times arraigned, condemned and killed; they fall a sacrifice to the rage of their persecutors and oppressors. It is added, He doth not resist you; which if applied to Christ, points at his meekness; he was slain without resistance; he came to suffer, therefore would not resist. If applied to suffering christians, it points at their weakness and inability to make resistance, as well as at their meekness and patience under sufferings.

7 ¶ Be patient, therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord: Behold, the husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth, and hath long patience for it, until he receive the early and latter, rain. 8 Be ye also patient; establish your hearts; for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh.

Observe here, 1. The duty exhorted to, patience: Be patient, brethren. Patience is a sense of afflictions without murmuring, and of injuries without revenge. It is the duty of christians to be patient under these sufferings, though they be long and sharp. 2. The argument to enforce this duty, The coming of the Lord draweth nigh. This may be understood of Christ's particular coming to judge his murderers at Jerusalem, which was then at hand, or of his general coming to judge the world at the last day. As if our apostle had said, "Have a little patience, and when your Lord cometh, he will put a period to all your afflictions; with desire long for his coming, and yet with patience wait for it." 3. A pattern of patience, propounded in the husbandman, he waiteth, and waiteth long for the time of harvest; and in order thereunto, for the former and latter rain, to prepare the corn for the day of a joyful harvest. Now, in imitation of the husbandman, the patient christian thus argues with himself; "If the husbandman waits with patience for the coming of the harvest, shall not I wait with perseverance for the coming of my Lord? The approach of harvest is precious to him, and shall not the appearance of Christ be so to me? Shall he endure so much for a little corn, and not I much more for an heavenly kingdom?" 4. The direction given in order to the obtaining of this patience and long suffering, establish your arguments; that is, in a firm expectation of Christ's coming, believe that he will come certainly, and may come suddenly, and sooner perhaps than you may apprehend. Learn hence, That it is the duty of christians, in and under their afflictions to establish their hearts in a firm belief of the coming and appearance of Christ, to put a final period to all their sufferings, and to reward their victorious faith and patience.

9 Grudge not one against another, brethren, lest ye be condemned: behold, the judge standeth before the door.

Observe here, 1. A prohibition, Grudge not one against another; that is, do not murmur or repine, groan or grieve, as impatient men use to do under their pressure; complain not of God, because the time of your deliverance is delayed: thirst not after revenge against your persecutors, and envy not those who are exercised with fewer troubles than yourselves: grudge not. 2. The enforcement of this prohibition from the danger of the fact, lest ye be condemned. As if he had said, "Impatience and discontent, envy and distrust, will expose you to greater miseries than you complain of: Your sufferings here are but for your probation, but your grudging and repining will be your condemnation." 3. The anticipation or forestalling of an objection, which some might make? "What! must we suffer, and may we not complain? Must we, by tamely bearing many affronts, invite more, and revenge none?" Yes, says the apostle, be patient, and commit your cause to him that judgeth righteously; for behold the Judge standeth before the door. Where note, 1. A Judge, the supreme and universal Judge, Jesus Christ, who was here judged by the creatures, but now is coming to judge his judges. 2. His posture, He standeth, which is the Judge's posture when he executes judgment. St. Stephen saw Christ standing, Acts vii. 55. at God's right hand; not as an advocate to plead his cause, (Christ is said to sit at God's right hand when he does that) but he stood now as a Judge, to take speedy vengeance on St. Stephen's murderers for that bloody act. 3. The place where the Judge standeth, before the door; that is, he is coming to judgment, and he is just at hand; he has put on his robes, and is ascending his tribunal. Observe, lastly, The note of attention, Behold! this ushers in the whole, Behold the Judge standeth at the door. Learn hence, That the consideration of Christ's near approach to judgment should awe the consciences of men, and mould their conversations into a dutiful compliance with divine commands.

10 Take, my brethren, the prophets, who have spoken in the name of the Lord, for an example of suffering affliction, and of patience.

Here the apostle exhorts suffering Christians to patience, by the example of the Old Testament saints, who were exceeding dear to God, employed in special services for God, yet exercised with long and sharp afflictions from him. Now, their nature was as tender and as frail as ours, and we have the same blessed Spirit to comfort and assist us with them. Note thence, 1. That the examples of excellent persons who have gone in the thorny path of affliction before us, and beaten it for us, are of excellent use to suppress our fears, to support our spirits under all our conflicts, and to rouse our courage in all our encounters. 2. That it is our great duty to eye the encountering examples of those that have trod the path of sufferings before us, and strive to imitate and follow such worthy patterns. The first sufferers had the hardest task; strange and untried torments are most terrible; they knew not the strength of their enemy which they were to engage: but we fight with an enemy that has been often beaten and triumphed over by our brethren that went before us; certainly we that live in these last times have the best helps that ever any had to subdue our fears: Take we then the prophets, and primitive saints, for an example, both of grievous sufferings, and of great patience.

11 Behold, we count them happy which endure.

That is, "All persons do judge and pronounce those that have suffered death, for righteousness sake, to be in a very happy condition; though they live persecuted, yet they die sainted. Living saints are an eye-sore; by the strictness of their lives, and the severity of their reproofs, they torment a wicked world; but dead saints do not stand in the way of their lusts, they will therefore have a good word for the dead saints, whilst they hate and persecute the living.

—Ye have heard of the patience of Job, and have seen the end of the Lord; that the Lord is very pitiful, and of tender mercy.

That is, "Ye have heard how eminent Job was, both for his sufferings and his patience, and you have seen (it is set before your eyes in this story) what an end the Lord made with him, giving him double in this world for what he lost; therefore, though you may be losers for God, yet fear not that you shall be losers by him." Learn hence, 1. That it is good and useful in our afflictions, to propound Job's pattern and example to our own imitation. He was famous for his sufferings, and as famous for his patience: Do you suffer various kinds of affliction? Do you suffer in your body, in your spirit, in your nearest relations, in your dearest of earthly comforts? And under all these do you suffer the heaviest censures for hypocrisy? It is but Job's portion, and if you compare notes, not half of his condition neither: so for his patience, let us propound that for our pattern too, and take this encouragement to do it, namely, that though Job discovered much impatience, cursing the day of his birth, &c. yet that is not here mentioned, but mercifully pitied, and pardoned, and graciously overlooked. Where the heart is upright with God, infirmities are not mentioned by him. 2. That our afflictions ought not so much to be considered in their nature and beginning, as in their issue and end: You have seen the end of the Lord. God gives always a gracious end, and a glorious end, to the afflictions of his people, and sometimes a temporal end also. Job had all these: let us, under the rod, wait upon God with Job's patience, and he will give us Job's end. 3. What an affectionate regard God bears to his children, in and under all their heavy sufferings; he is full of bowels, as the word signifies, truly compassionate, very pitiful, and of tender mercy. As he has pardon for their sins, so he has pity for their afflictions; he is pitiful as well as merciful, yea, very pitiful, and of tender mercy. Observe, lastly, That the book of Job is a real history, not a parable. There was such a man as Job, how else could his patience be propounded as a pattern? And whence is it that we find him numbered with Noah and Daniel? Ezek. xiv. 14. As they were real persons, and truly prevalent in prayer, so was he, Job. xlii. 1c.

12 ¶ But above all things, my brethren, swear not, neither by heaven, neither by the earth, neither by any other oath; but let your yea be yea; and your nay nay; lest ye fall into condemnation.

Observe, That an oath here is not absolutely forbidden, but restrained: Above all things my brethren. Note, With what vehemency and earnestness the apostle speaks, Swear not, that is, swear not vainly and rashly, swear not lightly, and prophanelly, swear not unduly by any of the creatures, (but by the Creator only) which was a sin that the Jews were dreadfully guilty of: But let your yea be yea; and your nay nay: accustom yourselves to a true simplicity and plainness of speech, in affirming or denying, letting oaths alone, lest ye fall into condemnation; that is, plainly, into the condemnation of hell. Learn hence, 1. That rash and vain swearing or prophane oaths, are an high abuse of the dreadful name of God, and a mighty provocation to him: verily there is no sin that doth more weary the patience of God, because there is no sin that doth more banish the fear of God out of our hearts. 2. That the great end of speech being to communicate the sense of our minds to each other, we ought to use such plainness and simplicity in speaking, that we may believe one another without oaths, or more solemn religious asseverations. But yet, 3. To take an oath upon a solemn occasion, when lawfully called thereunto, is a christian and necessary duty.

13 ¶ Is any among you afflicted? let him pray.

Here observe, 1. That affliction is a praying season. Prayer is a duty never out of season, but never more in season than in and under affliction. 2. That though the time of affliction be a special time when a saint prayeth, yet it is not the only time, he prays at all times, because he loves to pray; he prays then, because he especially stands then in need of prayer. A carnal heart has no mind to the duty; he visits not God unless God visits him; but a good man prays continually, prays without ceasing, in health and sickness, in poverty and want; when the candle of the Lord shines about his tabernacle, as well as when he walketh through darkness.

—Is any merry? let him sing psalms.

He that prays, makes music in the ears of God; he that sings psalms, performs a duty suitable to his condition. Several conditions require several duties, and all duties are to be performed suitably to our several conditions. Singing is proper to a prosperous state; both to sing God's praises, and to sing to his praise; prayer is proper to an afflicted condition; it is our best remedy, -because it leads us to God our best refuge: therefore, if any be afflicted, let him pray to God to alleviate and sanctify his affliction. Is any merry? let him sing psalms of praise to that God who hath given him this cheerfulness of spirit.

14 Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him,—

Some observe, 1. That St. James doth not say, "Is any man sick? let him pray;" but let him send for others to pray with him, and for him; plainly supposing that the sick man is very unfit to pray himself, or to pray for himself; in other afflictions let him pray, but in sickness let others pray for him, he having enough to do to grapple with his grief, and to conflict with his affliction: a diseased body unfit for holy duties. Yet, 2. It is one thing to want an heart in sickness to pray for ourselves, and another thing to want ability to pray for ourselves. Many desire the prayers of others in sickness, who wanted hearts to pray for themselves in health. This is a sad symptom that the soul is as sick, yea, more dangerously sick than the body. Add to this, that the prayers of others are very rarely beneficial to us, unless we pray, or have a desire to pray, for ourselves, 3. The sick man's duty, not only to desire prayer, but to send to the elders of the church to pray for him, and with him, Quest. But if the sick neglect to send, may the minister neglect to go, if he knows of the sickness? Doubtless we ought to go, if we know of it, whether they send or not, for they want our prayers and help most when they desire it least; and by refusing to go, we may lose the last, and perhaps the best opportunity of doing good unto them. If our people, through stupidity and insensibleness, omit their duty in sending for us, God forbid, that, either through pride or sluggishness, we should neglect our duty in going to them; too, too often we never hear our people are sick, till the bell tells us they are dead: if therefore by any means we gain the knowledge of their condition condition, let us apply ourselves with all our might to their consciences, lest God be more angry with us for not going to them, than with them for not sending for us, imitating our Lord, who was found of them that sought him not. Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the church; and let them pray over him.

—Anointing them with oil in the name of the Lord:

Some make this anointing with oil to be a medicinal practice among the Jews, and that they administered it physically: but why then must the elders administer it? The physician might have done it as well as they. True, but the elders are sent for, that they, applying this corporal remedy, might join with it spiritual physic, or prayer, good admonition and comfort. As if a sick person should send for the minister at his taking of physic, that he might then pray with him, counsel, and comfort him. Others make this anointing with oil a religious act. Christ empowered his apostles to work miracles, and, amongst others, they had the gift of healing the sick, whom they anointed in the name of the Lord, or by the authority of the Lord; but the gospel being sufficiently confirmed, this gift of healing is ceased, and therewith the rite of anointing; therefore the church of Rome keep up an idle ceremony in anointing the sick, unless they had a miraculous power to heal the sick: to keep up the rite, unless they could produce the effect; to pretend to the anointing, without the power of healing, is a mere piece of pageantry; besides, they anoint those that are given over for dead, and the apostle's anointing was for the benefit of the living, as appears by the following verse.

15 And the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up;—

Here our apostle shews the good effects of this anointing and praying: yet note, that he ascribes the sick man's recovery, not to the oil, but to the prayer: the prayer of faith shall save the sick. The moral means is taken notice of before the ritual and ceremonial: the prayer of faith shall save the sick. There was required to the miracle faith, both in the elder, and in the sick person, to save, that is, to recover the sick; yet mark, it is said, the Lord shall raise him up, to note, that the efficacy of faith lies in the object of faith; it is not faith properly, but God called upon in faith that saveth the sick; the efficacy of faith is not from its own merit, but from God's power and grace.

—And if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him.

If he has committed sins: why, is there any question to be made of that? No; but if he has committed such sins as brought this sickness upon him, they shall be forgiven him, upon this prayer of faith; if any special or particular sin has drawn down this disease upon him, it shall be remitted, and the disease removed; where the sickness is by way of chastisement, the healing is a testimony of God's forgiveness. Learn hence, how absurd is the popish sacrament of extreme unction; how can they gather a perpetual ordinance from an action that was extraordinary and miraculous, and long since ceased? Or apply a sacrament to dying persons, from a rite used upon persons who were not to die, but to be raised from sickness? Or how can they promise to him forgiveness of sins, to whom they cannot promise that recovery which was the token of it.

16 Confess your faults one to another, and pray one for another, that ye may be healed.—

Note here, 1. That there is a time and season when it is our duty to confess our sins, not only to God, but to one another, to a pious and prudent minister, to an injured and wronged neighbour, to those that have been tempted by us, and have consented with us in sinning. 2. How absurdly the papists ground their practice of auricular confession upon this text, here is not one word spoken of a priest, nor of our confessing to him; and if so, the text proves it the priest's duty to confess to the people, as much as the people's to confess to the priest, for the duty required is mutual, confess one to another: accordingly the words are generally understood of confessing private injuries one to another; that the sick person must reconcile himself to his neighbour as well as to God, that he may recover; for so it follows, pray for one another, that ye may be healed; intimating, that it is the duty of christians to confess their mistriages and private injuries one to another, and by their prayers to succour, help, and relieve each other; it is the duty of the strong to pray for the weak, and the strong may be strengthened by the prayers of the weak.

—The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much.

Observe here, 1. The qualification of that prayer, which at that time was effectual for the recovery of the sick person in a miraculous manner, it may be rendered an inspired prayer; as they that were acted by the evil spirits, so such as were moved by the impulses of the Holy Spirit, were called Evangelists, in a good sense, the phrase properly signifies a prayer inwardly wrought and excited, and implies the efficacious influence of the Holy Spirit, and the force and vehemency of a christian's spirit and affection exerted and put forth in the duty; in wrought prayer, or prayer that works in and upon our hearts, has a mighty prevalency with God. 2. The qualification of the person praying a righteous man, not legally righteous, one in a state of sinless perfection, but a person justified by faith, and whose faith is fruitful in good works. 3. The prevalency and efficacy of such a person's prayer; it availeth much; he doth not say how much, that is better experienced than expressed; it availeth much for ourselves, sometimes more for others than for ourselves. Note, That the fervent prayers and intercessions of the righteous have a mighty prevalency with God, both for themselves and others.

17 Elias was a man subject to like passions as we are, and he prayed earnestly that it might not rain; and it rained not on the earth by the space of three years and six months. 18 And he prayed again, and the heaven gave rain, and the earth brought forth her fruit.

Our apostle in these words proves the general proposition he had laid down, that the fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much, by a particular instance, the example of Elias: who seemed to carry the keys of heaven at his girdle, to shut and open heaven at his pleasure, 1 Kings xvii. 1. As the Lord liveth, there shall not be dew nor rain, but according to my word: The apostle here tells us what word this was, namely, a word of prayer, and not a word of command: Elias prayed, and the heaven gave rain: he prayed in prayer, so the original: that is, he prayed with faith and fervency, according to the will of God revealed to him; and though he was a man subject to the common infirmities of human nature with ourselves, yet his passions did not hinder the prevalency of his prayers; nothing has wrought such wonderful effects in the world as prayer; it made the sun stand still in heaven; it brought fire out of heaven, 2 Kings i. 10. and here it shut up the windows of heaven, that it rained not for the space of three years and six months: It has a divine kind of omnipotency in it.

19 Brethren, if any of you do err from the truth, and one convert him; 20 Let him know, that he which converteth the sinner from the error of his way, shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins.

Our apostle concludes his epistle with an exhortation to the duty of fraternal corruption and christian admonition: "If, says he, any one among you, who hath made an outward profession of christianity, shall, for fear of persecution, or otherwise, turn aside from the rule of the gospel, whether in matters of faith or practice, such a person, either minister or private christian, as shall be instrumental, by prayer, reproof, or counsel, to recover him out of that wandering and backsliding condition, shall have the honour to save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins; that is, he shall be a means of bringing him to a light of his sins, and to seek pardon for them, which is the only true and happy way of hiding and of covering them. Learn hence, 1. It is not sufficient that every one takes care of his own soul, but he must also watch over the souls of others; there is no brother so mean in the christian church, but the care of his salvation belongeth to all in the christian communion. Learn, 2. What great honour God puts upon the creature, in calling him a saviour to a restored and converted brother, he shall save a soul from death: but when God puts the glory of his own work upon the head of the creature, what cause has he to lay the crown of his excellency at the foot of God? When the honour of the supreme Cause is put upon the instrument, the instrument ought to ascribe all the efficacy and efficiency to the first Cause, saying, Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but to thy name be the praise. Amen.

ST. PETER.

The writer of this and the following epistle was St. Peter, who styles himself an apostle of Jesus Christ, not the Universal bishop and head of the church; no where do we find this holy and humble apostle assuming, though we often find the apostate church of Rome giving him an uncontrollable monarchy, and sovereign dominion, over the whole church of Christ, and over the apostles themselves, and their successors: and accordingly to interpret those words of our Saviour to St. Peter, St. John xxi. Pasce oves, Feed my sheep, in such a rampant sense as they have done, could never with any confidence have been offered to the reason of mankind, had not these men subdued their reason to their interest, and subjected both to an implicit faith and blind obedience. Saint Peter, being the apostle of the circumcision, writes this epistle to the believing Jews, and profelyted Gentiles, who were of the dispersion, scattered abroad in divers countries, of whom he had an especial charge, and of whose conversion he had been a principal instrument.

The design of the epistle is to confirm them in the christian religion, to encourage them to constancy under the sharpest persecutions and fiery trials for the same, and to excite them to the practice of particular duties incumbent upon them in every capacity and relation in which they stood, beautifying and adorning their holy profession by an holy and becoming conversation. And accordingly thus he writes unto them;

C H A P. I.

PETER an apostle of Jesus Christ, to the strangers scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, Elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, through sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience, and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ. Grace unto you and peace be multiplied.

Observe here, 1. The penman of this epistle described by his name, Peter; by his office an apostle; by the author of his office, Jesus Christ. This name Peter was given him by our Saviour, and signifieth a stone, a rock, probably for his confession and acknowledgment of Christ, the Rock upon whom the Christian Church was built; his call to the office, first of a disciple, and then of an apostle, was from Christ himself. It is a singular support to the ministers of the gospel of Christ, under all their discouragements, to consider whose officers they are, and from whom they have both their mission and their message, their authority, and their abilities for the sacred function: Peter an apostle of Jesus Christ. 2. The persons to whom the epistle is directed, to the strangers scattered abroad in Pontus, Galatia, &c. that is, to such of the converted Jews and proselyted Gentiles as were dispersed into several countries, exiled and banished from house and home, for the sake of Christ and his holy religion, which they made a faithful profession of. Learn hence, That a state of exile and banishment from outward comforts and privileges, has been, and may be the lot and portion of a people that are exceeding dear to Almighty God. 3. How he comforts them in this their persecuted condition, by declaring to them the great things which God had done for them in their election, vocation, and sanctification; assuring them that God had chosen them out of the world according to his foreknowledge and unsearchable counsel, and effectually called them to the participation of his grace, sanctifying them by his Spirit, that they should obey the truth, and by faith be sprinkled with the blood of Christ, and thereby be brought into a state of perfect peace and reconciliation with God. Learn hence, 1. That God has certainly chosen some to eternal salvation. 2. That such as are chosen to happiness as the end, are also chosen to holiness as the mean: Elect through sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience: sanctification is the fruit of our election, and obedience the end of our sanctification. 3. That sanctification and justification always accompany one another; here is sanctification and sprinkling with the blood of Christ joined together; where note, Christ, as mediator, has blood, his blood was shed, his blood that was shed must be sprinkled, and by faith applied; and we can never discern our interest in the blood of Christ, till we are sanctified by the Spirit of Christ, and our hearts and lives wrought unto obedience. Justification and sanctification, though distinct in their nature, yet are inseparable in their subject. Observe, lastly, The salutation here sent to these dispersed saints, Grace and peace be multiplied. Where note, 1. The connection, grace and peace. 2. The order, first grace, and then peace. 3. The option, be multiplied. The blessings prayed for, are the choicest, the sweetest, and the best of blessings; grace and peace: together with the augmentation, and abundant increase of both, Grace and peace be multiplied. Learn, That there is nothing that the ministers of Christ do more passionately desire, and more earnestly endeavour, than to see their people brought into, and preserved in a state of favour and peace with God, and enjoying a multiplied increase of all spiritual and temporal blessings from him.

3 Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which, according to his abundant mercy, hath begotten us again unto a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, 4 To an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you.

Observe here, 1. How our apostle breaks forth into gratitude and thankfulness to God, for those special blessings, which, by his ministry, were conferred upon these converted christians, Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. Blessing and praise are due to God for the least mercies received from God, because we are less than the least, much more for spiritual and eternal blessings, which are the greatest mercies that either God can give, or we receive. 2 The special mercy which he thus solemnly blesses, and gives thanks to God for, namely, their regeneration: For begetting them to a lively hope, by the resurrection of Christ, &c. Where note, 1. The benefit declared, they were begotten again to an hope of salvation; by means of sin, all influences of grace were suspended, and all hopes of salvation were cut off. Christ's interposure for us makes our condition hopeful, and the fallen angels hopeless. 2. The qualification of that hope which christians are begotten to, it is a lively hope, in opposition to a dead hope, and to a languid and languishing hope; the christian's hope is an effectual hope, which proceeds from faith, and promotes holiness. A lively hope is an hope that makes us lively, joyful, and comfortable in our lives; an hope that puts life into us. 3. The means whereby we are begotten to this hope, and that is, by the resurrection of Christ from the dead; not by the bare act of his resurrection, but by the virtue and power of it, we are raised to a spiritual life by it, and our hopes of eternal life are thereby strengthened and confirmed. The justification of our persons, the regeneration of our natures, the resurrection of our bodies, the glorification of our souls and bodies, are singular fruits and benefits of Christ's resurrection. Well might the apostle then say, that we are begotten to a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead. Note, 4. The moving and impulsive cause from which regeneration, and all other spiritual blessings, do proceed and flow; the mercy and goodness of God. According to his abundant mercy he has begotten us again. In the matters of salvation nothing is owing to our merit; for demerit cannot merit, but all is due to divine goodness, and undeserved mercy; this is the fountal cause of all our favours. 5. The nature of that happiness which believers are begotten to a lively hope and expectation of; it is here styled an inheritance. Heaven is an inheritance, and as such it is given to children, to all God's children, to none but his children; it is an inheritance, ritance dearly purchased, yet freely given: Christ is the sole purchaser of it; no joint-purchasers with him; the saints are called joint-heirs with Christ, but never joint-purchasers: yet remember, that though we cannot purchase this inheritance in a way of merit, we may forfeit it by our demerit, and provoke our heavenly Father to disinherit us.

6. The properties and excellencies of this inheritance which believers are raised by Christ to the expectation of; it is an inheritance incorruptible, an enduring possession; not subject to decay, having nothing in it that can corrupt it, or corrupt us in the enjoyment of it. Undeiled, heaven is an holy habitation; the holiness of heaven is the most considerable part of its happiness: sinners therefore that despise holiness, despise the richest jewel in the crown of glory. It fadeth not away, it withereth not; glory is a flower which will eternally retain its freshness and verdure. Reserved in the heavens for us: heaven is the country where the saints inheritance lies: here it is reserved or laid up safe, by the purpose and pleasure of God, by the purchase, possession, and intercession of Christ; and to be able to say [for us] and be particularly assured of heaven, is a special comfort.

5 Who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time.

Here our apostle seems to pre-occupate and prevent an objection. Some might say, "Though the saints inheritance be safe in heaven, yet they are in danger here on earth;" be it so, as if our apostle had said, yet they are and shall be kept by God's power, and their own faith to eternal salvation. Note here, 1. We are kept: it implies we are in danger, in great danger of missing salvation, by reason of the number, power, and policy of our spiritual enemies, corruption and sin within, the devil and the world without; but we are kept as in a garrison; so the word signifies: saints are preserved like besieged cities; the general whom they fight under: and hold out for, preserves them, by sending in fresh recruits, supplies from the Holy Spirit, and by cutting off such succours, as our lusts and spiritual enemies would send forth against us, so that they starve, and shall not vanquish us, but we them. We are kept: eternal thanks for such a keeper! 2. What it is believers are kept and preserved to, namely, salvation: he does not say they are or shall be kept from trouble and affliction; that their sinners shall not ake in this world; he has made no such promise, and we must expect no such preservation, but the contrary; in the world ye shall have tribulation, says Christ the Captain of our salvation, John xvi. but safety and rest, happiness and ease, shall be our portion in the coming world. 3. The means by which we are thus kept unto salvation. (1.) On God's part, almighty power. If left one moment to ourselves, we become a prey to every temptation. How did the devil baffle and besool Adam in innocency, when he had his wits about him, by being left in the hand of his own counsels? Lord, in a worse hand thou canst not leave us than our own. (2.) On our part we are kept through faith. Our own endeavour must accompany God's power, in order to our preservation. We are kept by the power of God through faith; by both jointly, by neither singly. God's power will not keep us without our care, neither can our care secure us without the help of his power. We and our faith must be kept by the power of God; what God does for us, he does by us; he requires the use of our faculties, and the concurrence of our own endeavours in order to our salvation. Note, 4. The time when the saints complete salvation shall be revealed to them and they have the full and final fruition of that—Ready to be revealed in the last time. Mark, The saints salvation in heaven is a mystery, an hidden mystery, not yet revealed; revealed only to saints on earth by faith, to saints in heaven by sight; but the full revelation is not to be expected and enjoyed by glorified saints before the day of judgment, called here, the last time. Our apostle told us, ver. 4. it was reserved in heaven for us, kept safe for us, but kept close in heaven, it is an inestimable rich treasure; they that are heirs of it on earth, yea, they that are possessed of it in heaven, do not as yet fully understand and know the transcendency of it, but it shall be revealed to them at the last day.

6 Wherein ye greatly rejoice, though now for a season, (if need be) ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations: 7 That the trial of your faith being much more precious than of gold that perissheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise, and honour, and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ.

Wherein ye greatly rejoice: that is, in the belief and expectation of which glorious and incorruptible inheritance in heaven, ye now joy and rejoice here on earth; plainly intimating, that a believer may be assured of his title to the glorious inheritance above, and both may and ought to rejoice in it abundantly below. Observe farther, By what way and method God brings his people to heaven, it is by heaviness, by afflictions, yea, by manifold afflictions. As if he had said, "You that are the present candidates for heaven, the heirs of salvation, must not think yourselves past the rod and the fernla; and that you are to expect nothing but comfort, and to do nothing but rejoice in the hopes of your salvation. But I tell you, you may have need of heaviness before you get to heaven, and of manifold temptations for the mortifying your corruptions, before you enter upon an inheritance incorruptible." Observe, 2. The supposition made concerning the necessity of a believer's afflictions, If need be: intimating, 1. That we should never feel any affliction from the hand of God, never be in heaviness, if there were not need. And, 2. That there is need that the holiest in this world should sometimes be made heavy, and that heaviness should be upon them for a season. We should always have calms and fair weather; never any storms or tempests from God, did not our needs call for it. As we need our daily bread, so verily do we need a daily rod; both the rod of God's mouth to admonish and his hand to chasten and correct us: Ye are in heaviness for a season, &c. Hence learn, That the trials and afflictions which God exercises his children with, are many, yet they never feel them but when they need them, and then only for a season. As the coldness of the winter kills the weeds in our grounds, so the cold blasts of affliction (under the mortifying influences of the Holy Spirit) kill our corruptions in our souls. Perpetual shinings and fair seasonings, are reserved for heaven; cold blasts, and nipping frosts, are needful and useful here on earth: Ye are in heaviness for a season, if need be. Learn farther, That as God doth not afflict us, but when there is need, so he will not afflict us more than there is need. Ye are in heaviness for a season; we shall not be afflicted an hour longer, nor shall our cross be a drachm or a grain heavier than God thinks needful. 3. The happy effect and fruit of the saints manifold temptations: they all work for their advantage; they receive good, and not hurt by them; no more hurt than the gold receives by the fire: That the trial of your faith; that is, that your tried faith, being more precious than gold. Faith is more precious than gold, because more pure, more durable, especially when purified in the furnace of affliction. A good man is no loser, but a great gainer by being tried. He, who before had much dross in him, comes out of the furnace as gold, without losing any thing either of its weight or worth; nothing is consumed but the dross and rubbish of his corruptions. O happy consumption! Grace is not only grace still, but more gracious, yea, glorious after trial. Observe lastly, That faith must be tried on earth, before it be crowned in heaven; and after it is tried, it shall certainly be crowned, and found unto praise, honour, and glory, at the appearing of Jesus Christ. Learn hence, That the trial of a christian's faith in their manifold afflictions and temptations now, will bring abundance of honour and glory to God in the day of Christ; yea, not only to God, but to ourselves.

8 Whom having not seen, ye love: in whom though now ye see him not, yet believing, ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory:

In these words our apostle commendeth the faith and love of those Jews to whom he wrote; that although they had never seen Christ in the flesh, as others did, yet they did truly love him, and their faith caused them to triumph and rejoice in him. Learn hence, That it is the property and practice of a believer to love an unseen Saviour, and to rejoice in him, and in the hopes of eternal life by him. Inference, if such as never saw Christ but with a believing eye, do yet love him superlatively, and rejoice in him unspeakably, how will they love him, and rejoice in him, who shall see him with a glorified eye, and behold him face to face.

9 Receiving the end of your faith, even the salvation of your souls. 10 ¶ of which salvation the prophets have enquired and searched diligently, who prophesied of the grace that should come unto you: 11 searching what or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow. 12 Unto whom it was revealed, that not unto themselves, but unto us they did minister the things which are now reported unto you, by them that have preached the gospel unto you, with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven: which things the angels desire to look into.

Observe here, 1. The end, that is, the reward of a christian's faith, it is the salvation of his soul; of his soul eminently, but not exclusively of body and soul both. The complete salvation of soul and body both with Christ in heaven, shall be the end and reward of the believers faith. 2. The diligent search into, and enquiry after the nature of this salvation, which was made by the prophets of the Old Testament: Of which salvation the prophets have enquired, and searched diligently: that is, by prayer, meditation, and study, they searched after the farther and clearer knowledge of this great salvation, and the kingdom of the Messiah, when should be the time of his sufferings and humiliation, which were to precede his glory and exaltation. 3. The success of this their enquiry and search, they were answered by God, and received this revelation from him, that they themselves were not the men that should see the Messiah, and his special kingdom; and that the things which they prophesied of, were not to be fulfilled in their own times, but in after times; and accordingly the things foretold by the prophets he assures them, were clearly manifested to them by the apostles, which were endued with an extraordinary measure of the Holy Spirit, sent down upon them at the day of Pentecost: Unto whom it was revealed, that not unto themselves, &c. Observe lastly, The sublimity, and transcendent excellency of those Gospel-mysteries which are now revealed; they are so ravishing and transporting, that the holy angels desire to pry into them, Which things the angels desire to look into. Learn, thence, That the glorious mystery of man's redemption and salvation, by the incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ, is an object worthy of the admiration and contemplation of the adoring angels. They admire the person of the redeemer, they admire the author and contriver of the work of redemption, they admire the subjects redeemed, they admire the manner and method of our redemption, they admire the finally glorious state which the redeemed are brought into, and possessed of, and they pry into these things, as the cherubims looked upon the ark, with a curious and accurate inspection, with an earnest and affectionate inspection; they holily admire the wisdom of this glorious contrivance, though even their raised and enlarged capacities can never be able fully to comprehend it.

13 ¶ Wherefore gird up the loins of your mind, be sober, and hope to the end for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ;

Our apostle, having laid before them their high and glorious privileges in the foregoing verses, comes now to excite them to the practice of several needful and important duties in this and the following verses: the first of which is vigilance and watchfulness; preparation and readiness of mind; Gird up the loins of your mind; an allusion both to runners and waiters; to such as run in a race, and to such as wait upon their master; who both gird up their clothes (which in those eastern countries they wore down to their heels) that they might not hinder or trouble them, either in running or waiting. Next, to be sober, and keep up their hopes steadfastly and perseveringly to the end, for that grace and salvation, for that perfection in holiness and glory, which God will certainly give us at the glorious appearing of Jesus Christ. Here note, 1. The grace and duty which they are exhorted to be found in the exercise of, and that is, hope, to persevere in hope unto the end: that is a divine grace, and necessary duty, whereby a believer for Christ's sake expects and waits for all the great and good things which God has promised, but the christian at present not received. 2. The direction given in order to the exercise of this grace and duty of hope, Gird up the loins of your mind. Habits of grace are altogether unprofitable to us, without they be excited by us, and stirred up in us. When we pray, when we hear, we must gird up our loins in praying and hearing: or, in the prophet's phrase, Stir up yourselves to take hold on God. A man upon his sick-bed must gird up the loins of his mind to hear his affliction, else he will never profit by it, nor answer the end of God in it. No grace can be exercised, no duty can be performed by a soul ungirded: Gird up the loins of your mind, &c.

14 As obedient children, not fashioning yourselves according to the former lusts in your ignorance: 15 But as he which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation; 16 Because it is written, Be ye holy, for I am holy.

The next duty he exhorts them to, is to answer the engagements which their adoption laid them under: they were now the children of God, and as such must, 1. Be obedient to their heavenly Father, walking in the path of his commandments, and no longer according to the former lusts, which they were captivated by, and enslaved unto, in the time of their ignorance, when they knew not God. And, 2. They must imitate their heavenly Father in the love and practice of universal holiness: As he which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy. Observe, 1. Christians must make God the pattern of their holiness, and be holy as God is holy, though not as holy as God is; the command obliges to a conformity, not to an equality; as God is really holy, positively holy, strictly and exactly holy, universally holy, unchangeable holy, so must we labour to be holy towards God and man, which is to be holy in all manner of conversation. 2. Christians are here required not only to make God the pattern of their holiness, but the motive of their holiness, be ye holy for I am holy. Seeing our God is an holy God, therefore we that are his people must be holy also. Our apostle here represents the holiness of God both as a rule and as a motive of that holiness which should be acted by us. And whereas the apostle says, It is written, be ye holy: It plainly intimates, that God has in all former ages, obliged all persons who pretend any relation to him as his children, to be holy as he is holy; though not as to equality, yet as to imitation; though not in measure and degree, yet in quality and kind. God is the original of all holiness, and the first man he created was after his own likeness; and every one that is renewed, is said to be created after God in righteousness and true holiness. What is godliness but God's likeness? And what is holiness, but the conformity of our natures to the holy nature of God, and the conformity of our lives to the will of God?

17 And if ye call on the Father, who without respect of persons judgeth according to every man's work, pass the time of your sojourning here in fear:

If ye call on the Father: that is, if ye call God your Father, and call upon him by worshipping and owning of him, who without any respect of persons, or any regard had to nations, Jew or Gentile, judgeth of every man now, and will judge every man according to his works hereafter, see that you pass the time of your pilgrimage and sojourning in this world, in holy and obedient fear. Learn, 1. That such as call God Father, ought to walk in obedience before him as his sons. 2. That he whom we call Father, is and will be our Judge; not a short-sighted, but a sharp-sighted Judge; impartial in judgement, judging all persons according to their works, and judging all works as they really are, and not as they outwardly appear to be. 3. That christians here in this world are but strangers, and their life upon earth a pilgrimage, which they are daily passing. 4. That the whole time of a christian's pilgrimage ought to be passed in an holy, cautious, reverential, and obedient fear of God.

18 Forasmuch as ye know that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold, from your vain conversation received by tradition from your fathers; 19 But with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish, and without spot. 20 Who verily was fore-ordained before the foundation of the world, but was manifest in these last times for you; 21 Who by him do believe in God that raised him up from the dead, and gave him glory, that your faith and hope might be in God.

Still our apostle is pressing christians to the love and practice of holiness, and a reverential fear of God, by fresh arguments and motives, particularly from their redemption; saying, that they could not but be sensible that they were redeemed with a very costly price, not with silver and gold, which yet would ransom kings, but by the precious blood of Christ, whom the paschal lamb typified, and who was from eternity fore-ordained to the office of a Mediator, though he was not manifested in the flesh till these last days, for the good and benefit of those who by him do believe in God that raised Christ from the dead, and gloriously exalted him at his right hand, upon which account their faith and hope may safely and comfortably rest in God. Note, 1. The thralldom, bondage, and slavery of our sinful state before we were redeemed. 2. The impotency and inability of all outward things, be they never so rich, precious, and costly, to redeem and ransom an enslaved sinner. All the gold and silver in the world was no ransom for one soul, nay, the blood of all the creatures in the world offered up in sacrifice to the justice of God, could have been no sufficient compensation. 3. That the redemption of every soul cost no less than the precious blood of the Son of God, that spotless Lamb, who, by the sacrifice of his death, atoned divine displeasure. Note, 4. That God the Father fore-ordained Jesus Christ his Son to this blessed office of a Redeemer before the foundation of the world, though though he was not manifest in the flesh till these last times. 5. That by Christ the Redeemer we are taught to know God, and to believe in him who raised Christ from the dead. Here observe, How the Socinians wrest and misapply this text, where we are said by Christ to believe in God. Thus they argue, "He by whom we believe in God, is not that God in whom we believe, because the means of faith can never be the object of faith; but Christ is he: the apostle says here by whom we believe in God, therefore Christ is not God." Answ. Christ considered in his human nature, in which he died, and was raised for us, is he by whom we believe in God, that is, own him to be able to raise us from the dead; but this hinders not his being God according to his divine nature, by which he did actually raise himself from the dead, John x. 18.

22 Seeing ye have purified your souls in obeying the truth through the Spirit, unto unfeign love of the brethren; see that ye love one another with a pure heart fervently: 23 Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth for ever.

The next duty which our apostle exhorts these christians to, is the duty of brotherly love, to a gracious propensity of heart which a christian bears for Christ's sake to his neighbour, whereby he wills, and to his power procures all good for him, a brotherly affection, which every true christian chiefly bears to all his fellow-members in Christ for grace's sake. This duty of brotherly love is often urged and enforced by Christ and his apostles. St. Peter here tells them, that seeing by the power of Christ's Spirit, and the obedience of the gospel, they had purified themselves in some measure from pride and self-love, they should now labour to grow in the fervency and sincerity of their love one towards another. And the argument he uses to persuade them to love one another, is drawn from their relation to each other; they are all born again, and born alike; not brethren by corruptible generation only, but begotten of incorruptible seed, the word of God; therefore should they live in love together, as children of the same Father. Note here, The commendation given to the word of God, not to any inward word infused, but to the outward word preached, it is styled incorruptible seed; from whence it follows, that the ministry of the word is the ordinary mean of the new-birth, and the instrumental cause of our regeneration. Note farther, That such as are born of this incorruptible seed, ought to bear an incorruptible love to each other, as an evidence of their incorruptible and gracious nature: See that you love one another, &c.

24 For all flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass. The grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away:

Our apostle closes the chapter, by setting before them the excellency of their spiritual regenerate state, compared with all other excellencies and endowments whatsoever: all flesh, that is, flesh with all its glory, is a fading, dying, perishing thing; it flags like the grass, and fades like the flower. There are three excellencies in a flower; sweetness, which affects the smell; beauty that affects the eye; softness and smoothness, which affects the touch: all these our apostle passes over, and speaks of the flower; not as flourishing, but as withering; not as springing up, but as falling away. Learn hence, That man when most flourishing, with all the ornaments of wit and wealth, beauty and honour, is fading, and near to withering. Thus David describes him, Psal. ciii. 15, 16. As for man his days are as grass; as the flower of the field, so he flourisheth; the wind passes over it, and it is gone. Though the flower be neither cut nor crot, yet a breath of wind blasts it, and blows away the beauty of it: All flesh is as grass, &c.

25 But the word of the Lord endureth for ever. And this is the word which by the gospel is preached unto you.

That is, the word of God, the mind of Christ, contained in, and revealed by the gospel, shall abide and last for ever, and never be abrogated; the word of God is everlasting truth, it is so in its nature, and also in its effects upon the regenerate, it abideth for ever, and so doth their estate who are begotten again by it: The word of God is the incorruptible seed, or principle of regeneration: It is called the word of eternal life, because it brings those that love and obey it to eternal life, John vi. 68. Observe lastly, That the same word of God is now preached unto us which was so highly commended by the prophets, apostles, and by Christ himself: This is the word, &c.

CH A P. II.

Our apostle in this chapter, gives several directions for our profitable hearing and receiving of the word of God; which having compared to milk, he shews how, and after what manner, it should be desired, tasted, and digested by us, that we may grow thereby.

WHEREFORE laying aside all malice, and all guile, and hypocrisies, and envies, and all evil-speakings,

Here we are first directed what to lay aside, in order to our fruitful and profitable entertainment of the word of God, namely, these five sins, malice, guile, hypocrisy, envy, and evil-speaking. Whence note in general, That any sin, much more if many sins be kept close, and lie dormant within us, they will certainly hinder the efficacy of the word upon us. As the foulness of the stomach hinders the natural digestion, till it be purged out nothing can nourish within: In like manner, our apostle here advises to purge out these pestilent lusts of malice and guile, of hypocrisy and envy, &c. before we hear the word of God, if ever we expect to be nourished with it, and grow thereby. As sin hinders good from coming to us, so it hinders the word from working good in us, particularly malice, or inveterate anger harboured in the heart; guile, or deceit in words or actions; hypocrisy, or an appearance of friendship, when the heart is otherwise affected; envy, or grieving at another's good; and evil-speaking of all kinds, by lying, by slandering, by back-biting, by detracting, all which are contrary to the

the great command of love, and obstructive of the word of truth, by which we are born again ; but it is observable, particularly, concerning malice, and guile, and evil-speaking, that our apostle puts the note of universality to them, lay aside all malice, and all guile, and all evil-speaking ; importing, that though some other sins will stick close unto us, yet not a jot of malice or guile should be found in us, at least prevailing in us, of any kind, or in any degree or measure, for one drop of this deadly poison may destroy us : therefore lay aside all malice, and all guile, &c.

2 As new-born babes, desire the sincere milk of the word that ye may grow thereby.

St. Peter having directed us, in our preparation before we come to hear the word, and shewn the necessity of laying aside an evil frame of spirit, he now directs us what we are to do when under the word, namely, that there be found with us a spiritual appetite to it, and that we have the same longing desires after it that the child has after the breast : As new-born babes desire the sincere milk, so desire you the incorrupted word of God, that you may grow thereby. Quest. How does the new-born infant desire its natural nourishment, its mother's milk ? Answ. These four ways : First it covets it with vehement and impatient desire, nothing will so well satisfy and please it as the breast, this will quiet it when nothing else will ; thus the new born christian hungers after the word with a vehement desire, nothing will content and satisfy him, neither gold, nor silver, in the absence of the word of God. Secondly, The new born infant desires the milk from a deep sense of its inward wants, it is pinched with hunger, and parched with thirst, and therefore cries for the breast ; so is the christian sensible of his wants, of his want of knowledge, want of grace ; " It is little says he, that I know of myself, less of God, least of Jesus Christ : Oh ! that by conversing with his word, I might know him more, and serve him better." Thirdly, The infant desires its mother's milk unmixed, as nature has prepared it without any artificial sweetening of it. Some little regard the wholesomeness of the food, but only admire the dexterity of the cook : They applaud the parts of the preacher, when the word flows from the golden mouth of a celebrated orator ; but the new-born christian desires the sincere milk of the word, without any composition of error and without any such mixture of wit and eloquence as is inconsistent with the gravity and simplicity of the word they hear. Plain truths, without art or varnish, may be conveyed with more warmth and vigour to the conscience, than all the charms of human eloquence from the most fluent and popular tongue, yet always remembering, that though the ministers of God must come in plainness, yet not in rudeness of speech. Fourthly, This desire of the babe after the sincere, unmixed, and uncompounded milk, is always accompanied with endeavour, it hunts for the breast, and is not satisfied that the breast is in its eye, but is impatient till it sucks and draws, that nourishment may be conveyed, and it grow thereby : Thus active and operative are the desires and endeavours of a sincere christian after the word of God ; that which was seed to beget, they find food to strengthen, they can never be satisfied without it, they cannot be satisfied with a little of it.

3 If so be ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious

In these words our apostle declares the condition whereon our profiting, growing, and thriving by the word doth depend, namely, upon our tasting and experiencing its power, as it is the great instrumental cause both of our spiritual birth and growth. This taste is a spiritual sense of the goodness, power, and efficacy of the word, in conveying the grace of God unto our souls ; in a taste there is sweetness and refreshment, but not fulness and satisfaction. Learn hence. 1. That God doth graciously sweeten the word to such a soul as doth desire sincerely to taste the sweetness of it. 2. That it is but a taste of the sweetness of God and his word, which a christian partakes of in this life, satiety and satisfaction are reserved for another state.

4 To whom coming, as unto a living stone, disallowed indeed of men, but chosen of God, and precious. 5 Ye also, as lively stones are built up a spiritual house, an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ. 6 Wherefore also it is contained in the scripture, Behold, I lay in Sion a chief corner-stone, elect, precious : and he that believeth on him shall not be confounded.

Observe here. 1. The denomination, or title given to Christ, he is stiled a living stone, and the chief corner-stone. 1. A living-stone, that is, a lively stone, no dead foundation, and a life-giving stone, having not only life in himself essentially, but communicatively, imparting spiritual life to the whole building. Christ is not only an Head of authority, but an Head of vital influence to all his members ; because he lives, they shall live also. 2. He is stiled also the chief corner-stone, both in regard of sustentation ; the corner-stone supports the whole building, the church's grace, the church's peace, the church's consolation, the church's salvation, are all upheld and maintained by him : And in regard of union, the corner-stone unites, ties, and knits the other stones together, that they should not drop out of the building. Christ alone unites the several stones of the spiritual building to himself, and one to another. And this corner-stone is of God's own immediate laying, Behold, I lay in Sion a corner-stone. Christ was first manifested and offered to the church of the Jews, and then to the rest of the world. Observe. 2. The rules given to believers. (1.) They of lively stones are built a spiritual house. Believers are God's temple, dedicated to, and set apart for his special service, and also enjoying his gracious and special presence. " This is my rest forever, says God concerning the believer's heart ; here will I dwell, for I have delight therein." (2.) They are an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable through Christ. Learn hence, That every christian in this life is a priest, and ought to offer up himself a spiritual sacrifice or oblation unto God. In a sacrifice, there was a separation of the thing sacrificed from common use ; the beast was separated from the rest of the flock, so must the christian be set apart from the rest of the world. There was an addition, or dedication, or solemn consecration of the thing set apart to some holy and special use and purpose. Thus the christian, christian that presents himself a living sacrifice unto God, does not only separate himself from sin, the world, and the flesh, but does addict and devote himself to God, to serve and please him, to honour and glorify him. 3. The application which believers make to Christ, in order to their being his spiritual temple, and a royal priesthood. To whom coming as unto a living stone; the particle denotes a continual mot on, by which the soul gains ground, and gets nearer and nearer to Christ, they are daily coming by faith to him and gradually advancing in the knowledge of him, and love unto him. Lastly, the sweet fruit and blessed effect of their faith, whosoever believeth in him shall not be confounded: that is, not ashamed, as a person who is disappointed of his hopes and expectations, he shall not be ashamed of his choice, he shall not be ashamed of his profession, he shall never be ashamed of the cause and interest of Christ, which he has espoused, and at all times appeared for; nor of the work and service of Christ, nor of the time and pains expended in that work and service; nor shall he ever be ashamed hereafter that he never was ashamed here.

7 Unto you therefore which believe, he is precious:

To you belongs the honour of being built a spiritual house upon Christ, the chief corner-stone, which renders him deservedly precious to you, and of a very high estimation with you; whatever mean, low, and undervaluing thoughts the wicked world have of Jesus Christ, yet he is highly esteemed by, and deservedly precious to, every believing soul; he is precious in the several relations he stands in to them, precious in regard of the great things he has done for them, precious in the rich supplies of grace he bestows upon them, and will be eternally precious to them, upon the account of those mansions he has purchased and prepared for them.

—But unto them which be disobedient, the stone which the builders disallowed, the same is made the head of the corner, 8 And a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence, even to them which stumble at the word, being disobedient: whereunto also they were appointed.

These words discover the great sin and danger of those who slight and neglect our Lord Jesus Christ, who stumble and take offence at him, either at the meanness of his person, or at the ignominy of his cross, or at the holiness and strictness of his doctrine, or at the freeness of his grace; whatever the occasion of their contempt may be, Christ will prove to them a burdensome stone, a rock against which they will split, to their utter confusion; they will, in the close, bring ruin upon themselves, as a madman does that dashes himself against a stone. Observe next, How this contempt of Christ, has prevailed in the world ever since his first coming into the world; how did the Jewish rulers, called here the builders, set him at nought; the stone which the builders disallowed and stumbled at; that is, the high rulers, whose office and duty it was to build up the church, having power in their hand to do it, but instead of building upon this corner-stone, they stumbled and took offence at him, and accordingly

Christ is called a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence, yet this does not imply that Christ was the cause of their stumbling, but only the occasion of it, the object at which they stumbled, without any cause but their own wickedness; for though it be said in the next words, that they were appointed thereunto, the meaning is not, that God ordained them to disobedience, for then their obedience had been impossible and their disobedience had been no sin; but God, in his just decree, appointed that destruction and eternal perdition should be the punishment of such obstinate and disobedient persons. Learn hence, That christians have no reason to be offended at the great number of unbelievers that are in the world, and at the sight of Christ's being rejected by multitudes in the world, it having been long ago foretold in scripture that thus it would be, and consequently it ought to be no occasion of offence that thus it is, Matt. xxi. 42. The stone which the builders rejected, &c.

9 But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people; that ye should shew forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his marvellous light: 10 Which in time past were not a people, but are now the people of God: which had not obtained mercy, but now have obtained mercy.

In these words our apostle acquaints these believing Jews, who were built upon Christ the foundation-stone, that the same titles did now belong to them in a more excellent manner as christians, which were formerly given to their ancestors of the Jewish nation by God himself, Deut. vii. 6, 7. As the Jews of old were a chosen generation, a kingdom of priests, an holy nation, a peculiar people; that is, they were a people chosen by God before all other people whatsoever to bear his name, and to bear witness to his truth; they were a people in covenant with him, and so inexpressibly dear unto him, that he that hurt them touched the apple of God's eye; in like manner these Jews, and protelyted Gentiles of the dispersion, who were converted to christianity, have all the forecited titles belonging to them. A chosen generation, by effectual vocation separated from the world to the service of Christ, whose name they bear. A royal priesthood, that is, kings and priests; kings to reign with him, and priests to offer spiritual sacrifices to him. An holy nation; so are all the professors of christianity soeverally holy, and for that reason all the christian churches called out of the world, and dedicated to the service of Christ, are stiled saints in all St. Pauls epistles. A peculiar people, in covenant with God, purchased by the blood of Christ. Next, the apostle declares the end of all these distinguished favours being granted to them; namely, that they might shew forth the virtues, that is, publish and proclaim the wisdom, power, goodness, and mercy, the righteousness and truth of God, who had called them out of the darkness of sin, ignorance, and misery, into the marvellous light of knowledge, faith, holiness, and comfort. Lastly, To enhance their thankfulness for all these distinguishing favours, he puts them in mind of what they were before their conversion to christianity; in times past they were not a people, that is, not a people beloved of God, and in covenant with him; the Lord having given the Jews a bill of divorce, and said to them, Lo-ammi, ye are not my people, Hof. i. 9. but now, upon their believing in Christ, they were restored to all their church privileges, by the special mercy and grace of God. Learn hence, That till persons subject themselves to the government of Christ, and become obedient to the gospel, they are in God's account no people; to live without Christ in the world is a life worse than death. 2. That when a people are brought near to God by Jesus Christ, and partake of all the rich and invaluable blessings and privileges of the gospel, they are exceedingly indebted for all to the rich mercy and free grace of God. Which had not obtained mercy, but now have obtained mercy.

11 ¶ Dearly beloved, I beseech you as strangers and pilgrims, abstain from fleshly lusts, which war against the soul :

Observe here, 1. A dehortation, Abstain from fleshly lusts. Quest. What is here meant by lusts? Ans. Lust is either habitual or actual; habitual or original lust is the corruption and depravation of the faculties of the soul, an aversion to every thing that is good, and a proneness to all evil; actual lust is original sin put in motion; by fleshly lusts understand in particular those lusts which are conversant about sensual and fleshly objects. Quest. But what is it to abstain from fleshly lusts? Ans. It implies a total forbearance of all wilful sins; and at all times there is great difference between temperance and abstinence; the temperate man eats little, the abstinent nothing at all; every one then that would be accounted a christian, is to account it his great duty and interest to abstain from all fleshly lusts. 2. The arguments which our apostle here makes use of to persuade christians to abstain from all fleshly lusts: The first is implied or included in the compellation, Dearly beloved, not of the apostle only, or chiefly, but of God, Αγαπητοι, the same word that Almighty God makes use of in expressing his love to his dear Son: As if he had said, "You that are so dearly beloved of God, look you to it that you abstain from what you know will be displeasing to him." The second argument is drawn from their present state and condition in the world; ye are strangers and pilgrims in the world, and therefore should act as strangers, who are not wont to be overmuch affected with objects that they see abroad, in their travels, no more should you. The third argument is taken from the peril and danger of these fleshly lusts to our precious souls, they war against the soul; that is, they war against the purity of the soul; they war against the dignity of the soul; against the peace of the soul; against the liberty of the soul; yea, against the life of the soul.

12 Having your conversation honest among the Gentiles: that whereas they speak against you as evil-doers, they may by your good works which they shall behold, glorify God in the day of visitation.

From the apostle's dehortation in the former verse, he comes to an exhortation in this, and the duty exhorted to is strict godliness, or holiness in all manner of conversation, Having your conversation honest; it is not a single action, but our general course and conversation, that denotes us either to be good or bad; and the word translated honest, signifies fair and amiable, beautiful and adorning, the doing nothing that is unseemly, or a blemish either to our person or profession; christians should not only live free from evil, but as much as may be from the very suspicion of evil. It is added, among the Gentiles, that is, amongst the idolatrous nations and people, who had not received the christian faith: Great care must be always taken by the professors of christianity, that they do nothing which may increase the prejudices of the wicked world against religion and the ways of godliness, but remember that they are our watchful observers and bold censurers, and accordingly, endeavour that by a regular piety, a strict sobriety, a diffusive and extensive charity, we may render religion venerable to the world, and stop the mouth of slander as much as in us lies, by cutting off the occasion from them that seek occasion. Observe farther, The apostle exhorts them to have their conversation honest among the Gentiles; he doth not say religious, though that be included, but outwardly square, strictly just and honest: This is that which the world judges us by; vain are all our pretensions to piety, if we fail in honesty; we must make conscience of the duties of the second table, as an argument of our sincerity, and as an ornament to our profession. Observe next, What was then, and is now the lot and portion of good men, namely, to be evil spoken of as evil-doers: Whereas they speak evil of you as evil-doers: Christ himself did not escape the scourge of the tongue, he was charged with gluttony, blasphemy, imposture, with having a devil, and with working miracles by the power of the devil; and it is sufficient for the disciple to be as his master was; yet mark, they speak evil of you, says the apostle, as evil-doers: To be an evil doer is miserable, but not to be spoken of as an evil-doer. Nemo miser sensu alieno, no man is miserable in another man's evil opinion of him; a bad report, much less a bad opinion, makes no body a bad man; if it be enough to censure and accuse, who can be innocent? Again, The apostle exhorts these believing Jews to a conspicuous fruitfulness in good works, that they may by your good works, which they shall behold, &c. implying that christianity sets men to work; (though we shall never be saved for our works, yet without working we can never be saved) and that good works may and ought to be so done, that men may behold them; though we must not do good works to be seen of men, yet we ought to do good works that may be seen of men, Matt. v. 16. how else can men be patterns of good works, as they are required, Tit. ii. 7. if their good works be not conspicuous, and exposed to the world? Observe lastly, The blessed fruit and effect of good works, they cause such as behold them to glorify God in the day of visitation. This may be understood two ways, 1. With respect to believers, your good works will cause the wicked world to glorify God in the day of your visitation, that is, in the day of your persecution and affliction; though they afflict and persecute you, yet they shall glorify God when they behold your faith, your patience, your constancy in and under sufferings, in the day of your visitation. 2. With respect to the wicked; and so the day of visitation is the day of their conversion; and then the exhortation is to be so conspicuous in good works, that their adversaries may praise and glorify God, when he shall visit them with his grace, and draw them by his gospel, to believe in his Son: The day of saving conversion is a day of gracious visitation.

13 ¶ Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake: whether it be to the king as supreme: 14 Or unto governors, as unto them that are sent by him for the punishment of evil-doers, and for the praise of them that do well. 15 For so is the will of God, that with well doing ye may put to silence the ignorance of foolish men:

Our apostle having exhorted them in general to take care that their conversation be honest among the Gentiles, he now descends to particular duties, which he advises them to be very exemplary in the performance of. And the first is in their subjection to governors and government; submit yourselves, says he, to every civil ruler, both supreme and subordinate. Where observe, 1. How the apostle calls magistracy and civil government, though originally of divine institution, an ordinance of man: First as to the end of it, it being appointed and ordained for the good and benefit of man. Secondly, In reference to the kind of it, every nation having a liberty to chuse what kind and form of government human prudence shall direct them to, as most agreeable to, and commodious for the people. 2. The quality of that obedience and subjection which is to be given unto magistrates, it must be for the Lord's sake, that is, in obedience to the command of God, and with an eye at the honour and glory of God. Christianity is no enemy to the civil rights of princes, it requires subjection for conscience sake, Prov. viii. 15. by me, says God, kings reign; some read it, for me kings reign; both are true: Princes then hold not their crowns either from the pope or from the people, to be kicked off by the one, or to be plucked off by the other, at their pleasure: Submit yourselves, says our apostle, to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake. 3. The reasons assigned why magistrates should be thus subjoined and submitted to; namely, 1. Because they are sent by God for the punishment of evil-doers, and the praise of them that do well: the magistrate's office is to punish evil-doers; the fear of the magistrate's sword awes many men more than the fear of God's hand. If some men were not gods among men, many men would be devils among men; there would be no living among those who fear not the invisible God in heaven, if there were not some visible gods on earth to fear. 2. Because God will, by this their subjection given to magistrates and governors, silence, or, as the word signifies, put a muzzle upon the mouth of foolish and unreasonable men, who rage against his people, as if they were enemies to order and government: By this kind of well doing in particular, namely, by subjection and obedience to rulers in the Lord, and for the Lord's sake, we put to silence the foolishness of wicked men.

16 As free, and not using your liberty for a cloak of maliciousness, but as the servants of God.

Here our apostle answers an objection which he foresaw the Christian Jews were ready to make against this duty of subjection, namely, "that they were a free people, as Jews, and ought to preserve their liberty, and own no governors that were not of their own nation; and as christians they looked upon themselves as Christ's freemen:" Whereas christian liberty exempts no man from the duty of civil subjection; the liberty Christ has purchased for believers, is a freedom from sin and Satan, from sinful servitude: Christ makes all his subjects free, but it is with a freedom from spiritual bondage, and not from civil subjection; consequently, to plead our christian liberty in bar to that obedience which we owe our superiors and governors, either civil or ecclesiastical, is to use our liberty for a cloak of maliciousness, and as a covering for that disobedience which is hateful to God, and injurious to mankind, as being destructive of order and government, which is the beauty and the bond of human society.

17 Honour all men. Love the brotherhood. Fear God. Honour the king,

Here are four very important duties recommended to us in this short verse. 1. To honour all men; no man is to be despised by us, but every man truly respected, according to his place and station. There is a common honour, and a tribute of civil respect, payable to every man, though some men forfeit it by acting below men; a vile person is contemptible, though great; bare greatness is no guard against contempt; but the rags of a good man cannot obscure his worth, nor hinder him from true honour in the hearts, and from the tongues of wise men; honour all men, but especially good men. 2. Love the brotherhood; as there is a general respect due to all men, so there is a special love due to the brethren; to all the saints, of what nation and country soever, of what estate and condition soever, high and low, rich and poor, of what judgment and opinion soever; therefore the apostle calls upon us to love the brotherhood, the whole fraternity and society of christians, by what unhappy names and characters of reproach soever distinguished; there is no better evidence of the life of grace in ourselves, than the love of grace in another. 3. Fear God; that is live in a religious dread of his name, as a glorious God and a gracious Father; and have a reverential awe and fear of his majesty immoveably fixed and implanted in your souls; to the production of which a double apprehension is necessary, namely, the inconceivable majesty of God, and the miserable vileness of the sinners. 4. Honour the king; this duty consists in reverencing their persons, in obeying their lawful commands, in a cheerful payment of their dues, in praying affectionately for them, and in praising God for the blessing of their government. Nero, the worst of kings, the persecutor of christians, was now on the throne, yet the command is express to honour him: And if we consider the words in their connection and conjunction one with one another, Fear God, and honour the king, we learn, That religion, and the fear of God, do best qualify persons to be good subjects; this is the true and steady principle of loyalty, that obedience to governors that is lasting, is for conscience sake to the command of God; where there is no fear of God in the heart, there will be no regard to the command of God in the life. Lastly, These words may be considered, as in their conjunction, so in their order in which they stand; first, Fear God, and then, Honour the king; intimating, that the fear of God must be the rule and guide of our subjection into governors; it is no disparagement to our superiors to be under God, and so to be looked upon by their subjects; let such as pretend to fear God, shew it by being loyal subjects; and let such as would be thought most loyal subjects, evidence it by their awful and religious fear of God.

18 ¶ Servants be subject to your masters with all fear, not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward. 19 For this is thank-worthy, if a man for conscience toward God endure grief, suffering wrongfully. 20 ¶ For what glory is it, if, when ye be buffeted for your faults, ye shall take it patiently? but if, when ye do well, and suffer for it, ye take it patiently; this is acceptable with God.

Observe here, 1. The order and method of our apostle in the exhortations given to christians in this epistle; he first excites them to the general practice of their duty, and to be holy in all manner of conversation; and next binds upon them the performance of relative and particular duties. In the foregoing verses he insisted upon the duties of subjects towards magistrates and governors; in this verse he propounds the duty of servants towards their masters. Thus let christian servants be subject to their masters, whether christian or heathen, giving due reverence and respect, not only to such as are kind and gentle, but to such as are froward and wrathful. Learn hence, That such as are in the lowest condition, being servants, yea, the meanest of servants, may glorify God in that condition. 2. That servants, to the end that they may glorify God in their servile condition, must be subject to their masters with all fear; yea, even to wicked and froward masters; because the ground of their obedience is the will and command of God, which binds them to their duty to their masters, though their masters fail and fall short in their duty to them. Obs. 2. The several arguments made use of by St. Peter to enforce this duty upon servants. 1. This is highly acceptable and well-pleasing unto God, and will procure a gracious reward. We shall certainly receive a glorious reward from God, for what we suffer wrongfully and unjustly from men. This is thank-worthy, and this is acceptable with God. 2. From the indecency of the contrary; because it is no virtue, but a just punishment, for evil doers to suffer for their evil deeds: Though to suffer patiently when we suffer justly is praise-worthy, yet not comparable with the praise of suffering patiently when we suffer unjustly. To do well, and then to suffer patiently, as for ill-doing, will meet with a gracious, yea, with a glorious reward. What glory, &c.

21 For even hereunto were ye called: because Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an example, that ye should follow his steps.

Observe here. Two farther arguments to excite and move christians to patience under unjust sufferings. 1. Hereunto, says the apostle, were ye called; that is, by your profession of christianity; religion obliges you to suffer, and to suffer with patience; you must bear the cross before you wear the crown: To this you are called, and with this you have been acquainted. 2. You should not think much to suffer patiently, when you suffer unjustly, because Christ, your Captain and Guide, did so before you; he was the most meek and patient endurer that ever was, of the greatest and most wrongful sufferings that ever were. Note here, That although the example of our Saviour be here propounded to us with a special regard to the particular virtue of patience under unjust sufferings, yet it ought to be extended to all graces and duties, and improved as a pattern for the love and practice of universal holiness; Leaving us an example, that ye should follow his steps: the practice and example of the holy Jesus, in all the ordinary acts of his obedience, ought to be propounded by all his disciples and followers as the grand pattern of our imitation; it being a safe and unerring example, an easy and familiar example, a powerful and encouraging example, and the most instructive and universal example, that ever was given to the world, being a most absolute and perfect pattern of holiness.

22 Who did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth: 23 Who, when he was reviled, reviled not again; when he suffered, he threatened not; but committed himself to him that judgeth righteously: 24 Who his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree, that we being dead to sin should live unto righteousness: by whose stripes ye were healed.

Our apostle proceeds to represent and recommend our Lord Jesus Christ as a mirror and perfect pattern of patience under the sharpest sufferings; he acquaints us, 1. With his pure and spotless innocency; he did no sin, therefore could not suffer for doing evil: No guile was found in his mouth, neither in his expressions, nor in his actions: he never did ill either in word or deed, but was a perfect pattern of unblameable holiness. Next our apostle recommends to us his invincible patience under all his sufferings, telling us, that although Christ was most shamefully reviled, having the dirt of a thousand scandals, slanders, reproaches, and blasphemies cast upon him, yet he reviled not again, not giving them one ill word for all: And when he suffered all manner of injuries and indignities at one, being buffeted, spit upon, crowned with thorns, and crucified, though he had power sufficient to look them into nothing, to frown them into hell, yet he threatened them not with the least revenge, but prayed for his murderers, and committed his cause to a just and righteous God. Blessed Jesus! help us to imitate thy patience under sufferings and reproaches, and never let us be found rendering to any evil for evil, or railing for railing, but contrariwise, blessing for cursing, courtesies for injuries, affability for affronts: let us at no time be overcome of evil, but labour at all times to overcome evil with good. Note lastly, How our apostle takes notice, that the sufferings of Christ were not only exemplary but satisfactory; he did not only suffer patiently, but meritoriously: He his own self bare our sins, &c. Note here, 1. What was borne, our sin, that is, the guilt and punishment of our sin. 2. Who bare it, Christ his own self. This imports, (1.) The singularity of his sufferings, he had no partner or sharer with him in what he bare; he trade the wine press alone. (2.) The sufficiency of his sufferings, he himself bare our sins; he who was God-man the Lamb of God, and as such took away the sin of the world. (3.) How he bare it, in his own body upon the tree; that is, in his human nature upon the cross: Christ suffered in his soul as well as in his body, and both were satisfactory to divine justice, but his bodily sufferings are only mentioned, because these were most visible. (4.) The great ends of his sufferings, namely, expiation of sin, and mortification of sin; our sins were expiated on the tree by Christ's suffering for us in his own body, and by his death he also purchased virtue for mortifying sin in us, and for quickening us unto holiness of life, that, as he died for sin, we should die unto sin, and as he rose again and revived, never to die more, so should we, being dead unto sin, live no longer therein: He himself bare our sins in his own body, &c. that is, by whose expiatory sufferings we are healed; the wounds made in our souls by the guilt and power of sin, are mercifully and meritoriously healed; the guilt of sin is pardoned, the power of sin subdued, and all the invaluable fruits and benefit of the Redeemer's death obtained. Thanks be to God for Jesus Christ.

25 For ye were as sheep going astray; but are now returned unto the shepherd and bishop of your souls.

Observe here, 1. The state and condition in which both Jews and Gentiles were found before their conversion to christianity, they were like sheep going astray and lost, wandering in the ways of sin and unbelief, to their threatened ruin and destruction. 2. The tender care of Christ, that great and good Shepherd, in bringing home these lost sheep upon his shoulders, (Isa. xl. 11.) into his fold the church; But are now returned unto the shepherd, to him that will feed you in green pastures, and preserve you to his heavenly kingdom: The shepherd gives life to his sheep, and also lays down his life for his sheep. 3. The additional title given to Christ, he is stiled the bishop of our souls: he that with tenderness, care, and diligence, doth inspect and visit all his charge: he is the universal Bishop, the Bishop of bishops, who has the charge of all the flocks, and of the shepherds too, and to whom all bishops and shepherds must become accountable. God Almighty give them all such grace to be faithful, such wisdom to be prudent, that love to himself, that zeal for Christ, that tenderness for souls, such meekness and humility, such patience and charity, such mortification and self denial, as becomes persons of their holy character and profession; always remembering, that the salvation of one precious soul, for which the great Shepherd died, is infinitely worth the most indefatigable labours of their whole lives; that when the chief Shepherd shall appear, they may receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away. Amen.

C H A P. III.

LIKewise, ye wives, be in subjection to your own husbands; that if any obey not the word, they also may without the word be won by the conversation of the wives. 2 While they behold your chaste conversation coupled with fear.

Our apostle having in the foregoing chapter, entered upon an exhortation to the practice of relative duties, particularly of subjects towards their rulers, and of servants towards their masters, he continues here his exhortation to husbands and wives in the former part of this chapter, beginning first with the wives' duty (as did St. Paul, in all his epistles) because their duty of subjection is the most hard and difficult duty: Likewise, ye wives, be in subjection to your own husbands. Observe here, 1. The duty enjoined, subjection, that is, a loving and delightful obedience to the husband, owning of, and submitting to his authority, in compliance with the command of God. 2. The persons from whom and to whom this subjection is due, from every wife to her own husband, believer or unbeliever, christian or infidel: it is not lawful, upon any pretence whatever, for the wife to cast off this duty, which, by the law of her creation, and the express command of God, is bound upon her. 3. One special reason assigned why such wives as have unbelieving, wicked, and unconverted husbands, should take particular care to express that fear and reverence toward God, subjection and obedience, that chastity and conjugal affection towards their husbands, which the word of God calls for; namely, that such husbands as obey not the word, may without the word (preached) be won to the faith, by observing the efficacy and power of the word in the conversation of the wives. Learn hence, That the wives' holy and humble, pious and prudent, meek and patient, chaste and unsuspected conversation before God and the world, does recommend not only their persons to the love and esteem of their husbands, but also their faith and holy religion (which produces such good fruits) to their approbation and choice.

3 Whose adorning, let it not be that outward adorning of plaiting the hair, and of wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel; 4 But let it be the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price.

Our apostle's next advice here given to wives, is concerning their attire; this is laid down, first negatively, what it should not be, not an outward adorning, attended with great curiosity and exactness in dressing the body with plaited hair, gold chains, gay and gaudy apparel, and such like. Where note, That plaited hair, gold chains, and costly attire, were then the attire of lewd women, whores only, or chiefly, were so decked and adorned, and therefore were absolutely forbidden to the christian women by our apostle; but when such attire ceases to be a mark of such distinction, it may be worn by christian women, provided it be done without pride, and without too great expence both of time and treasure; always remembering that gravity in apparel, and wearing such a dress as is soon put on, is most honourable, and best becoming christian women. "I had rather, says one, go like the wild Indians, than have those thousands of hours to answer for, which some have spent between the glass and the comb." Observe here, That this this text doth not absolutely forbid the wearing of ornaments, or costly apparel, by such persons whose quality will answer it, but only forbids pride and vanity, affectation and ostentation in the wearing of them; it is not only lawful to cover the body, but to adorn the body; Abraham had never sent ear rings and bracelets to Rebecca, had they been sinful in their use; to wear such things beyond our purse and place, and to make ourselves or others poor by making ourselves fine, is very sinful, but otherwise lawful. Observe, next, Our apostle's affirmative precept for the woman's adorning, with the reasons of it, ver. 4. But let it be the hidden man of the heart, &c. Where note, 1. What must be apparelled and adorned, the hidden man of the heart, that is, the soul, which wants both covering and adorning as well as the body, sin having made both naked to their shame. 2. With what the hidden man of the heart must be apparelled, not with fine clothes, they will not cover a naked soul, but with the sanctifying graces of the Spirit of God, with humility and meekness, with piety and prudence, which ornaments will never wax old, nor grow out of fashion, as others do, and are also of precious esteem with God himself, they are in the sight of God of great price: These virtues are in themselves, and render the possessors of them, truly valuable in the sight and esteem of God. Upon the whole then it evidently appears, that the negation here is not absolute, but comparative: As if the apostle had said, "God will have the hidden man of your heart adorned with grace, and delights more to see that, than your bodies adorned with precious jewels and costly apparel;" and accordingly, if women affect finery, and would appear beautiful, let them choose the best ornaments, those of the mind and heart, which will attract the eye of God towards them, rather than those external ones, which serve only to draw man's eye to an admiration of them.

5 For after this manner in the old time the holy women also who trusted in God adorning themselves, being in subjection unto their own husbands; 6 Even as Sara obeyed Abraham, calling him lord: whose daughters ye are as long as ye do well, and are not afraid with any amazement.

Our apostle in these two verses enforces the exhortation and advice given to women in the foregoing verses, namely, to attire themselves with outward modesty, and inward meekness, by a twofold argument: (1) From the example of holy women in general under the Old Testament, whose praise is in the scripture, nor for the external adorning of the body, but for their affiance and trust in God, and their subjection paid to their own husbands. Here note, 1. That holiness, or the duties of the first table, are required of women as well as of men: And God accepts holiness in them as well as in men, The holy women. 2. That all holy women of old did, and always ought to make conscience of their duty to their husbands, particularly of subjection, that so good example may be given by them, and taken from them, for others to do the like; the virtue of good example is lasting, it may do good many years after the example is given; the example of these holy women had a fresh power to do good many thousand years after it was given, and will still have to the world's end. (2.) Another argument is taken from the example of Sarah, who meekly obeyed Abraham, acknowledging him to be her lord: the daughters of whose faith, and the heirs of whose blessing, such wives will appear and prove themselves to be, who do as Sarah did, not suffering themselves by any fears or terrors to be diverted from, nor by any fits of passion and grief, to be disturbed in the performance of that duty which God requires, and the husband expects: Even as Sarah obeyed Abraham, calling him Lord. Observe here, 1. That the faithful practice, and conscientious discharge of domestic and relative duties is much taken notice of by God, and had in remembrance with him, particularly the wife's duty, faithfully discharged to the froward husband, is and shall be had in everlasting remembrance with God. 2. That the same duty and reverence, the same subjection and obedience which Sarah gave to Abraham, is due and payable to every husband, else the apostle's argument is of no force. Some might say, Abraham was a great man: Ans. True, but Sarah obeyed him as her husband, as all wives ought to do, because the command of God requires honour and reverence to be given to all husbands, as husbands. Lastly, With what great and wonderful goodness and clemency the Lord is pleased to overlook the failings and infirmities of his upright servants. We find in Sarah's story, Gen. xviii. that she spake very unhandsofly, and laughed indecently, when the angel came and told her she should have a son, but all that is passed by in silence, and that one good word she gave her husband, calling him lord, is mentioned here by St. Peter to her eternal honour: The Lord has a gracious respect to a little pure gold, though mingled with much dross, and in a great heap of sin: If he can espy, he will accept of, a little spark of true grace: O Lord! thou wilt not bring our infirmities and slips to account against us, nor rigidly reckon with us for the same, if our hearts be upright with thee; make us then sound in thy statutes, that we may not be ashamed.

7 Likewise, ye husbands, dwell with them according to knowledge, giving honour unto the wife as unto the weaker vessel, and as being heirs together of the grace of life; that your prayers be not hindered.

Next our apostle proceeds to direct and exhort husbands to the practice of their respective duties; the general and comprehensive duty of the husband here mentioned is cohabitation, under which all matrimonial duties are contained; Dwell with your wives according to knowledge, that is, as becomes wise and understanding men, that well understand their duty, and, as the rule of christianity directs, giving just honour, and due respect unto them, and exercising great tenderness towards them. Next observe, The reasons subjoined to enforce this duty upon husbands: 1. Because wives are the weaker vessels, subject to infirmities, and more liable to contempt, therefore their husbands should contribute their wisdom and authority to support their honour, and preserve them from being despised either by children or servants. 2. Because wives are not only copartners with their husbands in their temporal good things, but also co-heirs of saving grace with them, Heirs together of the grace of life. 3. Because otherwise their prayers one with, and one for another, would be obstructed and disturbed, That your prayers be not hindered. Note here, That all sinful walking in general, but discord and discontent between husband and wife in particular, doth exceedingly hinder prayer, it oft-times hinders from the very act of prayer, that the duty is laid aside; it flats and deadens our spirits, and streightens our hearts in prayer, and it hinders the effect, fruit, and success of our prayers; it makes persons in that condition, that they have no heart to come before God, nor care to lift up their faces to him. From the whole learn, That it ought to be the mutual care of married couples so to order all their carriage towards each other, that in their houses they hinder not any holy duties; to hinder the practice of religion is repugnant to the great ends of this relation; some hinder by their wickedness, others by their discontent and frowardness; take we care that neither the husband's nor wife's heart be deadened, nor their heart damped to holy duties by either of their sinful or froward behaviour; that family will be little in praying that is much in squabbling and contending one with another.

8 ¶ Finally, be ye all of one mind, having compassion one of another, love as brethren, be pitiful, be courteous: 9 Not rendering evil for evil, or railing for railing: but contrariwise, blessing; knowing that ye are thereunto called, that ye should inherit a blessing. 10 For he that will love life, and see good days, let him refrain his tongue from evil, and his lips that they speak no guile. 11 Let him eschew evil, and do good: let him seek peace, and ensue it. 12 For the eyes of the Lord are over the righteous, and his ears are open unto their prayers: but the face of the Lord is against them that do evil. 13 And who is he that will harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good?

Our apostle, having finished his exhortation to relative duties, namely, of husbands and wives, masters and servants, magistrates and subjects, he now enters upon another subject, namely, that of sufferings, shewing us a prudential way and manner how to avoid sufferings, that they may not come upon us; and next, how to avoid impatience under sufferings, if it be the will of God that they do come upon us. The former of these is spoken to in the verses now before us, in which he exhorts us to practise all those virtues which are apt to reconcile and gain the affections of men towards us, particularly he exhorts to unity and concord. Be all of one mind, to sympathize one with another in and under sufferings, and to bear with one another's infirmities, to be courteous towards all, sweet and affable in our demeanour, provided our courtesy be neither a snare to ourselves, nor an encouragement to others in their sins, abtaining from all injuries and provocations, from all revenge both in act and in desire, not reviling them that rail at us, but giving good words for bad ones, for we are bereunto called that we should inherit a blessing; that is, Christ by his gospel hath called, and by his example encouraged us thus to do, that we may be blessed. Next observe,

That to encourage us to the perpetual practice of these virtues, our apostle assures us, that thereby we should most effectually consult the safety and comfort of our lives: For he that loveth life, that is, quietness and peace, which is the comfort of life, the likeliest way to obtain it is, to keep his tongue from speaking evil of others, and his lips from uttering falshood and deceit; plainly intimating, that it is men's unbridled tongues which bring most of their troubles upon them. He advises also to eschew evil, to avoid and to abhor every thing that is vile and sinful; and to do good, that is, all the good we can to all men: to seek peace, and ensue it, that is, to depart sometimes from our own right to obtain peace, and to follow hard after it, though it flies before us. And farther, our apostle assures us, that this innocency of conversation is not only the way to gain the friendship of man, but to obtain the favour of God, and to engage his providence for our protection, For the eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous, and his ears are open to their cry: as if he had said, "The eye of God's special care will be continually watching over you for good, to save you from unreasonable men, and he will bear your prayers in all your distresses; and the face of the Lord, his angry countenance, will be against them that wrong you, and do evil to you, to return it upon their own heads." So that the sum of all is, that an innocent and harmless, a quiet, peaceable, and obliging deportment, doth naturally tend to preserve us from evil, and from evil men; for who is he that can be so unnatural and so ungrateful as to harm us, if we be followers of that which is good? that is, if we be civil and obliging to them, they cannot find in their hearts to be injurious and unkind to us. Who is he that will harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good? Here note, that the apostle doth not absolutely say none will harm us, but he speaks of it as so very unreasonable and improbable a thing, that we may presume it will not ordinarily and often happen: Not but that good men are obnoxious to harm; the most unblemished and shining virtue will not at all times, and in all cases be exempt from injury and ill-treatment; but the following of that which is good doth in its own nature tend to secure us from the malice and mischief of men, and very frequently does it and is the best and most effectual means in order to it; he must love mischief for mischief's sake, that will be mischievous to him who never offered him any occasion, or gave him any provocation; therefore let us never be weary of well-doing, seeing doing good to men is ordinarily a security against injury from men, by recommending us to the favour and protection of God, and to the esteem and good-will of mankind; none shall harm them that do good, for all harm shall tend to their good.

14 ¶ But and if ye suffer for righteousness sake, happy are ye: and be not afraid of their terror, neither be troubled:

As if the apostle had said, "Though following that which is good be, generally speaking, a sure and certain way to keep you from harm, yet should it so happen, that notwithstanding all your piety and prudence, you should suffer for well doing, ye are happy, and not miserable; therefore be not afraid of their terrors, and threatenings, neither be ye troubled troubled for what they can inflict upon you." Note hence, 1. That to suffer affliction and persecution for righteousness sake, doth not hinder, but further our happiness: If ye suffer for righteousness sake, happy are ye, for so suffered your Saviour that went before you. 2. That when God calls us forth to suffer for righteousness sake, we must fortify ourselves against all fear; no terrors must trouble us, no apprehended dangers or difficulties must dismay us.

15 But sanctify the Lord God in your hearts:—

This phrase in scripture imports, 1. A firm belief of God's almighty power, that he can protect from sufferings; and a full assurance in his goodness and providence, that he will do so if it be good for us. 2. It is from the heart to own and believe the truth of all that God delivers in his word by way of promise to his people, and by way of threatening to their enemies, that his eyes are over the righteous, and his face against them that do evil. 3. To sanctify the Lord God in our hearts, is always to maintain upon our minds such an holy fear, and awful reverence of God, as will effectually prevail upon us to dread more the displeasure of God, than any thing we can suffer at the hand of man. Learn hence, 1. That when sufferings are approaching, we ought to strengthen our hearts against all fears of suffering, by putting our trust in God. 2. That by this trust and confidence in God in a suffering hour, we do eminently sanctify the Lord God in our hearts, Isa. viii. 13. Sanctify the Lord of hosts himself, and let him be your fear and your dread.

—And be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you, with meekness and fear :

As if the apostle had said, "If you be christians indeed, you are not without hope, an hope of everlasting bliss and happiness, which will infinitely recompence you hereafter for all the hard things which you suffer for the sake of christianity here; and forasmuch as this your hope is not a vain and groundless expectation, but a rational hope, Be always ready to render a reason of that hope, &c. Learn 1. That the christian's hope is a rational hope, he has a reason to hope for what he hopes, his hope is well-grounded upon the promise of God, upon the purchase of Christ, and upon the operations of the Holy Spirit quickening him by its renovation, leading him by its manuduction, actuating him by its influence, animating him in devotions by its assistances, by being the author of all that grace that is in him, and of all that good that is done by him. 2. That it is a christian's duty to be always ready to render a reason of this his hope, when the glory of God, the honour of religion, and the good of others, do require it. 3. That this must not be done with vanity and ostentation, but with meekness and fear: Be always ready to render a reason, &c.

16 Having a good conscience, that whereas they speak evil of you as of evil-doers, they may be ashamed that falsely accuse your good conversation in Christ. 17 For it is better, if the will of God be so, that ye suffer for well-doing than for evil-doing.

Here our apostle adds his advice to christians that they silence and put to shame their adversaries, by their works as well as by their words, by their holy conversation, together with their rational disputations; he required them in the former verse to be always ready to make a profession of their faith, and to render a reason of their hope: here he bids them confute gainlayers by a good conversation, and in order thereunto, to keep continually an innocent mind, and a clear conscience, pure from guile, and clear of guilt; having a good conscience, that such as speak evil of you as evil doers may be ashamed. Note here, 1. That let the servants of Christ be never so innocent in their lives, and circumspect in their carriage, yet there are those that will censure them as bad men, and slander them as evil-doers. 2. That a good conscience accompanied with a good conversation, is the most effectual mean to stop the mouth of slander, and to put such as accuse us falsely to shame. 3. That when sufferings and persecutions do come, after all, the consideration that we suffer not for evil, but for well-doing, will be a sufficient support and consolation to us. It is better, if God will have us suffer, that it be for well-doing; better for us, but worse for our persecutors; for now the body only suffers, while the soul is free.

18 For Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God, being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit :

These words are brought in as a strong argument, why christians that suffer wrongfully should bear it patiently; it was our Saviour's own case, he that had perfect innocency and unspotted righteousness, suffered in the severest manner, for us that were unrighteous, that he might reconcile us to God, being put to death in the flesh, that is in our human nature, but quickened by the Spirit, or raised to life again by the power of his Godhead it doth therefore well become all his followers cheerfully to undergo all manner of sufferings for him, which they meet with in their duty to him. Note here, 1. Christ did not barely suffer for our good, but he suffered in our stead: He is not only said to suffer for us, but to suffer for our sins, that is, the punishment of our sins; for no man was ever said to suffer for sin that did not undergo and endure the punishment of sin. As the sin-offering under the law is called an offering for sin, because it did expiate the guilt of sin, by dying in the place and stead of the offender; in like manner, when the death of Christ is called an offering for sin, what can it import, but that he suffered to make atonement for sin in our place and stead? The just for the unjust: If these words do not imply the substitution of Christ as our surety, and his suffering the punishment due to our sins, what words can express it? 2. That the great end of Christ's bitter death and bloody sufferings, was, to bring all those for whom he died unto God; now Christ's bringing us to God imports our apostasy from him, our inability to return to him; that sin unsatisfied for which was the great bar to keep us from him, is mercifully removed by him, and that our chief happiness consists in the enjoyment of him.

19 ¶ By which also he went and preached unto the spirits in prison ; 20 Which sometime were disobedient, when once the long-suffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the ark was a preparing, wherein few, that is, eight souls were saved by water.

As if St. Peter had said, " Though Christ suffered for our sins, and was put to death in his human nature, or flesh, yet he was quickened and made alive by the Spirit, in which, or by which Spirit, he went and preached unto the spirits in prison, which in the days of Noah were hardened in sin and disobedience, whilst the long suffering of God endured them, and waited for their repentance no less than an hundred and twenty years, while the ark was making and preparing and, Noah preaching to them ; yet so impenitent were they to the very last, that only eight were saved in the ark." Note here. 1. That the old world before the flood were in prison whilst here on earth, being in bondage and captivity to sin and Satan, held in the chains of their lusts, and in the bonds of their iniquity ; such as are in bondage to sin, are captives in Satan's prison : The old world also was in prison whilst on earth, as having received from God the sentence of destruction, and were reserved, as in prison, against the day of slaughter, if they repented not within one hundred and twenty years. 2. That Christ, by his Spirit did preach to the old world in the ministry of his prophets, Enoch and Noah ; and his Spirit did chide with them and reprove them, in order to their bringing to repentance. 3. That those refractory and hardened sinners, for despising the offers of grace made to them, were for their disobedience clapped up into the prison of hell, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire ; such as were cast into prison in Noah's time, were all fast in St. Peter's time : There is no picking the locks of hell-gates, no breaking through the walls of the fiery Tophet ; hell has a door to take in, but none to let out. 4. That though Christ, by his Spirit, preached to the spirits in prison, yet it was not when they were in prison, I mean in the prison of hell, but when here on earth ; there are no sermons in hell, no conditions of happiness proposed, no tenders of salvation propounded there : Christ preached to these prisoners to prevent their imprisonment ; Christ preached to these men, who were now in prison, that they might not have been imprisoned. Lastly, That the obstinate infidelity, and sottish stupidity, of the old world, was amazing, that after one hundred and twenty years preaching, no more than eight persons should be persuaded into the belief of the world's destruction. From the beginning we find, that the prophets of God had cause to complain, that few have believed their report : Do the ministers of God now groan to God, that they run in vain, and labour in vain, and spend their strength for nought ! From the beginning it has been so. Lord ! if thou honourest any of us with better success, and givest us to see the fruit of our labours in the lives of our people, help us to set the crown of praise on the head of thine own grace, and say, Non nobis, Domine, non nobis, &c. " Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy name give glory."

21 The like figure whereunto, even baptism doth, also now save us, (not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience towards God) by the resurrection of Jesus Christ :

Observe. 1. The type and the antitype, the ark and baptism ; their salvation from the deluge, by the ark, prefigureth our salvation from God's wrath by baptism. As all that were without the ark perished, and all within the ark were saved ; so that all are ingrafted into Christ by faith, whereof baptism is a seal, are saved, whilst the unbelieving and unbaptized part of the world perish. Baptism is such a mean of spiritual salvation now, as the ark was of Noah's, and his family's, temporal salvation then ; the like figure whereunto baptism now saveth us. 2. How our apostle expresses himself, and plainly declares what he means by that baptism which is saving ; negatively, it is not the outward ceremony of sprinkling the face, or washing the body with water, that is saving, or any ways pleasing unto God, save only as it is an act and exercise of our obedience to his command and will ; but positively, it is the answer of a good conscience towards God, that is, the faithful answer of a resolved soul in the covenant of baptism, who gives up himself to the obedience of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and renounces the world, the flesh, and the devil ; this covenanting is the condition of salvation, and baptism but the sign. Learn hence, That outward baptism alone saves none, but the inward only ; and the sign and singular effect of inward baptism, is the answer of a good conscience towards God. Yet we must not conclude, with the Anabaptists, from this text, that baptism can be of no saving advantage to infants, because they cannot at present make this answer of a good conscience : For in the same manner speaks St. Paul of circumcision, that the true circumcision before God, is the inward circumcision of the heart and spirit, and not the outward circumcision of the flesh. But who dare argue from thence, that the Jewish infants, for want of the inward circumcision, must not be admitted to the outward ? The argument is the very same : Will you say that the answer of a good conscience is absolutely necessary, and expressly required, that baptism may be beneficial ; therefore they only are to be baptized that can make this answer ? The same may we say, that the inward circumcision of the heart was required as the only acceptable circumcision in the sight of God ; therefore they only are to be circumcised, who have this inward circumcision of the heart. But as the one was the will of God, so is the other. True indeed the Jews did not admit proselytes to circumcision then, no more will we admit adult persons to baptism, now, without the answer of a good conscience, or a solemn stipulation to be the Lord's for ever ; but they admitted infants to circumcision without it ; in like manner, the christian church doth not admit the children of christian parents to baptism, without such answer made by them, but for them only.

22 Who is gone into heaven, and is on the right hand of God, angels and authorities and power being made subject unto him.

Our apostle having, in the close of the former verse, spoken of the resurrection of Christ, and of the benefits which we receive thereby, he makes mention in this verse, 1. Of his going into heaven, there to dispatch all that remained mained to be done for the completing the salvation of his people. 2. He is here affirmed to be at God's right hand. The right hand is the upper hand, the hand of honour; and the right hand is the hand of power; accordingly Christ sitting at God's right hand, as an enthroned King, imports sovereign honour and supreme power; and that God has exalted his Son Jesus Christ with great triumph to his kingdom in heaven. 3. It is asserted, That angels, authorities, and powers, are made subject to him, that is, our Jesus in whom we hope, believe, and trust, is advanced in heaven to a pre eminency above, and to a superiority over, all angels and celestial powers, waiting and expecting until all his enemies on earth become his footstool. For though his victory is yet incomplete and inconsummate, and we see not all things yet put under him, it may suffice at present that we see Jesus crowned with glory and honour, and that is enough to shew that the power of his enemies is broken; and that though they make some opposition still, yet it is to no purpose at all; For refusing to submit to his sceptre, they will fall by the rod of his strength. Angels and principalities in heaven, and all powers and potentates upon earth being made subject unto him.

C H A P. IV.

FORASMUCH then as Christ hath suffered for us in the flesh, arm yourselves likewise with the same mind: For he that hath suffered in the flesh hath ceased from sin; 2 That he no longer should live the rest of his time in the flesh to the lusts of men, but to the will of God.

These words may be considered, 1. As an inference drawn from what the apostle had asserted in the foregoing chapter, namely, That Christ Jesus suffered for our sins, the Just for the unjust, ver. 18. Now, says the apostle, forasmuch as Christ has thus suffered for us, first, As our Surety and Representative, in a way of satisfaction. Secondly, As our pattern and example in order to our imitation; let us arm ourselves with the same mind and resolution, to be conformed to him in his death, dying to sin as he died for sin; for he that hath crucified the flesh, and mortified his corrupt nature, in imitation of Christ's sufferings in our flesh and nature, that man hath ceased from sin, that is, from living unto sin, or serving sin any longer, but spends the remainder of his life wholly according to God's will, not according to his own, or others lustful desires and inclination. 2. These words may be considered as an argument to excite christians to eschew evil and to do good, which he had pressed upon them in the former chapter, from the example of Christ. And the force of the argument lies thus: "All christians should be armed with the same mind and resolution against sin, and for holiness, that Christ was. But Christ having suffered in the flesh for sin, and ceased from sin, lived in the Spirit unto God: Therefore all christians should wholly endeavour all they can to cease from sin, and live no more to the lusts of men, but to the will of God."

3 For the time past of our life may suffice us to have wrought the will of the Gentiles, when we walked in lasciviousness, lusts, excess of wine, revellings, banquetings, and abominable idolatries: 4 Wherein they think it strange that ye run not with them to the same excess of riot, speaking evil of you: 5 Who shall give account to him that is ready to judge the quick and the dead.

Observe here, 1. That this epistle was written and directed not only to the Jewish natives, but to the Gentile profelytes and converts; this is evident from the apostle's putting them in mind that there was a time, namely, before their conversion, when they wrought the will of the Gentiles. 2. The black and dismal sins which the Gentiles were guilty of, and wallowed in, before their conversion to christianity, namely, all manner of sensuality, uncleanness, excess in drinking, revellings, banquetings, and idolatries, joined with the rest of their abominations. Lord! how endearing are our obligations, who were sinners of the Gentiles, for calling us out of this darkness (worse than Egyptian) into marvellous light by the gospel. 3. The argument used to excite them to quit and abandon the fore-mentioned sins now in their converted state, which they had before indulged themselves in the practice of in their heathen state. The time past may suffice to have wrought the will of the Gentiles: as if he had said, "Surely you have had enough, enough of sin, and too much in your unregenerate state; your lusts have taken up too much of your lives, and had too much of your love." Learn hence, That the true penitent, and sincere convert, is one that has had enough of sin, yea, more than enough; one moment's service of sin is more service than we owe it: we can never serve Christ too long, and our lust too short a time. Learn, 2. That this consideration how long some of us served sin before conversion, should be a forcible argument to excite and quicken us unto greater measures and degrees of holiness in our regenerate and converted state. Observe, 4. What usage such christians must expect from the men of the world, who come out from among them, and refuse to run any longer into the same excess of riot with them. (1.) They think it strange: they admire and wonder at them, as we do at strangers that come out of another country. And, (2.) They speak evil of them, because they will not be as bad and as mad as themselves. They think it strange that you run not with them to the same excess of riot, speaking evil of you. Learn hence, 1. That wicked men are excellently riotous, or that there is an excess of riot and sin, which wicked men upon all occasions run into. 2. That such men wonder, and think it very strange, that good men are not as excessively riotous as themselves. 3. That because they will not so run, they speak evil of them. Observe, lastly, The impartiality and severity of that account which the wicked men of the world must render to God, the universal Judge, for all their hard speeches which they have uttered against the righteous: Who shall give account to him, &c. Note here, 1. There must and shall be a day of account: There must be one, because there never was yet one: There shall be one, because God has made an accountable creature; he can give, and therefore he shall give an account of his actions; for he has a principle of reason to know what he does, and a liberty of choice to govern himself, and a rule to direct him what to choose, and what to refuse; and consequently, the actions proceeding from him, must and shall be accounted for by him. 2. That this account must be given to Christ, the supreme and universal Judge both of quick and dead; partly as a fitting reward for his great humiliation and sufferings, and partly that the world may see what a great and excellent person he was, who came to visit them in great humility, and partly to give advantage to the future judgment, in that God has appointed a man for our Judge, who is flesh of our flesh, and bone of our bone, one that is sensible of the follies, temptations, and infirmities of mankind, and pities them, and will make favourable allowances for them; nay, one that is God as well as man, from whom we may expect all the goodness of a God, and all the tender compassion of a man, in their utmost perfection; so that no man need fear such a Judge, who has not out-sinned the mercies of a God, and the tender compassions of a man; for if either God or man can help us, we are safe in that day, when we shall give account to him that is ready to judge, &c.

6 For, this cause was the gospel preached also to them that are dead, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the spirit.

By the dead here, some understand the Gentile world, dead in trespasses and sins, to whom the gospel was preached when they were thus spiritually dead and buried in sensuality, that they might judge and condemn, oppose and strive against, mortify and subdue, those sensual desires and carnal appetites, which they indulged, whilst they lived as natural men, without the knowledge of God's will, and the assistance of his grace and Spirit; others do understand the words of such as are naturally dead, that the gospel was preached to them who were long since dead, even our forefathers, that liveth and died before Christ's coming, and that they had the gospel preached to them, while they were alive, that so they might mortify all their sinful lusts and corrupt affections, and live new lives, according to the direction and command of God in his holy word. Learn hence, That the condition of men now living, and of those that lived heretofore in all ages, is one and the same, having the same gospel, for substance, preached to them, and accordingly, the same duties of mortification and holiness required of them.

7 But the end of all things is at hand: be ye therefore sober and watch unto prayer.

These words are brought by our apostle as a fresh argument to persuade Christian Jews to the practice of sincere holiness; the end of all things, that is, of the Jewish state and polity, their city, their temple, and worship, is at hand; the fatal destruction of Jerusalem is now very near, therefore be ye sober and temperate in all things; watch, that the day of visitation overtake you not unawares, and pray for the averting of God's wrath, and that ye be not overwhelmed in it. Learn hence, That sobriety, watchfulness, and prayer, are very requisite and needful qualifications to prepare and fit persons for every coming and appearance of Christ to judgment, be it his particular coming to some, or his universal coming to all at the end of the world.

8 And above all things have fervent charity among yourselves: for charity shall cover the multitude of sins.

The next grace and virtue exhorted to, is that of charity, or mutual love amongst themselves: and observe with what special care and particular regard it is recommended to us, above all things; and note also, the intense degree of it, it must not barely be charity, but fervent charity; above all things have fervent charity. Learn, That we ought to take care, above all things, that our love to one another be sincere and fervent. Quest. But how may it be known to be such? Ans. If it be active and operative; if we love not in word or in tongue, but indeed and in truth, if it be not weakened by time, if it be not hindered by remoteness of place, if it be a sympathizing and compassionate love, a forbearing and forgiving love, then have we fervent charity among ourselves. Observe next, The argument or reason to enforce the duty, for charity shall cover the multitude of sins. This may be understood two ways: (1.) With respect to ourselves. Charity, or true love to our brother, will cause us not strictly to take notice of, but silently to overlook and pass by the faults and failings of others towards and against ourselves. (2.) It will cover the sins of others from the eye of the world, and keep us from blazing abroad the infirmities of others, to their prejudice and disgrace; it is both unwarrantable and unsafe to cover the sins of others, either by flattery or falsehood; but to cover a sin by charity, to conceal it from public notice, is a great piece of christian duty, unless when the concealing of it will do apparent mischief: Love looks upon great wrongs as small, and small wrongs as none at all; he must have no friends that will have a friend with no faults.

9 Use hospitality one to another without grudging.

As a principal act, and eminent exercise of charity, the apostle advises to use hospitality to their poor brethren; without grudging or murmuring at the charge; hospitality is a necessary, a commendable, and a commanded duty; St. Paul requires, Rom. xii. 13. that we be given to hospitality. Observe farther, The apostle doth not barely say, use hospitality, but, use it one to another; it is a mutual duty; whence it appears, that though hospitality towards the poor be a commanded duty, yet hospitality among the rich is no sin, but a duty likewise to give reciprocal entertainments; and though our Saviour says, Luke xiv. 12. When thou makest a dinner, or a supper, call not thy friends and rich neighbours; the prohibition is not absolute; he doth not forbid the inviting of the rich, but chargeth us not to forget the poor; we may treat both, if we have enough for both; but if not, what we have to spare must be for them that have nothing, not for them that have enough already, for we must prefer works of pious charity, before acts of civil courtesy: Use hospitality one to another without grudging.

10 As every man hath received the gift, even so minister the same one to another, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God.

His next exhortation is, That they endeavour rightly to employ, and wisely to improve, their spiritual gifts, (as well as their temporal, mentioned in the foregoing verse) which they had received for the good and benefit of others, in their respective places in the church, looking upon themselves not as proprietors, but as stewards of the various gifts bestowed upon them by the free favour of God, and of which they must give an impartial account. Learn hence, 1. That several men have their several gifts, as it pleaseth the gift-giving Spirit to give unto them; As every man has received the gift. 2. That gifts are given for the benefit of others, we are to minister one to another, that is, to improve our gifts to the mutual edification of each other. 3. That such as look upon themselves as stewards of the manifold gifts of God, will wisely improve them for his glory, and the good of others, the great ends for which he has conferred them.

11 If any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God: if any man minister, let him do it as of the ability which God giveth: that God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ: to whom be praise and dominion for ever and ever. Amen.

If any man speaks, that is, 1. As a public minister, or teacher, let him speak as he is instructed from the oracles of God. Or, 2. If he speaks as a private christian, let his discourse be grave and serious, for mutual edification, especially when ye speak of divine things; speech is a noble and advantageous benefit to man, by which he excels the whole creation; our tongue is our glory, the instrument of our Creator's praise; and there is no subject so sublime and honourable for the tongue of man to be employed about, as the word and oracles of God, but then we must never mention them but with reverence: Woe be to those men that bring forth scripture in their discourse, as the Philistines brought forth Samson, only to make them sport, rendering it the theme of their giddy mirth and prophane drollery; but these men ere long will find Almighty God in earnest, though they be in jest; such men forget this injunction of the apostle's, If any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God.—If any man minister, that is, To supply the necessities of others, either as a deacon, whose office it then was to take care of the poor, or as a private christian, by charitable contribution, let him perform that duty readily and cheerfully, according to the ability which God hath given him. Where observe, That he that with his wealth ministereth to the necessities of others, if he doth it not according to the ability which God has given him, his charity is no acceptable charity in God's account; nor acceptable to God, because not proportionable to what he has received from God; the reason of this injunction is added in the next words,—that God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ:—in whose strength these gifts are rightly employed, and by whose merits and intercession, our intention to glorify God by them is accepted.—To whom, that is, to which Jesus, as to God blessed forevermore, be all honour and dominion everlastingly ascribed. Amen.

12 O Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you, as though some strange thing happened unto you: 13 But rejoice inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings; that when his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy.

Observe here, 1. The metaphor which the apostle uses to set forth the christian's afflictions and persecutions by; he calls them fiery trials; burnings, because very painful and afflictive, very grievous and burdensome to sense, and also because men are tried by them as metals are by fire. 2. The warning given by the apostle to all christians, not to think strange concerning these fiery trials; that is, not to look upon them as unusual things, but to expect them, and prepare for them; for unexpected trials fall upon the soul in their full weight, and suddenly overthrow it; what we fear, for that we prepare; but when trials come, and we never looked and prepared for them, they strike us to the heart, because not armed to receive the blow. 3. The gracious end that God has in the afflictions and persecutions which fall upon his people, they are to try them, not to consume them; to try their graces, and destroy their corruptions, to give them opportunity to make proof of the truth of their faith, sincerity, and constancy. 4. The high honour which God puts upon his suffering saints and servants; they are said to be partakers of Christ's sufferings, because they suffer for him, and he suffers with them, and in them; and also because he suffered the same things before them, and much worse things for them. Lastly, The duty which God expects and requires from them who suffer these fiery persecutions for the sake of his Son, and that is to rejoice, and be exceeding glad. From the whole learn, 1. That no afflictions or persecutions should seem new or strange things to sincere christians. 2. That the end and use of all afflictions is the trial and improvement of the christian's graces. 3. That believers in suffering afflictions and persecutions are partakers of Christ's sufferings; he suffers in them, and they are made conformable to him by them. 4. That it is the will of God, that such as suffer for him, should not only be meek and patient, but be joyous and cheerful. 5. That at the great day when Christ's glory shall be revealed, then especially will the suffering saints rejoice, and be glad with exceeding joy, when they shall see their dear Redeemer coming in the clouds, with an human body, shining brighter than ten thousand suns; a body which still retains the marks of his sufferings, and the tokens of his love. O joyful day of Christ's appearing, when this royal Bridegroom shall take his suffering spouse the church by the hand, and present her to his Father, own his in the presence of men and angels, bestow a kingdom upon them that they may be with him where he is, eternally to behold his glory, to feed upon an happiness as large as their capacities, and as lasting as their beings; such honour, have all his suffering saints, and therefore ought greatly to rejoice inasmuch as they are made partakers of Christ's sufferings, that when his glory shall be revealed, &c.

14 If ye be reproached for the name of Christ, happy are ye: for the spirit of glory and of God resteth upon you. On their part he is evil spoken of, but on your part he is glorified.

Another

Another argument is here offered by our apostle for glorying in sufferings and reproaches for Christ, taken from the happiness of those that are so reproached, If ye be reproached for the name of Christ, happy are ye. Note here, That the reproaches which the saints suffer for the sake of Christ, are reckoned persecutions, and yet at the same time are esteemed a part, as well as a prognostic of their happiness. Note, 2. The reason assigned why christians under reproach for the sake of Christ, are to be esteemed thus happy, namely, because the Spirit of glory and of God resteth upon them; that is, the glorious Spirit of God, which is both the mean and evidence of your happiness, who is glorious in himself, and also a glory to you, upon whom he rests, and in whom he dwells. Two things are implied by the Spirit's resting upon a reproached christian: (1.) Complacency, that he is well-pleased where he is; men do not rest where they do not like. (2.) Permanency, he abides where he rests, and dwells there with delight. Some take the expression to be an allusion to Noah's dove, that hovered about, but could not rest till returned to the ark. Thus the Spirit of God, called here a Spirit of glory, from its effects and fruits, namely, from his cheering, sealing, and reviving influences, which make christians glory in tribulations; this Spirit flies from place to place, and from person to person, hither and thither, but rests upon, and takes up his residence and abode with such christians as suffer for the name of Christ: If ye be reproached, &c. It follows: On their part he is evil spoken of, but on your part he is glorified; that is, by their reproaches cast upon you, they blaspheme the Holy Spirit, as the word signifies; but he is eminently glorified by your patience and constancy of mind under all your pressures, which shews the power of the Spirit resting upon you, and mightily working in you. Learn hence, That in those reproaches which good men suffer for the sake of Christ, the Spirit of God in a special manner is blasphemed on the one side, and glorified on the other. O sinner! know, that all reproaches which thou castest upon religion and religious persons, as such, reach the Holy Spirit that rests upon them, and resides in them as his temples: But, O christian, remember thou, that by thy patience and constancy under sufferings, thou glorifiest the Holy Spirit eminently, abundantly shewing, that by his help, afflictions are not only tolerable, but joyous.

15 But let none of you suffer as a murderer, or as a thief, or as an evil-doer, or as a busy-body in other men's matters. 16 Yet if any man suffer as a Christian, let him not be ashamed; but let him glorify God on this behalf.

Observe here, 1. What it is that the apostle calls upon them to avoid and shun; it is sin, not suffering: Evil-doing in general, murder and theft in particular, sins that were then very much practised among the Jews; Let none of you suffer as a murderer, or a thief, or as an evil-doer; by suffering as evil doers, we lose the comfort and reward of all our sufferings. 2. What sufferings he bids them not be ashamed of, but glory in, namely, when they suffer as christians, and purely as such. Quest. But what is it to suffer as a christian? Ans. 1. When we suffer for a good cause. 2. From a christian principle. 3. In a christian manner, with meekness, patience, and self denial. Quest. What is it to glorify God on behalf of our sufferings? Ans. Afflictions and sufferings, considered barely in themselves, are far from being glorious; but consider them in their cause, as sufferings for righteousness sake, and so they are glorious; and God honours a greatly, when he calls us forth to suffer, and furnishes us with courage and resolution for sufferings, and it is our duty to give glory to him who enables us thus to do.

17 For the time is come that judgment must begin at the house of God: and if it first begin at us, what shall the end be of them that obey not the gospel of God?

Observe here, 1. The apostle does not say, If judgment begin at the temple of idols, but, If it begin at the house of God; God will not spare his own house nor his own household; he will not spare his children or servants when they sin, he is no cockering Father to indulge his children to their ruin. Nay, observe, 2. Judgment first begins at the house of God; God will not bear so long with his own people sinning as with strangers: they shall be corrected sooner and severer than others; the Lord will first punish them who have been forgetful of him, and trifled with him, who have been formal in their profession, and vain in their conversation. 3. That when we see with sorrow God contending with his own people for their sins, we may with astonishment expect what will be the end of them that obey not the Gospel; when God brings such troubles upon his own house, what troubles may they expect from God, who are but a den of thieves, and a cage of unclean birds? O what appearances shall they have of God! And how shall they appear before God! Observe then, What little cause wicked men have to rejoice at the church's sufferings, when it presages a far more heavy judgment coming upon themselves; for if judgment begin at the house of God, &c.

18 And if the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and sinner appear?

As if he had said, "When the day of visitation comes, which is verily at hand, and God shall begin to punish the Jews, his own people, called his house in the foregoing verse; if then the righteous among them escape the common calamity with great difficulty, and are scarcely preserved, how shall the ungodly and sinners think to escape unpunished in the day of Jerusalem's calamity; that day of vengeance, when Christ shall come to plead with them? If then the righteous be scarcely saved, that is, with great difficulty preserved from that desolating calamity, that fiery trial spoken of, ver. 12. where shall all the ungodly and sinner appear? And how shall they hope to escape in safety from that dreadful judgment now ready to come on the Jewish nation." There have been those that have made use of this text to shew the difficulty of eternal salvation; and that the best and holiest of saints, even those that are most eminent in grace, are very difficultly saved; which though a truth in itself, yet is scarcely deducible from this text, which certainly speaks of temporal preservation.

16 Wherefore let them that suffer according to the will of God, commit the keeping of their souls to him in well-doing, as unto a faithful Creator.

Observe here, 1. A cautionary direction given, that in all our sufferings, we take care that we suffer according to the will of God: that is, for what is according to God's will, either to be believed or practised by us, for asserting and maintaining the purity of the christian doctrine and worship; and when our patience under such sufferings is as extensive and intensive as God requires, when our patience is as large and as lasting as our troubles, then may we be said to suffer according to the will of God. 2. The special privilege allowed to such sufferers as suffer according to the will of God, they may commit the keeping of their souls to God in well-doing, as unto a faithful Creator. Learn hence, That when men suffer really and truly for well-doing, they may with confidence and great assurance commit their lives, and all that is dear unto them, to the special care of the divine providence; either God will keep us from, or support us under, trials, when we thus commit ourselves to him.

CHAP. V.

St. Peter closes his epistle with an exhortation to the spiritual guides and governors of the church, to discharge their duties faithfully, in feeding and ruling of the flock of God committed to them.

THE elders which are among you I exhort, who am also an elder, and a witness of the sufferings of Christ, and also a partaker of the glory that shall be revealed:

Observe here, 1. The persons exhorted; The elders that are among you, the guides and governors of the church; elders by age and office, who were both to rule well, and also to labour in the word and doctrine; and for doing both faithfully, were to be accounted worthy of double honour. 2. The person exhorting, I exhort, who am also an elder. Mark, he says, "Not I, who am the universal head of the church, Christ's vicar upon earth; but I, who am elder by age, and by apostleship, who have been long the minister of the circumcision; I exhort, beseech, and intreat you as my brethren, fellow-labourers in our Lord's vineyard." 3. The humble testimony which St. Peter gives of himself; he doth not say, "I command, who am the chief of the apostles, with whose confession of faith Christ was so well pleased, that he said, Thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my church;" but, "I exhort, who am a witness of the sufferings of Christ, an eye witness of what our dear Lord and Master suffered in the faithful discharge of his office, both in his life, and at his death: And also a partaker of the glory that shall be revealed, I was also an eye-witness of Christ's glory in his transfiguration here on earth, and hope to be partaker of that glory which shall hereafter be revealed in heaven." Learn hence, That such exhortations to duty are likely to be most effectual and successful, which are propounded in the humblest manner. St Peter was placed in an high degree above these elders, being an apostle, a chief apostle; yet he gives himself no such title, but says, The elders I exhort, who am also an elder; not an apostle, much less the head and chief of the apostles.

2 Feed the flock of God which is among you, taking the oversight thereof, not by constraint, but willingly; not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind; 3 Neither as being lords over God's heritage, but being ensamples to the flock.

Observe here, 1. The title given to the church, it is the flock of God: Denominations are given in scripture to persons and things proper to the state of things and persons: Thus here the church is called a flock, and sometimes a little flock, in opposition to the herds and huge droves of the men of the world: yet the flock consists not of a few absolutely, but comparatively only; a flock contains a multitude. Again, As the church is called a flock for the number, so for their order; a flock is under inspection and government continually; Christ Jesus is the great Overseer of this flock: And farther, it is a flock in respect of the unity and love that is amongst them; though the church be scattered over the world, yet there is an holy combination, and sweet communion of the members amongst themselves. 2. The duty exhorted to, and that is double, to feed the flock, and to be an example unto the flock. Feed the flock, taking the oversight of it; feed it with wholesome doctrine, guide and govern it by strict discipline; overlooking it continually, and watch over it with unwearied diligence; and that you may do so, be perpetually resident, feed the flock that is among you: How can the flock be duly watched over, when the shepherd lives several miles from the fold, and is following his pleasure, when he should be feeding his sheep? Feed the flock among you. 3. The manner directed to, how, and after which, the shepherds should feed and watch over their flocks. (1.) Not by constraint, but willingly; that is, not as a burden, but a pleasure, with a free and ready mind: what men do, out of compulsion, from base fear, they do with no satisfaction either to God or man. (2.) Not for filthy lucre; to feed the flock purely for the sake of the fleece, and to take a living only to get a living, is an horrid impiety: to be driven into the ministerial office by necessity is bad, but to be drawn by covetousness is much worse. (3.) Not as being lords over God's heritage. Where note, The title given to the church, they are God's heritage, his people, not our own, his lot and portion; he having a special and peculiar right unto them, and property in them; therefore they are not to be lorded over, not to be treated with insolence and imperiousness, ruling them by the sword, and outward force, which has made many hypocrites, but not one convert. Lastly, He requires that they be ensamples to the flock; that is, in their daily conversation. Now, how can they be examples to them, if they live not amongst them? They must be examples of such meekness and humility, of such patience and charity, of such mortification and self-denial, as becomes persons of their holy character and profession; and be patterns of those virtues amongst their people in conversation which they recommend to them from the pulpit. This duty of ministerial exemplariness in conversation is bound upon us by innumerable arguments taken from the command of Christ, from the glory of God, from the preciousness of the soul, from the dignity of our office, from the success of our ministry, which depends more upon our practice than upon our preaching; from our own interest, with respect to our present comfort and future happiness; from the influence it has upon our people, an encouraging and confirming influence.

4 And when the chief Shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away.

As if our apostle had said, "It is possible you may miss of your reward here from the hands of men, but when Christ, the great and good Shepherd, shall appear, when the owner, ruler, and lover of his church shall come to judgment, you shall have from him your full reward, a never-fading, ever-flourishing crown of glory, for faithfully discharging your duty to God and his people." Learn hence, 1. That Jesus Christ, the chief Shepherd, will at length appear. 2. That, when he doth appear, he will call the under shepherds to account, how they have discharged every part of their ministerial office, as well private inspection, as public preaching. 3. That to all such, and to only such, as have been faithful to the interest of Christ and souls, shall the reward be assigned, even a crown of glory that fadeth not away: When the chief Shepherd shall appear, &c.

5 ¶ Likewise, ye younger, submit yourselves unto the elder, ye, all of you be subject one to another,—

Having laid down the duties of pastors in the former verse, he points out the duties of the people in this, whom he calls the younger, either because they were generally younger in years than their spiritual guides, or because they ought to shew that reverence and obedience to them which is suitable in young ones towards their elders: These young ones he exhorts to submit themselves to the guidance of their elders and teachers: Likewise, ye younger, submit yourselves unto the elder: Instruction and jurisdiction belonged to the elder, subjection and obedience to the younger. Note here, That the duties of pastor and people are mutual and reciprocal, not that their duties are alike, but because there is a like reason for the performance of their respective duties, a like engagement and obligation upon both; the duty of the one is subjection; of the other ministerial direction. He adds, yea all of you be subject one to another: Intimating thereby, that there is a duty of mutual subjection, which all christians owe to one another in love; they ought to condescend to the meanest offices one towards another; to bear with the infirmities of each other.

—And be clothed with humility: for God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble.

The original word, rendered clothed, signifies, first, an upper garment, a frock or cloak, put over all the rest of our clothes; and so imports, that we should be wrapped up all over with this grace, that this should be most visible in our conversations, words, and actions, and conspicuous beyond all other virtues. Secondly, It signifies a belt which girds about our garments, and so imports, that we should tie it fast unto us, and have those considerations always fixed upon our spirits, which may keep us in an humble frame of soul. Note then, That humility is a special ornament, a beautiful robe, to be put on daily, which commends us greatly both to God and man. We are never to account ourselves dressed, until we have this livery of our humble master Christ Jesus put upon us: Be clothed with humility. Observe next, The argument to enforce this duty: for God resisteth the proud, sets himself as in battle-array against them, but giveth fresh supplies of grace to the humble; because more grace is promised to the humble, and the humble soul is more fitted, prepared, and disposed, to receive farther measures of grace from God. God sets himself against proud men to bring them down, but the humble he doth countenance and exalt.

6 Humble yourselves therefore under the mighty hand of God, that he may exalt you in due time:

By the hand of God understand his judgments, his almighty power, which it is our duty to submit unto, and to be humble under, in the day of our affliction; and this profound submission, and deep humiliation is the way to glory and exaltation. He can exalt us, and will do it here, if it be good for us; but sometimes God sees abasement better for his people; better, because safer, and accordingly they shall have it. Learn hence, That the strength and power of God should oblige us very greatly to humble ourselves before him, and subject ourselves unto him: Humble yourselves under the mighty hand of God. Secondly, That God will exalt the humble in due time, either here or hereafter; either in time or in eternity, as it shall most and best conduce to his own glory and their good.

7 Casting all your care upon him; for he careth for you.

Observe here, 1. The nature of the duty enjoined, to cast our care upon God; it is not a providential and prudential care, but an anxious and vexations care, that the scripture forbids; and the duty here required is this, that, after we have used all prudent care and diligence in subserviency to the providence of God, we should not be over solicitous about the issue and event of things; which, when we have done all we can, will be out of our power. Casting our care upon God implies, that we should refer the issue and event of things to his wise providence, which is continually watching over us, and knows how to dispose of all things for the best advantage to us; entirely confiding in his wisdom and goodness, that he will order all things for the best, and, in that confidence, resting satisfied with the disposal of his providence, whatever they be. This is to cast all our care upon God. 2. The argument here made use of to persuade us to this duty: God careth for us. This implies two things: (1.) In general, that the providence of God governs the world, and concerns itself in the affairs of men, and disposeth of all events that happen to us (2.) More particularly, that this providence is more peculiarly concerned for good men, and that he takes a special care of them, and of their concerns; and the care that God takes of them is a special care, a tender care, a promised and engaged care, a care mysteriously exercised; he then takes most care of them when they think he takes least, and the men of the world think he takes none at all. Cast we then then all our care upon him who careth for us ; for anxious care is a painful evil, an unprofitable evil, a sinful evil.

8 ¶ Be sober, be vigilant : because your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about seeking whom he may devour. 9 ¶ Whom resist stedfast in the faith, knowing that the same afflictions are accomplished in your brethren that are in the world.

Observe here, 1. A double duty exhorted to, sobriety and vigilancy : Be sober, be vigilant, be sober and temperate in all things : Sober in your enjoyments ; sober in your employments ; sober in your recreations. Be neither drunk with wine, nor with worldly cares ; the latter is the worst of the two. A night's sleep cures the former, but the worldling is drunk all the year long, never sober night nor day. And to sobriety we are exhorted to add vigilancy, a watchful care, and diligent circumspection over all our thoughts, words, and actions, that we may not displease God in any thing. 2. The reason or motive to enforce the duty, because your adversary the devil goeth abroad, &c. Where note, How every word contains a special motive to christian watchfulness. He is your adversary, who will do you all possible mischief : He is the devil, an accuser, and one that seeks all advantages against you : He is a cruel adversary, a lion, yea, a roaring lion, which adds terror to his cruelty : He is a restless adversary, he goes about seeking whom he may devour : What soul he may devour, for that is the bait he gapes for. It grieves the devils, those apostate angels, to find the souls of men appointed to fill up those vacant places in heaven, which they turned themselves out of. It is a delight to them to plunge souls into the same condemnation and misery with themselves. 3. The duty of resistance, urged upon us in order to our preservation, with the weapon put in our hand for that purpose : Whom resist stedfast in the faith : that is, be stedfast in the faith, that you may resist him ; and, by the help of your faith, you shall overcome him. Learn hence, 1. That the devil is the restless adversary, and unwearied enemy of mankind. 2. That all the pains which Satan takes, is in order to the destruction of precious souls. 3. That the way to overcome him is by resisting of him, not by yielding to him : He is a cowardly enemy, and a conquered enemy ; resist him and he will run. 4. That faith is the weapon, by which the christian is enabled to resist the tempter, and to repel the force of his fiery temptations. Whom resist stedfast in the faith, &c. As if the apostle had said, " Resist Satan's temptations, occasioned by your sufferings, remembering that it is not your case alone, but others also suffer with you, even all that will live godly in Christ Jesus. Learn hence, That christians should not desire, and cannot reasonably expect a better condition in the world, with respect to freedom from sufferings, than the rest of their brethren, who have all a share of affliction to suffer, and a measure of hardship to endure as well as ourselves.

10 But the God of all grace, who hath called us unto his eternal glory by Jesus Christ, after that ye have suffered a while, make you perfect, stablish, strengthen, settle you. 11 To him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen.

Our apostle concludes and closes his epistle with an affectionate prayer for these afflicted christians and suffering saints, beseeching Almighty God, who is the author of all grace, and who hath called them by his gospel to the participation of that grace, which will entitle them to eternal glory, that after they have suffered a while in the world, he would perfect the work of grace begun in them, establish, strengthen, and settle them in the truth of the gospel ; and to this infinitely gracious God, he desires glory and dominion should be for ever ascribed. Observe here, 1. That God is the God of all grace, seed, growth and perfection, all from him, restraining grace, renewing grace, sanctifying grace, all from the fountain of all grace. 2. That serious christians are called by God to eternal glory and happiness, they are called to the hope and expectation of this glory, upon the account of the promise of it which God made to Christ, Tit. i. 2. and they are brought into a state of preparation for it : God hath by his word and Spirit wrought them for this same thing. 3. They are called to eternal glory through Christ Jesus, he reveals it to them, he purchases it for them, he works that faith and repentance in them which qualifies them for, and entitles them unto, this heavenly glory. 4. That some afflictions must be expected and endured by all christians, how dear to God soever they are or may be. Was there any patriarch, prophet, apostle, primitive or modern christian, that did not suffer a while ? Saints must suffer a while from the remains of sin, from the temptations of Satan, from the enemies of religion, from the friends of religion, yea, from God himself, their best friend. 5. That after serious christians have suffered a while, they shall enter into glory, their title is sure by the promise of God, by the purchase of Christ, by the inhabitation of the Spirit. 6. That the perfecting, stablishing, strengthening of the christian in grace and comfort is from God, to whom all glory and dominion is and ought for ever to be ascribed.

12 By Sylvanus, a faithful brother unto you, (as I suppose,) I have written briefly, exhorting and testifying, that is the true grace of God wherein ye stand.

Observe here, That our apostle, to encourage these suffering christians to a resolved perseverance in the christian religion, assures them, that it was undoubtedly from God, the unquestionable truth of God, and therefore neither seducers on the one hand, nor persecutors on the other, should be able to shake them, or cause them to fall from their own stedfastness ; a firm belief of the certainty and excellency of christianity conduces much to the establishment of those that have newly embraced it ; if we be once assured that it is the true grace of God wherein we stand, it will cause us to stand stedfast.

13 The church that is at Babylon, elected together with you saluteth you : and so doth Marcus my son.

14 Greet ye one another with a kiss of charity, Peace be with you all that are in Christ Jesus. Amen.

At the foot of his epistle he sends them salutations from 6 S the

the christians at Babylon, who were chosen out of the world, to partake in the faith and fellowship of the gospel. Some, by Babylon, figuratively understand Rome, but others understand it of Babylon in Assyria, where many Jews did tarry, and continue after the expiration of the seventy years captivity, whom St. Peter, being a minister of the circumcision, went to visit, having probably planted a church there. Wheresoever they were, God had called them to the knowledge of his gospel, and they send salutations to all their brethren and fellow members in Christ, wheresoever dispersed, or howsoever distressed. As also doth Mark, whom St. Peter calls his son, because instructed by him in the gospel, and begotten by him to christianity. Lastly, He exhorts them to express their fervent affection to each other by a kiss of charity used in the primitive times as a token of love amongst christians; but afterwards, for just reasons, laid aside; and so wishing peace, that is, all manner of prosperity to all in Christ Jesus, that is, to all professing faith in Christ Jesus, he shuts up his epistle.

S T. P E T E R.

The Second Epistle of St. Peter was written by him a little before his death, he having received a revelation, probably of his approaching departure out of this life; he writes this second letter to the Jews of the dispersion scattered through Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, to warn them of the fiery trial, that sharp and bitter persecution which was coming upon them, and to fortify them against that apostacy from the faith, that falling from their own stedfastness, that departing from the holy commandment, which these newly-converted Jews were very prone unto: He sends therefore this epistle to establish and settle them, to strengthen and confirm them: and this is the last mention which we find in scripture of this great and glorious apostle.

C H A P. I.

SIMON Peter, a servant and an apostle of Jesus Christ, to them that have obtained like precious faith with us, through the righteousness of God and our Saviour Jesus Christ:

Observe here, 1. The author and penman of this epistle described by his name, Simon Peter, the former given at his circumcision, the latter by Christ, upon the occasion of his confession, Matt. xvi. 18 by his condition, a servant; by his office, an apostle; by the Author of his office, Jesus Christ. Note, That Christ only has an authoritative power to make apostles, ministers and dispensers of his word; a derivative power from Christ the governors of the church have; but such as have not now their call from Christ immediately (which it is presumption to expect, and if any pretend to it, let them shew it by their miracles) or mediate from the officers of his church, are usurpers of the sacred office, and they cannot pray in faith themselves for a blessing upon what they do, nor can the people expect it, Jer. xxiii. 32. I never sent them (says God) therefore they shall not profit this people at all. Observe, 2. The persons described to whom this epistle is directed, to them that have obtained like precious faith with us. To such as had obtained faith, precious faith, like precious faith, with the apostle of Christ; like for its nature and quality, though not for its measure and degree; and alike precious in regard of its object, Christ; in regard of its subject, the heart; in regard of its act, which is acceptance and consent to the terms of the gospel-covenant; in regard of its effects and precious fruits, peace with God, peace with conscience, victory over the world, and the like. We see then that the faith of the poorest believer is as precious as the richest, and that the weakest believer has the same precious faith with the strongest: and if it be alike precious, it shall be alike permanent and persevering. 3. The meritorious cause of this their precious faith, the righteousness of Jesus Christ: Through the righteousness of God, even our Saviour Jesus Christ. All grace is derived to us through Christ, for the sake of his righteousness, sufferings and satisfaction; and as all grace is derived from him, and for his sake conferred, so all our good, that little service we do for God, is accepted through him, and owned for his sake. And if so, then Jesus Christ is really God; for the righteousness of a creature cannot justify me in the sight of God; there is no appearing before God for any creature in a creature-righteousness. And farther, if so, then it is not faith faith that justifies and saves, but the righteousness of Christ, upon which faith is grounded, Ephes. ii. 8. By grace are ye saved effectually through faith instrumentally. The brazen serpent healed not the eye that looked on it; yet without looking upon it, no help from it, no healing by it.

2 Grace and peace be multiplied unto you through the knowledge of God, and of Jesus our Lord.

The person saluting and the parties saluted, were mentioned in the former verse; here we have the salutation itself, 1. The matter of it, Grace and peace; grace to free us from God's wrath and reinvigorate us in his favour; peace to quiet our own consciences, and reconcile us to ourselves. 2. The measure of it, grace and peace be multiplied; they had both grace and peace already, yet the apostle prays for the farther increase of them; there is no complete perfection in grace attainable in this life. The best of saints must be multiplying and increasing their stores; for they are but imperfectly perfect, when at the best. 3. The means for multiplying grace and peace, through the knowledge of God, and of Jesus Christ our Lord. Learn, That the knowledge of God, in, by, and through our Lord Jesus Christ, is the special mean of multiplying grace and peace in our hearts; and indeed there is no comfortable knowledge of God, but in and through Christ, John xvii. 3. This is life, &c. Out of Christ God is a revenger, in Christ a reconciled Father.

3 According as his divine power hath given unto us all things that pertain unto life and godliness through the knowledge of him that hath called us to glory and virtue:

In these words our apostle shews, what reason they had to believe and hope, that grace and peace should be multiplied unto them, namely, because Almighty God had already given them all things which conduced to make them holy in this life, and happy in the next, by the knowledge of Christ. Others, by life and godliness, understand all things conducing to the preservation of natural life, likewise of grace here, and glory hereafter; and whereas it is said they were called to glory and virtue, by glory understand the honour of being christians; by virtue, the good life that becomes christians. To both these they were called with a glorious calling, as being attended with the glorious effusion of the Holy Ghost. If by glory and virtue be understood grace here, and glory hereafter, it shews our privilege, that we have both at present in a way of inchoation, and shall ere long enjoy both in a way of consummation; and points out also to us our duty, we must have virtue, if we would have glory; if we be not like Christ, we can never love him, nor may we ever expect to live with him.

4 Whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises, that by these you might be partakers of the divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust.

Whereby, or by whom, that is, through the knowledge of Christ in the gospel, God has given to us all things conducing to our present or future happiness; and, amongst the rest, the precious promises of the gospel, which so directly tend to make men partakers of the divine nature. Note here, That the promises of the gospel are the christian's great and precious treasure; greatness and goodness are then most shining, when they meet in the same subject, but such a glorious conjunction is rarely found, either in persons or things; rarely are great men good, or good men great; pebbles are great, but not precious; pearls are precious, but not great: But the promises are both for quality exceeding precious, and that in respect of the author of them, God; the foundation of them, the blood of Christ; the manner of their dispensation, they are freely given; the means whereby they are apprehended and applied, precious faith; and exceeding precious the promises are in regard of the end of them, which is to make us partakers of the divine nature, not of the essence, but qualities of the divine nature, which enable us in some measure to resemble God; as the seal doth communicate its signature, but not its substance; so in the work of regeneration God doth not impart his essence, but infuse holy principles and gracious habits into the soul, whereby the christian resembles him. Learn hence, That the great end and effect of the promises, and the proper influence and efficacy which they ought to have upon the hearts and lives of men, is this, to make them partakers of the divine nature, and to render them daily more like unto God; Having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust. Here note, 1. That the world is full, very full, of corruption, sin, and temptation; by reason of the lust of men, they rub their leprosy upon each other, and by the contagion of a bad example, infect and poison one another. 2. That by being made partakers of the divine nature, through the influence of the promises, we escape the pollution of fleshly lusts, which the world is defiled with, and would defile us by.

5 And besides this, giving all diligence, add to your faith, virtue; and to virtue, knowledge; 6 And to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; 7 And to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness charity.

The apostle spends the former part of the chapter in comforting, this in exhorting; he told us before what God had done for us; he tells us now, what we must do for ourselves; it is not fit that Heaven should take all the pains, and we none; we must give diligence, all diligence. Besides this, that is, besides what God has given us, and done for us, let us take care to be daily adding to our stock and store. Adding to our faith, virtue; that is, all good works in general, without which faith is dead, or dying; and fortitude, or holy courage, in doing our duty in particular. To virtue, knowledge; that is, a more exact knowledge of your duty, and a farther increase in it; for knowledge is the light, without which the christian cannot see to do his work. And to knowledge must be added, temperance, which subdues the violence of our unruly passions and appetites, and does reduce those rebellious powers under the government and dominion of reason and religion. And to temperance, patience under all wrongs and sufferings whatsoever; an impatient man under affliction tion is like a bedlamite in chains, raving against God and man. To patience, godliness, a conscientious regard to all the duties of the first table; let the fear of God restrain you from sin, the love of God constrain you to duty. And to godliness, brotherly kindness, or a fervent love to all christians, as being our brethren and fellow-members in Christ, and this for grace sake. And to brotherly kindness, charity; that is, to all mankind, as proceeding from the same stock, having the same nature, and subject to the same necessities with ourselves; let there be found with you a desire and endeavour to do all the possible good you can to every one. Learn and observe from the whole, That there is a concatenation both of graces and duties, they must not be separated, they will not live single; where there is one grace in sincerity, there is a constant care to secure all the rest; and where a christian, for conscience sake, performs one duty, he will make conscience of all the rest; the duties of both tables are religiously observed, both as an argument of his sincerity, and as an ornament to his holy profession.

8 For if these things be in you, and abound, they make you that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ.

9. But he that lacketh these things, is blind, and cannot see afar off, and hath forgotten that he was purged from his old sins.

To encourage christians to grow and improve in the fore-mentioned virtues and graces, our apostle here lays before us, (1.) The great advantage of such a proficiency and growth; If these things be in you and abound, that is, the forementioned graces, they will both cause you, and evidence you not to be barren and unfruitful in your profession of christianity and faith in Christ: The exercises of divine graces are the best evidences of our being made partakers of the divine nature. (2.) The miserable estate of those whose faith is not fruitful in good works; He that lacketh these things, that is, who doth not live in the exercise of the aforementioned graces, is spiritually blind, and really destitute of that knowledge which he pretends to, blinded by his passions and lusts, and sensual affections, and sees not the great end and design of christianity, forgetting that in baptism he solemnly vowed all this, and that he was sacramentally washed from his old sins.

10 Wherefore the rather, brethren, give diligence to make your calling and election sure: for if ye do these things, ye shall never fall:

As if our apostle had said, "See that in the diligent exercise of the afore-named graces, and in the daily practice of the afore-mentioned duties, you make your calling and election, which are sure in themselves, sure to you; for so doing, you shall never fall or miscarry eternally." Here note, That it is their own calling and election which christians are called upon to make sure, not another's; we must leave their case and state to God that searches the heart; we cannot know the hearts of others, it is well if we know our own. Learn, 1. A christian may be assured of his own salvation. 2. Assurance of salvation requires all diligence. 3. That assurance of salvation deserves all diligence. 4.

That the way to make our election sure, is first to make our calling sure.

11 For so an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

There are four sorts of persons spoken of in Scripture: 1. Some are said to be far from the kingdom of God, afar off from God, as heathens and infidels, who know not God. 2. Others are said not to be far from the kingdom of God, Mark xii. 34. who yet will never come there. 3. Others are scarcely saved, saved with great difficulty, so as by fire, with much dross of error in judgement, and corruption in life. 4. Others are said to have an abundant entrance administered to them into the everlasting kingdom, and these are the fruitful christians, who are daily adding to their graces, and going from strength to strength: These shoot the gulph of death in the holy triumph of their grace; they enter the harbour of heaven with a plerophory, a full sail, with a full assurance of faith and hope: Thus will the fruitful christian have both a more comfortable passage to, and also a more ample reward in heaven.

12 Wherefore I will not be negligent to put you always in remembrance of these things, though ye know them, and be established in the present truth.

13 Yea, I think it meet, as long as I am in this tabernacle, to stir you up, by putting you in remembrance: 14 Knowing that shortly I must put off this my tabernacle, even as our Lord Jesus Christ hath shewed me. 15 Moreover I will endeavour that you may be able, after my decease, to have these things always in remembrance.

Observe here, 1. The persons to whom the apostle gave the foregoing exhortation to progressiveness and proficiency in holiness, they were knowing persons, yea established persons, they were both informed and confirmed in the truth; but were they knowing, yet they wanted farther information; were they established, yet might they want farther confirmation. It is a very dangerous notion that some have taken up, that a christian in this life may live above ordinances, and outgrow counsels and exhortations, as if he need not hear, or pray, or the like. St. Peter thought otherwise: these were grown christians to whom he writes, yet he tells them three several times together here, in four verses, that he would not be negligent to put them in remembrance, even of those things which they knew already. 2. The exemplary diligence and industry of the apostle in his ministerial work, together with his constancy therein, as long as I am in this tabernacle; that is, as long as I live in this world, I will endeavour to keep the heavenly flame of love and zeal burning very lively upon the altar of your hearts. 3. The motive or consideration provoking him to this diligence, and that is, the certainty of his approaching dissolution, I must shortly put off this tabernacle, &c. Where note, 1. He calls his body a tabernacle in regard of its moveableness and frailty, and in opposition to that house made without hands, eternal in the heavens. 2. How familiarly familiarly our apostle speaks of death, I must put off this tabernacle; he makes no more of putting off his body, by death, than a man does of putting off his clothes at night.

3. The necessity of putting off the body, I must, I may and I must shortly; intimating, that how strong soever the affections and inclinations of souls are to the fleshly tabernacles they now live in, yet they must put them off, and that speedily. 4. How the consideration of the certainty and suddenness of St. Peter's removal by death did excite and provoke him to the utmost industry and diligence in his ministerial work, while he lived; the apprehensions of approaching death must quicken to utmost diligence. Note lastly, That ministers must never give over pressing known truths as long as they live, that their people may have them in remembrance after their decease.

16 For we have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eye-witnesses of his majesty. 17 For he received from God the Father honour and glory, when there came such a voice to him from the excellent glory, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased. 18 And this voice which came from heaven we heard, when we were with him in the holy mount.

Our apostle comes now to exhort them to constancy in the faith of the Gospel, assuring them that himself and his fellow apostles, had not followed artfully devised fables, when they made known to them the coming of Christ in the flesh, and that he was truly, and in very-deed, the promised Messias, for that he himself, with James and John, were with Christ upon mount Tabor, as eye witnesses of his transfiguration, where and when he received in his human nature a communicated splendour and God the Father from heaven, the seat of the magnificent glory, pronounced him to be his well-beloved Son, in whom he is well-pleased. Learn hence, 1. That God the Father's testimony from heaven, concerning his Son Jesus Christ did effectually bring honour and glory unto Christ, and is a great obligation upon us to faith and obedience to him; He received from God the Father honour and glory, attesting him to be his well-beloved Son. 2. That there was as much assurance given of the certainty of Christ's being the promised Messias, and of the truth of the evangelical doctrine, as the world could reasonably desire. Men can humanly be certain of nothing more than what they perceive by their senses, which are the proper judges of all sensible objects; now no satisfaction of this kind was wanting to the world concerning our blessed Saviour and his miracles: The apostles attesting what they had heard, what they had seen with their eyes, and their hands had handled of the word of life, 1 John i. 1.

19 We have also a more sure word of prophecy: whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day star arise in your hearts:

Observe here, That the scriptures, or written word of God, are a more sure word to us than any voice from heaven, or revelation whatsoever; not that there was any uncertainty in the Lord's voice uttered from heaven at Christ's transfiguration, but because that transient voice was only heard by three, and might be mistaken or forgotten; whereas the Holy Scriptures are a standing and authentic record, and a most sure ground for faith to build upon; and accordingly our apostle tells them, they should do well to attend unto the written word, that is, the scriptures of the Old Testament, as unto a light that shined in that dark time until, by considering those ancient prophecies, and comparing them with what Christ hath done and suffered, they might find the day dawning upon them, and the morning star the Holy Spirit, arising in their hearts, so enlightening and convincing them, that no more doubts or scruples should be left in them, concerning this great truth, attested by a voice from heaven, and confirmed by the writings of the prophets, namely, that Jesus is the true and promised Messias, and really the Son of God. Learn hence, that the written word of God, is a surer word, more to be depended and relied upon than any voice from heaven, though attested by the greatest and most eminent apostle, and consequently to be more heeded and regarded by us; nay, farther, the sanctifying operation of the Holy Spirit in and upon the hearts and lives of sincere and serious christians is a more certain and indubitable evidence of their salvation than if an angel should come from heaven on purpose to tell them that they should certainly come thither; for the testimony of an angel, at the highest, is but the testimony of a creature; but the testimony of the sanctifying Spirit is the testimony of God himself; it is therefore the sure word, that we are to attend unto; and that revelation of God's will being final, is and ought to be attended to, before any pretended or real revelations whatsoever.

20 Knowing this first, that no prophecy of the scripture is of any private interpretation. 21 For the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man: But holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.

These words are understood variously. (1.) some interpret thus: That no part of holy scripture was written by any private impulse, incitation, or motion, by no suggestion of men's own private spirits, but they gave out to us what the Holy Ghost gave in to them; nor did they prophesy according to the will of man, that is, when they would, or that they would, but they spake by the instinct and impulse of the Holy Ghost. The words shew what authority the penman of the holy scriptures had to write what they did, and why we should be so careful to take heed to what they wrote. Learn hence, That it is a very great principle, yea, one of the first principles of our faith, that the scriptures are the very word and will of God, written not by any private spirit, but dictated by the spirit of God, and consequently are no part of them of human invention, but all of divine inspiration, for which reason great respect is due to them, and we shall do well to take heed to them. (2.) Others understand the words thus: That no prophecy of scripture is to be expounded as speaking speaking only of those persons whom the speaker first intended and meant, according to the speaker's proper private thought, for the holy men of God were moved by God's Spirit to speak those words which signified more than they designed, or always meant and understood themselves; as for instance, David often speaks in the Psalms words true of himself and Solomon, but the Holy Ghost pointed at Christ, who was typified by those persons; and whether David meant more than himself and Solomon, it is certain the Holy Ghost meant more; so if Josiah be meant in Isa. liii. as some would have it, it is evident that he was but typical, and that the Holy Ghost meant Christ and his sufferings ultimately; so that it is plain that the scripture prophecy receives its full sense from the Spirit, and not from the speaker; and must not be appropriated narrowly to those private men, by whom, or of whom they were proximately meant by the speaker. 3. others understand the words after this manner, namely, that no private person must take upon him the interpretation of holy scriptures, but refer all to the church: Hence Eitius infers, "That the reformed and their pastors must not interpret the scriptures, but the catholic church only." To which we reply, that as no private persons, so likewise no church, may presume to interpret scripture according to their own mind, nor make their private sense to be the sense of scripture, but to seek understanding from God, who shews the meaning of the word by the word comparing (scripture with scripture) and by his Spirit leads good men into the knowledge and understanding of it; knowing this, that no prophecy of the scripture is of private interpretation, &c.

CH A P. II.

Our apostle in this chapter declares the coming in of false prophets and teachers, that would pervert the truth of doctrine by bringing in damnable heresies.

BUT there were false prophets also among the people, even as there shall be false teachers among you, who privily shall bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction.

Observe here, 1. How the apostle foretels the coming of false teachers into the gospel church, as there had been false prophets in the Jewish church; no age of the church ever was or will be free of them; but the run of the last times is most likely to have most of these four dregs. There shall be false teachers among you, false teachers then may find a scripture prophecy for their being in the church, but they will hardly find a scripture warrant for their being there. Observe, 2. The doctrines which they will teach; and they are damnable heresies. Where note, That almighty God never intended a certain remedy against heresy, any more than he did against sin and vice: It is certain, that there is no certain and effectual remedy against either of them: God does what he sees best and fittest, not what we think to be so. Note also, That infallibility itself is no effectual remedy against heresy; the apostles were certainly infallible, and yet they could neither prevent nor extinguish heresy, which never more abounded than in the apostles' times: St. Paul says, there must be heresies, 1 Cor. i. 19. St. Peter here says, that there shall be false teachers: Now, if there must be heresies and false teachers, either the church is not infallible, or infallibility is no effectual remedy against heresy. Observe, 3. That Christ is here called the Lord that bought these men who brought destruction upon themselves, denying the Lord that bought them; because none should perish for want of a sufficient sacrifice for sin: Christ by his blood purchased for them pardon and life, to be theirs, upon condition of believing acceptance. Lastly, As the seeds-men, false teachers, and the seed they sow, damnable heresies, so the crop they shall reap, and that is swift destruction; as damnable heresies are brought in privily, so the blasphemous heretic, the seducing heretic, the seditious heretic, brings upon himself swift destruction; sometimes temporal destruction in this world, certainly eternal, without repentance, in the next.

2 And many shall follow their pernicious ways, by reason of whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of.

As if the apostle had said, "Notwithstanding heretics bring such fatal destruction upon themselves, yet many that profess christianity shall be seduced by them, and follow their pernicious ways, by reason of whom the enemies of religion will speak evil of it, and the professors of it. Here observe, 1. The thriving and growth of heresies, many shall follow their pernicious ways. Where note, The nature of error, it is pernicious and destructive; and the efficacy of error, not a few, but many are in danger of being perverted by it. Observe, 2. The sad sequel or truth of this by reason of whom the way of truth is evil-spoken of. Note here, 1. The title given to the christian religion, it is the way of truth, so stiled from its parentage and original, the God of truth; in regard of its efficacy, it works truth in the inward parts, and because it brings those that embrace and practise it, to the enjoyment of him who is the God of truth. 2. The coarse usage which religion meets with from many in the world, it is blasphemed or evil-spoken of by persons following seducers, by reason of whom the way of truth is evil-spoken of. It is no new or unusual thing for religion, and the sincere professors of it, to be traduced and slandered by heretical seducers and false teachers.

3 And through covetousness shall they with feigned words make merchandise of you: whose judgment now of a long time lingereth not, and their damnation slumbereth not.

Observe here, 1. What is the root of all heresy; it is covetousness, which the apostle calls the root of all evil; they are covetous, worldly-minded men generally, who hope some way or other to make an advantage of their opinions, who broach errors and false doctrines. 2. The miserable condition of the seduced, they are sold by heretics like beasts; they make merchandise of you: The business of heretics is to sell their own and others souls, as Judas did Christ, for some outward benefit. 3. The arts which heretics and seducers use to circumvent and deceive, and that is feigned words, artificially composed to seduce, drawing into error with a deceitful eloquence. 4. The dreadful punishment which attends their sin, swift destruction; their damnation slumbereth not, &c. Learn, That the righteous judgment of God brings damnation upon the wicked, and their damnation will come swiftly, very swiftly upon them.

4 For if God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment: 5 And spared not the old world, but saved Noah the eighth person, a preacher of righteousness, bringing in the flood upon the world of the ungodly; 6 And turning the cities of Sodom and Gomorrha into ashes, condemned them with an overthrow, making them an ensample unto those that after should live ungodly:

Our apostle having asserted in the foregoing verse, that the judgment of the wicked in general lingereth not, and that the damnation of seducers in particular slumbereth not; he comes here in these verses to make his assertion good by a threefold instance, namely, the angels, the old world, and the people of Sodom and Gomorrha; from whence he would have them conclude, that, if God spared not these, he would not long spare false prophets and their followers. Observe, 1. The example of God's severity on the fallen angels; they sinned, and kept not their first state, they fell from that state of holiness in which they were originally created; and their punishment followed, they were cast down to hell, and delivered into chains of darkness, reserved unto judgment. But are they not judged and punished already? Yes, no doubt, but the full wrath of God will not be poured out upon them until the day of judgement, if they are now as full of sin as they can be, it is certain they are not so full of misery and torment as they shall be. Learn hence, 1. That the angels, though created in an holy, yet are they not in an immutable state. 2. The freedom of their own wills, was the cause of their sin, and their sin the cause of their misery. 3. That for sin they were cast down to hell, where their misery is much but they expect more. Observe, 2. The example of the old world, upon whose sinning God brought a flood, drowning them all, except eight persons. Where note, That the greatest multitude and number of sinners does not hinder God's justice from executing judgment upon them for their sins; a whole world sinning are as easily destroyed by God as a single sinner. 3. He instances in the wicked cities of Sodom and Gomorrha, who were consumed by fire from heaven, and rendered by the Almighty a dreadful spectacle to all that should live ungodly. Sin lays the foundation of ruin in the most flourishing cities and kingdoms; the strongest walls cannot keep judgments out, when sin enters in; Sodom's plenty and power could not secure her inhabitants, when sin had once exposed them to the wrath of God. Note also, The intention, end and design of God, in punishing some sinners; it is to make them examples unto others.

7 And delivered just Lot, vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked: 8 (For that righteous man dwelling among them, in seeing and hearing, vexed his righteous soul from day to day with their unlawful deeds.)

Observe here, 1. As bad as Sodom was, it had a good man in it; God leaves not himself without witness, in the vilest and worst of places God has some that profess his name, and bear witness to his truth. 2. The character given of him, just Lot; the denomination was taken from the habitual frame of his heart, and the general tenor of his life. 3. How this good man laid to heart the wickedness of Sodom; he was grieved for their wicked and filthy conversation before God, more than for their unkind and cruel behaviour towards him; the spirit of a child of God is a sympathizing spirit, it sadly lays to heart both the sins and the sufferings of others. 4. The care that God took for this good man's preservation, he delivered just Lot; he delivered him from the company and conversation of the wicked, which was a continual vexation to him; and also delivered him from the judgments which were righteously brought upon the wicked.

9 The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations, and to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished.

From the particular example of Lot, and his gracious preservation in Sodom's destruction, the apostle draws this general conclusion, "That Almighty God knows how to preserve his own faithful servants from the evil of temptations and trials, which they here meet with, in the world, and from the world, and can and will reserve the wicked to the day of judgment to be punished." Note here, 1. That the Lord has a perfect and exact knowledge both of the righteous and the wicked, and of their several ways and doings. 2. That God knoweth many ways how to deliver the righteous (but considering the tenor of his revealed will) he knoweth no way how to deliver the wicked, they having refused all ways of his appointment for their own deliverance. 3. That although the wicked sometimes escape trouble, yet they are never delivered from it; all their preservations from evil are but reservations for future and farther evil; the wicked are not so much preserved from, as reserved unto future wrath: Thus we see how Almighty God very well knows how to perform all those things which he has promised to the godly, and threatened to the wicked.

10 But chiefly them that walk after the flesh, in the lust of uncleanness, and despise government: presumptuous are they, self-willed they are not afraid to speak evil of dignities.

As if the apostle had said, "Though God reserves all wicked men to punishment, yet especially heretics and seducers, who second their corrupt doctrine with a wicked conversation, such as walk after the flesh in the lust of uncleanness." Note, That heretics are frequently unclean persons, monstrous opinions, and vile affections accompany one another; such as oppose the faith are flesh-defilers. Farther, Seducers are opposers of civil government and dominion, they despise government, &c. Some think the dignities here intended were the angels, others the apostles, but most understand derstand it of civil rulers: it is a very heinous sin in the sight of God to despise government, and oppose rulers.

11 Whereas angels, which are greater in power and might, bring not railing accusation against them before the Lord.

That is, "Whereas the blessed angels, who have more power than men, when they plead against devils themselves, do it not by railing accusation." Note 1. That angels are far superior to men in dignity and power. 2. That purity of affection does accompany angelical illumination; as the angels are above us, so are they the patterns of holiness to us. 3. They are eminently so with respect to the government of their passions; when they contend with devils themselves, it is without disturbance, without railing accusations. It is our duty to learn this angelical lesson, of forbearing railing accusations; not to return evil for evil, but being defamed, to entreat; we are to be as just to another's reputation as our own; they that handle the names of others rudely, must expect their own will be, at one time or other, handled as roughly; nothing is more just with God, than to suffer others to open their mouths against those who will open their own mouths against others.

12 But these, as natural brute beasts made to be taken and destroyed, speak evil of the things that they understand not, and shall utterly perish in their own corruption:

Observe here, What our apostle compares these heretical seducers to, and sets them forth by, brute beasts. 1. Because their minds run after sensual objects violently and impudently, and they know no measure in the using of them; like swine, they wallow over head and ears in the mud of their sensual lusts: And, 2. They were also as secure as the brute beasts; they mock at the denunciation of God's judgments, saying, Where is the promise of his coming? Seducers are perfect sensualists; it is a righteous thing with God to leave them to be governed by sense, who will not be guided by grace; they would not be saints and at length they cease to be men; but, like brutes, fall into the ditch of beastly sensuality. O christian! beg of God that thy grace may be true and supernatural; for if it be only in appearance, and doth not arise to true sanctity, it may soon degenerate and sink down into sensual bestiality. In a word, 3. They are to perish, and to be destroyed like brute beasts; all seek to destroy them for their hurtfulness, but these moral beasts destroy themselves; sensual seducers perish in their own corruptions; in their natural corruptions, by their luxury and intemperance, bringing diseases and death upon their bodies; in their civil corruptions, overthrowing their families, by swallowing down their estates; yea, they corrupt themselves eternally, destroying body and soul by their excess. Lord! how will the fatted glutton (without repentance) fry in hell; how dismal a recompence will a sea of brimstone be for a river of wine! They who are drowned in profaneness, shall certainly be drowned in perdition.

13 And shall receive the reward of unrighteousness, as they that count it pleasure to riot in the day-time: spots they are and blemishes, sporting themselves with their own deceivings, while they feast with you: 14 Having eyes full of adultery, and that cannot cease from sin; beguiling unstable souls; an art they have exercised with covetous practices: cursed children:

Here we have many sad and dreadful instances given of the height of sensuality and brutishness which these seducers were arrived at, and had attained unto. Lord! how do fleshly lusts, and sensual affections, obscure the light of conscience, and corrupt its judgment? There is such an intimate communion between the soul and the body, that they interchangeably corrupt one another. To what a desperate degree of hardness and insensibility, had the flames of lust seared the consciences of these men! They had lost all the ingenuous bashfulness of human nature, and pleased themselves in their licentious principles and practices, not declining to do that at noon day which heathens would have blushed to be found doing at midnight. Observe particularly, how luxury and uncleanness accompany each other; they took pleasure in rioting and sporting themselves in their feasts, and their eyes were full of adultery. They feasted and fed immeasurably, impurely, and lustfully, making their plenty fodder and fuel for their lusts; for, having fed to the full, every one neighed after his neighbour's wife, and putting out the candles after supper, they gave way promiscuously to the ravings of unbridled lust, turning the temple of the Holy Ghost into an hog-stye: But know, O unclean sinner! that God will return flames for flames, and revenge this fire in thy heart with the fire of hell. How nearly does it concern thee, who has burst in these impure lusts of uncleanness, and kindled the flames of God's wrath, to labour to cool and quench them with the blood of Christ, and the tears of repentance, which alone can allay the heats of sin in thee, and of wrath in God? Let unclean sinners improve examples, lest they be made examples.

15 Which have forsaken the right way, and are gone astray, following the way of Balaam, the son of Bosor, who loved the wages of unrighteousness; 16 But was rebuked for his iniquity; the dumb ass speaking with man's voice, forbade the madness of the prophet.

Our apostle, having charged these men with insatiable lust in the former verse, proceeds next to tax them with insatiable covetousness in this verse, declaring that this sin had diverted them from the right way of truth and godliness, and caused them to imitate Balaam of old, whose love of honour and wealth so blinded his eyes, that the ass he rode upon could see beyond him, whose mouth God miraculously opened to rebuke the madness of the prophet. Note here, 1. How the wicked in after ages do in their courses and practices imitate such wicked persons as lived before them in former ages: These men followed the way of Balaam, imitate his covetousness and insatiable desire of wealth. 2. That as it is the nature of all sin to carry men out of the way, so covetousness in particular will carry a man astray, and put him upon the practice of any wickedness: It neither fears nor forbears any sinful course to attain its end; they that will be rich meet with many enticements ments unto sin, and they will not fear to embrace any enticement. Nay, verily a thirst after gain will make a man thirst after blood, to get gain. Witness Balaam and Judas, who were both covetous and bloody. Covetousness is oftentimes the cause of uncleanness. How many, for the sake of money, have violated their matrimonial faith, allured more with the adulterer's purse than by his person. Let no person hope to escape any sin that embraces this one sin. 3. What a mighty struggle there sometimes is in a natural man's conscience concerning sin. The light of Balaam's conscience made him refuse the wages of unrighteousness, and speak honourably: If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold, I cannot, &c. but at the same time lust in his heart led him forth strongly to desire it. He loved the wages of unrighteousness; loved it, yet durst not touch it. 4. How extremely, yea, brutishly mad, such men are upon their lusts, who will not be rebuked or stopped in their progress of impiety without a miracle. Balaam's running was so greedy, and his march so furious, that he had cursed the people, had not the angel stopped him, and the ass spoken to him. Little thanks to a resolute sinner that he does not rush on, when the arm of omnipotency pulls him back. O let the heart-changing power of the grace of God influence us to good, as well as his almighty arm restrain us from evil, or we are miserable.

17 These are wells without water, clouds that are carried with a tempest, to whom the mist of darkness is reserved for ever.

Still our apostle proceeds in characterising and describing these seducers, which were then amongst them. He describing them before by their luxury and licentiousness, by their incontinency and uncleanness, by their insatiableness and covetousness, now he proceeds to discover their vanity and emptiness. They pretended indeed to be deep fountains of saving knowledge, but they were like wells without water; and to be clouds, containing abundance of rain, for the watering of the church; whereas they were like clouds carried about with the tempest of pride and ambition, from one vicious doctrine and practise to another, darkening the church; for whom, by the just judgment of God, is reserved the blackness of darkness for ever. Note here, 1. The ministers of the Gospel ought to be as wells, for depth of knowledge, for purity of doctrine, for fidelity and fixedness of abode; every one knows where the town-well stands; though ministers are wells of clay, yet should they be always full of the water of life, and always at hand for the people to have recourse unto. 2. The ministers of Christ must be full and watery clouds, able and apt to teach, able to open scriptures, able to convince gainfayers, continually dropping down the heavenly dew; but not as clouds without water, without the water of true knowledge, without the water of holiness, sanctity both of heart and life, nor without the water of consolation and refreshment. The highest commendation of a minister is industry for, and usefulness to the souls of others; clouds confine themselves by watering others. 3. That although seducers are wont to make great shews and appearances of worth in themselves, yet it is a great and inexcusable sin to make shew of that goodness of which we are wholly void, and to which we are also opposite; to be wells without water, and clouds without rain, big and black, accompanied with emptiness and dryness. Appearing goodness sets men at the farthest distance from real goodness; they that satisfy themselves in appearances, will never labour after holiness in reality.

18 For when they speak great swelling words of vanity, they allure through the lusts of the flesh; through much wantonness, those that were clean escaped from them who live in error.

The next sin charged upon these seducers is pride and ostentation, they speak big, great swelling words of vanity; with a lofty and affected style they propound their false doctrines to amuse the simple. It is the usual practice of seducers to speak in an high-flown strain of words, that, being not understood, they may be the more admired. Next they allure to their party such novice christians who had left the heathenish beastiality, and made an outward profession of the christian religion. The word rendered to allure, is a metaphor taken from fishers or fowlers, who produce the bait or shrap, but hide the net or snare. Seducers bait their hook with such baits as are proper to the fish they would catch, else they are no good anglers. But observe, what the bait is here before us, it is liberty, it is licentiousness, they allure through the lusts of the flesh? no bait like this. Learn hence, That the true reason why seducers have so many followers is this, because their doctrine is libertinism, and most agreeable to the carnal lusts and corrupt affections of men. This is the true reason why popery has had so many profelytes; they allure through the lusts of the flesh. Never was a religion better calculated for gratifying men's beastly lusts than popery; it indulges a liberty to all abominable lusts and unchristian practises, yet after all will, blanch over wilful violations of God's laws with the favourable title of venial crimes. Let my soul, at the great day, be rather found among the sober heathen philosophers, than among sensual and brutish christians.

19 While they promise them liberty, they themselves are the servants of corruption: for of whom a man is overcome, of the same is he brought in bondage.

Observe here, 1. How the old pretence for the most unbounded licentiousness has been liberty; they promise you liberty; a liberty to do any thing without fear: but this is not liberty properly, but licentiousness, which in reality is the greatest slavery. Accordingly it follows, they themselves are the servants of corruption; that is, such as promise you a sinful liberty, are the greatest slaves to sin and corruption themselves. All sin is servitude and slavery; and when sin and sinners flatter men with the great opinion of liberty, it makes them the most miserable vassals, and the worst of slaves; for so many lusts, so many lords, so many vices, so many tyrants has a sinner over him. As when the conqueror brings the vanquished into captivity, he makes them slaves, and imposes on them vile and servile offices; in like manner, those lusts, by which sinners have been conquered and brought in bondage, they must needs be slaves unto. Is this liberty to obey every lust as a petty slave? Call you this freedom, when a man cannot choose but sin? It to sin be the only liberty, they have no liberty in heaven; no, this is the service of corruption; a thraldom not a freedom.

20 For if after they have escaped the pollutions of the world through the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, they are again entangled therein, and overcome: the latter end is worse with them than the beginning.

By escaping the pollutions of the world, understand their renouncing of them in baptism; their conversion from heathenism to the profession of christianity, by the knowledge of the gospel. Now, if afterwards they return to it again, and are entangled in their idolatry, and other gross sins, their latter end is worse than their beginning, their christian heathenism worse than their old heathenism. Learn hence, That a person may forsake many gross and scandalous sins, and have a visible change and reformation wrought in his life; but, not being a thorough and prevailing change, he is still in an unsafe state; his latter end may be worse than the beginning.

21 For it had been better for them not to have known the way of righteousness, than after they have known it, to turn from the holy commandment delivered unto them.

As if the apostle had said, The sin and misery of these men had been far less, if they had never known the way of righteousness revealed by the gospel of Christ, than after they have known it, to forsake the practice of holiness, which by their baptismal profession they had obliged themselves unto. Learn hence, That to sin against light and knowledge received in and by the gospel is a very heinous aggravation of sin. The condition of persons simply ignorant is not so bad by far as theirs, who have been enlightened, and yet afterwards have apostatized. A relapse is ever more dangerous than the first sickness, more soon incurred; more hardly cured. Wo to those that relapse from God to the world, from truth to error, from grace to vice; the latter end will be worse than their beginning, if they recover not themselves again by timely repentance.

22 But it is happened unto them according to the true proverb, the dog is turned to his own vomit again; and, The sow that was washed, to her wallowing in the mire.

Observe here, The odious character given of apostates; the apostle compares them to dogs and swine, who, though washed in the water of baptism externally, yet their natures were never internally renewed by the Holy Ghost, as Christ's sheep are. All the outward reformation of life which is found in unrenewed persons, is but like the washing of a swine, which you may make clean, but can never make cleanly; upon occasion it will again to the mire; make the swine a sheep, change its nature, and it will never delight in filth more; but, whilst it retains its filthy nature, it will delight in filthiness. Dogs that have disgorged their stomachs, are dogs still; and swine washed are swine still. No wonder then if temptation draw them to return to their vomit, and mire again. O our God! as thou hast outwardly washed us in baptism, do thou inwardly renew us, and thoroughly sanctify us by the Holy Spirit; as we are the workmanship of thine hands, make us also the sheep of thy pasture, that our love to purity may daily more and more increase: That when apostatizing sinners return to their vomit with the dog, and to the mire with the swine, and so draw back into perdition, we may be of the number of those that persevere to the salvation of our souls. Amen.

CHAP. III.

Our apostle in this chapter exhorts christians to the love and practice of universal holiness, as the best preparative for the day of judgment.

THIS second epistle, beloved, I now write unto you: in both which I stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance; 2 That ye may be mindful of the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets, and of the commandment of us the apostles of the Lord and Saviour:

Observe here, 1. The design of both St. Peter's epistles was one and the same, even to put them in remembrance of, and to call to their minds what they had formerly heard and understood, but possibly not retained, nor duly considered. Note, The office of ministers is to be remembrancers. The Lord's remembrancers, by putting him in mind of the people's wants; their people's remembrancers, by putting them frequently in mind of their duty to God. There is then a constant necessity of a conscientious ministry; none are weary of it but such as love not to be remembered of their duty by it. Nay, farther, St. Peter tells them, he would stir up their pure minds by way of remembrance; implying, that the memories of the best christians stand in need of refreshing, and the affections of the holiest want a fresh exciting. The freest christians sometimes want a spur: We are slow to learn what we should do, and more slow to do what we have learnt. Great then is the sin of those who condemn repeated truths. Cursed is that curiosity that despises a wholesome truth, because it is common. If we have such nice stomachs that will not endure to eat twice of the same dish, if wholesome; it is just with God, that want should overtake our wantonness. Observe, 2. What it is that he would have them remember and be mindful of; it is the word of prophecy in the Old Testament, and the doctrine of the gospel in and under the New, That ye be mindful of the words spoken before by the holy prophets, namely, Enoch and Daniel, who prophesied of the general judgment of the last day, and of the destruction of Jerusalem, then at hand. Observe, 3. How St. Peter here joins the prophets and apostles together, as concurring harmoniously in their doctrine; what was foretold by the prophets was confirmed by the apostles; hence they are said to have but one mouth, St. Luke i. As he spake by the mouth of all his prophets, not by the mouths; for, though the prophets and apostles were many, yet had they all but one mouth, speaking all the same things.

3 Knowing this first that there shall come in the last days scoffers, walking after their own lusts, 4 And saying, Where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation.

Observe here, 1. The persons foretold, or what sort of men should be found in these last days; namely, scoffers. These are the dregs of mankind, found in the dregs of time; they scoff sometimes at the word of God, sometimes at religion and the ways of good men; sometimes at sin, and the follies of those that are bad. The scoffing spirit, is a vile spirit; it is better to be a fool than a flouter; better to have a dull spirit, than a deriding spirit; to deride God and religion is the height of impiety. Such as are in the chair of the scorner are in the highest form in the devil's school. 2. What it was that these men scoffed at; namely, at the prediction of our Saviour's coming to judge the world; they say, Where is the promise of his coming? because Christ did not come when some looked for him, they concluded he would not come at all, but that all things should go on in a constant course, as they had done from the beginning of the creation. 3. The character of the persons who are called scoffers; they are said to walk after their own lusts, men of sensual spirits, and licentious lives. No wonder, that they who give themselves up to all manner of sensuality, do deny a judgment to come; for, as it is expedient for them that there should be none, so they endeavour to persuade themselves that there shall be none, and are glad to find arguments to fortify themselves in that persuasion. But surely God scorneth the scorners, he will laugh at their calamity, and mock when their desolation cometh. Lord! what a black and horrid ingratitude is this, to scoff at the Author of our beings, and the Patron of our lives; to live in defiance of him in whom we live? Is it not time for God to come and judge the world, when men begin to doubt whether ever he made it?

5 For this they willingly are ignorant of, that by the word of God the heavens were of old, and the earth standing out of the water and in the water. 6 Whereby the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished. 7 But the heavens and the earth which are now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men.

These scoffers had declared in the former verse, that the world was the same it was from the beginning; that nature always had, and therefore ever would keep its course. But, says the apostle here, these scoffers know better; if they be ignorant, they are willingly ignorant what a change God made in the world since the creation of it, and that he can as easily destroy it, as he did at first create it. To evidence this, the apostle shews how God by water drowned the old world, and therefore all things had not continued as they were from the beginning of the creation; and that this present world shall, when God's time is come, be ruined by fire, as the old world was by water. The same omnipotent power of God which created the world, upholds it and preserves it, and will at last destroy it, namely, at the final judgment, when all wicked persons, especially prophane scoffers at, and deriders of Christ's coming, shall be condemned and perish. Hence learn, That those great and awful works of God, the creation preservation, and final destruction of the world, first by water, and next by fire, none ought to be ignorant of, but all ought to meditate frequently upon, and be continually prepared for. 2. That the day of judgment will be a day of perdition to ungodly men, they shall then be utterly and eternally destroyed. The wicked are called in scripture sons of perdition, they are so actively, they make it their work to destroy others, and they are so passively, they shall be destroyed at that day, when they and their works shall be burnt up.

8 But beloved, be not ignorant of this one thing, that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day. 9 The Lord is not slack concerning his promise (as some men count slackness) but is long suffering to us-ward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance.

Our apostle here answers the cavil and objection of the forementioned scoffers, namely, That if Christ intends to come to judgment, why does he so long defer his coming? To this our apostle replies, 1. by assuring them that this delay ought not to be judged according to our sense and apprehension of things, for God does not measure time as we do, but a thousand years, which seem so long to us, are but a day, yea, but a moment to him who is eternal, and inhabiteth eternity. To the eternity of God no finite duration bears any proportion; to eternity all time is equally short; God does not measure time by our pole, nor cast up years by our arithmetic. 2. He assures them farther, that God's delay of judgment did not proceed from slackness, but from divine patience and goodness. He delays his coming on purpose to give men time to repent, and by repentance to prevent their eternal ruin. Learn hence, 1. That God's delay of judgment is no ground for sinners to conclude that he will not come to judgment, for our Saviour has no where fixed and determined the time of it. We can neither be sure when our Lord will come, nor certain when he will not come. 2. That the true reason why God defers judgment, is to give sinners opportunity for repentance, if this be not complied with, he reserves those who are incorrigibly bad, to a more remarkable ruin, condemning them that will not be saved, but obstinately destroy themselves.

10 But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night, in which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also, and the works that are therein shall be burnt up.

Our apostle having asserted, that this solemn day of judgment the Jews, at the destruction of Jerusalem first, and then of all mankind at the end of the world, will certainly come; he next shews the manner how, and that though this great day of the Lord comes slowly, yet it will come unexpectedly, like a thief of the night, surprizing the secure and unprepared part of the world. The thief cometh without warning and without noise, so shall the coming of the Son of man be. Rev. xvi. 15. Behold I come as a thief, blessed are they that watch. Observe next, The apostle declares what a great change there will be when Christ comes to judgment, namely, a total dissolution of the whole frame of nature, The heavens shall pass away with a great noise, the elements shall melt, and the earth be burnt up: that is, say some, totally consumed and utterly abolished; for when there is no more need of sun and stars, of earth and water, why should they be any more? And when the saints see God face to face, what need of the glass of the creatures to behold the face of God in? Others conceive that the heavens and the earth shall not be annihilated, but bettered and improved, their substance continued, but their qualities changed; that out of this conflagration God will bring forth a new edition of heaven and earth, and of what is contained in them, to be the everlasting monuments of his own power and goodness, and the delightful object of his saints contemplation.

11 Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness.

These words are St. Peter's practical improvement of the foregoing doctrine, concerning the certain, sudden, and terrible judgment of Christ to come. If the whole frame of heaven and earth shall be so wonderfully changed, and a new world made, how holy should they be, and how great a degree of purity should they labour to attain unto, who expect to live in this new world. Learn hence, That the firm belief of Christ's coming to judgment, and the dissolution of this sinful world by fire, should convince all christians of the necessity of, and engage them in their pursuits and endeavours after, a life of universal holiness, and that with the utmost care and possible diligence. Heaven is an holy place, has holy company, holy employments, holy enjoyments; we must be qualified for it, before we can be admitted into it, and begin that life of holiness upon earth which will never end in heaven; without a present meetness for heaven, we must never expect to be admitted into it, Col. i. 12.

12 Looking for and hasting unto the coming of the day of God, wherein the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat?

Having exhorted persons by holiness to prepare for Christ's coming to judgment in the foregoing verse, he now directs them to expect and look for it, to desire and long after it, looking for and hasting unto the coming of the day of God, that joyful day of our perfect deliverance and salvation, when the lower heavens and earth shall be dissolved, and the elements melt with fervent heat. Learn hence, That there is, or ought to be in all believers, a vehement desire after, and a fervent longing for, the coming and appearance of our Lord Jesus Christ. O christian! long intensely for Christ's company, for know assuredly he longs for thine.

13 Nevertheless we (according to his promise) look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. 14 Wherefore, beloved, seeing that ye look for such things, be diligent, that ye may be found of him in peace, without spot, and blameless.

Observe here, 1. What is the subject-matter of the christian's expectation, he looks for new heavens, and a new earth in which dwelleth righteousness, that is, only righteous persons, and perfectly righteous persons, where sin shall no more prevail. 2. What is the ground and foundation of this hope, in the christians, it is the promise of God, we (according to his promise) look for new heavens, &c. To hope for any thing that God has not promised, is presumption. Hope is the expectation of some future good which God has promised, and faith believed. 3. How christians should qualify and fit, make ready and prepare themselves for this joyful hour, this desirable place and state. Be diligent, &c. Give all diligence that ye may be found at that day in a state of peace and reconciliation with God by justification, and without spot, and blameless, without any allowed spot or blame, by pressing now after the highest measures of sanctification, that so an entrance may both joyfully and abundantly be administered to you into that kingdom wherein dwelleth righteousness.

15 And account that the long-suffering of our Lord is salvation, even as our beloved brother Paul also, according to the wisdom given unto him, hath written unto you; 16 As also in all his epistles, speaking in them of these things: in which are some things hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other scriptures, unto their own destruction.

In these words St. Peter advises them to make an holy and wise construction of the forbearance of God in his delaying to come to judgement, not to think that God neglects them under sufferings, or is well-pleased with the perverseness of the world in sinning; but his patience and long-suffering towards them is hereby displayed, in order to the bringing of them to repentance, and by repentance to salvation. Account that the long-suffering of God, that is, the design of God in his long-suffering, is the sinner's salvation. Here note, That patience and long-suffering in God is an ability or power in him, not only to delay the execution of his wrath for a time, by a temporary suspension of it towards them that perish, and shall feel it at last; but to delay the execution of it towards others, in order to their eternal salvation, that they may never feel it. Observe, How this apostle, to add to the strength and authority of what he had spoken concerning the certainty of Christ's coming, and their duty to be in ready preparation for it, doth make mention of St. Paul as hearing witness, in several places of his epistles, thereunto: Even as our beloved brother Paul, &c. As the prophets had all one mouth, so had the apostles also, speaking all the same thing. Observe, lastly, The testimony given by St. Peter to St. Paul's epistles. He acknowledges, That there were some things in them hard to be understood. Mark. He doth not say many things, much less that all things in St. Paul were hard to be understood, but some things only. How vainly then doth the church of Rome produce this text, to prove the obscurity of the whole scripture; whereas the great and necessary things to our salvation are so plainly revealed in scripture, that even babes in Christ do apprehend and understand them. And though there be difficulties in other points, more remote from salvation, yet they are so for our exercise and trial, to excite our most intense study and diligence. Note farther, Who the persons are to whom the scriptures are hard to be understood, to the unlearned and unstable, who wrest and pervert them to their own destruction. The original word rendered to wrest, is a metaphor taken from torturers, who put a man upon the rack, they torment him, so long till they make him speak what he never meant to speak; so these wrest a sense out of scripture which the Holy Ghost never intended. Scriptura obscuritas non novæ regulæ necessitatem, sed spiritus illuminantis et ministerii exponentis necessitatem ostendit. Bishop Davenant.

17 Ye therefore, beloved, seeing ye know these things before, beware lest ye also, being led away with the error of the wicked, fall from your own steadfastness. 18 But grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ: To him be glory both now and for ever. Amen.

Our apostle concludes his epistle with an exhortation to watch against the errors and false doctrines of seducers, lest we; being led away thereby, do fall from our own steadfastness in the faith of the gospel. It ought to be our care not only to be sound in the faith, but steadfast in the faith; and, that we may be so, we are here directed, 1. To grow in grace, in all grace, in faith, hope, and love; for grace establishes the heart, and accordingly, steadfastness and increase of grace are here joined together. 2. To grow in knowledge; the way to be kept steadfast is to grow in grace; and the best way to grow in grace, is to grow in the knowledge of Jesus Christ, to know him in his person, in his offices, in his undertaking, in his doctrine, in his example; such a knowledge as this is of Jesus Christ, is fundamental to all graces. They all begin in knowledge, and are increased by knowledge. Grow in grace, and in the knowledge of Jesus Christ; behold how these two keep equal pace in the soul of a christian, namely, grace and knowledge; in what degree one increases, the other increases proportionably. To the author and finisher of which grace, to the fountain and foundation of which knowledge, be ascribed all honour and glory both now and for evermore. Amen.

ST. JOHN.

As touching the author and penman of this epistle, the church of God has in all ages concluded it to be St. John the apostle, the same person that wrote the gospel, though we do not find his name prefixed to either, which is looked upon as an evidence of his great humility: he that was so high in Christ's favour as to be called, The disciple whom Jesus loved, how little and how low was he in his own sight!

The time when he wrote this epistle is concluded to have been a little before the destruction of Jerusalem, because he speaks of the last hour now at hand, which is generally understood to be the last times of the Jewish state; and because of the many Antichrists and false prophets which were then among them, such as Christ tells us, Matt. xvi. 24. where to be the immediate forerunners of that destruction.

The occasion of writing it seems to be twofold, partly to arm the Jewish converts against those loose doctrines, that faith without works, believing without doing righteousness, was sufficient to salvation; that men might be children of the light and yet walk in darkness, the favourites of God without obedience to his laws, or love to his children or servants; and partly to fortify them against the impious doctrine of the Gnostics, who sprang from Simon Magus; and pretended to extraordinary measures of knowledge and divine illumination, from whence they had their name; but notwithstanding all these glittering appearances, they allowed themselves in all manner of impious and vicious practices.

Now that St. John particularly aims at these men, is evident from the frequent and plain allusions throughout this epistle, to those names and titles which this sect assumed to themselves; thus, chap. ii. 4. He that saith I know him, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him. This sect also pretended that, whatever they did, they could not sin. Hence is that of the apostle, chap. i. 8. If we say that we have no sin, the truth is not in us. In a word, these men not only held it lawful to renounce christianity, that they might avoid persecution, but also joined with the heathens in persecuting the christians; for which reason the apostle taxes them with hatred of their brethren, and calls them murderers; therefore to shew the inconsistency of these principles and practices with christianity, the apostle writes this excellent epistle now before us, asserting, that nothing is more essential to a true christian than the love and practice of universal holiness; and let men pretend to what knowledge and faith they please, wickedness is a plain mark and character of the children of the devil. This is the general scope and design of St. John's epistle.

C H A P. I.

THAT which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled of the Word of life;

It is first observable, that whereas St. John began his gospel with a description of Christ's divinity, as God, he begins his epistle with a demonstration of the truth of his human nature as man; for the certainty of which he appeals to the judgment of sense, because the senses, when rightly circumstantiated, are the proper judges of all sensible objects: Accordingly St. John here, to shew the certainty of Christ's incarnation, and manifestation in the flesh, brings in three of the five senses, to wit, hearing, seeing, feeling, to bear witness to it, the latter still carrying a stronger testimony than the former; to see is more than to hear; to feel is more than to see. Observe farther, that to make the testimony yet more strong, St. John adds two words more, by way of confirmation, 1. That which we have looked upon; now this is more than to see; to see may be but a transient sudden act, but to look upon is a fixed and deliberate act, and usually a pleasing and delightful act; we look upon him as the rarest object, as the desire and the delight of our eyes. 2. It is added, as the surest ground of certainty, that their hands had handled the Word of life; as they daily conversed with Christ, so they handled and touched him, both before his resurrection and after it; so that from hence we may remark, that God has given us the highest and fullest assurances, that can be desired, of his Son's manifestation in our flesh, and appearing in our nature; he was heard and seen, looked upon, and handled, by those that conversed with him, which are evident demonstrations of the truth of the human nature assumed by him. Lastly, Our apostle takes notice of Christ's divine nature, as well as asserts the reality of his human nature; he styles him the Word: the Word of life, and the Word which was from the beginning; in the beginning, when all things received their being, then the Word was, and did actually subsist, even from all eternity. Learn hence, That Jesus Christ, the eternal Word, not only antecedent to his incarnation, but even before all time, and the beginning of all things, had an actual being and subsistence. Prov. viii. 23. I was set up from everlasting, then was I by him as one brought up with him; thus was this Jesus in whom we trust, both God and man, having two distinct natures in one person.

2 (For the life was manifested, and we have seen it, and bear witness, and shew unto you that eternal life which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us.

As if the apostle had said, "Christ Jesus, that eternal life which was with the Father from eternity, as being his eternal Son, was in the fulness of time manifested in the flesh, and we his apostles saw him in his assumed human nature, and do now testify, publish, and declare him unto you, he was pleased to subject himself to the notice of our senses, and what we have heard, seen, and felt, and has been manifested unto us, that we do, with all integrity declare and manifest unto others." Note here, 1. The title given to Christ, he is life, eternal life, he is so in himself, and he is the fountain of life to us; we now live by him a life of justification, we derive from him a life of holiness and sanctification, and we hope to live with him a life of glorification. 2. This eternal life was from all eternity with the Father, and distinct from him; he was with the Father, not as an instrument, but as an agent, in making of the world, Heb. i. 2, 3. And as his Father's delight, Prov. viii. 31. Note, 3. This eternal life, which from the beginning was with the Father, in the fulness of time was manifested to the sons of men; manifested, not as he was to the prophets by faith, so they rejoiced to see him, John viii. nor in the similitude and likeness of flesh, so he sometimes manifested himself to the patriarchs, Gen. xviii. but manifested in the flesh to his apostles, who eat and drank, discoursed and conversed with him. 4. That what the apostles saw of Christ they made manifest to others; they had themselves sufficient satisfaction of the verity of Christ's human nature, and of the certainty of his doctrine, and therefore with mighty assurances they declare it unto others, and the reason of that declaration follows in the next verse.

3 That which we have seen and heard, declare we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us: and truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ.

As if he had said, "We declare unto you that of Christ which we ourselves have seen and heard, and what we had

by sight and hearing you are to receive from our testimony; and our design and end herein is sincerely this, that you may have fellowship, and be of one communion with us, and not with false teachers, and by virtue of your communion with us may partake of the same faith and grace, and all spiritual benefits and privileges which Christ has purchased for us; and you will have no cause to repent of your coming into our communion and fellowship; for verily we, and all that have sincerely embraced the doctrine of the Gospel with us, have fellowship with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ, and with each other. Learn hence, That believers have communion with the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and one with another.

Quest. What doth this communion include? Ans. 1. Real union; believers are united to God and Christ morally, conjugally, mystically. 2. Reciprocal community; a community of enjoyments: the Lord is theirs, and they are his; a community of affection; there is mutual love, mutual delight, mutual desires, and mutual hatred; a community of interests; they have the same designs and ends, the same enemies and friends; a community of privileges; the Lord visits them, and they visit him; the Lord walks with them, and they with him; the Lord observes them, and they observe him; they impart the secret of their hearts to him, and he imparts the secrets of his word and of his providence to them, Gen. xviii. 17. Shall I hide from Abraham the thing that I do? Quest. 2. What are the benefits and advantages of this communion? Ans. It affords the highest honour, the sweetest pleasure, and the chiefest happiness; it is heaven on this side heaven; our happiness and theirs differs only in degree, not essentially, but gradually. Blessed privilege!

4 And these things write we unto you that your joy may be full.

Observe here, The great end for which the Apostle penned and wrote the doctrine of the gospel, namely, that their joy may be full who do believe it and obey it. The joy which good men experience in the word of God is a solid joy, a substantial joy, a full joy, a lasting joy. Worldly joy is nauseating, but not satisfying; glutting but not filling: But that joy that is found in the holy Scriptures, in the word and promise of God, is better experienced than expressed. Christianity doth not extirpate our joy, but regulate and refine it; it shews us the proper object of our joy, what to rejoice in, and the manner how, that we may not sin in rejoicing.

5 ¶ This then is the message which we have heard of him, and declare unto you, that God is light, and in him is no darkness at all.

That is, "This is the sum and substance of the gospel of Christ's doctrine, and our message, to teach us to know what God is, namely, light, that is, a being of infinite knowledge, wisdom, and purity; and that there is no darkness in him, no darkness of error, no darkness of ignorance, impurity, and sin, found with him, or can be pleasing to him. Note, here, 1. The gospel is a message, a special and gracious message, sent by God to a lost world. The ministers of the Gospel are messengers sent of God, to make known this message; and if so, then they must receive their mission from God, then their message depends not upon their own, but God's authority; then their people are to receive it, not as the message and word of man, but as it is indeed the word of God. 2. The metaphor which St. John makes choice of, to set forth the nature of God by. He describes him, 1. Affirmatively, God is light, his nature and attributes are, (though darkly and imperfectly) resembled by it; the light, as it was the first of all creatures, shadows forth the eternity of Gods being, who is the First and the Last; light, of all bodies, is the most immaterial and uncompounded, denoting the Spirituality and simplicity of God's nature. Is the light diffusive, and cannot but impart itself for the benefit of others? so is God communicative of his goodness to all persons, shining upon the just and upon the unjust. But according to the apostle's intendment here, light is of a pure and undesired nature, it is a bright and spotless splendor; though it shines upon a dunghill, it contracts no pollutions; this represents the perfect purity and unspotted holiness of God. 2. Negatively, In him is no darkness at all; that is, God is so pure, that not the least impurity can cleave unto him; so holy, that no sin can be found in him, and consequently no darkness of sin or impurity can proceed from him. Learn we then, always to entertain high and holy thoughts of God, and to conceive of him as a being that hates sin, and all the works and workers of darkness, Psal. v. 4. Thou art not a God that hath pleasure in wickedness; neither shall evil dwell with thee, &c.

6 If we say that we have fellowship with him, and walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth,
7 But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another,—

Observe here, 1. What great plainness of speech St. John uses with and towards such persons as call themselves christians, and pretend to fellowship with God, but yet hold communion with sin, he says, they lie. O how well does fervour, vehemency, and impartiality, become the ministers of Christ in reproving sin! Health is found in those smart wounds which ministerial reproof makes. 2. St. John speaks in the first, not in the second person plural; if we say, not if you; if we apostles and ministers, as well as if you disciples and members of Christ, be guilty of this hypocrisy, we lie, and do not the truth; he does not say, and speak not the truth; but do it not; there is a twofold lie, the lie of the lip, and the lie of life, and the latter is the louder of the two; they lie, because they do not the truth. The sum is, that a profession of piety and religion, accompanied with sin and unsuitable walking, is odious hypocrisy abhorred by God and man. 3. The practise of the sincere and serious christian, he walks in the light; that is, in the clear knowledge of the gospel, and in the exemplary and exact performance of his duty. Walking implies motion, it is a voluntary motion, an uniform and even motion. To talk of religion is easy, but to walk wisely before God and man in the practise of our whole duty, requires diligence and circumspection. 4. The pattern after which the christian walks, and that is God; he walks in the light, as he is in the light; God is in the light light, that is, all his actions are exactly pure and holy, and our walking must, for the quality of it, be holy, though for equality it cannot be so holy as God is holy. 5. A double privilege secured to such as walk in communion with God, we have fellowship one with another; justification by Christ, the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin. Note 1. Such as walk in the light have a certain fellowship and communion with God and Christ, and the holy Spirit, and they with him, and likewise an intimate fellowship and communion one with another. Oh! How great is our dignity! How gracious Christ's dignation! How high are we exalted! How low is he abased! The second privilege follows:

—And the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin.

Note, here, 1. The pollution and uncleanness of sin implied and supposed in the word cleansing; sin is the great pollution and defilement of the soul, an universal pollution, an abiding pollution, a mortal pollution, and yet an insensible pollution. 2. The remedy which the wisdom of God has provided against this malady, the soul's pollution by sin, and that is the blood of his Son; this cleanseth meritoriously, called therefore the blood of God, as being the blood of him that is truly and really God. 3. The extent of the efficacy and virtue of this blood. 1. In regard of the universality of the disease, it cleanseth from all sin. 2. In regard of the permanency of the remedy, which is expressed in the present tense, it cleanseth; implying, that this blood doth never lose its efficacy; it cleanses still no less than it did the first moment it was shed; nay, it cleanseth virtually before it was shed; all the patriarchs and prophets were justified, and saved by faith in his blood, who was the Lamb slain from the beginning of the world, in the decree and purpose of God. Eternal thanks to our Lord Jesus Christ the Son of God, whose blood cleanseth from the guilt and filth of all sin.

8 If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us.

If we say; we apostles, we cannot say we are free from sin; much less can the proud Gnostics say so, who suppose and assert themselves to be in a state of perfection; and observe, he doth not say, If we say we had no sin, we deceive ourselves; but that if now we say we have none; intimating, that christians, as well after as before conversion, continue sinful persons; a perfect freedom from all sin being altogether unattainable in this life, not only by ordinary christians, but by the most eminent saints. The church of Rome will have it that this is magis humiliter quam veraciter dictum, rather spoken humbly than truly; but the Apostle doth not say, humility is not in us; but, the truth is not in us; he saith not, we extol ourselves, and there is no lowliness in us; but, we deceive ourselves, and there is no truth in us; no truth of knowledge in our understandings, no real holiness in our hearts. Who can say, he has made his heart clean? We can neither ascribe what purity we have to ourselves, nor yet attribute perfection to our purity; and if so, how should we long for the day of redemption, when no sin shall affect us, no sorrow afflict us! when we shall be clothed with unspotted purity, perfect felicity, and that to all eternity.

9 If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness.

Behold here, 1. A double blessing promised and insured, namely, justification and sanctification, forgiveness of sin, and cleansing from it, yea, from all iniquity; when God pardons sin, no sin is left unpardoned; the sea can as easily drown a thousand men as a single man; God's act of pardoning grace is free and full. 2. The certainty of the mercy promised, God is faithful, and just to forgive; not merciful and gracious, though so he is in himself, but faithful with respect to his promise to us, and just with respect to the satisfaction given by Christ for us. Almighty God in pardoning sin performs an act of strict justice with respect to Christ, as well as an act of grace and mercy, in regard of us; he is faithful and just, as well as gracious and merciful. 3. The indispensable duty required on our part, and that is confession of sin, If we confess. Now, confession of sin is a penitent sinner's voluntary accusing himself to God, and condemning himself before God, with hatred of, shame and sorrow for, and a full resolution against his sin, together with an earnest desire of, and some good hope in divine mercy. 4. What relation confession stands in to remission, not as a meritorious cause; satisfaction, not confession, merits pardon, but it is an exclusive condition, there is no remission without confession; God will not pardon without it: And it is an inclusive condition; God will, certainly will, forgive them that confess: There is not only a possibility or probability, but an infallible certainty of obtaining remission upon confession.

10 If we say that we have not sinned, we make him a liar, and his word is not in us.

Note here, The impiety and blasphemy of those who affirm themselves to be in a state of sinless perfection; they do not only lie themselves, but interpretatively, and as much as in them is, they make God a liar, by contradicting what he has asserted in his word, that all are sinners: So that upon the whole it appears, that to affirm we have no sin, is the highest pride, the greatest deceit, the loudest lie, the prophaneest blasphemy; it is to make the God of truth a liar, and to turn the truth of God into a lie, which evidences that his word is not in us.

CHAP. II.

MY little children, these things write I unto you that ye sin not. And if any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous: 2 And he is the propitiation for our sins: and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world.

Observe here the compellation. First, My little children. The Apostle calls the christians to whom he wrote, children, little children; his little children. He calls them children, because converted to christianity; little children, because because young and tender christians, of a low stature in religion, and far short of manly perfections: and his little children, to denote that spiritual relation which was between him and them, and that endeared affection which he bare towards them. St. John, by a loving compellation, makes way for a faithful admonition, which follows in the next words: These things I write, that ye sin not. This must be understood in a qualified sense, thus: 1. Sin not, that is, as the wicked sin; take heed of scandalous enormities, though you cannot shake off daily infirmities. 2. Sin not, as in the same kind that others sin, so abstain either in the same manner that you yourselves before sinned; sin not with that fulness of deliberation, with that freedom of consent; sin not with that strength of resolution, with that frequency of action, with which you sinned before you were called to christianity. 3. Sin not; that is, as far as human nature will admit, abstain from all sin; let it be your care, prayer, study, endeavour, to keep yourselves from every evil thing. Thus Zachary and Elisabeth, were blameless, Luke i. 6. that is, they lived in no sin known to the world, or known to themselves; so it is said of Job, chap. i. ult. he sinned not; that is, had no sin prevailing, in him; no sin indulged by him. Observe, 2. As the cautionary direction, sin not; so the comfortable conclusion, but if any man sin, that is, through infirmity and weakness, through the policy of the tempter, or by the surprize of a temptation, we have an advocate, a mediator and an intercessor in heaven, who is absolutely sinless, even Jesus Christ the righteous. It is a metaphor, taken from courts of judicature, where are the guilty person, the accuser, the judge, and the advocate: Thus here heaven is the court, man is the guilty person, Satan the accuser, God the judge, Christ the advocate. The proper office of an advocate is, not to deny the fact, or disown the guilt, but to offer something to the judge, whereby the law may be satisfied, and upon which the judge may, without any unrighteousness, discharge the accused. 3. An invaluable privilege here discovered, that Christ our advocate became a propitiator for us, and for the whole race of mankind, for all that lived before us, or shall live after us, for Jews and Gentiles; there is a virtual sufficiency in the death of Christ for all persons, and an actual efficacy as to all believers. Learn hence, That our Lord Jesus Christ, suffering death upon the cross for our redemption, did by that one oblation of himself once offered, make a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction for the sins of the whole world. The original word propitiation, signifies a propitiatory covering, an allusion to the mercy-seat that covered the ark in which the law was: In allusion to which, Christ is here called our propitiatory covering, because he hides our sins, the transgressions of the law, from his Father's sight.

3 ¶ And hereby we do know that we know him, if we keep his commandments. 4 He that saith, I know him, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him. 5 But whoso keepeth his word, in him verily is the love of God perfected: hereby know we that we are in him.

Observe here, 1. That a christian may be assured of his salvation; to know that we know, is to be assured that we know; not only to have the vital, but the fiducial act of faith. Some christians can say, "We know that we know him." 2. The nature of true christian knowledge discovered: It is an obedient knowledge: It is not sufficient to profess that we know Christ, except we yield sincere obedience to him: For this is a certain mark and proof that we know Christ effectually, if we love him, and keep his commandments. The true knowledge of God consists in keeping of the word of God, the whole word of God, and because it is his. 3. That to say we know God, when we do not keep his commandments, and to say we keep his commandments, when we do not know him, is a lie. Sad will their condition be who perish for want of the knowledge of God, but much sadder theirs, who perish in the neglect or abuse of that knowledge. 4. That a conscientious care, and constant endeavour to observe the word, and keep the law of God, is a certain mark and evidence that he that doth it has the love of God perfected in him, and towards him: Whosoever keepeth his word, &c.

6 He that saith he abideth in him, ought himself also to walk even as he walked.

Observe here, 1. An high and honourable privilege supposed to be claimed, and that is union with Christ, and abiding in him; he that saith he abideth in him. The abiding in Christ is a great privilege, and the true and real christian, doth truly and really abide in Christ. 2. A great and important duty belonging to all those that do abide in Christ, and that is to walk as Christ walked; to set his example daily before them, and to be continually correcting and reforming of their lives by that glorious pattern. Every christian is bound to an imitation of Christ, under penalty of forfeiting his claim to Christ; for no claim to Christ is or can be valid without a careful imitation of him. The temper of our minds, and the actions of our lives, must be a lively transcript of the mind and life of the holy and innocent Jesus; we must be like him, or we can never love him, nor hope another day to live with him.

7 Brethren, I write no new commandment unto you, but an old commandment, which ye had from the beginning: the old commandment is the word which ye have heard from the beginning. 8, Again a new commandment I write unto you, which thing is true in him and in you; because the darkness is past, and the true light now shineth.

Our Apostle here exhorts christians to the great duty of brotherly love, assuring them, that it was no new commandment which he enjoined them, but that which they were taught, not only in and by the Old Testament, but at the first preaching of the gospel amongst them; and in these respects the command of love might be called an old commandment, it being a branch of the law of nature, and a known precept of the Jewish religion; although in other respects it might be called a new commandment, because urged from a new motive, and enforced by a new example.

Learn hence, 1. That the doctrine of christian love is a divine commandment, that which christians are not only allowed but enjoined to practise; and it is called the commandment, in the singular number, to intimate, that in this one commandment all the rest were contained, so that in keeping this we keep all. What are all the commandments indeed but love enlarged? And what is love but the commandments contracted? 2. That the commandment of love is an old commandment; it is as old as Moses, yea, as old as Adam, being a part of the law of nature written in Adam's heart. The evangelical command of love was from the beginning of the law, and nothing new enjoined by Christ, which was not before by Moses. 3. That yet this command of love may, in some respect, be called a new commandment; not substantially, but circumstantially: Not in the essence of the doctrine, but in the manner of the discovery; not in the respect of the truth delivered, but in the way of delivering. New, not in regard of institution, but restitution, because purged from the old corrupt glosses of the Pharisees, who had limited this duty of love, and confined it to their own countrymen; whereas Christ obliges his disciples to love all mankind, even our very enemies. In a word, it may be called a new commandment, because it was never to wax old, but to be always fresh in the memory and practice of Christ's disciples to the end of the world. Observe next, The arguments to enforce the observation of this new commandment; (1.) In those words, which thing is true in him and in you: that is, as there was in Christ a true and sincere love towards you, so look that there be a true and sincere love in you towards him, and one towards another. (2.) Because the darkness is past, and the true light now shineth: that is, the darkness of ignorance in general, and the darkness of the Mosaic state in particular, is now past, and the true light of the gospel now clearly shineth.

9 He that saith he is in the light, and hateth his brother, is in darkness even until now. 10 He that loveth his brother abideth in the light, and there is none occasion of stumbling in him. 11 But he that hateth his brother is in darkness, and walketh in darkness, and knoweth not whither he goeth, because that darkness hath blinded his eyes.

Two things are here to be considered, namely, the grace and duty proposed and enforced, and the sin or vice specified and opposed. Observe, 1. The grace proposed, or the duty recommended, namely, the love of our brother: He that loveth his brother, &c. Where note, 1. The nature of brotherly love; it is a gracious propensity of heart, which a christian bears, for Christ's sake, to his neighbour, whereby he wills, and to his power, procures all good for him; or it is that brotherly affection which every true christian chiefly bears to all his fellow-members in Christ, for grace sake. 2. The benefits attending the practice of this grace and duty. (1.) His condition is happy, he abideth in the light; that is, he is in the state of grace. Charity is an evident demonstration of sanctity; and accordingly St. Paul, Gal. v. reckoning up the fruits of the Spirit, placeth love in the front of them. (2.) His conversation is holy, there is no occasion of stumbling in him: that is, he walketh inoffensively in a state of grace, and neither stumbleth himself, if neither is there occasion given by him that others should stumble, or be drawn into any sin. Observe, 2. The sin specified, and the vice opposed, namely, hating of our brother: He that hateth his brother, &c. Where note, 1. It is not only hurting, but hating our brother, that is forbidden, and that this hatred is not only forbidden whilst he is our friend; but when he becomes our enemy. To hate a friend is inhuman; to hate an enemy is unchristian. And further, it must be noted, that whatever falls short of the duty of loving, cometh within the compass of hating our brother: For every departure from love is a degree of hatred. 2. The dismal character given of those persons who hate their brother; they are described by their wicked disposition; they are in darkness: By their vicious conversation; they walk in darkness: By their miserable condition; they know not whither they go, because that darkness has blinded their eyes. From the whole learn, That we must love all, in the various kinds and manners, in the various measures and degree, according to which God appeareth in them: That is, we must love all men, as men, above the brutes; and we must love all professed christians, above all other men; and we must love real christians, especially such of them as are eminent for wisdom, goodness, and usefulness, above all other christians. The light of knowledge and the heat of love must be inseparable.

12 I write unto you, little children, because your sins are forgiven you for his name's sake. 13 I write unto you, fathers, because ye have known him that is from the beginning. I write unto you, young men, because ye have overcome the wicked one. I write unto you, little children, because ye have known the Father. 14 I have written unto you, fathers, because ye have known him that is from the beginning. I have written unto you, young men, because ye are strong, and the word of God abideth in you, and ye have overcome the wicked one.

Observe here, 1. The care which God has taken, not only to have his word preached, but written; I write unto you, partly to supply his ministers absence, that their writings might be instead of vocal instructions, partly to perpetuate truth unto posterity, and to transmit divine revelations to future ages. 2. The subject or persons whom our apostle writes to; fathers, young men, and children; where, in general, the great wisdom of the apostle is to be observed and taken notice of, that he contents not himself with general, but directs his discourse particularly to old and young; plainly intimating, that none are too young to receive instruction, none are old enough to reject it. And if St. John wrote to persons of all ages and conditions, then the sacred writings are to be read to, and read by persons of every age and condition forever. And if the scriptures be perverted by some, that is not a natural effect, but only an accidental consequence of reading the scriptures. Now, as evil must not be done that good may come of it, so good must not be left undone, though evil come of it. 3. The duty which all sorts of christians ought to be exhorted and excited to, and

and that is love; love to God, accompanied with obedience; and love to all christians, in obedience to the command of God. It belongs to all sorts of christians, weak and strong; to all ages of men, young and old, children and fathers; to expel the poison of anger and hatred out of their bosoms, and mutually to embrace one another. 4. The reasons of our Apostle's writing to all christians in general, and to each age in particular. Note, 1. The reason assigned for writing to children, ver. 12. Because your sins are forgiven you, &c. therefore ought you mutually to forgive, and cordially to love one another. 2. The reason assigned for writing to fathers; Because ye have known him that is from the beginning; that is Jesus Christ, who, in respect of his divine nature, had a subsistence from the beginning; that is, from all eternity; and if so, then our blessed Saviour had a being antecedent to his conception, and before he was born of the virgin Mary; he then began to be a man, but he did not then begin to be; for before Abraham was he was; and he prays to his father John xvii. 5. to glorify him with the glory which he had with him before the world was. Mark, It is not said, with the glory which thou preparedst for me in thy decree and purpose before the world was, as the Socinians would have it, but the glory which I had with thee. He that gave being to all things, must have a being before all things. 3. The reasons assigned for writing to young men, Because ye are strong, and have overcome the wicked one, &c. Here we have observable, 1. The enemy described, Satan, called the wicked one: Not that he was so by creation, but by his apostasy and defection. Because the first in wickedness, because most industriously wicked, and because most obstinate and persevering in wickedness. 2. The conquest ingeminated; Ye have overcome the wicked one. Mark, he doth not say, You have made a league with him, but overcome him; there is no way to accommodate or compound matters with Satan, no way to deal with him, but by victory; we are said to overcome him, because we are sure to overcome him; resist him and he will flee; and because we have overcome him in God's account, and because we have begun to overcome him. Yield to him, and you will find him an imperious tyrant; resist him, and you will find him a timorous coward. 3. The combatants, young men. Youth is the warlike age; young men are fit for action, old men for advice; young ones should begin this spiritual war betimes, possibly they may never live to be old; or if so, victory will be the more difficult, by how much the longer it is delayed; and God may deny thee that grace which now thou deniest thyself. The proverb says, "A young saint, but an old devil;" but it is very hard for a young devil to become an old saint; whereas a young christian soldier is most amiable in God's eye, and most terrible in the devil's. 4. The aid, helps, and assistants, by which this victory is attained, ye are strong, that is, made partakers of divine strength; ye have your second in the field, the Holy Spirit, you are strong in the Lord, And the word of God abideth in you. By the strength of God, and the abiding of his word and grace in us, we overcome the wicked one, and prevail against him. God's word is the richest treasury to supply our wants, and the strongest armoury to oppose our enemies.

15 Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the father is not in him. 16 For all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but is of the world. 17 And the world passeth away, and the lust thereof: but he that doth the will of God abideth for ever.

Observe here, 1. That our Apostle doth not, as he did before, direct his advice to any one particular sort or rank of Christians in special, but unto all in general; Love not the world, &c. 2. That the prohibition here is not absolute, but comparatively only. It is not an ordinata caritas, but inordinata cupiditas, that is here forbidden; we may look upon the world, and desire it, delight in it, and in the enjoyment of it, provided we do not chuse it for our portion, delight in it as our chief good. 3. St. John doth not say, Leave the world, but Love not the world; he doth not say, Use not the world, but Love it not; that is, seek not after the world inordinately, and delight not in it immoderately: Seek it we may, but not in an undue manner; delight in it we may, but not in an undue measure. 4. The arguments which our Apostle makes use of, to enforce his dehortation. 1. The contrariety of the love of the world to the love of God; If any man love the world (in an undue manner and measure) the love of the Father is not in him: that is, the worldly lover has no interest in the Father's love; the world's darlings are none of God's friends, and the world's lover has no love of the Father in him; there is no positive love of God in him in whom there is a superlative love of the world. Lord, how desperate and dangerous a sin then is worldly love! If the love of the Father be not in him, the hatred of the Father is towards him, James iv. 4. A second argument to dissuade from worldly love is contained in the 16th verse; For all that is in the world; that is, all that is in esteem and vogue with the men of the world, is either the lust of the flesh, that is, all sensual delights and enjoyments, which occasion intemperance; or the lust of the eye, the desire of gold, silver, stately houses, rich gardens, which tend to gratify the eye; and the pride of life, or the desires of honours and dignities, high titles, and places of advancement, which tend to gratify our pride, all these are not of the Father; that is, they are not desires excited by him, nor are they pleasing to him, but are the desires of the men of the world, and proceed from that corruption which is in them. The third argument is taken from the world itself, and its short continuance, in the 17th verse, the world passeth away, that is, all the things of the world, which the men of the world doat upon, and are in love with, are of a fading transitory nature, in themselves, and they pass away from their possessors and owners. And the lusts thereof; that is, the pleasure which they had in gratifying their lusts passeth away, but the sting remaineth, and the torment abideth. It is added, But he that doth the will of God abideth for ever. Behold here the permanent felicity, not of the knowing, but obedient christian. He abideth for ever, not in this, but in the other world, in a state of endless happiness. Although eternity, in its most comprehensive notion, notion, be peculiar to a Deity, and incommunicable to a creature, yet it is that which God has made rational creatures capable of; and as he abideth for ever, so will he grant to them that do his will to abide with him for ever also.

18 ¶ Little children, it is the last time; and as ye have heard that antichrist shall come, even now are there many antichrist's; whereby we know that it is the last time. 19 They went out from us, but they were not of us: for if they had been of us, they would no doubt have continued with us, but they went out, that they might be made manifest that they were not all of us.

Our apostle having warned them against the danger of covetousness in the foregoing verses, he cautions them against the danger of deceit in these; he tells them, that this is the last time of the Jewish dispensation, and that the destruction of their city, temple, and polity, was now at hand; and as they had heard that Antichrist should come, accordingly now there were many antichrists come; that is, opposers of Christ, and deniers of him to be the Christ; and by the swarming of these seducers and false teachers now, according to our Saviour's prediction, Matth. xxiv. they might well conclude it was the last time. Observe next, These antichrists are described by the communion which they once were of, to wit, christian communion; They went out from us, from us Apostles, and from us christians, being false brethren, and unsound christians; for if they had been of us, as members of the same body, and had joined with us Apostles, in planting and propagating the same christian faith, They would no doubt have continued with us, professing the same faith, and preaching the same doctrine, which we do; but they left us, that it might be made manifest that they were not all of us. Here note, That these antichristian impostors had been in the bosom of the church, and made a profession of the christian faith; so did the false apostles, the judaizing teachers, mentioned Acts xv. so did Simon Magus, Nicolas, and Cerinthus. The church's seeming members prove her worst friends, the foxes within do more mischief than the wild boar without. Quest. But is it not then lawful to depart from the communion of a church whereof we have been formerly members? Ans. Yes, if she departs from herself; if she degenerates and grows so corrupt a body, and be so far infected, that we cannot communicate with her without sin, which was the case between us and the church of Rome, her doctrines were erroneous, her worship idolatrous; we went out from them, because they went out from the ancient apostolical church. Non fugimus; sed fugamur: Not we, but they made the separation, and consequently the schism lies at their door.

20 ¶ But ye have an unction from the Holy One, and ye know all things.

As if our Apostle had said, "Although there are many antichrists and seducers abroad in the world, yet the most holy God hath anointed you with his holy Spirit, which will preserve you from pernicious error, and lead you into all necessary truth, if you obey and follow him." Observe here, 1. A privilege enjoyed: Ye have an unction from the Holy One. By which understand the Holy Spirit in its sanctifying gifts and graces, which consecrates believers as kings and priests unto God. 2. The advantage of that privilege declared, Ye know all things; not absolutely, but with restriction and limitation: All things: that is, all divine things, all divine things revealed, and all things revealed that are necessary to salvation: All things needful to be known, and as far as needful for you to know: all things relating to God, Christ, the Holy Spirit, ourselves, sin, Satan, the law, the gospel, grace, and glory; ye know all these things by virtue of your unction.

21 I have not written unto you because ye know not the truth: but because ye know it, and that no lie is of the truth. 22 Who is a liar but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ? He is antichrist, that denieth the Father and the Son. 23 Whosoever denieth the Son, the same hath not the Father; [but] he that acknowledgeth the Son, hath the Father also.

Observe here, 1. The character given of the gospel; it is the truth, the word of truth, the way of truth, confirmed by real miracles. It is divine truth, universal truth, effectual truth, and no lie; for Almighty God would never have set the seal of his omnipotency to a lie, and have confirmed it by signs and wonders, miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghost, had it been false. Observe, 2. The character given of the heretics in St. John's days, and in our days also, they denied that Jesus is the Christ, and therein deny the Father and the Son: For whosoever denieth the Son, the same hath not the Father; that is, he denieth the Father as well as the Son; for not having the Father, and denying the Father, is the same thing ver. 22. He is antichrist that denieth the Father and the Son. This is a text in which every Socinian may see himself an Atheist; he that denies the divinity of the Son, denies the Deity of the Father; for such is the nature of the Godhead, that one of these cannot be alone; the Father is not without the Son, nor can be; nor can the Son be without the Father; this coherence is inseparable and inviolable; therefore he that denies the eternal Son, denies the eternal Father; and if it be Atheism to deny the divinity of the Father, it is no less to deny the Deity of the Son; for he that denieth the Son, denieth the Father also. There is such a connection between these two, the Father and the Son, they being co-essential and co-eternal, that if you deny the divinity of the one, you deny that of the other; therefore they are Atheists that deny the divinity of Christ, as well as they that deny the being of God.

24 Let that therefore abide in you which ye have heard from the beginning. If that which ye have heard from the beginning shall remain in you, ye also shall continue in the Son and in the Father.

These words are an exhortation to hold fast, and not to forsake the doctrine of christianity, which from the beginning they had received, and not to turn to novelties. Let that abide in you which ye have heard from the beginning; that is, from the first preaching of the gospel. Note here, What is truth and true doctrine, namely, that which was delivered delivered from the beginning. Truth is error's elder, though error is not much truth's younger. 2. By what means they received the evangelical doctrine, namely, by hearing; let that which you have heard abide in you. No sense more needful than that of hearing, for the benefit and advantage of man; both as he is by nature a reasonable creature, by converse a sociable creature, and may be by grace a new creature: Faith cometh by hearing. 3. The duty required with reference to what they had heard; let that which ye have heard abide in you, namely, by a careful remembrance of it, and by resolute adherence to it. The sum of this exhortation is, that we retain and maintain the ancient catholic and apostolic faith; and verily when we consider how tenacious heretics are of their novel errors, it may bring a blush into our faces to consider how ready we are to be withdrawn from primitive truth. Observe next, The motive with which our Apostle doth enforce and back his exhortation—If that which ye have heard remain in you, you shall continue in the Son, and in the Father; that is, in the love and favour of the Son, and of the Father, and in communion with both. Quest. But why is the Son put before the Father here? Partly to intimate, that the Son is no less in essence and dignity than the Father, but equal in both; accordingly, the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ in the apostolical benediction, is mentioned before the love of God the Father: And partly, because no man cometh to, or continueth in the Father, but by the Son; He is the way, the truth, and the life. The doctrine of the gospel comes from Christ; it leads to Christ, and by him unto the Father. See John xiv. 23.

Observe here, 1. How gracious Almighty God is to enforce his commands with promises of reward; he required of us adherence to the truth, and perseverance in it, in the former verse; here he promises eternal life by way of encouragement, in this verse. 2. The benefit promised, life, eternal life; the greatness of this life is immeasurable, the worth of this life is estimable, the joys of this life innumerable, the duration of it is interminable. 3. The certainty of the conveyance; this the promise promised. Mark; He doth not say purposed, but promised. A purpose is a secret and a hidden intention of the mind, but a promise is a revelation of that intention; yea, it is more than a declaration. A promise makes sure, as well as makes manifest; especially God's promise, which has his oath for the confirmation of it, Heb. vi. 17. 4. The peculiarity of the persons to whom the promise is made, he hath promised us; not to us as Apostles only, but to us as christians; all that are born of God are begotten to a lively hope of an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away: Again, he has promised us, not promised all; eternal life, but us who are thus and thus qualified, who keep his commandments, and walk as he walked. 5. The eminency of the author by whom this promise is made, in the relative he; This is the promise which he hath promised us. Here note, That eternal life was promised by God to good men under the Old Testament; Heb. xi. 16. tells us, that the Old-Testament saints desired a better country, to wit, an heavenly; now how could they have desired it, if they had not known it? And could they have known it, if God had not revealed it? And Christ had the Jews search the scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life; intimating, that in the writings of Moses, eternal life was made known typically and darkly, not so clearly and fully as by the gospel, 2 Tim. i. 10. He is holy, and cannot lie; righteous, and cannot deceive; immutable, and cannot repent.

26 These things have I written unto you concerning them that seduce you. 27 But the anointing which ye have received of him abideth in you: and ye need not that any man teach you: but, as the same anointing teacheth you of all things, and is truth, and is no lie, and even as it hath taught you, ye shall abide in him.

Observe here the pious care which St. John expresses for their preservation from heretics and seducers, These things have I written to you concerning them that seduce you. That is, to arm them against the seducers then amongst them; intimating, that men are naturally prone to error, yea, to fundamental errors. 2. That to be seduced by, and led into such errors, is dangerous and destructive. 3. That it is the special duty, and ought to be the singular care, of the ministers of Christ, to warn their people of, and arm them against errors, and erroneous persons, against seducers and seduction; These things I write concerning them that seduce you; that is those who endeavour to seduce you. Observe next, The encouragement which St. John gives them against these seducers, and their seduction, the anointing which ye have received from Christ; that is, from the special illumination of his Spirit, this abideth in you, teaching you all things necessary for you to know, so that you need not any man to teach you; that is, any new doctrine, any new fundamental principles of faith. Note here, That christians savingly enlightened by the Spirit of God need no new gospel or doctrine to be instructed in; but they need farther teaching still, in order to their better improvement in what they know; vain therefore are the Quakers, and other sectaries arguments drawn from hence, against all ministerial teaching I because the Spirit teaches, man must not teach: Whereas the Spirit teaches immediately by man, and not immediately by itself. When these seducers can show that they have such an immediate and extraordinary affatus of the Holy Spirit, as was vouchsafed to the primitive christians, then let them cry down the necessity of ministerial teaching, not before.

28 And now little children, abide in him; that when he shall appear, we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before him at his coming,

Still our Apostle reinforces his foregoing exhortation to abide fixedly in Christ; that is, in the doctrine of Christ, in true christianness; and now, little children, abide in him: And the argument which he makes use of, is very forcible and cogent, namely, That when Christ shall appear, we may have confidence, &c. Here note, 1. Something supposed, namely, the coming and appearance of Christ: he shall appear. 2. Something implied, namely, our appearance before Christ in the day of his appearance. 3. Something expressed, namely, the confident appearing before Christ, of all those who abide in him: That we may have confidence, &c. Whence learn, That the persevering christian shall have confidence before Christ at his coming; shall lift up his head without shame or blushing, from the testimony which confidence bears of his sincerity, and from the interest he has in the Judge: But, on the other hand, they that do not persevere and abide in Christ shall be ashamed before him at his coming; ashamed of their gross hypocrisy, of their vile unfaithfulness, of their manifest folly.

29 If ye know that he is righteous, ye know that every one that doeth righteousness, is born of him.

Our apostle concludes the chapter with an exhortation to holiness and righteousness; assuring them, that if they be sensible (as they must necessarily be) that God is righteous, essentially and infinitely holy and righteous; they may and ought to know also, that whosoever is born of him, and doth receive a new nature from him, doth certainly endeavour to live unto him, and to walk before him as his child in a way of obedience, and to expect favour and protection from him as from a Father. Learn hence, That all that sincerely live a righteous life towards God and man, are certainly born of God; and such as are born of God do certainly live that righteous life; then, and only then, may we know that we are indeed God's children, when the image of our heavenly Father is instamped upon us, and the disposition of his children wrought in us; when there is a happy conformity in our natures to the holiness of God's nature, and in our lives to the righteousness of his law; when he beholds his own face in the glass of our souls, and loves us for his own image instamped and impressed upon us.

CHAP. III.

BEHOLD, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God!—

Our apostle begins this chapter with wonder and admiration at the astonishing goodness and condescension of Almighty God towards believers, in taking them into his family, and adopting them into the number of his children; that strangers and enemies should be dignified with the honourable and amiable title of his sons: it is the same relation that Christ has, I ascend to my Father and your Father; there is indeed a diversity in the foundation of it: Christ is a Son by nature, we by favour: he by generation, we by adoption: However, not only crowns and sceptres are beneath this dignity, but the honour of our innocent state was not equal with it: well might the apostle then break out with an heavenly astonishment, and say, Behold, what manner of love is this, that we should be called, accounted and acknowledged, for the children of God! Here note, 1. That it is the high and honourable privilege of all true believers, that they are now the sons of God. They are so, (1.) By regeneration; they are made partakers of the divine nature: not in the essence of it, but in the gracious qualities of it, which enables them in some measure to resemble God their Father; they receive a principle of spiritual life from God, which enables them to live unto God, and this principle received in regeneration: it is an inward principle, an universal principle, a God exalting principle, and an abiding principle. 2. They are children by adoption also: adoption is the acceptance of a stranger into the relation and privileges of a son: it was a rare condescension in Pharaoh's daughter to rescue Moses, an innocent and forsaken stranger, from perishing by the waters, and adopt him for her son; but O! how much greater kindness was it for Almighty God to save guilty and wretched man from eternal flames, and to take a rebel into his family! This privilege of being the sons of God by regeneration and adoption, is a choice and gracious privilege, an high and honourable privilege, a free and undeserved privilege, a lasting and abiding privilege. 2. As the privilege itself, so the formal cause of it, the fountain from whence it doth proceed and flow, namely, from the gratuitous love, and free favour of God; what manner of love has the Father bestowed upon us? He cannot say what, nor how great it was: He admires it, but cannot declare it; yet though adoption was the effect of God's free love, it was the fruit of Christ's rich purchase: he of a Son became a servant, that we of slaves might become sons. 3. In the word Behold! a note of attention and admiration both: God expects, the gospel requires, and the privilege of adoption deserves, that it be beheld with love and wonder, taken notice of with joy and thankfulness, and improved for growth in grace and advancement in holiness.

—Therefore the world knoweth us not, because it knew him not.

Note here, 1. That the believer's dignity, though real and great, is altogether unknown to the unbelieving world; they are so far from acknowledging them to be God's children, that they mock and scoff, jeer and deride them, for pretending so to be; and as they little know them, so do they less affect and love them, but hate and persecute them. 2. The reason assigned why the world knows not the children of God, Because it knew not him: God once made himself manifest to the world in and by his Son: Christ, in whom dwelt the fulness of the Godhead, came and dwelt among us, but the world knew him not, received him not; and if they saw no beauty in him, who had strength of grace, and no corruption in him, is it any wonder that they see no excellency in them in whom is much weakness in grace, and too great strength of corruption!

2 Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know, that when he shall appear, we shall be like him: for we shall see him as he is.

As if the apostle had said, "Although the world knows us not, affects us not, esteems us not, because of the weakness of our grace, and the strength of our corruptions, yet notwithstanding both these, we are now the sons of God: this be, we are not what we should be, we are not what we shall be; but blessed be God we are what we are; now are we the sons of God." Observe, 2. As the honour and dignity of the christians' privilege in this life asserted, we are now the sons of God, so their happiness and glory in the next life described, 1. By way of negation, It doth not yet appear what they shall be; the glory which God has prepared for all his adopted children and people, is an hidden glory, a glory that doth not yet appear; what the saints shall be in their perfect state of glory doth not yet appear to them in this their perfect state of grace. 2. By way of positive asseveration, But we know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him, &c. Here note, 1. The certainty of Christ's appearance declared, He shall appear. 2. A double benefit which believers may expect at his appearing. 1. They shall be like him, as well in holiness, as in happiness, as well in purity as in immortality; like him in a perfect freedom from sin, like him in the ardour and intense fervency of their love; like him in the perfection of grace, and the unspotted purity of his holy nature. 2. They shall see him: that is, his glory, with a clear and immediate sight, with a full and comprehensive sight, with an assimilating and transforming sight, with an appropriating and possessive sight, with a satisfying and everlasting sight.

3 ¶ And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure.

Every one that hath this hope, that is, the hope of seeing and enjoying Christ in glory, he now endeavours to purify himself, according to the pattern and copy which Christ hath set before him, labouring to imitate it, though he cannot reach it. Observe here, 1. The character of a christi in by this hope, every man that hath this hope in him. Learn, That a christian is a person of high hopes, and raised expectations, as to future blessedness; the author of this hope is God; the object of this hope is some future good promised and expected; the grounds of this hope are the promise and oath of God, the purchase and undertaking of Christ, and the sanctifying work of the Spirit, in and upon his soul. Observe, 2. A description of this hope by its inseparable effect, it purifies the christian; he that has this hope purifies himself; where it is implied, 1. That sin is a pollution which we must be purified from. 2. That the holiest of saints here on earth, are not perfectly purified from this pollution, but are daily endeavouring to purify themselves more and more. Observe, 3. The pattern after which the sincere christian doth conform in this work of purification, and that is Christ; he purifies himself, even as he is pure; intimating, that the Lord Jesus Christ was a perfect pattern of purity; and that it is the christian's duty to eye this pattern, and to endeavour to conform himself thereunto, by purifying himself, even as Christ is pure.

4. Whosoever committeth sin transgresseth also the law: for sin is the transgression of the law.

5 And ye know that he was manifested to take away our sin: and in him is no sin.

Whosoever committeth sin, that is, whosoever lives in the allowed commission of it, lives in rebellion against, and in a flat opposition to, the law of God, sin being a transgression of God's law; and such a person as thus commits sin, not only violates the law of God, but also frustrates the death of Christ; for Christ, in whom there was no sin, was manifested in the flesh to take away sin, the guilt of it by his blood, the power of it by his Spirit, and consequently we must purify ourselves from it, if we hope to see him as he is. Learn hence, That nothing can be more unreasonable and absurd, than to expect salvation with God in heaven by a sinless Saviour, if we allow ourselves in a course of sin; nothing being more contrary than this to the design of Christ's death, which was not only to deliver us from the danger, but from the dominion of our sins; not only to expiate our sins, but to make us sinless like himself.

6 Whosoever abideth in him, sinneth not: whosoever sinneth, hath not seen him, neither known him.

That is, "Whoever lives in sin, and goes on in a course and trade of sinning, is the servant and slave of sin; and although his reason condemns him, his conscience boggles at it, and his will is something averse to it, yet if he yields his members instruments of unrighteousness unto sin, he is the servant of sin; and whatever his pretence may be, he has no right knowledge of Christ, nor any true faith in him; for whosoever abideth in him thus, sinneth not." Learn hence, That the sincere christian, so far as he is in Christ, and by faith united to him, and is taught and ruled by him, sinneth not; that is, he makes it his constant care and continual endeavour to ~~shun~~ and avoid all sin. 2. That such persons as go on in a course of sin, let their pretences to Christianity be what they will, they never had any experimental knowledge of Christ, no fellowship or communion with him; nor can ever hope to be happy in the fruition and enjoyment of him.

7 Little children let no man deceive you. He that doth righteousness is righteous, even as he is righteous.

As if the Apostle had said, "Let no man deceive you by making you believe that a right faith may consist with an unrighteous life, for only he that doth righteousness is righteous." Note here, 1. That there is a twofold doing righteousness. 1. In a legal sense, which stands in an exact obeying and fulfilling the law; and thus there is none righteous, no not one. 2. In an evangelical sense, a walking uprightly, according to the rule of the gospel, conscientiously avoiding all known sin, and performing every commanded duty; it is not a single action, but a constant course of holy actions, that denominates a person holy; a righteous man makes righteousness the business of his life; his daily care is how to please God in all he does. Note, 2. That it is the duty of every christian, that would not be deceived, as to his spiritual state and condition, to try himself by this infallible mark and rule of trial. Christian, enquire not so much what thy afflictions are, as what thy desires are, what thy joys and comforts are, as what thy actions.

actions are; not what thy peace is, but what thy paths are: For God doth not measure men's sincerity by the rides of their affections, but by the constant bent of their resolutions, and the general course and tenor of their conversations.

8 He that committeth sin is of the devil: for the devil sinneth from the beginning.—

That is, "So far as a man sinneth, so far he is of the devil, and like unto him, in whom sin is predominant; he having been an old sinner, soon after the beginning of the creation, and a bold tempter to sin all his days." Learn 1. That Satan has kept in a constant and continued course of sinning against God from the beginning of his apostacy, and first moment of his revolt from God; the devil sinneth from the beginning. 2. That such as make sin their work, do make themselves the devil's children; they are his children by imitation: St. John viii. 44.

—For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil.

As if he had said, "The Son of God came purposely into the world to destroy sin, the work of the devil, in all that he will save." Note, 1. The odious character wherewith sin is branded, it is the work of the devil; that work which he is always doing himself; and which he is continually tempting and soliciting others to do, that they may be as miserable as himself. 2. Our Saviour's manifestation in the flesh asserted; the Son of God was manifested, namely, to the world, and in the world; he appeared in our nature, and was seen in our flesh; it was a real exhibition, and not an imaginary manifestation of him. 3. The great end of this gracious manifestation of the Son of God in our nature, it was to destroy the works of the devil, to loose and dissolve; so the original: This supposes mankind to have been in bonds and fetters; we were in duress and captivity, shut and locked up in the prison-house; we were under the dominion of sin, and power of Satan, but the Son of God came to rescue us, to knock off our fetters, and to set us at liberty: By the works of the devil understand all sin in general. 2. Those sins in particular, which have most of the devil's image upon them, and render persons most like unto him, such are malice and envy, rejoicing at the calamities, and delighting in the evils, that befall others, rage and passion, bitter strife and contention, schism and faction, lying and falsehood, craft and treachery; but especially pride and haughtiness, which was the sin that turned Satan out of heaven, and made him a devil in hell. 3. By the works of the devil here are meant in particular, idolatry, and all idolatrous worship, even to the worshipping of the devil himself; this, and all other kinds of idolatry, had strangely prevailed and over-run the world before the coming of Christ, who came on purpose to deliver mankind from this slavery, and to pull down the kingdoms of Satan, and beat him out of those strong holds which he thought had been impregnable.

9 Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin: for his seed remaineth in him: and he cannot sin, because he is born of God.

Observe here, 1. The character of a true christian, he is born of God; he has in the work of regeneration passed under a blessed change by the operation of the Holy Spirit, renewing his nature, and reforming his life; yet this denotes not the single transient act of regeneration, but rather a continued course and permanent state; one that is born of God is the same with him that leads a pious and godly life, and continues so to do. 2. What is here asserted concerning him that is born of God, namely, that he doth not commit sin; and that he cannot sin. 1. He doth not commit sin, he is no evil-doer, no worker of iniquity, no habitual or customary sinner; he goes not on in any way or course of sin, as the wicked does, who makes a trade of it; yea, he doth not tolerate or allow himself in any single act of sin; not that he is absolutely free from all sin. 2. It is said, he cannot sin; but how? And why? How can he not sin? Has he not a natural power to sin? Has he not corruptions within, and temptations without, inclining and disposing him to sin, as well as other men! and has he not opportunity to sin: the same expectations of advantages by sin with other men? Yes, no doubt; but he has not a will bent for sin, or a heart and mind set upon sin, as the wicked have; nay, he has a heart and will opposite to sin, and set against all sin. A gracious person then, though he hath not a natural impossibility, yet he has a moral impossibility to sin. He that is born of God hath a power to do that evil which he hath not a will to do; he hath always a natural power, and sometimes a civil power, as being in authority; but his blood and pedigree are so high, being born of God, that he disdains to meddle with, or to trade in so base a thing as sin is. Note, That a child of God has a blessed impotency in the unregenerate part, that he cannot sin strongly, though as yet he has not that ability in the regenerate part, as not to sin at all. Observe, 3. The reasons assigned why a regenerate person cannot sin as the wicked sin, because his seed remaineth in him, and because he is born of God; that is, he has an inward principle inclining and disposing him to hate and oppose all sin, to wit, the sanctifying grace of God; and he has that mortifying Spirit, which causes him daily more and more to die unto sin, and enables him to mortify the deeds of the body. Learn hence, That although sin remaineth in him that is born of God, yet he that is born of God doth not remain in sin, either as to a sinful state, or a sinful conversation; God's word and Spirit, by which he was regenerate, still remain in him; and so far as he is under the ruling power and governing influences of them, he cannot sin, much less live in wilful sin.

10 In this the children of God are manifest, and the children of the devil: whosoever doth not righteousnes is not of God, neither he that loveth not his brother.

Our Apostle in these words gives us the distinguishing character of a good and bad man; those who in their dispositions and actions, in the temper of their minds, and in the actions of their lives, do imitate God, are his children; and those who addict themselves to sin and impiety, are of another race and descent, they are the children of the the devil; they resemble him, and belong unto him. By doing righteousness is meant the practice of universal goodness, and a thorough conformity to the law of God in opposition to sin, which is the transgression of the law. Learn hence, 1. That every man may come to the certain knowledge of his own condition, whether he be a good or bad man; By this the children of God are manifested; that is, hereby good and bad men are really distinguished; the scripture has laid down real marks of difference between them. 2. That the love and practice of universal righteousness, and nothing short of it, will denominate a person a child of God, and evidence to his own conscience, that he is brought into a state of grace and favour with him.—Neither he that loveth not his brother:

This discovers a farther difference between the children of God and the children of Satan, namely, Brotherly love; he doth not say, he that hateth his brother is a child of the devil, but he that loveth not his brother; intimating, that not only hatred and malice against, but want of brotherly love towards each other, is the mark and sign not of a child of God, but of the devil. He that doth not unfeignedly love men as men, and all christians as christians, is no child of God, no lover of God; for he that loveth not God's image, loveth not God himself.

11 ¶ For this is the message that ye heard from the beginning, that we should love one another. 12 Not as Cain, who was of that wicked one, and slew his brother. And wherefore slew he him? Because his own works were evil, and his brother's righteous. 13 Marvel not, my brethren, if the world hate you.

Our Apostle comes now to enforce his exhortation unto brotherly love, by many weighty arguments: 1. He assures them, that this precept concerning brotherly love was given them by Christ and his apostles, from the beginning of the preaching of the gospel. Note here, 1. That the word of God is a message sent from God unto us, a message for our information and instruction, a message for our guide and direction. 2. That the duty of brotherly love is an ancient message that God has sent and has continued to send us, from the beginning; God help us to learn this lesson, so anciently taught us, and so long pressed upon us by God himself. A second argument to excite brotherly love is drawn from the evil of hating our brother, which appears in the person and practice of Cain, whom our Apostle describes, 1. By his pedigree, He was of that wicked one; that is, the devil, of his diabolical disposition, of his envious and malicious inclination, and, as such, was not so much Adam's son as the devil's son. 2. By his practice, he slew his brother: He first hated him, and then slew him. His hatred was causeless and unjust, implacable and deadly, and ended in his brother's death and his own destruction. 3. The reason is assigned why he slew him, Because his own works were evil, and his brother's righteous; not for any harm he had done, or for any evil he had deserved, but because Cain was bad himself, and his works bad; to hate godliness, and to persecute the godly, is the very nature and disposition of a wicked man. Observe lully, The inference drawn by the Apostle from this example of Cain's hating his holy and innocent brother; Marvel not, my brethren, says he, if the world hate you; intimating, that the world always did, and ever will, hate God's children; and that the children of God are not to marvel or wonder at it, but to prepare for it; it is no new thing, but what has been from the beginning; Though Cain be dead, the spirit of Cain is alive; the persecutor goes about with Cain's club in his hand, redded with blood; marvel not then if the world hate you.

14 We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren. He that loveth not his brother abideth in death.

Observe here, 1. Our Apostle's description of a carnal unregenerate state; it is a state of spiritual death. 2. Of a christian's renewed state by the spirit of Christ, it is a state of spiritual life; we are passed from death to life. 3. Here is the mark and token by which this translation from death to life may be known, namely, by love; for love being the great work of God's renewing spirit on the soul, it is by the production of that, we come to the knowledge that we are changed from a Cainish corrupt state of death, into a state of holy life: Whatever grace men pretend unto, if they want this grace of love, they are yet dead in sin.

4. The characteristical note of that love which will be an undubitable evidence of this our translation from death to life, it must be a love of the brethren; that is, of all christians, as such; particularly it must be an extensive and universal love, that reacheth all the children of God, all good men, of what judgment and opinion soever, otherwise it is the love of a party only, and a love for opinion-sake, not for grace-sake, Colos. i. 4. We give thanks since we heard of your love to all the saints; that is, to all of what nation and kingdom soever, of what estate and condition soever, of what judgment and opinion soever, though differing from you in some lesser things. It must also be an holy love that will evidence our christianity; though all men must be loved as men, yet the brethren must be loved for the likeness of God in them; we must love God's holiness in holy persons; it is one thing to love the brethren, and another to love them as brethren, and because they are brethren; a gracious person may be loved only for carnal respects, and sinister ends; again, it must be active and operative, a costly and expensive love; that cheap love of some men, which will with a poor christian well, but will be at no pains, no cost or expence, to help and succour him, because they love their money better than they do their brother, is the hypocrite's love, not the saint's; see James ii. 15. From the whole learn, that the love of grace in another, is a good evidence of the life of grace in ourselves; unfeigned love to the children of God as such, is an undoubted evidence of our regeneration and adoption.

15 Whosoever hateth his brother is a murderer: and ye know that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him.

Observe here, 1. The nature of the sin condemned, it is a secret sin of the heart, not an open sin of the life; he that hateth his brother, that is, in his heart, is a murderer, though he doth not smite him with his tongue, or with his hand. Learn thence, That sins of the heart are damning, as well as sins of the life; a man may be an adulterer in the sight of God, and yet never touch a woman. Matth. v. 28 and idolater, and yet never bow his knee to an image, Eph. v. 5. a murderer, and yet never hurt his brother; if he hates him in his heart, it is recorded murder in God's account. What need have we to put up David's prayer, Psal. xix. Cleanse thou me from my secret sins? Observe 2. The sad and deplorable condition of such as are guilty of this sin, namely, of murdering their brother by hatred in their hearts: He that hateth his brother, abideth in death, ver. 14. and hath not eternal life abiding in him, ver. 15. that is, he hath no spiritual life, nothing of the life of grace abiding in him, which is the seed and principle, the original and beginning of eternal life. Note thence, That the life of grace in the heart of a regenerate person, is the beginning and first principle of a life of glory, whereof they cannot but be destitute who hate their brother in their hearts. So much hatred in a man, so much death; and so much want of love, so much want of life.

16 Hereby perceive we the love of God, because he laid down his life for us: and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren.

Here our apostle presses brotherly love from another argument, namely, from the example of Jesus Christ, who being God, as well as man, laid down his life, as man, for us. Where note, That the intimate union betwixt the divine and human nature in Christ, gives ground for the calling Christ's life, as man, the life of God; as his blood is said, Acts xx. 28. to be God's own blood: Hereby perceive we the love of God; that is, of Jesus Christ the Redeemer, in that he laid down his life for us. Thence learn, That the death of Christ for us is a special manifestation of his singular love unto us. Observe farther, The inference which our Apostle draws from Christ's love in laying down his life for us, namely, that we therefore ought to lay down our lives for the brethren: That is, in a time of persecution, when the glory of God, the edification of the church, and the eternal salvation of our brethren, do require it, and stand in need of it: We must never flit at laying down our lives when God calls us to it, as needful for better ends than our lives. It is not needful that we live, but needful and necessary that we glorify God, both in life and death.

17 But whoso hath this world's good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?

Our Apostle here draws an argument from the greater to the less, after this manner: "If, says he, we ought to be ready in some cases to part with our lives for the brethren, surely we much more ought to impart and communicate our worldly goods to them in the time of their necessity, and he that refuses so to do, can never think there is any thing of that love in him, which God requires of him towards his children." Learn hence, That there certainly dwells no love of God in that man's heart, who having this world's goods, stretcheth not out his hands to help the necessities of his brother. Here note, 1. The fountain from which all charitable distributions are to proceed and flow, namely, from the compassion of the heart. 2. That the compassion of the heart must draw forth the help of the hand: He that is a christian indeed will open both heart and hand to the distressed, and they shall partake of his purse as well as of his pity. 3. It is not said, He that has abundance of this world's goods, let him of his great superfluity give; but he that hath this world's goods; that is, in any measure, yea, though he has no more than he works for, yet is he required, Eph. iv. 28. that worketh with his hands, to give to him that needeth. The world is greatly deceived who thinks charity and almsgiving a duty that only concerns the rich; indeed it concerns them eminently, but not exclusive. And oh! the dreadful account that some rich men have to give, who expend more upon a lust in one day, than they give to the poor in a whole year. But yet, after all, every one that hath this world's goods, though he has but what he labours and sweats for, yet must he in proportion to what he has, give to him that needeth. Note, 4. The object of this our compassion and charity; a brother, a brother in need, and every brother in need; not only such as are cast down, but such as are falling, are the proper objects of our pity and help. 5. The circumstances of time when we must give, namely, when we see our brother in need. What a vanity is it to leave our alms till after our death, to be beholden to the justice of others for their distribution! Let us see our charity bestowed with our own eyes, and given out with our own hands, when the tongues of the poor will bless us, but their prayers will do us no good when we are dead. Whoso seeth his brother have need, &c. From the whole learn That when we are in a capacity, and enjoy an opportunity of expressing our charitable benevolence towards our poor and indigent brethren, the omission of it is a certain evidence that there is nothing of the love of God residing in us.

18 My little children, let us not love in word, neither in tongue, but in deed and in truth. 19 And hereby we know that we are of the truth, and shall assure our hearts before him.

Having laid down several motives to brotherly love before, by way of excitation, as an help to their affections, he comes now to propound some directions to them as an help to their endeavours. And the first is this, to take special care that their love be sincere, and not hypocritical. Let us not love in word, that is, in word only, but in deed, and in truth. As if he had said, "Let our deeds speak the truth of our love; sincere love is fruitful; true affection will put forth itself into action; it doth not rest at the tongue's end, but will be seen at the finger's end, rendering us laborious in works and offices of friendship; as faith, so love without works is dead; and as faith is justified by works, so is our love also." Observe next, The encouragement which our Apostle gives to the exercise of true love, hereby we shall know that we are of the truth, &c. That is, "By such efficacy and real fruits of our love we shall know that we are true christians, who live by, and walk according to the rule of the gospel, which is emphatically styled styled the truth, and shall have the assured testimony of our consciences, that we are sincere in the sight of God." Learn 1. That the love of christians one to another ought not to be verbal, or in word only, but in deed, and in truth. 2. That the sincerity of our love to our brethren is the security of our consciences and estates before God. A christian may be assured of his good estate, and may build his assurance upon the sincerity of his love to God and christians.

20 For if our heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things. 21 Beloved, if our heart condemn us not, then have we confidence towards God.

By heart here is undoubtedly meant conscience; and it is as much as if the apostle had said, "If our consciences tell us that our love is barren and fruitless, and so condemn us for hypocrisy, God is greater than our consciences, both in holiness to condemn, and in knowledge to perceive the evil of them, for he knoweth all things: whereas if we have the witness of our consciences touching the sincerity of our love by the fruits of it; if, after a most strict examination of our consciences, and an exact comparing of our lives and actions with the law of God, we are not condemned of insincerity in our obedience to God, and love to our neighbour, then have we an humble confidence with God in all our addresses to him." Learn hence, 1. That the consciences of men have a self-condemning and a self-absolving power. 2. That the consciences of men are much better known to God, than they either are or can be known unto themselves. 3. That if our hearts or consciences do condemn us, it is an evidence of greater condemnation from the heart-searching God. 4. That if our consciences do absolve us, it is an argument of our acceptance with God, and a ground of confidence in all our addresses to him. 5. That according to the verdict or testimony of men's consciences rightly informed, and truly testifying, God will either acquit or absolve them at the great day.

22 And whatsoever we ask, we receive of him, because we keep his commandments, and do those things that are pleasing in his sight.

Observe, 1. An extraordinary favour and privilege insured, Whatsoever we ask, we receive of him; that is, whatsoever we ask according to his will, we are sure to receive, either in kind, or in equivalency. It shall either be given in mercy, or denied in love; for verily God is as kind in denying some of our requests, as in answering others; we often cry for that which it would be cruelty for God to give; we know not what is best to beg, but an infinitely wise God knoweth what is fittest to give. Dat pro jucundis aptissima. 2. The qualification of the persons to whom this precious privilege does belong. They keep God's commandments, and do the things that please him. According to our hearing God's commandments, so he hears and answers our prayers; with what measure we mete to God, God will measure to us again. If God's commands be trode under our feet, no wonder that all our prayers fail to the ground. God hears not us, if we hear not him.

23 And this is the commandment, that we should believe on the name of his Son Jesus Christ, and love one another, as he gave us commandment.

Observe, 1. What is the sum of the christian's duty, faith and love, to believe on the name of Jesus Christ; that is, to rely upon him as our Redeemer, our Teacher, our King, our Intercessor, and to obey his great command of loving one another with a pure heart fervently. 2. What a mighty encouragement it is to faith, that believing on Christ is constituted a duty by a plain gospel-precept. This is the commandment, for this command cuts off that vain pretence and plea of presumption. What! such a vile wretch as thou presume to believe on Christ? says Satan. Yes, says the christian, here is a command to me so to do, yea, a command from the highest sovereignty, the contempt whereof I must answer at my utmost peril. 3. How the command of faith, and the command of love, are linked and knit together, as if the weight of our salvation hung equally and alike upon both; as without faith it is impossible to please God, so without love it is impossible to please him also. Will no duty profit without faith? In like manner can we neither profit ourselves nor others without love: As whatever is not of faith is sin, so whatever we perform towards our brother, if we do it not out of love, we miss our reward. 1. Cor. xiii. 3. Lord! can we ever think this command of love small and inconsiderable, when thou hast joined the love of thine image with faith in thy dear Son?

24 And he that keepeth his commandments dwelleth in him, and he in him. And hereby we know that he abideth in us, by the Spirit which he hath given us.

Observe here, The benefit of obedience to God's command. God dwelleth in us, and we in him. God's dwelling in us implies, 1. Right and property; what a man dwells in is his own. 2. Command and authority; the master and owner is the commander and disposer of the house. It also, 3. Implies residence and continuance, settlement and fixedness of abode; there a man dwells where he constantly resides. And our dwelling in God imports, 1. Reconciliation with God. Can two dwell together except they be agreed? 2. Affiance and trust in him. 3. An upholding constant communion with him; it is one thing to run to God for refuge in a storm, and another thing to make him our dwelling place at all times, and in all conditions; he that keepeth God's commandments thus dwelleth in God, and God in him; it follows, And hereby we know that he abideth in us, by the Spirit which he hath given us. Learn, That the Spirit of God, bestowed upon us in his sanctifying gifts and saving graces, is an evident sign of God's dwelling in us, and we in him.

CHAP. IV.

BELOVED, believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they are of God; because many false prophets are gone out into the world.

Our apostle having in the last verse of the foregoing chapter, mentioned the abiding of the Spirit of God in the souls of believers, left the christians to whom he wrote should be deceived by such as might pretend to be acted by the Spirit, when indeed they were not; he comes in this chapter to caution and counsel all christians to take heed of being seduced by such as should pretend to be inspired by the Holy Spirit of God, saying, Believe not every spirit; that is, every teacher who pretends to be inspired, and every doctrine that lays claim to the doctrine of divine revelation: But try the spirits; that is, examine their doctrines by the rule of the word of God, and try from whom they come, whether from the Spirit of God, or Satan; for many false prophets, or impostors, and deceivers, are gone abroad into the world. Learn hence, 1. That men from the beginning of christianity have, and still do, falsely pretend to divine inspiration. 2. That christians ought not to believe every one that thus pretends to be divinely inspired; for every one that has but enough of confidence, and little enough of conscience, may pretend to come from God. 3. That neither are we to reject all that pretend to come from God; for when the Apostle bids us not believe every spirit, he supposes that we are to believe some; and when he bids us try the spirits whether they be of God, he supposes some to be of God, and that such as are so, ought to be believed by us. 4. That there is some way to discern mere pretenders to inspiration from those who are truly and divinely inspired; it were in vain to make the trial, if there were no way to discern the truth. 5. That it is the duty of all christians to examine the doctrines propounded to them, by the word of God; they having a judgment of discretion, though not a judgment of decision; a power to judge for themselves, not to impose upon others; nor does this allowed liberty of every one judging for himself take away the necessity and use of our spiritual guides and teachers, or exempt us from a due submission and obedience thereunto, but, in concurrence with them, we are to try the spirits whether they be of God.

2 Hereby know ye the Spirit of God; every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God: 3. And every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is not of God. And this is that spirit of antichrist, whereof you have heard that it should come, and even now already is it in the world.

In these words our Apostle lays down a plain mark and rule of trial, how they might know a teacher that was acted and inspired by the Spirit of God, from one that was not: such a one as durst truly and openly in the face of danger own and profess, teach and preach, Jesus Christ in his person, nature, and offices, as the incarnate word, or Son of God, sent from heaven, ascribing virtue and efficacy to the sacrifice of his death, and attributing to him alone the whole glory of a perfect Saviour; this doctrine is of the Spirit, and this Spirit is of God. But, such teachers as will not hazard themselves, but for fear of sufferings and persecution will deny either the Godhood or manhood of Christ, and disown either his incarnation, death or resurrection; such teachers, and such doctrines, are not of God, but are the very spirit of antichrist, which, says he, you have been foretold, should come, and is now already in the world. Learn hence, That such a teacher as disowns either of the natures of Christ, or denies any of the offices of Christ, that either denies the divinity of his person, or the meritoriousness of his satisfaction, is not of God, he is antichrist, against Christ, and shall find Christ against him in the day that he appears before him.

4 Ye are of God, little Children, and have overcome them: because greater is he that is in you than he that is in the world.

Observe here, 1. A character and description given of these christians to whom our Apostle writes. He tells them they were of a nobler descent, of a more excellent pedigree, and higher offspring, than their false teachers; Ye are of God, regenerated by the Spirit of God, quickened by his renovation, led by his manuduction, acted by his influences, animated by his assistances: Little children, ye are of God. 2. What is affirmed of these christians, Ye have overcome them; that is, you have resisted their temptations, withstood their seductions, and all their arts and endeavours to mislead you, when others have been perverted by them. Learn hence, That by steadfastness in the doctrine of Christ, christians do overcome impostors and seducers, when unstable souls are overcome by them. Observe, 3. The reason assigned why, and the means declared by which they overcome, namely, because greater is he that is in you, than he that is in the world; that is, Christ, who by his Spirit and doctrine dwells in you, is greater, and more powerfully efficacious, than the spirit of error, which influences these wild impostors and seducers that are abroad in the world.

5 They are of the world: therefore speak they of the world, and the world heareth them. 6 We are of God. He that knoweth God heareth us: he that is not of God, heareth not us. Hereby know we the spirit of truth, and the spirit of error.

Here we have, 1. The character given of these seducers and false teachers, They are of the world; that is, men of worldly minds and interests, They speak of the world; that is, they preach a doctrine suitable to the lusts and inclinations of worldly men, who greedily hear them, and easily believe them; ordinarily our words are such as we are; they who are of the world must needs speak of the world, for they have nothing else to speak of. The covetous man speaks covetously, and the proud man proudly. 2. The character which the Apostle gives of himself and his fellow-apostles, we are of God; that is, taught and instructed by God. We have our mission and our message from God, and he has given us his attestation, by opening the ears and hearts of those that attend upon our ministry, to receive and embrace our doctrine; but such a are not taught of God, reject both it and us. 3. The inference and conclusion which our Apostle draws from hence, namely, that by the doctrine and writings of the apostles and evangelists, the truth or falsehood of doctrines may and must be judged; for, says he, Hereby we know the spirit of truth, and the spirit of error.

7 I Beloved, let us love one another: for love is of of God; and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God: 8 He that loveth not, knoweth not God: for God is love.

Our apostle here resumes his exhortation to brotherly love, and urges and reinforces it with fresh arguments. 1. He assures us, that love is of God; that is, the fruit of his good Spirit in us; common love is his common gift, and holy love is his special grace. 2. It is an evidence that we have a right knowledge of God, both of his nature and will, and that we understand both what he is, and what he requires; he that has not the grace of love in his heart, has not the right knowledge of God in his head, whatever he may think of himself, or pretend to others. 3. The apostle assures us, That love is not only commanded, but exemplified by God himself: God is love. He had said before, love is of God, as a quality; here he says, God is love; not as a mere quality, but his essence. God is love: 1. Essentially; love in the creature is an accidental quality, in God an essential property. 2. God is love, casually, the efficient cause of whatever is loving or lovely in us: All our love to him, and one another, is but a reflection of his love to us. 3. God is love, objectively; he is, or ought to be, the supreme object of our love; and we must love him above all, or he accounts we love him not at all. 4. God is love, declaratively; all his works, as well as his word, are a declaration of his love to us, and ought to engage us to steadfastness in our love to him.

9 In this was manifested the love of God towards us, because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him.

Observe, 1. That God doth not only bestow love upon his people, but it is his good pleasure to manifest that love. Quest. Wherein has God manifested his love towards us? Ans. 1. In our creation, making us out of nothing in such a wonderful manner; our bodies curiously wrought as with a needle, our soul beautified with understanding, will, and judgment. 2. In our apostacy and degeneration, when no eye pitied us, and when we had no hearts to pity ourselves, then were his bowels of love and compassion yearning towards us; then he said unto us, Live, when he might have said, Die, and be damned. 3. In our redemption, recovery and restitution, in sending his only begotten Son into the world, that we might live through him. Observe, 2. A threefold evidence of God's love to mankind in the work of redemption, that great and glorious work. 1. It was a wonderful instance of the love of God, that he should be pleased to take our case into consideration, and to concern himself for our happiness; as nothing is more obliging to human nature than love, so no love obliges more than that which is exercised with great condescension after a provocation; such was God's love to offending man. 2. That he should design so great a benefit to us, as is here expressed, even life, that we might live through him. 3. That God was pleased to use such a mean for the obtaining and procuring of this benefit for us. He sent his own Son into the world, that we might live through him. Where note, 1. The person sent, his own Son, and only begotten Son. 2. The persons sent to, the men of the world, who are spiritually dead, and judicially dead. 3. The manner of his being sent, voluntarily and freely, not constrained by necessity, not prevailed upon by importunity, not obliged by benefit or kindness from us; but out of his mere pity and goodness towards us, he sent him into a wicked world, and into an ungrateful world, that we might live through him. From the whole learn, That God's bestowing his Son upon a lost world, was a manifest evidence of his great and wonderful love unto them.

10 Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins.

Herein is love: that is, the clearest, the fullest, the highest expression of free and undeserved love that ever the world was acquainted with. Observe, That the wisdom and power of God did not act to the utmost of their efficacy in the work of creation; he could have framed a more glorious world had it pleased him; but the love of God in our redemption by Christ could not be expressed, or set forth, in an higher degree: When Almighty God would give the most excellent testimony of his favour to mankind, he gave them his eternal Son, the Son of his love: And verily the giving of heaven itself, with all its joys and glory, is not so full and perfect a demonstration of the love of God, as the giving of his Son to die for us. Observe next, the priority of God's love to mankind; he loved us, not we him; he loved us antecedently to our loving him, and he loved us, that we might love him, when there was nothing in us either to deserve, or to engage his love. Observe lastly, The great intent and gracious design of God in sending his Son; namely, To be a propitiation for our sins; that is, to die as a sacrifice for our sins, and thereby atone divine displeasure. Herein is love; that is, the triumph, the riches, and glory of divine love, that God gave Christ to die for us. "But is their love in nothing else but this?" Yes sure, to have a being among rational creatures, therein is love; to have our life carried so many years in the hand of providence, like a burning taper, in the midst of winds and storms, and not burnt out, this is love; to have food and raiment convenient for us, relations and friends to comfort us, in all these is love, great love; but comparatively none at all to the love expressed in giving Christ to die for us; Herein was love, the flower of love.

11 Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another. 12 No man hath seen God at any time. If we love one another, God dwelleth in us, and his love is perfected in us. 13 Hereby know we that we dwell in him, and he in us, because he hath given us of his Spirit.

Observe, 1. The genuine inference which our apostle draws from the doctrine laid down concerning the greatness of God's love to us; namely, "That seeing God so loved us, we should love one another, and be like him according to our measure, and in our degree." 2. The apostle's argument to provoke us hereunto; he tells us, That God himself is to be loved by us for his astonishing love unto us: But as God is not to be seen in his essence, but in man his image, so must we love God in man, his creature, made after his own image and likeness: And if we love the holy image of God in each other, it is an evidence that God dwelleth in us, and we in him; namely, by the inhabitation of his holy Spirit, which being a Spirit of love in us, draws forth our love towards himself, and one towards another. And further he assures us, That this will be a sign that love is perfect in us; namely, that this grace is, in its vigour and perfection, in our souls, sincere and entire, having all its essential parts, though it be not absolutely perfect in all degrees. Note, That perfection here is not opposed to imperfection, but to insincerity. Our love is then said to be perfected, when it is considerably heightened and improved. Blessed be God! the hour is coming when this, and all other graces, shall be perfected, when this spark of love shall be blown up into a seraphic flame. Lastly, The rule which our apostle lays down, whereby we may know assuredly, that God dwelleth in us, and we in him; namely, If he has given us his Spirit, which is a Spirit of holy love. Learn thence, That the holy Spirit, (not in its extraordinary gifts, which are long since ceased) but in its sanctifying operations and gracious fruits (of which sincere love is the first and chief) is an undoubted evidence of God's dwelling in us by a special inhabitation, and of our dwelling in him; that is, resting in his love and favour, and under his protection and care.

14 And we have seen and do testify that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world. 15 Whosoever shall confess that Jesus is the Son of God, God dwelleth in him, and he in God. 16 And we have known and believed the love that God hath to us. God is love; and he that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God, and God in him.

As if the apostle had said, "Though no man hath seen God at any time, yet we apostles, who preach the doctrine of faith unto you, and press the duty of love upon you, have seen with our bodily eyes the Lord Jesus Christ, and do testify, that God the Father glorified his love, by sending his Son to be the Saviour of a perishing world; not of Jews only, but of the Gentiles also. And we further declare, That whosoever believing this our testimony shall confess with his mouth, and believe in his heart, that this Jesus, whom we preach, is the Son of God, and shall evidence the truth of his faith by the sincerity of his love, and other good fruits, it is certain that God dwelleth in him by his Spirit and he dwelleth in God by repeated acts of love. And finally, we apostles well knowing, and firmly believing the love, the wonderful great love, which God hath manifested towards us, in and through his Son Jesus Christ, we again affirm and conclude, that God is love. Love originally, the fountain from whence all love flows. Love efficiently, the producing cause of all love in the hearts of our people. Love subjectively, a God full of love and mercy, of goodness and pity towards his creatures. Love objectively, he is deservedly the first and chief object of our love; as he is the first and chief good. Love declaratively, both his word and works declare the purposes of his love unto us, and give demonstrations of innumerable instances of his beneficence towards us. But especially God is love essentially. Love in us is an adventitious and accidental quality; in God it is an essential property, it is his very essence and nature, inseparable from his being; he can as soon cease to be, as cease to love. And as God is love, so we again affirm that he that dwelleth in love, that is, he who has love, as the prevailing habit in his heart, and as the governing principle of his life, dwelleth, by communion, in God, as the eye dwells in the light, and as one friend by love dwells in another; and God, by his Spirit of love, dwelleth in him.

17 Herein is our love made perfect, that we may have boldness in the day of judgment: because as he is, so are we in this world. 18 There is no fear in love, but perfect love casteth out fear: because fear hath torment: he that feareth is not made perfect in love.

Still our apostle proceeds by way of argument to enforce upon us the obligation of our duty to love one another; he assures us here, that if our love be made perfect, that is, heightened and improved by an exact corresponding with the divine pattern and precept; if we love one another in obedience to God's command, and in conformity to Christ's example, it will give us boldness in the day of judgment; and we may think and speak of, we may expect and look for, the approach of that day without fear and consternation of mind; the reason is added, because as Christ was, so are we in the world: that is, as he was full of holiness and purity, of love and charity, so have we endeavoured to be in imitation of his example, according to our measure, in some proportion and degree. Learn hence, 1. That such as are sincerely gracious, and do excel in the grace of love, are in the world in some sort as Christ was in the world; such as walk in love, walk as Christ walked. 2. That such as are in the world, as Christ was in the world, shall have boldness when Christ comes to judgment, and need not fear the condemnation of that dreadful day; the reason of this freedom from the fear of wrath is added, verse 18, There is no fear in love; that is, no slavish or distrustful fear, whereby we question the favour of God; but only a filial and reverential fear, whereby we stand in awe of offending him as a Father: But perfect love casteth out fear; that is, either the actings of our perfect love to God, or the apprehensions of God's perfect love towards us, do cast out all that fear which has torment in it. Yet note, That although perfect love casteth out tormenting fear, it calls in obeying fear, Ecc. xii. 13. Fear God and keep his commandments, for this is the whole duty of man; an awful fear of God is all duty, and every grace. Note also, The true reason of our disquieting and tormenting fear is the imperfection and weakness of our love; fear may stand with faith and love, but not with perfect faith, nor perfect love: He that feareth is not made perfect in love, and because he is not made perfect in love, therefore he feareth. Blessed be God, as there will be no torment, so no fear, in heaven; that is, no tormenting fear; yet there is a fear of reverence, which will undoubtedly remain with glorified saints in heaven; they shall have an everlasting awe of the majesty and holiness of God eternally fixed upon their hearts and spirits, even in the the kingdom of glory in heaven, as well as in the kingdom of grace here on earth; the saints serve God acceptably with reverence and godly fear; Lord, hasten the perfecting of thy grace in us, particularly the perfection of our love, that perfect love may cast out tormenting fear, and cherish such a reverential fear as will both prepare us for heaven, and accompany us in heaven, to all eternity.

19 We love him, because he first loved us.

There is a double reading of these words according to the original: 1. They may be read, let us love him because he first loved us, by way of motive, denoting, that believers have great reason to love God with their choicest and highest affections, for as much as he has loved them, and first loved them. 2. They are here read by way of causality, we do love him, because he first loved us; intimating, that God's love to us is the root and spring of our love to him, and to one another; all our love to saints is the effect of his preventing love to us, and but a reflection of those beams of love which God has first cast upon us; if God's love to us had been a mere dependent consequence of our love to him, how uncertain should we be of its continuance? But his love to us was the antecedent cause of our love to him; we therefore love him, because he first loved us.

20 If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar. For he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?

Our Apostle in these words prevents an objection. Some might be ready to say, "Who is it that doth not love God? is there any that live who doth not love him?" The Apostle replies, That whosoever says he loves God, and yet hateth his brother, is plainly a liar; for it is impossible truly to love God, and not to do what God commands; and if we do not exercise love to our brethren, whom we daily see and converse with, how can it be imagined that we love God, whom we never saw? Learn hence, first, That as God is infinitely above us, so he needeth not our love, but it is wonderful condescension in God to give us leave to love him, and to suffer himself to be embraced by those arms which have embraced sin and lust before him. 2. That though God needs not us, or our love, yet we need him, and stand in need of one another, and for that reason must and ought to love each other. 3. That if we love not God's visible image, it is certain we never loved the invisible God; if when we have our christian brethren in our daily view, and the objects of our senses are their miseries and wants, and yet we shut up the bowels of compassion from them, can we, or dare we, pretend at the same time to love God whom we have not seen, and who is only present to our minds by raised expectations; as the sight of our brother is a strong inducement to love him, so the not loving him at sight, is a strong argument that we love not God himself.

21 And this commandment have we from him, That he who loveth God, love his brother also.

This commandment; this great and chief commandment above the rest, this summary and comprehensive commandment, including all the rest, namely, to love God above all for his own sake, and to love our brother as ourselves, for God's sake; this command, so full of wisdom, so agreeable to right reason, and so much our duty and interest to comply with, have we received from God; and it is most certain that we love him not, if we keep it not; This commandment have we from God, that he who loveth God, loveth his brother also, Learn thence, 1. That the great God, by his gracious command, requires that we love him, and place the supremacy of our love upon him. 2. That as God requires us to love him above ourselves, so does he oblige us, by virtue of his command, to love our brother as ourselves; as sincerely, though not so intensely, as ourselves. 3. That the same commandment that requires us to love God, requires love to our brethren also; God interprets the neglect of our duty to our brother, as a neglect of our obligation to ourself.

C H A P. V.

WHosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ, is born of God: and every one that loveth him that begat, loveth him also that is begotten of him.

Observe here, 1. The grand proposition laid down as the object of our faith, namely, that Jesus is the Christ; that is, that Jesus of Nazareth, who was born with, and lived amongst the Jews, was the Saviour of the world, the person whom Moses and the prophets foretold to be the Messiah. 2. The duty required of us, namely to believe that Jesus is the Christ; that is, not historically only, to assent that Jesus is the predicted and promised Messiah, but to express the truth of that faith in a suitable conversation. 3. How evidential such a faith is of our regeneration; whosoever thus believes that Jesus is the Christ, is born of God; faith in Christ Jesus, as the great King, Priest, and Prophet of his church, accompanied with an holy life, is a sure mark and undoubted evidence of our new birth. 4. The affection which every person that is born of God bears unto God, He loveth him that begat; this is the ingratiating and endearing quality; it is this that commends both our persons and performances to God's acceptance; the service of love is therefore most acceptable, because most honourable to God, and most durable and lasting from us; the obedience of love will be lasting. 5. What is the genuine effect, and natural product of this love to God, namely, a sincere affection to all the children of God: every christian that sincerely loves God, certainly loves the image of God in his saints and children; he that loves the father for his own sake, cannot but love the child for the father's sake, if like him; and the more like him, the more he loves him.

2 By this we know that we love the children of God, when we love God, and keep his commandments.

Observe here, That the sincerity of our love to the children of God is best discovered by our love to God, and obedience to his commands. Quest. 1. What kind of love is required towards the children of God? Ans. A love of esteem, a love of desire, a love of delight, and a love of service and beneficence. Quest. 2. What kind of obedience towards God is that which springs from love? Ans. It is uniform and universal; love regardeth the whole law in all its injunctions and prohibitions, and studieth to please the lawgiver; it is pleasant and delightful, not a melancholy task, but a pleasing exercise, it is accurate and exact, it produces a severe circumspection over our ways, that nothing be done or allowed by us that is displeasing to the divine eye; and it is constant and persevering; that motion which is caused by outward poises will cease when the weights are down, but that which proceeds from an inward principle, or life, is continual; and such a principle is the love of God planted in the christian's breast.

3 ¶ For this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments: and his commandments are not grievous.

Our apostle in these words gives a threefold description of a sincere christian. He describes him, 1. By his inward affection to God and Christ, and that is love; this is shed abroad in his heart. 2. By the action which flows from this affection, namely, obedience to God in keeping his commandments. 3. By the disposition and inclination from which that obedience doth proceed and flow, namely, a delight and cheerfulness in the doing of our duty. His commandments are not grievous; that is, they have nothing in them heavy or burdensome, but every thing that may render them at once both our duty and delight. Learn hence, 1. That obedience is the most natural and necessary product of love; where love is the governing principle, it rules all the inclinations of the heart and actions of the life. 2. That love makes our obedience to God cheerful and constant, delightful and lasting. Love is seated in the will, and that obedience which proceeds from it is out of choice, and purely voluntary. No commandment is grievous that is performed from love, and it makes obedience also constant. That which is forced from impressions of fear is unsteady, but that which flows from delight is lasting. Learn hence, That the service of Christ is a very gracious, a most desirable and delightful service, not to sinners, whose minds the god of this world has blinded, whose consciences are cauterized, who have not only grieved, but quenched the Holy Spirit of God. But, 1. It is not grievous in itself. 2. Nor is it grievous to a regenerate person; a sound eye never complains of light, but a sore eye is uneasy under it. The commands of Christ cannot be grievous, because they exact things of us which are agreeable to our reason, suitable to our natures, consonant to our rational desires. We cannot give an instance of any one of the commands of Christ which is in itself grievous; that command of his, To do to others as we would have others do by us, is a dictate of nature as well as the law of Christ.

4 For whatsoever is born of God overcometh the world: and this is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith.

Two things are here observable, namely, a proposition, and the explication of that proposition. Observe, 1. The proposition, Whosoever is born of God overcometh the world. Every regenerate christian is a victorious christian, he is a conqueror yea, the greatest of conquerors, he conquers the whole world. 2. The exposition of this proposition, This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith. It is a spiritual conquest, and spiritually obtained, even by faith. Note here, 1. That the world is a christian's grand enemy. A conquest supposes a combat, and a combat supposes an enemy. 2. That every regenerate christian is a victorious conqueror over this enemy. The christian is a soldier as soon as he is a believer and he is a conqueror as soon as he is a soldier. This is the victory; he hath his enemy under his feet, even whilst he is in the fight. 3. That the special weapon by which the christian conquers the world, and his spiritual enemies, is his faith. Many warriors have done great things in conquering kingdoms, but this is a greater conquest than all theirs; their conquest was but poor and partial, only of some small parts of earth, but the christian's conquest is universal; those conquerors whilst they prevailed abroad were slaves at home; whilst they were lords of nations, they were vassals to their own lust; but these conquerors, which the text speaks of, begin their victories at home, and enlarge their triumphs over all enemies abroad.

5 Who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God? 6 This is he that came by water and blood, even Jesus Christ; not by water only, but by water and blood. And it is the Spirit that beareth witness, because the Spirit is truth.

Our apostle having spoken of the usefulness of faith in the former verse, that it overcometh the world, next discovers the object of this faith, which is this proposition, that Jesus is the Son of God. Who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God? That faith which overcomes the world, is faith in the divinity and sonship of Jesus Christ. We overcome the world by believing in him that overcame it, even Jesus Christ, who hath purchased, promised, and prepared a better world than what we do see, or can see, with our bodily eyes, and has made us heirs of eternal glory. Observe next, The argument by which the apostle proves that Jesus is the Son of God, the true Messiah and the Saviour of mankind, namely, because he came by water and blood: that is, say some, by the testimony given him when he was in the water, at his baptism, both by John the Baptist, and the voice from heaven; he came by his Spirit, say others, as by water, to sanctify those that believe in him; and by his blood to make a full atonement for them; an admirable symbol of both, which was the flowing of water and blood both out of Christ's side, when he hung upon the cross. It is a sweet meditation that Christ comes by water as well as blood, by way of sanctification as well as by way of justification; his death not only discharges from guilt, but cleanses also from pollution and filth; blessed be God there is a fountain opened in the side of our Saviour for sin, and for uncleanness, to wash in, and to be purged from. Sanctification is as great, and in some respects a greater privilege than justification; for justification frees us only from misery and punishment, but sanctification frees us from sin, which is worse than punishment. Again, real perfections are above relative perfections; now justification by Christ's blood is only a relative perfection, it makes us stand in a new relation to the law, laws by which before we stood guilty and condemned; but sanctification by the Spirit of Christ, signified here, and set forth elsewhere frequently, by water, is a real moral perfection, it changes the heart and nature, and makes us like unto God, yea, like unto him in his highest perfection, which is that of holiness. Come then, O blessed Redeemer, by water and blood into our souls, with thy renewing grace and sanctifying Spirit, to purge our consciences from dead works, and to deliver us not only from the danger, but from the dominion of our sins. And it is the Spirit that beareth witness, because the spirit is truth. Some by the Spirit's bearing witness understand the testimony which the Holy Spirit gave to Christ here upon earth, as touching the truth of his doctrine, the reality of his miracles, and the certainty of his mission; others understand by it the Spirit's testimony in the holy Scriptures, and in the consciences of believers, that Jesus Christ is a divine person, and came by water and blood, both to save us at once from the wrath of God, and the rage of our lusts. Learn hence, That the holy Spirit of God speaking in the Scriptures, and breathing in the consciences of believers, bears witness to their soul, that Jesus Christ came to save them by the water of sanctification, as well as with and by the blood of redemption; and that the Spirit thus witnessing is a Spirit of truth.

7 For there are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost: and these three are one.

That is, "There are three in heaven which do bear record to this truth here upon earth, namely, that Jesus is the Christ; that is to say, the three persons in the holy Trinity, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost; the Father bore witness both at Christ's baptism and transfiguration also, when with an audible voice he declared, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased. The word bore record of himself, affirming frequently, plainly and directly, that he was the Son of God, and making it manifest, by his doctrine and miracles, that he came from the Father; the Spirit bore witness to this, partly by descending on Christ at his baptism in the shape of a dove, and partly by descending on his apostles in the Feast of Pentecost in the figure of fiery tongues." Acts ii. Learn hence, 1. That it was no easy matter to believe the truth of our Saviour's mission and miracles, and that Jesus Christ was the essential and natural Son of God. Though by the mouth of two or three witnesses every truth is established, yet in this and the next verse we have no less than six witnesses produced to prove our Jesus to be the Son of God, three heavenly, and three earthly witnesses. It is added, these three are one, one in testimony, say the adversaries of the Trinity, but not one in essence. One in both, say we, as one in testimony, so one in essence. But suppose that we should grant that the oneness spoken of in the text is to be expounded of consent in testimony, agreement, and will, principally, yet will it prove the Godhead of Christ, and of the Holy Ghost; for in free agents, where there is the same will, there is the same nature: With men it is the same specific nature; but with God, because there is but one only God, therefore it must be the same numerical nature. 2. That there are three persons, yet but one God, that do bear witness to the divinity of Christ, and of the plentiful redemption wrought by him.

8 And there are three that bear witness in earth, the Spirit, and the water and the blood: and these three agree in one.

As if the Apostle had said, "As there are three in heaven who have given us their testimony to the divinity of Christ and his doctrine here on earth, so there are three witnesses here below, testifying the same thing, namely, the Spirit, in the preaching of the gospel, and in the souls of believers; the water, or sacrament of baptism, wherein we are baptised in the name of the Son, as well as of the Father; and the blood, that is, the death of Christ, and the sufferings of those who have sealed this truth with their blood; all these do give testimony on earth to Christ's divinity from heaven." Note here, That though much of these two verses be left out in many ancient copies of the Bible, as the learned Dr. Hammond takes notice, yet in copies more ancient they are found, and we have more reason to believe that the Arians left them out, than that the orthodox put them in, other texts that assert the truth being so abused. It has been the common course of heretics to disown the authority of such texts as do gall and pinch them. Note farther, That the doctrine of the blessed Trinity stands built upon holy Scripture, as a firm basis, and impregnable rock, and the doctrine of the Anti-Trinitarians falls to the ground like Dagon before the ark: Lord, let our understandings ever more stoop and yield to this divine revelation, though it contain such a doctrine as doth exceed the comprehension of human reason.

9 ¶ If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater: for this is the witness of God which he hath testified of his Son. 10 He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself: he that believeth not God hath made him a liar, because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son.

Our Apostle's argument in these words is taken from the less to the greater, thus: If, says he, for the believing of any thing, it be ordinarily thought sufficient to have the testimony of two or three credible men, then surely the testimony of the faithful and infallible God, given from heaven, is much more worthy of belief; but the testimony given concerning Christ, that he is verily the Son of God, is evidently the testimony of the faithful God that cannot lie; therefore he that, after all the assurance which God has given of his Son's being a true and real Saviour, shall yet reject and disown him as such, does in effect accuse God of falsehood, and make him a liar, because he believes not the record which God has given of his Son; whereas the person that believes on Christ as the Son of God, and the true Messiah, is safe, having the testimony of God the Father without him, and the testimony of the holy Spirit within him, as the Spirit of holiness, wisdom, and power; Learn hence, 1. That every testimony which God gives us is infallibly true. 2. That the testimony which God has given us concerning his Son Jesus Christ being the true and promised promised Messiah, has had its confirmation abundantly above and beyond other testimonies. 3. Therefore such as do not believe on our Lord Jesus Christ as the Saviour of the world, they disbelieve the most undoubted and infallible testimony of God, and in his account make him a liar. Lord! what a bold, presumptuous, and daring sin is unbelief? It gives God the lie, and makes the God of truth a liar.

11 And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life: and this life is in his Son. 12 He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life.

As if our apostle had said, "The sum of God's testimony recorded in the gospel is this, concerning his Son Jesus Christ, namely, that God for his sake has made a free deed of gift of pardon and salvation to the world, assuring them of grace here, and eternal life hereafter, upon condition of their believing acceptance, that is, of faith and obedience: and accordingly he that thus has Christ, he that accepts the merit of his blood, and submits to the authority of his law, hath eternal life; that is, he has an undoubted right unto it, and assurance of it, yea, he has it already initially, and in the first-fruits; but he that, either by unbelief or disobedience, refuses Christ, shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him. Learn hence, 1. That eternal life is the gift of God. 2. That this gift of eternal life is laid up for us in his Son. 3. That upon our having or not having union with and interest in the Son, depends our having or not having eternal life.

13 These things have I written unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God; that ye may know that ye have eternal life, and that ye may believe on the name of the Son of God.

Our apostle entering now upon the conclusion of his excellent epistle, acquaints them with his design and end in the writing of it, namely, 1. That they might know they had eternal life, that is, both a right and title to eternal life, and might also attain to the knowledge and assurance of it. Learn thence, That believers may in this life, without the help of extraordinary revelation, attain to a knowledge and well-grounded assurance of life eternal. There is a three-fold knowledge; notional, which is barely the work of the understand; experimental, which is seated in the heart, and visible in the life; fiducial, when a person is ascertained and assured of what he knows: Thus here, these things I write, that ye may know that ye know, that is, be assured that ye know; a christian may believe, and yet not be assured that he does believe; many have a vital act which have not a fiducial act of faith; many have a faith of adherence that want a faith of evidence: Faith and assurance in a saint; differ as much as reason and learning in a man; every man has reason, but every man that has reason has not learning, which is the improvement of reason; thus every good man has faith, but every one that has faith has not assurance, which is the special fruit of faith. This therefore was the first design and end of St. John's writing, that they might know they did believe; the second follows, that those that did believe, might believe on the name of the Son of God; the meaning is, that they might more firmly believe, be more rooted, grounded, settled, and confirmed in the faith, so as to remain unshaken by all the storms of persecution that might fall upon them; this seems to be the sense of the apostle when he exhorts believers to believe. The strongest believers may be exhorted to strengthen their faith, and to persevere in the faith, which they are strengthened and established in.

14 ¶ And this is the confidence that we have in him, that if we ask any thing according to his will, he heareth us. 15 And if we know that he hear us, whatsoever we ask, we know that we have the petitions that we desired of him.

To enforce the foregoing exhortation to believers, namely, to be confirmed and constant in the faith, he shews them here what a special advantage believers have above other persons, namely, confidence in all their approaches to God; and a full assurance, 1. In general, that whatever they ask in faith according to his will, they shall obtain. 2. In particular, that our several petitions which we present unto God, shall in his own time, in his own way, and after his own manner, be granted by him, provided our persons and our prayers be qualified according to the gospel for the receiving of his promise. Learn, 1. That through our interest in Christ, and for the sake of his meritorious satisfaction and prevailing intercession, our prayers are certainly heard by God, and we shall assuredly have what God has promised to give, and we are fit to receive. God indeed does not always, nay, not often, come with an answer for prayer at our time, but he never stays a moment beyond his own time. 2. That in all the prayers we present and put up to God, a special eye and regard must be had to the will of God, if we expect to be heard and answered. The will of God is the rule, not only of things to be done by us, but also of those things which we crave of God to do for us. The will of God under a threefold revelation is the rule and matter of prayer. 1. The will of God in his commands; whatever God hath required us to do, we may pray for power that we may do. 2. The will of God in his promises; what God hath said he will give, we may pray that we may receive. 3. The will of God in prophecies; what God hath foretold shall come to pass, we may and ought to pray that it may come to pass. The prayer of man gives birth to the prophecies of God, yea, and to the promises of God too. Ezek. xxxvi. 37. I will be enquired of, to do it for them. Though God be a sure paymaster, yet he expects that we should put his bond in suit before he pays. Learn, 3. That a prayer made according to God's will, shall certainly be granted according to our will. When we pray for any thing in obedience to God's will, and with submission to his will, we know that we have the petitions that we ask of him.

16 If any man see his brother sin a sin which is not unto death, he shall ask, and he shall give him life for them that sin not unto death. There is a sin unto death: I do not say that he shall pray for it. 17 All unrighteousness is sin: and there is a sin not unto death.

Our apostle informed us in the foregoing verse, of the comfort which believers have in their prayers for themselves, all that is requested by them is granted by God; now in the verse before us he relates the benefit which others receive by their prayers as well as themselves, assuring them that if any did pray for an offending brother, they should be heard in what they desired, unless the person they prayed for had sinned the unpardonable sin, the sin unto death, by which we are to understand apostacy from the christian religion unto idolatry, as appears from the following words, Keep yourselves from idols, which caution has no manner of dependence upon what went before, unless we understand the sin unto death in this sense; or if (with others) we call it the sin against the Holy Ghost, it comes to the same; for what is that sin but a renouncing of christianity, denying the truth of the christian faith, after illumination and conviction by the Holy Ghost, and maliciously persecuting the sincere professors of it? Here note, 1. That a believer is not to hide his eyes from observing, but may and ought to take notice of the sins and miscarriages of his brethren: If a man see his brother sin, which he cannot do if he neglect to observe him. 2. That a believer discerning and observing the sin of his brother, may and ought to pray for him. Let him ask, that is, importune God on his behalf. 3. That a believer's prayers may prevail with God for us, when our own prayers will not prevail for ourselves. Let him ask, and he shall give him life, temporal life at least, and upon his repentance and faith eternal life also. 4. That the state of some wicked men may be such, that were it certainly known, it might be a christian's duty to cease praying for them. There is a sin unto death, that is, which doth not only deserve death, as all sin doth, and bespeak a person in a state of death, but a sin that argues a person to be twice dead, dead in respect of unregeneracy, and dead in respect of wilful and sinful apostacy. I do not say, that he shall pray for it, that is, for the person guilty of it, seeing God never intends to forgive it. Lord! how deplorable is the condition of those whose sins are past prayers, who give over praying for themselves, and others are stopt from praying for them! How sad is it, when the Lord shuts up the hearing of any of his from praying for us! It shews the sin of that man to be apprehended as being the sin unto death, when the faithful cease praying for him. Yet, 5. The apostle doth not here explicitly and simply forbid praying for such wretched persons, but only says, I do not say that ye shall pray for them; that is, I cannot give you any encouragement to pray for such, nor dare I promise you any good success in praying for them who have sinned unto death. I do not say; that is, I give you no warrant, I lay you under no command, I can give you no promise, that your prayers for such, shall be heard and answered.

18 We know that whosoever is born of God sinneth not: but he that is begotten of God keepeth himself, and that wicked one toucheth him not.

That is, we are well assured that sincere christians, who are begotten and born of God, do not commit this sin unto death, namely, apostacy from christianity to the heathen idolatry: But he keepeth himself and the wicked one toucheth him not; that is, he preserveth himself from the contagion of idolatry, into which the devil was so busy to seduce a great part of mankind. It may be further added, that he that is born of God, so far as he partaketh of the divine nature, sinneth not: that is, suffers not any sin to have dominion over him, but takes care to preserve himself, through the assistance of divine grace, from Satan's deadly wound. He toucheth him not; that is, doth not touch him so as to leave an impression of his devilish spirit upon him. Non tangit tactu qualitativo, vel tactu lethali et mortifero; "He shall not mortally touch them, to make them sin unto death."

19 And we know that we are of God,—

That is, do belong to the true God, and are worshippers of him; we are guided by his Spirit, we are obedient to his laws, we please him on earth, and do hope to enjoy him in heaven.

—And the whole world lieth in wickedness.

That is, the far greater part of the world are under the dominion of that wicked one being sunk into idolatry, and become worshippers of the devil, continuing in the midst of their impurity and malignity, and wholly set upon mischief and wickedness. See here the darkness and horror of an unregenerate and unconverted state. Persons in it are under the dominion of Satan, that wicked one. But behold the blessed change that christianity makes, not in the profession, but in the practice of it, it delivers from the power of darkness, and from the power of Satan, the prince of darkness, and translates us into the kingdom of God's dear Son.

20 And we know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding that we may know him that is true. And we are in him that is true, even in his Son Jesus Christ. This is the true God, and eternal life. 21 Little children keep yourselves from idols. Amen.

As if the apostle had said, "We christians are better taught by our religion, to acknowledge and worship the only true God by his Son Jesus Christ our only Mediator, and therefore exhort you to keep from idols;" intimating hereby, that the worshipping of any other besides this only true God, and by any other mediator, besides Jesus Christ, is idolatry. Or the words may be sensed thus: "We are sure that the Son of God is come, and that Christ is he, who by his doctrine and Spirit hath enlightened us to know the true and living God, whilst the greatest part of the world worship false gods, yea, adore the devil himself." And farther, We are in him that is true, even in his Son Jesus Christ; that is, we are by faith implanted into Jesus Christ, who is the author, purchaser, and disposer of eternal life, and therefore is the true God. This text, which proves undeniably the divinity of Christ, the Socinians pervert by applying these words, this is the true God not to Christ, but to God the Father. But this makes the apostle guilty of a grand tautology, by saying, "The true God is the true God." Besides, it is here said of the same person that he is the true God, and eternal life. Now, eternal life is thrice in this very chapter attributed to Jesus Christ, as the author and dispenser of it, ver. 11, 12, 12. If then Christ be meant by eternal life, he must be also meant by the true God, for they are spoken of together when the apostle says, This is the true God and eternal life. Lastly, our apostle concludes his epistle, with this cautionary direction, Little children keep yourselves from idols. As if he had said, "My advice to you is as that of a father to his own children, having received by the gospel the knowledge of the true God, keep yourselves from idols, or false gods.

of the heathen, among whom ye live; abandon all idolatry, superstition, sacrificing to idols, frequenting idol-feasts, and all idolatrous communion, these things being inconsistent with the worship of the true God, and real christianity. Little children, keep yourselves from idols. Amen.

SECOND EPISTLE GENERAL

ST. JOHN.

That St. John, the apostle and disciple of our Saviour who wrote the first, did also write this second epistle, seems very evident from the exact agreement of several passages in this with the former epistle, even word for word, and accordingly it has been agreed, that the same person was the author of both epistles.

But as touching the person to whom it was wrote, there have been different opinions: Some think that it was a church whom he directs it to under the title of the Elect Lady; and that some Jewish church, and particularly the church of Jerusalem, the mother of all, and from whence came forth the word to all other churches; the reason upon which this conjecture is grounded, is, because the rest of the epistles, called catholic, were written to the Jews (excepting that to Gaius) and therefore probably this was written to some Jewish church; and because all the Jewish churches received their spiritual things from the church of Jerusalem, she may therefore (say some) be fitly stiled the Lady, as she was the mother of all other churches. Others conceive this epistle to be wrote to a particular person, some eminent and religious matron, of a great estate, and a great reliever and supporter of the members of the church in her days. Which opinion of these two has the greater probability, is a matter of no great importance: Let us rather attend to the subject-matter of this divine epistle, which speaks thus:

THE elder unto the elect lady, and her children, whom I love in the truth; and not I only, but also all they that have known the truth; 2 For the truth's sake which dwelleth in us, and shall be with us for ever. 3 Grace be with you, mercy, and peace from God the Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ the Son of the Father, in truth and love.

Observe here, 1. The person writing and directing this epistle, St. John, styling him the elder, partly with respect to his age, he being, as it is thought, the only person at that time living upon the earth, who bore the name of an apostle; and partly with respect to his office in the church; the word elder being a name of honour and dignity, we find both St. Peter elsewhere, and St. John here, making use of it. 2. The person to whom this epistle is directed. The elect lady, and her children; either some particular church, with its religious members, according to some; or some honourable person of eminent piety and usefulness in the church, according to others; and to her children, who had been religiously educated by her. 3. The solemn profession which he makes of the sincerity of his love to herself and her children, together with the ground and attractive cause of that his cordial affection to her and hers, Whom I love in the truth, and for the truth's sake. Mark, St. John here loved the lady for the truth's sake, but how many in our days love the truth for the lady's sake? I mean for sinister ends, and bye respects. It is a blessed thing when a religion, and the grace of God shining in the lives of christians, is the special load-stone of our love and affection towards them: The elder to the elect lady, whom I love in the truth. She had embraced the truth of the gospel, and he was confidently persuaded that she would continue in the profession and practice of it for ever. Observe, 4. The salutation sent to her and her children; namely, increase of grace, and an abundance of mercy and peace from God the Father, and Christ the Redeemer; earnestly wishing, that they may continue stedfast in the profession of the truth, and in the exercise of love one to another, Grace, mercy, and peace from God the Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ the Son of the Father, &c.

4 I rejoiced greatly that I found of thy children walking walking in truth, as we have received a commandment from the Father.

Observe here, 1. The person rejoicing, St. John the apostle and minister of Christ Jesus, I rejoiced greatly. 2. The mercy rejoiced in, their walking in the truth. It was not their speculative knowledge of the truth, and their taking upon them a bare profession of christianity, that he rejoiced in, but their walking in the truth, and framing their conversation according to the commandment which they had received from the Father. Christianity is not a speculative science, but a practical art of holy living; and the most exalted knowledge is insufficient to salvation, without a suitable and correspondent practice; therefore says St. John here, I rejoiced greatly to find of thy children, not barely professing of the truth, but walking in the truth. 3. The persons rejoiced for, or in behalf of, the youth in that church or family, to which he now wrote, I rejoiced to find thy children walking in the truth: the hopes which the holy apostle had of a succession of saints, and that the children in his time would walk in their religious parents footsteps, was matter of singular joy and rejoicing to the blessed apostle. Yet, 4. With what caution, restriction, and limitation, our apostle speaks. I rejoiced greatly to find of thy children; that is, some of them, perhaps many of them, it is to be feared not all of them; to have seen all was no doubt the apostle's desire, but to find any was questionless matter of exceeding joy, I rejoiced greatly, &c. Learn hence, That there is no greater joy to the ministers of Christ, than to see the youth, or rising generation in their day, walking in the paths of holiness and religion, and treading in their religious parents footsteps.

5 And now I beseech thee, lady, not as though I wrote a new commandment unto thee, but that which we had from the beginning, that we love one another.

Observe here, The duty required, together with the profession of the gospel, namely, to live in unity and peace, in amity and concord, one with another. This he calls a commandment, in the singular number, to intimate, that in this one commandment all the rest are contained, and in keeping this we keep all: And he tells them it is no new commandment, but an old one, from the beginning; it is as old as Moses, yea, as old as Adam, being a part of the law of nature written in Adam's heart; yet in some respects love may be called a new commandment, because urged from new motives, and enforced by a new example; and because it is never to wax old. but to be always fresh in the memories, and found in the practice of Christ's disciples to the end of the world.

6 And this is love, that we walk after his commandments. This is the commandment, That, as ye have heard from the beginning, ye should walk in it.

As if our apostle had said, "By this we shall make it evidently appear that here is the true love of God in us, if we endeavour to frame our lives according to his commandments;" and this, he assures them, was the great commandment, which they heard from the beginning, when the gospel was first preached unto them, namely, that they should believe in Christ, and love one another, and constantly persevere in the practice of these duties. Learn hence, That as obedience is the natural effect, and necessary product of love, so is it the best evidence, the surest mark and sign of it; This is the love of God: that is, the surest evidence that we love him, if we keep his commandments. 2. That it is not sufficient that we profess love to God and our neighbour, but we must walk in love, and be found in the exercise, yea, in the persevering exercise, of that grace and duty.

7 For many deceivers are entered into the world, who confess not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh. This is a deceiver and an antichrist.

Having exhorted them to perseverance in the faith, before he subjoins a reason for that exhortation now, because many deceivers are entered into the world, &c. Many impostors were gone forth abroad, who denied, some the divinity, others the humanity of Christ, and so razed the very foundations of christianity, and thus discovered themselves to be antichrists; or persons that set themselves to oppose Jesus Christ. Learn hence, That even from the beginning our Lord Jesus has had those who have disowned his natures, and denied his offices, the divinity of his person, the meritoriousness of his satisfaction; these are antichrists, persons maliciously set against Christ, and they shall find him righteously set against them in the day when they shall be summoned by him solemnly to appear before him.

8 ¶ Look to yourselves, that we lose not those things which we have wrought, but that we receive a full reward.

Here our apostle resumes his exhortation to them to constancy and perseverance in the faith and obedience of the gospel, from this argument, lest they should lose the fruit of their faith professed, the profit of their afflictions, which for the sake of christianity they had suffered, and their works of piety and charity which they have performed, but continuing faithful to the death, might receive a full reward, even a crown of life. Learn hence, That it is both lawful and needful, even for the best of saints, in what they do in the service of God, to have an eye to the promised reward, by way of encouragement to them in the course of their obedience. We may with Moses have respect to the recompence of reward, but not only, or chiefly, yet as a spur to provoke us to duty: Perseverance in goodness has its reward belonging to it; that reward has a fullness belonging to it, a fullness of compensation, and a fullness of satisfaction, and that it is both lawful and a laudable to have an eye in our working to this full recompence of reward.

9 Whosoever transgresseth and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ, hath not God. He that abideth in the doctrine of Christ, he hath both the Father and the Son.

Observe here, 1. The character given of the gospel, it is the doctrine of Christ; that is, the doctrine relating to Christ, and the doctrine taught by Christ. 2. What is affirmed of those that apostatize from, and abide not in the doctrine of Christ, they have not God; that is, say some, they have not God to be their Father, nor the Spirit to be their guide and sanctifier; they have, say others, no knowledge of God, no interest in God, no influences of grace and holiness derived from God. 3. The happy condition of those that abide in the doctrine of Christ, they have both the Father and the Son; he that has one, hath both; and he that hath not both, has neither; and this having may admit a threefold interpretation, thus; he has the Father and the Son by way of abode and inhabitation; he dwelleth in God, and God in him; they have the Father and the Son with them by way of society and communion. Lastly, They have the Father and the Son, by the way of assistance and approbation; they have God to assist them, to accept them, to reward them.

10 ¶ If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed. 11 For he that biddeth him God speed, is partaker of his evil deeds.

In these words our apostle directs them how to carry themselves towards those wicked apostates and heretical seducers, that deny the gospel, or any essential part of christianity, by no means to give any countenance or encouragement to them, or to hold any familiarity or communion with them, nor to entertain them, nor so much as courteously to salute them, but by shewing them disrespect, manifest a dislike and disproving of their errors. This form of interdict, Bid him not God speed, seems to be an imitation of the Jewish practice towards excommunicated persons, who were not only excluded from all commerce, but also from all kind of common civilities, and ordinary salutation. Learn hence, that even civil courtesy, and common respect, is not, ought not to be, paid to those that seduce others, or attempt to seduce us, from the christian faith.

12 Having many things to write unto you, I would not write with paper and ink: but I trust to come unto you, and speak face to face, that our joy may be full. 13 The children of thy elect sister greet thee. Amen.

Here our apostle concludes his epistle with an apology for the brevity of it, declaring that he hoped to come shortly to them, and see them. And though he had many things to write, yet all things were not fit to be written; but, besides, a lively voice affects more than a written letter; and he hoped that they should be filled with mutual joy at the sight of, & converse with, each other. Presence of friends, and familiar converse with each other, is preferable to all writing to each other. By the children of the elect sister, some again understand the members of another church, who now sent salutations to them. The concluding word Amen, imports his sincerity in what he had written to them, and his hearty wishes for the happiness and welfare of them.

THIRD EPISTLE GENERAL

ST. JOHN.

THE elder, unto the well-beloved Gaius, whom I love in the truth.

Observe here, 1 The penman and writer of this epistle, St. John, who wrote the two former, as appears by the agreement of them in words and phrases, which are peculiar to this apostle, he styles himself not an apostle, tho' he was so, but an elder; that word being a name of honor and dignity belonging to the chief of their tribes, agrees very well with the office of the apostles, set over the twelve tribes of the house of Israel. 2. The person to whom this epistle is directed, Gaius; we find three persons of this name in the New Testament, to wit, Gaius of Macedonia, Acts xix. Gaius of Derbe, Acts xx. and Gaius of Corinth, Rom. xvi. whom St. Paul calls his host, and of the whole church, who being eminent for his hospitality, especially to the ministers who went out to preach the gospel among the Gentiles, taking nothing of them; this man seems to be the person who had the honor of an epistle sent to him from the pen of an eminent apostle; such as do excel in their kindness to the faithful ministers of Jesus Christ, having oft-times in this life some special marks of honor and respect put upon them by God, as a token of his gracious acceptance of them. 3 The interest which Gaius had in St. John's affections, he styles him the well beloved Gaius, and shews also what was the motive and attractive of that his love, namely, the truth, that is, the gospel of Christ, called eminently the truth; he loved Gaius in the truth, that is in great sincerity, and for the truth; for his sincere professing and practising the doctrine of the gospel. Such as love the truth are, and ought to be, the special objects of our love.

2 Beloved, I wish above all things that thou mayest prosper and be in health, even as thy soul prospereth.

Observe, 1. This holy man, Gaius, who was so hospitable ble an host to the ministers and members of Christ, had but a weak and sickly body, he wanted health; strength of grace, and dearnels of respect, even from God himself, cannot prevail against diseases; such as are most holy are sometimes most weak and sickly. 2. That though Gaius had but a weak and consumptive body, yet had he a very thriving and vigorous soul; it is a very common, yet a very sad and true observation, that men of strong, healthy, and active bodies have weak, lame, sickly, and sinful souls. Ah wretched sinner! when under obligations to serve thy God best, thou forgettest him most, and prostitutest thy health to the service of thy lusts; how does the health and ease of one day deserve the service and thankfulness of thy whole life! But alas! instead of that thou makest him to serve with thy sins, and layest the first-fruits of thy time and strength upon the devil's altar. 3. Our apostle's wish on the behalf of Gaius, namely that his body were as healthful as his soul was holy, that he had as much health in one, as he had grace in the other. Behold here, such an improved and well-grown christian was this holy man Gaius, that our apostle makes the prosperous state of his soul the measure of all that prosperity which the one could wish, or the other desire, as thy soul prospereth, so may thy bodily health, for the service of God and of thy soul.

3 For I rejoiced greatly when the brethren came and testified of the truth that is in thee, even as thou walkest in the truth. 4. I have no greater joy than to hear that my children walk in the truth.

Observe here, 1. The commendable testimony which the brethren that came from Gaius gave to St. John concerning his holy and unblameable conversation, according to the direction of the gospel, the brethren testified of thee that thou walkest in the truth; good reports of our brethren, without detracting any thing from their worth, is a manifest duty. 2. With what joy and rejoicing St. John received the notices of Gaius's adherence to the truth, and of his answerable walking thereunto; he did not envy the grace of God so largely conferred on Gaius, but rejoiced in it, and no doubt blessed God exceedingly for it; soul-mercies are the greatest mercies, and matters of the greatest joy to gracious souls. 3. That additional joy which St. John expresses to hear that his children, that is, those persons whom he had converted to christianity, and begotten to Christ through the gospel, did walk in the truth, that is, in the sincere practice as well as in the outward profession of religion; the faithful ministers of Christ rejoice more in the welfare of their people's souls, than in all their worldly wealth or honour.

5 Beloved, thou doest faithfully whatsoever thou doest to the brethren, and to strangers: 6 Which have borne witness of thy charity before the church: whom if thou bring forward on their journey after a godly sort, thou shalt do well: 7-Because that for his name's sake they went forth, taking nothing of the Gentiles. 8 We therefore ought to receive such, that we might be fellow-helpers to the truth.

Observe here. How our apostle at once commends the great charity of Gaius, and at the same time excites him to the further practice of it. Where note, 1. How charity towards christians is here styled fidelity to Christ, because shewn to them upon Christ's account. Acts of charity are acts of righteousness and fidelity; he that is uncharitable is unjust. 2. The extensive nature of Gaius's charity, it was to brethren, yet not only to brethren, but to strangers; that is, not only to the brethren of the church with him, but to strangers in their travels to and fro, as they came near him; more particularly to such faithful ministers as came out of foreign parts to preach the gospel, whom Gaius had hospitably and charitably entertained. 3. How he exhorts Gaius farther to furnish and help these ministers in their travels with all things necessary for their journey; because, 1. They preached the gospel freely, taking nothing of the Gentile christians for their pains. 2. Because it was for Christ's name sake they went abroad; to preach the gospel, say some, to avoid persecution, say others. 3. Because to entertain such is to farther, as much as in us lies, the propagation of the gospel of Christ; such as contribute towards the maintenance and support of the ministers of Christ for his sake, shall have the present comfort and future reward, of co-operating and contributing their parts towards the propagating and spreading of the gospel of Christ.

9 I wrote unto the church: but Diotrephes, who loveth to have the pre-eminence among them, receiveth us not. 10 Wherefore if I come, I will remember his deeds which he doth, prating against us with malicious words: and not content therewith, neither doth he himself receive the brethren, and forbiddeth them that would, and casteth them out of the church.

Observe here, The pious care which St. John took for the relief and succour of such faithful christians as now travelled amongst them, both to avoid persecution, and to preach the gospel; he wrote to the church on their behalf, desiring their reception, and advising their relief; I wrote to the church; that is, I wrote for them, and sent my testimonial to the church on their behalf; every one has a pen to plead for himself, happy he that has both tongue and pen to intercede for others. 2. The opposition which St. John met with in so good a work; Diotrephes, a proud man, regarded not his letters, acknowledged not his authority, yea, slighted the apostle, prating against him with malicious words; the holiest men may meet with opposition in the holiest and best of actions, wherein the glory of God and the public good are most concerned. 3. The holy apostle's resentment of this indignity, and wise resolution thereupon; when I come, I will remember his deeds; that is, I will sharply rebuke him, and use that severity towards him which his crime deserves, according to the authority which God has given me. Learn hence, That though private offences against Christ's minister's must be forgiven and forgotten by them; yet when an offence is prejudicial to the church, it must be opposed, and openly censured.

11 Beloved, follow not that which is evil, but that which is good. He that doeth good is of God: but he that doeth evil hath not seen God.

Here St. John adviseth his beloved Gaius, and those with him, not to intimate and follow this evil example of Diotrephes, Diotrephes, (who not only refused charity towards the christian Jews, that wanted it himself, but would not permit the Gentile christians to receive them or relieve them) but to follow the example of God, who is good to all; and accordingly, he that is merciful is born of God, but he that is malicious hath no true knowledge of God, but is a mere stranger to him. Behold here the eulogy and high commendation which the Spirit of God gives to a charitable and good man: He that doth good is of God, he is allied to heaven, born of God, and his offspring; but the uncharitable evil man is a composition of spite, envy, and malice, born from beneath, and the devil's offspring.

12 Demetrius hath good report of all men, and of the truth itself: yea, and we also bear record; and ye know that our record is true.

Having propounded the example of God in the former verse, he propounds in this the example of Demetrius, as a pattern to them for their imitation in works of piety and charity; not only common report, and the apostle's testimony, but his own good works, did justly recommend him as an extraordinary pattern to their imitation. Note, That the commendations, which our own good works do give us before the world, are more valuable than all the praises and applause which can be given us by men, yea, by the best of men.

13 I had many things to write, but I will not with ink and pen write unto thee: 14 But I trust I shall shortly see thee, and we shall speak face to face. Peace be to thee. Our friends salute thee. Greet the friends by name.

Thus our apostle concludes his epistle with an apology for the brevity of it, hoping in a short time to see him, and to speak face to face unto him; he concludes with his apostolical valediction, Peace be to thee; unto which adding the brethren's salutations, it teaches us, that kind remembrances and greetings are suitable to christian friendship.

ST. J U D E.

The design and scope of this epistle appears to be much the same with that of the second of St. Peter, and was written probably about the same time; the intent of both is this, namely, to fortify the Christian Jews against the errors and corruptions of those seducers, who, by their wicked lives and worse doctrines, attempted to seduce persons from the plainness and simplicity of the gospel, and to bring upon them the same condemnation and judgement with themselves.

JUDE the servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James, to them that are sanctified by God the Father, and preserved in Jesus Christ, and called: 2 Mercy unto you, and peace, and love be multiplied.

Here we have observable, the person saluting, the person saluted, and the salutation itself. Observe, 1. The person saluting described three ways. 1. By his name, Jude, called Thaddeus and Lebheus, to distinguish him from Judas Iscariot; behold an holy apostle and a perfidious traitor, bearing the same name, Judas an apostle, and Judas an apostate; it is not an holy name, but an holy nature, that commends us unto God. 2. By his office, a servant of Jesus Christ; he might have stiled himself a near kinsman of Jesus Christ, or a brother of the Lord; but he mentions not his natural, but his spiritual relation to Christ; alliance in faith, or a spiritual relation to Christ, is much dearer and nearer than alliance in flesh; there is a peculiar honour and excellency in the title of Christ's servant above that of Christ's kinsman. 3. By his kindred and alliance, brother of James, this is added to distinguish him from Judas Iscariot; it is the duty of the servants, but especially the ministers of Christ, to prevent all scandalous exceptions against their persons, and to be of untainted reputations. Observe, 2. The persons saluted, these also are three ways described. 1. They are sanctified by God the Father; the apostle judges of them by their profession, and by their obligation: they had, by assuming the christian name, obliged themselves to be saints, or holy persons; and by their profession did own and declare themselves so to be; and no doubt many of them were inwardly sanctified, as well as outwardly holy. 2. They are preserved in Christ Jesus; that is, in the faith of Christ Jesus, when many, for fear of persecution, have apostatized from it; he that will approve himself a true christian, must shew himself a stedfast christian; instability is an argument of insincerity; again, preserved in Christ Jesus; that is, preserved in a state of grace and holiness, by Christ Jesus, by the merit of his death and passion, by the prevalency of his intercession, and by the Holy Spirit's efficacy and operation. They are called all of them externally by the ministry of the word; internally, many of them by the effectual operation of the Spirit, renewing the nature, and reforming the life; these are the persons saluted, Them that are sanctified by God the Father, preserved in Christ Jesus, and called. Observe, 3. The salvation itself, Mercy, peace, and love be multiplied unto you: Mercy from God, the Father of mercies; peace from Jesus Christ, who is our peace; and love from the Holy Ghost, by whom it is shed abroad in our hearts; and his praying that these graces may not be barely given and granted, but be multiplied and increased, intimates to us our duty, which is not barely to seek grace at the hands of God, but the multiplication and augmentation of it; to labour after grace in growth, as well as grace in truth: Mercy, peace, and love be multiplied: thankful we may and ought to be for the least measures of grace received, but not satisfied with the greatest measures, short of our heavenly perfection; he was never truly good that does not desire daily to grow better.

3 Beloved, when I gave all diligence to write unto you of the common salvation, it was needful for me to write unto you, and exhort you that ye should earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered unto the saints.

Observe here, 1. A courteous and loving compellation, Beloved; people should study to render themselves fit objects of their pastor's love. 2. How his love towards them put him upon writing to them with all diligence: Love must be the spring and fountain of all our ministerial performances; all services without love, are as sacrifices without fire. Christ first enquired after Peter's love, before he urged him to labour; God will reward no services to our people, but what have been done in love. 3. The excellency and weightiness of the subject about which he was to write, it was concerning the common salvation; so called, not as if it were a salvation common to all persons, good and bad: but because common to all believers who have a joint title to it, and a common interest in it: The salvation which the gospel reveals, is a common salvation; it is in common in regard of the purchaser of it, Christ our common Saviour; in regard to the price paid for it, the precious blood of Christ; in regard to the way and means by which it is obtained and secured, and that is faith: and in regard of the earnest of it, and longings after it, the Holy Spirit of God is common to all believers, and gives them a pledge and earnest of, and sets them a breathing after, and longing for this salvation. 4. The exhortation itself, Earnestly to contend for the faith once delivered to the saints; that is, for the sincere doctrine of the gospel delivered by Christ: once delivered; that is, once for all, so as never to be changed or altered more: no new rule of faith is ever more to be expected; and therefore the articles of faith added to the apostles creed by the council of Trent, can be no articles of christian faith, because never delivered by Christ, or his apostles, and never known to many christians long after their decease. Learn, That it is the duty of christians at all times, but especially in times of error and seduction, to contend earnestly for that pure and uncorrupted faith which is contained in the gospel.

4 For there are certain men crept in unawares, who were before of old ordained to this condemnation, ungodly men, turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness, and denying the only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ.

Here we have a reason of the foregoing exhortation assigned, why we should contend so earnestly for the christian faith once delivered by Christ to his apostles, because there were crept, by little and little, such seducers into the church as would endeavour to adulterate and corrupt it. Note here, That corrupters and corruptions creep secretly and gradually into the church; and heretics do not broach all their errors and false doctrines at once: Vain then and frivolous is the question which the church of Rome asks us, When did their innovations and false doctrines come first into the church? They crept in, and that unawares; it is enough for us that we find them there, though we assign not the time when, nor the manner how they did come in. Observe next, The character and description which our apostle gives of these seducers crept in amongst them. 1. He tells us they were men fore-ordained to condemnation; mark, not fore-ordained to seduction to sin, but to condemnation for sin; the word rendered fore-ordained, signifies before written, or before prophesied of, by Enoch and others, that they would by their great sins and impieties, fall into that condemnation which God hath ordained as a just reward to their transgressions; God never ordaineth nor decreeth any man's sin, but he decreeth and foretelleth their condemnation for sin. 2. He styles them wicked, ungodly men, turning the grace of God into lasciviousness; pointing at the Nicolaitans, Gnostics, and other impure heretics, that sprang from Simon Magus, who made the doctrine of the free grace of God, discovered in the gospel, a cloke for their looseness and lasciviousness. Errors in doctrine are usually accompanied with corruption in manners, as being most suitable to man's corrupt vile nature, and will be sure never to want followers. 3. He charges them with denying, the only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ: That is, Jesus Christ our only master, God, and Lord, called by St. Peter, the Lord that bought them; lessening the dignity of his person, and invalidating what they could, the merit of his death and sufferings. Learn hence, 1. That Jesus Christ, the master of the world, the Lord of his church, is truly God; he is called the great God, and the mighty God, to shew that he is not a God inferior to, but equal to the Father; and that by nature, not by office. 2. That it is an horrid impiety, to deny our Lord Jesus Christ, to deny him either of his natures, or in any of his offices; to deny him either in opinion, or in practice, is a sin that carries a prodigious appearance with it.

5 I will therefore put you in remembrance, though ye once knew this, how that the Lord having saved the people out of the land of Egypt, afterwards destroyed them that believed not.

In this, and the following verses, our apostle, to deter them from following the pernicious ways of these seducers, sets before them the several examples of God's judgments inflicted in former times upon persons guilty of such crimes, as these seducers were stigmatized for, and guilty of; he begins with the Israelites in the wilderness, as they perished through unbelief, after they were brought out of Egypt, so shall revolvers perish, notwithstanding their baptism, and fair beginnings. Learn hence, 1. That God's judgments inflicted on some, are, and ought to be warnings unto all. 2. That God's ancient judgments were ordained to be our warnings and examples; his holiness is the same as ever, his justice the same, his hatred of sin the same, and his power to revenge it the same as ever; his judgments now may be more spiritual but they are not less terrible. 3. That unbelief will as certainly bring destruction upon christians now, as it did upon the Israelites of old. Did God destroy them that believed not his power then? No less will he destroy them that believe not his promise now.

6 And the angels which kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation, he hath reserved in everlasting chains under darkness, unto the judgment of the great day.

The next example set before them, is that of the apostate angels, who for their rebellion against God were thrown down from heaven, and are reserved as so many prisoners in chains of darkness, to the judgment of the great day, when their condition will be more miserable than now it is. Now, if God did not spare apostatizing angels, surely he will not spare apostatizing seducers. Note, 1. The sin of the angels; they left their first state, namely, their state of holiness. 2. Their punishment; they left their own habitation, they departed from that place of happiness and glory which before they enjoyed; when they changed their nature, they changed their place; the presence of an holy God is no place for unholy persons. 3. That the angels are kept in chains, and those chains are everlasting; the chain of God's eternal decree holds them; the chain of their own guilt holds them; the chain of utter despair eternally holds them. 4. That the day of judgment will be a great day; and at that day, the punishment of fallen angels will be far greater than now it is: When heaven's joys are full, then hell's torments will be full, but not before.

7 Even as Sodom and Gomorrah, and the cities about them, in like manner giving themselves over to fornication, and going after strange flesh, are set forth for an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire.

Another example of God's severity against sin and sinners, is Sodom and Gomorrah, Adma and Zeboim, who giving themselves up to the lusts of uncleanness, were in an extraordinary manner destroyed by fire from heaven, which was a forerunner of that eternal fire of hell, which they are to suffer to all eternity, and so may and ought to be a terrifying example, and timely warning to all persons, that they fall not into the like sins. Learn, 1. That the sin of uncleanness doth exceedingly displease and provoke God to punish above other sins, because it defiles both soul and body; it makes a flye of a temple; and because it is a sin usually accompanied with final impenitency; none that go unto her return, that is, very few: Whoredom is a deep ditch, the abhorred of God do fall into it. 2. That the sin of uncleanness is remarkably followed with vengeance, even with eternal vengeance: God returns flames for flames, and revenges the fire of lust with the fire of hell.

8 Likewise also all these filthy dreamers, defile the flesh, despise dominion, and speak evil of dignities.

As if our apostle had said, "Notwithstanding these fore-mentioned examples of God's vengeance upon the unclean Sodomites, and others, yet these heretical seducers, whom he calls dreamers, because they vented their own dreams and phantasies instead of God's truth, did defile themselves with their filthy practices, teaching that by their christian liberty they were freed from all civil subjection, speaking evil of those who were set in authority over them." Observe, 1. That the doctrines which seducers bring, are not the truths of Christ, but their own dreams. Dreams they are in point of opinion, and dreams they will be found in point of expectation; they promise much, but perform nothing. 2. That dreams of error, or heretical principles, do dispose towards filthy and unclean practices. Avoid error in judgment, if you would escape filthiness in conversation. 3. That lust loves not restraint, libertines despise dominion, sensuality makes men unruly; such are sons of Belial, they cast off the yoke. 4. That such as despise government, speak evil of governors; dignities lie open to the lash of the tongue; neither power nor innocence can protect from calumny and imputations, from slander and false accusation.

9 Yet Michael the archangel, when contending with the devil, he disputed about the body of Moses, durst not bring against him a railing accusation, but said, The Lord rebuke thee.

Our apostle in the preceding verse having charged seducers with contemptuous speaking against governors and government: in this verse he aggravates the imprudence and impiety of it, by the carriage of Michael the archangel towards the devil. The argument is taken from the greater to the less, and lies thus: If Michael, an archangel, so excellent in nature, so high in office, contending with Satan, an impure spirit, yet used great modesty, without the least indecency of expression towards him, who and what are these that despise dominions, and dare speak evil of dignities? Observe, That it is our duty to learn this angelical lesson, namely, not to give railing or reviling language to the worst adversary in the best cause, because it proceeds from pride or passion, and because so contrary to the temper and design of christianity; much more is it our duty to watch against the sins of the tongue, with respect to our governors and superiors.

10 But these speak evil of those things which they know not: but what they know naturally as brute beasts, in those things they corrupt themselves.

A double crime is here charged upon these seducers by our apostle, namely, pride, in speaking evil of things they know not; and wickedness, in abusing the knowledge they had. 1.

Their

Their sin was great, in speaking evil of what they did not know, (they reviled dignities and magistrates, the usefulness of whom they knew not) and possibly condemned the mysteries of the christian faith which they understood not, notwithstanding they called themselves Gnostics, and pretended to higher degrees, and larger measures of knowledge than other men. Learn, That truth is usually slandered by ignorant and conceited men; because men do not understand the things of God, therefore they do condemn them. 2. Their wickedness was great in abusing the knowledge that they had, and in acting contrary to it. What they knew naturally, or by the law of nature, to be sinful, in those things, as brute beasts, did they corrupt and defile themselves. Note, 1. That were sin reigneth, it turneth man into a brute beast. Psal. xlix. 12. Hence they are compared to dogs for filthiness, to swine for uncleanness; to wolves for cruelty; of the two it is worse to be like a beast, than to be a beast; the beast is what God has made it; but he that is like a beast, is what sin and the devil has made him. 2. That it is a sign of a man turned to a beast, to follow the lusts and passions of corrupt nature. It is just with God to leave them to be led by sense, who will not be guided by grace, and to suffer them to fall into the ditch of beastly sensuality, who forget that they are men.

11 Wo unto them: for they have gone in the way of Cain, and ran greedily after the error of Balaam for reward, and perished in the gainfaying of Core.

Our apostle goes on in charging these seducers with several crimes; particularly with the malice and envy of Cain, with the fordid covetousness of Balaam, with the sedition and gainfaying of Core; they hate their brethren, and so are murderers, like Cain; they have adulterated the truth for base gain, and so have followed the example of Balaam who loved the wages of unrighteousness; and as Corah, Dathan, and Abiram, rose up against Moses and Aaron, so have they seditiously opposed both magistracy and ministry. Learn, 1. That the practice of wicked men now, and from the beginning is still the same. 2. That Satan entices his slaves to divers sins, to the malice of Cain, to the covetousness of Balaam, to the sedition of Core. 3. That such as sin now may read their destruction in the destruction of those that sinned before them.

12 These are spots in your feasts of charity, when they feast with you, feeding themselves without fear: clouds they are without water, carried about of winds; trees whose fruit withereth, without fruit, twice dead, plucked up by the roots; 13 Raging waves of the sea, foaming out their own shame: wandering stars, to whom is reserved the blackness of darkness for ever.

Our apostle having set forth these seducers in the foregoing verses, by sundry examples, he now comes to set them forth by several similitudes and resemblances. 1. He calls them spots in their love feasts (the infamy of their lives being a blemish and scandal to their christian assemblies) feeding without fear of offending either God or man. 2. He calls them clouds without water, promising rain, but yielding none; making a shew of knowledge, but indeed having none, and they are driven (as clouds by the wind) from one vanity to another. 3. Trees they are, but like them in autumn, which have neither leaves nor fruit; nay, trees twice dead, in sin, before conversion, and in respect of their apostacy, after their conversion, and so shall be plucked up by the roots. 4. They are like raging waves of the sea, turbulent and tumultuous, foaming out at their mouths the filthiness and impurity that boileth in their hearts. 5. Wandering stars, or teachers unstable, departing from the true faith once delivered to them; but for these illuminated and knowing teachers, is reserved the blackness of darkness for ever.

14 And Enoch also, the seventh from Adam, prophesied of these, saying, Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints, 15 To execute judgment upon all, and to convince all that are ungodly among them, of all their ungodly deeds which they have ungodly committed, and of all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoked against him.

The Apostle having described the sin of the seducers in the former verses, declares the certainty of their destruction in the verses now before us; assuring us, that Enoch of old, by the Spirit of prophecy, did foretel the sins of such persons, and their condemnation also at the general judgment, when Christ shall come gloriously attended to execute judgment upon the ungodly in general, and on such as speak contumeliously of him and his in particular. Here note, 1. That the doctrine of the day of judgment is very antient, foretold by the prophets from the beginning. Man was made an accountable creature, capable of rendering an account of his actions; and the sentence of death denounced in paradise against him for his sin, did necessarily imply it; the drowning of the world, and burning of Sodom, were both types and forerunners of it; though there are Atheists upon earth that do not believe a future judgment to come, there are none in hell; feeling and experience must teach some men that which the Spirit, scripture, reason, and conscience, could never learn them. 2. How Enoch here prefixeth a note of incitement to his prophecy, Behold, the Lord cometh to judgment; implying, that great is our natural backwardness to believe and mind the coming of Christ to judgment; and intimating, that we should always realize the day of the Lord to ourselves, and represent it to our thoughts as certain, and near at hand. 3. How royally attended Christ will come to judgment; Behold, he cometh with ten thousands of his saints. Christ will be attended only with holy ones at the last day; such as meet him now in purity, shall meet him then in peace. How cheerfully then may saints think of the last judgment, and observe the number of his attendants? Not a few saints, but ten thousand of them, Rev. v. 11. They are called a number which no man can number. This is a comfort against the paucity and small number of those that are now upright with God; in heaven we shall have company enough; God's family, when it comes together, will be very numerous, or rather innumerable, Heb. xii. 23. Observe 4. The work of Christ at the day of judgment, namely, to convince and judge. Conscience shall then have an exact view of all that sinners did and said: Sin will find them out, and testify against them at Christ's tribunal; and when conscience has convinced, Christ will condemn, and whom he has condemned, he will execute. 5. The persons whom Christ will convince and judge, the ungodly. The process of the last day lies chiefly, though not only, against the ungodly; these shall not stand in the judgment, because ungodliness doth chiefly provoke; not but that unrighteousness will then be condemned also, Rom. i. 18. and sinners sent to hell for neglecting the duties of the second table, no less than the first. 6. That not only the deeds of ungodly men, but their words, especially their bold speeches against God and his children, shall be brought into judgment. A wicked tongue is a rugged tongue; it speaks words sharper than swords; pray we for wisdom to make as good an use of the reproaching tongue of an enemy, as of the reproving tongue of a friend; that the sword of the tongue may let out the corruption that is in our hearts, and do us good against the will, and contrary to the intention, of our enemy.

16 These are murmurers, complainers, walking after their own lusts: and their mouths speaketh great swelling words, having men's persons in admiration because of advantage.

Our apostle having asserted in the former verse, that Christ will at the great day convince and judge all the ungodly; in this verse he declares that these seducers were of the number of the ungodly, whom Christ will certainly judge, because they were murmurers, complainers, discontented with, and always complaining of their lot, and present condition; because they had not as much as they desired, they murmured against God, as if they had nothing; walking after their own lusts, contrary to the restraint of nature, and the laws of God; their mouths speaking great swelling words. It has been the constant course of heretics to speak high, and talk big, like mountebanks, hoping thereby to set off, and put off the better their counterfeited and false ware; but he is no wise man, whom great swelling words will seduce from the ways of wisdom. Not the words of the speaker, but the weight of what is spoken, is to be minded; yet though they talk these swelling words to their inferiors, at the same time they could flatteringly admire the persons and actions of others, from whom they expected any benefit or advantage. Now from the whole of this large character, which St. Jude here gives of these heretical seducers and false teachers, we learn, That miserable and most deplorable is the condition of the misled followers of seducing teachers; the seducer follows his lust, and the follower is led by the seducer. Here the blind leads the blind; God pity them both! When teachers offer themselves to us, we should consider who leads them, who are so officious to lead us, and follow them only as they follow Christ; no wise man will set his watch by the clock, but by the sun.

17 But beloved, remember ye the words which were spoken before of the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ; 18 How that they told you there should be mockers in the last time, who should walk after their own ungodly lusts. 19 These be they who separate themselves, sensual, having not the Spirit.

Having largely described those seducers, our apostle now comes to exhort those to whom he wrote, to beware of them, assuring them, that the apostles of Christ, St. Paul, and particularly St. Peter, had expressly foretold of those wicked scoffers which would arise in the church in the last times; which mockers and scoffers he shows were such as without any just cause separated themselves from the church's communion, pretending greatly to sanctity, but addicted to sensuality, and destitute of the Holy Spirit. Note here, 1. That the Scripture speaks much of the sin and sinners that should be found in the latter times; we ought not therefore to be troubled at what is foretold; nor be unarmed when we are so often forewarned. It is a shame for them, who have oft heard and known the doctrines of the apostles, to be surprized by seducers. St. Jude expects that these christians who know what the apostles had delivered, should vigorously oppose all seducers and seduction. 2. That a causeless separation from a church, of which we are members, is culpable and sinful; a separation from corruptions, and a separation from them that are corrupt, are two distinct things; the former is always a duty, the latter not so. 3. That those that separate from the assemblies of the faithful, are usually sensual, and have not the Spirit; they have not the Spirit either to guide them, or to quicken them, or to comfort them.

20 ¶ But ye, beloved, building up yourselves on your most holy faith, praying in the Holy Ghost, 21 Keep yourselves in the love of God, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life.

Our apostle having, in the former part of the chapter, warned the christians of the danger of seducers, he closes his epistle with directions and advice how they may be preserved from seduction, and what means they should use for their perseverance and establishment in the doctrine of Christ. First, he directs them to build up themselves in their most holy faith; that is, in the doctrine of faith contained in the gospel. Where note, 1. That the faith of christians is a most holy faith; holy in its principles, holy in its pattern, holy in its encouragements and rewards. 2. That it is the duty, and ought to be the endeavours of every christian to build up himself, and others also in the faith of the gospel; the best way for christians not to be losers of what they have, is to be labourers for what they want; progress in christianity is the best means to preserve us from apostacy. Secondly, He exhorts to prayer, praying in the Holy Ghost; that is, with holy reverence, with humble confidence, with fervent importunity, with those holy affections and desires which the Spirit of God exciteth in us: The concurrence of the Holy Spirit is necessary both to assistance and acceptance in prayer; it enables us to pray in faith and love, with sincerity and importunity; without the Spirit there is no acceptable praying, and without prayer vain is the pretence to the Spirit. Breathing is the first evidence of life. St. Paul was no sooner converted, but behold he prayed. Thirdly, He directs that they keep themselves in the love of God; no such way to keep ourselves from error, error, as to preserve ourselves in that love which God bears to us, and in that love we bear to him; take we care that there be no intermission of the acts of love, and no remission of the degrees of love, but that we be rooted and grounded in love, and then we are proof against seducers and false teachers. Fourthly, He directs them to look up to heaven, if they would be steady and stedfast in the faith, here on earth. Looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life. Here observe, That heaven, or eternal life, is the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ. Mercy it is called, because bestowed on the miserable, that could never merit or deserve it, and because it is the effect and fruit of free and special mercy, and because bestowed on the vessels of mercy, and because it is the perfection and consummation of all mercy; and it is the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ, because he purchased it, he prepared it, he exhibits and gives it. Observe farther, That christians are to look for eternal life, as the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ; that is, to believe it, to meditate upon it, to have ardent desires after it, and patiently to wait for it.

22 And of some have compassion, making a difference. 23 And others save with fear pulling them out of the fire; hating even the garment spotted by the flesh.

In these words our apostle directs them how to carry and behave themselves towards those who were seduced, in order to their recovery, namely, after a different manner. 1. He advises to christian lenity and gentleness, to compassion and tenderness towards some; Of some have compassion. Learn thence, That though reproofs are to be given to backsliders, yet must they be given in compassion, and with holy grief. Our words must have bowels in them, and proceed not from passion, but from pity. 2. For those that are more entangled, corrupted, and hardened in their errors, he advises that they endeavour to save them with fear; that is, terrify them with the fear of God's judgments and wrath, and by sharp admonitions recover them out of their errors, as Lot was snatched out of the fire of Sodom. There is a time when severity is not only useful, but absolutely necessary, yet necessity must be the mother of severity. Lenity must be first used; if that fails, severity must succeed. Hating even the garment spotted by the flesh. By this the apostle means every thing that doth defile, though in the least degree; he forbids all affinity or nearness to the errors and vices of these sinners, implying, That some sinners are so filthy and unclean, that there is no keeping company with them without defilement; and intimating, That christians, in their converting with erroneous or vicious persons, whom they labour to recover, should take great care that they be not corrupted nor debauched by them, they being only to deal with them as physicians, not as companions.

24 Now unto him that is able to keep you from falling, and to present you faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy.

Observe here, 1. How our apostle shuts up his exhortation with prayer; having exhorted them to duty, he commends them to the divine grace, intimating, that the fruit of all must be expected from God, without whose blessing all exhortations and endeavours will nothing avail. 2. The person who is the object of prayer and praise, Christ, described by his power. 1. He is able to keep us from falling; that is, from apostacy: He speaks not of his absolute power, so Christ is able to keep us from all sin, but of such a power as is engaged by promise and office; all believers are Christ's charge, and he will preserve them from final destruction. 2. He is able to present us faultless; it is Christ's office to preserve his church until he presents it spotless to the Father, before the presence of his glory; that is, at his glorious appearance, when he shall come to judge the world with exceeding joy; on both sides no doubt, both on Christ's part and ours. O sweet interview betwixt Christ and believers! He will joy to see us, as we will rejoice to see him. Learn, That Christ will one day make a solemn presentation of his people unto God. 2. That when he doth present them, he will present them faultless. 3. That the day in which he does present them, will be a very glorious day in itself, and a very joyful day to all his people; when the impenitent world howl, they shall triumph.

25 To the only wise God our Saviour, be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and ever. Amen.

Our apostle shuts up his epistle (as is usual) with a doxology; where Observe, 1. The person to whom the praise is given, to God, the wise God, the only wise God, so called because he is originally and independently wise; because he is infinitely and transcendently wise; all the wisdom of the wisest of men is nothing in opposition to his wisdom, nor in comparison with it. 2. That Jesus Christ our Saviour is worthy to be accounted the only wise God; as he is God, he is called the wisdom of the Father; and in the book of the Proverbs, he is represented under that title, and spoken of as a person, chap. viii. As he was man, all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge were found in him; he received the habits of all created knowledge and wisdom, together with all other graces without measure. 3. As the person described to whom the praise is given, so the description of the praise which is given to this person, Glory and majesty, dominion and power; by which understand the greatness and eminent excellency of the divine nature, which results from his perfections, and whereby the divine nature is infinitely exalted above all others beings. Learn hence, That we ought to have such a sense of God's transcendent excellencies and perfections, as may oblige us to ascribe all things that are honourable and glorious to him, therefore are so many words here used. 4. The duration, now and ever. Learn thence, That believers have such large and vast desires for the exaltation of God's glory, that they would have him glorified everlastingly, and without ceasing, not only in the present, but to eternal ages. To him be glory now and ever. Amen.

ST. JOHN THE DIVINE.

The title of this book is the Revelation, so called, because it contains in general a discovery of such secrets, as no wisdom of man could have manifested or foreseen, and in particular reveals such divine things concerning the state of the church, which before lay hid in the purpose and counsel of God. Concerning this book, observe, 1. The penman that wrote it, St. John, the Apostle and Evangelist (as it is believed) the Disciple whom Jesus loved; his hand held the pen, whilst the Spirit of God indicated the mysterious matter of this book. Observe 2. The time when, and the place where he received the commandment to write what he wrote; the place was in the isle of Patmos, into which it is said that St. John was banished by the emperor Domitian, and there received and wrote this revelation, after he had, by a miraculous providence, escaped death at Rome, being there put into a cauldron of burning oil. As to the time when he had his commandment to write, he tells us it was on the Lord's day, chap. i. 10. I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day, and heard a voice, saying, What thou seest write in a book. The more conscientious we are in observing our Lord's day, and the more zealous and fervent in the religious duties of it, the more receptive we are of divine favours, and the better qualified for receiving discoveries from God: The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him; that is, devoutly worship and perform their duty to him. Observe, 3. The persons to whom this epistle and prophecy is written, namely, to all the servants of God in general, and to the seven churches of Asia in particular, to remain a perfect record for the use of the church to all succeeding ages, the state of the universal church-militant being herein laid open. Observe lastly, The authority of what is here written, it is the revelation of Christ Jesus, chap. xxii. I Jesus have sent my angel to testify these things unto the churches; that is, for the instruction and consolation of the church in all ages are these things written, ver. 7. And blessed is he that keepeth the words of the prophecy of this book; from whence we may infallibly gather, that it is the mind and will of God, that this book should be read by the church in all ages, and by all her members; for how can they keep the words of this prophecy, except they know them? How can they know them, except they read them, and study them? And to this, that besides the prophetic part of this book, there is such a spirit of holiness breathing through it, the main articles of the christian faith so clearly and plainly held forth in it, and many religious and moral duties so strictly enjoined by it, that it is the unquestionable duty of the ministers of God to study this book with that modesty and sobriety, which becomes them as inquirers, and likewise the people's duty to give themselves to the reading of it with fervent prayer, and a simplicity of mind to be guided and directed by it as becomes learners.

C H A P. I.

THE revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave unto him, to shew unto his servants things which must shortly come to pass; and he sent and signified it by his angel unto his servant John: 2 Who bare record of the word of God, and of the testimony of Jesus Christ, and of all things that he saw.

That is, "This revelation God the Father gave to Christ, his Son, as Mediator; and therewith a commission to impart it to his faithful servants, especially the ministers of his church, and particularly to St. John, who bare record in his gospel, and his epistles, that Jesus Christ was the essential and eternal word of God, and also bare record of the Testimony of Christ: that is, of his doctrine and miracles, of his death and sufferings, declaring all things that he saw, namely, in his visions, and as they were represented to him." Here note, 1. The favour granted to St. John, he had a vision or revelation of future things. Revelations from God were sometimes by vision, sometimes by voice, and sometimes by dreams; this revelation, which St. John bare had, was of a mixed nature, partly by vision, and partly by voice. 2. The primary Author of this revelation, God the Father, the first person in the Trinity, he revealed it. 3. The order in which God gave forth this revelation; first, it is given to Christ, The revelation of Jesus Christ which God gave unto him; next unto the angel, then unto St. John, to reveal it to the church. Christ, as God, knew all things from eternity, but as man and mediator he received his revelation from God the Father, and imparted it by the angel to his servant John; we see then that Christ, in his state of exaltation, continues to execute his prophetic office, by revealing to his servants the mind and will of God. 4. The subject-matter of the revelation, Things which should shortly come to pass; mark, not things which were already past (then this book had been an history, and not a prophecy) but which should certainly and suddenly come to pass; that is, they should shortly begin to be accomplished, and to take effect, not that they should all be immediately performed, but in God's time; in respect of whose eternity, a thousand years are but as one day. Lastly, The fidelity and great integrity of St. John, in making known to others all things that he saw; that is, he had by his writings told the churches what Christ by his angel told him, even all that he heard and saw in this vision, as St. Paul did not shun to declare the whole counsel of God, Acts xx. (he doth not say he had declared the whole counsel of God, for who but God himself could declare that?)

3 Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things which are written therein: For the time is at hand.

Observe here, The great encouragement which the Spirit of God gives to all christians to read and regard, to consider and meditate upon the things contained in this divine book, that is, the necessary parts of christianity, which are here mixed with darker passages; all must read, study, and practise these that hope for blessedness. Hence note, That although the book of the Revelation be in itself a very abstruse and mysterious part of holy scripture, yet christians ought not to be debarred, much less debar themselves from reading of it, and consulting with it; blessed is he that readeth, that is, attentively, understandingly, and affectionately; and blessed is he that keepeth the things that are written, that is, in his mind and memory, in his affection and practice, so as to adhere to the truth, whatever trials and temptations it may expose him to.

4 John to the seven churches which are in Asia: Grace be unto you, and peace, from him which is, and which was, and which is to come; and from the seven spirits which are before his throne; 5 And from Jesus Christ, who is the faithful witness, and the first begotten of the dead, and the prince of the kings of the earth.—

Observe, here. 1. The persons to whom St. John writes, and the particular churches which he does salute, namely, the seven churches in Asia, which were then the most famous and flourishing churches in the christian world, but now over-run with barbarism. Sin has laid the foundation of ruin in the most flourishing churches and kingdoms. 2.

The apostolical salutation given to these churches, Grace be unto you, and peace; by grace understand the free favour and rich love of God, in pardoning, sanctifying, and saving; and by peace, the inward sense of that love, and all outward mercies and temporal blessings whatsoever. 3. The persons in whose name, or from whom this salutation is sent and given. 1. From God the Father, who is described by his eternity and immutability, which is, which was and which is to come. 2. From the seven spirits, which are before the throne; that is, from the Holy Ghost, who is thus described in regard of the perfection and variety of his gracious operations; the Holy Spirit is called seven, because he is perfect in working; and he is said to be before the throne, because continually present with God, and ready to perform what is needful for the church of God. 3. From Jesus Christ, who is described according to the threefold office of a prophet, priest, and king; his being called the true and faithful witness, points out his prophetic office, that he is the great Prophet of his church, who reveals the will of the Father fully and faithfully to the sons of men; his being styled the first begotten of the dead, points out his priestly office, and intimates that he died, that he rose again from the dead, and that he first arose, or was the first begotten from the dead; that is, the first that rose from the dead by his own power, to a state of immortality, and never to die more; some indeed rose before him, but then they were raised by him, he was the first that ever raised himself; others were raised from the dead, as Lazarus, before Christ, but they died again; whereas Christ rose from the dead never to die more: he entered into a state of immortality after his resurrection, and lives for ever to make intercession for us. Lastly, Christ is styled the Prince of the kings of the earth, which phrase shews both his influence upon them (as giving laws and rules unto them) and their dependence upon him, who do receive their power and government, their protection and dominion, all from his hand.

—Unto him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood, 6 And hath made us kings and priests unto God and his Father: To him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen.

In the former verse our Saviour was considered in the excellency of his person, and with respect to what he is in himself; in this verse he is considered in the execution of his office, or with respect to what he is unto his church. And here, observe, 1. His affection in general toward us, he hath loved us; our blessed Redeemer has given us full and ample demonstration of his great and wonderful love unto his church and people, and none doth so properly and passionately love the church as Christ himself: before conversion he loves his people with a love of commiseration and compassion; after conversion, he loves them with a love of complacency and delight. 2. The discovery and manifestation which Christ has made of this his love particularly towards us, he hath washed us from our sins in his own blood; that is, he hath given himself a sacrifice for our sins, and by the merit of his blood freed us from the guilt of sin in our justification, and also by the efficacy of that blood cleansed us from the filth of sin in our sanctification; the blood of Christ

Christ has both a pacifying and purifying influence ; it pacifies God's wrath, and purges the sinner's conscience ; the blood of Christ merited the Spirit of God for our sanctification, and so reconciled us to God, as well as obtained pardon for us, in a way of meritorious satisfaction, and so reconciled God to us, he washed us from our sins in his own blood. Where note, a great emphasis in the double word of property. 1. Our sins ; that is, every one of our own sins, without any limitation or exception whatsoever, as to the number or heinous nature of them ; the sin against the Holy Ghost is indeed excepted ; but this proceeds from the incapacity of the sinner, not from the inefficacy or insufficiency of Christ's sacrifice for sin. 2. There is also an emphasis in the word of property with respect to Christ, when it is called his own blood ; the Levitical priests sprinkled the people with blood, but it was not their own blood, but the blood of bulls and goats ; but Christ spared not his own blood, and he did not barely sprinkle us with it, but washed us in it ; it was not the blood of his finger, but the blood of his heart, his very life went with it. Observe. 3. The consequent effect, and happy result of all this love of Christ towards us, and undertaking for us, he hath made us kings and priests unto God. 1. Kings, not in a temporal but spiritual sense ; they reign as kings over their unruly lusts and corruptions over Satan, over the world, over death the king of terrors ; they begin their reign upon earth, without which it were impossible to perfect and complete it in heaven. 2. Priests, consecrating themselves a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable unto God, and offering up, not expiatory, but gratulatory sacrifices unto him, namely, prayer and praise, supplication and thanksgiving. 1. Peter ii. 5. Ye are an holy priesthood, &c. Observe, 4. After this description of Christ, follows an ascription of all that glory and honour, dominion and power, which is his due, and our duty to ascribe unto him : To him be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen. Where note, That the same honour and glory, dominion and power, being here attributed and given to Christ, which Christ teaches us to ascribe and render unto God, Matth. vi. it is a sure testimony that Christ is God, and as such to be acknowledged and adored by us.

7 ¶ Behold he cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him : and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him. Even so, Amen.

These words are a majestic description of our Saviour's coming to judgement ; they are ushered in with a note of attention and admiration, Behold! which denotes also the truth and certainty of his appearance, and upbraids us likewise for our natural backwardness to believe, mind, and meditate upon the coming of Christ ; we are too much guided and governed by sense ; what we see nothing of, we believe little of ; therefore St. John here begins with a note of incitement, in the word Behold! It follows, he cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see him, and they which pierced him. This was fulfilled, 1. When Christ came by the Roman armies to destroy Jerusalem, by taking vengeance on his murderers, when his crucifiers might discern that those heavy and direful judgments were inflicted on them for their crucifying Christ, and persecuting christians. But,

2. It will be more eminently and universally fulfilled at the general day of judgement, when Christ will come riding upon the clouds, as in a triumphant chariot, and all human eyes shall then see him, his persecutors and despisers particularly, beholding him, but not all alike ; such as pierced him, but repented, whose hearts were afterwards pierced for their piercing of him, these at that day shall see Christ with astonishing joy, though they put him to bitter sorrow ; the death of Christ has procured mercy for those whose cruelty did procure his death ; but as for such as pierced him, but never repented, both such as pierced him in his person, or in his members, they shall also see him to their sorrow, and shall wail, or take on heavily, because of him ; that is, because they must be judged by him. Lord ! how will the sight of a pierced Saviour then pierce their souls with sorrow, with vexation of heart, and anguish of spirit ? To behold Christ with an eye of sense then, will be very grievous to them that do not behold him with an eye of faith now ; see him they shall, see him they must ; but alas, they had rather be covered with mountains and hills falling upon them, than thus behold him ! Farther, How St. John closes this description of Christ's second coming, with a pathetic option on his own and the church's behalf, in the last words of the verse—Even so, Amen—intimating, that the saints, or church of God, do expect and believe that assuredly it will be so, and do also earnestly desire and pray that it may be so. Learn hence, That Christ will undoubtedly come to put an end to the sufferings of his afflicted church, and to punish his and their persecutors ; with whose coming the saints are well pleased, and do earnestly desire and long for it ; behold he cometh—Even so, Amen. Come, Lord Jesus.

8 I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord, which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty.

Observe, 1. That what was applied to God the Father, at the fourth verse, namely, that he was, is, and is to come, is here by Christ applied to himself at the eighth verse. Alpha is the first, Omega the last letter of the Greek alphabet, and as such they inclose all the rest, Christ calling himself the first cause and the last end (as nothing began before him, so nothing can outlast him) he does hereby discover his divinity to us, that he is co-essential and co-substantial with the Father, the same attributes being given to both ; understand we then that this text plainly speaks the Godhead of Christ, against the Socinians. Christ calling himself the first and the last, takes to himself absolute perfection and power, sovereignty and dignity, eternity and divinity ; he is the first, because he was before all beginning, and because from him all things had their beginning ; he is also the last, because he shall continue for ever ; without end, because he is the end of all things, and because when we have attained him, we are at the highest and last of our attainments ; we rest, and have no more to seek when we have found Christ, for he brings us to the Father, in whom we have eternal rest through himself, the Son ; and the last title Christ assumes to himself, namely, the Almighty, bespeaks his divinity ; he is God Almighty, able to accomplish all his promises to his people, and to execute his threatenings on his enemies ; and if the adversaries of our Saviour's Godhead, head, in the glass of this text, do not see his divinity, it is not because they cannot, but they will not see.

9 I John, who also am your brother, and companion in tribulation, and in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ, was in the isle that is called Patmos, for the word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus Christ. 10 I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day; and heard behind me a great voice as of a trumpet, 11 Saying, I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last: And, what thou seest, write in a book, and send it unto the seven churches which are in Asia; unto Ephesus, and unto Smyrna, and unto Pergamos, and unto Thyatira, and unto Sardis, and unto Philadelphia, and unto Laodicea.

The preface being ended in the foregoing verses, here begins the body or visionary part of this book; the first vision is here before us, concerning the seven Asian churches. In which vision we have observable, 1. The person that received it, he is described by his name John, I John; by his spiritual relation, I John your brother; by his then present condition, your companion in tribulation; undergoing like sufferings with you: your companion in the kingdom of Christ, that is, in expecting of, and hoping for, the same kingdom of heaven and glory which ye expect; and I am also your companion in patience, called the patience of Jesus Christ, because in his word he requires it, because by his spirit he produces it, because in his own example he gave us a pattern of it; and perhaps principally, because of the present state of the kingdom of Christ in this world calls for it. 2. The place where St. John received this vision, in the isle of Patmos, not far from the Asian churches, into which the emperor Domitian banished him. (Having, as is said, cast him first into a caldron of burning oil, out of which he miraculously escaped.) Ecclesiastical history says, St. John was very near an hundred years old, when he was, by that bloody emperor, banished into Patmos, for preaching the word of God, and for bearing testimony to this truth, that Jesus Christ was the Saviour of the world. Learn, That the greatest honour which an apostle, an aged apostle, a beloved apostle, can be admitted to the participation of, is to suffer banishment and death for bearing a faithful testimony to Jesus Christ. Observe, 3. The time when St. John had this glorious vision of Christ, communion with him, and communications from him, it was upon the Lord's day; I was in the spirit, that is, in spiritual meditation, in a spiritual ecstacy, in a transporting rapture by the Spirit, under his more immediate illumination and powerful influences; on the Lord's day, namely, the first day of the week, so called, because Christ at his resurrection took possession of it for his own, and because the end of its institution was to commemorate Christ's resurrection, and because applied to special worship and service, and as such religiously observed by the apostles, Acts xx. 7. and by the universal church, ever since the apostles days. In that St. John, in a solitary island, kept the christian sabbath, we learn, that the religious observations of the Lord's day, is a duty incumbent upon all persons, and in all places. Learn, 2. How Christ owned his own day, and encouraged St. John in his religious and strict observation of it, by the influences of his holy Spirit upon him, and by communicating extraordinary revelations to him. Observe, 4. The vision and revelation itself, which began with his hearing a loud voice like a trumpet; that is, the voice of Christ, full of majesty and power. spake unto him, saying, What thou seest, that is, what thou shalt see and hear, write in a book, and send it to the seven churches. Here note, 1. That the book of the Revelation written by Christ's own direction, therefore warranted to be of divine authority. 2. That what Christ commanded St. John carefully to write, it becomes us heedfully to read; for though what St. John wrote and sent concerned the seven Asian churches at that time, and had a particular respect to their present state: Yet all scripture is written for our learning, and we are to beg spiritual wisdom from God to make a right use and holy improvement of what is written.

12 And I turned to see the voice that spake with me. And being turned, I saw seven golden candlesticks; 13 And in the midst of the seven candlesticks, one like unto the Son of man, clothed with a garment down to the foot, and girt about the paps with a golden girdle. 14 His head and his hairs were white like wool, as white as snow: And his eyes were as a flame of fire; 15 And his feet like unto fine brass, as if they burned in a furnace; And his voice as the sound of many waters. 16 And he had in his right hand seven stars: And out of his mouth went a sharp two-edged sword: And his countenance was as the sun shineth in his strength.

As if St. John had said, "I turned to see the person whose voice I heard speaking with me, and I beheld seven golden candlesticks, representing the seven Asian churches, and in the midst of those candlesticks I saw one in the shape of a man, which reminded me of Christ the Son of man, clothed in garments much like unto Aaron's the high priest, who was an illustrious type of Christ our great and merciful high priest, who made an atonement for us on earth, and maketh now intercession for us in the highest heavens." Note here, 1. The comparison made between the churches of Christ and the golden candlesticks; they are called candlesticks in regard of the light which they hold forth; the candlestick does not give light of itself, but holds it forth to others: It is the church's duty to keep within herself the pure word of God, and to keep herself pure from being besmeared with errors in doctrine, or vice in conversation. Churches, the holiest and purest of churches, are rather candlesticks than candles; Christ is the light, the word is the lamp, the church but the instrument to convey the light unto us. Again, the churches are golden candlesticks: Gold is the most precious of metals, the church is the most excellent of all societies; for it beautifies all societies whatsoever, that are members of the church of Christ. 2. How Christ was seen by St. John walking in the midst of the golden candlesticks, present in and with his churches; that is, St. John had in this vision a very lively representation of Christ in his human nature; nature ; not that St. John now saw Christ in his manhood really, for that was then in heaven, but he had a resemblance of it in the vision. 3. The description given of Christ, as walking in the midst of his gospel-church. He is, (1.) described by his attire, habited like Aaron the high priest, with a garment down to his feet, and girt with a golden girdle, to signify, that as Aaron was of the Old, so Christ is the high priest of the New Testament, presenting continually to his Father the memorials of his death, the merits of his sacrifice, and making intercession with the Father for our gracious acceptance with him. 2. He is next described by the parts and members of the body : His head and hair as white as snow and wool, signify his eternity and his purity, that he is the Ancient of days, even the Father of eternity, and perfectly innocent, pure, and holy : His eyes like flaming fire, denoting his piercing knowledge ; that as head of his church he spies out all her ways, words, and thoughts : His feet like burning brass, and his voice like many waters ; which expressions represent the dread and terror of Christ towards the enemies of his church ; and that vengeance he would execute upon his murderers, in particular, at the destruction of Jerusalem, and upon all the impenitent rejecters of his gospel-grace, at the general judgment : Then will they understand what they now will not believe, that it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God. 3. He is next described by what he had in his right hand, namely, seven stars, representing the seven angels, bishops, and ministers of the seven churches. These are called stars, their office and duty being to enlighten the church, both by the light of life and doctrine : and as stars are seated above, so should their conversation be in heaven, and their affections not set upon the things below. Stars give direction, light, and influence to others ; they were not made for themselves. Ministers must not chiefly seek their own, but others good. Stars are swift in their motion, and their motion is constantly in their own orb and sphere. Vain is the pretence of care and concern for other churches, whilst we neglect our own. Finally, ministers are stars, as in respect to their situation, and in respect of their constant and regular motion ; so in respect of their continuance and duration. Stars are fixed in heaven, so are ministers in the church : Christ holds them in his hand, otherwise the world would soon have them under their feet. 4. He is described by a sharp two-edged sword coming out of his mouth, denoting the piercing power of the word of God to conquer sin, convert sinners, and to condemn and slay the unconverted. Lastly, it is added, That his countenance was as the sun that shineth in his strength ; that is, very glorious in itself, and very comforting and refreshing to those that are his members, his sincere disciples and followers. This part of the description of Christ, sweetly follows the former : When his feet were as burning brass, to tread down and consume his enemies ; his countenance was as the sun, to cheer and cherish, to comfort and refresh his friends.

17 And when I saw him, I fell at his feet as dead, and he laid his right hand upon me, saying unto me, Fear not ; I am the first and the last : 18 I am he that liveth, and was dead ; and behold, I am alive for evermore, Amen ; and have the keys of hell and of death.

Observe here, 1. The effect which this glorious representation of Christ in this vision had upon St. John, he was astonished and amazed at it, and fell down at Christ's feet as one almost dead. Note from hence, That the holiest man on earth is not able to bear the presence of Christ here, nor able to stand before his gracious manifestation of himself, when he comes to reveal himself in mercy towards him. See Hab. iii. 15. 16 Lord, how unable then will the wicked be at the great day to stand before the manifestation of thy fury ! if at this visionary representation of Christ, St. John trembled, and fell at his feet as dead, how unable will the impenitent world be to look him in his face at the great day, when he shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, rendering vengeance to them that know not God ! Observe 2. The seasonable care of Christ for St. John's relief in this great exigency ; He laid his right hand upon me saying, Fear not. Hereby Christ discovered both his readiness to help, and his ability to help ; the right hand is the supporting hand, the strengthening hand ; Christ did not send an angel to comfort St. John, but laid his own hand upon him, to assure him both of safety and succour. 3. As what Christ did, so what he likewise said, for St. John's comfort and support under the burden of his fears ; Fear not, says Christ, for I am the first and the last ; that is, I am an eternal being, without either beginning or end. Again, I am he that liveth, and was dead. As if Christ had said, " Fear not death or dying, for I have overcome death by dying, conquered the king of terrors in his own territories ; but behold, I am now alive for evermore, for the benefit of my church, and to protect and defend my faithful servants." Nay, farther, to shew that his life was not a bare subsistence, but clothed with power, Christ adds, I have also the keys of hell and of death ; that is, a sovereign power over the whole invisible world, to let into heaven, and to lock into hell, as I please." The keys are an emblem of authority and power ; the steward who has the keys of the house, commands the house. There are four keys which Christ keeps in his own hands ; the key of the womb, the key of the clouds, the key of the earth, as of the granary of corn, and the key of the grave. When Christ says here, I have the keys of hell and of death, the meaning is, that he has a sovereign dominion over both worlds ; over this in which we live, and over that into which we die, whether the one or the other part of it, heaven and hell both ; for the words must not be understood with a debasing limitation, only respecting hell, as if Christ had only the keys of the bottomless pit : But the original word hades signifies the invisible world, consisting of both heaven and hell ; and he has a power over both ; and also over death too, which is the common passage into both places. Learn, 1. If Christ has the power of death, and keeps the key of the grave in his own hand, that men do not die at random, by accident and chance, but by determination and judgment : Christ by an authoritative act turns the key, and gives man his exit out of the world. 2. That Christ, who has the key of death, has also the key of hades ; the upper and lower hades, heaven and hell ; and such as go out of the world, go not out of being, but go into one of those two states and places. 3. How admirable, and yet how amiable, Christ should be in all our eyes, who hath these keys in his own hand, with such such merciful intentions towards us; and how willingly should we die, when the keys of death are in so great, so kind an hand as his! O how happy is it when this power of our great Redeemer over death and the grave, and a placid resignation to his pleasure, do concur and meet together, not from stupidity, but trust in him that keeps the keys! Lord, when the key is turning, and thou art letting in souls into the invisible world, let thy servant depart in peace, and everlastingly see thy salvation.

19 Write the things which thou hast seen, and the things which are, and the things which shall be hereafter. 20 The mystery of the seven stars which thou sawest in my right hand, and the seven golden candlesticks. The seven stars are the angels of the seven churches: And the seven candlesticks which thou sawest are the seven churches.

This chapter concludes with a solemn charge given by our Saviour to St. John, to write and record the vision of the seven stars, and seven golden candlesticks, which he had newly seen; letting him into the mystery of both, by telling him, that the seven stars are seven angels; that is, signify seven angels, and the seven candlesticks are, that is, signify seven churches, and represent them. In like manner, when Christ says in the sacrament, This is my body; the meaning is, this bread signifies and represents my body. Here note, That the bishops and governors, the pastors and teachers of the church, are called angels, because they are sent by God on his message, because they had their commission from him; and to signify that unspotted purity which should be found with them, both in life and doctrine; and they are represented by stars, to denote their dignity and duty, their usefulness and beneficialness, the swiftness and constancy of their motion, but especially in regard to their nature. A star is of the same nature with the heavens, celestial; not earthly, not elementary; ministers should be heavenly, holy, blameless, inoffensive; they should teach by tongue and hand, and instructed by lip and life. God grant, that in our hearts we may experimentally find the works of holiness, and in our lives express the power of holiness. Amen.

CHAP. II.

UNTO the angel of the church of Ephesus, write, These things saith he that holdeth the seven stars in his right hand, who walketh in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks;

Note here, 1. That the church of Ephesus, with the other six churches of Asia, were, at the time of St. John's writing, very flourishing churches, favoured as much with the special presence and influence of Christ, as ever any churches were. 2. That these churches are written to as a sort of types of all the Gentile churches unto the end of the world, and patterns also which the Gentile churches were to take warning by, Christ hereby declaring what all other churches, offending and declining in the same manner, might expect. 3. That the first church St. John is commanded to write unto, is the church of Ephesus, and what is written is directed to the angel, the bishop, the president, and chief minister in that church, to be communicated to all in the church both ministers and people, as that which nearly concerned them all. 4. That Christ in the beginning of every epistle, doth notify himself by some one or other of those characters which he gave of himself in the former chapter: Thus here, These things saith he that holdeth the seven stars in his right hand. Mark, He holdeth the stars in his hand, to shew his tenderness; in his right hand, to shew his power, supporting and directing, them for the good of his people. It is added, Christ walks in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks. Which expression denotes Christ's gracious presence with them, his strict observation of them, his tender care over them, his protecting and defending of them, in doing their duty to him, his encouraging or reproving, his rewarding or punishing, as there should be cause. Learn, 1. That the ministers of Christ are stars, yet but stars, they shine but with a borrowed light, with a light derived from the sun; they shine but for a time, the day hastens when these stars shall disappear for ever. 2. These stars are in the right hand of Christ, in his power, and at his disposal; he appoints them their orbs, where they shall shine, and appoints them also their time for shining. 3. That the church is a candlestick, a golden candlestick. As a candlestick has no more light than what is put into it, and must be continually maintained by a new supply of oil, such is the state of the church; and as a candlestick is a moveable thing, remove the candlestick, and the light is removed with it: so when God removes the light of the gospel from a people, he unchurches them. Farther, The church is called a golden candlestick, because as gold is the purest of metals, and excels all other metals in preciousness; so God expects his church should differ as much from the world, as gold doth from common clay. 4. That there is a special gracious presence of Christ with his church in all her administrations: It denotes his presence with them, and this presence of his is an holy presence, and a joyous presence.

2 I know thy works, and thy labour, and thy patience, and how thou canst not bear them which are evil: And thou hast tried them which say they are Apostles, and are not, and hast found them liars: 3 And hast born, and hast patience, and for my name's sake hast laboured, and hast not fainted. 4 Nevertheless I have somewhat against thee, because thou hast left thy first love.

Observe here, 1. A general declaration which stands in the front of the several epistles, I know thy works, both thy inward and outward works, to observe and mark them, to punish or reward them, as the case requires. This proves the divinity of Christ, that he is truly and essentially God: he knows the hearts of men, which none but a God can know. 2. The commendation which is here given of this church for her labour, in propagating the gospel, for her patience in bearing affliction and persecution for it, for the strictness of her discipline, that she did not bear with, nor tolerate and endure, such persons as were either erroneous in judgment, or scandalous in practice; for her faithfulness in trying the authority of those who pretended to an immediate call from God to be apostles, but were found liars and false prophets; such were those two seducing heretics Eblion and Cerinthus, and their followers. Mark here, How our Lord Jesus Christ doth observe and approve, doth commend and praise, whatever is good in his church, and whatever is commendable and praise-worthy in the members of it; yet at the same time, when he commends them for what is good, he reproveth them for what is evil and amiss; 3. The reprehension given, vers. 4. Nevertheless, I have somewhat against thee, &c. As if Christ had said, "I observe amongst you a great abatement of your former zeal and fervour; you have not that hearty love to me, and to one another, which you had at first, but verily you grow cooler when you should grow better." Learn hence, 1. That were there is truth of grace, there may yet be a sad decay and declining in grace. 2. That Christ takes notice of, and is displeas'd with, such decays and declining in grace, and severely checks and reproveth his people for them.

5 Remember therefore from whence thou art fallen, and repent, and do the first works: or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will remove thy candlestick out of his place, except thou repent.

We had Christ's commendation and reprehension of the church of Ephesus before, we have his admonition and exhortation now. The words before us are partly monitory, and partly minatory; monitory in the former part of the verse, Remember from whence thou art fallen, and repent. Note here, That Christ did not surprisingly come upon this church at unawares; they were admonish'd before chastised, warn'd before laid waste; Christ doth premonish before he punishes. In the minatory part we have a great guilt and sin suppos'd, a great judgment for that guilt denounced, the unchurching of them that had committed it, and the means prescribed for the averting of that judgment; to wit, repentance. Learn hence, 1. That a people professing religion and godliness may fall. 2. That fallen professors should and ought to remember from whence they are fallen. 3. That fallen professors should be repenting professors, and do their first works. 4. That without repentance and reformation, God will certainly remove a people's candlestick, take away the gospel from them, as the severest judgment which he can inflict upon them; Remember, repent, and do thy first works, else I will remove thy candlestick out of its place: that is, such a tempest of persecution shall arise, as will shake your tottering candlestick out of its place. The universal church only has a promise of stability; any particular church may be unchurch'd finally.

6 But this thou hast, that thou hatest the deeds of the Nicolaitans, which I also hate.

As if Christ had said, "Though thou art not what thou shouldst be, yet this thou hast commendable in thee, that thou hatest the deeds of the Nicolaitans (who held community of wives, and eat things offer'd to idols) which impure sect I also hate for their licentious doctrine, and lewd practices, which tend to the ruin and bane of human societies." Note here, 1. That it is not unlawful to call heretics by the name of their leaders; the Nicolaitans are here so called from one Nicolas, suppos'd to be the deacon mentioned Acts vi. who having a beautiful wife, expos'd her as common, to avoid the imputation of jealousy. 2. That Christ hated all licentious doctrines, and loose practices, and so should we.

7 He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches;—

That is, "Let all that hear or read these words unto the churches, which the Holy Spirit has utter'd, consider them, set their hearts to regard them as matters of great importance, and which nearly concern them. Observe, That this form of speech, He that hath an ear to hear, let him hear, Christ often us'd at the end of his parables, when he would stir up the people to more than ordinary attention; and he uses it here in this, and the next chapter, at the end of every one of these epistles to the several churches.

—To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life; which is in the midst of the paradise of God.

As if Christ had said, "Let all such as fall away from their holy profession for fear of persecution, consider what they lose, even eternal life, which I will only give to such as persevere; for to him that overcometh trials and temptations, will I give share of my merits, and thereby a title to eternal happiness, signified by the tree of life in paradise." Note here, 1. It is not said, to him that striveth or resisteth, will I give the crown of life, but to him that overcometh. Lazy wishes are so far from saving men, that endeavours, yea, striving against temptation, without conquering and overcoming, will not save. It is not enough that we resist, but we must conquer; not sufficient that we strive, but we must overcome; 2. From the promise that Christ makes of eternal life, I will give, a clear argument for Christ's being God, essentially God; how is it else that he assumes to himself a power of disposing eternal life.

8 ¶ And unto the angel of the church in Smyrna, write, These things saith the first and the last, which was dead, and is alive; 9 I know thy works, and tribulation and poverty, (but thou art rich) and I know the blasphemy of them which say they are Jews and are not, but are the synagogue of Satan. 10 Fear none of those things which thou shalt suffer. Behold, the devil shall cast some of you into prison, that ye may be tried; and ye shall have tribulation ten days. Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life. 11. He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches; He that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death.

Here we have the second epistle which St. John wrote by the command of Christ to the church of Smyrna, a famous city in one of the provinces in Asia where Polycarp was bishop, and suffered martyrdom. Now, in this epistle we have these particulars observable, 1. The description which Christ is pleas'd here to give of himself, namely, the first and the last, which was dead and is alive, and the suitable-ness of this description, for the consolation of this church, which was now under great tribulation. It is as it Christ had said, "I am an eternal being, the first cause and last end; I was myself put to death, but I am alive again; therefore fear neither sufferings nor death, for I will assist and strengthen you, and if you lose your lives for my sake, I will raise your bodies again to everlasting life." 2. The commendation given by Christ of this church at Smyrna, it is large and full; nay, Christ blameth nothing in this church; she kept her purity fast because always in affliction: not but there were failings undoubtedly in this church; but almighty God mercifully overlooked them. As in the case of Job, no mention is made of his impatience, though he shewed much, but we are called upon him to behold him as a pattern of patience. Next, The particulars of this church's commendation. I know, says Christ; that is, I approve, commend, and praise, thy works, and thy tribulation, and poverty; that is, thy labour and sufferings, and worldly poverty, which thy profession of the gospel hath brought upon thee: but though thou art outwardly poor, yet art thou inwardly rich, rich in grace, rich in faith and patience, rich in meekness and humility, rich in courage and christian fortitude. And farther, I know also the blasphemy of them that say they are Jews, and are not; that is, I know the malicious reproaches and evil speeches of your enemies; cast upon you, partly by native Jews, who glory in circumcision and the law; and partly by false christians, professing faith in Christ, but not daring to own him for fear of persecution. These belong to Satan's synagogue, not to Christ's church. None are so bad as they who only profess and seem to be good. Farther, The encouragement which Christ gives this church to persevere in the faith, though they should suffer much sharper things than ever they yet suffered; fear none of the things you may be called forth to suffer; what though the devil by his instruments casts some of you into prison, and you suffer for a short time, be faithful to your profession until the day of your death, and I shall reward you with a crown of life. Note 1. That Satan by his instrument has been the cause of all those bitter and bloody persecutions which christianity in all ages hath undergone. 2. That though Satan's malice be infinite, yet his power is limited and bounded; he cannot do all the mischief he would, and he shall not do all he can: Satan shall cast you into prison, but not into hell: and not all of you into prison neither, but some only. 3. How mercifully almighty God over-rules the devil's rage and malice, making it subservient to his own glory, and his church's good, causing that which Satan intended for destruction, to serve only for probation and trial. The devil's design by all those floods of wrath, which he pours out against the church, is, that she may be destroyed: but God's intent is only that she may be tried; even as the wife refiner, when he casts his gold into the furnace, designs the purifying of the metal, and only the consuming of the dross. 4. That the sufferings of good men for the cause of christianity, though they may be sharp, yet shall they be but short; Ye shall have tribulation ten days; that is, for a short space of time. 5. That a persevering faithfulness in the service of Christ in this life, is indispensably necessary to our obtaining the crown of life and immortality in the world to come; lastly, The conclusion of this epistle to the church of Smyrna; this is partly hortatory; He that hath ears to hear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches. The warnings of the Holy Spirit to the churches are recorded as of great concernment for all to mind: and partly promissory, He that overcometh; that is, conquereth the love of this world, and the love of life, when God calls him forth to suffer, he shall not be hurt of the second death; that is, he shall escape eternal misery, that living death, and that dying life, which will be the assured lot and portion of the wicked and ungodly world.

12 ¶ And to the angel of the church in Pergamos, write, These things saith he, which hath the sharp sword with two edges; 13 I know thy works, and where thou dwellest, even where Satan's seat is: and thou holdest fast my name, and hast not denied my faith, even in those days wherein Antipas was my faithful martyr, who was slain among you, where Satan dwelleth. 14 But I have a few things against thee, because thou hast there them that hold the doctrine of Balaam, who taught Balac to cast a stumbling-block before the children of Israel, to eat things sacrificed unto idols, and to commit fornication. 15 So hast thou also them that hold the doctrine of the Nicolitans, which thing I hate. 16 Repent, or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will fight against them with the sword of my mouth. 17 He that hath an ear let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches: To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it.

In these verses is contained the third epistle, which St. John by direction had wrote and sent to the church at Pergamos, in which (as in the former) we have, 1. A description of Christ, as having a sharp two-edged sword in his mouth, denoting the word of God, and that piercing power which accompanies it to conquer the lusts and corruptions of men. As also, 2. A commendation of what was good and excelling in that church, I know thy works; that is, with a knowledge of intelligence and observation, as also with a knowledge of approbation and acceptance. I know thee to be good in bad places, and in the worst of times, though thou dwellest where Satan's seat is; that is, where Satan bears sway by idolatry and persecution, yet dost thou hold fast my name; that is, the doctrine of the gospel preached in my name, and by which I am made known to the world as a man is by his name; and hast not denied my faith, but openly professed it in a time of persecution, even then when blood and slaughter attended the professors and profession of it, namely, when Antipas was slain (who probably was a bishop, or some minister in Pergamos of extraordinary piety; for upon such the storm of persecution generally falls) who died a faithful witness to the truth of my gospel; even then and there, I say, hadst thou the courage to profess my name, and bear witness to the truth. Mark

here, What an honourable mention Christ makes of the services and sufferings of his people; nothing we either do or suffer for Christ, but it is recorded, and shall be remembered to our commendation and honour in this life, and to our consolation and happiness in the next. Yet note farther, The holy impartiality of our blessed Lord; at the same time, when he commends this church for what was commendable and praise worthy, he reproves her for what was faulty and blame-worthy; verse 14. But I have a few things against thee, because thou hast them that hold the doctrine of Balaam, and the Nicolaitans; that is, the doctrine of the impure Gnostics, who teach men now to eat things offered to idols, and to commit fornication, even as Balaam of old directed Balac to ensnare the Israelites, by committing fornication with the Moabitish women, and to eat of what they sacrificed unto idols then. Here observe, That it was not the being of those heretics and heresies among them; that Christ blames them for, but the tolerating of these in their communion, who made light both of adultery and idolatry. They ought to have executed church-discipline upon them, and denounced the church censures against them, as had been done by the church of Ephesus before them, that Christ might have said of them as he did of those, ver. 6. Thou hatest the deeds of the Nicolaitans, which I also hate. Observe next, The counsel which Christ gives this church, Repent; that is, be humbled for this thy connivance at, and tolerating of this wicked sect, and damnable doctrine, and amend, or verily I will come quickly upon thee, and them, in a way of judgment, and fight against them with a two-edged sword; that is, with my holy word convince, wound, and condemn them, &c. The want of zeal and severity against sin, and incorrigible sinners, is very displeasing to Christ, and provokes him to anger greatly. Observe, lastly, The conclusion and close of this epistolary letter, which is partly exhortatory, He that hath ears let him hear, and with his mind ponder and consider what the Spirit saith, by way of counsel and caution, unto the churches; and partly consolatory, To him that overcometh will I give, &c. Mark, He doth not say, to every one that fighteth; no, nor to every one that conquereth in one, two, or more particular acts of resistance; but to him that perseveringly conquers, and finally overcomes both tempter and temptations, both persecutors and persecutions; both false teachers and false doctrines; to them will I give the hidden manna, laid up, not in the earthly tabernacle, but in the heavenly sanctuary: by which understand Christ himself, and the joys and consolations of the holy Spirit, which are hidden from the world, and the peculiar portion of such as sincerely believe in him, and cheerfully suffer for him. It is added, I will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name; that is, absolution and pardon of sin, together with the privilege of adoption; it being a custom anciently to give a white stone in token of absolution, and a black stone as a sign of condemnation, on which stones were written the names of the innocent and guilty; accordingly this new name signifies God's pardoned and adopted ones; the sweetness and comfort of which privilege no man knows, but he that is possessed of it; the happiness of God's sons both here and hereafter cannot be expressed: only they that are so, know what it is to be so: and whereas Christ says, I will give the hidden manna, I will give the white stone, and the new name, to them that overcome, surely it affords a good argument to evince and prove his divinity: who but a God can pardon sin, and sanctify and save sinners?

18¶ And unto the angel of the church in Thyatira, write, These things saith the Son of God, who hath his eyes like unto a flame of fire, and his feet are like fine brags; 19 I know thy works and charity, and service, and faith, and thy patience, and thy works: and the last to be more than the first. 20 Notwithstanding I have a few things against thee, because thou sufferest that woman Jezebel, which calleth herself a prophetess, to teach and to seduce my servants to commit fornication, and to eat things sacrificed unto idols. 21. And I gave her space to repent of her fornication; and she repented not. 22 Behold, I will cast her into a bed, and them that commit adultery with her into great tribulation, except they repent of their deeds. 23 And I will kill her children with death: and all the churches shall know that I am he which searcheth the reins and hearts: and I will give unto every one of you according to your works.

The next epistle is directed by Christ, and written by St. John, to the church at Thyatira; in which epistle observe, 1. The name given to Christ; he is styled the Son of God; that is, by eternal generation, being the only begotten of the Father, as well as begotten of the Father only; and partaker of the Father's essence, as well as of his likeness; he is here called the Son of God, as being a distinct person from the Father; yet is he the first and the last, which denotes his eternity; and who is, and who was, and is to come, the Almighty, which are essential attributes of the Godhead. 2. The description here given of Christ, his eyes like flaming fire, and his feet like burning brags; denoting thereby his piercing and discerning sight to see and observe his enemies, his fiery indignation, and fierce wrath, ready to take hold of them, and his irresistible power and strength to vanquish and tread them under his feet. 3. The great and special commendation which Christ gives to this church; greatly she is commended for her charity to christians in distress; for her service in ministering to them, and in comforting of them; for her faith and constant adherence to the profession of christianity, and for her patience under persecutions for the gospel sake; but her special and peculiar commendation was this, that her last works were more than her first; that is, her last works were better, did exceed and excel the first: Ephesus was best at first, and worst at last; but Thyatira's last works were best. It is a blessed thing when christians grow in goodness, increase in faith, and holiness, when their last days are the best days, their last works, and their last fruit, their best, their fairest fruit. 4. The reprehension follows the commendation; as good as Thyatira was, she needed to be better. She was remiss and negligent in her duty of reproof; censuring, excommunicating vile seducers, the Gnostics and Nicolaitans, the disciples of Simon Magus, and his lewd Helena, as some think, think, compared to Jezebel, because she enticed Ahab to worship Baal, as this woman (whosoever she was) calling herself a prophetess, and teaching the lawfulness of fornication, and eating things offered to idols. Some observe, That there was scarce any heresy broached, but it had some woman or other for the propagator and promoter of it, who took upon them the name of prophetesses. Simon Magus had his Helena; Montanus had his Priscilla and Maximilla; Carpocrates his Marcellina. Concerning this person it is affirmed, that God gave her space to repent, but she repented not. Learn thence, That great is the sin, folly, and danger, of deferring and putting off the duty of repentance, when God gives us time and space sufficient to perform it. 1. Great is the sin, because it is a mocking of God's patience, and undervaluing of his service, a contempt of his authority, a presuming on his goodness, a defiance of his displeasure. 2. Great is the folly, as well as the sin of it, because we put it off to the most improper and unfitting season, and because we hereby make the work more hard and difficult, in what season soever we set about it; and the longer we delay our repentance, the more work shall we make for repentance. 3. As great is the danger, as either the sin or folly, because it puts a person upon a mighty hazard, he runs a desperate venture, not knowing whether he shall live an hour longer; and because we forfeit by our delays that special grace, without the assistance whereof we can never repent. Observe 5. How severely God threatens Jezebel here, and in her all sinners, to whom he gives space for repentance, but it is not improved for that end; I will cast her into a bed of tribulation and torment, instead of her bed of lull and uncleanness, unless she repent. Behold here how great and immeasurable the patience of God is towards the greatest, the vilest, and the worst of sinners; they have space for repentance, they have invitations to repent, they have judgments threatened to prevent their final impenitence: But if they prove incorrigible and unreclaimable, nothing is to be expected but approaching ruin; I will kill her children with death; that is, such as are seduced by her shall suffer with her, if judgments threatened be not by repentance prevented. Lastly, The end and design of Christ in bringing upon vile sinners these exemplary punishments, namely, to declare his omniscience, power, and justice. All the churches shall know that I am he that searcheth the reins and hearts; that is, all the churches in and about Thyatira, says Christ, shall know, that I not only observe outward acts, but take notice of the secret counsels, motions, and designs of men's hearts, and will judge every man according to his works: A full and clear text to prove the divinity of Christ; he that searcheth mens hearts, and renders to all men according to their works, is God; but Christ doth both, and therefore is essentially and truly God.

24 But unto you I say, and unto the rest in Thyatira, as many as have not this doctrine, and which have not known the depths of Satan, as they speak; I will put upon you none other burden. 25 But that which ye have already, hold fast till I come. 26 And he that overcometh, and keepeth my works unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations: 27

(And he shall rule them with a rod of iron: as the vessels of a potter shall they be broken to shivers:) even as I received of my Father. 28 And I will give him the morning-star. 29 He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches.

Here Christ returns in his council and charge given to the church at Thyatira; unto you I say; that is, to you the angel, the governors and pastors, and to all the members of the church; I say unto you all, who have not owned nor entertained these doctrines of the Gnostics, who proudly call their filthy opinions profound mysteries, and depths of knowledge, though they are indeed the depths of Satan, his policies and devices; as if Christ had said, "These vile seducers call their opinions depths, and so they are, but depths of Satan; that is, such depths as Satan has brought out of hell; they are the whisperings and hissings of the old serpent, not the inspirations of the holy God; to you, I say, that I will not impose or put upon you any new doctrine, but charge you to hold fast the old, that apostolic doctrine which you have received; persevere therein till I come to relieve you, and to release you from your persecutions, which will soon be at an end." Observe farther, How our Saviour concludes this epistle to the church of Thyatira, as he did the former, with a consolatory promise to such as overcome temptations, persecutions, all, and all manner of opposition in their christian conversation, and faithfully persevere in well-doing to the end; to him, says Christ, will I give power over the nations; that is, power with me, and in subordination to me, to judge the world, wicked angels, and wicked men, at the great day; then shall you rule them with a rod of iron, and dash them to shivers like a potter's vessel. As if Christ had said, "I have received power, as Mediator, from my Father, effectually to subdue and conquer all mine and your enemies, and I will make you partakers of it in some measure, you shall exercise an irresistible power over them, by consenting to, by approving and applauding of, that righteous judgment, which I shall denounce against them, and execute and inflict upon them. Learn, That believers shall sit as assessors with Christ in judgment, and approve the equity of his proceedings, against the finally impenitent then, though never so near and dear unto them now. Lastly, The full and final reward which Christ promises to him that finally persevereth and manfully overcometh, I will give him the morning star; that is, myself and Spirit to comfort him, and the light of glory to shine upon him to all eternity. Note, Christ is called a Star, because he enlightens all with the light of natural knowledge, and his church with divine illumination; and the Morning-star, peradventure with respect to his incarnation, because as that rises not at the beginning of the night, or at the middle of it, but towards morning; so Christ came not in the beginning or middle of the dark time under the law, but in the last age of the world, in which he has shined forth to the joy and comfort of all nations.

C H A P. III.

AND unto the angel of the church in Sardis, write, These things saith he that hath the seven spirits of of God, and the seven stars; I know thy works, that thou hast a name that thou livest, and art dead. 2 Be watchful, and strengthen the things which remain that are ready to die: for I have not found thy works perfect before God. 3 Remember therefore how thou hast received and heard, and hold fast, and repent. If therefore thou shalt not watch, I will come on thee as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour I will come upon thee.

This chapter begins with the fifth epistle, which Christ wrote and directed to the church of Sardis. In which observe. 1. The glorious description given of our Lord Jesus Christ, namely, that he has the seven spirits of God and the seven stars; that is, according to some, he hath the holy Spirit of God proceeding from him as from the Father; and because he had power to send the Holy Ghost, together with the Father, he is therefore said to have the seven spirits of God; so the Holy Ghost is called, because of the perfection and variety of his gifts and graces, influences and operations. Others by the seven spirits understand created angels; and the seven spirits being joined with seven stars, intimate according to these, that Christ is the Lord of angels and ministers, he upholds his ministers, and has angels always at hand to defend his members. 2. This church's partial opinion of herself; in her own and others esteem, she was alive; thou hast a repute for an excellent church, thy profession causes many to think and speak well of thee. 3. Christ's impartial judgment concerning her, as one that knew her better than either others did, or herself could know her; thou sayest thou art thus and thus, alive and lively, but alas! thou art no better than dead, thou art dead or dying, thyself, and others are deceived concerning thee. Learn hence, 1. That it is possible for a professing people to be alive in their own and others esteem, and yet to be dead or dying in God's account; at the same time that they make a splendid and glorious profession of religion, they may be under the reign and power of hypocrisy. 2. That no religious pretences, no fair shews, can possibly hide a person's or a people's hypocrisy from God's eye; thou sayest that thou art thus, but I know thee better than others do, or thou canst know thyself; thou hast a name to live, but thou art dead. Observe, 4. The counsel given by Christ to this languid and languishing church. 1. To be watchful; to shake off her drowsiness and formality; no reformation can be expected, if due consideration, watchfulness, and care, be not exercised. 2. To strengthen the things that are ready to die; that is, blow up every spark of grace which lodges under the ashes of much corruption, and keep it from going quite out. Spirituals are to be succoured and strengthened, if once they grow languishing and dying, lest they grow quite dead. 3. To remember what they had received and heard from Christ's apostles and ministers, to hold fast the truths received, and to repent of what is evil, and to reform what has been done amiss; intimating, that it is the duty of christians to remember those truths which they have heard and received; and also to hold fast what they have heard and received; and that renewed repentance is the duty of christians as well as initial repentance. Observe 5.

The complaint which Christ brings in against the church of Sardis, I have not found thy works perfect before God: Not full, says the original: that is, not filled up with that sincerity and zeal which God requires: A man may be full of good works, and yet his works not be full; a man may be full of prayer, pray much, pray often, and yet his prayer not full, but vain and empty; sincerity is the fullness or filling up of all duties; it is not common frailty, but the want of sincerity and soundness, zeal, and seriousness, which Christ complains of. 6. The danger threatened to security and slothfulness; If thou shalt not watch; I will come upon thee as a thief; that is, "I will surprize thee with my judgments in the midst of thy security, as a thief does persons when they are asleep, and least expect him;" the expression plainly intimates, both the suddenness of the judgment, and the severity of the judgment threatened.

4 Thou hast a few names even in Sardis which have not defiled their garments; and they shall walk with me in white: for they are worthy.

Note here, That though the greater part in Sardis were dead or dying, that is, declining and decaying, yet there were some that kept their innocency, and preserved themselves from error and false worship, from erroneous principles and debauched practices. Farther, That these few which keep themselves pure above the rest, are not commanded to separate from the rest. Doctrines crying up purity to the prejudice of unity, reject; for the gospel call for unity as well as for purity. The reward promised to such as keep themselves in Sardis pure both from error and vice; they shall walk with Christ in white, like persons of dignity and honour, like kings and conquerors, who of old wore white garments; they shall have the reward of their innocency and uprightness, for they are worthy of it, according to the law of grace, which promiseth it to them; they have walked worthily, with a worthiness of meekness not with a worthiness of merit; they are therefore meet receivers, though not meritorious purchasers of this reward.

5 He that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment; and I will not blot out his name out of the book of life, but I will confess his name before my Father, and before his angels.

Observe, Christ doth not say, he that consisteth, but he that vanquisheth; not he that conquereth once or twice, in the spiritual combat, but he that overcomes at last the temptations and persecutions from without, the lusts and corruptions from within, he shall be clothed with white raiment; that is, with robes of glory, as the reward of his innocency and virtue, and as a mark of dignity and honour; and farther, I will not blot his name out of the book of life; that is, they shall be enrolled in it, and certainly saved, and I will present them to my Father, yea, I will publicly own them, and confess them before God, angels, and men. Lord! what an honour is this, to know thy people by name, and to call them by name before thy throne, and there publicly to acknowledge them, and proclaim the good done by them! Oh let it be our care to get first the white garment of grace on earth, and then we shall not miss of the white robes of glory in heaven.

6 He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches.

These words are the same exhortatory conclusions which we find added by Christ to all the foregoing epistles; and plainly signify thus much, that all persons should look upon themselves as concerned in these several messages which the Spirit of Christ sends unto the churches; hence it is so oft repeated both in the former chapter and in this chapter, because it is of such universal use, and so nearly concerns us all.

7 ¶ And to the angel of the church in Philadelphia, write, These things saith he that is holy: he that is true; he that hath the key of David; he that openeth, and no man shutteth: and shutteth, and no man openeth: 8 I know thy works: behold, I have set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it: for thou hast a little strength, and hast kept my word, and hast not denied my name. 9 Behold, I will make them of the synagogue of Satan, which say they are Jews, and are not, but do lie; behold, I will make them to come and worship before thy feet, and to know that I have loved thee.

Here we have the sixth epistle edited by Christ, written and sent by St. John to the church of Philadelphia, which name signifies brotherly love, and we may reasonably suppose that grace of love, unity, and concord, was eminently found with and amongst the members of this church, and had a mighty influence upon them in the practice of universal godliness, in as much as we find not this church blamed by Christ for any thing; not that she was wholly faultless, and altogether unblameable, but being free from those gross miscarriages which were in other christians, and abounding with love to Christ, and one towards another, Christ graciously passes by and overlooks her failings and infirmities, and only proclaims her virtues and good works. Sincerity and love, though they do not blind Christ's eye, that he cannot see sin in his people, yet it causes him to look upon their failings with a pitiful and compassionate eye. This Philadelphia is said to be a mean city, not far from Sardis, yet here Christ had a very eminent church, not faulted for any thing; it is not the grandeur, but graciousness of a people, that renders a place renowned: In this epistle to the Philadelphians, we have these particulars observable. 1. A lofty description of Christ, by whose authority it was written, He is holy and true, holy in himself essentially, holy with respect to us communicatively, the author, approver, and dispenser of all holiness; and true, that is, a lover and approver of truth. This title assures the church of the truth of all his predictions, promises, and threatenings; these two titles Holy and true, are generally ascribed to God in the Old Testament; these, Christ in the New Testament often attributes to himself, which he had never done, had he not been truly and really God. The other part of the description of Christ follows, that hath the key of David; that is, of the church, of which David was a type; by the key power is denoted; Christ, as Mediator, has an absolute power over the church, being Lord and head of it, and has committed a ministerial power of the keys to the governors and pastors of it, and having this key of the church in his own hand, by virtue of it he opens and none can shut; and shutteth, and none can open; that is, he can open, when he will, the door of success to his faithful ministers, by opening the hearts of his people through the power of converting grace, and no man can shut that door which Christ will thus open; and again, when he shuts the finally impenitent out of the church and out of heaven, no man can open and bring them in against his will. 2. The special favour which Christ indulged to this church, namely, the favour of success in her gospel-administrations: Behold, I have set before thee an open door. Under the metaphor of an open door, the success and progress of the gospel, in the preaching and dispensation of it, is shadowed forth; it is a special favour from God when he opens a door of advantage to us to do good, the least good, either by convincing or converting sinners, or by edifying, strengthening, and comforting saints, and when God is pleased to open such door, none shall shut it. Observe, 3. The commendation given by Christ, of this church, thou hast a little strength; a little spiritual and inward strength, and but few external and outward helps and advantages, yet hast thou kept my word, my doctrine of faith, and my precepts for holy walking, these hast thou kept pure, and hast not denied my name, but adhered constantly to the profession of me and my gospel, notwithstanding all the temptations thou hast met with, by sufferings and reproaches. Note here, How Christ took notice of that little measure of strength which this church had, and accepted it; weak grace, if sincere, shall always find acceptance with Christ; thou hast a little strength, and hast kept my word. Observe, 4. The gracious promise made by Christ unto his church, that her enemies should submit themselves unto her, and worship before her feet; behold, says Christ, I will make them of the synagogue of Satan, which falsely call themselves Jews; I will make them, namely, by the power of my grace, to come and worship before thy feet; they shall reverence thee, and pay a civil respect to thee, and shall know that I have loved thee. Learn hence, That the submission, which the enemies of the church shall be forced to make unto her, by the power of Christ, is great and wonderful.

10 Because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth, 11 Behold, I come quickly: Hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown. 12 Him that overcometh, will I make a pillar in the temple of my God. And he shall go no more out: And I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, which is new Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from my God: And I will write upon him my new name. 13 He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches.

Still our blessed Saviour proceeds with promises and encouragements to this church, because thou hast kept thy word of my patience. Here note, That the doctrine of the gospel is called the word of Christ's patience, partly because it teaches patience in persecuting times, and partly because it is a doctrine, which cannot firmly be adhered to without patience, thou hast kept the word of my patience. To keep this word of Christ's patience, implies not only the keeping his doctrine pure and uncorrupted from error, but also the observing and practising all the duties of a good life. And note, The reward promised to this church for the performing of this duty, because thou hast kept—I will keep thee; Christ will not be behind-hand in rewarding our obedience, no, not in this life; I will (here) keep thee from the hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world. Here note, 1. That a time of affliction, much more of persecution, is a time of temptation, because an afflicted and persecuted state hath many circumstances attending it, by which all are tried, and some ensnared. 2. That a time of trial and temptation will come, most certainly come, sooner or later, upon all persons that dwell upon the earth, upon sinners as well as saints, upon hypocrites as well as sincere christians; which trials will infallibly discover the faith and constancy of the one, the corruption and apostacy of the other. Behold, I come quickly. Hold that fast which thou hast, &c. Observe here, Notwithstanding this church's constancy, yet Christ exhorts her to steadfastness, hold fast; the steadiest and most steadfast christians have need to be often cautioned and counselled against backsliding. Observe also, The encouragements which Christ gives his church to hold fast her innocency, fidelity, and patience; the first is drawn from the shortness of her sufferings, by reason of Christ's sudden coming, behold I come quickly, that is, to deliver my faithful people, and to destroy their enemies; the second is drawn from the hazard which they run of losing the crown, for want of an unfainting perseverance, hold fast, that no man take thy crown. Where note, That only the persevering christian shall be crowned, and that each persevering christian shall have his own crown; there are probably differences of reward in heaven, as well as degrees of misery in hell; for quality the glory will be the same, they shall shine as the sun, for degree it will likely be differing as much as one star differs from another star in glory. Him that overcometh, will I make a pillar in the temple of my God, &c. Observe here, Christ promises a threefold reward to them that finally overcome all the temptations and trials of this life. 1. They shall be pillars in God's temple, that is, honourable and glorious members of the triumphant glorified church, and shall have a fixed happiness therein; possibly the Holy Ghost here alludes to the pillars in Solomon's temple, which were very beautiful. 2. They shall go no more out; the pillars in Solomon's porch were removed and carried away by the Chaldeans, but these pillars shall be perpetual, their glorious state shall be a fixed unchangeable state; when all the pillars of the earth shall tremble, these pillars in the temple of heaven shall remain immoveable to eternal ages. 3. As in pillars erected by men, their names were written and engraved, in like manner does Christ here promise the inscription of a threefold name upon these pillars, the name of God the name of the city of God, and his new name. The name of God signifies the person to be an adopted child of God; the name of the city of God, declares such a person to be a citizen of the new Jerusalem, which is said to come down out of heaven, that is, the knowledge of it comes down to us from God, else we had never known it, nor could ever have conceived of it; and Christ's new name, is that of the glorious Redeemer, and signifies him that overcometh shall be honoured as one of Christ's redeemed ones; the whole name put together, to wit, the name of God, the name of the city of God, and the new name, signifies an adopted son of God, and heir of the new Jerusalem, and a living member of Christ the glorified Redeemer; thus shall it be done to them whom Christ delighteth to honour in the new Jerusalem; they shall spend an eternity in the rapturous and ravishing admiration of that love which Father, Son, and Holy Spirit bestowed upon them, in making them first the adopted, and now the glorified sons of God. He that hath an ear, let him hear, &c. This is again the close and conclusion of this as it was before of all the epistles, in which Christ calls upon all persons to hear and consider what he saith by his Spirit to his church, and to lay it deeply to heart for their instruction and admonition. The counsel which is given by Christ to one particular church, he requires and expects should be applied to all, and improved by all.

14 And unto the angel of the church of the Laodiceans, write, These things saith the Amen, the faithful and true witness, the beginning of the creation of God: 15 I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot; I would thou wert cold or hot. 16 So then, because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spue thee out of my mouth.

This epistle to the Laodiceans is the seventh and last epistle which Christ commanded St. John at this time to write; most of the churches were found faulty before, but none like this here. Formality and hypocrisy, coldness and indifferency, in religion, had so far prevailed in this church, that we find nothing commended in them, nothing of good spoken of them, and none of them exempted from the general charge brought in against them for that lukewarmness and hypocrisy. In this epistle now before us, observe, 1. A description of Christ in his deservedly glorious titles, thus saith the Amen, the faithful and true witness, that is, he that is verity and truth itself, both in his promises and his threatenings, who is holy, and cannot lie; righteous, and cannot deceive; wise, and can never be deceived; therefore Christ takes upon him this name here of the faithful and true witness, to awaken these drowsy hypocrites, to see and consider that he knows their state and condition, and will testify and witness against them. There is no such effectual remedy against hypocrisy, lukewarmness, and indifferency, in the matters of religion, as a firm belief of Christ's omniscency and veracity. The other title given to Christ, is the beginning of the creation of God; that is the beginner of the creation of God, the original and first cause, by which all the creatures of God had their beginning. Christ is not only principium principatum, but principium principians; not the passive beginning, or he that first created, but the active beginning, or he by whom the creation was begun, both the old and new creation. Now, Christ takes upon him this title to encourage the Laodiceans to come unto him (according to the invitation given verse 18.) to recover them from their formality, seeing he is omnipotent, and can give a being and beginning to grace in the new creation, as he did to nature in the old and first creation. 2. The reproof here given to this church of Laodicea, I know thou art neither hot nor cold, thou art not for open heresy or infidelity, but likest well a profession of christianity; you receive the gospel, and so are not quite cold, but you want zeal to suffer any thing for it, and so are not at all hot, I see nothing in thee but a lukewarm indifferency, for which I disown thee, nay disdain thee. Learn 1. That Christ loaths lukewarm persons, who profess christianity with reserves for worldly safety. These Laodiceans were neither enemies to Christ, nor true friends, but served God and gain, Christ and the world by turns, as occasion served. 2. Though God abominates lukewarmness and want of zeal, yet he will not disown those who have any spark of true zeal, though defective, and culpably remiss, he will not quench smoking flax, but blow it up into a holy flame; but all that have not so much zeal as to prefer Christ before the world, shall be accounted his enemies, and disowned by him.

17 Because thou sayest, I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing; and knowest not that thou art wretched: and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked. 18 I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayest be rich; and white raiment that thou mayest be clothed, and that the shame of thy nakedness do not appear; and anoint thine eyes with eye-salve that thou mayest see.

Observe here, 1. This church's partial opinion of herself, her vanity and vain-glorious ostentation, accompanied with self-esteem. 2. That this boasting and vain glorious ostentation did very probably spring from, and was occasioned by, this church's worldly prosperity. We are apt to mistake the warm sun for God's blessing, and to apprehend when we are great, that we are gracious; and because rich in goods, conclude ourselves rich in grace: But alas! God lifts up the light of his common providence upon thousands whom he does not lift up the light of his reconciled countenance upon. 3. Christ's impartial judgment concerning this church of Laodicea, Thou sayest thou art rich, and needest nothing; but I say, thou art wretched, and miserable, &c. Behold here, how some have little or no grace, who yet conceit they have much grace; as some reckon their temporal, so there are others that value their spiritual estate, at many thousands beyond what it really is, and when upon a just balance of account, they are worth nothing. Ah miserable souls! empty and guilty, poor and penniless in spirituals, wanting every thing, but especially a sight and sense of their poverty and wants. 4. The counsel given by Christ to this church, very suitable to her condition; what pinches more than poverty? Here is gold to enrich us. What shames us more than nakedness? Here is a promise of raiment to clothe and cover us. What afflicts and grieves us more than blindness? Here is eye-salve to anoint us. But observe the order of the words, 1. Christ says not, I command thee, but I counsel thee. O infinite condescension! the Lord Jesus does not always command like a king, but sometimes counsels like a friend; he counsels us by his Spirit, he counsels us by his ministers, he counsels us by our own consciences. 2. Christ's counsel is to buy; that is, earnestly to desire, and sincerely to endeavour, the procuring such spiritual blessings as we want; we buy with our prayers, our tears, our endeavours. 3. The blessings offered, tried gold, that will bear the touch-stone, that faith and holiness which will give thee boldness in judgment. White raiment, or the merits of the Mediator, which covers our shame and nakedness ought of the sight of God. An eye-salve, or the grace of spiritual illumination, whereby we see the want and worth of these spiritual blessings.

19 As many as I love, I rebuke and chasten: Be zealous therefore and repent.

Here Christ lets the Laodiceans understand, that although he had been sharp with them, in reproving them for their formality and lukewarmness, yet it was upon a merciful design towards them, it proceeded from a principle of love in him, for as many as I love, says Christ, I rebuke and chasten. Christ does not therefore hate his children because he corrects them, but he therefore corrects them because he loves them. Name the favourite whom God loved too well to strike; nay, commonly there goes the severest exercises, where there has been the greatest love. Let not then God's chastenings of us abate our love to him; necessity compels God to correct; nothing is done by rods but what could not be effected without them: Be zealous therefore and repent; as if Christ had said, O Laodicea! lay aside thy lukewarm indifferency, and be fervent in my service, repent and amend your ways, if you would escape your chastenings and rebukes, for I had much rather give you the kisses of my lips than the blows of my hand: if then you love not correction, prevent it by zeal and reformation.

20 ¶ Behold I stand at the door and knock. If any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me.

These words are very expressive of the tender love, and gracious condescension of Christ towards poor sinners, full of heavenly rhetoric, to win and gain their hearts unto himself. Here observe, That man's heart is Christ's door, that this door of the heart is naturally shut, yea, locked and barred against Christ by ignorance and infidelity; that, notwithstanding this, Christ knocks graciously at the door of men's hearts by his word, by his rod, by his Spirit; knocking is a vehement motion, a reiterated motion, we knock again and again; a gradual motion, first more gently, then loudly; and it is a finite motion, men will not always continue knocking, but if none answer, they turn their backs and go their way. All the knocks of Christ will cease and end, his Spirit will not always strive. Father, Christ doth not only knock, but stand knocking, it denotes the assiduity of Christ in waiting upon sinners, and his patience in knocking; standing is a waiting posture, it denotes an earnest desire and patient expectation. Though Christ knocks at the door of man's heart, he doth not break it open, he doth not offer violence to men's wills, and save them against their wills, but the holy Spirit inclines them to hear Christ's voice, and enables them to open the door to him, causing them to approve of and consent to the offer and call of Christ.

The door is no sooner open, but Christ comes in and sups with the sinner; his coming in denotes our union to him; his supping, our communion with him, imperfect on earth, complete in heaven; there is a mutual, sweet, and intimate communion between Christ and believers here on earth; there will be a perfect, complete, and uninterrupted communion with him in heaven, when they shall ever be with the Lord.

21 To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne.

Here our Saviour concludes this epistle, as he did the former, with a promise to the persevering christian, to him that overcometh, namely, all the trials and temptations of this life, and keeps his faith, love, and obedience entire to the end, I will grant, not in a way of merit, but of free gift and grace, to sit down with me in my throne, namely, to partake of the same power and glory, and kingdom, that I as Mediator do now partake of. Where observe, Christ here distinguishes between his own throne and his Father's; the former seems to be his mediatorial, the latter his essential, throne; and he plainly tells us, that as he obtained his glory by overcoming Satan and the world, so must we, to him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me, &c. the way to heaven for Christ and all his members is the same; as he conquered and finally overcame on earth before he was crowned in heaven, so must they.

22 He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches.

Thus Christ shuts up this, as he did all the preceding epistles before, with a repeated exhortation to all christians to the end of the world, to hear, read, attend unto, and observe all the cautions and warnings, all the reproofs and counsels, all the promises and threatenings, contained in this and the other epistles, as matters that do greatly concern all christians to understand and know.

C H A P . I V .

AFTER this I looked, and behold, a door was opened in heaven: And the first voice which I heard was as it were of a trumpet talking with me; which said, Come up hither, and I will shew thee things which must be hereafter.

As if St. John had said, After my first vision was over, being desirous farther to understand and know the mind of God, I looked upwards to heaven, from whence divine revelations come, and it was represented to me as if a door were opened into the third heavens; and I apprehended, that I heard that former voice, which spake to me in the first chapter, now speaking to me again, namely, the voice of Christ, sounding like a trumpet in my ear, and saying, Come up hither, and I will shew thee, or give thee a clear representation of, things that shall be hereafter. Where note, 1. That such a soul as has tasted the sweetness of communion with Christ, does long for the farther and fuller enjoyment of him. After this I looked: It was a gracious vision he had of Christ in the first chapter, but it did only whet his desires after more communion with him, and clearer manifestations from him. 2. That the knowledge which advances and improves a man's understanding on earth, comes all from heaven: Thither we must look up, and from thence seek, if we will know the things of God.

2 And immediately I was in the spirit: And behold, a throne was set in heaven, and one sat on the throne. 3. And he that sat was to look upon like a jasper and a sardine stone: And there was a rainbow roundabout the throne, in sight like unto an emerald.

I was in the spirit: that is, in an ecstasy, in a trance, in a rapture of delight and joy, ravished in spirit. This vision was represented to his mind more lively than any corporeal objects could be to his outward senses, which were now all bound up. Observe here, 1. The vision itself, a throne set in heaven; St. John's mind was not taken up with earthly matters: Worldly crowns and sceptres were now poor things in his esteem, and will be so in the estimation of all others, who have a prospect of a throne in heaven, as our apostle had. 2. The person whom he saw sitting upon his throne, God the Father in royal majesty, whose power and glory was represented by the similitude of precious stones, particularly by the jasper and sardine stone; which stone, say some, being of a red and fiery colour, represented how terrible God is in judgment, clothed with omnipotent power and inflexible justice; but to allay the terror of this vision, St. John saw a rainbow round about the throne, in sight like unto an emerald: this was very comforting, for the rainbow was of old a token of God's covenant, Gen. ix. that he would never more drown the world by water; here it denotes the covenant of grace, whereby the church is secured from the deluge of God's wrath by the blood of a Mediator; and mark, this rainbow was round about the throne: let God look which way he will, here is that which reminds him of his covenant and promise; and the colour of this rainbow was like an emerald; that is, of a most pleasant and delightful greenness; signifying, that Almighty God, in mindfulness of his covenant, takes unspeakable delight and pleasure in the exercise of mercy towards his children, even then when he appears clothed with terror, to judge and sentence an impenitent world. Blessed be God, that he that sitteth upon the throne of judgment has a rainbow about him, giving full assurance, that, for his covenant sake, the floods of his wrath shall not overwhelm his children when his enemies are swept away with the deluge of destruction.

4 ¶ And round about the throne were four and twenty seats: And upon the seats I saw four and twenty elders sitting, clothed in white raiment; and they had on their heads crowns of gold.

St. John having described Almighty God as sitting upon his throne in the former verse, here he declares whom he saw about the throne as assessors with him, namely Four and twenty elders: by which some understand the patriarchs and apostles, as representatives of the Jewish and Christian church; others understand hereby the whole body of private christians, a certain number being put for an uncertain, who who are represented, 1. As round about the throne, to denote their nearness unto God, and their communion with him. 2. As sitting, to signify their state of rest and ease, and to denote their settled and secure condition of happiness which they now enjoy. 3. As clothed with white raiment, to represent their priestly dignity, that they were all priests unto God; as also their celestial purity and glory. 4. As having on their heads crowns of gold; this kingly dignity, that as kings they do, and shall reign with Christ for ever and ever, who having loved them, and washed them from their sins in his own blood, has made them kings and priests unto God. 5. They are called elders, to signify their great wisdom and experience; such as with patriarchs and apostles have done the greatest services for God on earth, shall share with him in the highest dignity and honour in heaven, sitting nearer the throne than others: St. John saw the elders not only near the throne, but sitting round about it.

5 And out of the throne proceeded lightnings, and thunderings, and voices: And there were seven lamps of fire burning before the throne, which are the seven spirits of God.

By the throne, God is represented as a Judge; by the thunderings, and lightnings, and voices, is represented the terrible-ness of God in judging sinners. As the law was delivered upon mount Sinai in lightning and thunder, so will there be the same, nay, far greater dread and terror, when God comes to judge and plead with sinners for their wilful and repeated transgressions of that law. By the seven lamps of fire burning before the throne, some understand the holy Spirit of God in its manifold gifts and graces, enlightening, quickening, warming, comforting, the church of God; others understand the holy angels, who are continually waiting upon this Judge, and attending of this judicature, who are as his eyes and feet; that is, his ready instruments to execute his pleasure. God, in the judgment of the great day will be attended by his saints as assessors, by his angels as assistants.

6 ¶ And before the throne there was a sea of glass like unto chrysal.—

By this sea of glass there seems to be an allusion to that large vessel of water in the temple, called the brazen sea, in which Aaron and his sons did wash themselves before they administered in holy things; signifying that purity which is required in all the worshippers, but especially in all the ministers of God: And because the use of this sea, in the temple, is made good in Christ, the laver of his blood might be signified by this sea of glass here represented, which is compared to chrysal; denoting the spotless innocency of his person and sufferings, and the purity and clearness of his justified members. Others, by this sea of glass, will have the world represented to St. John's visionary view: The world (say they) is compared to a sea for its instability, tempestuousness, and uncertain motion; to a sea of glass, for its slipperiness, and for its brittleness: Glass yields no good footing to any that stand upon it, nor does the world to any that stay themselves upon it; and to a sea of glass like chrysal, because of the clearness and transparency of it to God;

he sees quite through it, all the councils and actions of men being naked and open before God and the throne.

—And in the midst of the throne, and round about the throne, were four beasts full of eyes before and behind. 7 And the first beast was like a lion, and the second beast like a calf, and the third beast had a face as a man, and the fourth beast was like a flying eagle. 8 And the four beasts had each of them six wings about him; and they were full of eyes within: And they rest not day and night, saying, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come.

By the four beasts here, understand the four evangelists in special, and all gospel ministers in general, who went forth to preach the word in all the quarters of the world: And here we have a most stately emblem of true gospel-ministers, they have the courage of the lion, the strength of the ox, the loftiness of the eagle, the face, that is, the prudence and discretion of a man. Farther they are described as full of eyes; they have eyes looking before them to God for direction, looking behind them to the flocks they lead, and within them to their own hearts. They have also six wings; with two they cover their faces, manifesting their deep reverence of God, with two they cover their feet, manifesting the humble sense of their infirmities, and with two they fly with cheerful expedition to the service of God. Observe next, What was represented to St. John, as the perpetual employment and work of heaven; namely, incessantly to admire, love, and praise the holiness of God, which is the excellency of all his other excellencies. Learn hence, That the celebrating of the praises of the most high and holy God, is the incessant work of glorified saints and angels in heaven, and a very great part of the work and duty of the faithful ministers of God here on earth. 2. From this example, how much it is the duty of the ministers of Christ, to study and endeavour to make God known in all his glorious attributes, particularly in his holiness and his power; as also in his eternity and simplicity, as he is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, without variation, and shadow of changing.

9 And when those beasts give glory and honour and thanks to him that sat on the throne, who liveth for ever and ever. 10 ¶ The four and twenty elders fall down before him that sat on the throne, and worship him that liveth for ever and ever, and cast their crowns before the throne, saying, 11 Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory and honour and power: For thou hast created all things: and for thy pleasure they are, and were created.

Observe here, 1. How St. John saw both beasts and elders representing ministers and people, unitedly joining together; and with one consent sounding forth the high praises of their God; intimating, how the whole body of sincere christians ought heartily to join with their faithful ministers in that blessed work of praising and worshipping the eternal God.

God. 2. That as a farther act of homage and adoration, the four and twenty elders cast their crowns down to the ground; not in a way of contempt and disdain, as if they lighted the glory conferred upon them by God, but in a way of humble gratitude, attributing their victory and reward to God, and not to themselves, and acknowledging that whatever honour they have, they have it from God's hand, and are willing, very willing, and ready to lay it down at God's feet, and to divest themselves of it, that they may put honour upon God; professing hereby, that all the goodness wrought in them, or done by them, does proceed from God's free grace and mercy, and that the glory of it is entirely due to him. 3. The hymn of thanksgiving itself, which was jointly sung among them, Worthy art thou, O Lord, to receive glory, &c. As if they had said, That God thou art, unto whom all the homage and adoration of thy creatures are justly and peculiarly due; for thou hast created all things by thy omnipotent power, and for thy pleasure, and for the manifestation of thy glory, they are still preserved as they were at first created. Where remark, That every moment's preservation is virtually a new creation, and that the same omnipotent power is necessary every moment to preserve us, which was at first requisite to create us. Therefore worthy art thou, O Lord, to receive glory, and honour, and everlasting praises, as thou art he who givest being to all creatures, and therefore givest it them that they might love and laud, magnify and bless, glorify and serve, honour and obey thee, their great Creator, and gracious Preserver. Amen.

C H A P. V.

AND I saw in the right hand of him that sat on the throne, a book written within, and on the backside, sealed with seven seals.

In this chapter we have a continuation of the vision recorded in the former chapter: I here St. John saw a throne set in heaven, and a person sitting upon that throne in majesty and great glory, representing to him God the Father. Here he beholds the same glorious person sitting upon the throne, with a book in his right hand, written within and on the backside, sealed with seven seals. Observe here, 1. What St. John saw, namely, a book, by which Mr. Mede and others understand a roll, containing God's decrees and counsels, his purposes and resolutions, concerning the future state of the church, as they were to be fulfilled according to prophecy, and brought to pass in several ages, as the providence of God should order and see fit. 2. The person in whose hand this book of the secret counsels of God was; namely, in God's own hand, and in his right hand, thereby denoting his authority to impart and communicate the knowledge of this sealed book to whom he pleased, and as he pleased. And as none but God himself can declare who God is, so none but God himself can declare what God does, and what in after ages he will do. 3. The copious fulness of this book, it was written within and on the backside, inside and outside filled up, so that there was no room left either for addition or alteration. 4. It was a sealed book, yea, sealed with seven seals, denoting the matters that are therein contained to be most divine and excellent, secret and mysterious, certain and unalterable, and the knowledge of them impossible without the help and favour of special revelation.

2 And I saw a strong angel proclaiming with a loud voice, Who is worthy to open the book, and to loose the seals thereof? 3 And no man in heaven, nor in earth, neither under the earth, was able to open the book, neither to look thereon. 4. And I wept much because no man was found worthy to open and to read the book, neither to look thereon. 5. And one of the elders saith unto me, Weep not: Behold, the lion of the tribe of Judah, the root of David, hath prevailed to open the book, and to loose the seven seals thereof.

Observe, 1. Here is a proclamation made by an extraordinary angel, like an herald or officer, inquiring who was worthy, either in regard of authority, or in respect of ability, to open this book, and unloose the seals; that is, to disclose the secret counsels of God, and to make them known unto the sons of men; implying, that every angel in heaven is not worthy or meet to be the expounder of God's mind and mysteries unto man. 2. The great silence which there was in heaven upon this proclamation, amounting to an absolute and peremptory denial, that not any one, either in heaven or earth, or under the earth; nor angel in heaven, nor any saint living upon earth; nor any dead saint under the earth, nor any devil or infernal spirit, was either worthy to open the book, or able to foresee and foretell the least event concerning the church, farther than revealed to them. Learn hence, That neither angels nor devils do understand the mysterious counsels of God, or can reveal future things to man, any farther than as God is pleased to reveal the same unto them. Observe, 3. St. John's great and bitter lamentation, because no person was found worthy to open the book, and reveal unto the church, the secret counsels of God concerning her; I wept much; fearing, no doubt, lest the church of God should be deprived of the benefit and comfort of this relation. Such as are the true members of the church are greatly afflicted with all the providential dispensations of God which do beset her; but nothing goes so near them, as to have the mind and will of God hidden and concealed from her. 4. A seasonable consolation given to St. John; one of the elders that were about the throne said to him, Weep not, for care is taken for the opening and revealing of the book. Christ, who is called the Lion of the tribe of Judah, the Son of David, as man, and the root of David: as God, is found worthy, in regard of the dignity of his person, and the prevalence of his merits, to open unto the church all the mysteries of God, which are meet and convenient for her to understand and know. Quest. Why is Christ called the Lion of the tribe of Judah? Ans. In allusion to Jacob's blessing, Gen. xlix. where Judah is called a lion's whelp, denoting the dignity and superiority of that tribe above the rest. Now, Christ descended of this tribe, and is called a lion, in regard of his kingly power and strength, in regard of his stoutness and courage, in regard of his mildness and clemency, and true nobleness of spirit submit and yield unto him, and in respect of his vigilancy and watchfulness over his church; all which are the known properties of the lion; and as that creature is the king of beasts, so is Christ King of kings, and Lord of lords, the only potentate; dominion and fear are with him. Quest. But how could Christ be called David's root, when we know that David did not spring from him, but he from David, according to the flesh? Answer. In a natural sense, David was the root of Christ, but in a spiritual sense, Christ was the root of David. David, as man, was the root of Christ; Christ, as mediator and God-man, was the root of David. Thus he was both David's Lord, and David's son.

6 And I beheld, and lo, in the midst of the throne and of the four beasts, and in the midst of the elders stood a lamb as it had been slain, having seven horns and seven eyes, which are the seven spirits of God sent forth into all the earth. 7 And he came and took the book out of the right hand of him that sat upon the throne. 8 And when he had taken the book, the four beasts, and four and twenty elders fell down before the Lamb, having every one of them harps, and golden vials full of odours, which are the prayers of saints. 9 ¶ And they sung a new song, saying, Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof: for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation; 10 And hast made us unto our God kings and priests: and we shall reign on the earth.

Observe here, 1. That St. John had a vision of Christ in the former verse, under the representation of a lion: Here he is represented under the form and figure of a lamb, as wounded, bloody, sacrificed, and slain; as bearing upon him the signs and scars, the marks and tokens of his by-past death: his appearing as a lamb slain, denoted his death; his standing, denoted his resurrection. There stood a lamb as it had been slain, it is added having seven horns the strength of a beast lying in its horns; this expression of seven horns denotes, that omnipotent power which Christ has in himself, and that fulness of power which he does exert, and put forth on all occasions in defence of his church. It follows, and seven eyes, which are the seven spirits of God; these represent the holy Spirit of God in its manifold graces given by Christ unto the church, as his agent and advocate upon earth; so that here in the text and context are all the three persons in the holy Trinity, whose divinity we believe, and in whom we trust; God the Father upon the throne, with a book in his hand; Christ the Lamb in the midst of the throne opening the book; and the seven spirits, or Holy Ghost, distinct from the two former. 2. The office, which Christ, as Mediator God-man, performs; he goes to the throne, and takes the book out of the Father's hand; that is, he received power from God to open the book of mysteries, and to execute them: Christ sat upon the throne as God, but went to the throne for the book, as God-man; this power was due unto him as the reward of his sufferings. 3. The joyful acclamations accompanied with the profoundest adorations, which were deservedly given by the holy inhabitants of heaven to Jesus Christ, as the only person worthy to take the book, and open the seals. Note here, Divine worship given to Christ the Lamb, which proves his deity; they sing an hymn of divine praise to the blessed Redeemer, with harps, and golden vials in their hands, a new song; that is, a most excellent song, setting forth the benefits, and extolling the praises of the Lord the Redeemer. Observe, 4. The church's celebration of those benefits and blessings, which by the death of Christ she had received, namely, 1. They were redeemed unto God out of every kindred and tongue, people and nation; which shews the universal extent of the gospel-church scattered over the face of the whole earth, in and among all the nations of the world. 2. They were by him made kings and priests unto God, to reign on earth; that is, spiritual kings and priests unto God, to reign over sin, Satan, and the world, trampling their spiritual enemies under their feet, not expecting an earthly dominion.

11 And I beheld, and I heard the voice of many angels round about the throne, and the beasts, and the elders: and the number of them was ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands; 12 Saying with a loud voice, Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honour, and glory, and blessing. 13 And every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I, saying, blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever. 14 And the four beasts said, Amen. And the four and twenty elders fell down and worshipped him that liveth for ever and ever.

Observe here, 1. The office of the holy angels in heaven declared, they stand round about the throne of God continually, as nobles, and chief ministers of state attend upon a prince, awaiting his pleasure, and expecting his commands. 2. The numberless number of them, Thousands of thousands, and ten thousand times ten thousand; and as almighty God is attended by an innumerable company of angels in heaven, so do the holy angels stand ready to accompany and protect his people here on earth, Psal. xxxiv. 7. They encamp round about them. 3. How readily and cheerfully the holy angels joined with the elders, in blessing and praising Christ, for the invaluable fruits and benefits of man's redemption; those beneficent spirits rejoice in our happiness; they joy at the conversion of a sinner, and triumph at the glorification of a saint. Here they are said to sing with a loud voice, to shew their affection and zeal in the work of blessing and praising God for Jesus Christ, who is an head of confirmation to them as he was an head of redemption unto us. 4. How the angels give the same worship, pay the same homage, ascribe the same honour to Christ, which they do to God the Father; this had never been given, had he not been essentially God: The angels pronounce and proclaim Jesus Christ worthy of of omnipotent power ; and that honour, glory, and blessing, do appertain to him for evermore. Lastly, That not only all the angels, but all the creatures in heaven, in earth, under the earth, and in the sea, all and every of them, do worship Christ with religious worship, and pay him divine honour ; adore him that sits on the throne, and the Lamb for ever and ever, that is, the rational part of the world, to wit, angels and men, actively : The sensitive part of the world, objectively : The diabolical part, passively : Christ extorts that glory from them by their torments, which they refuse to give unto him by confessions, and voluntary acknowledgments. What greater argument than this can we desire for our satisfaction, that Christ is truly and essentially God ? He thinks it no robbery to be equal with God, to share with him in all that honour and homage, in all that adoration and religious worship which the whole creation do pay to almighty God ; for thus do the angels and elders above, and the whole church militant here below, chaunt forth the praises of the Creator and Redeemer, saying,

*Blessing, and glory, and renown,
We now give altogether,
To him that on the throne sits down,
And to the Lamb for ever.*

Amen, Hallelujah.

C H A P. VI.

AND I saw when the Lamb opened one of the seals, and I heard as it were the noise of thunder, one of the four beasts saying, Come, and see. 2 And I saw, and behold a white horse : and he that sat on him had a bow ; and a crown was given unto him : and he went forth conquering, and to conquer.

The former chapter acquainted us with Christ's receiving of the sealed book ; this, with the opening of it seal by seal, Christ's reveals unto St. John the deep counsels of God, which were hidden and secret : the only begotten Son that lay in the bosom of the Father he hath revealed them, he only received authority, and he only was endued with ability to reveal them. Note, 1. The preparation made for St. John's vision of the seals ; he standing afar off with profound reverence, heard a voice like thunder proceeding out of the mouth of one of the four beasts, who performed the office of a public crier, saying, Come, and see. It is dangerous searching into God's secrets, and prying into his hidden counsels, until we have a call and commission, a command and invitation, from God himself so to do ; thus had St. John here ; one said unto him, Come near, and see. Note, 2. The vision itself, I beheld a white horse, and he that sat on him had a bow and a crown, &c. By the white horse is generally understood the gospel, so called in regard of the divinity and spotless purity of its doctrine : the rider upon this horse is Christ, who rode swiftly in the ministry of the apostles and other faithful teachers in the first ages of christianity ; and he rode with a bow in his hand, and a crown on his head : with a bow, that is with threatenings and terrors denounced against his enemies before they were inflicted upon them, as the bow is first held in the hand, then the arrow prepared upon the string, and at last shot forth : and with a crown, denoting that royal state of kingly dignity and honour, to which Christ the Lamb that was slain was now exalted, and thus he rode on conquering and to conquer, until he had consummated his victories in a glorious triumph over his enemies, namely, in the conversion of some, and destruction of others ; thus the opening of the first seal gave the church a very encouraging and comfortable prospect of the victories, successes, and triumphs of Christ, notwithstanding the rage, subtlety, and power of all his enemies : Christ rode on with a bow in his hand, and with a crown on his head, conquering and to conquer, until his arrows were sharp in the hearts of his crucifiers ; and will thus ride on till the people fall under him, and all his enemies become his footstool.

3 And when he had opened the second seal, I heard the second beast say, Come, and see. 4. And there went out another horse that was red : and power was given to him that sat thereon, to take peace from the earth, and that they should kill one another : and there was given unto him a great sword.

The second seal opened did represent to St. John's visionary view, a red horse, of a bloody colour, denoting first the dreadful execution of God's wrath upon the Jews, embroiling the land with wars, divisions, bloodshed, unpeaceable tumults, killing and ruining one another, to which purpose he apprehended that he saw a sword in his hand that rode upon this horse, signifying the great slaughter which would be committed by the Jews upon one another. Others, secondly, by this red horse understand the bloody Roman emperors, Nero, Trajan, &c. and the persecution which the primitive church underwent in their days : Eusebius relates, that so fierce was their rage against the poor christians, that a man might see cities full of dead bodies, old and young, men and women, cast out naked, without any reverence of persons, or regard to sex. From hence we may learn, What little reason the christian church has to think strange of the fiery trial, as if some strange things happened to them ; when as we see all the rage and cruelty, all the blood and violence, which the christian church has fallen under in the several ages of it, have been from the beginning revealed and prophetically foretold.

5 And when he had opened the third seal, I heard the third beast say, Come, and see. And I beheld, and lo, a black horse ; and he that sat on him had a pair of balances in his hand. 6 And I heard a voice in the midst of the four beasts say, A measure of wheat for a penny, and three measures of barley for a penny ; and see thou hurt not the oil and the wine.

The third seal opened, sets forth the great calamity which should befall the church by famine, which some understand literally, others figuratively and mystically. 1. A literal famine in Judæa, seems here to be prefigured by a person riding on a black horse with a balance to weigh food in his hand ; famine discolours the face of men, and makes them look black, sad, and dismal ; accordingly it is represented by a black horse ; and the rider having a pair of scales in his hand to weigh corn by the pound, and not to measure it by the bushel, imports the great scarcity that there there should be of bread ; and St. John heard a voice saying, A measure of wheat for a penny, and three measures of barley for a penny. The Roman penny was the ordinary wages for a days work to a labourer, so that the quantity of bread was but sufficient to keep persons alive for one day. Famine is a very sore and terrible judgment, it consumes a people by piece-meal ; other judgments cut off suddenly, but this is a lingering and languishing death : Lord ! help us in the midst of our fulness, when we eat the fat, and drink the sweet, to remember how righteously thou mayest cut us short of our abused mercies ; how is it that we have not long ago sinned away our plenty, who have so often sinned with our plenty ? 2. Others understand the famine here represented by the black horse, to be meant of a spiritual famine, a scarcity of the word of God, which fell out in the time of the ten persecutions, when the storm fell upon the bishops, and most useful ministers in the church, when many bright and burning lamps were extinguished, others hid under a bushel : a dismal gloomy day, when the church of God did eat her spiritual bread by weight, when all the spiritual food men could get to keep their souls alive from day to day could be but sufficient for that end.

7 And when he had opened the fourth seal, I heard the voice of the fourth beast say, Come, and see. 8 And I looked, and behold, a pale horse : and his name that sat on him was death, and hell followed with him. And power was given unto them over the fourth part of the earth, to kill with sword, and with hunger, and with death, and with the beasts of the earth.

The fourth seal opened represents a pale horse (pestilence) with death riding upon it ; and hell, that is, the grave following it, denoting, say some, all the calamities of sword, pestilence, and famine, which Christ (St. Mark xiii.) foretold should come upon the Jews, and cause an universal devastation of their city and nation, and as universal a destruction of their persons. Note here, 1. How death is represented as sitting upon a pale horse ; by a horse, for his strength, there is no resisting of him ; for his swiftness, it is always posting towards us ; for his office and use, which is to cut off and carry away ; and by a pale horse for its ghastliness. Death has a grim and ghastly countenance, that strikes terror into all hearts, and paleness into all faces. 2. As terrible as death was, it must and did receive power before it could destroy and kill ; I beheld a pale horse, &c. Learn thence, That all the executioners of God's wrath and vengeance, sword, pestilence, and famine, death of all kinds, do act by commission, yea, they all come forth with limited commission ; power was given to them : others conceive that by this pale horse the persecution of the primitive church was represented under the Pagan emperors, who made her face look pale like death, by the loss of a vast quantity of blood and spirits, when the church was mowed down like a meadow, and sprang as fall.

9 And when he had opened the fifth seal, I saw under the alter the souls of them that were slain for the word of God, and for the testimony which they held. 10 And they cried with a loud voice, saying,

How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth ? 11 And white robes were given unto every one of them ; and it was said unto them that they should rest yet for a little season, until their fellow-servants also, and their brethren, that should be killed as they were, should be fulfilled.

Here we have the fifth seal opened, under which Christ represents to St. John the condition of those precious souls of the holy martyrs who died for the testimony of Christ, by the bloody hands of tyrants ; the design whereof is to support and encourage all that were to come after in the same bloody path. Observe here, 1. The vision which St. John saw, namely, the souls of the martyrs ; but how could they be seen ? Ans. Not by the external senses, being immaterial substances, but in spirit they were seen by him ; he had a spiritual representation of them made to his mind. Observe, 2. The place where he saw them, under the alter ; that is, lying at the foot of the alter, as sacrifices slain and presented unto God. Where note, That however men look upon the death of the martyrs, yet in God's account they die as sacrifices : and their blood is no other than a drink offering poured out to God, which he highly prizeth, and graciously excepteth. Observe, 3. The cause of their sufferings and death described, it was for the word of God, and for the testimony which they held ; as one of the martyrs in the Marian days held up his Bible at the stake, saying, " This is that hath brought me hither." They die not as malefactors, but as martyrs, giving a three-fold testimony of the truth, a lip testimony, a life testimony, and a death or bloody testimony : they held the profession of their faith faster than they held their own lives. 4. What St. John heard, a loud cry, saying, How long ? Not, 1. That souls can speak audibly to the ears of men ; nor, 2. That they have any sense of sufferings when they are in glory, it doth not imply that souls there are in a restless state, or that they want true satisfaction and repose, when they are out of the body ; much less, 3. Doth this cry suppose, that they carried with them to heaven any angry resentment, or revengeful dispositions towards their murderers ; but this cry supposes in them a vehement zeal for the glory of God, a flagrant desire that God would clear their innocency, and make known his justice among men, that he would abolish the kingdom of Satan, and consummate the kingdom of Christ, making all his enemies to become his footstool ; so that they pray for what Christ waits in glory, Heb. x. 13. All the revenge here desired was only a vindication of God's holiness and truth, which he himself had promised. Observe, 5. The gracious answer which God gave to the cry of these gracious souls, in which he speaks satisfaction to them these two ways, 1. By somewhat given them for the present, 2. By somewhat promised them hereafter ; first, white robes were given at present to every one of them, that is, large measures of heavenly glory, as the reward of their sufferings and services, beyond other saints ; as if God had said, " Though the time be not yet come to satisfy your desires in the final ruin of Satan's kingdom, yet it shall be well with you in the mean time, you shall walk with me in white, and enjoy my glory in heaven." Secondly, That is not all, but the

the very things they cry for shall be given them after a little season, for God had more to call unto sufferings besides them, and they having conquered shall be crowned together; as if God had said, "You my faithful witnesses, wait a little while till your brethren be got through the Red-sea of sufferings as well as you, and then you shall see the feet of Christ upon the necks of all his enemies, and justice shall fully avenge the precious innocent blood of all the saints, which in all ages has been shed for the testimony of the gospel, from Abel the martyr to the last sufferer. Now from the whole learn these lessons of instruction: Learn, 1. That the souls of men perish not with their bodies, but do certainly outlive them, and subsist in a state of separation from them; the bodies of those martyrs were destroyed by divers sorts of torments, but their souls were out of the reach of danger, they were in safety under the altar, and in glory, clothed with their white robes, when their bodies were either turned to ashes, or torn in pieces by wild beasts; we shall not cease to be, when we cease to breathe; our souls do not vanish with our breath. 2. That as the soul is alive in a state of separation from the body, so is it awake also, and doth not sleep with the body. Mark, These souls cried with a loud voice, then they were not asleep, though their bodies were asleep in the dust: the opinion of the soul's sleeping with the body till the resurrection, is a wicked dream; it is granted that the organical acts of the soul, that is, such acts as do depend upon the members of the body, must cease when the body ceases; but we find, when we are asleep, that our soul can act of itself, without the assistance of the body; the soul grieves and rejoices, hopes and fears; chuses and refuses, therefore the soul is not only alive, but awake also in its state of separation from the body. 3. That there are not only praises, but prayers in heaven, and that for justice to be inflicted upon persecutors here on earth. O the miserable condition of bloody persecutors! when heaven and earth both pray against them. 4. That there is no sin committed upon earth, which doth more loudly call for vengeance from God in heaven, and which he will more certainly and severely punish, than persecuting and wronging of his saints and servants. 5. That one reason why the suffering servants of God are not presently delivered from their persecutions is this, because more of their brethren must suffer besides them, before their persecutions are ripe and ready for signal vengeance. Lastly, That the souls of God's martyrs shall be under the altar in heaven clothed in white, enjoying divine glory, before the fatal day of final vengeance come upon the persecuting world; for though the patience of God suffers long, yet the holiness of God cannot permit that innocency should always suffer, and violence with persecution go unpunished, but in the mean time they shall put on their crown and their robes.

12 And I beheld when he had opened the sixth seal, and lo; there was a great earthquake: and the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the moon became as blood. 13 And the stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs when she is shaken with a mighty wind. 14 And the heaven departed as a scroll when it is rolled together; and every mountain and island were moved out of their places.

A threefold interpretation is given relating to this sixth seal, of the opening of it. 1. Some apply it altogether to the Jews, and that their destruction in Judea and at Jerusalem was so dismal, that it was represented to St. John as the darkening of the sun, and the moon looking like blood; and the stars falling, such calamities impending as if heaven and earth were dissolving; doubtless at and before the destruction of Jerusalem there was a confluence of such calamities, so dismal, and so dreadful, as can very difficultly be represented or described. 2. Others apply it to the overthrow of Paganism, and the destruction of the Heathen emperors; the fall of Paganism, by means of Constantine's conversion to the christian faith, was the most terrible judgment that ever fell upon the devil's kingdom; and accordingly, by the earth quaking, the sun's becoming black, the moon's becoming blood, and the stars falling from heaven to earth, is to be understood the great changes that were made in the Roman empire, by overturning the whole Pagan state, and making christianity the religion of the greatest part of the world; so that the sense of the foregoing expression is metaphorical, and signifies a great and general alteration of the face of affairs, as if the world was to be another thing. But, 3. There are that interpret all this of the great and horrible confusion of the christian world under antichrist, when Christ the Sun of righteousness began to be obscured, that is, his doctrine concerning his offices and benefits darkened; the moon or church turned into blood, the stars or pastors fallen from heavenly offices, the Scriptures, like the heavens rolled up, forbidden to be read; the mountains, kings and princes in jeopardy, and the islands brought under antichrist's yoke and tyranny. Lastly, Some apply all this to the last dissolution of the world, and the final judgment at the great day, according to what follows in the three next verses.

15 And the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bondman, and every freeman, hid themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains; 16 And said to the mountains and rocks, Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb; 17 For the great day of his wrath is come; and who shall be able to stand?

Observe here, That if this was meant of the ruin of the Jews at the destruction of Jerusalem, it was exceeding dreadful, and bespoke all sorts of men, from the highest to the lowest, to be under a most dreadful consternation, when they saw an inevitable vengeance coming upon them for crucifying Christ, and persecuting his members, which made them run into rocks, and call upon mountains to hide them: If it be applied to the judgment of the great day, it shews the justice of Christ in forcing those to call upon the mountains to hide them, who by persecution had driven his members to hide themselves in mountains, dens, and caves of the earth: Any sort of hope of deliverance would be then welcome; but alas! all help will fail, and all hope will be then in vain; neither greatness nor numbers will save any from misery and terror, when that day of vengeance is come. Learn, That wicked men, how numerous, how powerful and strong soever, shall fall before the wrath and indignation of Christ; if when Christ appears like an angry lamb, the greatest in the world fall before him, what will they then do, when Christ shall put on the fierceness and severity of a roaring lion! If the wrath of the Lamb cannot be borne; if the unbelieving kings and potentates of the earth shall be cast down at the sight of Christ, where shall the wicked and the sinner appear? If the wrath of a king be as the roaring of a lion, what will be the wrath of God, an angry God be? Let us now be cast down at the sight of sin, and we shall not be cast down hereafter at the sight of God: but when others, at his appearance, cry to the rocks to cover them, and to the mountains to fall upon them, such as have seen sin to their abatement and humiliation, shall see a Saviour to their joyful satisfaction, and spend an eternity in the rapturous contemplation and ravishing fruition of him. Amen.

C H A P. VII.

AND after these things I saw four angels standing on the four corners of the earth, holding the four winds of the earth, that the winds should not blow on the earth, nor on the sea, nor on any tree.

Observe, 1. That if a temporal judgment of the Jews be here intended, then this vision represented to St. John God's decree and purpose for suspending the dreadful execution of the threatened and intended vengeance upon Judea for a time, namely, until God had sealed his murder, that is, marked them for preservation, according to Ezek. ix. 4 Set a mark upon the foreheads of the men, &c. that is, preserve the penitent believers from the common destruction, as the Israelites were preserved in Egypt from the destroying angel. I beheld four angels that had power to inflict judgments, famine, sword, and pestilence, foretold chap. vi. upon Judea, I beheld these angels making a stay and stop, before they would suffer those mischiefs to break forth upon the earth. Where note, That the office of the holy angels in heaven is at God's command, and by God's direction, to execute vengeance, and to inflict all temporal judgments upon obstinate sinners here on earth; yet glad they are, when it pleases God to stay and stop them from a speedy execution of his wrath and vengeance: for as judgment is God's strange work, in which he does not delight, so neither is it pleasing to the angels as an act of punishment, but only in obedience to the command of God, and with an eye and respect to the glory of God. Observe 2. That if a spiritual judgment be here intended, as others apprehend, namely, the calamities befalling the church by reason of an apostacy under antichrist; then by the winds they understand heresies, and false doctrines of all sorts, which have an impetuous force and violence, like winds, to drive unstable souls from their steadfastness in the truths of God, into damnable errors. Now, God takes special care that these winds should not blow, these antichristian errors and false doctrines should not overflow the earth, until he had sealed his people, that is, secured them from that danger, preserving them from spiritual desolation, as the undoubted fruit of their sealing; where we see, that in all times of public calamity, be it temporal or spiritual, God has a special care of his own, and bears a special regard unto his own; here he commands the angels to hold the winds from smiting the earth, until the number of his sealed ones was completed.

2 And I saw another angel ascending from the east, having the seal of the living God. And he cried with a loud voice to the four angels to whom it was given to hurt the earth and the sea. 3 Saying, Hurt not the earth, neither the sea, nor the trees, till we have sealed the servants of our God in their foreheads.

Observe here, 1. The special and distinguishing care which God took of his church and faithful people before he suffered the approaching storm to come upon the world: he did by another angel cry to the four angels that were ready, as God's executioners to hurt the earth, that they should hurt nothing until the servants of God were sealed in their foreheads; and his crying with a loud voice intimates his great care to preserve his faithful ones. Quest. What was this sealing? Ans. Some understand it of an external visible sealing, by sitting a mark upon their foreheads for preservation, according to Ezek. ix. 4. the letter Tau; doubtless there was some notification made by almighty God to the destroying angels, of every one whom he would have preserved. Others do understand this seal to be internal, by sanctification; and from thence we may gather, that inward holiness is the best guard against temporal or spiritual judgments. But take this sealing in either sense, either for an outward or inward sealing, the notion doth imply, 1. That the persons sealed are of precious and excellent esteem with God. 2. It imports preservation, and security from danger; God sealeth his people, that the destruction coming upon others may escape them; thus here God's servants were sealed, that they might be preserved; that they are kept either from sin and error, or from judgment and danger, is not from themselves, but from God's care and love towards them in the sealing of them.

4 ¶ And I heard the number of them which were sealed; and there were sealed an hundred and forty and four thousand of all the tribes of the children of Israel. 5 Of the tribe of Judah were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Reuben were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Gad were sealed twelve thousand. 6 Of the tribe of Aser were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Nephthalim were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Manasseh were sealed twelve thousand, 7 Of the tribe of Simeon were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Levi were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Issachar were sealed twelve thousand. 8 Of the tribe of Zabulon were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Joseph were sealed twelve thousand. Of the tribe of Benjamin were sealed twelve thousand.

Observe here, 1. That the true church is represented in this book by the name of the Jews, and the false church by the Gentiles : so that by the tribes of the children of Israel is to be understood the whole universal church of sincere and serious christians, all that profess and practise the faith of Abraham, and so are his spiritual seed. 2. That these hundred forty and four thousand are particularly mentioned, chap. xiv. 1. as the pure virgin church distinguished from the adulterers ; this number then comprehends all such as during antichrist's tyranny should be kept from his delusions, of whatsoever nation they be ; all that adhere to Christ against antichrist are sealed, to preserve them from that defect where in others would be involved. 3. The great care which almighty God takes in a time of general apostasy, to preserve a number in all his churches from that fatal mischief that the catholic church may not fail : God has a number sealed ; and such as are sealed shall be preserved. 4. That though the number of God's sealed ones be great in itself, 144,000, yet how small is it in comparison of the not sealed. 5. That as God had a number out of all the tribes of Israel, so doth he gather to himself a people out of all nations, ranks, and conditions of men, in and throughout the whole world. 6. That the tribe of Dan is here left out ; the reasons assigned for it are various ; because, say some, antichrist was to come of that tribe : but it doth not any where appear, that ever almighty God punished a people before they committed a sin : others with more reason conceive it was the great idolatry which this tribe fell into and continued in until the captivity, see Judg. xviii. 30. and Amos viii. 14. yet we must not suppose that none of this tribe were saved, because here not mentioned ; for we find Samson of this tribe, and reckoned among those worthies, whose names are recorded, Heb. xi. By faith Samson. 7. That Levi, or the Levites, who had no inheritance in the earthly Canaan, but were dispersed and scattered throughout all the tribes that they might teach the people the law of the Lord, and so could not be numbered there ; yet, says the learned and pious Dr. Hammond, in Christ their portion was as good as the rest, and therefore were not omitted here. Behold here a consideration which administers much comfort to us the ministers of the gospel, though many of us have no earthly possessions, and some cut short of outward comforts, yet our title to the heavenly inheritance is good, and we shall not miss of it as the reward of our faithfulness. Lastly, That although Levi had the charge of all the tribes, and had the peculiar favour above all the rest to stand before God, and administer to him in holy things, yet no more are sealed of this than of the other tribes ; all were teachers, but all were not sealed ; all are not saved that are of the holy calling, and who may be instrumental to save others.

9 ¶ After this I beheld, and lo, a great multitude, which no man could number of all nations and kindred of people, and tongues, stood before the throne, and before the Lamb clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands : 10 And cried with a loud voice, saying, Salvation to our God which sitteth upon the throne and unto the Lamb. 11 And all the angels stood round about the throne, and about the elders and the four beasts, and fell before the throne on their faces, and worshipped God, 12 Saying,

Amen : Blessing, and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and honour, and power, and might be unto our God for ever and ever. Amen.

St. John having had in the former verses a visionary view of the church militant, under the denomination of sealed ones, in these verses a prospect is given him of the church triumphant in heaven ; a most magnificent description of which we have here before us. Where note, 1. The triumphant church above, is described by its multitude ; according to the promise made to Christ, of bringing many sons into glory. 2. They are described by their variety ; some out of every nation, tribe, people, and language, according to that of our Saviour, Matth. viii. 11. They shall come from the east, &c. 3. They are described by their posture, they stand before the throne, and before the Lamb, as servants attending upon their Lord, a most happy station, as such accounted by them ; not that they stand perpetually gazing upon God, and doing nothing else ; but they express their love unto him, by attending upon him, to execute his command. 4. They are described by their habit, they are clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands ; white garments import their dignity, their purity, their joy. The saints dignity in heaven is great, they are kings and priests unto God ; their purity great, being purified as he is pure ; their joy great, being entered into the joy of their Lord, this joy being too great to enter into them. Farther, How these glorified saints do ascribe all their glory, happiness, and salvation to Christ, and nothing to themselves, Salvation to our God who sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb. Sancti quasi sanguine tincti, say some ; " Many of these saints were martyrs that shed their blood for Christ." But mark, Their garments were made white not in their own blood, but in the blood of the Lamb. Again, They are described with palms in their hands, as well as clothed in white. Now, this denotes their victory, and the rewards of their victory. Palms were amongst the Romans ensigns of victory. All the saints enter heaven with palms in their hands, having conquered sin, Satan, and the world, and the whole host of spiritual enemies. Observe next, How the holy angels in heaven do join with these saints and martyrs in worshipping God, and adoring the Lamb, verse 11, And all the angels stood round about the throne, &c. concurring with the church in their congratulations, adding their Amen to what the palm-bearers had said, and much more of their own, ascribing Blessing, and glory, and wisdom, &c. Note, How the triumphant church is made up of an innumerable company of angels, as well as saints, as part of the church of the first-born. (Angeli etiam Sancti etiam debent Christo mediatori, says one.) And St. Paul, Eph. i. 10. says, That in the dispensation of the fulness of time it might gather together in one, all things in Christ, &c. Whence it appears, that though angels sinned not, yet Christ gathered them and us into one society, and is an head both to them and us.

13 And one of the elders answered, saying unto me, What are these which are arrayed in white robes? and whence came they? 14 ¶ And I said unto him, Sir, thou knowest. And he said unto me, These are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. 15 Therefore are they before the throne of God, and serve him day and night in his temple: and he that sitteth on the throne shall dwell among them.

As if St. John had said, One of the elders, not out of ignorance as to himself, but out of desire to inform me, asked me, Whether I knew what these were that stood arrayed in white? And I told him, I did not know, but desired him to inform me. He replied they were such as had suffered great tribulation for Christ, and were now accepted of him, and dignified by him; not for their own worthiness, but for the sake of his sufferings. Note here, 1. The present state and condition of the church of God, and members of Christ in this world, they are in tribulation, yea, in great tribulation here; as long as there is a devil in hell, and wicked men upon earth, all that will live godly in Christ Jesus must suffer tribulation. 2. The future state which they shall be advanced to, they shall come out of great tribulation; the saints tharp sufferings shall have a joyful issue and glorious end. 3. That though the cross was the way to the crown, yet the cross did not merit the crown: their sufferings would not, could not, bring them to heaven, without having their souls washed in the blood of the Lamb, much less could their sufferings merit and purchase heaven; but it pleased God of his free grace thus to reward their sufferings. They were washed in the blood of the Lamb, whose blood paid the price of their salvation. 4. The description which is here given of heaven; it is called a temple, in allusion to the Jewish temple, in which God dwelt of old; as God by his gracious presence dwelt in his temple on earth, so by his glorious presence he dwells among his glorified saints in his temple in heaven; and accordingly the glorified saints in heaven do temple-service, they worship God continually, and serve him day and night. In allusion this is probably spoken to the priests standing in the material temple; and serving in their courses night and day, Psal. cxxxiv. 1. Heaven is a place of employment and service, as well as of pleasure and joy; and the greatest joy results from the greatest service.

16 They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat. 17 For the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them into living fountains of waters: And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes.

Here St. John proceeds in giving a farther description of the place and state of the blessed; he acquaints us both with the private evils they shall be everlastingly delivered from, as also with the positive good they shall eternally rest in. As to the former he assures us, that glorified souls shall be acquainted with no wants, and exposed to no afflictive providences. They shall neither hunger nor thirst; that is, they shall be in a condition free from all, and all manner of wants whatsoever. Neither shall the sun, nor the heat light upon them; that is, the scorching heat of persecution, to which they were exposed here, shall never more affect or afflict them there. And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; that is, all cause of sorrow and mourning shall everlastingly cease. Farther, he acquaints us with the positive good which glorified saints do eternally rest in, the Lamb in the midst of the throne shall feed them; that is, Christ shall satisfy them with a satiety of joy, and fulness of pleasure: And lead them to the living fountains of water, that is, to the never failing comforts of God's presence. O happy place and state! which will at once cause the saints to forget all former sorrows for time past, and happily prevent any farther cause of affliction and sorrow for time to come; where no sin shall afflict them, no sorrow affect them, no danger affright them, where all tears shall be wiped from their eyes, all sorrows banished from their hearts, and everlasting joys shall possess their souls: Where they shall obey their God with vigour, praise him with cheerfulness, love him above measure, fear him without torment, trust him without despondency, serve him without lassitude and weariness, without interruption or distraction, being perfectly like unto God, as well in holiness as in happiness; as well in purity as in immortality. Lord, strengthen our faith in the belief of this desirable happiness, and set our souls a longing for the full fruition and final enjoyment of it.

C H A P. VIII.

AND when he had opened the seventh seal, there was silence in heaven about the space of half an hour.

When he had opened, that is, when the Lamb, who opened the six foregoing seals, did open the seventh, there was silence in heaven about half an hour, by way of allusion to what was done in the temple at the time of offering incense. The end of which silence was to give St. John an opportunity to contemplate those high mysteries which he had revealed to him, and to prepare him for new visions, as silence is cried before the proclamation of great and weighty matters. When great things are to be uttered, great attention is expected, and great silence prepares for great attention.

2 ¶ And I saw the seven angels which stood before God: and to them were given seven trumpets.

Observe here, 1. The readiness of the holy angels to execute the will of God at all times: They stand before God, namely, to minister at his pleasure, and to execute judgments at his command: Whether these were good angels or bad, it is not material to dispute, seeing God makes both the executioners of his judgments when he pleases. 2. The number of these angels, they were seven, and no more, because it pleased not God to pour down his whole wrath at once upon the rebellious world, but at divers times, and gradually. 3. That to these seven angels were given seven trumpets to publish God's judgment to the world. These trumpets signified that God would proceed against the world in fearful hostility, and appear against it as an enemy to battle, proclaiming as it were open war, with sound of trumpet, and beat of drum, and hanging out a flag of defiance against it. The patience of God, though lasting, yet will not be everlasting. These angels sounding the alarm of judgments before they did inflict these following dreadful judgments upon the world, shews that God warns before he strikes: He doth usually pre-admonish before he punisheth.

Judgment

Judgment is his strange work, he delights not in it. But when sin call upon him to arise out of his place, to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity, he doth it with unspeakable reluctance and regret like a tender-hearted Father, with a rod in his hand, and tears in his eyes.

3 ¶ And another angel came and stood at the altar, having a golden censer: And there was given unto him much incense, that he should offer it with the prayers of all saints upon the golden altar which was before the throne. 4. And the smoke of the incense, which came with the prayers of the saints, ascended up before God, out of the angels hand. 5. And the angel took the censer, and filled it with the fire of the altar, and cast it into the earth, and there were voices, and thundrings, and lightnings, and an earthquake.

Observe here, That all along in the visions which St. John had, a presentation was made to his mind of things pertaining to the Jewish worship; his visionary temple, the altar, the incense, the fire, the censer, which he saw, were in allusion to the material temple, and to the worship and service performed there at Jerusalem; and accordingly this other angel here mentioned, represented the high priest (who was an illustrious type of our Lord Jesus Christ) whose office it was to offer incense at the altar, and therewith to offer up prayers for the people. Farther, that Christ is here represented as having a golden censer, whereas, the high priest's was only of brass, to denote that he was a more excellent high priest; and the much incense given to him, represents his abundant merits, whereby he renders the prayers of all his saints acceptable to his Father. Learn, That as Christ was the only Mediator of redemption, so is he also the only Mediator of intercession; his mediation is founded upon his satisfaction: None had to do with the censer to offer incense, but he that had to do with the altar to offer sacrifice: Who durst offer to intercede with an offended God on the behalf of sinners, but he that has first satisfied the justice of God for sin? Now, to satisfy an offended God is Christ's peculiar, therefore to intercede with God authoratively, on the behalf of offenders, is Christ's sole prerogative. Again, Christ's intercession gives virtue and effect to our supplications. This truth was signified, ver. 4. where it is affirmed, That the smoke of the incense, &c. that is, the virtue and efficacy of the Mediator's merits, which came up with the prayers of the saints, and perfumed them, did both plead for, and procure acceptance with God. Behold here the true reason why our supplications do find acceptance with God; namely, because perfumed with the odours of Christ's merit, and presented to the Father by his own mediation and intercession. The Father heareth him always, and so he doth all them whose prayers are offered by him. Lastly, The success and efficacy of the saints prayers thus perfumed and presented unto God; there followed voices, and thunders, and lightnings, signifying the wonderful effects of prayer, or the terrible things that would follow after their prayers, even dreadful judgments upon the earth; that is, upon the land of Judea, say some; upon the Roman empire say others. However it was, we may gather thus much from it, that in times of national provocation, the fervent prayers of God's faithful servants have a mighty prevalency with God, for staying off for a time national ruin and destruction.

6 ¶ And the seven angels which had the seven trumpets prepared themselves to sound. 7 The first angel sounded, and there followed hail and fire mingled with blood, and they were cast upon the earth: And the third part of trees were burned up, and all green grass was burnt up.

Note, 1. The readiness of the holy angels in heaven to execute the will and pleasure of God here on earth; they knew that the execution of God's judgments was to be performed by them, and accordingly they prepare themselves for it. 2. The judgments denounced by the first angel, Fire and hail mingled with blood. A strange storm, alluding probably to one of the plagues of Egypt, mentioned Exod. ix. denoting, say some, direful temporal judgments which God would bring upon Judea in general, and Galilee in particular, by bloodshed and insurrections. The trees, says Dr. Moore, signify the great men and the grass the common people. Others by this storm of hail and blood understand a spiritual judgment, namely, an inundation of heresy upon the christian church, which is of a fiery and bloody nature wherever it prevails, it is a dreadful plague, and a consuming storm; justly inflicted by God upon a people for their contempt of the gospel, and not receiving the truth in the love of it, that they might be saved.

8 And the second angel sounded, and as it were a great mountain burning with fire was cast into the sea; and the third part of the sea became blood: 9 And the third part of the creatures which were in the sea, and had life, died; and the third part of the ships were destroyed.

Observe here, The universality of the judgment inflicted; the former judgment was upon the earth, this upon the sea, that no place might escape, a storm of hail and blood falls upon the former, a mountain of burning fire is cast into the latter; both signifying increasing wars and bloodshed by sea and land according to some; the mighty prevalency of error and heresy, say others, and particularly of the Arian heresy, which puffs up, and swells with pride, and is the harbinger and forerunner of ruin and destruction; as only by pride cometh contention, so after pride, or along with pride, cometh destruction.

10 And the third angel sounded, and there fell a great star from heaven burning as it were a lamp, and it fell upon the third part of the rivers, and upon the fountains of waters: And the name of the star is called wormwood: and the third part of the waters became wormwood; and many men died of the waters, because they were made bitter.

The next judgment inflicted, or rather the farther progress of the former judgment, was the infecting of the waters and rivers with a mortal bitterness by a bitter star falling from heaven into them; denoting, say some, the fall of a great captain among the Jews in Judea: others understand it of heresy in general; of the Arian heresy in particular;

and some apply it to the fall of Rome, the seat of the western empire; so Mr. Mede. If it be understood of heresy, it shews us what a poisonous, bitter, and deadly nature error and heresy is of. Error is as damnable as vice, the one is an open road, the other a by-path to hell and destruction; and accordingly that person, and that people, which have a due care of their soul's salvation, will be as much afraid of erroneous principles as they are of debauched practices.

12 And the fourth angel sounded, and the third part of the sun was smitten, and the third part of the moon, and the third part of the stars; so as the third part of them was darkened, and the day shone not for a third part of it, and the night likewise. 13 And I beheld, and heard an angel flying through the midst of heaven, saying with a loud voice, Wo, wo, wo to the inhabitants of the earth, by reason of the other voices of the trumpet of the three angels which are yet to sound.

Observe here, 1. That by sun, moon, and stars, in scripture-prophecies, the potentates and powers of a state are understood; accordingly the darkening of the sun, moon and stars, signifies generally the fall of some great powers either ecclesiastical or civil; others who interpret these judgments spiritually, by the darkening of the sun, moon and stars, do understand the prevalency of ignorance and error in the church, occasioning a fearful eclipse of that saving and comfortable light which would illuminate our eyes, and direct our steps in the way that leads to eternal happiness. 2. That in this and all the former judgments, the third part only is mentioned as smitten, which shews that the Lord corrects in measure, and delights more in mercy than in justice, and desires rather the conversion than confusion of sinners, by making the punishments of some instructive warnings unto others. 3. God's way of dealing with his people in giving warning of future and severe judgments before they come, I heard an angel flying through the midst of heaven, saying Wo, &c. thus God warneth of approaching judgments before they come, that sinners may repent, and his own people being forewarned, may be forearmed ere the judgment comes upon them. Præmoniti, prævisâ jacula minus feriunt; darts foreseen are duntless.

C H A P. IX.

AND the fifth angel sounded, and I saw a star fall from heaven unto the earth: and to him was given the key of the bottomless pit. 2. ¶ And he opened the bottomless pit, and there arose a smoke out of the pit, as the smoke of a great furnace; and the sun and the air were darkened by reason of the smoke of the pit. 3. And there came out of the smoke locusts upon the earth; and unto them was given power as the scorpions of the earth have power. 4. And it was commanded them that they should not hurt the grass of the earth, neither any green thing, neither any tree; but only those men which have not the seal of God in their foreheads.

Observe here, 1. That those who understood this word pronounced by the fifth angel, to denote a temporal judgment, apply it to the Jewish seducer, who headed the turbulent zealots; he was a ringleader of most hellish villains, and the zealots under him did all the mischiefs imaginable, marching up to Jerusalem, plundering the city, seizing the temple, and killing the high-priest, with the rest of the priests; but by God's providence it so happened, that this judgment of the zealots fell not upon the christians, signified by the trees and green things, but upon the Jews themselves only, because they were not of the faction of zealots. 2. That those who understand this wo to intimate a spiritual judgment, apply it, some to the first rising of the Turks and Mahometans, others to the papacy and papal clergy: Mr. Mede applies it to the former, King James to the latter: "By locusts and grasshoppers (says he) understand monks and friars, who seem to fly a little from the earth, but in deed are gorge-bellied devourers: in locusts you see little but a mouth and a belly; in monks you see a mouth to mumble over masses, and a belly to consume; they seized, when time was upon the meadows, the fat and pleasant parts of the land, and like grasshoppers consumed every green, that is, every good thing." 3. The commission and command given to them not to hurt the trees; such as are fruit-bearing and fruitful bearing christians, are preserved, and the storm falls upon drossy hypocrites: whence we may remark, That in times of error and seduction, as well as in times of judgment and calamity, God takes a special care of his faithful ones for their preservation; and has a special regard to the fruit of the trees of righteousness.

5 And to them (which had not the seal of God in their foreheads) it was given that they should not kill them, but that they should be tormented five months: and their torment was as the torment of a scorpion, when he striketh a man. 6 And in those days shall men seek death, and shall not find it; and shall desire to die, and death shall flee from them.

That is, God would bring such dreadful judgments and calamities upon the wicked world, that men should prefer death before life; and it should be an affliction beyond all other afflictions, that they could not die; to flee death is a great misery; but to have death flee from us, or flee before us, and not be able to find it, is a far greater misery; God can so imbitter life by afflictions and sufferings, that those who dread death may yet desire to die; not for any good that they see in death, but only to get rid of the troubles of this life.

7 And the shapes of the locusts were like unto horses prepared unto battle: and on their heads were as it were crowns like gold, and their faces were as the faces of men. 8 And they had hair as the hair of women, and their teeth were as the teeth of lions. 9 And they had breastplates as it were breastplates of iron; and the sound of their wings was as the sound of chariots of many horses running to battle. 10 And they had tails like unto scorpions, and there were stings in their tails: and their power was to hurt men men five months. 11 And they had a king over them which is the angel of the bottomless pit, whose name in the Hebrew tongue is Abaddon, but in the Greek tongue hath his name Apollyon.

This metaphorical description of a terrible army of cruel men, seems very plain; some understand it of the Jewish zealots, who appeared as warriors, and were devouring wasters; they looked like men, kind and friendly, and pretending to be redeemers of the people, saviours of, and benefactors to their country; but at the same time plundering and carrying away the spoils of their brethren without any tenderness or compassion. Others apply all this to the papal clergy, numerous, like locusts; well fed, like horses for battle; mighty, for earthly possessions; crowned, like petty princes; alluring, like women with their hair, and other ornaments, &c. Others again make the application to belong to the Turks and Saracens, who are represented as having many crowns on their heads, and as moved with wings, in regard of the many and vast conquests, says Mr. Mede, which they made in a short time, even Palestina, Syria, Armenia, Asia and Less, and many others; as to the king named here, Abaddon and Apollyon, some understand it to be the devil, others Mahomet, others the Pope; to whom, to every of whom, the name of a destroyer too fitly belongs, as seeking and endeavouring to destroy men's souls, and by blood and persecution to destroy and lay waste the church of Christ.

12 ¶ One wo is past; and behold there come two woes more hereafter. 13 ¶ And the sixth angel sounded, and I heard a voice from the four horns of the golden altar which is before God. 14 ¶ Saying to the sixth angel which had the trumpet, Loose the four angels which are bound in the great river Euphrates, 15 And the four angels were loosed, which were prepared for an hour and a day and a month and a year, for to slay the third part of men. 16 And the number of the army of the horseman, were two hundred thousand thousand: and I heard the number of them.

Note here, 1. From those words, One wo is past, and two more are to come, that God has a storehouse of judgments, as well as a treasury of mercy, and when one judgment will not do, he has more to inflict. 2. The golden altar, which is here said to be before God, signifies our Lord Jesus Christ, his purity and excellency, and his appearing continually in the presence of his Father for us, as our Intercessor and Mediator. 3. That this vast army of horsemen, consisting of two hundred thousand thousand, is expounded generally of Turks and Arabians who have vast armies beyond all nations whom God makes the executioners of his vengeance at his pleasure. 4. Whereas it is said, that the four angels were bound in the great river Euphrates, and, till loosed by God's command, could never hurt nor stir, it teaches us, that the Lord has Satan, and all his instruments, in his own power to loose them for our sins and to bind them again for our repentance: though their malice be infinite, yet their power is bounded; they cannot do all the mischief they would, and they shall not do all they can. 5. That when these destroying angels were loosed, their time of hurting was limited to a year, and a month and a day; shewing, that the set and determinate time of the wicked's insolvency is appointed by God to be either shorter or longer as he thinks fit; yea they execute nothing but with a divine permission; nay, nothing without a special warrant and commission from God. It is matter of singular consolation to us, that evil angels and wicked men are limited powers; they cannot move, much less hurt, till God loose them.

17 And thus I saw the horses in the vision, and them that sat on them, having breastplates of fire and of jacinth and brimstone: and the heads of the horses were as the heads of lions: and out of their mouths issued fire and smoke and brimstone. 18 By these three was the third part of men killed, by the fire and by the smoke and by the brimstone which issued out of their mouths. 19 For their power is in their mouth, and in their tails: for their tails were like unto serpents, and had heads, and with them they do hurt. 20 And the rest of the men which were not killed by these plagues, yet repented not of the works of their hands, that they should not worship devils, and idols of gold and silver and brass and stone and of wood, which neither can see, nor hear, nor walk: 21 Neither repented they of their murders, nor of their forceries, nor of their fornication, nor of their thefts.

St John proceeds here in describing this vast army of Turks and Arabians, that with incredible swiftness did overrun and ruin the eastern churches. All these expressions of fire, and brimstone, and smoke, denote that cruel devaluation and destruction which was occasioned by the Turks and Mahometans. Behold here the instruments of Satan, how his own cruel and destructive nature is discovered, how exceedingly he is delighted in the perdition of mankind, having been a murderer from the beginning. In the two last verses St. John declares, 1. What were the sins which procured so great a plague, namely, idolatry and worshipping the works of their own hands, a sin very odious to God, and for which God suffered the Turks to be so severe a scourge to christendom; what little reason had the Christians then to call their wars against the Turks, the holy wars, when idolatry the cause of it, was not repented of; what success could they expect, as long as the idolatry of Christians, and their other provoking sins were so many? Observe farther, What was the end God aimed at by such strong physic, by such terrible judgments as he then brought upon the world? it was to bring them to repentance; but so mad was the anti-christian world upon their idols, that they would not be reformed by the judgments they saw upon their brethren. Hence learn, That when God once begins to enter into judgment with a sinful people, he will follow them with a variety and succession of plagues and judgments one upon another, till he has either brought them to himself, or brought them to nothing.

C H A P. X.

AND I saw another mighty angel come down from heaven, clothed with a cloud: and a rainbow was upon his head, and his face was as it were the

the sun, and his feet as pillars of fire : 2 And he had in his hand a little book open. And he set his right foot upon the sea, and his left foot on the earth.

This angel is concluded to represent our Lord Jesus Christ, the angel of the covenant ; he is called a mighty angel, in opposition to the mighty enemies of his church, mentioned in the foregoing chapter ; he is said to come down from heaven, to intimate his signal and seasonable appearing for the relief of his church ; clothed with a cloud, representing the manner of his coming in the clouds at the final judgment ; with a rainbow on his head, signifying that covenant of peace which he had made with his church, and his continual mindfulness of that covenant : His face was as the sun, to denote that light of comfort and deliverance which he would bring to his church in his own time : His feet as pillars, signifying the steadiness and stability of his purposes and actions, that where he sets his feet, none can remove him ; and as pillars of fire, denoting his ability to tread down his enemies under him, and also to consume them ; this is according to the description of his person given, chap. i. 15, 16. The emblems and figures by which he is represented here, are the same by which he was described there ; consequently he is the same person. Observe, The account of what he did, He had a little book in his hand open, to distinguish it from the former book sealed ; a book in which the purpose and decree of God was made known, concerning what should happen to the church ; a book sealed and shut to us, but obvious and open to Christ. Christ, that lay in the bosom of the Father, reveals his Father's secrets to us, so far as it is needful and necessary for us to know them. And he set his right foot on the sea, and his left foot on the earth, to let us know his sovereignty and dominion over the whole world ; as well over the turbulent and unquiet, as over the quiet and more peaceable part of it ; and also to signify his ability to tread down his enemies, wherever they are ; a consideration that administers much comfort and consolation to his church ; his dominion is over the earth and sea, none can dispossess him of his power, and none can escape his presence.

3 And cried with a loud voice, as when a lion roareth : and when he had cried, seven thunders uttered their voices. 4 And when the seven thunders had uttered their voices, I was about to write : and I heard a voice from heaven saying unto me, Seal up those things which the seven thunders uttered, and write them not.

This angel, who represented Christ, the Lion of the tribe of Judah, is said to cry like a roaring lion, whose voice is both loud and terrible ; this, some conceive, shadowed forth the efficacious and successful preaching of the gospel, and that the seven thunders signified the same ; but others apprehend hereby the thundering judgments of God, which were shortly to be inflicted on the wicked world ; and particularly on Jerusalem by Titus, say some ; upon antichrist and his adherents, say others. The judgments of God are fitly set forth by thunder, because they do not fly at random, but by divine direction ; the loudness, the swiftness, the forceableness of thunder is known, and the terribleness of God in his doings towards the children of men, has been sufficiently understand. Observe next, St. John's intention to write what these thunders uttered, for the benefit of the church, as conceiving them to be of great concernment to her ; but he receives a command from Christ to the contrary, not to do it at present ; God foreseeing that the opposers would not hear, but despise ; therefore these judgments shall be known by experience, and not by words. Others say, this inhibition was only temporary, not perpetual : write them not, that is, conceal them for the present, till thou hast those things represented to thee in other types, and till they are nearer their accomplishment ; hereafter he might write them, for what God revealed to John, was to be shewed to his servants, chap. i. 1.

5 And the angel which I saw stand upon the sea and upon the earth, lifted up his hand to heaven, 6 ¶ And swore by him that liveth for ever and ever, who created heaven and the things that therein are, and the earth and the things that therein are, and the sea and the things which are therein, that there should be time no longer : 7 But in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, when he shall begin to sound, the mystery of God should be finished, as he hath declared to his servants the prophets.

The angel that represented Christ, is here represented to St. John as swearing, Observe, 1. The ceremony used in swearing, lifting up of the hand to heaven, appealing thereby to God as a witness, and a judge. 2. The person sworn by, God, described, (1.) By his eternity, He lives for ever, before and after all time. (2.) By his omnipotency and almighty power in the work of creation, making heaven, and earth, and the sea, and all things that are therein. An oath is proper to God, and as we are to swear by God, so God is only to be sworn by. Observe 3. The thing sworn, namely, That time shall be no more ; that is, that there should be no farther delay of time, for the destruction of Jerusalem, and the obdurate Jews, say some ; for the ruin of the Roman empire, for the destruction of antichrist, say others ; the performance of God's word, both in his promises of deliverance to his church, and in the execution of judgment on her enemies, are now at hand. 4. The promise made, and the assurance here given, namely that the mystery of God should be finished, that is, the deliverance of the church should be completed, and the final confusion of her enemies shall be accomplished ; which is called a mystery, because the world understands it not, nor will they believe the same. As mysteries have their own time to be made manifest in, so, to the comfort of the faithful and the terror of the wicked, a day was then approaching, in which the happy condition of the afflicted should appear, and the calamitous state of the ungodly be discovered.

8 And the voice which I heard from heaven spake unto me again, and said, Go, and take the little book which is open in the hand of the angel, which standeth upon the sea and upon the earth. 9 ¶ And I went unto the angel, and said unto him, Give me the little book. And he said unto me, Take it, and eat it up ; and it shall make thy belly bitter, but it shall be in thy mouth sweet as honey. 10 And I took the little book out of the angel's hand, and eat it up; and it was in my mouth sweet as honey: and as soon as I had eaten it, my belly was bitter. 11 And he said unto me, Thou must prophesy again before many peoples, and nations, and tongues, and kings.

Expositors generally make this little book the emblem of the holy scriptures, and the command given by the angels to St. John to eat this book, imports the great duty of studying diligently the holy scriptures, inwardly digesting them, and making them our own by particular application. What we eat is turned into nourishment, and becomes one substance with ourselves; thus the mysteries of the gospel must be eaten by the interpreters of gospel-mysteries. It is not enough that we know divine things, but we must know them divinely; we must have a savoury knowledge of them, and an experimental acquaintance with them. Observe, 2. The effect which eating of this book had upon St. John, it was in his mouth sweet as honey, in his belly very bitter; that is, the knowledge he had of divine mysteries, was in itself very pleasant, but the knowledge of the persecutions and cruelties which the christians were to suffer and undergo, was very bitter to his soul. Learn, That though communication of light from God, and the revelation of the mind and will of God, be in itself very delightful to his ministers, yet in respect of the sad messages contained in his word, it is very burdensome and bitter to them: however, it being the burden of the Lord, they must bear it, they must carry it. Every good man, much more every gracious minister, has a very high estimation of the word of God, he esteems it as food, he esteems it as necessary food; he esteems it more than his necessary food; but when God sends us to denounce judgments upon sinners, our belly trembles, our lips quiver, anguish takes hold upon us, we desire not the woful day, Lord, thou knowest. Observe lastly, The assurance God gives St. John of farther revelations of his mind unto him As thou hast prophesied, so thou must prophesy again before many people, and nations, and tongues, and kings; see here in St. John's person the true end and reason why God calls his ministers, and fits them with gifts, and why they furnish themselves with acquired abilities: it is to render themselves the more serviceable in his work, that they may speak of his word before kings, and not be ashamed.

C H A P. XI.

AND there was given me a reed like unto a rod; and the angel stood, saying, Rise and measure the temple of God, and the altar, and them that worship therein.

Observe here, 1. The command given by God to St. John to take a survey of his church, his spiritual temple, consisting of living stones, and built upon the chief corner-stone Jesus Christ. God's faithful and true worshippers are only those whom God will have to be measured, and taken notice of as being his part and portion, his tabernacle in which he will dwell. And, blessed be God! in the worst of times they are measurable; even in times of epidemical degeneracy, and universal apostacy, God has a number to stand up for his name, and to bear witness to his truth. 2. That the temple, the altar, and the worshippers therein, are here all joined together, and the command given, is to measure them together. Arise, and measure the temple, the altar, and them that worship therein; intimating, that the true church, and the true worshippers, are ever found together; and by the true worship, and true worshippers, is the true church ever known; so that if the question be asked, "Where is true church?" the answer is, Where the true altar is; and where the true worship is, there the true church is: That worship, which will bear God's measuring reed, the security of the scrutiny, and the examination of his holy word; where that worship is found, there the church of God is found.

2 But the court which is without the temple, leave out, and measure it not: for it is given unto the Gentiles: and the holy city shall they tread under foot forty and two months.

Observe here, What St. John is forbidden to measure, and commanded to leave out, as no part of the true church, namely, The court which is without the temple; that is, that part of the visible church which is over-run with idolatry, and anti-christian worship, as bad as Gentilism, and accordingly shall be treated as Gentiles, and trodden down under foot, as drossy hypocrites: Measure the temple, says God, but not the outward court. The temple had but few worshippers, the priests only, in comparison of the outward court, where the body of the people was; whence we see that the true church is but small, very small, in comparison of the false and anti-christian church, and consequently multitude can be no right note of the true church. Observe farther, That whereas these Gentiles are said to tread under foot the holy city forty-two months, thereby is signified, that they should kill and persecute the true spouse and church of Christ (called the holy city in allusion to the earthly Jerusalem) during the time of anti-christ's prevalency, yet here we have the church's ground of comfort and support, that her persecutors, and anti-christ's prevalency, shall be but for a limited time, a short time. The holy city, shall they tread under foot forty and two months.

3 I And I will give power unto my two witnesses, and they shall prophesy a thousand two hundred and threescore days clothed in sackcloth.

Observe here, 1. That the church of God, during anti-christ's prevalency, shall not want witnesses, or faithful teachers, though removed by persecution into corners. 2. By mentioning two only, we may gather the paucity of faithful teachers, during the time of anti-christ's prevalency, two are a number, but the least of numbers: We must not have our eye upon the multitude, or conclude that it is not truth which is not embraced and practised by the most: The train of Christ is not large, nor are his ways thronged as they ought, few comparatively there be that walk in them. As they, whom he calls forth to be eminently his witnesses witnesses, are not many, therefore called two; so they that received their witness are but few, for the world wonders after the beast. Quest. But who and what are these witnesses? Ans. The whole succession of faithful ministers, martyrs, and confessors, which almighty God, from time to time, has raised up in his church to be the asserters and maintainers of divine truth, and to bear their testimony for Christ against all heresies, blasphemies, idolatries, and usurpations in the time of antichrist's reign. Observe, 3. The proper work of these witnesses declared, it is to prophesy; that is, to instruct the people how to worship God according to his word and will. The manner of their prophesying is said to be in sackcloth; that is, in much affliction, and with great lamentation, bewailing the pollutions of the church by the overspreadings of idolatry: and the time of their prophesying is said to be a thousand two hundred and threescore days; that is, during the time of antichrist's reign, so long the witnesses shall have a mournful time of it; during the whole reign of antichrist, God will have a true church, a true ministry, and faithful witnesses, whom, though antichrist will fight with, yet he shall never prevail against. 4. How God is pleased to own and bear witness to these witnesses. 1. He calls them his, my two witnesses. 2. He gives them power to prophesy; that is, they have their commission and authority from him, and they are enabled, assisted, and succeeded by him in the discharge of their testimony: Their resolution and courage is from God, who calls them forth to bear their testimony for him. Learn hence, That when God calls any of his to a martyr's fire, he does endue them with a martyr's faith; he furnishes his ministers and faithful servants with noble endowments, answerable to their great employments; God evermore gives much grace, where he tries grace much. As the command of God makes every duty necessary, so the assistance of God makes every duty easy, and the reward of God makes every duty and service gainful and advantageous.

4 These are the two olive-trees, and the two candlesticks standing before the God of the earth. 5 And if any man will hurt them, fire proceedeth out of their mouth, and devoureth their enemies: and if any man will hurt them, he must in this manner be killed. 6 ¶ These have power to shut heaven: that it rain not in the days of their prophesy: and have power over the waters to turn them to blood, and to smite the earth with all plagues, as often as they will.

Observe here, 1. A double title given by God unto the two witnesses, spoken of in the former verse; they are styled olive-trees and candlesticks. As the olive-tree is always green, so the ministry of these witnesses is lively and efficacious; as the olive is a sign of peace, and the oil that drops from the olive, an emblem of grace, so the ministry of these witnesses was a ministry both of grace and peace. Again, they are called olive-trees, because they are to minister oil to the candlesticks, which are to hold out light unto others. Here note, That the title of candlesticks given to the churches chap. i. is here given to the ministers of the church; partly to shew the near relation that is between them, and partly to point out the duty that is mutually incumbent upon them; namely, to hold forth the light of truth unto others. And farther, These candlesticks are said to stand before the God of the earth, signifying their fidelity in the discharge of their duty, as in the presence of God before whom they stand. Observe, 2. The efficacy and power of these witnesses' ministry in the certain effects of it. What was said of Elijah and Elisha literally, is applied unto them spiritually. 1. As Elijah brought fire down from heaven, which devoured the enemy, so fire proceeds out of these witnesses' mouth not by way of imprecation, but by way of denunciation, pronouncing the threatenings and judgments of God against them, continuing in their impenitency. 2. As Elijah had power to shut heaven, so have these witnesses power to do the like during the time of their prophesy; that is, God is provoked for the world's ill treatment of his faithful witnesses, to withhold the spiritual rain of the world, and the refreshing doctrine of the gospel from them, Again, When it is said that these witnesses have power to turn the waters into blood, and to smite the earth with all plagues, there is a manifest allusion to Moses and Aaron, who exercised such a power, Exod. vii. Accordingly, God being provoked by the indignities offered to his faithful witnesses, permits the pure doctrine of the gospel to be corrupted, and avenges their cause, by bringing judgments on the world, as Moses did upon Egypt; according to the threatenings denounced by them. Whence we may learn, What great credit and esteem the faithful witnesses, and ministers of Christ, are in with God; what power and prerogative is given to them, far surpassing the power of any mortal prince, even a power to open and shut heaven, to turn waters into blood, and to smite the earth; that is, God doth all these things upon a just occasion, in vindication of them, and in revenge for the injuries done unto them.

7 And when they shall have finished their testimony, the beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit shall make war against them, and shall overcome them, and kill them. 8 ¶ And their dead bodies shall lie in the street of the great city, which spiritually is called Sodom and Egypt, where also our Lord was crucified. 9 And they of the people, and kindreds, and tongues, and nations, shall see their dead bodies three days and an half, and shall not suffer their dead bodies to be put in graves. 10 And they that dwell upon the earth shall rejoice over them, and make merry, and shall send gifts one to another: because these two prophets tormented them that dwelt on the earth.

These verses set before us the barbarous usage which the two witnesses should meet with from the antichristian world, for the faithful discharge of their duty, they shall be slain, politically and civilly, say some, deposed, silenced, imprisoned, and laid aside as useless, and dead, Literally, say others, they shall be put to death for the testimony of Jesus, by bloodshed, fire, and faggot. They shall overcome them them, that is, in their persons, but not in their cause. See here the christian church founded in blood, that of Christ, its head; watered with blood, that of his ministers and members. God suffers his sometimes to be actually slain, for his own glory, their honour, and the church's good; but mark the time specified when the witnesses were slain; it was when they had finished their testimony, and not before then, but not till then. So long as God has special work and service for his witnesses to do in the earth, their mighty and cruel enemies cannot touch an hair of their heads, much less can they take away their lives, till they have finished their testimony. 2. Besides the antichristian cruelty, in killing these witnesses, their barbarous inhumanity in denying them burial, not suffering some to be buried at all, and digging up the bones of others that have been long buried. The place where this was done is called Sodom and Egypt, and the great city where our Lord was crucified; which, if literally understood, signifies Jerusalem, compared to Sodom for the abominable sins of the Gnostics committed in her; and to Egypt for oppression; but if mystically understood, Rome, or the Roman empire, is conceived by most Protestants to be here intended by Egypt and Sodom: like Egypt for idolatry, tyranny, spiritual darkness, obstinacy, and obduracy; like Sodom for uncleanness, yea, worse than Sodom, uncleanness being not only practised, but tolerated, yea, allowed publicly, licences being there given to such public houses, and books written in defence of Sodomy at Rome, where Christ may be said to be crucified in his members as long as this apostate power holds up. 3. The great joy and exultation which is here discovered at the slaughter of these witnesses; the antichristian rabble triumph, and make merry, rejoice, and send gifts to one another. Lord! how madly do the wicked rejoice at the death of those men that used their utmost endeavours to have saved them. 4. The special reason alligned why the members of antichrist's kingdom did thus triumph at the death of the witnesses, and their supposed utter extinction, namely, because the two witnesses tormented them that dwell on the earth; that is, by their public preaching, by their private reproving, by their denouncing of God's judgments against them; for not suffering them to go on quietly and undisturbedly in the ways of sin, they grew very uneasy with them, and rejoiced when they thought the world fully rid of them. Lord! how does the preaching of thy word, which comforts and supports thy children, which is sweeter to them than the honey, and more esteemed by them than their necessary food, how does the same word preached torment notorious sinners? and instead of receiving the message, they rage at the messenger, and triumph and dance with Herod, to see that head cut off whose tongue was so bold to tell them of their faults.

11 ¶ And after three days and a half the spirit of life from God entered into them; and they stood upon their feet, and great fear fell upon them which saw them. 12 And they heard a great voice from heaven, saying unto them. Come up hither. And they ascended up to heaven in a cloud; and their enemies beheld them.

The death of the witnesses was described in the foregoing verses, their resurrection is declared in these. This is understood politically by some, that they who were civilly dead, that is, laid aside as useless, were now politically alive; that is, restored to their public work and employment in the church again, God causing princes and magistrates to own and favour them; and accordingly by their ascending up into heaven they understand their re-entering into the church, their re-enjoying their public liberties and gospel privileges, which in comparison of the low and sackcloth condition they were in before, was like heaven and earth unto them. And they ascended in a cloud, that is, gloriously, and their enemies beheld them with an envious eye, because of the work in their hands, which it was not in their power to hinder. Others understand this resurrection (in the manner forementioned) to be meant not of the same men, but of men of the same spirit and office, restored to the same work, to the admiration of the good, and consternation of the bad; and that the voice of Christ spake to the slain witnesses, saying Come up hither, that is, into heaven, to receive the reward of your sufferings and services, and others that succeed you in office shall partake of your spirit, and perfect that work which you began and carried on. Where note, That oft-times God's faithful witnesses, namely, such magistrates and ministers as have done great things for the church of God, are taken up to heaven before they behold the desired issue, which is left to their successors to see completed.

13 And the same hour was there a great earthquake, and the tenth part of the city fell, and in the earthquake were slain of men seven thousand: and the remnant were affrighted, and gave glory to the God of heaven.

These words are conceived by interpreters to set forth the great success of the witnesses ministry after their resurrection; it was accompanied with a mighty earthquake, or a great shaking of the kingdom of antichrist; insomuch that a tenth part of the city fell; that is, many nations and kingdoms under antichrist's tyranny and dominion shook off the yoke, and disowned his jurisdiction, and fell off from him. Observe farther, What this earthquake, and fall produced, namely, a twofold effect. 1. Seven thousand were slain. 2. Others were affrighted, turned from their sins, and gave glory to God. Behold here the great power of the word of God and the happy success thereof, to the shaking of antichrist's kingdom, which falls not at once, but by degrees, as it rots. The man of sin is to be consumed with the breath of Christ's mouth at first, which is a gradual death, till at last he be quite abolished by the brightness of his coming. Upon the whole then we may comfortably conclude, that whatever ground antichrist on the one hand may seem to have gained of late in any place, that yet he is certainly in a deep consumption; nay, far gone in it, and will languish more and more, till he draws his last breath: And on the other hand whatever clouds may overspread the church of Christ in any place, it will not belong ere they will vanish, and that affairs are moving forwards towards the church's highest outward prosperity, and most flourishing condition that she shall ever arrive at on this side heaven, which is to be under the blessed millennium, or thousand years, which begin probably with the resurrection of the witnesses, at the beginning of the Protestant reformation, by the preaching of Luther. Thus speaks our learned Dr. Moore, Myst. Iniq. p. 477. "I doubt not," says he, "but this vision of the resurrection of the witnesses, was a prediction of our Protestant reformation, begun at Spire in Germany, anno 1529, when several German princes and imperial cities, made a solemn protestation against the innovations and usurpations of the church of Rome; from whence came the name of Protestants, which continues to this day. This therefore," says he, "should make our reformation the more sacred, and keep all persons that with well to our holy religion, from casting any dirt upon our first reformers, whose names ought to be had in honour, and will be so in the church of God throughout all generations."

14 ¶ The second wo is past; and behold, the third wo cometh quickly. 15 ¶ And the seventh angel sounded; and there were great voices in heaven, saying, The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ; and he shall reign for ever and ever.

An account is here given of the angel's sounding the seventh trumpet, at the beginning of antichrist's ruin and downfall. St. John heard great acclamations and shoutings in heaven for the victory which Christ by his witnesses had gotten over him, saying, The kingdoms of this world, that is, several kingdoms, or main bodies of kingdoms and nations, are now brought in to acknowledge Christ for their Sovereign and Lawgiver, who did not so before; but whereas formerly they owned another master, namely, antichrist, now they do especially own and acknowledge Christ, by professing to believe in him, and becoming a pure church to him; And he shall reign for ever and ever. Even under antichrist's reign and tyranny Christ had a kingdom, but he will have a more visible kingdom in the world, and which shall continue without any eclipse by antichrist, or any other, as it suffered before.

16 And the four and twenty elders, which sat before God on their seats, fell upon their faces, and worshipped God, 17 Saying, We give thee thanks O Lord God Almighty, which art, and wast, and art to come; because thou hast taken to thee thy great power, and hast reigned. 18 And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead, that they should be judged, and that thou shouldest give reward unto thy servants the prophets, and to the saints, and them that fear thy name, small and great; and shouldest destroy them which destroy the earth. 19 And the temple of God was opened in heaven, and there was seen in his temple, the ark of his testament: and there were lightnings, and voices, and thunderings, and an earthquake, and great hail.

This chapter concludes with a doxology and solemn thanksgiving in heaven, for the victory which Christ obtained over antichrist here on earth; that is, for the begun victory over him. Here observe, 1. The persons rendering praises, the four and twenty elders; all the ministers of the church, say some; the whole church say others, who are said to sit before God; denoting, (1.) That they rest from their labours; they walked as pilgrims before, they sit now. Would we with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, sit down in the kingdom of God in heaven? we must with Abraham walk before God in uprightness here on earth, Gen. xvii. 5. (2.) It denotes their honour and dignity unto which they are now advanced; as servants they stood before, as friends they sit now. but upon this great occasion mark their humble gesture, their prostrations and adorations before God, They fell upon their faces and worshipped. 2. The ground and occasion of it; what it is which they thus solemnly bless God for; namely, for Christ's victory over his enemies, for assuming to himself his great power, and universal dominion; and because the kingdoms of the world were now become the kingdoms of the Lord, and of his Christ. For if there be joy in heaven at the conversion of one sinner unto Christ, what is there, suppose we, at the conversion of nations and kingdoms, unto Christ? Behold here the whole host of heaven, the church triumphant in the new Jerusalem, breaking forth into the highest praises for establishing the public exercise of religion in its purity, never more to be driven into corners, as it was twice before; first by Pagans, next by Pagan christians. 3. The doxology or thanksgiving itself, Lord God Almighty, we give thee thanks for this begun overthrow of antichrist, which by thy almighty power thou wilt certainly carry on, being always the same, and as able to help thy church as ever. As if they had said, In the time of antichrist's full power, when thy church was under a bitter and bloody persecution, thy power seemed to be laid aside, and thou seemedst not to reign, having thy power obscured by his tyranny; but now thou shewest thyself to be a ruler over all the world, both King of saints and King of nations. 4. The indignation and wrath which the friends of antichrist express upon this occasion, veric 18. The nations were angry; that is, the idolatrous nations; they who formerly persecuted, do now fret because they are overcome; they gnash their teeth at the successful progress of the gospel; and because thy wrath that is, the time to execute thy wrath is come, upon all idolaters and false worshippers. And the time of the dead that they should be judged and rewarded; that is, the time is now come, when those witnesses, which were civilly dead, and accounted as dead by the world, shall revive again, or, the time of the dead, that is, of those that have been slain by antichrist; the time is come that their blood shall be avenged, and all thy faithful servants and sufferers recompensed and rewarded; particularly thy prophets, whose work being greater, such shall their reward be also. And all that fear thy name, both small and great; that is, all true believers of a more private capacity, who have cleaved unto Christ's pure and undefiled religion, how obscure soever they have been in the world, none of these shall miss of a recompense, when God's time of rewarding is come; and then, he will destroy them which destroy the earth, that is, those bloody persecutors, who destroy the inhabitants of the earth by persecutions, or false doctrines.

5. The great blessing which follows upon the downfall of antichrist, verse 19. The temple of God was opened; alluding to the frequent shutting up of the temple at Jerusalem by idolatrous princes, Ahas and others, when the ark, in which the law of God lay, was not seen; but Hezekiah and Josiah, those two reforming princes, opened the temple, and restored the true worship of almighty God. In like manner, during antichrist's reign, the temple of God was shut up, his true worship suppressed; but now, since antichrist's falling, the temple is opened, the ark seen, the pure word of God expounded, and a more than ordinary presence of God (of which the ark was a symbol) found in his church.) Well might the church then, upon this happy occasion, triumphingly say, We give thee thanks, O Lord God Almighty, &c.

C H A P. XII.

AND there appeared a great wonder in heaven; a woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars:

Observe here, 1. That by the woman we are to understand the christian church in her militant state, called a woman in regard of her weakness and dependency, as also in regard of her fruitfulness, she bringing forth many children unto God, which are born upon her knees. 2. This woman the church is said to appear in heaven, having her original from heaven, her conversation in heaven, her tendency towards heaven, and her dependency upon heaven. 3. The woman described by her rare perfections, which are three, 1. Clothed with the sun, that is, adorned with those graces, which Christ the Sun of righteousness has put upon her, and environed with the pure light of the gospel shining about her. 2. Having the moon under her feet, that is the legal worship, according to some; the christian church outshining now the Jewish state of imperfection, casting off, and trampling under the yoke of the Mosaic dispensation. Others by the moon understand the world, which is like the moon, full of spots, defiling and polluting, full of changes and alterations, the fashion of this world passeth away, 1. Cor. vii. 13. It is never long in one garb; and her having the moon under her feet implies, the church's being enabled by Christ to overcome and trample upon all the enjoyments and satisfactions of the world, and to despise all the affronts and insults of the world. 3. Upon her head a crown of twelve stars, that is, holding fast the pure doctrine of the gospel, first preached by the twelve apostles, and after them by succeeding ministers, which is as a crown on the church's head. Where note, That the apostles, and all faithful ministers with them, are stiled stars. As stars they shine before men, by the light of life and doctrine. As stars they shine with a borrowed light, derived from the Sun of righteousness. Again, as stars are in continual motion for the good of the universe, so are the ministers of the gospel for the good of the church; as stars they shine in their own orb, attending the proper duty of their place and station; and as stars shine brightest in the cold winter-nights, so do they in the times of affliction and persecution.

2. And she being with child, cried, travailing in birth, and pained to be delivered.

The church, typified by a woman, described in the former verse by her rare perfections, in this verse by her weak and perilous condition, she cries like a woman in travail for delivery, to God in her prayers, to men in her apologies. The plain sense of this, "That the christian church was possessed with an earnest desire to propagate the christian religion throughout the world, and she earnestly cried to God to assist her therein, and strove with utmost endeavours to accomplish this her design; and was truly solicitous to see the success of her labours in the lives of her members." Many and sore have been the sick and breeding fits which the church has conflicted with, by means of heretics and persecutors, which sometimes gave occasion to fear that she would certainly miscarry; but at last God sent her ease from heaven by the birth of a child, which caused the woman to forget all her sorrows; and the prayer of faith was then in the greatest activity, when the woman was found to be in the greatest extremity.

3. And there appeared another wonder in heaven, and behold a great red dragon, having seven heads and ten horns, and seven crowns upon his heads. 4. And his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them on the earth.—

The church was described before; her arch enemy, the devil is described now; he is called a dragon for his subtlety, a great dragon for his power, a red dragon for his fiery cruelty. His seven heads denote his manifold subtleties, and mischievous contrivances, his devices and wicked imaginations against the church; his ten horns denote his vast power and great strength; both in himself and his members; also the number and power of his agents, who serve as horns to push and hurt the church. His seven crowns upon his head, denote his regal power, which he holds by usurpation, and his many victories and conquests which he obtains in the world, yet over none but those who are willingly overcome by him. The whole of the description represents Satan as a powerful, subtle, cruel, victorious adversary; all which properties he discovers in the assault he makes upon the ministers of the church, called the stars of heaven, which he endeavours to cast down to the earth; that is, to hinder their shining in the firmament of the church. Learn, 1. What a mighty enemy the church has, fierce and fiery, red and bloody, full of craft and cruelty, of power and policy; and how deplorable her condition would be, if the Lord himself was not on her side. 2. Who is prime author of all that cruelty and bloodshed against the church of God, even the red dragon with its heads and horns, his ministers and agents: The greatest monarchs upon the earth, if they gore and hurt the church, are the base heads and horns of this monstrous aragon.

—And the dragon stood before the woman which was ready to be delivered, for to devour her child as soon as it was born. 5. And she brought forth a man-child, who was to rule all nations with a rod of iron; and her child was caught up unto God, and to his throne. 6 ¶ And the woman fled into the wilderness, where she hath a place prepared of God, that they should feed her there a thousand two hundred and threescore days.

That is, "A. Herod watched to destroy Christ as soon as he was born, Matth. ii so while the church was endeavouring to propagate christianity, and make converts to Christ, the dragon watched, intending to devour them." The devil's great design is to crush every good thing in the beginning, to nip grace in the bud, to kill the infant-church in the cradle; he is therefore said to stand before the woman, to prevent all possibility of her child's escape. Behold his bloody cruelty! but though he stood before her, he had no power to hurt or touch either mother or child: Behold his powerful restraint! Observe farther, The child's birth, preservation, and preferment. 1. Its birth, she brought forth a child, not children, to shew the paucity of the church's members, and also their unity, they are all but one man child, make up all but one body, and the dragon's purpose was to devour all in one, and all at once. 2. Its preservation, The child is caught up to God and to his throne; that is, heaven took it immediately into his care and protection, out of the dragon's reach, to his shameful disappointment. 3. Its preferment, it was to rule all nations with a rod of iron; that is, with such severity, mixed with lenity, as was needful; the church shall prevail against all opposers. Lastly, after the woman's delivery, her flight into the wilderness, is set down, and her continuance there for a time, together with God's protection over her, and provision for her; a plain allusion to Elijah's flying into the wilderness from the rage of idolatrous and bloody Jezebel, and God's feeding him extraordinarily at the brook of Cherith. From the woman's, that is, the church's flying into the wilderness for a while, we learn, That the visibility of the church is not always conspicuous, to her enemies especially. 2. That is sometimes lawful to fly in time of hot and bitter persecution; the woman fled into the wilderness. 3. In that the woman had a place, and food prepared for her, we learn, God's provident care for his church in the day and hour of her greatest extremities; when she lark and hides herself in obscurity. During the time of antichrist's reign, God will take care that some shall feed her with wholesome food, the doctrine of the gospel, that sincere milk of the word, to the intent that she may grow thereby.

7 ¶ And there was war in heaven: Michael and his angels fought against the dragon, and the dragon fought and his angels: 8 And prevailed not; neither was their place found any more in heaven. 9 And the great dragon was cast out, that old serpent, called the devil and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world; he was cast out into the earth, and his angels were cast out with him.

By Mich. and his angels understand Christ, whose the angels are, and so much the name imports Mich. that is, who like God; Christ is the likeness of his Father, his essential likeness. St. John in a vision beholds Michael and his angels combating with the dragon and his angels; yea, vanquishing and overcoming them. This may comfort the church under all her conflicts, that at length her Michael will finally prevail, and the in him. Our Lord Jesus Christ by the powerful preaching of the gospel, has weakened the kingdom of sin, Satan, and antichrist. His angels are his ministers, martyrs and confessors; those particularly of the first ages, who by their cries to God, and apologies to their rulers, by their holy lives, and patient deaths did overcome their enemies. And thus Michael and his angels, Christ and his ministers, fought against the dragon and his angels, against Satan and his cruel instruments who were so far from prevailing, that they lost ground continually; the christians overcome them by their faith and patience. And the great dragon was cast down: he was by the preaching of the gospel deposed from being worshipped as a God, and his power was taken away.

Note, 1. That though Michael, Christ alone, be able to overcome the dragon, and all his angelic powers, yet for his own greater honor, and their greater confusion, he overcomes him and them by his ministers and faithful servants. 2. If Michael our prince be with us, Christ Jesus the captain of our salvation, our leader, then though the combat may be sharp, yet the victory is sure: For if he be for us, who can (successfully) be against us? 3. That Satan and his angels were cast out together; for of the devil and his instruments the lot shall be alike; they sin together, and they shall suffer together; and shall never be parted. Lord, how dreadful will an imprisonment with devils and damned spirits be to eternal ages? To lie for ever with Satan in that mysterious fire of hell, whose strange property it is always to torture, but never to kill; or always to kill, but never to consume. The dragon was not only cast out of heaven with his angels, but both were cast down into hell, even into that lake which burns with fire and brimstone.

10 And I heard a loud voice saying in heaven, Now is come salvation, and strength, and the kingdom of our God, and the power of his Christ: for the accuser of our brethren is cast down, which accused them before our God day and night. 11 And they overcame him by the blood of the Lamb, and by the word of their testimony; and they loved not their lives unto the death. 12 Therefore rejoice, ye heavens, and ye that dwell in them. Wo to the inhabitants of the earth, and of the sea: for the devil is come down unto you, having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time.

After Michael and his angels, Christ and his followers, victory over the dragon and his angels, over Satan and his instruments, here follows a solemn thanksgiving for the devil's downfall; the saints in heaven join with believers on earth in this song of confidence and triumph; when they speak of God, they say our God; and when they speak of the church below, they say our brethren; behold a sweet communion between the church militant, and the church triumphant: Indeed they constitute and make up but one church, one family, one household; the whole family in heaven and earth is but one. Observe farther, Another name name here given to Satan, the accuser of the brethren; he accuses them continually before God, and by his instruments before men; the primitive christians were accused by their enemies to the magistrates as guilty of the most villainous practices, in their religious assemblies: And behold the assiduity of Satan in accusing the saints day and night; but blessed be God, as Satan is a continual accuser, Christ is a continual mediator. Observe again, How the saints overcome Satan. 1. By the blood of the Lamb; that is, by faith in his blood. 2. By the word of their testimony; that is, by their preaching, professing, and practising the word of God. 3. By their sufferings and martyrdom, they love not their lives unto death; that is, they loved not their lives so well but that they were willing to expose them to death, rather than renounce the cause of Christ, and desert their holy profession. Observe lastly, After this great exultation and joy in heaven for the devil's downfall, here is a denunciation of Wo to the inhabitants of the earth, and of the sea, upon that account; that is, to all earthly, sensual men; whether they inhabit the continent, or any island in the sea, because the devil is come down full of rage, knowing that his time is short to execute his malice in. Learn 1. Who is the author of wrath, and malice, and revenge; and whose children they are that partake of that spirit and temper: The devil has great wrath; that is, his character, and the very soul and spirit of the apostate nature. 2. That something good may be learned from the evil one; Satan is very busy, doubly diligent, because his time is short; so should we be; our grave and coffin are at hand, our glass has but a little sand; since but a few leaves are remaining in the book of our lives unfilled up, it concerns us to write the closer, and the faster too; as Satan's time for mischief is short, so is our time for doing good.

13 ¶ And when the dragon saw that he was cast unto the earth, he persecuted the woman which brought forth the man-child. 14 And to the woman were given two wings of a great eagle, that she might fly into the wilderness, into her place: where she is nourished for a time, and times, and half a time, from the face of the serpent.

Observe here, The incessant and restless malice of Satan and his instruments against the church; neither his fore-mentioned disappointment, his present foil and downfall, nor his fear of future destruction, could move him to desist; but having attempted to destroy the church with the fire of persecution before, he endeavours to drown it with a flood of errors now, Diahelus mutat consilium, non deponit malitiam; the devil sometimes changes his methods in doing mischief, but never lays down his malice; he persecutes the woman, the church of Christ, after another manner, namely, by a flood of errors and heresies. 2. The care that God took for his church's preservation from this fatal mischief also; to the woman were given wings of a great eagle for flight into the wilderness; that is, all means and ways of evasion, which God out of his care for his church provides for her safety and protection in the time of trouble; the church's flight in time of persecution is by no means to be censured or condemned, especially when God by his providence provides her wings; that is, gives her opportunity so to do. 3. The place she flies into for safety, (namely, into the wilderness) called her place, because prepared by God for her safety; here she is nourished; that is, hath spiritual food provided for her by God, and a number of faithful ministers are qualified for the feeding of her; for a time, and times, and half a time; that is, for a certain time determined by God, but altogether unknown to us; thus when the church meets with new distresses, God provides for her new deliverances.

15 And the serpent cast out of his mouth water as a flood, after the woman; that he might cause here to be carried away of the flood, 16 And the earth helped the woman, and the earth opened her mouth and swallowed up the flood which the dragon cast out of his mouth. 17 And the dragon was wroth with the woman, and went to make war with the remnant of her seed, which keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ.

Two things are here observable; a new danger, ver. 15. a renewed succour, ver. 16. Observe, 1. A new danger: this is set forth, By the author of it, the serpent; the former attempt against the church was managed by the wrathful dragon, this contrived by the subtle serpent; open cruelty is more dreadful, but subtle policy is more dangerous; the cunning devil is a more mischievous enemy to the church of Christ than the raging devil; subtle Julian did the church more mischief than bloody Nero, or Dioclesian. Learn hence, That what mischief Satan cannot effect by open cruelty, he will attempt against the church by subtle policy; when he fails as a dragon, he will try what he can do as a serpent. Observe, 2. The matter as well as the author of this danger. The serpent cast out of his mouth water as a flood; that is, a flood of errors, heresies, false doctrines, and corrupt opinions, cast out of the mouth of the corrupting seducers, endangering the very essence and being of the church of Christ, particularly the Arian heresy, which prodigiously overspread the world in its time. Heresy may fitly be compared to a flood; it is a corrupting and defiling flood, it is a swelling and increasing flood, it is a drowning and overwhelming flood. Learn, 1. That the serpent's flood of errors and false doctrines, is the worst and chiefest of the church's dangers. 3. The church's seasonable relief and succour: The earth helped the woman, &c. by the earth some understand earthly ones, wicked men, who are said to help the woman, not intentionally, but eventually, by their greedy swallowing down those errors which come out of the dragon's mouth, hearkening to his lies, and believing his errors for truths; others by the earth understand the king and rulers of the earth, helping the woman, by calling synods and councils to stem the tide, to dam this flood, and to condemn these errors and heresies, which by their overflowing endangered the church's ruin; the devil raised four abominable errors presently after the church had obtained peace, and there was a great concurrence of magistrates and ministers in confuting, censuring, and condemning the same, in and by their councils and synods. 1. The heresy of Arius, who denied the divinity of Christ, this was condemned condemned by the council of Nice, called by Constantine. 2. The heresy of Macedonius, who denied the personality of the Holy Ghost, condemned by a council at Constantinople, called by Theodosius the first. 3. The heresy of Nestorius, who asserted that Christ had two persons, as well as two natures, condemned by a council at Ephesus, called by Theodosius the second. 4. The heresy of Eutyches, who confounded Christ's natures, making him to have but one nature, as well as to be but one person; this was condemned by the council of Chalcedon: Thus the earth helped the woman; these four councils tended very much to the maintaining the truth, and preserving the church from that flood of error and heresy which the dragon cast out of his mouth. Lastly, The dragon's rage, ver. 17, He was wroth with the woman; that is, he was greatly enraged because the woman was extraordinarily helped, and his designs wonderfully disappointed, and when he saw he could not ruin the whole church, he resolves to attack some particular members of it, even such as kept the commandment of God, and had the testimony of Christ; that is, those who kept close to the scriptures, which contain the doctrine of faith, and testify that Christ is the only Saviour of the world. Now, from the dragon's making war with the remnant of the woman's seed, we learn how insatiable the blood-thirstiness of Satan and his instruments is, who when they had killed the witnesses before, and many other, yet can they not rest till they have killed this little remnant, and made themselves drunk with the blood of the saints; and never let protestants expect any other, or any better usage at the hands of Romanists, with whom this is a certain principle, that heretics in a nation are to be extirpated root and branch, where it may lately be done; that is, when they are not too numerous, and the loss of one of our lives may not cost two of their own. If any say, that papists are now become better natured, by being under the restraint of our laws, I wish they may never be tempted out of their humanity by advantages of power: And as Almighty God has once more delivered the neck of this nation from the pinchings of the antichristian yoke, may our sins never provoke him more to deliver us into the hands of those men, whose tender mercies are cruel. Amen.

C A A P. XIII.

AND I stood upon the sand of the sea, and saw a beast rise up out of the sea, having seven heads and ten horns, and upon his horns ten crowns, and upon his heads the name of blasphemy.

Observe here, 1. The place where St. John had the vision related in this chapter; he apprehends himself to stand on the sea-shore, a place fit for the sight he was to see, namely, a beast rising out of the sea. Where note, That it is usual in the prophets, Daniel especially, to set out temporal monarchies oppressing the church by great beasts. Where we learn, What a base and vile, what a low and mean esteem God has of the mightiest enemies of his church and people; let the world admire them as gods, if they abuse their power God calls them beasts; and as such, in his own time, they shall be destroyed. Observe, 2. The monstrous description of that beast which St. John saw; it had seven heads, denoting, some say, the seven hills upon which Rome stands; or the seven sorts of government successively in the Roman state, say others; and ten horns, that is, ten kings under Rome, and confederate with her. Where note, That all such kings, be they ever so mighty or many, which persecute sincere christianity, are vile in the esteem of God, accounted no better than the horns of a bloody beast, which Almighty God in the end will either blunt or break. Sovereignty is from heaven, however men come by it, or however they abuse it; which shews the horrid ingratitude of those princes, who having received their power from God, do improve it against him, and turn it upon him by whom they reign. And upon his heads the name of blasphemy: Those that apply this description of the beast to Rome pagan, understand hereby their paganish idol-worship in general; and their defying of the Roman Emperors in particular. Others, as most protestants, who apply it to Rome papal, by this name of blasphemy, understand those blasphemous titles which are given to the pope, as "Lord God," "The universal Head, The Husband of the Church, The Light which came into the World," &c. Which are the incommunicable attributes of Christ: and by flatterers and admirers frequently given to the papal antichrist.

2 And the beast which I saw was like unto a leopard, and his feet were as the feet of a bear, and his mouth as the mouth of a lion; and the dragon gave him his power, and his seat, and great authority.

St. John here proceeds in giving a farther description of this monstrous beast; it was in appearance like a leopard, spotted with divers kinds of idolatry, with variety of idols; with feet like a bear, denoting its strength and fierceness; its mouth like a lion, that is, cruel and ravenous. Next, an account is given from whom this beast receives its power and authority; the dragon, that is, the devil, by God's permission, gave unto this beast power and great authority, to deceive by strong delusions, and hurt the soul, as also to kill and destroy the body. Note, That when the dragon is said to give the beast his throne and power, his seat and great authority, we must not understand it as by right, for all power is from God, but as the usurpation belonging to him. That authority, which is claimed to depole kings, to dispose of kingdoms, to dispense with the laws of God, all this is from the dragon, and in no wise from God.

3 And I saw one of his heads as it were wounded to death; and his deadly wound was healed: and all the world wondered after the beast.

Here St. John farther declares what he saw concerning this beast, namely, 1. That one of its heads was wounded; by which head many understand the fall of the ancient imperial powers, the decay of its wonted glory; and that ample jurisdiction which Rome heretofore had under the pagan emperors: And by the wounding of this head they understand the abolishing of paganism and idolatry, and putting a stop to persecution by the christian emperors. 2 It is asserted, That his deadly wound was healed; namely, when idolatry, the same for substance with the Pagan and old heathenish idolatry, but in a new dress, was gradually restored by the papal powers. 3. Here is the effect of this healing, all the earth wondered after the beast, that is, followed him in blind devotion. 4. Who the admirers of the beast are, the earth, the men of the world: No wonder to see them seduced! This admiration is general, the whole earth wondered after the beast; how false is it then, that multitude is a note of the true church. Behold the several instances of the world's wondering after the beast at Rome; they receive their doctrine and worship from him, they make all their appeals to him, all church officers receive their ordination from him, and are installed by him.

4 And they worshipped the dragon which gave power unto the beast: and they worshipped the beast, saying, Who is like unto the beast? who is able to make war with him? 5 And there was given unto him a mouth speaking great things and blasphemies: and power was given unto him to continue forty and two months. 6 And he opened his mouth in blasphemy against God, to blaspheme his name, and his tabernacle, and them that dwell in heaven.

From admiration in the former verse, they proceed to adoration in this, they worship both the dragon and the beast, that is, they did worship idols, which are often in scripture called devils; like the Gentiles of old, who are said by St. Paul to sacrifice to devils, and not unto God, 1 Cor. x. 20. Behold here a vast difference between God's judgment and the opinion of the seduced world. They think the worship they give to a creature is given to God; but God accounts it as given to the devil, who is the author of all idolatry. Note next, That as the seduced world worshipped the beast, so do they extol his earthly grandeur and surpassing power, saying, Who is like unto the beast? Who is able to make war with him? See how pomp and worldly grandeur dazzles the eyes of its admirers. Farther, A mouth was given this beast to speak, that is, a power by the devil's instigation and God's permission, to utter blasphemies against the Most high. 1. The blasphemous mouth of the beast is opened against the name of God, that is, against the word of God, by which God makes himself known, as a man is known, by his name. Now, the word of God is blasphemed by the beast and his worshippers, when it is charged with obscurity, with imperfection, called a dead letter, and a nose of wax, &c. The spirit of God is then blasphemed, when his divinely inspired writings are thus vilified and undervalued. 2. This blasphemous mouth is opened not only against God's name, but against his tabernacle, the place of his instituted worship, meaning by his tabernacle the true church, wherein God is worshipped according to his word. God accounts himself blasphemed when his true worshippers are called heretics, schismatics, and, in a way of scorn, Hugonots, and the synagogue of Satan. 3. They blaspheme them that dwell in heaven, by which some understand the holy martyrs now in heaven, whom they frequently called damned heretics, blackening their names, and blasting their reputations; others understand it of some saints in heaven, whom they pretend to honour, as the Virgin Mary, &c. They blaspheme them, namely, by speaking of them, and praying to them blasphemously, as when they bid the holy Virgin, "in the right of a mother, command her Son." Observe, That when we give that honour and worship to saints and angels, which is only due to God, it is an idolatrous and impious blaspheming of them that dwell in heaven; were the Virgin Mary sensible in heaven of that idolatrous adoration which is given her here on earth, with what indignation and disdain would she look down upon this sacrilegious violence offered to her holy Son, in robbing him of that divine honour, which is peculiarly due to his divine nature; for religious adoration is peculiar to a deity.

7 And it was given unto him to make war with the saints, and to overcome them: and power was given him over all kindreds and tongues and nations, 8 And all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him, whose names are not written in the book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world.

Observe 1. A war proclaimed; the beast makes war upon the saints, by bloodshed and persecution, and by the force of those weapons overcomes them; that is, to outward appearance, and in the opinion of the world, they seem to be totally overcome, because visibly slain; but really do the saints overcome him by their patience and constancy under sufferings; and by rejecting his cursed idolatry, and adhering to the truth. 2. The large extent of the beast's power that was given him, namely, over all kindreds, tongues, and nations. This must not be understood of individual persons, nor universally of all nations, but of the nations belonging to the Roman empire; whole nations were carried away with his idolatry, though not all of every nation. Christ's flock is a little flock, compared with antichrist's herd: how wrong a note then is multitude of the right church? 3. That as the power of the beast is universal, so is the worship also: All that dwell on the earth shall worship him; that is, the generality of the Roman empire shall obey and honour him, and comply with him in his idolatry; few comparatively refusing it. 4. We have a number excepted, whose names are written in the book of life. Blessed be God for this comfortable restriction; all are not worshippers of the beast. Christ has his number of faithful ones, who are not defiled by antichrist's pollutions; a number whose conversations are in heaven, and whose names are written there, in the book of life, called the book of the Lamb: because it is by him, and by the merit of his blood, that we obtain eternal life. Lastly, the title here given to our Lord Jesus Christ, he is styled the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, and that in several respects, 1. In the purpose and decree of God. 2. In the promise of God made from the beginning, Gen. iii. 15. 3. In respect of the types, shadows, and sacrifices, whereby his death was prefigured and represented, Christ was slain typically in those sacrifices which Adam and Abel offered up unto God daily. 4. In respect of the virtue and efficacy of his death, which was effectual to all that truly believe in him, from the first promise made of him. The merits of Christ's death have saved all that have been saved from the foundation of the world. Behold here, The tender care of God in providing for our salvation before we were, yea, before the world was; and observe also, that the saints of God, in all ages, have been saved the same way, and by the same mean, namely, by faith in the death of Christ, which has extended itself to all true believers believers from the beginning of the world ; and the efficacy of it will reach to all such, even to the end of the world ; the virtue of the sacrifice is as fresh as the first moment it was slain, the death of Christ is of eternal efficacy.

9 If any man have an ear, let him hear. 10 He that leadeth into captivity shall go into captivity he that killeth with the sword, must be killed with the sword. Here is the patience and the faith of the saints.

Observe here, 1. That this acclamation, If any man have an ear, let him hear, is added in scripture, when something went before, which required a very diligent attention and close application of mind : If any man have an ear, that is, a spiritual understanding to discern the meaning of what has been foretold, let him ponder and consider what is here revealed concerning this beast, and take heed that he be not found amongst the number of the worshippers of it. 2. The consolation here given to the saints, from the consideration of God's just retribution to his and their enemies, He that leadeth into captivity, shall go into captivity; that is, the beast, who has brought many of the saints into captivity, shall himself at length be taken captive, and thrown into that lake of fire and brimstone, spoken, of chap. xix. 20. With what measure antichrist metes to others, it shall be measured to him again : God has as many ways to hurt his church's enemies, as they have to hurt his people ; if they lead into captivity, so can he ; if they kill with the sword, so will he. 3. The end and design of God in suffering antichrist's rage to break forth against the church : it is for the trial of the church's faith and patience. Note, 1. That none can stand under, or bear up under sufferings like saints. 2. That under great sufferings, saints themselves will have great occasion for the exercise of faith and patience. 3. That the faith and patience of the saints will be made very conspicuous by great and sharp sufferings. 4. That faith and patience must accompany each other in suffering times. Patience is the soul's shoulder to bear what is afflictive at present : faith is the christian's eye to discover a glorious deliverance to come : where no patience is, it is a token of no faith : and were no faith is, there will appear great impatience. Behold then, the faith and patience of the saints.

11 ¶ And I beheld another beast coming up out of the earth ; and he had two horns like a Lamb, and he spake as a dragon. 12 And he exerciseth all the power of the first beast before him, and caused the earth and them which dwell therein to worship the first beast, whose deadly wound was healed. 13 And he doth great wonders, so that he maketh fire come down from heaven on the earth, in the sight of men. 14 ¶ And deceiveth them that dwell on the earth by the means of those miracles which he had power to do in the sight of the beast ; saying to them that dwell on the earth, that they should make an image to the beast which had the wound by a sword, and did live.

Here St. John enters upon the description of a second beast, very different from the former, yet not succeeding the former, but appearing during his continuance ; and this beast

(whoever he is) we find sundry ways here described, namely, 1. By his original, he ascendeth out of the earth, verse 11. which denotes his rise from a small beginning to a mighty height, as those things which from small seeds grow out of the earth to be tall trees. Thus has one arisen from being episcopus urbis, to be episcopus orbis. 2. He is said to have two horns, whereas the former beast had ten, verse 1. which signifies ten kingdoms, into which the Roman empire, after its dissolution, should be divided. Accordingly, by the two horns here, in all reason, may be understood two of those kingdoms of which this beast (whoever he be) shall be possessed. 3. He is said to look like a lamb, but to speak like a dragon ; that is, to pretend to great meekness, and make a shew of much lenity and mildness in his proceedings, but should really be very cruel ; pretending to do all without violence, but doing indeed all by force, assisted by his armed dragons, and hooted apostles with javelins in their hands. 4. It is affirmed, ver. 12, that he shall arise during the continuance of the first beast, and engage in his cause, assuming to himself as great, or a greater power, than any emperors did before him, causing the earth, that is, all earthly-minded men who are subject to him, to worship the first beast, that is, to yield as great reverence and obedience to his decrees for establishing idolatry, as ever the people did under the pagan emperors. 5. He is remarkable for working wonders, and particularly for causing fire to come down from heaven in the sight of men ; that is, he seemeth to the deluded multitude to do as great miracles as Elias did, who brought down fire from heaven to confirm the religion he professed : In like manner the beast here works wonders seemingly great, lying wonders, false miracles, such as false prophets may work, and have wrought for confirming their false doctrines : Accordingly we find this beast here called the false prophet, elsewhere, chap. xvi. 8, 9.— 6. He requires the inhabitants of the earth to make an image to the beast, that is, he persuades them, now professing christianity, to introduce and bring in such a kind of idolatry, that the old heathenish idolatry may seem to revive again. Here note, That the idolatry of the church of Rome is a living image of the old heathenish idolatry ; this is but the image of that, that was performed to heathen deities, this to departed saints. Popery, says the learned Dr. More, is such a christianity, as in all points answers the model of the old execrable heathenism, with which the Gentiles were enamoured then as are the Papists now : Thus the wounded and dead image of pagan idolatry revived, and lives again in papal idolatry : Good God ! that any persons professing to know and worship the blessed Jesus, should thus dishonour him, by intermixing the old heathenish superstitious, or something worse, with his holy institutions.

15 ¶ And he had power to give life unto the image of the beast, that the image of the beast, should both speak, and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed.

16 ¶ And he causeth all, both small and great, rich and poor, free and bond, to receive a mark in their right hand, or in their foreheads : 17 And that no man might buy or sell save he that had the mark, or the name of the beast, or the number of his name.

18 Here is wisdom. Let him that hath understanding count the number of the beast. For it is the number of a man; and his number is six hundred threescore and six.

St. John proceeds here to give a farther character and description of the beast, which he had begun to describe, ver. 11. And, 1. His bloody cruelty is set forth, ver. 15. He caused them to be killed, &c. Where mark, it is not said, that he killed them himself, not challenging directly the power of life and death to himself; but he causeth them to be killed, namely, by the secular power, by the kings and princes, who are the horns of the beast, and who give their power and strength to the beast, and war against the Lamb. Again, 2. After his cruelty follows his compulsion, he causes all sorts of men, high and low, bond and free, to receive a mark in their right hand, and in their forehead, in allusion to an ancient custom which was to mark servants and soldiers on the arm, by which it was known what master or captain they belonged to, in like manner the beast here is said to have a mark for those that are his, which mark seems probably to have been an open owning of him, and active engagement for him, a professed subjection to him. 3. The beast is here said to interdict and forbid all trade and commerce with those that had not his mark, ver. 17. Several bulls and decrees have been sent from Rome, commanding that no traffic or commerce be had with any heretic in buying or selling, but only with those that profess themselves members of the Romish church. 4. It is added, that the number of the beast is six hundred and sixty six, that is, that the numeral letters of a certain word or name, being computed, should amount to that number. I shall close this chapter with the words of a great man, Archbishop Tillotson, on Rev. xiv. 13, page 329, "Unto whom all the fore-mentioned characters of the beast do agree, and especially the number of his name, I shall not presume to conjecture, much less positively to determine, because it is said to require a particular wisdom and understanding to find it out. However the event will discover it." And again, on St. Luke, ix. 55. he thus speaks: "It is believed by many, and not without cause, that the pope and his faction are the antichristian beast: I will say no more than I know in this matter; I am not certain that it is he that is particularly designed in scripture by that name; but however that be, I challenge antichrist himself, whoever he is, and whenever he comes, to do worse and wicked things than he has done; verily it almost looks uncharitably, barely to relate what these men have not blushed to act."

C H A P. XIV.

AND I looked, and lo, a Lamb stood on the mount Sion, and with him an hundred forty and four thousand, having his Father's name written in their foreheads.

This verse represents to us a fresh vision which St. John had, in which several things are very observable, ac, 1. What and whom St. John saw, a Lamb, by whom Christ is to be understood. 2. The posture which this Lamb was found in, he stood, shewing thereby his readiness to deliver his church, and to do every thing that is needful for her. 3. The place where he stood on, Mount Sion, that is, in the midst of the church. Christ ever has been, is, and will be present with his church, even to the end, although his presence with her is not always sensibly perceived, his care is mysteriously exercised; he is then taking most care of her when he seems to take least, nay, when the men of the world think he takes none at all. 4. His company and attendants; and they are described two ways (1.) By their number, to wit, an hundred forty and four thousand, whereby the collective body of the whole church is to be understood, and intimates to us, that in the worst of times, even when apostacy and persecution do most universally prevail, Christ never wants a church, and is not without a number of true worshippers. 2. They are described by their badge or mark, having the Father's name written in their foreheads; in opposition to the mark of the beast mentioned in the foregoing chapter, and in allusion to a custom among men, who put their marks or names upon their goods, especially upon silver or gold vessels, and the like: so that the mark of the Father's name upon the forehead denotes both the precious esteem which God has of his people, and also intimates their open profession and owning of him for their Lord and Master, and their faithful adherence to his worship. Learn hence, That the sincere worship of God, with the open and avowed profession of his holy and undefiled religion, accompanied with a suitable conversation, is a better mark and note of the true church than multitudes and numbers, which are a note of the antichristian synagogue; the world wonders after the beast, when mount Sion here affords only 144 000, which had the Father's name written on their foreheads.

2 And I heard a voice from heaven as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of a great thunder: and I heard the voice of harpers harping with their harps: 3 And they sung as it were a new song before the throne, and before the four beasts, and the elder: and no man could learn that song but the hundred and forty and four thousand; which were redeemed from the earth.

St. John here describes the true worshippers of Christ in the midst of antichristian idolatry, where we have, 1. The acceptable worship they perform, prayer and praise, an heavenly exercise, which, like thunder, and the voice of many waters, sounds loud in the ears of God, and is certainly heard by him, and is melodious like the harp, and therefore as acceptable to him as the sweetest musick is to us. 2. The persons described who perform this acceptable worship, such as were redeemed from the earth; where the earth is put for earthly-minded men, the false church: the meaning is, that God has fetched this small number of true worshippers, the hundred forty-four thousand, from among the false worshippers and impure ones, he hath rescued them from the world of idolaters, and from the superstitious multitude. 3. The persons described before whom this worship is performed: Before the throne, to shew the reverence and sincerity, were with they performed the same, as in the sight of the great and glorious God: and before the beasts and elders, that is, the whole congregations of the saints, according to that that of the Psalmist, Psal. lxxxix. 7. God is greatly to be feared in the assemblies of his saints, and to be had in reverence of all them that are round about him.

4 These are they which were not defiled with women: for they are virgins. These are they which follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth. These were redeemed from among men, being the first fruits unto God and to the Lamb.

St. John proceeds here in describing the true worshippers of God, which would not comply with antichristian idolatry. 1. He styles them virgins, thereby intimating that they are the chaste spouse of Christ, and the true church, who worship God alone with religious worship; and they have not defiled themselves with women, that is, spiritually committed whoredom; they have not been inveigled with the whore to commit spiritual fornication. Where note, That idolatry is a filthy sin, it is as odious to God as whoredom and uncleanness; and an idolatrous church is a filthy whore, unworthy to claim the title of a mother, unless it be the mother of fornications. 2. They are said to follow the Lamb, whithersoever he goes; this is spoken in opposition to those who followed the beast; and denotes their imitation of Christ's example, and their firm adherence to the purity of his doctrine and worship, although it expose them to hazard and danger. 3. They are called the first-fruits unto God, and the Lamb, which denotes their paucity, like a few sheaves in comparison of the whole harvest; their sanctity, the first-fruits were holy to the Lord, and were his peculiar portion, also their safety and security, as the first-fruits were God's portion, so it was both sacrilegious and unsafe to rob God of his portion. By calling them the first-fruits which were holy to the Lord, we see the special interest and propriety that God has in his faithful servants and true worshippers beyond all others, they are his peculiar portion, his inheritance, his treasure, which he will ever take care of, and be concerned for.

5 And in their mouth was found no guile: for they are without fault before the throne of God.

Here St. John closes the description of the forementioned followers of the Lamb, 1. With the character of their integrity, like the Lamb, no guile is found in their mouth, as there was none in his, 1. Pet. ii. 22 they were free from that hypocrisy which was found amongst antichrist's followers, who profess to worship God, but adore their idols: Sincerity and uprightness of heart towards God and man was found with them. 2. They are said to be without fault before God, which may be understood comparatively; they have no such faults as antichrist's followers are guilty of; they worship God aright and are approved by him; or if absolutely, we must understand it of their glorification in heaven, where all the saints are without spot, and blameless before the throne of God, perfect like unto God and the Lamb, as well in purity as in immortality.

6 ¶ And I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation and kindred and tongue and people, 7 Saying with a loud voice, Fear God and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come: and worship him that made heaven and earth and the sea and the fountains of waters.

Here St. John has another vision of an angel flying in the midst of heaven with great swiftness, which interpreters apprehend to signify the faithful ministers' zeal and diligence in preaching the glad tidings of the gospel to a lost world. Where note, 1. The title given to the gospel of Christ, it is called the everlasting gospel: to it is, partly in regard of its author the everlasting God, partly because it promises and offers everlasting life; but chiefly because it was preached from the beginning of the world, and shall continue to the end of the world, and never be abrogated, as the legal administration was. 2. The universality of that grace and salvation which in and by the gospel is held forth and tendered even unto all nations, tongues, kindred and people: so that none are debarred, but those who by impenitency and unbelief do wilfully and finally debar themselves. 3. That God sending the everlasting gospel to be preached, is here called the hour of his judgment; the preaching the gospel is the hour of mercy to some, but wrath and judgment to others, even to all refusers and contemners; and accordingly all are warned to fear God, and give glory to him, and instead of worshipping idols and images, to worship the true God according to his will revealed in his word.

8 ¶ And there followed another angel, saying, Babylon, is fallen, is fallen, that great city, because she made all nations drink of the wine of the wrath of her fornication.

Here we have the second angel's proclamation, denouncing the fall of Babylon, whose fall is in the prophecy threatened, and in the threatening ingeminated; Babylon is fallen, is fallen, to shew the certainty of her downfall: And it is observable how this comes in, immediately after the restoring of the gospel, mentioned in the foregoing verses, I saw an angel fly, having the everlasting gospel to preach, ver. 6. And there followed another angel, saying, Babylon is fallen, ver. 8. Whence learn, That it is the zealous and faithful preaching of the gospel which is the ruin of antichrist, and the means of his downfall and destruction; this is the breath of the Lord's mouth, by which he is consumed, Babylon is fallen, is fallen. Quest. What is here meant by Babylon? Answ. All agree that literal Babylon is not here meant, which was the chief city of Chaldea, but spoken figuratively; and it is generally agreed that by Babylon is Rome here intended; some will have it Rome pagan, under the heathen emperors, others Rome papal, under the antichristian tyranny, and that she is paralleled with Babylon for her idolatry and cruelty, yea, far exceeding her in both, for in her is found the blood of the prophets, Rev. xviii. 24. Observe next, Her ruin declared in the present tense, is fallen, as if already accomplished; and ingeminated, is fallen, is fallen; which repetition denotes both the certainty of her fall, and the joy which the church should express upon that occasion; though Babylon be never so great, yet she shall fall, she shall assuredly fall; and it is the church's duty to pray, that as it is in the prophecy, so it may be in the history, that Babylon is fallen, and to express the highest joy upon upon that great occasion. Lastly, The cause of Babylon's ruin is here assigned, she made all nations drink of the wine of the wrath of her fornication. Where note, 1. That by fornications, her errors, idolatries, and false worship are understood. 2. That these are compared to wine upon several accounts. Is wine pleasant to the palate? so is idolatry to corrupt nature, which is hugely pleased with a pompous worship, and a sensual religion. Is wine inflaming? so is idolatry; inflaming themselves with idols, Isa. lvii. 5. Does the wine deceive, and insensibly steal upon the drinker, and intoxicate him ere he is aware of it? so doth error and idolatry grow upon persons by insensible degrees; and accordingly, chap. xiii. 14 the beast is said to deceive them that dwell on the earth: In a word, as person drunk with wine are altogether incapable of counsel and advice from their best friends, in like manner such as are drunk with error and idolatry, with the wine of the whore's fornication, are befotted, benumbed, will not acknowledge their error, nor receive instruction. 3. That this wine as sweet as it is, is called the wine of wrath, partly because it inflames them that are drunk therewith with rage and cruel fury against sincere worshippers, and partly because it brings the wrath of God upon them that drink it: little do idolaters think of this, because it is a worship of their own invention, it pleases them because it feasts their outward senses, it is as grateful as wine unto them, but they forget that this wine is mixed with wrath, even with the wrath of God, the dregs of which shall be wrung out, and all idolaters shall drink them up.

9 And the third angel followed them, saying with a loud voice, If any man worship the beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead or in his hand, 10 The same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation; and he shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb: 11 And the smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever: and they have no rest day nor night, who worship the beast, and his image, and whosoever receiveth the mark of his name.

Observe here the great and special care which Almighty God takes to warn men and women of those dreadful plagues, which should most certainly come upon the heads of idolaters; a third angel followed, crying with a loud voice. O how good is God, in that he doth always premonish before he punishes! warns before he strikes, and advises all not to partake with others in their sins, lest they be partakers of their plagues? 2. A most dreadful denunciation of the wrath of God, against all those who shall worship the beast and his image, that is, submit to the enjoined idolatry, and receive his mark in their foreheads or hands, that is, yield obedience to the beast as a servant, and openly own subjection to him as his slaves. Lord! what a dreadful guiltiness is it to follow antichrist, and to continue obstinate in idolatry, after God has sent one angel after another, minister after minister, to acquaint them both with their sin and danger. 3. The denunciation itself in the several parts of it, 1. They shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, that is, for their sin shall partake of severe judgments, the effects of God's wrath. Mark, Here is wine for wine; for the wine of Babylon's fornication, here is the wine of the wrath of God; the former wine was not so sweet, but the latter shall be as sharp. 2. Here is the quality of this wrath, it is poured out without mixture; its being poured out shews the abundance of it, and without mixture, shews that it is without the least drop of mercy to allay the extremity of their torment. 3. It is called a cup of indignation, thereby intimating that it is not the correction of a father, which is accompanied with lenity and love, but the vengeance of a judge that designs utter destruction. 4. Here is the effect of their drinking of this cup of the Lord's indignation, their being tormented with fire and brimstone, which expression denotes these sinners torments to be most exquisite, both intolerable and interminable, and their punishment both easeless and endless. 5. It is here said, that this their torment shall be in the presence of the holy angels, and of the Lamb; in the sight of the Lamb, against whom, and in the sight of the angels, before whom they had sinned, in worshipping the beast, they shall see them, but none shall help them. 6. The eternity as well as the extremity of their torments is here set forth; their smoke ascends for ever and ever; the torments of hell are here set forth as most acute and exquisite, and as endless and easeless, they have no rest day nor night, nor a moment's ease. It is well observed by Mr. Mede, that there is not a more terrible description of punishment in the whole book of God, than is here denounced against those idolaters which adhere to the beast, the smoke of their torment, that is, the fire and smoke wherewith they are tormented, ascendeth up for ever and ever, and they have no rest day nor night, And if the church of Rome, or papal Babylon, be here intended and not pagan, as most protestants believe and affirm, then this shews that those of her communion, living and dying in a firm adherence to the chief doctrines of popery, and framing their lives by them, after they have had, or might have had, sufficient means to convince them of their error and idolatry, do expose their salvation to extreme hazard and danger. Blessed be God for our happy reformation, from the idolatry and superstition, from the tyranny and oppression, and the intolerable yoke of the church of Rome. God grant we may be reformed in our lives as well as in our religion, otherwise our damnation is as sure as theirs is great, for the holiest doctrine and purest worship, will be of no avail to impure worshippers and unholy livers; it matters not what church or what communion a bad man is of, for it is certain he cannot be saved by any.

12 Here is the patience of the saints: here are they that keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus.

That is, here at this time will be exercised all the faith and patience of Christ's faithful servants, and this their exercise of these graces will make it appear that they were true, and not counterfeit christians; it follows, here are they which keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus, that is, who discover themselves sincere in their profession, by obeying the commands of God, and rightly believing in our Lord Jesus Christ. Where note, What is the characteristical mark mark of a sincere christian, namely, faith and obedience united together, faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, and obedience to the will of God in all things, are never separated where they are sincere.

13 And I heard a voice from heaven saying unto me, Write, Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord, from henceforth: yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours, and their works do follow them.

These words in their original and primary intention were delivered by the Spirit, and commanded to be written by St. John, for the support and comfort of the church under that severe persecution which should befall it; and do declare the happy condition of martyrs particularly, and such as die for the Lord; but they may be considered in a greater latitude, and be of general use to the church of God in all ages, and under all circumstances, and administer comfort to all believers who die in the Lord, that is, in the faith of the Lord, in the fear of the Lord, and in the favour of the Lord, to all that die sincere christians, both in faith and practice.

Note, 1. A solemn declaration of the blessed state of good men after this life, their death is blessed, and a blessing to them. 2. The time from whence their blessedness commences, from henceforth, that is, from the time of their death, then doth their blessedness begin. Learn, That all good christians, immediately upon their dissolution and departure out of this life, are in a blessed and happy condition. 3. Wherein the blessedness of the righteous after their departure doth consist, 1. In resting from their labours, that is, from all the troubles, sorrows, and sufferings, from all the calamities, infirmities, and miseries of this frail mortal state; no sin shall afflict them, no sorrow afflict them, no danger affright them. 2. In reaping the comfort of all the good works they have done in the world, their works follow them, that is, A delightful remembrance of their good works and the special reward belonging to them, shall accompany good men into another world, which will render them completely blessed, by procuring for them, through the merits of our Lord Jesus Christ, an admission into heaven, where they shall drink of those pleasures which are at God's right hand for evermore. Lastly, How this truth concerning the future blessedness of the righteous, deserves our most serious and attentive regard and meditation because delivered by an audible voice from heaven, expressly commanded to be written, and confirmed by the solemn asseveration of the Spirit.

14 And I looked, and behold a white cloud, and upon the cloud one sat like unto the son of man, having on his head a golden crown, and in his hand a sharp sickle. 15 ¶ And another angel came out of the temple, crying with a loud voice to him that sat on the cloud, Thrust in thy sickle and reap: for the time is come for thee to reap; for the harvest of the earth is ripe. 16 And he that sat on the cloud thrust in his sickle on the earth; and the earth was reaped.

¶ In these verses a description is given of Christ as coming to judgment, to inflict punishment upon his stubborn enemies, and here we have the judge described, 1. By his form or shape, he was one like the Son of man. 2. By his place and posture of judgment, sitting on a white cloud, the cloud denoting the sovereignty of the judge, and whiteness signifying the uprightness of his proceedings and both signifying his speed and swiftness in coming to execute judgment; on this white cloud did he sit, denoting thereby, both his composedness and freedom from all passion and perturbation as a judge, and also his majesty and authority, sitting as a king upon his throne, as well as like a judge upon his tribunal. 3. He is described by his royal ornament having on his head a golden crown: behold here the different estate of our Lord Jesus Christ above, from what it was here below; here crowned with thorns, there crowned with gold, the reward to his sufferings! blessed be God, that as it was with the head, so shall it be with all the members! 4. By the instrument which he had in his hand fit for the work which he had in hand, namely, a sharp sickle for the reaping of the earth. A sickle is a circular instrument, and compasseth the corn round about, which it is to cut down; the judgment of Christ upon the wicked will enclose them all, not a soul of them shall be able to escape it; and a sharp sickle signifies the quality of his judgment, that it will be severe. Behold here the unavoidable destruction of the wicked, and how impossible it is for them to escape the judgments of Christ; all the wicked together are no more in the hand of Christ than as a handful of grass, or ripe corn, to a sharp sickle in a strong hand. In ver. 15. we have a manifestation of the church's fervent desire that Christ would make speed, and hasten his work, and come quickly to judgment, both for the consummation of their glory, and for the destruction of his own and their enemies: thrust in thy sickle, and reap, for the harvest is ripe; that is, it is full time to execute thy judgment on the wicked, for their sins (which call for these judgments) are now come to the height. Behold here Christ's day of judgment is like a day of harvest; when the corn is ripe the sickle is got ready; when the sickle is got ready, it is set to work; when it is set to work it cuts all down, wheat and tares, corn and grass, without discrimination; but the Lord of the harvest soon commands a separation to be made of the good grain from the tares, of the righteous from the wicked, laying up the former in the granary of heaven, binding up the latter for the fire of hell. In verse 16. we have observable, 1. Christ's ready answering of, and complying with, the desires of his people, to thrust in the sickle of his judgment, and reap the earth. How ready is Christ to fulfil the desires of them that fear him, to hear their cry, and help them in his own time, in the best and fittest season! 2. The great and infinite power of our Lord Jesus Christ, that upon the thrusting in of his sickle, the whole earth was presently reaped. Behold the ability of Christ for judgment, as well as his impartiality in judging; such a judge is he, as the power of the mightiest cannot daunt; such a judge, as the riches of the wealthiest cannot bribe; such a judge, as the subtlety of the wisest cannot deceive; in a word, such a judge, as there is no appealing from, no repealing of his sentence. O great day! when the stiffest knee shall bow at the tribunal of Christ, and the strongest back shall bend under the unsupportable burden of the wrath of the Lamb; when the Alexanders, and Cæsars, which once shook the earth, and caused the world to tremble, shall revere and lie prostrate at the foot.

of Christ! Behold then, and admire the wonderful power and dexterity of Christ in judging; that upon the thrusting in of his sickle the whole earth was presently reaped!

17 And another angel came out of the temple which is in heaven, he also having a sharp sickle. 18 And another angel came out from the altar, which had power over fire; and cried with a loud cry to him that had the sharp sickle saying, Thrust in thy sharp sickle, and gather the clusters of the vine of the earth; for her grapes are fully ripe. 19 ¶ And the angel thrust in his sickle into the earth, and gathered the vine of the earth, and cast it into the great wine-press of the wrath of God. 20 And the wine-press was trodden without the city, and blood came out of the wine-press, even unto the horse-bridles, by the space of a thousand and six hundred furlongs.

In the former verses we meet with a metaphor of an harvest, in these we meet with that of a vintage; there the wicked were compared to ripe corn fit for the harvest, here the ripe grapes fit for the wine-press: signifying by both, that the wicked, by filling up the measure of their sins, do make themselves ripe and ready for judgment. *Note here, 1. That as the true church is called a vine, so is the wicked anti-christian church here called; but with this addition a vine of the earth, cleaving to, and only favouring of the earth; a good name will signify little in judgment; to be called christians, virgins, &c. what will it profit, without burning and shining lamps? 2. Whereas the grapes of this vine are said to be not only ripe, but fully ripe, how great is the forbearance and long-suffering of God towards the wicked? The patience of God towards sinners is the greatest miracle in the world; but though lasting it will not be everlasting; when long abused, it turns at last into fury; ripeness in sin, is a sure prognostication of judgment at hand. 3. The vine with all its clusters are gathered, small and great one and another, all shall appear before the bar of Christ, chap. xx. *Note, 4. Whither this degenerated vine, with all its clusters, was cast, namely, into the wine-press of God's wrath, which is called a great wine-press, because it can contain all the wicked; it will hold them all, be they ever so many; and is said to be trodden, that is, by Christ, denoting the severity of that vengeance which will be inflicted upon sinners; the grapes which have hung a long time ripening in the sun are severely pressed at last. 5. That the blood which came out of the wine-press (the blood of the grape) was so much in quantity, that it came up to the horse-bridles, by the space of a thousand and six hundred furlongs; all metaphorical expressions, signifying that wine is the wrath of God, and the cup of his indignation; and the hyperbolical expression of its height, reaching as high as the horse's bridle; and of its length, reaching more than a thousand furlongs, shews that mighty deluge and inundation of God's wrath, which the wicked in general, and all antichrist's followers in particular, shall not only drink of. But swim in; and as they shed the blood of the saints abundantly, in like manner God will give them blood to drink in great abundance. Lastly, That although these two metaphors of the harvest and the vintage signify one thing only, the vision is doubled, like Pharaoh's dream, to shew the certainty thereof, yet we may conceive that the similitude of a vintage here holds forth greater judgment than the harvest: Almighty God, in his providential dispensation towards the wicked, proceeds gradually; as they proceed from one degree of wickedness, so does he from one degree of wrath and vengeance to another; the vintage follows the harvest, the sharp sickle follows the sickle, the harvest is said to be ripe, the vintage to be fully ripe; if the flood of God's anger in this life will not wash sinners clean, the deluge of his wrath in the next will wash them quite away. Eternal thanks to Christ the Lamb, who has delivered his from this dreadful wrath to come!

CHAP. XV.

AND I saw another sign in heaven great and marvellous, seven angels having the seven last plagues, for in them is filled up the wrath of God.

This and the following chapter acquaints us with a fresh vision, which St. John had of the pouring forth of the vials, or the inflicting of the seven last plagues and judgments upon the world, upon the heathen world, say some, upon the antichristian world, say most: I saw seven angels, having the seven last plagues, &c. where by seven angels, understand the ministers and executioners of the wrath of God; by the seven plagues, understand the last dreadful judgments that should be inflicted, which would make a final end of him, whoever he be, that they should be poured forth upon him one after another. Note, 1. How the patience, forbearance, and long-suffering goodness of God is wonderfully seen in his carriage towards sinners: though he punishes the wicked sometimes, to let them see that his justice is not asleep, yet he doth not stir up all his wrath, nor poureth it out all at once upon them, but gradually; desirous of, and waiting for their repentance, even when he has begun in justice to punish them. 2. Whereas it is said, in them (that is, in the present seven plagues) is filled up the wrath of God: We learn, what final impenitency and incorrigibleness under former judgments, will produce at last; namely, judgment to the uttermost; ripeness in sin will at last make men ripe for ruin: and when they have filled up the measure of their sins, God will fill up the measure of his wrath.

2 I saw as it were a sea of glass mingled with fire; and them that had gotten the victory over the beast, and over his image, and over his mark, and over the number of his name, stand on the sea of glass, having the harps of God. 3 ¶ And they sing the song of Moses the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb, saying, Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints. 4 Who shall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name? for thou only art holy; for all nations shall come and worship before thee; for thy judgments are made manifest.

There seem here to be an allusion to the Israelites deliverance out of Egypt, and to the song of Moses upon that occasion, recorded Exod. xv. As they were delivered out of literal Egypt, so these from mystical Egypt, both nets of idolatry and false worship; a deliverance from both which deservedly called for a song of thanksgiving. I saw a sea of glass mingled with fire; that is, a great number of pure zealous christians, their multitude being represented by the sea, their purity by glass, and their zeal by fire: who had gotten victory over the beast, and over his image; that is, who overcame all temptations to idolatry, both from the pagan and antichristian emperors, called the beast and his image. Having the harps of God in their hand, in allusion to the musical instruments used in the temple-service, and denoting hearts fitted for, and tuned by, the Spirit of God, to praise him with cheerfulness for preserving them from being overcome by temptations to idolatry. Learn, That such as are sincerely gracious, are truly thankful to God for all his benefits and blessings, but especially for their preservation from sin, and their getting victory over temptations. Observe next, The work of solemn praise and thanksgiving, which the purified and preserved souls were engaged in, and employed about. Note, 1. The title of the song, namely, The song of Moses and the Lamb. The song of Moses, that is, a song much like unto that of Moses and the Israelites, after they had passed safely through the Red sea, Exod. xv. And the song of the Lamb; so called, because it was a song indited by the Spirit of the Lamb, and tending to advance the glory of the Lamb. 2. The matter of the song, which is divided into two parts (1.) The church's confession and declaration of those works which Christ doth: Great and marvellous are thy works, &c. that is, they are great and wonderful works, fit only to be done by him who is the Lord God almighty: just and true, well becoming him who is King of saints. (2.) The use which the church makes of these works; and that is, 1. To record, celebrate, and publish them. 2. To oblige and bind themselves, faster and closer to him in his worship and service. Observe farther, The titles which are here by the church given unto God. 1. The Lord God almighty. A title full of comfort to the saints in their greatest straits, and full of terror to their enemies in the midst of their abundance. 2. He is stiled King of saints, they receiving special protection from him, and he exercising a particular care over them. 3. He only is said to be holy; that is, essentially and casually: Essentially in himself, and casually with respect to us; all holiness is originally in him, all holiness is derivatively from him, therefore should the praise thereof be given to him. Lastly, The duty inferred from all those glorious titles which are here given to God, and for all the great and marvellous works done by him: Who shall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name? As if he had said, "All ought to do so, and there is great reason for so doing." As God is to be feared because he is full of power and justice, so then especially should his people fear him, when he is taking vengeance on his enemies, his own and his church's adversaries.

5 And after that I looked, and behold, the temple of the tabernacle of the testimony in heaven was opened: 6 And the seven angels came out of the temple, having the seven plagues, clothed in pure and white linen, and having their breasts girded with golden girdles.

Observe, 1. The vision which St. John had; he thought he saw the Holy of holies open to him, and seven angels coming forth with seven plagues, as the executioners of God's judgments upon idolatrous persons. Note, 1. The instruments employed by God for executing his wrath upon sinners, angels, seven angels; not that he needs them, but he is pleased to make use of them; and they are but instruments in his hand, his bow, and his battle-ax, mere dead tools, who receive all their efficacy from the hand that uses them: Their presence adds no strength to him, their absence makes the work no more difficult to him. 2. From whence these seven angels came, namely, out of the temple, out of the oracle, more immediately from the presence of God, implying, that they came forth to execute vengeance by God's special directions, and not barely by his permission; and consequently that the work was very acceptable and well-pleasing unto God which they went about. 3. How they are furnished, having seven plagues; namely, to inflict upon the idolatrous enemies of the church. 4. In and after what manner these angels were appalled and appeared. 1. They were clothed in pure white linen, to denote the holiness of their persons, as also the holiness of that work which they had then in hand. 2. This clothing of their's was girded to them, expressing thereby their great readiness for, and their great alacrity and cheerfulness in, their work. 3. The girdle wherewith they were girded was a golden girdle, exactly answering the habit of the high priest, when he entered into the Holy of holies, to enquire of God, or came out with an answer from God. From the whole learn, That when the Lord comes to pull down Babylon, as well as to build up Sion, he will appear in glory: The angels are God's special ministers; when they go forth to pour out the vials of his wrath upon Babylon, they appear gloriously apparelled, glittering like the high priest, and girded with golden girdles.

7 ¶ And one of the four beasts gave unto the seven angels, seven golden vials full of the wrath of God, who liveth for ever and ever. 8 And the temple was filled with smoke from the glory of God, and from his power: and no man was able to enter into the temple, till the seven plagues of the seven angels were fulfilled.

Observe, 1. That what was called seven plagues in the foregoing verse, is here called seven golden vials full of the wrath of God: In this verse vials are full cups. Vials of wrath are prepared when the measures of a people's sins are filled up; full cups of sin are followed with full vials of God's wrath. Next, These vials are said to be of gold, signifying, that these judgments proceed from a just God, with whom there is no corruption nor iniquity in judgments, he being holy in all his ways and righteous in all his works. These vials are also said to be full of the wrath of God, who liveth for ever and ever; as an aggravation of the same, it not being like the wrath of a mortal man, of short continuance, but of endless duration; it is the wrath of him that ever lives to maintain his wrath, and to uphold and sustain the sinner under the execution and infliction of this wrath, that the sinner cannot run from him. O what a fearful thing is it to fall into the hands of the living God, whose wrath is both intolerable and interminable! the sinner can neither stand stand under it, nor flee from it. 2. The executioners of this wrath are said to be seven angels. The angels which are merciful attendants upon the godly, are also, at God's command, the executioners of his wrath upon the wicked. These angels are here said to be seven, to signify that God's judgments upon his church's adversaries shall be heavy and great: One angel plagued all Egypt, and destroyed Senacherib's mighty host, but here went out seven angels to destroy antichrist. 3. The tremendous dreadfulness of this wrath, intimated by filling the temple with smoke, thereby signifying, that the wrath of God kindled against his enemies shall be unto them like a devouring and consuming fire, before the flame of which burst forth, a cloud of smoke appears. Learn, That almighty God is glorified in the destruction, as well as in the salvation of sinners; his glory is as well seen in his smoking wrath against the wicked, as in his saving mercy towards the godly. The temple was filled with smoke from the glory of God, and from his power; it follows—No man was able to enter into the temple; that is, to deprecate God's anger, and supplicate his mercy, or to avert the plagues threatened, and now just ready to be inflicted; when mercy has been long offered and despised, the Lord at last becomes inexorable, and will suffer none to intercede, or plead with him, Jer. xv. Though Moses and Samuel stood before me, yet my mind cannot be towards this people; cast them out of my sight, &c. The sins of a people may sometimes grow to such an height, that almighty God will no longer be netreated; and when we know it, it is our duty to cease praying for them, Wo, wo, wo, be unto such a people.

C H A P. XVI.

AND I heard a great voice out of the temple, saying to the seven angels, Go your ways, and pour out the vials of the wrath of God upon the earth.

Observe, 1. The command given to the seven angels, the executioners of God's justice, to do their office, namely, in pouring out the vials of his wrath upon the earth. The command is here said to be given by a voice, by a great voice; because it was the command of a great God, and about a great work: and it is said to come out of the temple, in allusion to the Holy of holies, the place of God's exhibiting himself, and from whence he gave forth oracles of old. 2. How the seven angels (the instruments of God in executing his judgments) receive their commission from God, and pour not out one vial on the earth till they are required so to do; and being called vials of the wrath of God, it gives us this intimation, that what is done against antichrist is not the effect of man's revenge, but the fruit of God's wrath; and whereas vials are vessels of large content, but of narrow mouths, which pour out slowly, but still effectually, and drench deeply, it imports, that the wrath of God is, though slow, yet sure; it comes upon sinners gradually; but if, upon its approach, they repent not, it will at last, like a mighty torrent, wash them away from off the earth.

2 And the first went and poured out his vial upon the earth; and there fell a noisome and grievous sore upon the men which had the mark of the beast, and upon them which worshipped his image.

Observe, 1. What allusion this plague inflicted upon Babylon has to that plague which God of old inflicted upon Egypt, Exod. ix. 9. Egypt had her boil breaking forth, with blains upon man, and upon beast; in like manner, the worshippers of the beast have noisome and grievous sores upon them: that is, great trouble and uneasiness of mind upon the first prospect of the shaking of their kingdom, by discovering the vanity, blasphemy, hypocrisy, and tyranny, of their devised religion; even as sores and blains do vex and torture those that are troubled with them. Learn, That it is no small vexation and trouble to the wicked, when they have their sins detected and discovered, it is as great a torture to their minds as an ulcer or boil is to their bodies.

3 And the second angel poured out his vial upon the sea, and it became as the blood of a dead man: and every living soul died in the sea. 4 And the third angel poured out his vial upon the rivers and fountains of waters; and they became blood.

Observe, That this second and third plague poured out upon the sea, and the rivers of waters, whereby they became blood, have a manifest allusion to that plague of Egypt whereby all the waters were turned into blood, Exod. vii. 19. Farther, That by the sea and the rivers full of blood, the bloody persecutors in the antichristian church are supposed to be meant, who, by slaughter and bloodshed, seek to plant and propagate a bloody religion throughout the earth. Lastly, That the pouring out of these vials gradually and successively upon idolaters and persecutors, and not altogether, and all at once, but one after another teaches us, how abounding the patience, forbearance, and long-suffering goodness of God is even toward the worst of sinners; not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance.

5 And I heard the angel of the waters say, Thou art righteous, O Lord, which art, and wast, and shalt be, because thou hast judged thus. 6 ¶ For they have shed the blood of saints and prophets, and thou hast given them blood to drink; for they are worthy. 7 And I heard another out of the altar say, Even so, Lord God almighty, true and righteous are thy judgments.

These verses seem to be a key to let us into the right understanding of the verses immediately foregoing; and clearly shew that as the idolatrous enemies of the church did shed the blood of saints and martyrs, so should theirs be shed; which is called their having blood to drink. Note, 1. The approbation which the angel gives of the equity and righteousness of God's judgments upon these bloody persecutors. Where the retribution which God makes of blood for blood, shews the righteousness of God in his judgments inflicted; and also declares that almighty God doth sometimes so suit his judgments to the sin committed, that persons may read their sin in their punishment. As these persecutors thirsted after blood, so here they get blood to drink. 2. How the angel in the fifth verse, and the other in the seventh verse, do both rejoice in the execution of God's judgments, and in the terrible revenge of the blood of saints.

8 And the fourth angel poured out his vial upon the sun; and power was given unto him to scorch men with with fire. 9 And men were scorched with great heat, and blasphemed the name of God, which hath power over these plagues: and they repented not to give him glory.

Observe here, 1. That the fourth vial is said to be poured forth upon the sun, which metaphorically taken in scripture usually signifies some great prince or potentate: Here the head of the anti-christian party is supposed to be the sun, upon which the wrath of this vial falls. 2. The effect which followed hereupon, Power was given him to scorch men with fire; and the event which ensued was double, men blasphemed the name of God; and repented not to give him glory.

Learn, 1. That although God sends his judgments to call the wicked to repentance, yet they will not repent of sin, even when they lie under the wrathful hand of God, but will rather break forth to further wickedness, even to blaspheme the holy name of God. 2. That what the damned do in hell, where the wrath of God is poured out upon men to the uttermost, that do incorrigible and unreclaimable sinners upon earth; they are scorched with great heat, the vengeance of God cometh upon them; they are mad and enraged, and blaspheme the holy and just God who bringeth such plagues upon them; but they have no sense of their sins, no thoughts of turning unto God, or of giving glory to him: These men here blasphemed, but repented not.

10 And the fifth angel poured out his vial upon the seat of the beast: and his kingdom was full of darkness: and they gnawed their tongues for pain, 11 And blasphemed the God of heaven, because of their pain and their sores, and repented not of their deeds.

Observe here, 1. The gradual approaches which almighty God makes by his plagues and judgments towards the anti-christian beast; he began farther off at first, and then came nearer and nearer to him; the first vial was poured out upon the earth, the second upon the sea, the third upon the rivers, the fourth upon the sun, now the fifth upon the seat of the east; that is, probably, the seat of his empire, the chief place where he appeareth in the highest majesty and glory. This should teach us all at the first alarm of judgments to draw near to God by a true and timely repentance, before he comes nearer to us by a succession of plagues and punishments. 2. The effect and consequent which did ensue and follow upon the pouring out of this vial upon the throne or seat of the beast. 1. His kingdom was full of darkness: this vial did not destroy, but distress him, it filled his kingdom with the darkness of misery and trouble, of calamity and horror; by the loss of that lustre, respect and reverence, which the throne of the beast had before, but was wanting now. 2. As an evidence of this distress, it is here said, that they gnawed their tongues for pain; that is, they were almost distracted at the declining of their grandeur.

Note, 1. From the gnawing of their tongues, which was an indication of the horror of their consciences, that as almighty God makes the guilty consciences of the wicked to be their own accusers, so he can make them, whenever he pleases, to be their own tormenters. 2. How almighty God doth visit his judgments sometimes to a people's sin, as that if they do not wink hard, or wilfully shut their eyes, they may and must see and read their sin in their punishment. These worshippers of the beast seduced others by their false doctrine, and sinned with their tongues, and now God makes their tongues like so many scorpions' tails, the instruments of their torments. Note, That as the plagues he inflicted resembled the plagues of Egypt, so the worshippers of the beast, whom they were inflicted upon, resembled Pharaoh king of Egypt, who hardened his heart yet more and more against the Lord, and repented not.

12 And the sixth angel poured out his vial upon the great river Euphrates; and the water thereof was dried up, that the way of the kings of the east might be prepared.

Observe, 1. In the drying up of the river Euphrates, a manifest allusion to the manner of old Babylon's destruction. The river Euphrates ran through old Babylon, and was a greater defence to it than its celebrated walls, which for thickness and height were the wonder of the world. Cyrus, when he took Babylon, cut many ditches, and let the river Euphrates run out, and so he and his soldiers entered the city, then fordable, and took it. Now, as the drying up of Euphrates then was an immediate forerunner of the destruction of Babylon, in like manner the drying up of Euphrates, signify what it will, shall be the immediate forerunner of the destruction of antichristian Babylon, whenever it shall be. The Romish Euphrates being dried up, the Romish Babylon will hasten apace towards its final ruin. Quest. But what is meant by Euphrates here? Answer. Probably the Turkish empire, according to Mr. Mede and Dr. More, the Turks first taking up their habitation about this great river: So that by Euphrates may be understood the people inhabiting about Euphrates; and by drying up its waters, the diminishing and lessening of their empire. By the kings of the east, the Jews are said to be understood, who inhabit the eastern countries, to whom God made a promise, Exod. xix. 6. that they should be a kingdom of priests: So that here seems to be a prophecy of the Jews conversion to the christian religion, which two things do chiefly hinder, namely, the idolatry of Rome, and the power of Constantinople; the image-worship of the Papists, and the puissance of the Turks; but both these being taken away by the fall of Babylon, and the ruin of the Turks, the way then will seem prepared for the Jews receiving of the christian faith. Taking the words in this sense, the notes are these. 1. That the days will come wherein Christian princes and states shall pour out the wrath of God upon Popish idolatry, and Turkish tyranny. 2. That the pouring out of the wrath of God upon both these grand enemies of God, will prepare and make ready the way for the Jews conversion to him.

13 And I saw three unclean spirits like frogs come out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the false prophet. 14 For they are the spirits of devils, working miracles, which go forth unto the kings of the earth and of the whole world, to gather them to the battle of that great day of God almighty.

In the foregoing verses an account was given of the subject upon which the sixth vial was poured out, namely, upon the river Euphrates. Here we have an effect and followed thereupon, namely, a warlike expedition or gathering to battle. Note, 1. The principle commanders in this battle, namely, the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet. 2. The instruments employed, and made use of by them, who are here said to be, for their nature, spirits, for their quality, unclean, for their number, three, for their similitude and resemblance, like frogs, namely, with respect to their original, they breed of corruption and in great numbers swarm and croak in all places, and live both in the water, and upon the earth; by all which many interpreters understand emissaries, missionaries, negotiators, solicitors, and legates, sent forth and employed by antichrist for the support and strengthening both of him and his kingdom, by soliciting the kings of the earth to join together, in a battle against the church. Behold here how the dragon, the beast, and the false prophet, do send forth all their emissaries, and employ all their instruments, to stir up princes, and engage them in battle, to withstand the reformation of christians, and the conversion of the Jews. Observe farther, The actions here said to be performed by them, namely, their working miracles by the power of the devils: that is, such wonderful things as Satan can sometimes produce, or at least delude people's senses, and make them believe that they are produced and effected by him. Where note, That the advantage which the false church makes of a pretended power with her to work miracles, the Spirit of God, both here and elsewhere (2 Theff. ii. 9.) makes to be a badge of antichrist and his followers.

15 ¶ Behold, I come as a thief. Blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked, and they see his shame.

These consolatory words of Christ seem to be inserted here for the support of the faithful servants of God, against those great preparations of the enemy in the day of battle, Behold, says Christ, I then come as a thief, secretly, suddenly, and unexpectedly, to destroy these enemies when they least expect me; and then am I at hand to take vengeance on them, and to deliver my church, when they least think of me; Blessed is he that watcheth, namely against those temptations which he will be then exposed to; and keepeth his garments, that is, his profession, unspotted from sin, and the defilements of antichrist; lest he walk naked, that is, appear as a man destitute of uprightness and sincerity; and they see his shame, which ever follows upon a sinful course. Note here, 1. That when Christ comes, he comes suddenly, even as a thief cometh. 2. That although Christ comes suddenly, and as a thief, yet he is pleased to give us warning of his coming, Behold I come. 3. That when Christ's coming is near at hand, there is danger that many for want of watchfulness will lose their garments. 4. That is, to such as through negligence shall lose their garments, this misery will befall them; they shall walk naked, and men shall see their shame. 5. That those few who watch and keep their garments, are certainly in a happy and blessed condition.

16 And he gathered them together into a place called in the Hebrew tongue Armageddon.

He, that is, almighty God, by his permissive providence suffered the kings of the earth to hearken to antichrist's missionaries, who, like frogs hop abroad even into kings' palaces, and persuade them to assemble and gather together, as Jabin and Sisera gathered together against Israel, to their own destruction: And whereas the place of their gathering together is called Armageddon, this is so named from the event of the battle; signifying such a place where the enemies of the church shall be destroyed. Learn hence, That the event and success of that battle, which the adherents of antichrist shall fight for him, will be desperate destruction to themselves, joyful victories and triumphs to the churches of Christ.

17 And the seventh angel poured out his vial into the air; and there came a great voice out of the temple of heaven, from the throne, saying, It is done. 18 And there were voices and thunders and lightnings; and there was a great earthquake, such as was not since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake and so great. 19 And the great city was divided into three parts, and the cities of the nations fell: and great Babylon came in remembrance before God, to give unto her the cup of the wine of the fierceness of his wrath. 20 And every island fled away, and the mountains were not found. 21 And there fell upon men a great hail out of heaven, every stone about the weight of a talent: and men blasphemed God because of the plague of the hail; for the plague thereof was exceeding great.

These words describe and declare unto us the pouring out of the seventh vial by the seventh angel; in which we have observable, 1. The subject upon which it fell, namely, the air; not that the elements of air, earth, or water, are to be understood in this chapter literally; for the vials poured forth are vials of wrath, and consequently are poured forth upon the proper subjects of God's displeasure, which the elements are not; but it is the earthly antichristian church which is thought to be here intended, so called in opposition to the heavenly and pure church. So that by the air here, Mr. Mede understands all the subjects of Satan's kingdom, who is called the prince of the air; and the pouring out of this vial upon the air denotes the full and final destruction of Satan's power. 2. The adjunct and accompanying the pouring out of this vial, namely, a voice out of heaven, saying, It is done; that is, "These last plagues are now finished, the work of God is done, and what in his counsels he designed for the destruction of his enemies, and for the deliverance of his people; this is said to be done, because it was now doing; and accomplished, because it was now accomplishing." God's threatenings of judgment (except men repent) are sure when denounced, as if they were already executed. 3. The direful effects and dreadful consequences of this last vial's pouring forth, namely, 1. Thunder, lightning, and earthquake; all implying thus much, that the storm of God's wrath now coming upon the kingdoms of sin, Satan, and antichrist, would be very terrible and amazing. 2. The great city was divided into three parts; into three factions, say some, and that antichrist's kingdom was now falling by being divided within itself: and the cities of the nations fell; namely, namely, heathen nations, and places which withstood Christ and his gospel. For all Christ's enemies are now to be deposed from public authority. And great Babylon came up in remembrance before God: Not that God was ever unmindful of her, either of her impiety towards himself, or of her cruelty towards his people; but as good works are said to be remembered when they are rewarded, so wickedness is then remembered when it is punished; God remembered Babylon, when, for the full cup of her sins, he put into her hand a full cup of the wine of the fierceness of his wrath. God is never forgetful either of his church's sufferings, or his enemies sins, but will punish the one, and redress the other, in his own appointed time. 3. As another effects of the pouring forth of this vial, it is added, every island fled away, and the mountains were not to be found; signifying, say some, that the remotest and strongest places, which owned and maintained Babylon, shall either be converted or confounded. Intimating, say others, that there shall be no place in that day of God's wrath, to flee unto for safety; neither island on the sea, nor mountain on dry land. Lastly, The superadded judgment of unusual hail which God poured forth upon Babylon, as before upon Egypt, Exod. ix. There fell great hail out of heaven, every stone about the weight of a talent. An hyperbolical expression, setting forth the design and purpose of God to pursue Babylon, and the worshippers of the beast, until they be utterly destroyed. A talent, say some, was an hundred pound weight; if so, these hail-stones were sufficient not only to kill men, but to dash them all in pieces. This heavy hail shews that weighty sins procure heavy judgments; yet mark what a bad use these obdurate sinners made of all these tremendous judgments, they blasphemed God. They were so obstinate in their idolatry, that they stood it out against all God's judgments. And when they should have humbled themselves under his mighty hand, they open their mouths in blasphemies against him. Note, That in the book of Exodus we do not read that the old Egyptians blasphemed God when the plague of hail was inflicted upon them, nor when they lay under any of the ten plagues: But these idolaters, instead of giving glory to God, they blaspheme him, because of the greatness of their plagues. This perhaps is an emblem of what the damned will do at the day of judgment; though their consciences be convicted of the righteousness of their sentence, yet will they not cease to pour out blasphemies against God, upon the account of the severity and eternity of their torments. But verily then will all the divine attributes be conspicuously glorified, his wonderful clemency sweetly displayed, his exact justice terribly demonstrated, his perfect wisdom clearly unfolded; and all the knotty intrigues of providence wisely resolved, and the injured honour and glory of almighty God visibly cleared and repaired, to the joyful satisfaction of all good men, and to the dreadful consternation and confusion of all impenitent sinners, who with these worshippers of the beast will gnaw their tongues for anguish, and blaspheme the holy and just God most unjustly, for bringing upon them that destruction which they had deserved, yea, that damnation which they had chosen: And men blasphemed God because of the plague of the hail; for the plague thereof was exceeding great.

C H A P. XVII.

AND there came one of the seven angels which had the seven vials, and talked with me, saying unto me, Come hither, I will shew unto thee the judgment of the great whore, that sitteth upon many waters:

Observe here, 1. The angel's invitation to the subsequent vision, One of the angels talked with me, saying, Come hither, &c. Where we see the readiness of those ministering spirits, the holy angels, to do any good office for the saints, and with what cheerfulness they are employed about things for our consolation, and the sweet familiarity that is between them and the saints, evidenced by that expression, He talked me with, &c. 2. The promise which the angel makes to St. John namely, to shew him the judgment of that great whore. By the whore all understand the city of Rome: only some will have it Rome pagan, others Rome papal, or the great idolatrous city and church of Rome: Idolatry is often, in scripture-style, called whoredom; and idolaters are said to go a whoring from God. A whore is a person married to an husband, who afterwards proves false to his bed. The papal present church of Rome deserves this name, having been guilty of the greatest defection and apostacy from the true evangelical doctrine and worship that ever was in the world; and she is deservedly also called the great whore, because of her whoredoms committed with so many under her power and jurisdiction, having many people subject to her, and for that reason is here said to sit upon many waters. The true church is Christ's bride and spouse, she is betrothed unto him in righteousness, in loving-kindness and in tender mercy, and at any time by idolatry to apostatise from him in spiritual whoredom, which shall not pass without deserved punishment. Learn hence, How hateful idolatry is to God, and how highly it provokes God's wrath, even as the whoredom of a woman, who plays the common harlot, provokes the jealousy of her husband. Verily, never was husband more jealous of the chastity of his suspected wife, than God is jealous in point of worship.

2 With whom the kings of the earth have committed fornication, and the inhabitants of the earth have been made drunk with the wine of her fornication.

Babylon was charged with committing whoredom in the former verse; in this, the persons are declared whom the committed whoredom with, viz. with kings, and the inhabitants of the earth; that is, with all sorts of persons, small and great, rich and poor. Where note, That she is, 1. A catholic whore, common and shameless; she refuses none that will be lewd with her. 2. A politic whore; she first draws kings and princes to commit fornication with her, and then other inhabitants; well knowing how fast the example of superiors is commonly followed by inferiors; and whereas she is said to make them drunk with the wine of her fornication, the Spirit of God seems to intimate, that idolatry is like unto wine; a sensual sort of worship, and therefore alluring; making persons drunk, therefore intoxicating. Wine is sweet, but proves deceitful; idolatry is pleasing to man's corrupt nature, but brings wrath and judgment upon the sinner.

3 ¶ So he carried me away in the spirit into the wilderness: and I saw a woman sit upon a scarlet-coloured beast, full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads, and ten horns. 4 And the woman was arrayed in purple and scarlet colour, and decked with gold and precious stones and pearls, having a golden cup in her hand, full of abominations and filthiness of her fornication. 5 ¶ And upon her forehead was a name written, MYSTERY, BABYLON THE GREAT, THE MOTHER OF HARLOTS, AND ABOMINATIONS OF THE EARTH.

Observe, 1. That St. John was not in one continued ecstasy, but at several times in the spirit; that is, in an ecstasy or rapture of mind, wherein his outward senses being bound up, his understanding was fixed and raised up to the contemplation of divine objects, represented to him in the vision. A spiritual frame of mind is requisite for discerning the visions of God. 2. The place whither St. John was carried, and where he saw the following vision, namely, in the wilderness: A place of privacy say some, where he might discern things undisturbedly and undistractedly. Solitude is fittest for contemplation. A wilderness, say others, was the fittest place to see that church in a vision, which was itself a wilderness: The apostolical church before, was driven into the wilderness; here the apostate church follows her, as an harlot succeeding to a faithful city. 3. The vision itself: I saw a woman sit upon a scarlet-coloured beast, &c. The woman here is the same with her that was called whore, ver. 1. namely, idolatrous Rome: she is represented as a woman richly and splendidly arrayed, with her wealth and riches, with her pomp and power enticing the world to her idolatry, called so often whoredom and spiritual fornication; and the golden cup in her hand is an allusion to harlots, who, with their philters or enchanted cups, do allure and provoke men to sensual satisfactions; in like manner doth Rome, by her outward splendour, allure, and, by other specious pretences and means, draw persons to her idolatries and superstitions. Lastly, The name written on her forehead, to wit, Mystery, Babylon the Great; that is, not literal, but mystical Babylon, the great city of Rome; the mother of idolatry, the patron of cruelty, the patroness of all impiety; and propagating all these by her power and policies, who calls herself the mother church, but it is indeed the mother of harlots, and of all manner of abominations; that is, of abominable doctrines and practices.

6 And I saw the woman drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus: and when I saw her, I wondered with great admiration. 7 And the angel said unto me, Wherefore didst thou marvel? I will tell thee the mystery of the woman, and of the beast that carrieth her, which hath the seven heads and ten horns. 8 The beast that thou sawest, was, and is not; and shall ascend out of the bottomless pit, and go into perdition: and they that dwell on the earth shall wonder, whose names were not written in the book of life from the founda-

St. John proceeds in the description of this woman: he declared her to be a filthy and common whore, in the foregoing verse; in this, he represents her as a cruel and bloody whore: she is said to be drunk, drunk with blood, drunk with holy blood, drunk with the blood of saints and martyrs. Behold the blood-thirstiness of the Roman church; and her insatiableness therein, even unto drunkenness. 2. With what wonder and admiration St. John was filled, when he saw this woman drunk with blood, I wondered with great admiration; intimating that so astonishing is the cruelty of that church, that it justly causes wonder and admiration to all that are not of her cruel and bloody disposition. I wondered that God should suffer so much of his dear servants blood to be shed by her, and at her insatiable cruelty in the shedding of it. 3. How the Spirit of God was pleased to open this mystery, which indeed is the only vision of this nature expounded throughout the whole book: He begins first with a description of the beast, affirming, that he was, and is not, and yet is: As if he had said, "The Roman empire was once pagan, now is not pagan, but christian; and yet is as idolatrous now, as it was of old; the same as it was, only in another form." Rome papal is certainly as idolatrous, as cruel and bloody, as ever Rome pagan was of old; yea, perhaps, much more so, beyond compare. The rise and original is declared whence this idolatrous church should spring, namely, out of the bottomless pit, because her working is after the working of Satan, with all deceivableness, with signs and lying wonders. And as its rise is declared, so is its ruin foretold; it shall go into perdition, that is, shall be finally destroyed, never to revive again: But before this destruction, the world shall be under such an insaturation, that the generality of the inhabitants of the earth, some few excepted, shall wonder after the beast; that is, be wonderfully taken with him, and shall follow him with an implicit faith, paying homage and subjection to him. But these admirers and adorers of the beast are only such whose names were not written in the book of life; intimating to us, that in the times of greatest apostasy, and most universal defection from the truth, the Lord wants not his own true church; he ever had, and has, yea, ever will have, a number to stand up for his name, and bear witness to his truth.

9 ¶ And here is the mind which hath wisdom: The seven heads are seven mountains, on which the woman sitteth. 10 And there are seven kings: five are fallen, and one is, and the other is not yet come; and when he cometh, he must continue a short space. 11 And the beast that was, and is not, even he is the eighth, and is of the seven, and goeth into perdition:

Here the angel cometh directly to declare and unfold the mystery of the beast, premising first, that it requires heavenly wisdom in a person to understand it, and apply the marks accordingly. Here is the mind that hath wisdom, that is, the mind that hath wisdom, may here exercise itself. The seven heads, said the angel, are seven mountains, that is, signify seven mountains; a clear description of Rome, as to its local situation, being built upon seven hills. And there are seven kings kings, that is, seven forms of government, by, and according to which, Rome was governed, namely, by kings, consuls, tribunes, decemviri, dictators, and emperors, that were pagans. Five of these were fallen in St. John's time, that is, utterly extinct, namely, the government by kings, consuls, tribunes, decemviri, and dictators. And one is, to wit the government by pagan emperors, which was in St. John's time in being. And the other is not yet come, that is, the government by christian emperors was not yet in being, and when it did come, it held but a little while before the bishops of Rome wrested the government out of their hands, and took it into their own. Behold here the great mutability of all earthly things; governments have their periods, kingdoms come to an end. Happy they, who, serving God acceptably, with reverence and godly fear, have secured to themselves a kingdom that cannot be moved! Heb. xii. 28.

12 ¶ And the ten horns which thou sawest, are ten kings, which have received no kingdom as yet; but receive power as kings one hour with the beast.

13 These have one mind, and shall give their power and strength unto the beast. 14 ¶ These shall make war with the Lamb, and the Lamb shall overcome them: for he is Lord of lords, and King of kings: and they that are with him, are called, and chosen, and faithful.

Observe here, the angel farther explains to St. John this great mystery of the beast; declaring, that the ten horns of the beast, do signify ten kings, which should employ their power with the beast, and in conjunction with his established idolatry, to uphold his bloody religion. Next, their wicked unity is declared, in giving their power and strength to the beast: They have one mind, ver. 13, that is, they unanimously concur in aiding, strengthening, and assisting the beast, in using their power, and employing their authority to maintain him in his idolatrous and pagan-like superstitions. Lastly, It is declared for what end they thus concur together, in giving their power and strength to the beast; namely, to make war with the Lamb; that is, to take part with antichrist, and oppose Christ in his truth and gospel, in his ministers and members, in his children and servants. But the Lamb shall overcome them: Some shall be converted by the power of the gospel, others shall be confounded, one way or other brought into subjection; for he is Lord of lords, and King of kings; that is, clothed with divine power. Christ, though a meek Lamb yet is a mighty Lord. The titles here given him, shew his Godhead and omnipotency; and having such a power, he knows how to fit instruments for his purpose; and those whom he will make use of in this work, shall be chosen persons, and faithful in the discharge of the trust committed to them. All that are faithful to Christ, shall share with him in his victory.

15 And he saith unto me, The waters which thou sawest, where the whore sitteth, are peoples, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues. 16 ¶ And the ten horns which thou sawest upon the beast, these shall hate the whore, and shall make her desolate and naked, and shall eat her flesh, and burn her with fire.

plication of the vision. By the waters whereon the whore sat, he declares, are to be understood, many and divers nations belonging to the Roman empire. Behold then of what church multitude is a note! not of the church of Christ, his flock is a little flock; but of the antichristian synagogue, which vaunts, that multitudes are on her side. Alas! the multitude, or generality of persons, are prone to oppose that which is good, and those that do good. Next, it is declared with instruments God will make use of, as the executioners of his vengeance upon this great whore; the ten horns, that is, the ten kings which did before idolize her, and commit idolatry, and spiritual whoredom with her, shall at length revolt from her, hate her, make her desolate and naked, shall eat her flesh, and burn her with fire. Lord! what a strange, sudden, and mighty change doth the power of converting grace make! Behold these ten kings who sometimes doted upon the painted beauty of this great whore, when once their eyes shall be opened, their hearts will soon be alienated, Babylon's courts shall be crowded with suitors no longer; they shall make her desolate, by deserting their communion; make her naked, by withdrawing their former supplies afforded to her; - they shall eat her flesh, feed themselves with spoils, and take her revenues to themselves, and burn her with fire; that is, shall utterly ruin and destroy her. The destruction of antichrist once begun, shall hold on constantly by degrees, till his final destruction.

17 For God hath put in their hearts to fulfil his will, and to agree, and give their kingdom unto the beast, until the words of God shall be fulfilled.

Observe here, 1. How the infinitely wise and perfectly holy God, can, and does so order things, that all his judgments shall be executed by sinners, without his being the cause of any of their sins; though, by the permissive will of God, these kings gave their power for a time to the beast, yet they never had his approbation for so doing. God so overrules the actions of wicked men, that when they are doing their will, contrary to their own intentions, in and by them the Lord is likewise doing his will. God sometimes does his will by those who resolve they will not do his will. 2. The time when almighty God, who permitted them to submit to the whore, will put it into their hearts to hate her, and help to destroy, namely, when his word is fulfilled. God's word shall be fulfilled, in spite of Satan, and all his instruments: yea, the wicked are then fulfilling God's word and will, that is, his permissive will, when they are going on in their wickedness.

18 And the woman which thou sawest is that great city which reigneth over the kings of the earth.

This is so clear a description of Rome, that the church of Rome herself acknowledges it: For if that be the city built upon seven hills, the city that allures the inhabitants of the earth to idolatry; if her idolatries be a lively image of the old pagan idolatries; if to her many kings have given their power and strength; and if she reigneth over the kings of the earth, there remains no doubt but that this great city is Rome; that Rome is mystical Babylon, which has shed the blood of saints and martyrs without number, and must be destroyed for so doing; no pomp nor grandeur can exempt, exempt, or shall save her from the revenging hand of God, and his just indignation. Lord! hasten that desirable time!

C H A P. XVIII.

AND after these things I saw another angel come down from heaven, having great power; and the earth was lightened with his glory. 2. ¶ And he cried mightily with a strong voice, saying, Babylon the great is fallen, is fallen, and is become the habitation of devils, and the hold of every foul spirit, and a cage of every unclean and hateful bird.

The destruction of spiritual Babylon hath, in this prophecy, been several times predicted, and already foretold: Now here, an angel from heaven is employed, to declare it shall certainly be performed. This angel is variously here described: 1. By the place from whence he came, namely, from heaven; signifying that the destruction of Babylon was there surely decreed, and should most certainly be accomplished. 2. By the authority and power with which he came, in the name of, and by commission from the great God, and having great power. A mighty angel is employed in this great and mighty work, to destroy Babylon, the mighty throne of antichrist. 3. By the effect of his appearance; The earth was lightened with his glory: denoting, that Babylon's destruction should be open and manifest, and matter of joy and glorious rejoicing both to heaven and earth. Learn hence, That as the destruction of Babylon is the work and office of an angel, under God, so is it unto the angels matter of joy and triumph, especially to such of them as are employed as officers therein. Observe, The place against which the mighty angel doth denounce the vengeance of God, and that with an ingemination, or repetition of the threatening: Babylon the great is fallen, is fallen; where, by Babylon, all, both papists and protestants, do understand the city of Rome, though in different respects. This is called mystical Babylon, in an allusion to ancient Babylon, because of their resemblance, 1. In sin; namely, in pride and self exaltation, in cruelty and oppression, in sorcery and witchcraft: See Jer. li. 7. 2. In punishment: The destruction of old Babylon was a sudden destruction, Isa. xlvii. 9. and a perpetual destruction: See Isa. xliii. 20. compared with Rev. xi. 10. and Rev. xviii. 8. It is called Babylon the great, 1. Because of the greatness of its strength and glory; it was the strongest and most fortified place in the world. Cyrus besieged it thirteen years before he took it, and then by cutting channels, and drawing dry the river Euphrates. 2. In regard of her great power and dominion: Literal Babylon said, Are not my princes altogether kings? and mystical Babylon ruleth over all the kings of the earth. Farther, it is here said, that Babylon the great is fallen, nay, it is ingeminated and repeated; is fallen, is fallen; implying, 1. The certainty of her ruin; it is a speech of faith, speaking of things to come as already past; God's punishments, when threatened, are as certain as if already inflicted. 2. It denotes the suddenness of her destruction, she is fallen, that is, subita ruitura she shall soon fall; as when Christ said of his suffering work, It is finished; he meant, that it was very near finishing. 3. It denotes her utter ruin and destruction, is fallen, is fallen, never to rise more; the church shall never more be tormented by her, or troubled with her. 4. It denotes the joy and rejoicing which will be found in Sion, at Babylon's downfall and destruction; she is fallen, she is fallen; it is not only a speech of faith and trust, but of joy and triumph. Learn hence, 1. That Rome, or mythical Babylon, shall certainly fall, shall utterly fall, shall irrecoverably fall. 2. That the downfall of Babylon will be matter of great joy and triumph to the inhabitants of Sion, because she has been to the church of Christ an old and inveterate enemy, a cruel and bloody enemy, and shall be the last enemy. When Babylon is fallen, then shall all persecutions cease: Satan shall be bound, and the kingdoms of the world shall become the kingdoms of the Lord, and of his Christ. Let all that have an interest in God, be instant in prayer with him to hasten its time, that it may be in the history, as it is here in the prophecy, that Babylon is fallen. Lastly, What an heap of multiplied expressions the Holy Ghost is pleased to make use of, to set forth the utter ruin, and final desolation of Babylon: She is become the habitation of devils, &c. that is, as devils and evil spirits are supposed to haunt desolate places: and birds, which make hideous and dismal noises, do dwell in ruinous and ruined places; in like manner these expressions denote how entirely and absolutely God will bring about the destruction of Babylon; inasmuch that the place which hath known her shall know her no more, and her habitation shall be an eternal desolation, so that none that pass by shall say, This is Babylon.

3 For all nations have drunk of the wine of the wrath of her fornication, and the kings of the earth have committed fornication with her, and the merchants of the earth are waxed rich through the abundance of her delicacies.

The Spirit of God is pleased here to assign the reason and cause of Babylon's fatal ruin and final desolation; namely, 1. Because all nations have drunk of the wine of the wrath of her fornication. All nations, that is, very many; the generality of the Roman empire have been allured to, and intoxicated by her idolatries, which have brought all this wrath upon her and them. Where note, 1. How idolatry is compared to wine, because very pleasing to corrupt nature and also very enticing and ensnaring, overtaking, like wine, a person unawares; and it is called wine of wrath, because it exciteth and provoketh God's wrath against a person or people guilty of it. 2. Because the kings of the earth have committed fornication with her; that is, joined with her in idolatrous worship. Where note, The policy of Babylon in drawing kings and princes to the bed of her fornications, well knowing how fast their example will be followed by inferiors. The example of superiors in doing evil is strangely powerful; Jeroboam made Israel to sin; not by commanding them to worship the golden calves, but commending that idolatrous worship to them in his own person. 3. Because the merchants of the earth were waxed rich through the abundance of her delicacies. By the merchants, understand all such as trade in Babylon's wares, her pleasing and costly wares of pardons, as masses and indulgences, by which so many were enriched. All things are vendible at Rome; any sin may be forgiven for silver, and a licence for any any thing that is unlawful for money. These are the reasons here assigned for Babylon's ruin. The nations were made drunk by her, kings committed fornication with her, &c.

4 ¶ And I heard another voice from heaven saying, Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues.

Observe here, An admonition given, and a double reason assigned for that admonition. 1. The admonition itself: Come out of her my people; that is, come out of mystical Babylon, have no communion with that idolatrous church; abstain from all communicating with her in her sins, as ever you would approve yourselves to be my faithful people. Here note, It is not so much a local departure, as a moral separation, that is here intended; not so much from Babylon's local bounds, as from her abominable errors, superstitions, and idolatries. Learn hence, 1. That God has, and ever had, a people, even in Babylon. 2. That it is a special duty which God requires of his people, to depart from mystical Babylon, especially when her downfall is approaching. 3. That such a departure from Babylon is no schismatical separation; it is not a departure from the true church, but the true church's separation from an idolatrous communion; and that by the express and positive command of God himself, Come out of her, my people; an allusion to the charge given with respect to Babylon of old, Jer. li. 6. 9. We would have healed Babylon but she would not be healed; forsake her. Observe, 2. A double reason assigned for this admonition. 1. Because we are in danger of being partakers of her sins, namely by incurring the guilt of her sins, and by contracting the spot and filth of her sins. 2. There is a danger also of being made partakers of her plagues; there is no safety in being near those who are under the curse of God; participation in sin will certainly cause a participation in judgment. How dreadful is this text to such as continue in, or apostatize unto, Babylon's idolatry and communion!

5 For her sins have reached unto heaven, and God hath remembered her iniquities. 6 Reward her even as she rewarded you, and double unto her double according to her works: in the cup which she hath filled, fill to her double. 7 How much she hath glorified herself, and lived deliciously, so much torment and sorrow give her. For she saith in her heart, I sit a queen, and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow. 8 Therefore shall her plagues come in one day, death, and mourning, and famine; and she shall be utterly burned with fire. For strong is the Lord God who judgeth her.

Observe here, 1. The reason assigned why Almighty God inflicted such severe punishments upon Babylon; because her sins, that is the cry and clamour of her sins had reached up to heaven: the measure of her sins was filled up, and God had remembered her iniquities, that is, manifested his remembrance of them, by inflicting on her so great, so just a punishment for them, viz. for her idolatry and persecution. Learn hence, That although sins be transient actions, yet they have a permanent pleading before the Lord's tribunal, to bring down judgments upon incorrigible sinners. And 2. That although the justice of God may be thought to be asleep, and he may seem to be forgetful of sin and sinners, yet he will take his own time to manifest that he remembers them, by inflicting the heaviest of his judgments upon obdurate sinners. Observe, 2. The injunction and command given by God unto his people, to every one of them in their place and station, to contribute regularly all they can towards Babylon's downfall and destruction, Reward her as she rewarded you, yea, double; this is required, not from a private spirit of revenge, which christianity expressly forbids, but as a public work, in an authoritative way and manner, out of an ardent zeal for the glory of God, and from a just indignation against her tyranny and idolatry; and the command to double unto her double, implies, that a double punishment is due unto her, yea, a just one, according to her works. Behold here! what bloody persecutors may at length expect, namely, to receive at the Lord's hand double for all their sins. Babylon's punishment shall be double, respecting what she has acted, but not double in respect of what she has deserved; if possible, let her have as much blood again to drink as ever she spilt; for one drop of the blood of Sion is more worth than an ocean of the blood of Babylon; give her therefore double, for though it be more in quantity, it is nothing so much in value. 3. How suitable and answerable Babylon's punishment inflicted will be to her sin committed; her sins were pride and insolence, luxury, and voluptuousness. Note, 1. Her pride, she said in her heart, I sit as a queen: Mark, she did not barely say, I am a queen, but, I sit as a queen; as if she had said, "I am not only in a high place, but in a sure place: I have a warm and a firm seat, I am well settled, I have a great command, yea, an uncontrollable command: I am no widow, no desolate widow, no disconsolate widow, for I have many children to comfort me, many sons and daughters to support me: I shall see no sorrow, I neither feel nor fear any." Behold how worldly men fancy to themselves an everlastingness in worldly things; they fancy themselves sitting as upon down pillows for ease and softness, and as upon rocks of adamant for sureness and unmoveableness. 2. Her luxury and voluptuousness: she lived deliciously, in pompous palaces pleasantly situated, plentifully furnished; and her judgment bears a strict proportion to her sin how much she hath glorified herself, and lived deliciously, so much torment and sorrow give her: the justice of God will exact all the arrears of abused mercy. Sinners that now fare deliciously every day, shall pass from their good things here, to the flames which live by the breath of God's revenging wrath. Ah! doleful exchange! one hour's feeling of that fire will be more tormenting than an age's enjoyment of this world's delight can be pleasing. 4. The equity, the celerity, and multiplicity of Babylon's punishments; their equity is intimated in the illative particle therefore, that is, because of her former sins her plagues shall come; the celerity and swiftness of her punishment is intimated, they shall come upon her in one day, as did Sodom's plagues, suddenly and unexpectedly: And the multiplicity and variety of her plagues is particularly here expressed: death, for putting the taints to death; mourning, for her former rejoicing; famine, for famishing God's people; and burning, for having burnt so many of the bodies of the holy martyrs to a coal. Lastly, The reason here assigned for the unavoidable nature of all these plagues coming upon Babylon, for strong is the Lord who judgeth her. True! Babylon has all natural power and all civil strength on her side; but the strong God is against her, it is his controversy with her, and he is able to effect what he pleaseth, how incredible soever the thing may seem to us; sooner may the ark and Dagon be reconciled, and cease to be adverse, than God can be at peace with Babylon.

9 ¶ And the kings of the earth who have committed fornication, and lived deliciously with her, shall bewail her, and lament for her, when they shall see the smoke of her burning, 10 Standing afar off for the fear of her torment, saying, Alas, alas, that great city Babylon, that mighty city! for in one hour is thy judgment come.

The spirit of God having in the former part of the chapter set forth the certainty and severity of those judgments which should come upon mystical Babylon; He next declares what wailings and bitter lamentations her downfall would occasion to her votaries and admirers, to her friends and followers; more particularly, he acquaints us with three sorts of persons that shall bewail Babylon's destruction, kings, merchants, and seamen; the former we have here before us, in these two verses; the kings of the earth, who have adhered to the whore, committed spiritual fornication with her, and delighted themselves in her carnal and pompous idol-worship, when they see the smoke of her burning, and understand the certainty of her destruction, they shall stand afar off, like persons astonished, and like persons afraid, amazed at the dreadful nature of the judgment, and afraid to come near, lest they be involved in it; and the words of their lamentations are here set down, Alas, alas, that great city Babylon! in one hour is her judgment come! As if they had said, "Notwithstanding all Babylon's grandeur, which we so admired and magnified, and which she herself put so much trust and confidence in, to our astonishment we behold, in one hour, her judgment come upon her; a great and mighty city destroyed, a gay and splendid church politically founded, powerfully strengthened, on a sudden broke in pieces, and brought to desolation: Alas, alas, that great city Babylon!" Learn hence, That when God begins to enter into judgment with his church's enemies, the strongest arm of flesh cannot avail, but kings with their armies will flee and be discomfited, the stoutest hearts will be afraid and terrified, not daring to approach the presence of an angry God.

11 ¶ And the merchants of the earth shall weep and mourn over her; for no man buyeth her merchandize any more. 12 The merchandize of gold and silver, and precious stones, and of pearls, and fine linen, and purple, and silk and scarlet, and all thyine wood, and all manner of vessels of ivory, and all manner of vessels of most precious wood, and of brass, and iron, and marble, 13 And cinnamon, and odours, and ointments, and frankincense, and wine, and oil, and fine flower, and wheat, and beasts, and sheep, and horses, and chariots, and slaves, and souls of men. 14

And the fruits that thy soul lusted after are departed from thee, and all things which were dainty and goodly are departed from thee, and thou shalt find them no more at all. 15 The merchants of these things, which were made rich by her, shall stand afar off for the fear of her torment, weeping and wailing, 16 And saying, Alas, alas, that great city, that was clothed in fine linen and purple and scarlet, and decked with gold and precious stones and pearls! 17 For in one hour so great riches is come to nought.—

The second sort of people who passionately lament, and bitterly bewail Babylon's downfall and destruction, are, the merchants who traded in and with Babylon. Here we have an allusion to the merchants and merchandize of Tyre, spoken of Ezek. xxvii. As Tyre was the mart of the earth for temporal things, so was Babylon for spiritual things; making merchandize even of the souls of men persuading the people that they could purchase the redemption of souls out of purgatory by masses. Here note, That pagan Rome, though she did traffic for slaves, yet not for souls; but papal Rome deals for both. She sells also the souls of men, by selling her ecclesiastical benefices, and cure of souls. And I would to God that this piece of spiritual merchandize were only found amongst them, and not heard of elsewhere. Observe next, The holy Ghost is pleased to enumerate at large several sorts of wares, and the kinds of merchandize, which Babylon dealt and trafficked in, namely, gold, silver, precious stones, fine linen, purple, silk, and scarlet; all things for ornament, necessity, and delight; the pride and sensuality of Rome prompted her to buy up all sorts of commodities, and took off all that the countries round about could bring in; partly to gratify her pride, and partly to serve her idolatry. Farther, What a bitter lamentation is here taken up; but for what? Not for their sins, their luxury, or idolatry, but for the loss of their market and merchandize only. Behold in these Babylonians, the spirit and temper of all natural men; they weep not for sin, but for sufferings; for any temporal cross they have tears enough, they refuse to be comforted; but for their sins, which are not their crosses, but their curse, their plague, yea, the greatest of all plagues, because spiritual, these they can speak of with dry eyes and unaffected hearts. Observe lastly, How these merchants here, as the kings before, stand afar off for fear of her torment, weeping and wailing; pitying and condoling one another, greatly affected, and sorely afflicted to see the ruin of that polity that sustained them, but not able to help one another. Behold! how fruitless and helpless the wicked's friendship is to one another in the day of visitation; that stand afar off for fear of torments, but can afford no succour to each other: They durst not come near to help Babylon or them.

—And every ship-master, and all the company in ships; and sailors, and as many as trade by sea, stood afar off. 18 And cried, when they saw the smoke of her burning, saying, What city is like unto this great city? 19 And they cast dust on their heads, and cried, weeping and wailing, saying, Alas, alas, that great city, wherein were made rich all that had ships ships in the sea, by reason of her costliness? for in one hour is she made desolate.

The last sort of mourners for Babylon's ruin are sailor^s and seamen: All spiritual seamen that have an oar in St. Peter's boat, shall lament greatly, whose life and livelihood did depend upon the merchant trade of that great city: These, though they stuck close to her, and trafficked with her in the day of her prosperity, yet now with the rest they stand afar off from her lamenting her ruin, and their own loss, in the day when her desolation cometh. And, as an evidence of the greatness of their sorrow and mourning, they are here said to cast dust on their heads; which amongst the ancients was used as a special token of extraordinary grief and sorrow, Job ii. 13. In a time of deep affliction, we may express our outward sorrows by our outward gestures: These mourners for Babylon express their sorrow for her and themselves, by casting dust upon their heads.

20 ¶ Rejoice over her, thou heaven, and ye holy apostles and prophets; for God hath avenged you on her.

Note here, 1. That as Babylon's ruin was matter of great grief and sorrow to the forementioned mourners who merchandized and traded with her; so is it matter of great joy and rejoicing to all spiritual and heavenly minded persons which are the true church, who are commanded to rejoice at it. Rejoice over her, O heaven; that is, ye angels in heaven, or ye saints, or that are of an heavenly disposition. And all ye holy apostles and prophets; that is, all faithful ministers who succeed them, who are endued with the same spirit, and teach the same pure and holy doctrine with them. Note, 2. The cause of this rejoicing declared; for God hath avenged them upon her. The church does not, the saints of God dare not, rejoice at Babylon's calamity as such, but as an act of divine vengeance. God will be avenged on Babylon for the doctrine of the gospel corrupted by her, and for the rules of worship violated by her, and for all the barbarities and indignities which his church and people have suffered from her: God will revenge the wrongs of his people, when through want of power they cannot, and through his prohibition they may not avenge themselves.

21 And a mighty angel took up a stone like a great millstone, and cast it into the sea, saying, Thus with violence shall that great city Babylon be thrown down, and shall be found no more at all. 22 And the voice of harpers and musicians, and of pipers and trumpeters, shall be heard no more at all in thee; and no craftsman, of whatsoever craft he be, shall be found any more in thee; and the sound of a millstone shall be heard no more at all in thee; 23 And the light of a candle shall shine no more at all in thee; and the voice of the bridegroom and of the bride shall be heard no more at all in thee. For thy merchants were the great men of the earth: for by thy forceries were all nations deceived. 24 And in her was found the blood of prophets and of saints, of all that were slain upon the earth.

Observe here, 1. Babylon's utter desolation represented by the type and sign of a millstone cast into the sea: Like a millstone she had ground, and oppressed the church of God, and now, like a millstone thrown into the sea, she sinks into the pit of destruction. Almighty God, by this sign or symbol, signified to St. John, that Babylon's ruin should be violent, irrecoverable, and irreparable; she falls never to rise more. The casting of a stone into the sea was anciently the emblem of everlasting forgetfulness. 2. The amplification of Babylon's ruin particularized in several instances. 1. That nothing should ever more be found in her that belonged to pleasure or delight; no voice of harpers, musicians or trumpeters. 2. Nothing which belonged to profit or trading, no artificers or craftsmen. 3. Nothing belonging to food, no noise of a millstone for grinding corn and making provision for bread. 4. Nothing to relieve against the darkness and terror of the night; as the light of a candle. 5. No means for the propagation of mankind by marriage; The voice of the bride and the bridegroom shall be heard no more. All which expressions do imply extreme destruction and utter desolation; intimating, that Babylon shall be a place utterly abandoned and forsaken. Observe 3. A threefold cause assigned for all this, to wit, 1. Damnable covetousness; Her merchants were the great ones of the earth. Her sinful way of merchandizing, by dealing in spiritual commodities peculiar to Rome, seems to be here pointed at, her making merchandize of the souls of men, as we have it, ver. 13. 2. Her bewitching idolatry, called here forceries, whereby she enticed people to join with her in her superstitious worship. 3. Her cruelty and bloodshed; in her was found the blood of prophets, and of saints, and of all that were slain upon the earth. Quest. But how can the blood shed by others be laid to her charge? Auf. 1. Because the doctrines which caused their blood to be shed were with her. 2. Because her jurisdiction gave commission to slay the saints which were slain in other kingdoms. 3. Because by the influence of her example at home, much blood had been shed abroad. God will charge upon others, as he did upon Babylon, not only the sin which they have acted, but all the sins which they have been accessory unto.

CHAP. XIX.

AND after these things I heard a great voice of much people in heaven, saying, Alleluia: Salvation, and glory, and honour, and power unto the Lord our God:

Note here, That the first who sing this song of thanksgiving for Babylon's destruction, are glorified saints, called here much people in heaven, and they are said to sing with a great voice, expressing thereby their united zeal and fervent affection in this duty of thanksgiving, and they begin their song with an Hebrew word, Alleluia, which is a word of excitation, and signifies, laud ye the Lord. Some think that hereby the christian church do invite the Jews or Hebrews to join with them in praising God, and that after Babylon's overthrow Christ shall be solemnly praised, as by the Gentile, so by the Jewish church: The tenor of their song is much the same with that which we had before, chap. vii. 10. to wit, salvation, (or deliverance from all evils, spiritual and temporal, particularly from those which the church church suffered under Babylon's tyranny) and glory, and honour, and power, be ascribed, unto the Lord our God, and to him alone, who is the Author of all good, and hath manifested his great power in destroying our enemies. Learn hence, 1. That the church's salvation is entirely from God, and the special effect of his divine power. 2. That to him, upon that account, all possible honour and glory is due, as having shewn himself his people's God.

2 For true and righteous are his judgments: for he hath judged the great whore, which did corrupt the earth with her fornication, and hath avenged the blood of his servants at her hand. 3. And again they said, Alleluia. And her smoke rose up for ever and ever.

Observe here, 1. The cause assigned and set down of this their doxology and solemn thanksgivings, namely, the truth and faithfulness, as also the justice and righteousness of God in the execution of his judgments upon Babylon; his truth appeared in performing the threatenings which Babylon despised, and his righteousness in suiting his judgments inflicted upon her, to the sins of idolatry, and bloodshed committed by her. 2. The title here given to Babylon, she is called the whore, because of her idolatry, which is often in scripture styled spiritual whoredom, and the great whore, because of her universal corrupting the whole earth; she made others to sin, and cruelly murdered those who would not sin. Hence learn, That idolatry and persecution constantly go together. Babylon's idolatrous practices were accompanied with bloody cruelties. 3. An intimation given of the irreparable ruin and irrecoverable destruction of Babylon, her smoke rose up for ever and ever, that is, God followed her with a succession of plagues and judgments until she was ruined past recovery. 4. That the word Alleluia, as it begins the song so does it also close the same, to shew thereby the raisedness of the church's affections, and their unweariedness in praising God for this deliverance of Babylon's destruction.

4 And the four and twenty elders and the four beasts fell down and worshipped God that sat on the throne, saying, Amen; Alleluia. 5. And a voice came out of the throne, saying, Praise our God, all ye his servants, and ye that fear him, both small and great.

Note here, 1. How the whole heavenly choir praise God on the forementioned account, acknowledging the justice of his proceeding against Babylon; and, 2. An invitation is here given to all the saints upon earth, both small and great, to fear and praise him: Whence note, How the church triumphant and militant, the saints in heaven, and christians on earth jointly give praise to God, and glorify him for this great work, adoring his divine justice in destroying Babylon, the mother of idolatry, the nest of luxury, the seat of oppression and cruelty: It is a duty well becoming the saints, both small and great, to celebrate the praises of God for the equity of his judgments upon his church's incorrigible and unreclaimable enemies; and here God himself, and his ministers call upon the whole church to join in this solemn work of praise and thanksgiving.

6 And I heard as it were the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of many waters, and as the voice of mighty thunderings, saying, Alleluia: for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth. 7 ¶ Let us be glad and rejoice, and give honour to him: for the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready. 8 And to her was granted that she should be arrayed in fine linen, clean and white. For the fine linen is the righteousness of saints.

In the former verses, an exhortation was given to all the saints, to abound in the duty of thanksgiving, here we find them unanimously addressing themselves to the practice and performance of that duty; and accordingly they are called here a great multitude, their voice like many waters for unity, and like mighty thunderings, denoting that zeal and fervour which is in their thanksgiving. Where note, How exceedingly the church doth rejoice and triumph, not so much in Babylon's ruin, as in the glory of God advanced, and as his own kingdom is promoted by it. Observe 2. A superadded ground and reason for this extraordinary joy and rejoicing, for the marriage of the Lamb is come, &c. By the marriage of the Lamb, Mr. Mede and Dr. More do understand the conversion of the Jews; by the Lamb's wife, the nation of the Jews, so called, in regard of that relation which they stand in to God, by virtue of the covenant; and she is said to have made herself ready, namely, by the wedding garment of faith, to accept of her formerly despised bridegroom. Note, That it is probably conjectured by some, that the conversion of the Jews shall soon follow the destruction of antichrist; for his idolatry and persecution are great scandals to the Jews, and mighty stumbling-blocks in the way of their conversion. And whereas it is added, that it was granted her to be arrayed in fine linen, the words do seem to import, that the Jews shall in due time, be brought in to Christ, to submit to his righteousness, and be clothed with it, and that an holy emulation shall be found between the Gentiles and them, which shall meet and best adorn the profession of the gospel. From the whole, note, How the church is called Christ's wife. Christ and she are here betrothed each to other; but at the great day, the marriage will be here consummated. Note farther, The church's spiritual nakedness in herself considered: It was granted to her to be arrayed in fine linen; she had it not of herself, but it was put on by Christ; he decks and dresses his own bride with the ornaments of grace here, and glory hereafter.

9 And he saith unto me, Write, Blessed are they which were called unto the marriage-supper of the Lamb. And he saith unto me, These are the true sayings of God. 10 ¶ And I fell at his feet to worship him. And he said unto me, See thou do it not: I am thy fellow-servant, and of thy brethren that have the testimony of Jesus. Worship God: for the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy.

Blessed are they which are called to the marriage-supper of the Lamb; that is (say they, who, understand, by the marriage of the Lamb, the conversion of the Jews) who shall shall live in the happy time, when the Jews being converted, shall, with the Gentiles, make up one glorious gospel-church. But the marriage is one thing, and the marriage-supper another; the marriage-supper follows the marriage; so that the kingdom of glory rather seems here intended: Blessed are they which are called to it, being made meet and prepared for it, by grace here, for glory hereafter: We must be made meet for heaven, before we can be admitted into heaven. Observe next, That St. John being overjoyed at the good news of his countrymen's (the Jews) conversion, fell down at the angel's feet to worship him, as Cornelius did at St. Peter's when he heard of the conversion of the Gentiles, Acts x. 25. And I fell at his feet to worship him. The holiest and best of saints are not wholly free from passionate infirmities: He would now have worshipped this angel, yet we read not of any attempt made to worship any of the former angels which converted with him. This makes it probable, that he apprehended it to be an uncreated angel, even the Son of God, which now talked with him. Next, With what indignation this holy angel rejected the offer of religious adoration, and how peremptorily he forbids it; ut in, by no means, upon no terms, do it, See thou do it not. The church of Rome asks us, Why we reprove them for worshipping the angels, when St. John himself did it? Our answer is ready, That St. John himself was reprov'd for it; the angel rejected it as none of his due. O the presumption of those men, who dare do that which the angel expressly forbids to be done! Yet, after all, Bellarmine says, That St. John did well to worship the angel; then, say we, the angel did ill to reprove St. John: But whether we shall believe a cardinal at Rome, or an angel of God, judge ye. Lastly, The reasons assigned by the angel who forbade it. 1. Because God, and God alone, is the sole and proper object of religious worship: 2. Because the angel was St. John's equal in office, though not in nature: As if he had said, "Those who serve and worship God together with you, must not be worshipped by you: Those who are fellow-servants to one master, should not give to one another that worship which is only due to their Lord and master. But we are fellow-servants: How doth that appear? Thus: You have the testimony of Jesus, and I have the spirit of prophecy. Now, the spirit of prophecy, and the work of the ministry in testifying of Jesus, being of the same nature and kind of service; therefore, from those that are employed in one of them, religious worship is not due to the other. It is Christ that employs us both, and therefore, he alone is to be worshipped, and neither I nor thou: Worship God, to whom religious worship is justly and peculiarly due."

11 And I saw heaven opened, and behold, a white horse; and he that sat upon him was called Faithful and True, and in righteousness he doth judge and make war. 12 His eyes were as a flame of fire, and on his head were many crowns; and he had a name written that no man knew but he himself: 13 And he was clothed with a vesture dipped in blood: and his name is called, The Word of God. 14 And the armies which were in heaven followed him upon white horses, clothed in fine linen, white and clean. 15 And out of his mouth goeth a sharp sword, that with it he should smite the nations: and he shall rule them with a rod of iron: and he treadeth the wine-press of the fierceness and wrath of almighty God. 16 And he hath on his vesture and on his thigh a name written, KING OF KINGS, AND LORD OF LORDS.

Here we have a new and fresh vision, in which St. John saw heaven opened, and Christ represented as a great and victorious General, marching forth with a glorious army for his church's enemies full and final destruction. This great General is first described from the place whence he comes, namely, from heaven; he is no earthly prince or potentate, but an heavenly monarch. Next, he is said to sit in a white horse, denoting victory, prosperity, and success: He is called faithful and true, and righteous, because faithful in all his promises, true in his threatenings, righteous in all his dispensations towards his enemies; he will do them no wrong. Next his eyes are said to be as a flame of fire; denoting his clear and piercing knowledge, and also his terror as a judge, his eyes being in wrath as a flame of fire, ready to consume his enemies. And farther, to shew his royal dignity, it is added, on his head were many crowns, which also denoted his many victories over his many and mighty enemies. And by the name, which no man knew but himself, some understand his nature and essence, which is so incomprehensible and unsearchable, as that none but he who is true God, is able to comprehend it folly, or reveal it perfectly. Others by his name, understand his judgments and ways, by which he is known, as a man by his name. Observe next, This great and mighty General is described from his vesture dipped in blood, which denotes the mighty overthrow of his enemies: The cruelest and proudest of them can expect nothing in the end from him, but extremity of wrath and deserved destruction; for they must all become his foot-stool. And his name being called The Word of God, speaks dread and terror to antichrist, who slanders, opposes, corrupts, and suppresses, and offers all manner of indignities to the word of God; exercises the utmost cruelties against the preachers and professors of it. Observe farther, That after the description of this great and mighty General, follows next the description of his armies, his attendants and followers, namely, the holy angels and glorified saints, ver. 14. these also ride upon white horses, as their General before them, and are clothed in fine linen, white and clean. Behold the comely conformity, and purity, and holiness, between the General and his seldier, between Christ and his followers; they both appear on white horses, suitable to one another. Christ will admit none to be his followers that are not like him. Next, we have the weapon described, ver. 15. which Christ makes use of for the destruction of antichrist, and all his church's enemies; and that is a sword, a sharp sword, the holy scriptures, particularly the threatenings of the word, with which he will smite all the wicked nations that side with antichrist against him and his kingdom: dealing with his enemies as men do with grapes gathered into a wine-press, which they can easily crush. Lastly, He is described described by a new name of royal dignity and supreme power, being called King of kings, Lord of lords. And this name is said to be written on his vesture, and on his thigh, partly for perspicuity, that all might take notice of it; and partly for permanency, to shew, that as long as himself lasts, which is for ever, so long shall his kingdom and dominion over all endure.

17 And I saw an angel standing in the sun: and he cried with a loud voice, saying to all the fowls that fly in the midst of heaven, Come and gather yourselves together unto the supper of the great God; 18 That ye may eat the flesh of kings, and the flesh of captains, and the flesh of mighty men, and the flesh of horses, and of them that sit on them, and the flesh of all men, both free and bond, both small and great.

After the description of the General and his army, follows next the event and success of the battle, which is a prodigious slaughter of the church's enemies: And as eagles and vultures, and other birds of prey, do attend an army, and flock where the slain lie, in like manner, almighty God here invites the fowls of the air to sup upon the carcases of his slain enemies. Antichrist would not suffer the dead bodies of the witnesses to be buried, but to be cast out, and ly in the streets; and here God metes to him the same measure; their carcases also shall be a supper for the birds and fowls of the air. Come to the supper of the great God, to the slaughter of antichrist and his adherents. Where note, That by calling it a supper, two things may be probably intended. 1. The facility and easiness of the victory; that Christ's and his church's enemies, will not put him hard to it to overcome them; as we proverbially say, they will be but a supper to him, or a breakfast for him. 2. The word supper seems to import, that this shall be the last effort, the last great opposition, that antichrist and the church's enemies shall ever make against Christ to the end of the world, as the supper is the last meal of the day.

19 And I saw the beast, and the kings of the earth, and their armies, gathered together to make war against him that sat on the horse, and against his army. 20 And the beast was taken, and with him the false prophet that wrought miracles before him, with which he deceived them that had received the mark of the beast, and them that worshipped his image. These both were cast into a lake of fire burning with brimstone. 21 And the remnant were slain with the sword of him that sat upon the horse, which sword proceeded out of his mouth: and all the fowls were filled with their flesh.

Observe here, 1. The final issue of this great battle, namely, the total ruin of all the enemies of the church; the beast and false prophet were taken, and cast alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone. Behold the punishment of idolators and idoltry; the false prophet had cheated credulous princes and peoples, with his pretended miracles, into idoltry; he had cast others into a bed of fornication, and God casts him into a bed of flames. Lastly, it is added concerning the remnant, that they were slain with the sword of his mouth: That is, by Christ's judicial sentence, they were righteously adjudged to be slain, and when they were so, all the fowls were filled with their flesh. Where note, That these persons were not excused, because they followed their leaders, and did what they bade them; Christ commands, for all that, that they also should be slain. Lord! how vain will the plea of many sinners be at the great day; we followed our guides, we did as we saw others do before us! Remember me, that God has given us a rule to walk by, the infallible and inflexible rule of his word: and neither the example of the most, nor of the best, must influence us to act contrary thereunto; for if we will do as the most do, we must be contented to go where the most go, even into the lake of fire burning with brimstone.

C H A P. XX.

AND I saw an angel come down from heaven, having the key of the bottomless pit, and a great chain in his hand: 2 ¶ And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the devil and Satan, and bound him a thousand years. 3 And cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, and set a seal upon him, that he should deceive the nations no more, until the thousand years should be fulfilled; and after that he must be loosed a little season.

This chapter begins with a fresh and glorious vision which St. John had of an angel's descending from heaven, to bind Satan for a thousand years: And herein we have observeable, 1. The person binding, the angel of the covenant, Christ Jesus, (for he only has the keys of the bottomless pit, of hell, and of death, Rev. i. 18.) This angel is here said to come down from heaven, and with a great chain in his hand, denoting his omnipotent power and sovereignty over Satan, and his ability to restrain him. 2. The person bound, Satan: Where mark, That he is set forth here by five names; he is called the dragon, the serpent, the old serpent, the devil, and Satan. And note, Christ's power is set forth in as many terms as the devil has titles; he is said to lay hold on him, to bind him, to cast him into the bottomless pit, to shut him in, or seal him up for a thousand years; that is, to restrain him, and render him incapable of doing such mischief to the world as he had done before. 3. What we are to understand by Christ's binding Satan; some thereby do understand Christ's overthrowing the power of the devil in the heathen world, his casting down those strong holds of Satan, to wit, ignorance, superstition, idolatry, and lying oracles, by the light and power of the gospel, preached among the Gentiles; his curbing of Satan, that he should no more cozen the world with heathenish delusions as he had done. Others understand this binding of Satan to be after the destruction of antichrist; when the Jews shall be converted, and there shall follow a quiet and peaceable state of the church for a long time, styled here a thousand years; during which time, Satan shall be bound, and there shall be no molestation from him. From the whole, learn, That be the devil never so devilish, Christ his has power to overpower him. Christ has a great chain in his hand to bind Satan : Intimating, That how mighty and malicious soever Satan is, Christ has him as a dog in a chain. But observe a little, how Christ's power meets with, and masters Satan's power ; the devil carries power in his name, he is called a dragon ; in his nature, as being an angel ; in his numbers, which are numberless ; but Christ overpowereth him, so that he cannot do his own will without him ; he bounds him in the execution of his malice, though his malice be boundless. Satan is bound in a double chain, in a chain of justice, and in a chain of providence ; he cannot move a foot either to tempt or trouble us, without a permission from Christ.

4 And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them : and judgment was given unto them ; and I saw the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God, and which had not worshipped the beast, neither his image, neither had received his mark upon their foreheads, or in their hands ; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years.

These words are conceived to set forth the glorious and happy condition of the church of Christ here on earth, during the time of Satan's restraint ; and the term of a thousand years shews, that it will be the longest happy condition that ever the militant church enjoyed, for purity of ordinances, for increase of light and knowledge, for the power of godliness, for the abundance of professors, for the more open and public profession of christianity, for outward freedom and peace, and all this for a long continuance of time ; which happy state and condition is here set forth by thrones, shewing the saints' dignity and dominion over their enemies. And whereas St. John says, he saw the souls of martyrs who had shed their blood for Christ, the meaning, say some, is, He saw them in their successors of the same faith, those pious christians which should at that time live, and in their principles and practices are like the holy martyrs ; these shall then enjoy a more quiet, happy, and comfortable state, during this time than the servants of God enjoyed at any time before. Yet observe farther, That this glorious condition of the church is not absolute, but comparative only, both in respect of purity, and in respect of peace ; for whilst the church is on this side heaven, there will be both corruptions without, and temptations with crosses ; Hypocrites will be, and offences will come, though freedom from all these will at that time be more than usual ; yet taking up the cross, and being conformed to Christ in his sufferings, will be duties belonging to saints whilst the world endures. Observe, lastly, That yet there is no ground from hence to expect Christ's personal reign upon earth, or his corporeal presence with his church here ; for it is not said that he reigned with them, but that they reigned with him ; denoting that this kingdom is spiritual, consisting in purity and peace, in righteousness, and joy in the Holy Ghost. As to a personal reign of Christ then with his people here on earth, it seems not probable, because the scripture is silent of it, and joins Christ's personal coming, and the day of judgment, together. Besides, were Christ personally upon earth, how should we enjoy him, and converse with him ? It is impossible we should enjoy a glorified Christ till our bodies be spiritualized, which they will never be till they get to heaven. Once more, What will become of the saints during these thousand years of Christ's supposed presence with them ? Either they will live all that thousand years (which is not rational to suppose) or they will die in that time ; if they die, and go to heaven, they will go from Christ, and not to him, and must for a time be absent from him, instead of being for ever with him ; and doubtless, heaven will be a melancholy place, if Christ be out of it. The sum then is this, " That the saints living and reigning with Christ, holds forth the flourishing condition of the church militant : The expression of sitting upon thrones, speaks an honourable condition that the church will be certainly in, after the downfall of antichrist : And the term of a thousand years, shews it will be the longest happy condition that ever the church enjoyed." God almighty hasten that desirable time !

5 ¶ But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. This is the first resurrection. 6 ¶ Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection : on such the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with him a thousand years,

By the rest of the dead, understand the subdued enemies of the church in their successors, who are said to be dead politically, in respect of their outward condition, which will now be very low ; they lived not again a political life : that is, they did not regain or recover that power to persecute the church, which once they had, but are now divested of in great measure, namely, till the thousand years are finished ; then they shall have liberty again to vent their enmity against the church, joining with Gog and Magog, as their predecessors, the worshippers of the beast, did combine together before them. This is the first resurrection ; that is, the living again of the saints, in that glorious manner before described, in holy societies, with greater degrees of purity and peace. Learn, That the reformation of the church, after the ruin of its Pagan and Papal enemies, is as a splendid and glorious resurrection to her ; and accordingly, such as are sharers in this political resurrection are pronounced blessed ; Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection ; that is, blessed are they that shall have their lot to live in this happy time, when the means of holiness will more abound, and the measures of holiness be more extensive and universal. The second death shall never affect them ; everlasting misery shall be escaped of them ; and they shall be priests unto God, to offer up, not expiatory, but gratulatory, sacrifices of prayer and praise unto him ; and as the priesthood is spiritual, so is the kingdom also. They shall reign spiritually over their lusts and corruptions, and have greater power to overcome temptations, and this for a thousand years ; that is during the time of their living here, in that part of the happy millennium in which they shall live, they shall in that time enjoy a more holy, happy, peaceful and flourishing condition than the church of God did ever so long enjoy in former times. Some will have all this to be understood concerning a spiritual a spiritual resurrection from the grave of sin to a life of holiness and grace ; over such indeed the second death, or everlasting misery, shall have no power ; but though this may be alluded to, yet a political, not a spiritual, resurrection seems here to be principally intended.

7 And when the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison, 8 And shall go out to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to battle : the number of whom is as the sand of the sea. 9 And they went up on the breadth of the earth, and compassed the camp of the saints about, and the beloved city : and fire came down from God out of heaven, and devoured them. 10 ¶ And the devil that deceived them, was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone, where the beast and the false prophet are, and shall be tormented day and night for ever and ever.

Observe here, 1. A prophetic prediction, that when the long time of the church's liberty and peace shall be expired, which is here expressed and set forth under the notion of a thousand years, God will then take off his restraint from the devil, and he shall influence the wicked world once more to make opposition against his church ; When the thousand years are expired, Satan shall be loosed out of his prison. Behold here Satan's restless malice against mankind, and particularly against the church of Christ. Observe next, That Satan is first said to deceive the nations, and then to gather them together to battle against the saints : The same saints, either in their persons, or in their successors, who did formerly reign, will now suffer ; but by whom ? By Gog and Magog ; where is probably an allusion to these two names mentioned often in the Old Testament, who were the last enemies of the Jewish church before Christ's first coming. In like manner, the last enemies of the christian church are here set forth by that name, who shall be utterly destroyed a little before Christ's second coming to judgment. Satan, with all his united power, and combined force, will attempt the whole body of the christian church before his last and fatal overthrow. Observe, lastly, That after the destruction of these agents and instruments of Satan's fury his own full and final destruction is declared ; which may be called his second imprisonment in that lake of fire and brimstone, which is both caseless and endless, there to keep company with the beast and false prophet to all eternity. Behold here the deceived and the deceived plagued together ; the devil that deceived, and the beast and false prophet that were deceived by him, and were his instruments to deceive others, are cast together into the lake of fire, to be tormented for ever. Satan was indeed condemned to this before, and reserved thereunto, but the actual and final execution thereof is suspended till the end come.

11 And I saw a great white throne, and him that sat on it, from whose face the earth and the heaven fled away ; and there was found no place for them. 12 ¶ And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God ; and the book were opened ; and another book was opened, which is the book of life : and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works. 13 And the sea gave up the dead which were in it ; and death and hell delivered up the dead which were in them : and they were judged every man according to their works. 14 And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death. 15 And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire.

Here is another vision which St. John saw, namely, a lively representation of the great day of judgment, when all, both good and bad, that ever lived, shall be raised and sentenced according to their works ; the state of the wicked is set forth in this chapter, and the happy condition of the righteous in heaven gloriously described in the two next chapters. Observe here, 1. The Judge described, as sitting upon a throne or seat of judgment ; a throne, to denote that this Judge is a King ; and a white throne, to denote the purity and righteousness of this Judge ; and a great white throne, because erected for a great Judge, and for a great service, namely, the judging of the whole world. Observe, 2. The dreadful majesty and glorious power of this Judge declared, that neither heaven nor earth are able to abide his presence, but are said to flee away, and that there was no place found for them. Observe, 3. The persons judged are here described, and that, 1. By their condition and qualification, all the dead, both small and great ; all that ever lived, and all that shall then be found alive. 2. By their posture ; they stand before the Judge, whilst he sits, to shew his authority. 3. By the manner of proceeding, which is represented as being after the form of well-ordered judicatories here on earth ; wherein the books are produced, namely, the book of God's omniscience, and the book of conscience, the book of the law, and the book of the gospel. They that had not the written law, shall be judged by the law of nature ; they that had the written law, are to be judged by that ; and they that had the gospel, to be judged by that ; and every one according to their works. Observe, 4. The execution of the sentence of this great judge upon the wicked and impenitent world ; they are cast into the lake of fire, which is the second death. From the whole, learn, 1. That it is certain that there shall, and necessary that there should, be a day of judgment. 2. That in that day there will be no exemption of any persons from the examination of the Judge ; I saw all the dead, small and great, stand before God. 3. That Jesus Christ, called here God (which clearly proves his deity) shall come in the clouds to judge the world ; and will then be found such a Judge that the riches of the wealthiest cannot bribe ; such a Judge that the power of the mightiest cannot daunt ; such a Judge as the subtilty of the wisest cannot delude ; such a Judge as there is no appealing from, no repealing of, his sentence. Learn, 4. That as the same persons shall be judged, who formerly lived, so in the same bodies that died, and were either buried in the earth, or consumed in the sea : The sea gave up her dead ; by which understand all places, though attended with never so many improbable improbable circumstances of a resurrection, shall yet give up the dead: Death and hell, that is, death and the grave, gave up the dead which were in them, that is, by the power of God were made to restore them. Learn, 5. That the sentence denounced will be according to every man's work at the great day; according to the nature and quality of the wicked man's works, shall his judgment and punishment be; according to the sincerity, not according to the imperfection of the righteous man's work, shall his reward be, God grant that the consideration of this may so far influence us, that no profit may tempt us, no pleasure entice us, no power embolden us, no privacy encourage us, to do that thing, of which we cannot give a good account in the day of judgment.

C H A P. XXI.

AND I saw a new heaven and a new earth: for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away: and there was no more sea. 2 And I John saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband,

By the new heavens and the new earth here, all understand a new state and face of the church; but some apply it to the state of the church militant here upon earth, and others to the state of the church triumphant in heaven. Accordingly they take the new heavens and the new earth to be the effect of that great change which shall be made by fire at the universal conflagration; and they are called new, not so much in regard to substance, as in respect of qualities, being now for nature more stable, and for beauty more glorious. Quest. But what use shall there be of this new heaven and new earth? and who shall dwell therein? Ans. We cannot tell, but must rest satisfied with what God hath told us, that therein shall dwell righteousnes; and it will be a standing monument of God's power and greatness: It is added, that the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; not by annihilation, but by a qualitative mutation. And no more sea; that is, say some, as it was before, turbulent, changeable, subject to corruption and vanity; say others, no more troublesome state of things, which is oft-times signified by the sea. A new and glorious state of things was undoubtedly here designed relating to the church. Observe next, The character St. John gives of the glorious state of the church triumphant. ver. 2. He compares her, 1. To a beautiful city, for amplitude and largeness, for compact structure, and for commodious habitation; she is called holy, because no unclean thing can enter into her, and because that holiness shall there be perfected which was here begun. 2. To an adorned bride; no spouse on her marriage-day so adorned as she was. The church in heaven is so called, to denote her dignity, and the love which Christ bears to her, and the delight which he takes in her, which is so continual, as if it were always a wedding-day; and she is adorned for him, and adorned by him, with spiritual beauty, and glory, and perfection of grace.

3 And I heard a great voice out of heaven, saying, Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God. 4 And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying; neither shall there be any more pain; for the former things are passed away.

Observable is that variety of expressions which the Holy Ghost here makes use of, to set forth the excellency of the church triumphant by. 1. She is blest with God's immediate presence and abode, of which the tabernacle was a sign; the Lord manifesting himself in heaven unto his saints in a more immediate way than ever he did unto them here on earth. The tabernacle of God is with men; and to shew the permanency of this privilege, it is added, He shall dwell with them; after an inhabitation here by grace, shall follow a cohabitation hereafter in glory. Next it is said, They shall be his people, and he will be their God; which must not be so understood, as if that relation did now begin between them, but the comfort of that relation is now perfectly understood, and they reap the complete advantage of that covenant-promise, whose sweetness they did only taste before. 2. Having described the positive good which the triumphant church shall eternally rest in; St. John next sets forth the private evils, which they shall everlastingly be freed from. All sorrow, and all the causes of sorrow, shall be removed; they shall have no outward occasion, nor inward disposition to weep: There shall be no death, but immortality and eternal life; nor any more pain or sickness, but pleasure for evermore. Lord! what a sovereign cordial is this against all our present sorrows and sufferings! to consider the time is at hand when all tears shall be wiped from our eyes, all sorrows, and the causes of sorrow, banished from our hearts, and everlasting joys shall possess our souls, and we shall be with our Lord for ever, to obey him with vigour, to praise him with cheerfulness, to love him above measure, to fear him without torment, to serve him without interruption or distraction, and be perfectly like unto him as well in holiness as in happiness, as well in purity as in immortality!

5 And he that sat upon the throne, said, Behold, I make all things new. And he said unto me, Write: for these words are true and faithful. 6 And he said unto me, It is done. I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end. I will give unto him that is athirst, of the fountain of the water of life freely.

Note here, 1. How these new heavens and a new earth come to be effected and made, namely, by the omnipotent power of Christ, Behold, I make all things new: A good argument to encourage us to go unto Christ by prayer for renewing grace. Surely, he that makes new heavens can make new hearts; he that renews an old world, can renew us in the Spirit of our minds, and make old things pass away, and cause all things to become new. Next he commands St. John to write, that these words set down here and throughout this prophecy are true and faithful. We see then that the holy scriptures were written at the Lord's command, and therefore from him they do derive their authority.

authority. 2. The word of assurance here uttered by Christ, for the confirmation of what he had before declared and promised, he said unto me, It is done; signifying thereby, that it is as certain as if it were already done; namely, whatever he had promised relating to his church's happiness, and all he had threatened relating to her enemies destruction: Let not the church then at any time stagger in her faith. 3. The title which Christ is pleased here to resume, which before was given by himself, chap. i. 8. I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, to shew that as he first made the world, so he was now about to put a period to it, and would give to every thirsty or believing soul an everlasting life in the new Jerusalem, which shall no more decay, than water, which is an ever-springing fountain, can be dried up.

6 He that overcometh shall inherit all things: and I will be his God, and he shall be my son.

Observe, 1. That our desires of happiness must be accompanied with endeavours after it, or they will be ineffectual; to thirsting in the former verse, he joins overcoming in this verse; We must not barely wish but work; not only talk, but fight; and not only fight but overcome our spiritual enemies in fighting, or we are miserable; how strong soever our desires after happiness may be supposed to be, without proportionable endeavours, we can have no good ground of hope. 2. He that overcometh, that is, he that is overcoming, he that daily maintains the combat, though he has not yet obtained a perfect conquest over his spiritual enemies, yet he keeps the field with sword in hand, resolving never to throw down his weapon, but to die as a conqueror, rather than be taken prisoner. Observe, 3. The encouraging promise given to the conqueror, He shall inherit all things. Where note, The extent and latitude of the promise, the enjoying all things, that is, all blessings and benefits, all joys and comforts that are requisite to make him perfectly and perpetually happy. Note also, God's way and manner of dispensing the mercy promised, and that is by free gift, he shall inherit all things, not merit anything: An inheritance is gratuitum paterni amoris pignus, an estate freely given by the father to his children. 4. A superadded promise, I will be his God, and he shall be my son; that is, I will give him the manifestation of his adoption before angels and men: I am now his God, and he is now my son, but the world knoweth it not; they brand my people for a generation of hypocrites, and sometimes they call in question their own sincerity, and their title to the privilege of adoption; but at the great day I will publicly own them before angels and men, and make it appear that I love them as a father, and they shall live with me as sons for ever and ever: He that overcometh, &c.

8 But the fearful, and unbelieving, and the abominable, and murderers, and whoremongers, and forcerers, and idolaters, and all liars, shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone: which is the second death.

After a description given of the celestial happiness of the righteous at the day of judgment, here follows the eternally miserable condition of the wicked; and eight several sorts of sinners are here summed up, who shall be excluded out of heaven, and cast into hell; namely, the fearful, such as dare not own Christ, or for fear of suffering have disowned him, or apostatized or revolted from him; unbelievers, such especially as have sat under the dispensation of the gospel, but have rejected our Lord Jesus Christ, and refused to come unto him that they might have life; the abominable, such as live in the practice of sins against nature, sodomy, and such uncleanness as renders them abominable in the sight of God and man, Rom. i. 26. Murderers, such as destroy either the soul, body, or good name of their neighbours, especially persecutors; the whore and her followers, who are drunk with the blood of the saints; whoremongers of all sorts, both spiritual and corporeal, particularly such as are guilty of uncleanness in a conjugal state; forcerers, such as exercise witchcraft, consult with the devil, and trade with familiar spirits; idolaters of all sorts and kinds, such as worship false gods, or the true God after a false manner; covetous persons, who make the world their God, and sensual persons, who make their belly their God; lastly, all liars, those who lie with the lip, and talk falsely; those that lie in their lives, as all hypocrites do, whose practice gives their profession the lie: those who are the inventors of the doctrine of lies, which is no better than the doctrine of devils: these all these shall have their part in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone, that is, in exquisite torments, and everlasting. From the whole, note, 1. How the timorous and fearful stand in the front of all those vile sinners, whose ways lead down to the chambers of death and hell. Behold here! God's martial law executed upon cowards and renegadoes, whose fear makes them revolt from Christ in the time of danger. Think of this, all you timorous and faint-hearted professors! who cannot bear the thought of lying in a nasty dungeon for owning Christ, how will you endure to lie in a lake of fire and brimstone for disowning of him! Is not the little finger of an angry God heavier than the loins of all the tyrants and persecutors in the world? 2. That although eight sorts of sinners only are here reckoned up, yet all others who live and die impenitently in any known sin, besides these, of what kind soever, are certainly included, and their damnation implied also, as well as these; for whoever lives in the habitual practice of any known sin, without converting from it unto God, is certainly in a state of damnation. Note lastly, That the sins here mentioned must not be understood copulatively, but disjunctively; we must not suppose that such as are guilty of all the before-mentioned sins, are the persons threatened with hell-fire; but such as are with allowance guilty of any one of these, or of any other besides these, and continuing impenitently in them.

9 And there came unto me one of the seven angels which had the seven vials full of the seven last plagues, and talked with me, saying, Come hither, I will shew thee the bride, the Lamb's wife. 10 ¶ And he carried me away in the spirit to a great and high mountain, and shewed me that great city, the holy Jerusalem, descending out of heaven from God, 11 Having the glory of God: and her light was like unto a stone most precious, even like a jasper stone, clear as chrystal:

chryſtal; 12 And had a wall great and high, and had twelve gates, and at the gates twelve angels, and names written thereon, which are the names of the twelve tribes of the children of Iſrael. 13 On the eaſt, three gates: on the north, three gates; on the ſouth, three gates; and on the weſt, three gates. 14 And the wall of the city had twelve foundations, and in them the names of the twelve apoſtles of the Lamb.

St. John having delivered, before, a general account of the ſaints' happineſs in heaven, deſcends here to a more particular deſcription of it. Heaven, called the New Jeruſalem is repreſented by a city, with magnificent gates and walls; and the church, the collective body of glorified ſaints, is here called the Lamb's wife, eſpouſed before, but the marriage ſolemnized now. Note here, 1. That as the earthly Jeruſalem was a type of the church militant, ſo the church triumphant is called the New Jeruſalem, and compared to a great city, for the multitude of its members; and ſtyled holy, becauſe ſanctity is the ſpecial qualification of thoſe who are the inhabitants of it. 2. The light which is found in this city, it is not compared to the light of the ſun, for that is attended with ſcorching heat, nor to the light of the moon, which is variable and uncertain, but to the light of precious ſtones, which is clear and pure, and has nothing annoying in it. 3. The great ſafety and ſecurity of this city, and of all the citizens, inhabiting therein; here is a wall great and high: Walls are for defence (called mœnia a muniendo) and the higher the wall, the greater the defence; God's omnipotency is as a wall, and will be an invincible bulwark about his ſaints in heaven, nothing ſhall endanger them, nothing ſhall offend them. 4. Here are twelve gates, for the conveniency of entrance into this city on all ſides, and to give free and eaſy acceſs from all parts, eaſt, weſt, north, and ſouth; to ſignify, that the church in heaven will be made up of perſons coming from all parts, as Chriſt foretold, Matt. viii. 11. Luke xiii. 29. They ſhall come from the eaſt, &c. and ſhall ſit down with Abraham. The triumphant church is a collective body of believers, of all nations, kindreds, and people, tongues and languages. Laſtly, That as the names of workmen are ſometimes ſet upon foundation-ſtones, by which it is well known in after ages who were the builders; in like manner it is here intimated, that as the ancient Jewiſh church was founded in twelve patriarchs, ſo the latter Chriſtian church in and by twelve apoſtles, Jeſus Chriſt himſelf being the chief-corner ſtone, or the foundation of both, he being fundamentum fundans, they fundamenta fundata; teaching us, that our faith muſt be built upon the doctrine of Chriſt and his apoſtles, and upon no other doctrine whatſoever, though it has a pretended ſtamp of infallibility upon it.

15 And he that talked with me had a golden reed to meaſure the city, and the gates thereof, and the wall thereof. 16 And the city lieth four-ſquare, and the length is as large as the breadth. And he meaſured the city with the reed, twelve thouſand furlongs. The length and the breadth and the height of it are equal. 17 And he meaſured the wall thereof an hundred and forty and four cubits, according to the meaſure of a man, that is, of the angel.

Still St. John proceeds in the deſcription of the heavenly ſtate, and the church triumphant in it; this is called a city, in reſpect of its magnificent building, comely order, and invincible ſtrength; a great city, in regard of its largeneſs and capaciouſneſs, being full of glorified ſaints and angels; and Jeruſalem, becauſe of that everlaſting peace which is there enjoyed, as the Hebrew word ſignifies; and here an account is given of the meaſuring of this great city: We read of its meaſuring before, chap. xi. but differently from its meaſuring now; then it was meaſured by a man, now by an angel; then by an ordinary reed, now by a golden reed; intimating the tranſcendency of the ſtate of the church now, to what it was before, and repreſenting the firmneſs, perfection, and greatneſs of the New Jeruſalem. Note, An obſervable difference in the meaſuring of the church militant, and of the church triumphant; the church militant, upon a juſt meaſure by the reed of the word, is found unequal in its parts, ſome parts of it are purer and better than others, but in the new Jeruſalem all parts are equal in perfection and purity; the length is as large as the breadth, and the height equal to either; the church of Chriſt in heaven ſhall be exceeding large and great, perfect and complete, nothing ſhall be found irregular in it, all things can there endure the meaſuring reed, and abide the exacteſt trial.

18 And the building of the wall of it was of jaſper: and the city was pure gold, like unto clear glaſs. 19 And the foundations of the wall of the city were garniſhed with all manner of precious ſtones. The firſt foundation was jaſper; the ſecond, a ſapphire; the third a chalcedony; the fourth, an emerald; 20 The fifth, a ſardonyx; the ſixth, a ſardius; the ſeventh, a chryſolite; the eighth, a beryl; the ninth, a topaz; the tenth, a chryſopraſus; the eleventh, a jacinth; the twelfth, an amethyſt. 21 And the twelve gates were twelve pearls; every ſeſeral gate was of one pearl: and the ſtreet of the city was pure gold, as it were tranſparent glaſs.

Some will have all this to ſignify and repreſent the pureſt ſtate of the church here upon earth; but if there ſhall be any ſtate on this ſide eternity which answereth this glorious repreſentation, how much more will the perfect glorious church in heaven fully answer it? What was ſaid of Jeruſalem of old, may be truly ſpoken of the New Jeruſalem above, Pſal. lxxxvii. 3. Very excellent things are ſpoken of thee, thou city of God: her pavement of gold, her gates of pearl, her walls of precious ſtone, denoting the durableneſs and permanency of the ſaints' happineſs, the delight and ſatisfaction that accompany it, and the reſplendent glory of it; as gold excels all metals, and is not ſubject to corruption, as precious ſtones are full of ſplendour and glory; in like manner will the manſions of heaven be moſt glorious, the converſation there pure and incorrupt, affording ſaints ſuch an entire ſatisfaction as entirely exceeds all that the moſt rich and glorious things of this world can aſſert for the gratification of the outward ſenſes.

22 And I saw no temple therein: for the Lord God Almighty, and the Lamb, are the temple of it. 23 ¶ And the city had no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine in it: for the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof. 24 ¶ And the nations of them which are saved shall walk in the light of it: and the kings of the earth do bring their glory and honour into it. 25 And the gates of it shall not be shut at all by day: for there shall be no night there. 26 And they shall bring the glory and honour of the nations into it. 27 And there shall in no wise enter into it any thing that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie: but they which are written in the Lamb's book of life.

Observe here, 1. St. John declares that the new Jerusalem shall not want either those spiritual supplies or natural advantages which Jerusalem below stood in need of; no need of any temple there for external worship and ordinances, which it is our duty to wait upon God in here: What need an house of prayer for them that want nothing to pray for? what need of ministers and ordinances, to teach them whose knowledge is perfected? what need of sacraments to remember Christ in and by, when they shall always see Christ face to face? Again, What need of the natural light of the sun and moon, where the sun of righteousness forever shineth, and where God is all in all! Happy they that enjoy him, for they enjoy all good in him and by him, he being the fountain of all goodness! 2. Having thus described the city, St. John next declares who shall be the citizens, namely, the nations that are saved, all believing Jews and converted Gentiles, called elsewhere, the general assembly and church of the first-born, which are a great multitude; these shall be admitted into it, and partake of the glory and happiness of it: And whereas it is added, that kings do bring their honour and glory into it, this is not to be so understood as if there would be a distinction in heaven between kings and subjects; no, all the saints there are kings and priests unto God; neither is it meant that kings shall carry their earthly glory and honour with them into heaven; but that kings who shall be so happy as to come thither, shall see all their honour and glory swallowed up in the glory and happiness of that place and state, and shall confess that all their crowns are dunghills compared with the dignity of this throne. 3. It is declared what perfect security and peace the saints enjoy in the new Jerusalem, together with their glory, riches, and happiness; this is signified, ver. 25, The gate shall not be shut at all by day, and there is no night to shut them in; the gates shall be open, to shew their peaceable state and secure tranquillity, without fear of any hostile invasion or entry of enemies, either by force or fraud: It is added, There shall be no night there, either in a literal or a metaphorical sense, no darkness, no interruption of happiness, nor fear of danger, nothing that can either disturb or disquiet. 4. Who the persons are that shall be everlastingly debarred the enjoyment of all this happiness, all that have defiled themselves by lust and uncleanness, every person that hath not, by holiness of heart and life, separated himself from sin and wickedness, and dedicated himself to God and his service; nothing that defileth, nothing that worketh abomination, no open scandalous sinner, or he that maketh a lie, shall he admitted; to tell a lie is bad, but to make a lie is much worse, this is the devil's sin in a special manner, it is his by temptation, it is his by approbation, it is his by practice; he is a liar, and the father of lies and liars; it were well if our customary liars would consider it. The sum of all is, "That without grace and holiness here, there can be no expectation of glory and happiness hereafter; this sits at once for the employment of heaven and the enjoyment of heaven, it makes meet for the inheritance in light, and if we have not our present fruit unto holiness, our end can never be everlasting life."

CHAP. XXII.

AND he shewed me a pure river of water of life, clear as chrystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb.

St. John in this and the four following verses, goes on with the description of the heavenly Jerusalem, which he had begun in the former chapter; and here we have observable, 1. The city described, as having a clear river running through it, and this of the water of life, an allusion, doubtless, to the earthly paradise, Gen. ii. which was well watered, without which accomodation, no place can be happy; the heavenly paradise here, or the new Jerusalem, is said to have a pure river of water in it, denoting the pure and unmixed joys of heaven, and those rivers of pleasure which are at God's right hand for evermore. Here is not a well of water, but a river, not of muddy or fetulent water, but clear as chrystal, not corruptible or dead, but living water, water of life. 2. The head or spring of this river declared, from whence it doth arise, not from the hills, which may be cut off, diverted, or dried up, but it proceeds out of the throne of God, and of the Lamb, and therefore can no more fail, than God and Christ can fail: no river can fail, unless the springs that feed it fail; the saints in heaven shall be refreshed with such consolations as flow from the Father, Son, and holy Spirit, and their comforts cannot fail till they fail.

2 ¶ In the midst of the street of it, and on either side of the river, was there the tree of life, which bare twelve manner of fruits, and yielded her fruit every month; and the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations.

Note, 1. That as there was a river and a tree of life in the terrestrial paradise, so in allusion thereunto, both are said to be in the heavenly paradise; Behold here a tree of such vast proportion and extent, that its branches extend to both sides, that all may receive benefit by it: Who can this agree with but Jesus Christ, who is called a tree of life, because from him we have our natural, our spiritual, and our eternal life? from this tree do bud forth all the fruits of grace and comfort, and that for all seasons and conditions. In its leaves are for healing, as well as its fruits for food. 2. All Christ, 1. Our souls have all necessities for food and physic, variety of fruits, called here twelve manner of fruits, that is, variety of graces, and comforts of all sorts. 3. In him are these fruits at all times: This tree bears fruit every month, winter winter fruits as well as summer fruits, even in the black month of sickness and death. Christ is continually distributing of his divine fulness to the satisfaction of his people; he is all in all, in the enjoyment of mercy; he is all in all, in want of mercy: he is all, in order to his people's salvation; and he is all, in their glorification. Quest. But will there be any need either of food or physic in heaven? If not, what need of the fruits of this tree for food, or of its leaves for healing? Ans. We cannot suppose that in the heavenly state there will be any want either of meat or medicines, any hunger that shall require food, or any sickness to stand in need of physic; but as food and physic are the instrumental means of the preservation of natural life, without which it will certainly and suddenly decay; in like manner our Lord Jesus Christ doth not only give spiritual life unto his people, but he is the conserving cause of it, he doth maintain, and will preserve it without the least decay to all eternity.

4 And there shall be no more curse: but the throne of God and of the Lamb shall be in it, and his servants shall serve him. 4 And they shall see his face; and his name shall be in their foreheads. 5 ¶ And there shall be no night there; and they need no candle, neither light of the sun; for the Lord giveth them light: and they shall reign for ever and ever.

St. John has not yet done with this copious description of the new Jerusalem, but here he closes it by doing these two things. 1. He shews what shall not be found there, there shall be no curse, no accursed person, or accursed thing, no sin, nor any thing sinful, that deserves the curse; and there shall be no night there, no darkness of ignorance or error, or darkness of affliction, temptation, or desertion, no night of natural darkness, no night of spiritual darkness, much less of eternal darkness which is the portion of the wicked: farther, there shall be no need of natural light, the light of the sun, no need of artificial light, the light of a candle; no need of the spiritual light of the word and ordinances, all which shall then and there cease. 2. He shews what there shall be there, namely, (1.) The throne of God and the Lamb, that is, the glorious and everlasting presence of God and Christ, as on a throne of royal majesty, inasmuch, that, the name of the city may be Jehovah Shammah, the Lord is there. (2.) It is added, that his servants shall serve him, that is, the glorious angels and glorified saints shall continually stand before him, and administer unto him, not spend their eternity in a perpetual gazing upon God, but executing his commands, obeying him with vigour, praising him with cheerfulness, loving him above measure, fearing him without torment, trusting him without despondency, serving him without lassitude and weariness, without interruption or distraction, praising God, and singing eternal allelujah's to the Lamb for ever and ever. 3. It is declared that they shall see God's face, which imports fruition as well as vision of him, together with a sweet and satisfactory delectation in him. St. Matt. v. 8. Heb. xii. 14. Blessed are the pure in heart, and holy in life, for they shall see God; that is, have a clear and apprehensive, though not a full and comprehensive knowledge of him. (4.) His name shall be in their foreheads: his name, that is, his holy nature, his image and likeness, by which they shall be known, as a man is by his name; an allusion probably to the high priest, who had beliefs to the Lord written on his frontlet; or a reflection upon the worshippers of the beast, who have his name on their foreheads; in like manner the name of God shall be on his servants foreheads; they are thankful for imperfect lineaments here, but shall be satisfied with his likeness then and there. Lastly, It is closed with this, they shall reign for ever and ever, not for a thousand years, as the militant church is said to reign on earth after antichrist's destruction, but for eternal ages, and this not partially, but fully and completely, when all their spiritual enemies, sin, Satan, and the world, yea, death itself, shall be put under their feet, and that forever. From the whole learn, That when we are at any time dejected upon the account of our dark and imperfect knowledge, or afflicted upon the occasion of many wearisome nights and days of sin and sorrow, of trouble and temptation, of misery and desertion, which we have here on earth, let this meditation comfort us, that the happy day is coming, when there shall be no night, but an eternal sabbath of rest, light and life, with plenty of all good things, even fulness of joy and rivers of pleasure for evermore.

6 And he said unto me, These sayings are faithful and true. And the Lord God of the holy prophets sent his angel to shew unto his servants the things which must shortly be done. 7 Behold, I come quickly: blessed is he that keepeth the sayings of the prophecy of this book. 8 And I John saw these things, and heard them. And when I had heard and seen, I fell down to worship before the feet of the angel which shewed me these things. 9 ¶ Then saith he unto me, See thou do it not: for I am thy fellow-servant, and of thy brethren the prophets, and of them which keep the sayings of this book. Worship God.

The prophetic part of this book being now ended, here follows the conclusion, which is managed in a way of dialogue between Christ, the angel, and the apostle. Note here, 1. How the divine authority of this book is strongly asserted, and its excellency commended: These sayings are faithful and true; that is, all things contained in this book of prophecies are certain and infallibly true. The holy Spirit of God foresaw that this book would be more questioned than other books of holy scripture, therefore he confirms the divine authority of it by an holy angel, and the truth of all things in it, and especially that which relates to the happiness of the saints in heaven, the inhabitants of the new Jerusalem, with a frequent assertion, viz. These sayings are faithful and true. It is added, they shall shortly be done: this is spoken of the beginning of their accomplishment, they shall begin to be fulfilled, and to take effect, and shall receive their full and final accomplishment in due time. Behold here in Christ's omniscency an evident proof of his divinity, he knows all things to come, as well as all things past; and whereas Christ says, these things shall shortly be done; we learn, that the time of the church's suffering is a limited time, it is a short time, after which shall follow an eternal deliverance and a great reward. Note farther, That

That Christ subjoins a promise and assurance of the certainty and suddenness of his coming to judgment, for the support of his church, during the short time of her sufferings and services, Behold, I come quickly; next, he pronounces them blessed who keep the words of this book, not only in memory and profession, but in practice and performance. Observe, lastly, The sincerity of St. John, the penman of this book, he leaves here upon record his relapse into that error into which he had fallen before, chap. xix. 10. The good man relates his own sin; yea, records his relapse into the same sin, once and again, which, as it discovers that he preferred the glory of God before his own reputation, so it evidently declares that a holy man may possibly relapse into the same sin, through inadvertency, or the power of a temptation, and how much it is the duty of every one that thinketh he standeth, to take heed lest he fall. Of St. John's weakness in worshipping the angel, see the notes on chap. xix. 10, as also the angel's answer, Worship God; as much as if he had said, "Thou mistakest the object of thine adoration, I am a created being, and can accept of no such homage as this, which is peculiarly due to the great Creator.

10 And he saith unto me, Seal not the sayings of the prophecy of this book: for the time is at hand, 11 He that is unjust, let him be unjust still: and he that is filthy, let him be filthy still: and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still: and he that is holy, let him be holy still.

Observe here, 1. A strict charge given unto St. John, not to seal or close up the words of this prophecy, but to publish and make it known, for the use and benefit of the church, for which reason this book is called a revelation; Seal not the sayings of the prophecy of this book. Where mark, That although this book be the obscurest part of the scripture, yet it is Christ's command that it should not be concealed from the knowledge of the people; How sacrilegious then is the practice of the church of Rome in robbing the common people of all the scriptures, locking them up in an unknown tongue, and forbidding the people to read the same? Observe, 2. How the Holy Ghost here pre-occupies an objection, which St. John might be ready to make: "If I seal not up, but make known this prophecy, the wicked men of the world, persecutors especially, will be made worse by it, they will be unjust still, and filthy still, and more so than ever:" Be it so, says he, yet the righteous will be more confirmed in their course of obedience, and such as are holy, will be holy still; and such as are righteous, will be righteous still. There is, we see, a dangerous perseverance in sin, as well as a desirable perseverance in grace and holiness; let him that is unclean be unclean still: Where mark, This is no permission, much less a persuasion to sin, but a dreadful threatening or commination, that such as give up themselves to sinning, shall be judicially given up by God to sin as a punishment; such a liberty as this to sin, is the worst of bondage. Again, he that is holy, let him be holy still; the words carry with them not only the force of a command, and the direction of a rule, but the sweetness of a promise, and a gracious privilege, that they shall persevere in holiness unto the end.

12 And behold, I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be.

The former verses contained a dialogue or interjectory discourse between the angel and St. John; here Christ begins to speak, and continues his speech to the middle of the 20th verse, wherein he declares, that it will not be long before he comes to judge the world, to give unto those who are good, everlasting happiness; and to them that are evil, everlasting punishment. Here observe, 1. An excitation, behold! 2. The celestial object, Christ Jesus, I come quickly. And 3. The end of his coming, My reward is with me, to render unto every one according to his works. Learn hence, 1. That the notices of our Lord's coming to judgment are usually, in scripture, uttered in with great solemnity, with a mark of attention and observation; this word behold, is generally prefixed and set before; thus, Jude 7. Behold! the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints, &c. So the Apostle James gives an awful admonition, Behold! the Judge standeth before the door, ready to pass a final sentence. And St. John in this book of the Revelation seldom speaks of Christ coming, but he breaks forth into an extacy of admiration. Learn 2. That the special distribution of rewards and punishments is reserved till the second coming and appearance of Jesus Christ; My reward is with me, to give to every man according to his work. Learn 3. That it is our wisdom and duty to represent, by actual and solemn thoughts, the certain and speedy coming of Christ to the righteous judgment of the world.

13 I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last. 14 Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city.

As if Christ had said, "I am the eternal God, the first cause and the last end of all things; I first made the world, and I will at last put a period to it; and when time shall be no more, they shall for ever be happy in the enjoyment of me, who have here obeyed me, and lived in conformity to my doctrine and example; they shall through holiness enter the gates of the new Jerusalem, that glorious city, having the tree of life in it; present blessedness, as well as future happiness, belongs to those that obey God's will, and keep his commandments; Blessed are they, and blessed for ever shall they be."

15 For without are dogs, and forcerers, and whoremongers, and murderers, and idolaters, and whosoever loveth and maketh a lie.

Without, that is, without the gates of the city of the New Jerusalem, are all filthy and unclean sinners, all cruel and bloody persecutors, all raging and furious enemies to me and my people, all idolaters, and all liars; these shall be shut out of heaven, as dogs are shut out of the house; and shut into hell, to be imprisoned with devils and damned spirits, and that everlastingly, to lie for ever in that mysterious fire, whose strange property it is always to torture but

but never to kill, or always to kill but never to consume : They would die, but they cannot die ; they seek for death, but cannot find it ; they desire it, but it flies from them.

16 I Jesus have sent mine angel to testify unto you these things in the churches. I am the root and the off-spring of David, and the bright and morning-star.

Observe here, 1. That the Lord Jesus Christ is the author of this revelation, and owneth it to be his ; the angel did but declare it, St. John did but write it, Christ himself was the inditer of it : They were not the inventions of St. John nor the sayings of the angel, but the revelation was Christ's ; which leaves all men inexcusable who believe not the same, but question the divine authority thereof. 2. The titles here by Christ given of himself (1.) The root of David ; that is, as God, from whom by creation David and all mankind had their being, and did spring. (2.) The off-spring of David, according to his humanity : Christ as God was the root of David ; but considered as man, David was the root of Christ, Isa. xi. 1. There shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a branch shall grow out of his roots. (3.) Christ styles himself the bright morning-star, that is, the light of the world, enlightening and enlivening the new creation : The fountain of all knowledge, grace, and comfort on earth, and of all glory and happiness in heaven. As the morning-star first brings light to the world, so Christ first published the light of the gospel, and now, by this revelation, gives a superadded light to his people, informing them what shall befall his church until his second coming to judgment.

17 And the Spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth, say, Come. And let him that is athirst, come : and whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely.

Observe here, 1. The persons mentioned, the Spirit and the bride : By the Spirit understand the Holy Ghost, and by the bride the whole catholic church in general, both in heaven and earth, and every true believer in particular. Behold how the Spirit speaks in the bride, and how the bride speaks from and by the Spirit. Christ by his Spirit is present with her, by his influence he is assistant to her. 2. The title here given to the church, she is called Christ's bride, and he elsewhere called her Bridegroom : Now this title of a bride given to her, is, 1. A title of eminency and excellency, and stands in opposition to adultery ; she is a bride, not a whore : The false church is not a bride, but the whore, and so often called : She desires not Christ's coming, no more than an adulteress desires the return of her husband, but the bride, being a chaste, virgin, longs for it. 2. As the word bride is a word of excellency, as it stands in opposition to adultery, so it is a word of extenuation and diminution, as it stands in a distinction from matrimony and complete marriage ; it is the bride not a married wife. The saints are contracted to Christ in this world ; the marriage is near, and shall be consummated in the next. A bride is a spouse in the confines of marriage, near the approaches of the conjugal solemnity : Blessed be God ! it will not be long before Christ and his church, Christ and every believer, who are now betrothed and espoused, shall be fully and completely married, and in the perfect enjoyment of each other. Observe 3. The affection which this bride expresses towards her bridegroom ; she says, Come ; she passionately and impatiently desires, and vehemently longs for his coming. Come, is a word of invitation, "I pray, come, it is my earnest suit and request that thou wouldst come." Learn hence, That the glorious coming and appearance of Jesus Christ to judgment, is vehemently desired and earnestly longed for by all believers. The Spirit in the bride, and the bride by the Spirit, say Come. Observe, 4. The invitation of access returned by Christ : the bride says, Come ; says Christ, Let him that is athirst, come : We must first come to Christ by faith and repentance, before we can ever desire Christ's coming to us by death and judgment. Lastly, The intimation given by Christ of a gracious acceptance, and a grateful entertainment : Whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely. Here note, 1. The benefit mentioned, or the mercy offered, water of life, all grace here, and glory hereafter ; grace, as it leads to glory, and glory, as it follows upon grace : Grace carries life in the bosom of it, even eternal life. 2. The persons to whom this benefit is offered and tendered, and that is, to whosoever will : to shew that salvation is not forced upon us against our wills, but bestowed upon us in the use of our faculties, and in the exercise of our own endeavours. We are the subjects of this willingness, but God is the author of it, Psal. cx. 3. Certum est nos velle, cum volumus ; sed Deus facit ut velimus ; prebendo vires efficacissimas voluntati ; says St. Austin. Note, 3. The offer itself, let him take it freely : Grace is the free gift of God as well as eternal life. Such is God's munificence and royalty, that he will not sell his good things ; if he did, such is our indigence and poverty, that we could never buy them ; therefore, says God, take freely : Yet we must understand it only of a freedom from merit, not of freedom from endeavour. God's offers in the gospel are conditional ; he proffers his Son, and all good with him, but upon condition of our acceptance on his own terms. Let none then straiten the grace of God where he has enlarged it. If a man has a mind to keep his sins, he shall have no mercy, be they never so small ; but if he be willing to leave his sins, and to accept an offered Saviour, as offered, he shall not be excluded from mercy, be they never so great.

18 ¶ For I testify unto every man that heareth the words of the prophecy of this book, If any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book : 19 And if any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the book of life, and out of the holy city, and from the things which are written in this book.

Here we have a dreadful commination and severe threatening denounced by Christ, against all such as shall add any thing to the scriptures in general, and to this prophecy in particular ; not by way of true interpretation, but either formally, by joining any thing to be received as scripture which God never revealed to be such ; or virtually, by putting such a sense and meaning upon scripture as God never intended, and the words cannot rationally bear. Almighty God here declares, that he will add to such his plagues, and shut them out of the holy city, the new Jerusalem, the kingdom of heaven: And if so, learn we, what great guilt the church of Rome contracts, and what a dreadful curse she lies under, by making oral tradition of equal authority with the scriptures, and by adding new articles of faith, new points of doctrines, which is, in effect, to accuse God of ignorance or inadvertency. True, the doctrine of christianity is a tradition; it was delivered by Christ to the apostles, and by the apostles to their successors, but now they being long since dead, we cannot receive from them the doctrine of life by word of mouth, but must stick to the scriptures, or written word, for these things were written for our sake. But if any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book. We reject not all traditions, because scripture itself is a tradition; but we blame the church of Rome, and deservedly so, for making her private unwritten traditions of equal authority with the scriptures, and for urging, that they ought to be received pari pietatis affectu, with the same pious affection with which we receive the holy scriptures. And thus they set their post by God's post, and equal their traditions with the doctrines of faith: Their opinion is bad, but their practice is worse; for they value their own traditions above the scriptures, and prefer them before the scriptures; they never call their own traditions 'a nose of wax, a dead letter, a dumb rule, an obscure doctrine;' but in this manner have they stigmatized the holy scriptures; and how they will escape Christ's severe commination here before us, for adding to, and taking from, the word of God, concerns them to look to it; for they must certainly answer for it at the bar of God.

20 He which testifieth these things, faith, Surely I come quickly.—

That is, Jesus Christ, the faithful and true witness, from whom St. John received this revelation, as he formerly had done the holy gospel, faith, Surely I come quickly. Where note, 1. That this prophecy or promise of God's second coming to judge the world, is here left as Christ's last word upon record; it is almost the last word in the bible; doubtless, that it might be seriously minded, and frequently remembered by us. Christ had in this chapter twice before, namely, at ver. 7, and 12, testified that he came quickly; yet he repeats it here again, to excite us to prepare for it, and to live continually in the expectation of it. Note, That as Christ has three several times in this chapter given us the assurance of the certainty of his coming, so he prefixes an écce, or behold, before it, Behold! I come quickly; and here he prefixes the word surely before it, Surely, I come quickly, to awaken the security and leave the incredibility of sinners without excuse, who live as if they did not believe any such day would come.

—Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus.

To the forementioned assurance of the certainty of our Saviour's coming, St. John, in the name of the whole church, subjoins a hearty Amen, an earnest wish, a passionate desire and longing for our Lord's coming, saying, Even so, come, Lord Jesus, as thou hast promised, and thy people long expected. Learn hence, 1. That the coming of Christ to judgment, is a truth firmly believed, and earnestly desired by all good christians. St. John here, in the name of the church, takes, as it were, the word out of Christ's mouth, like a quick echo, presently improves the promise into a prayer. Christ's farewell word to his church is, I come quickly; the church's farewell suit to Christ is, Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly. Quest. But why is Christ's second coming so exceedingly desired by his church and children? Ans. For finishing the days of sinning, and destroying the works of Satan; for accomplishing the number of his own elect, and for hastening his kingdom; for freeing the creature from subjection to vanity; for manifesting the glory of his justice and mercy, and for putting his saints into the full and final possession of their promised inheritance. Learn, 2. That it is the unfeigned desire of God's faithful servants, to have the full fruition of Jesus Christ; this is the habitual desire of their hearts, that Christ would come, and receive them to himself, though at the same time, they may tremble at some circumstances of his coming. There is a degree of sinful bondage, which hinders much our spiritual confidence and boldness; but the more holy we are, the more emboldened we shall be against the day of judgment.

21 The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.

This is an epistolary conclusion, used almost in all the epistles of the New Testament, and so here, because this prophecy was in the manner of an epistle directed to the churches: St. John began this epistle with this salutation. chap. i. 4. and so ends with it here; he knew there would be a long tract of time intervening between the giving of the promise, and the fulfilling of it, between the bride's making herself ready, and the day wherein the marriage was to be solemnized; he well knew, that before the consummation of all things, there were many sad dispensations which the churches would certainly meet with, many false doctrines would be spread, many duties to be performed, many afflictions to be endured; all which would require an extraordinary assistance and special grace; therefore he prays, that the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ may be with them all: teaching us, incessantly to desire for ourselves, and to crave for others, the auxiliary aids of divine grace, to enable the acceptable performance of every duty, and to the patient enduring of every trial; the greatest mercy that can be wished to any, or that any can wish unto themselves, is the grace of God to excite and quicken us to our duty, and to assist and help us in the performance of it; and accordingly, St. John shuts up this book, and therewith the canon of the whole scripture in these words, The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, be with you all. Amen.

Trinitati gloria sempiterna.
